INTERPARLIAMENTARY DELEGATIONS

TABLING OF FIFTEENTH REPORT OF THE CANADIAN SECTION OF THE AIPLF

Mrs. Nicole Roy-Arcelin (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Communications): Mr. Speaker, pursuant to Standing Order 34, I have the honour to present to the House, in both official languages, the fifteenth report of the Canadian section of the Assemblée internationale des parlementaires de langue française.

MEASURE TO ENACT

Hon. Gilles Loiselle (President of the Treasury Board and Minister of State (Finance)) moved that Bill C-9, an Act to facilitate combatting the laundering of proceeds of crime, be read the first time and be printed.

Motion agreed to, bill read the first time and ordered to be printed.

DEPARTMENT OF AGRICULTURE ACT

MEASURE TO AMEND

Mr. Peter Milliken (Kingston and the Islands) moved for leave to introduce Bill C-208, an Act to amend the Department of Agriculture Act.

He said: Mr. Speaker, this bill seeks to amend the Department of Agriculture Act.

[English]

The purpose of the bill is to delete the section of the act which permits the Governor in Council to assign powers or duties to the Minister of Agriculture. These powers are currently used to create new agricultural programs. The report of the Auditor General of Canada tabled in this House, I believe in 1989, recommended that this power be deleted from the act. This bill carries out that purpose and will require the minister to come to the House if he seeks to establish a new agricultural program rather than create it on his own without proper authority.

That is the purpose of the amendment to the act. It is a short and very simple act which I hope will commend itself to all hon. members.

Motion agreed to, bill read the first time and ordered to be printed.

PETITIONS

SALARY INCREASES

Mr. Jack Whittaker (Okanagan—Similkameen—Merritt): Mr. Speaker, I rise pursuant to Standing Order 36 to present a petition sent to me recently by a number of Public Service employees of Agriculture Canada, the Summerland Research Station in particular: "Whereas the government has introduced a new budget which outlines the need for fiscal restraint in this time of recession; and whereas the government has imposed a zero per cent wage hike ceiling on federal public employees for 1991; and whereas the recent 10 per cent total pay increase given to members of Parliament should be rolled back in keeping with this policy of restraint, wherefore, the undersigned, your petitioners, humbly pray and call upon Parliament to implement the aforesaid request."

ROYAL CANADIAN MOUNTED POLICE

Mr. Nelson A. Riis (Kamloops): Mr. Speaker, it is my pleasure and honour to present a petition on behalf of a number of citizens from the great city of Logan Lake, British Columbia, who are concerned about the government's decision to cut back on Royal Canadian Mounted Police funding.

They point out in a number of ways how this has affected their community, how this may result in increased levels of lawlessness throughout the region and are asking the Government of Canada to reconsider its funding cuts to the RCMP and provide the police force with a mandate and the ability to continue its role as the only visible police force for many British Columbia communities and a viable symbol of Canadian unity.

The petitioners point out that if this is permitted to proceed, the effect would be that local telephone rates will escalate and add a lot of additional cost to people who use the telephone.

The petitioners are asking the Minister of Communications to oppose Unitel's bid to compete with Canada's telephone companies in long distance service. They are urging the Minister of Communications to consult with all the affected parties, specifically those citizens living outside Canada's urban areas who will be impacted most severely by this deregulation.

PETRO-CANADA

Mr. Lyle Kristiansen (Kootenay West—Revelstoke): Mr. Speaker, I am pleased, pursuant to Standing Order 36, to present a petition signed by some 58 petitioners who are mostly from my own riding of Kootenay West—Revelstoke, the communities of Slocan, Johnsons Landing, Argenta, the cities of Revelstoke, Castlegar, Trail, and outside from Salmon Arm, Vancouver and Sparwood, British Columbia.

The petitioners ask Parliament to give serious consideration to the matter of Petro-Canada and Bill C-84, to take into consideration matters of price stability and energy security.

For a number of environmental reasons, they call upon Parliament to defeat or repeal Bill C-84, an act respecting the privatization of the National Petroleum Company of Canada and to keep Petro-Canada as a Crown corporation acting in the best interest of all Canadians.

GOVERNMENT ORDERS

[English]

Hon. Gilles Loiselle (President of the Treasury Board and Minister of State (Finance)): moved that Bill C-9, an act to facilitate combating the laundering of proceeds of crime, be read the second time and referred to a legislative committee.

He said: Mr. Speaker, the bill we have before us, Bill C-9, entitled an act to facilitate combating the laundering of proceeds of crime, is part of Canada's national drug strategy. As such, it builds on and complements other legislation that Canada has introduced in this area, most notably Bill C-58 which was designed to enhance international law enforcement co-operation and Bill C-61 which made money laundering a criminal offence.

Its purpose is to discourage the use of Canada's financial system by criminals and to ensure that there is an adequate paper trail for our law enforcement authorities to carry out money laundering investigations.

The bill is consistent with the recommendations of the G-7 financial action task force on money laundering and consistent with those of the advisory committee on money laundering, a joint, private-public sector group which I chair.

The bill also has the support of Canada's financial community and a cross-section of senior officials from that community are members of the advisory committee.

Before I turn briefly to the specific measures in the bill, I would like to outline the setting in which the bill was developed.

As you know, drug trafficking, unfortunately, is something which plagues all modern societies. Familiarity, however, should not breed complacency. The destruction that drug trafficking renders is a tragedy of gigantic proportion. Individual lives, families and communities can and are being destroyed in Canada and elsewhere.

Drug trafficking generates large volumes of cash and therein lies both its attraction and its vulnerability. The proceeds of crime, particularly from drug trafficking, must be converted in other seemingly legitimate forms. The act of doing so is of course called "money laundering".

Without money laundering, drug trafficking would be less profitable and, therefore, less attractive to the criminal element in society.

[Translation]

In July 1989, the leaders of the G-7 countries announced the establishment of a Financial Action Task Force to study and make recommendations on measures to combat money laundering. The Task Force's first report was released in April, 1990. It contains 40 recommendations for action. At the Economic Summit in Houston in July 1990 the Prime Minister and the other G-7 leaders made clear their intention to fully implement the Task Force's recommendations quickly.

I think that we all can feel some measure of satisfaction in that Canada is in substantial compliance with the Task Force's recommendations. One area where we fall short, however, is in ensuring that our financial institutions, other businesses and professionals who handle large volumes of cash maintain adequate records. This brings me back to Bill C-9, which is designed to fill this gap.

[English]

The bill, the short title of which is the Proceeds of Crime (Money Laundering) Act, is linked to the criminal offence of money laundering as defined in the Criminal Code, the Narcotics Control Act and the Food and Drug Act.

It is important to note that the provisions of the legislation focus on record keeping, not on reporting. The specific details relating to the keeping of records will be established by regulation. The records in question are limited to those which have been determined to be useful in the prevention, investigation and prosecution of money laundering.

This approach allows us to be flexible so that as the channels by which money is laundered change, the methods used to combat it can be adjusted. The bill is similar in most respects, Mr. Speaker, to Bill C-89, which we introduced in the last Parliament. However, the current bill calls for a consultation period of at least 90 days between the time of publication of regulations issued under the bill and their finalization.

In addition, the wording of certain sections of the bill has been made more precise. The revised bill makes it clear that intent is required before penalties apply. In addition, the regulation-making power of the government, with regard to determining the accuracy of information contained in records, only applies to the identification of clients.

The bill, I can assure you, will not reduce the traditional safeguards with respect to access to these records.

Finally, the bill imposes penalties in accordance with the seriousness of the situation. In closing, I do not need to remind the House that drug trafficking and money laundering pose major challenges to society.

Bill C-9 is an important bill for Canadians. It is designed to strike at these social ills but in a way which is not intrusive. It is in the interests of all of us to ensure that Canada does not become a haven for money launderers. I would welcome your support for this bill.

Mr. George S. Rideout (Moncton): Mr. Speaker, it is a pleasure to rise and speak on this particular bill, Bill C-9, otherwise known as the money laundering bill.

Bill C-9 appeared in the last session as Bill C-89 and it was lost when the House was prorogued. It is probably a good thing that it was because there were some flaws in that particular legislation. We are very pleased to see that the government has responded and made some changes in the legislation that make it a little more workable.

It seems to us that there are still a few things we should take a look at. We understand that everyone is in agreement that this bill be sent off to committee, and that is positive.

The drug war, as we hear it called from time to time, is a major problem in the world. There is absolutely no question about that. Canada has in part been considered a bit of a haven as far as the drug situation is concerned. Because of our close proximity to major drug routes, because we border on the United States and in part because we have lax financial reporting laws, Canada is one of the areas in which we see the drug trade moving. I know I can speak with some knowledge as far as New Brunswick is concerned.

There have been a number of cases where planes containing large amounts of drugs have landed on rural runways. Also, certain people have arrived in the New Brunswick area and deposited guns and everything else to try to free some of the people who have already been incarcerated by our efficient police force.

We know there is a drug problem in New Brunswick. We know there is a drug problem in Canada and this bill will help, in part, to solve the problem. Obviously, the problem has to be attacked on many levels. It has to be attacked where the drugs are being produced. It also has to be attacked at the means of delivery. Third, the criminals who are making a profit on the sale of drugs have to be attacked. I think, in large measure too, consumption also has to be attacked.

There is no question that this particular bill is aimed at one aspect. That is the profits which are associated with drugs and how those get into our community and become legitimate.

The bill builds on the so-called freeze and seize legislation, C-61, which in effect created the offence of money laundering. Money laundering is described as a process by which illegitimate dollars are transformed through the financial markets into legitimate funds. The purpose is to hide the identity of the real owners of the funds and give them the appearance of being legitimate.

[Translation]

There is no question that there is a problem and it is a world-wide problem. The question is whether this legislation goes far enough. We support the bill being considered in committee, but we hope that it will be improved upon thereafter.

[English]

There is no question that it is an international problem, and that is really what has forced this matter on this House. It is the United States and the G-7 which have said that all of the nations facing this problem have to become involved. This legislation when it was first presented had to be returned to the drawing boards because it did reflect an American slant. Their laws, as they deal with barristers, solicitors and other professionals, are different than ours so it was necessary for some of the legislation to be redrafted.

The other thing we have to look at is the area of regulation. A lot of this particular legislation is aimed at allowing the law to really develop through regulation. In some senses that is good but in others it is bad because the regulations do not have the control that Parliament has over intrusions into peoples' lives. We have to remember that is the effect of this legislation.

Any transaction over $10,000 is going to be subject to an intrusion by government, in effect through the reporting of those transactions in financial institutions. On the face of it that is good. There is no question, that is the only way we are going to track this situation. At the same time, it is an intrusion into peoples' lives and we have to make sure there is a balance and that we are going to benefit.

There is no assurance yet, nor have we seen any of the necessary money placed on the table to ensure it, that the government, the RCMP and the crime enforcement agencies are going to use this information. We have to be assured that when the information is sent from the financial institutions to the law enforcement agencies that they are going to have the resources and people and the money, all of the things that are necessary, to ensure that something good will come from this legislation. It does no one any good for this information to end up on a shelf in some RCMP office without being utilized. Therefore, that becomes a major concern.

As well, with respect to the regulations, there is a concern among many that the regulations will be proclaimed, and that the different professions and different institutions which are affected will not be fully aware and not have the input that they would have if it was an actual bill that came through Parliament.

We are hopeful that in the long run there will be more control over the regulations so that the adverse effects of regulations which slip through will not be felt. We are pleased that the government at least is going to have a three-month consultation process prior to the regulations coming into effect.

There is also protection for lawyers, as far as solicitor-client privilege is concerned, as that is the other problem and is where we differ a little bit from the American system. Lawyers were faced with the conundrum of not being able to divulge information given to them by their client while, at the same time, having to face a penalty for not giving out that information. There is an attempt to clean up that particular problem.

We also see that the government is going to define "cash" and say what that term really means. That is a loose end that certain criminal elements could hide behind.

The other broad aspect of this bill is that we are going to see an attempt to close some of the borders as far as Canada is concerned. One of the mechanisms to be closed is using Canada's financial system to legitimize illegitimate money.

However, the critical aspect and something that will become interesting once the committee meets is how effective the other countries are going to be. If we do not have connections between all of the other countries then it is not going to work. The other thing we have to be aware of is that the information gathered on Canadians will be available to other countries and other law enforcement agencies. That is a good point and a bad point, as it is an intrusion into the privacy of Canadians. We have to do a cost benefit analysis to ensure that there are not adverse effects on Canadians.

The Liberal Party is prepared to support this bill at this particular stage. We are excited that it will go to committee and that we will have before us all the different interest groups involved, such as the bar society and the bankers' society. We do not know which committee, but it will be one of the very important committees of this House I am sure, perhaps the one which the hon. member chairs.

In any event, the fact that it goes to committee and that we can have submissions from those different interest groups is important. In addition to the involvement of the barristers, the chartered accountants and the bankers' associations, a good idea that has been suggested—perhaps by the chairman of that committee—is that the RCMP be involved in advising us as to what the status of things is.

Second, it probably would not hurt for us to have someone from one of the civil liberties organizations appear to talk about the cost benefits of these intrusions. Let it be perfectly clear that the Liberal Party is fully supportive of the efforts to fight the drug situation in our country and on our streets. We are prepared to go to most levels in order to have legislation which will assist law enforcement agencies in achieving that goal. However, we are not prepared to go to the extent of a complete denial of civil liberties and individual Canadians' rights.

That is why this committee is important. That is why we want to see it at committee. I thank you, Mr. Speaker, for the time to give comments on this particular bill.

Mr. Steven W. Langdon (Essex—Windsor): Occasionally there is a piece of legislation which comes before the House and receives the unanimous support of all parties, and which has reached the House through a process of negotiation and discussion, which helps to explain that unanimous support. In the case of this piece of legislation, that is very much the reality.

This legislation is a result of the decisions of the G-7 countries to, quite rightly, attempt to ensure that what we assume to be tremendous monetary flows taking place as a consequence of the illicit drug trade are made easier to track and easier to police. As my colleagues in the Liberal Party have suggested this is not for purposes of trying, to somehow hurt the privacy of people, but instead of suggesting ways for our financial institutions in this country to help control more effectively this large scale flow of illicit funds.

We are talking about the flow of illicit funds which is especially important to track. If it is not possible to do so then these illicit funds become the basis on which legal activities are established within this country. This in turn permits further profit making on the basis of what was originally an illicit sale of drugs with subsequent flow of illicit money.

From our perspective as a party we strongly share the basic purposes and goals which lie behind this legislation, and that is to try to see to it that the flow of illicit funds does not become possible in our country. It is not a secret that Canada has been seen as a relatively easy country through which money laundering can take place. This is not a reputation that any of us in this House would want this country to have, and I am certain everybody in the House will support tightening up the situation.

Our concerns however with the original bill, which came before us in a previous session of this Parliament, were that in the process of attempting to deal with a serious problem the government had established a number of clauses as part of the legislation, a number of regulations as part of the draft regulations prepared to support the legislation which frankly represented certain dangers. These dangers could conceivably penetrate for instance the relationship between a lawyer and a lawyer's clients. That penetration could begin through the search for a monetary trail based on money exchanges, but it would have the effect of leading from the purely financial considerations involved into a detailed probing, we feared and the Canadian Bar Association feared, of the lawyer-client relationship which existed in a number of situations.

It is for that reason that the original version of this legislation was very strongly condemned by the Canadian Bar Association.

The Canadian Bar Association is not an organization which ordinarily takes strong positions on pieces of federal government legislation. Yet, the Canadian Bar Association did take the highly unusual step of passing a motion at the national level, condemning this piece of legislation as it was originally drafted.

We talked about this piece of legislation with members from the opposite side, the government side. They assured us that at the time the previous legislation was in front of us, there were no problems.

We however checked to see if this were the case with a number of associations such as the Canadian Bar Association. It indicated to us that unfortunately, contrary to what we have been told, there were serious problems which led them to pass this national resolution.

Subsequently, we indicated that we would not be prepared to co-operate with the passage of this legislation. It was after this, as I understand it, that the government finally entered into serious discussion with the Canadian Bar Association and came to conclusions which now resolve the problems that were in the previous piece of legislation.

We have discussed the new piece of legislation with the Canadian Bar Association. We have discussed it with the body that represents the Canadian Chartered Accountants. We are assured by both that they see no problems with the bill as it presently stands.

We have talked with representatives of the chartered banks who have also indicated that there should be no problem from their perspective with the period of time for which financial records are required to be kept under the legislation.

I think, as a consequence of further consultation, we have a much better piece of legislation in front of us now than we had in the previous session of Parliament.

For this reason we are prepared as a party to support the legislation because, as I say, we strongly agree with the principle. Our concern was with some of the details.

Those details have now been worked through with some of the bodies that previously expressed concern.

We would still hope that when this bill goes to committee, whether it is a legislative committee or a specific standing committee, it will call before it some of those organizations which expressed concern in the past so that those concerns will in fact be overcome by the changes which have taken place.

We have heard from such organizations. We take their word, but I think it is important to see that this is explored at committee.

I have had some discussions with the parliamentary secretary to the minister. I think there is widespread agreement with respect to the three or four groups that we would want to see come before the committee.

I hope that speedy passage through the committee will therefore be assured. I am pleased to say that as far as we are concerned, we are very pleased to see speedy passage at second reading of a significant piece of legislation.

It will not in any sense be a comprehensive response, but it will be a significant part of the response to try to deal with the illicit flow of funds associated with the drug trade in our country.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): Is the House ready for the question?

Some hon. members: Question.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): Is it the pleasure of the House to adopt the motion?

Some hon. members: Agreed.

Motion agreed to, bill read the second time and referred to a legislative committee.

EXPORT AND IMPORT PERMITS ACT

The House resumed from Thursday, May 30, consideration of the motion of Mr. Wilson (Etobicoke Centre) that Bill C-6, an act respecting the exporting, importing, manufacturing, buying or selling of or other dealing with certain weapons be read the second time and referred to a legislative committee.

Mr. Jim Karpoff (Surrey North): Mr. Speaker, I rise to speak on this legislation with a great deal of mixed feelings. Canada has had a history of being a nation which, on the whole, has worked for peace. It has been in the forefront of attempting to limit the proliferation of nuclear weapons and to provide peacekeeping forces within the United Nations.

Within my own family there is a long and strong tradition of working for peace. My father grew up in Russia belonging to a group called the Molokans, whose members are much like the Quakers; pacifists. He was fortunate enough to be able to leave Russia when he became draft age and he chose to come to Canada because he knew that Canada allowed for religious and political freedom. He was involved in some of the first peace movements in Canada including, I am proud to say, leading some of the first demonstrations and marches against the bomb in 1946 and 1947.

He spoke about many things in the late forties and early fifties and at that time, particularly if you had a Russian name, it was not easy to stand up and advocate peace initiatives. Many years later, when it became more acceptable, many of the things that he suggested, the total community adopted and realized that they only made sense in a modern society.

What we have here is the start of a new government initiative to get Canada farther into the area of arms sales. It is one of these things that becomes a treadmill. The farther you get into it, the more difficult it is to get out.

It is based on a number of very shaky premises. Under the present export control policy, Canada has agreed to a number of things. I think it is worth while looking at what they are. Basically Canada agreed to four things: it would not export military goods to countries that pose a threat to Canada or its allies; it would not export military goods to countries that are involved in or under imminent threat of hostility; it would not export military goods to countries under United Nations Security Council sanctions; it would not export military goods to countries whose governments have a persistent record of serious violation of human rights of their citizens.

Some of the current proposals would fail on two of these grounds. The current proposals are designed to start and dump back military armaments into the mid-east, including Saudi Arabia. If anyone looks at the history of the mid-east in the last four years, or 10 years,

The Chairman: I call this organization committee to order. The legislation we are dealing with is Bill C-9, an act to facilitate combatting the laundering of proceeds of crime.

First on the agenda is that the quorum is five. There is a quorum in attendance. I am Ralph Ferguson. I was asked to serve as chairman of this committee by the Speaker:

> Pursuant to Standing Order 113, this is to confirm your appointment as Chairman of the Legislative Committee F on Bill C-9, An Act to facilitate combatting the laundering of proceeds of crime.

I will ask Mr. Farrell to read the order of reference.

The Clerk of the Committee: It is ordered that Bill C-9, an act to facilitate combatting the laundering of proceeds of crime, be now read a second time and referred to legislative committee F.

The Chairman: I look forward to working with the members of this committee on this bill that is before us, and I hope everything will proceed smoothly. I am delighted with the members who have taken an interest in this particular issue. Let's hope we will have a good working committee, a committee that will reflect the wishes of the people of this nation.

We have with us, from the Office of the Law Clerk and Parliamentary Counsel, Louis-Phillipe Côté, legislative counsel, and from the Research Branch of the Library of Parliament we have Mollie Dunsmuir and Nis Moller, research officers.

We do have under routine business motions a printing motion. The motion reads that the committee print 750 copies of its Minutes of Proceedings and Evidence, as established by the Board of Internal Economy.

Mr. Rideout (Moncton): Mr. Chairman, without in any way tearing down the importance of this committee, do we really need 750? Wouldn't 550 be more appropriate?

• 1535

The Chairman: The clerk informs me the general distribution requires approximately 550 to all members and officials.

Mr. Rideout: So you need that extra cushion.

The Chairman: That would leave us 200 to spare.

Mr. Soetens (Ontario): I so move, Mr. Chairman.

TÉMOIGNAGES

Le lundi 10 juin 1991

Le président: La séance est ouverte. La loi dont nous avons à traiter est le projet de loi C-9, Loi visant à faciliter la répression du recyclage financier des produits de la criminalité.

Le premier point à l'ordre du jour concerne le quorum. Il est atteint, puisqu'il est fixé à cinq. Mon nom est Ralph Ferguson et j'ai été invité par le Président de la Chambre à assumer la présidence de ce comité:

> Conformément à l'article 113 du Règlement, la présente a pour objet de confirmer votre nomination en tant que président du Comité législatif F sur le projet de loi C-9, Loi visant à faciliter la répression du recyclage financier des produits de la criminalité.

Je demanderai tout d'abord à M. Farrell de lire l'ordre de renvoi.

Le greffier du Comité: Il est ordonné que le projet de loi C-9, Loi visant à faciliter la répression du recyclage financier des produits de la criminalité, soit maintenant lu une deuxième fois et déféré au Comité législatif F.

Le président: C'est avec plaisir que j'envisage de travailler en collaboration avec les membres de ce comité à l'étude de ce projet de loi et j'espère que tout se passera bien. Je suis heureux de constater l'intérêt que les membres ont affiché pour cette question particulière. Espérons que nous saurons être un comité efficace, un comité qui reflète ce que désire la population canadienne.

Nous avons parmi nous M. Louis-Philippe Côté, conseiller législatif, qui appartient au Bureau du légiste et conseiller parlementaire, ainsi que Molly Dunsmuir et Nis Moller, recherchistes au Service de recherche de la Bibliothèque du Parlement.

Au chapitre des motions courantes, nous devons nous pencher sur une motion d'impression des Procès-verbaux et témoignages. La motion prévoit l'impression de 750 exemplaires des Procès-verbaux et témoignages du comité, ainsi que l'a établi le Bureau de la régie interne.

M. Rideout (Moncton): Monsieur le président, loin de moi l'idée d'atténuer l'importance de ce comité, mais avons-nous vraiment besoin de 750 exemplaires? Est-ce que 550 ne suffiraient pas?

Le président: Le greffier m'avise qu'il nous faut environ 550 exemplaires pour la distribution aux députés et aux hauts fonctionnaires.

M. Rideout: Donc, vous voulez avoir une petite réserve.

Le président: C'est cela, nous aurions une réserve de 200 exemplaires.

M. Soetens (Ontario): Je propose la motion, monsieur le président.

[Texte]

Motion agreed to

The Chairman: Thank you. We will order 750. On to section (b), receiving and printing of evidence when a quorum is not present.

Mr. Soetens: I will move that, Mr. Chairman.

Mr. Rideout: Could I just add that at least one member of the opposition be present?

Mr. Soetens: You have the chairman now.

Mr. Rideout: I know, but he may not be there, and he cannot speak.

Mr. Soetens: I am not opposed to that.

Mr. Rideout: It is normally the case, I think. So I will do it either by an amendment or you can go ahead.

Mr. Soetens: Including at least one member of the opposition. I will add that to the motion.

Motion agreed to

The Chairman: Going on to (c), the questioning of witnesses, it is proposed that during the questioning of witnesses the first spokesperson of each party be allotted ten minutes, and thereafter five minutes for other members of the committee.

Mr. Keyes (Hamilton West): I will move that, Mr. Chairman.

Mr. Soetens: I might comment. I know why the motion is there, but I am one of those guys that is quite willing not to see that motion. If it is flowing along in a constructive fashion so that everybody gets a chance to participate but because five minutes are up and you are in the midst of an important series of questions I would hate to think the person, whoever it is, would be cut off because of that.

Mr. Keyes: Well maybe to ease the member's mind, on committees in the past, and I am sure Mr. Kempling can affirm that, it is usually at the discretion of the chair. Five minutes is a ballpark figure and nothing full fast or stop watch. I have never been in a committee where the answer was not completed or the question was not completed in five minutes.

The Chairman: Are we agreed?

Some hon. members: Agreed.

The Chairman: In terms of support staff, that the clerk of the committee in consultation with the deputy principal clerk of the Public Bills Office and the chairman be authorized to engage the services of temporary secretarial staff as required for a period not to exceed 30 working days after the committee has presented its report to the House.

Mr. Soetens: I so move.

Motion agreed to

The Chairman: Future business. You may have informal discussions with the chairman before another meeting is called by the chairman, and we do have some people who could be called before the committee, RCMP Inspector Bruce Bowie and the Canadian Bar Association, and they are available this week. What is your wish?

La motion est adoptée

Le président: Je vous remercie. Nous commanderons donc 750 exemplaires. Bien, passons au point b), audition de témoignages et impression de fascicules en l'absence de quorum.

M. Soetens: Je propose la motion, monsieur le président.

M. Rideout: Puis-je ajouter qu'il conviendrait qu'au moins un membre de l'opposition soit présent.

M. Soetens: Mais vous avez déjà le président.

M. Rideout: Certes, mais il pourrait ne pas être présent et il ne peut participer au débat.

M. Soetens: Je n'ai rien contre.

M. Rideout: C'est normalement le cas, du moins je le pense. Alors, dois-je proposer un amendement ou le proposez-vous vous-mêmes?

M. Soetens: Dont au moins un membre de l'opposition. C'est ce que je rajoute dans ma motion.

Le président: Au point c) à présent, l'interrogation des témoins. Il est proposé que, lors de l'interrogation des témoins, dix minutes soient accordées au premier intervenant de chaque parti et cinq minutes par la suite à chaque autre intervenant.

M. Keyes (Hamilton-Ouest): J'en fais la proposition, monsieur le président.

M. Soetens: Puis-je faire une remarque. Je sais que cette motion est déjà prévue, mais je fais partie de ceux qui ne sont pas tout à fait en sa faveur. Si tout se déroule bien et que tout le monde a la chance de participer mais que, la période de cinq minutes prend fin alors qu'on est en plein milieu d'une importante série de questions, je détesterais que l'intervenant, qui qu'il soit, soit interrompu.

M. Keyes: Eh bien, pour rassurer notre collègue, je préciserai que, par le passé, dans d'autres comités—et je suis sûr que M. Kempling pourra le confirmer—cette question a été laissée à la discrétion de la présidence. Cette période de cinq minutes n'est qu'une indication, et il n'est pas question de tenir un chronomètre. Par ailleurs, je n'ai jamais siégé à un comité où la réponse ou la question n'ont pu être formulées en cinq minutes.

Le président: Sommes-nous d'accord?

Des voix: D'accord.

Le président: Pour ce qui est du personnel de soutien, il est proposé que le greffier du comité, en consultation avec le greffier principal adjoint du Bureau des projets de loi d'intérêt public, ainsi qu'avec le président, soit autorisé à retenir, au besoin, les services d'employés additionnels pour la durée du mandat du comité, pour une période ne dépassant pas 30 jours ouvrables après le dépôt de son rapport à la Chambre.

M. Soetens: Je propose la motion.

Le président: Questions futures. Vous pourrez avoir des discussions informelles avec le président, avant qu'il ne convoque la prochaine réunion, de plus, nous devons considérer la question des témoins à convoquer au comité, à savoir l'inspecteur Bruce Bowie, de la GRC, et les représentants de l'Association du Barreau canadien; ils sont disponibles cette semaine. Que souhaitez-vous?

[Text]

Mr. Rideout: What were you thinking of, tomorrow or Wednesday?

The Chairman: I had better have our clerk give the times.

The Clerk: Well I know the RCMP and the Canadian Bar Association are free all week. They are willing any time we want to call them. The minister is available tomorrow between 5 p.m. and 6 p.m. if the committee wishes the minister to appear.

Mr. Rideout: Why do we not proceed with the minister and those two, both the Canadian Bar Association and the RCMP, tomorrow?

Mr. Soetens: Mr. Chairman, I do not have a problem with the minister and his officials. From my role on the other committee, the finance side of the committee, I would think the Canadian Bankers' Association may want to comment on this, since they are the ones that would have to handle all this money.

Mr. Rideout: Yes, I would think they might.

Mr. Soetens: I think it would be appropriate to ask them if they would like to comment on it.

The Clerk: I can update you on the Canadian Bankers' Association. I was talking to Bill Randle. Mr. Ballard, who is a vice-president of securities, is in Toronto this week, but there is a convention this week in Ottawa and they might be available when they are in town this week to appear also.

Mr. Soetens: I do not want them to appear if they do not have anything to say, but it seems to me—

Mr. Rideout: I think the same thing with the Canadian Institute of Chartered Accountants as well.

Mr. Soetens: I am not sure what their role would be in this.

Mr. Rideout: No, but just to invite them and give them an opportunity.

Mr. Soetens: I guess I would question, would the RCMP be in camera or in public? I am not sure what they would have to say but do they necessarily want to say it publicly?

Mr. Rideout: I think that in camera might be better for us as far as getting a better appreciation of what the problems are, rather than an open session, but I will be guided by what everybody else feels.

Mr. Chairman, what I think is that we should offer to the bankers and to the chartered accountants and maybe Alan Borovoy or one of those guys from one of the civil libertarian organizations to see whether they want to appear as well. That would be all that I would think would be necessary.

Mr. Soetens: Yes, a short list.

[Translation]

M. Rideout: À quel jour pensiez-vous, aujourd'hui ou mercredi?

Le président: J'aurais préféré que notre greffier s'en occupe.

Le greffier: Eh bien, je sais que la GRC et les représentants de l'Association du Barreau canadien sont libres cette semaine et qu'ils se tiennent à notre disposition. Quant au ministre, il est disponible demain entre 17 heures et 18 heures, si toutefois le comité désire le rencontrer.

M. Rideout: Pourquoi ne commencerions-nous pas, demain, par le ministre et par ces deux témoins, les représentants de l'Association du Barreau canadien et celui de la GRC?

M. Soetens: Monsieur le président, je n'ai rien contre le fait que nous rencontrions le ministre et ses hauts fonctionnaires. Mais, je siège à l'autre comité, celui qui s'occupe des finances, et je pense que l'Association des banquiers canadiens risque de vouloir intervenir, puisque ce sont ces gens qui devront manipuler tout cet argent.

M. Rideout: Tout à fait, c'est ce que je pense.

M. Soetens: J'estime qu'il serait approprié de leur demander s'ils veulent intervenir.

Le greffier: Je peux vous renseigner sur ce qu'il en est à propos de l'Association des banquiers canadiens, puisque je me suis entretenu avec Bill Randle. M. Ballard, qui est le vice-président chargé des valeurs mobilières, se trouve à Toronto cette semaine, mais, cette semaine également, il y a un congrès à Ottawa, et les membres de l'Association pourraient se rendre disponibles lors de leur passage en ville pour comparaître devant le comité.

M. Soetens: Je ne veux pas qu'ils comparaissent s'ils n'ont rien à nous dire, mais il me semble que...

M. Rideout: Il en va de même de l'Institut canadien des comptables agréés.

M. Soetens: Je ne vois pas quel pourrait être leur rôle à ce propos.

M. Rideout: Pourquoi ne pas les inviter et leur donner la possibilité d'intervenir?

M. Soetens: J'aimerais vous poser une question. L'intervention de la GRC se fera-t-elle à huis clos ou en public? Je ne sais pas exactement ce que son représentant aura à dire, mais il est possible qu'il n'ait pas envie d'intervenir en public?

M. Rideout: Bien sûr, il serait préférable que nous l'entendions à huis clos, ce qui nous permettrait de nous faire une meilleure idée de la nature du problème, plutôt que dans le cadre d'une séance ouverte. Mais je me rangerai derrière le sentiment général.

Monsieur le président, je crois que nous devrions inviter les banquiers et les comptables agréés, et peut-être même Alan Borovoy, ou un autre représentant des organismes de défense des droits civils. C'est là, je crois, tout ce que nous devrions faire.

M. Soetens: Oui, dresser une liste restreinte.

[Texte]

The Chairman: Yes. We have this room tomorrow at 3.30 p.m. Being that Inspector Bowie is available at any time, as is the Canadian Bar Association, would it be possible to slot those two in ahead of the minister starting at 3.30 p.m., and follow up with the minister at his convenience at 5 p.m., then try to have the others on Thursday? Wednesday at 3.30 p.m. is another possibility.

Mr. Soetens: If the minister is available first and his officials, I would prefer them first, only to get their views on the overall objectives before we have the RCMP. If that order could be arranged, I would prefer that.

The Chairman: In that case we would have to start at 5 p.m.

Mr. Soetens: The minister is not available for before 5 p.m., is that the situation?

The Chairman: Between 5 p.m. and 6 p.m. tomorrow is the only time he is available to speak.

Mr. Kempling (Burlington): Are his officials available?

The Chairman: We can check and find out.

Mr. Soetens: I do not mind starting earlier. It just seems to me that—

Mr. Keyes: Is there a reason why you want to hear from the minister before you hear from the—

Mr. Soetens: No. It just seems to me that the person who is in favour of this ought to explain what is so good about it before we question all those who have to enforce it. But I am not hardpressed on that.

Mr. Rideout: Maybe we could do it this way, if it is possible. I do not mind sitting and starting at 5 p.m., if everybody else is agreeable, and we could do the minister first. But if there is a problem with the RCMP and the other people and they have to be here at 3.30, then I am just as agreeable to starting at 3.30 and doing those two and tying the minister in afterwards.

Mr. Soetens: Fine, let's start at 3.30 then.

The Chairman: Is it agreed to start at 3.30 p.m.?

Mr. Rideout: If we could go on Wednesday for the next one, that would be—

Mr. Langdon (Essex—Windsor): My apologies for being late.

The Chairman: Perhaps I should have Mr. Farrell, our clerk, bring you up to date.

The Clerk: Mr. Langdon, we were discussing availability of witnesses. The minister is available between 5 p.m. and 6 p.m. tomorrow. The RCMP are available this week. The Canadian Bar Association is also available this week to appear in front of the committee. The Canadian Bankers' Association are having a convention and Mr. Ballard or a representative might be available some time on Wednesday. The other name that came up was the Canadian Institute of

Le président: Parfait. Nous avons cette salle à notre disposition demain à 15h30. Puisque l'inspecteur Bowie est disponible n'importe quand, ainsi que l'Association du Barreau canadien, serait-il possible de glisser ces deux témoins avant l'intervention du ministre, à partir de 15h30, puis d'entendre le ministre à 17 heures, avant d'entendre d'autres témoins jeudi? Il y a une autre possibilité: mercredi à 15h30.

M. Soetens: Si le ministre pouvait d'abord être disponible, en compagnie de ses hauts fonctionnaires, je préférerais commencer par eux afin qu'ils nous exposent les grands objectifs qu'ils auront poursuivis. Nous pourrions ensuite passer à la GRC. Personnellement, je préférerais ce type d'enchaînement.

Le président: Dans ce cas, nous devrions alors commencer à 17 heures.

M. Soetens: Est-ce parce que le ministre n'est pas disponible avant 17 heures?

Le président: Il ne pourra comparaître devant le comité qu'entre 17 heures et 18 heures demain.

M. Kempling (Burlington): Est-ce que ses hauts fonctionnaires sont disponibles?

Le président: Nous pouvons vérifier.

M. Soetens: Je n'ai rien contre le fait que nous débutions plus tôt, mais il me semblait que...

M. Keyes: Y a-t-il une raison pour laquelle vous désirez que le ministre intervienne en premier lieu?

M. Soetens: Non. Il m'apparaît simplement que la personne qui est favorable à un projet de loi devrait d'abord venir nous expliquer ce qu'elle y trouve de bien avant que nous n'interrogions tous ceux qui devront faire respecter la loi. Mais je n'insiste pas plus que cela.

M. Rideout: Peut-être pourrions-nous procéder ainsi, si c'est possible. Cela ne me fait rien de commencer à siéger à 17 heures, si tous les autres sont d'accord, et nous pourrions alors commencer par le ministre. Mais s'il y a un quelconque problème avec le représentant de la GRC et les autres témoins et s'ils doivent se trouver ici à 15h30, alors je suis tout à fait d'accord pour débuter à 15h30 par ces deux témoins avant d'entendre le ministre.

M. Soetens: Parfait, alors commençons à 15h30!

Le président: Sommes-nous d'accord pour commencer à 15h30?

M. Rideout: Si nous pouvions passer au suivant, mercredi, cela serait.

M. Langdon (Essex—Windsor): Excusez-moi d'être en retard.

Le président: Peut-être pourrions-nous demander à M. Farrell, notre greffier, de vous mettre au courant.

Le greffier: Nous étions en train de parler de la disponibilité des témoins, monsieur Langdon. Le ministre, quant à lui, est disponible entre 17 heures et 18 heures demain. Le témoin de la GRC est disponible cette semaine, de même que des représentants de l'Association du Barreau canadien. Quant à l'Association des banquiers canadiens, elle tient actuellement son congrès, et M. Ballard ou un autre représentant pourrait venir nous rencontrer dans la journée

I think there was a discussion about an in camera meeting to hear the RCMP. I do not know if there—

Mr. Soetens: Just for the RCMP.

The Chairman: Just the RCMP.

Mr. Rideout: Maybe part of the RCMP testimony could be public and part of it could be in camera, if they want. I do not care. We could leave it to their discretion.

Mr. Langdon: There is another question that I wanted to raise. I am not sure if it is an organizational question or a somewhat wider question, but in the briefings that we have had on the legislation previously, we were given draft regulations. I wonder if the new draft regulations, which I understand have been discussed with some of the various organizations, will be before the committee at some...?

The Chairman: All we have in front of this committee at this point is the bill.

Mr. Langdon: Perhaps the parliamentary secretary could tell us why this is the case.

Mr. Kempling: We normally do not discuss the regulations at the time we do the legislation. The regulations are normally published upon proclamation of the bill. But there is no reason why you cannot ask the minister questions about the regulations. It is relatively straightforward.

When you read the bill, it is relatively simple. They are just going to add names and institutions and so forth as they go along, by regulation rather than by amendment to the statutes.

Since I have been here, I do not think we have ever had a bill where we have discussed the statute and the regulations in parallel. Usually they are proclaimed afterwards. If there is something that concerns you, I would suggest that you discuss it with the minister when he is here.

Mr. Langdon: The usual practice with a lot of legislation considered by the finance committee is that the regulations are in front of the committee at the same time. That was the case, for instance, with respect to the GST. That was the case with respect to the pension legislation which went through last year.

As we had already received draft regulations in our previous discussions about this bill with the department and had had a chance to talk about those regulations, it strikes me as very curious why that would not be the case with respect to this stage.

Mr. Keyes: Why do you not move it?

Mr. Langdon: I do not like going into a motion if there is—

Mr. Kempling: Ask the minister when he comes then, Steven. There are no hangups about this. But I have not seen that many regulations put with bills. This bill is changed slightly from the original one that you saw.

de mercredi. Il a également été fait mention de l'Institut canadien des comptables agréés; je n'ai pas encore contacté cette association, mais je ne manquerai pas de le faire.

Il a aussi été question d'une réunion à huis clos pour entendre le témoin de la GRC. Mais je ne sais pas...

M. Soetens: C'était juste pour la GRC.

Le président: Oui, c'est la GRC seulement.

M. Rideout: On pourrait imaginer qu'une partie du témoignage de la GRC pourrait être publique et que l'autre se déroulerait à huis clos, si tel est le désir du témoin. Cela ne me dérange pas. Nous devrions le laisser décider.

M. Langdon: Il y a une autre question que je voudrais poser. Je ne suis d'ailleurs pas certain si elle concerne strictement l'organisation de nos travaux ou si elle est plus vaste... Lors des séances d'information auxquelles nous avons participé au sujet de cette loi, on nous a remis des projets de règlements. Je me demande si l'on nous remettra les nouveaux projets de règlements qui semblent avoir fait l'objet de discussions avec certains des organismes concernés?

Le président: Tout ce dont nous disposons pour l'instant, c'est du projet de loi.

M. Langdon: Alors peut-être que le secrétaire parlementaire pourrait nous donner la raison de cet état de choses.

M. Kempling: Normalement, on ne discute pas des règlements en même temps que du texte de loi. Normalement, les règlements sont publiés au moment de la promulgation de la loi. Mais rien ne vous empêche de poser au ministre des questions concernant ces règlements. Tout cela est fort simple.

À la lecture du projet de loi, tout est relativement limpide. Il s'agira simplement d'ajouter des noms et des institutions par règlement plutôt que de procéder par modification du texte de loi.

Depuis que je siège à la Chambre, je ne crois pas avoir jamais vu que des règlements soient analysés en même temps qu'un texte de loi. En général, les règlements sont adoptés après la loi. Mais si vous avez une quelconque inquiétude, je vous suggère d'en parler avec le ministre lorsqu'il viendra nous rencontrer.

M. Langdon: Pour une grande partie des lois étudiées par le comité des finances, nous avons examiné les règlements en même temps que le projet de loi. Cela a été par exemple, le cas de la TPS et des lois sur les pensions, l'année dernière.

Puisque nous avons déjà eu l'occasion, à propos de ce projet de loi, de nous entretenir à propos des projets de règlements avec les représentants du ministère, je trouve curieux que nous n'ayons plus la possibilité d'examiner ces règlements à ce stade.

M. Keyes: Pourquoi n'en faites-vous pas une proposition?

M. Langdon: Je répugne à faire une proposition si l'on peut...

M. Kempling: Steven, posez donc vous-même la question au ministre lorsqu'il comparaîtra devant le comité. Il n'y a pas de complexe à avoir. Mais je ne me rappelle pas avoir souvent vu que des règlements soient soumis en même temps que les projets de loi. Quant à ce projet de loi, il n'a été que très légèrement modifié depuis que vous avez vu sa version originale.

[Text]

Mr. Langdon: I know the regulations have changed and the bill is changed somewhat too, but my understanding is that the regulations have changed even more and that is what leads me to ask the question.

Mr. Rideout: I think clause 5 promotes a lot of regulation, and the impression was left when the earlier bill was brought forward that this committee or some other committee would have an opportunity to take a look at the regulations because those are far-ranging and could have some ramifications.

In addition, my understanding is that when new regulations come forward, it is the minister's intent to give a 90-day period for consultation with all the different groups. So it would seem to be in order that maybe we do take a look at the regulations.

Mr. Kempling: When the minister is here, just ask him. I think that is the easiest way. He has them available; he will bring them forward.

Mr. Rideout: Okay. I think we could make the motion afterwards. If the minister will not produce, then we will not . . .

Mr. Langdon: Okay. Maybe that is the best way. Maybe the parliamentary secretary could take the message back to the minister that some of us are interested in—

Mr. Kempling: Send it by telegraph.

M. Langlois (Manicouagan): Monsieur le président, bien que je ne m'oppose pas à ce que les règlements, si possible, soient déposés au Comité, je voudrais m'assurer que les travaux du Comité se limitent à l'étude article par article du projet de loi. Si les membres du Comité ont les règlements entre les mains, il ne faudrait pas que leur discussion glisse vers les règlements, parce que le travail du Comité est de faire l'étude article par article du projet de loi C-9 pour le renvoyer à la Chambre des communes le plus rapidement possible. Je ne vois pas d'objection à ce qu'on ait les règlements, mais il faudra faire attention de ne pas axer les questions et la discussion vers la réglementation alors que notre travail est de faire l'étude du projet de loi.

The Chairman: Yes, you are quite correct in that comment, because we are mandated only to study the bill itself. Unless there is agreement from the minister and perhaps unanimous agreement from this committee, I think we are pretty well stuck by way of the mandate given to us.

Mr. Rideout: The only thing I would add, Mr. Chairman, is that if you really look at section 5 in the bill, the meat that is on the bones is coming from the regulations and not from the legislation itself.

If we do not take a look at the regulations, I think we are going to be really missing the whole point. We might as well have the meeting now and say amen to the idea of money laundering, because that is all the legislation says, and

M. Langdon: Je sais que les règlements ont été changés, ainsi que le projet de loi, mais j'ai cru comprendre que les règlements avaient été encore plus modifiés et c'est pour cela que j'ai posé la question.

M. Rideout: L'article 5 prévoit l'adoption de plusieurs règlements, et nous avons eu l'impression, lors de l'examen de la première version du projet de loi, que ce comité ou un autre comité aurait la possibilité de revenir sur ces règlements, parce qu'ils ont une grande portée et qu'ils pourraient avoir des ramifications.

En outre, j'ai cru comprendre que lorsque de nouveaux règlements étaient adoptés, le ministre avait l'intention d'accorder un période de 90 jours pour la consultation des différents groupes. Il me semblerait donc raisonnable que nous puissions examiner ces règlements.

M. Kempling: Posez donc la question au ministre lorsqu'il sera ici. Je crois que ce serait la meilleure façon de procéder. Comme il a ces règlements, il pourra les déposer.

M. Rideout: Parfait. Je crois que nous pourrions faire la proposition par la suite. Si le ministre ne dépose pas les règlements, alors nous ne. .

M. Langdon: Très bien. Après tout, c'est peut-être le meilleur moyen. Entre-temps, peut-être que le secrétaire parlementaire pourrait faire savoir au ministre que certains d'entre nous désirent. . .

M. Kempling: Envoyez un télégramme.

Mr. Langlois (Manicouagan): Mr. Chairman, even if I do not oppose the tabling of those regulations before the committee, I would like to make sure that the committee work is limited to a section by section study of the bill. If the committee members are given the regulations, I would not like the discussion to drift towards those regulations because the mandate of the committee is to study the bill C-9, section by section, in order to refer it to the House of Commons as quickly as possible. I do not see why anyone would object to us having the regulations but we will have to make sure that we do not concentrate questions and discussions on the regulations while what we have to do is to study the bill itself.

Le président: Vous avez tout à fait raison, parce que nous sommes uniquement mandatés pour étudier le projet de loi lui-même. Ainsi, nous sommes liés au mandat qui nous a été confié, sauf si nous obtenons l'accord du ministre et peut-être si nous obtenons le consentement unanime des membres du comité.

M. Rideout: Il y a une chose que j'aimerais ajouter, monsieur le président, c'est que si vous examinez vraiment de près l'article 5 du projet de loi, vous vous rendrez compte que les règlements sont plus importants que le texte de loi lui-même.

Ainsi, si nous n'examinons pas de près les règlements, je crains que nous ne passions à côté de l'essentiel. Nous pourrions tout aussi bien limiter nos débats à cette réunion et donner notre aval à l'idée de la répression du blanchiment de it is not until you get into regulations that you really find out the full ramifications as to the effects on professions and businesses and how it all works. Until you see that, you really do not know.

I think that is why the minister wanted to have open consultation on regulations. It is the minister's position that there is good consultation with respect to the regulations because he recognizes the weakness in this bill, that it is law by regulation rather than by legislation. So we should see the regulations as they are initially commenced, because he has said there is going to be a 90-day period to consult afterwards.

The Chairman: Thank you very much. We will meet tomorrow at—

Mr. Langdon: Mr. Chairman, I am sorry, but there are some other groups that are affected besides the ones that have been noted. I guess I am particularly struck by the fact that the credit unions and the caisses populaires should be given a chance to comment on the legislation. It may be that they do not wish to take the opportunity, but it seems to me that they in fact may face more difficulty with some of the record-keeping commitments that are part of the legislation, which would be the case with banks, for instance.

Mr. Rideout: Their head office is here too.

The Chairman: Could you leave those with the clerk of the committee to see if they would care to make submissions? Is that the...?

Mr. Kempling: Mr. Chairman, I think you will find that the minister's officials have been in touch with credit unions and caisses populaires. If somebody wants to contact them, fine.

When I last talked to the officials they were meeting with the Certified General Accountants' Association, and they told me at that time that they did not think there was any difficulty, but if there was, they would have them come forward as witnesses.

Mr. Langdon: I wonder if you could find the names, Bill.

Mr. Kempling: I will, sure.

Mr. Langdon: I am sure if they see no need to testify, they will indicate that to us.

■ 1555

The Chairman: We are meeting tomorrow from 3.30 until 6 p.m. On Wednesday afternoon we have this same room. On Thursday morning we will meet at 10 and on Thursday afternoon at 3.30.

An hon. member: I am away on Thursday.

Mr. Langdon: With Wednesday, if there is any possibility—

Mr. Langlois: We are going to sit just the same.

Mr. Langdon: Do you want to get it done that quickly?

l'argent, parce que c'est ce que précise la loi et que ce n'est que dans les règlements que l'on retrouve toutes les ramifications et toutes les incidences de cette loi sur les professions et les entreprises. Ce n'est donc qu'à l'examen des règlements que l'on pourra vraiment savoir.

Je crois que c'est pour cela que le ministre voulait que nous tenions une consultation ouverte sur les règlements. Le ministre est d'avis qu'il faut tenir de véritables consultations à propos de ces règlements parce qu'il reconnaît la faiblesse de ce projet de loi et que nous avons affaire à un cas de législation par voie de règlement plutôt que par voie de texte de loi. Nous devrions donc avoir la possibilité d'examiner les règlements, au stade même de leur préparation, parce que le ministre a prévu une période de consultations de 90 jours par la suite.

Le président: Je vous remercie. Nous nous réunirons demain à...

M. Langdon: Monsieur le président, veuillez m'excuser, mais il y a d'autres groupes qui sont visés par ce projet de loi, outre ceux qui ont été mentionnés. Par exemple, je pense que l'on devrait donner la possibilité aux caisses de crédit et aux caisses populaires de venir commenter ce texte de loi. Il est toujours possible que ces organismes ne désirent pas se prévaloir de notre invitation, mais j'ai l'impression qu'ils risquent d'éprouver beaucoup plus de difficultés à propos des dispositions concernant la tenue de documents que les banques.

M. Rideout: Et puis, ces caisses ont leur siège social ici.

Le président: Pourrait-on demander au greffier du comité de voir si ces caisses veulent nous faire des présentations? Est-ce...?

M. Kempling: Monsieur le président, vous constaterez certainement que les fonctionnaires du ministère ont déjà communiqué avec les caisses de crédit et les caisses populaires. Par contre, si quelqu'un d'autre désire les contacter, d'accord.

Lorsque je me suis entretenu, la dernière fois, avec les fonctionnaires du ministère, ils m'ont fait part de leur réunion avec l'Association des comptables généraux agréés du Canada qui, à l'époque, n'entrevoyait aucune difficulté avec le projet de loi. Par contre, en cas de problème, l'association enverrait des témoins au comité.

M. Langdon: Pourriez-vous obtenir les noms, Bill?

M. Kempling: Bien sûr.

M. Langdon: Je suis sûr que l'association nous le dira si elle ne désire par comparaître devant le comité.

Le président: Alors, nous nous réunirons donc demain de 15h30 à 18 heures. Mercredi après-midi, nous disposons de la même salle. Mardi matin, nous nous réunirons à 10 heures et nous poursuivrons jeudi après-midi à 15h30.

Une voix: Je ne suis pas là jeudi.

M. Langdon: Et mercredi, je n'y suis pas, y a-t-il possibilité que...

M. Langlois: Nous siégerons quand même.

M. Langdon: Est-ce que vous êtes si pressé que cela?

The Chairman: I believe the feeling is that they would like to get this bill in place, get it back to report stage as quickly as they can. Perhaps the parliamentary secretary could give us more of a line on that.

Mr. Kempling: Naturally we would like to get the bill through as fast as we can. If we are going to have three or four witnesses, if we can hear them in one day or a day and a half, the better off we will be. We can report it to the House and possibly get it through report stage and third reading before we rise, and send it on to the Senate.

The Chairman: Do you agree with that?

Mr. Kempling: You are away Thursday?

Mr. Langdon: No, I am away Wednesday. Let's talk. We will see what witnesses we can jiggle through that.

The Chairman: This of course is tentative, depending upon the availability of the witnesses.

Mr. Kempling: Yes.

The Chairman: There being no further business before this committee, it stands adjourned to the call of the chair tomorrow afternoon at 3.30 p.m.

M. Kempling: Il est évident que nous aimerions que ce projet de loi soit étudié le plus rapidement possible. Si nous ne devons entendre que trois ou quatre témoins, le mieux serait que nous puissions le faire dans un délai de un jour à un jour et demi. Nous pourrions alors faire rapport du projet de loi à la Chambre dans les plus brefs délais, le faire passer en troisième lecture avant l'ajournement et le déférer au Sénat.

Le président: Êtes-vous d'accord?

M. Kempling: Vous êtes absent jeudi?

M. Langdon: Non, mercredi. Mais voyons quels témoins nous pourrions rencontrer dans cet espace de temps.

Le président: Tout cela, bien sûr, est provisoire, et dépend de la disponibilité des témoins.

M. Kempling: Mais oui.

Le président: Eh bien, s'il n'y a pas d'autres questions, la séance est levée jusqu'à demain après-midi à 15h30.

The Chairman: I see a quorum. I will call the meeting to order at this point. The first witness to appear before the committee today will be Terence Wade, Senior Director, Legal and Government Affairs, of the Canadian Bar Association. He will be followed by officials from the department. We were notified a couple of hours ago that unfortunately the minister is not able to be present with us today.

Mr. Terence Wade (Senior Director, Legal and Governmental Affairs, Canadian Bar Association): I would simply like to say at the outset that the president of the Canadian Bar Association would have liked to be here today to underscore the importance the bar attaches to this legislation. Unfortunately, he is about to leave for Budapest. The Canadian Bar has an aid program designed to better the administration of justice in eastern Europe and he is very much occupied with that.

Despite the fact that the Canadian Bar remains unconvinced that it is necessary for this bill to apply to the legal profession, and that is on the basis of the absence of any solid empirical data that money laundering by lawyers is currently a problem, the bar does accept that the decision has been made that lawyers should be subject to the bill, and our submission, my presentation today, is on the basis that this decision has now been taken.

Le président: Je constate qu'il y a quorum, la séance est ouverte. Le premier témoin que nous allons entendre aujourd'hui est M. Terence Wade, directeur général des affaires juridiques et gouvernementales de l'Association du Barreau canadien. Nous entendrons ensuite les fonctionnaires du ministère. Nous avons été informé il y a quelques heures que, malheureusement, le ministre ne pourra être des nôtres aujourd'hui.

M. Terence Wade (directeur général des Affaires juridiques et gouvernementales de l'Association du Barreau canadien): En guise d'entrée en matière, permettez-moi de dire que le président de l'Association du Barreau canadien tenait à témoigner lui-même aujourd'hui étant donné que le Barreau attache la plus haute importance à ce projet de loi. Malheureusement, il doit se rendre à Budapest. Le Barreau canadien a conçu un programme d'assistance qui a pour but de rehausser l'administration de la justice en Europe orientale, et notre président est très pris par ce projet.

En dépit du fait que le Barreau canadien n'est toujours pas convaincu que ce projet de loi doive s'appliquer à la profession juridique, et ce, parce que rien ne prouve que des avocats s'adonnent au blanchiment de l'argent, le Barreau accepte la décision voulant que les avocats soient désormais visés par le projet de loi. Notre intervention, aujourd'hui, procède de cette même décision.

Bill C-9, which this committee is considering, is in the bar's opinion a vast improvement over its predecessor Bill C-89. We must, however, state that we cannot at this stage finally endorse the legislative package of which Bill C-9 is a part because much of the content of this package will be found in the regulations to be made under the bill.

However, we do note and would like to state for the record that the Minister of State for Finance and his officials listened sympathetically to our concerns with Bill C-89 and we have every confidence that the regulations to be made under Bill C-9 will reflect our concerns regarding the draft regulations under the previous bill.

You will find attached to our submission on Bill C-9 a discussion and policy paper on the previous bill, Bill C-89, as an appendix to that submission.

Je voudrais offrir mes excuses aux membres francophones du Comité. Malheureusement, l'étude sur le projet de loi C-89 a été conçue comme document interne du Barreau, et on n'a pas eu le temps de la traduire avant de la présenter aujourd'hui. Cependant, le mémoire sur le projet de loi actuel, le projet de loi C-9, est dans les deux langues.

Our submission on the bill you have before you, Bill C-9, tracks the concerns we had with regard to the previous bill into the current bill. I don't propose to lead committee members through the submission, unless you wish, but simply to highlight certain points.

The first that the Canadian Bar would like to highlight is the offence clause, clause 6 of the bill, which you will notice now subjects the offence to intent on the part of the accused; it is everyone who knowingly contravenes or fails to comply with the act or regulations.

Under the previous bill the offence that was created was one of strict liability; that is to say, it was not necessary to establish that anybody prosecuted under the bill had the intent to commit the offence in order to convict that person. The Canadian Bar was very strenuously opposed to the offence created under the previous bill and is indeed pleased to note that the offence is now one subject to mens rea, that is to say, on which one must establish criminal intent before conviction.

The Canadian Bar in its discussion paper on the previous bill also expressed considerable concern regarding the fact that this offence was essentially defined not in the bill itself, or in the act, but in the regulations. The reasons for those concerns relate to general matters of public policy, of criminal policy, the fact that offences or provisions creating offences should be subject, in our view, to public debate and parliamentary debate in the normal course of events.

De l'avis du Barreau, le projet de loi C-9, que votre comité étudie, est de loin supérieur à son prédécesseur, le projet de loi C-89. Toutefois, nous nous devons d'affirmer que, dans l'état des choses, le Barreau n'est pas disposé à avaliser le train de mesures législatives dont le projet de loi C-9 fait partie, parce qu'une bonne part de son contenu résidera dans la réglementation annexe du projet de loi.

Mais nous tenons tout de même à reconnaître publiquement que le ministre d'État aux Finances et ses hauts fonctionnaires ont écouté attentivement nos objections au projet de loi C-89, et nous sommes certains que la réglementation du projet de loi C-9 prendra en compte les objections que nous avions formulées à l'égard du projet de réglementation du projet de loi antérieur.

En annexe à notre mémoire sur le projet de loi C-9, vous trouverez un énoncé de principe sur le projet de loi antérieur, le projet de loi C-89.

I would like to offer my apologies to the francophone members of the Committee. Unfortunately, our study on Bill C-89 was designed as an internal document of the Bar, and we did not have time to have it translated for today's session. However, our submission on Bill C-9 is in both languages.

Notre mémoire sur le projet de loi C-9 reprend les objections que nous avions faites à l'égard du projet de loi antérieur. Je ne tiens pas à donner lecture du mémoire aux membres du comité, et avec votre permission, je me contenterai d'en souligner les aspects les plus importants.

La première réserve du Barreau canadien a trait à la disposition sur les infractions et les peines, à savoir l'article 6 du projet de loi, lequel, vous l'aurez remarqué, lie désormais l'infraction à l'intention de l'accusé: à savoir, quiconque contrevient sciemment à la loi ou à la réglementation annexé, ou omet de s'y conformer.

Aux termes du projet de loi antérieur, l'infraction qui était créée était essentiellement une infraction de responsabilité: autrement dit, pour obtenir une déclaration de culpabilité, il n'était pas nécessaire d'établir que l'accusé avait eu l'intention de commettre une infraction. Le Barreau canadien s'est opposé vigoureusement à l'infraction que créait le projet de loi antérieur, et est heureux de constater que cette infraction est maintenant tenue pour une infraction de mens rea autrement dit, il faut désormais établir qu'il y a eu intention criminelle pour obtenir une déclaration de culpabilité.

Dans son mémoire sur le projet de loi antérieur, l'Association du Barreau canadien s'était également opposée au fait que cette infraction soit définie, non pas dans le projet de loi lui-même ou dans la loi, mais dans la réglementation. Nos objections se fondaient sur des considérations générales d'administration publique, d'administration judiciaire. A notre avis, les dispositions législatives créant des infractions devaient faire l'objet d'un débat public, d'un débat parlementaire, dans le cours normal des choses.

[Texte]

A secondary but nonetheless important consideration is that provisions creating offences, particularly where very serious penalties are attached to them, should be readily accessible to members of the public and those subject to the bill. Of course members will recognize, as does the Canadian Bar, that it is often very difficult to obtain copies of regulations, particularly up-to-date regulations.

Our concerns have been addressed in Bill C-9 by a provision found in clause 5 requiring prepublication of proposed regulations. This will obviously address the question of notice to those bound by the bill regarding the elements of the offence created by clause 6, and we are indeed again pleased that the minister and his officials have responded to our concern.

However, we feel bound to draw to your attention some concern with the way this provision in clause 5 is drafted. If I could refer the committee to subclause 5.(3) on page 3 of the printed bill, there is an exception to the 90-day prepublication of regulations in two instances, first where the proposed regulation has previously been published whether or not it has been changed as a result of representations made following the prepublication.

We certainly can understand the concern of the department that were this provision to provide for 90-day prepublication every time there was an amendment to a proposed regulation, the process could be never-ending and it might well be that the regulation could never be made. However, that does overlook the importance of giving notice to those to be bound by the regulation regarding its content, and it is entirely possible that during the 90-day period provided for under subclause 5.(2) there could be extensive amendment of a proposed regulation which would then, under subclause 5.(3), be published in The Canada Gazette and come into effect immediately without those being bound by it having a further opportunity to be warned.

The bar therefore recommends, and you will find this recommendation on page 9 of our submission, that paragraph 5.(3)(a) of the bill be amended to provide that no regulation finally made by the Governor in Council—that is to say, following the consultation process—may come into effect until at least 30 days after publication in The Canada Gazette. That 30-day period of the final form of the regulation would serve as notice to those to be bound by it. We should remember here again that most of the substance of this legislative package will in fact be found in the regulations.

I would also like to draw the committee's attention to paragraph 5.(3)(b), which exempts from the prepublication requirement any regulation or proposed regulation that "makes no substantive change to an existing regulation". In the Canadian Bar's opinion, that exception is very vague—"substantive change"—and given again that most elements of this legislative scheme are to be found in the regulations and not in the statute, we are constrained to

Autre considération, non moins importante, l'accessibilité du public et des principaux intéressés au texte législatif créant des infractions, surtout quand on prévoit des peines très sévères. Bien sûr, le comité admettra, tout comme le Barreau canadien, qu'il est souvent très difficile d'obtenir des copies des règlements, surtout des règlements les plus récents.

Nos objections ont été calmées par l'article 5 du projet de loi C-9 qui prévoit la publication dans la Gazette du Canada des projets de règlement. De toute évidence, cette disposition règle le problème du préavis pour les principaux intéressés en ce qui concerne les éléments de l'infraction créés par l'article 6 et encore là, nous sommes heureux de constater que le ministre et ses fonctionnaires ont tenu compte de nos objections.

Toutefois, nous sommes tenus de vous dire l'inquiétude que nous cause la formulation de l'article 5. Je pense ici au paragraphe 5.(3), page 3 du projet de loi, qui prévoit une dispense au délai de 90 jours dans deux cas: je parlerai d'abord du cas où les projets de règlement ont déjà été publiés, qu'ils aient été modifiés ou non à la suite d'observations présentées conformément à ce paragraphe.

Nous comprenons fort bien l'intention du ministère ici, parce que s'il y avait publication dans la Gazette du Canada avec délai de 90 jours chaque fois qu'il y a modification à la réglementation, le processus ne connaîtrait pas de fin et la réglementation ne verrait sans doute jamais le jour. Cependant, nous tenons pour plus important de donner avis à ceux qui sont liés par la réglementation, et il est tout à fait permis d'imaginer que, dans le délai de 90 jours prévu au paragraphe 5.(2), l'on modifie en profondeur le projet de règlement, lequel, serait ensuite publié dans la Gazette du Canada aux termes de l'article 5.(3) et prendrait donc immédiatement effet sans que les principaux intéressés en soient avisés.

Le Barreau recommande donc, et vous trouverez cette recommandation à la page 9 de notre mémoire, qu'on modifie l'alinéa 5.(3)a) du projet de loi, de telle sorte qu'aucun règlement promulgué par le gouverneur en conseil, c'est-à-dire, après le processus de consultation, n'entre en vigueur avant au moins 30 jours après la publication dans la Gazette du Canada. Ce délai de 30 jours suivant la publication sous forme définitive du règlement modifié servirait de préavis aux personnes visées. Encore une fois, il faut bien se rappeler que l'essentiel de cette mesure législative se trouvera en fait dans la réglementation.

Je tiens également à attirer l'attention du comité sur l'alinéa 5.(3)b), qui prévoit une exception à l'exigence de publication préalable à l'égard de tout règlement ou projet de règlement qui «n'apporte pas de modification de fond à la réglementation en vigueur». Selon le Barreau canadien, cette exception est très vague—«modification de fond»—et étant donné, comme je l'ai déjà dit, que la plupart des éléments de ce projet de loi seront contenus, non pas dans le texte remark that this vagueness seems to us unacceptable. We therefore make the recommendation that you find on page 10 of our submission that paragraph 5.(3)(b) be deleted from the bill.

In the alternative, our recommendation is that the bill should define substantive change to include as a minimum any change that has the effect of altering the obligations or liability of any person to whom the act or regulations apply. It is our very strong view that given again that the substance of this package is to be found in the regulations, including almost all of the obligations incumbent upon those to whom the bill applies, at the very least a change that affects those obligations or the potential liability of any person to whom the bill applies should be subject to the prepublication requirement.

The third point relates to paragraph 5.(1)(d) of the bill, which is on page 2 of the printed bill. Again, a very short point I would like to make is to compliment the minister and his officials on their response to the concerns that the bar has expressed regarding this provision. The importance of the independence of the legal profession has been acknowledged many times by the Supreme Court of Canada. The court has said that the profession—lawyers—must be free to represent their clients' interests free from any interference by the state. In fact, lawyers stand, to a certain extent, between their clients and the state with regard to many matters.

Under the former bill, paragraph 5.(1)(d) would have turned lawyers into agents of the state by requiring them to investigate their clients on behalf of the state. The former bill required them to investigate and ascertain the accuracy of all information required to be recorded. The bar found that inimical to lawyer-client confidentiality and it would certainly have undermined the ability of the legal profession to properly represent their clients. The bar is therefore very pleased by the limited scope of the new paragraph 5.(1)(d), which requires only that the identity of the client with whom the record-keeper is transacting must be ascertained or must be verified.

The bill before you does not address the Canadian Bar's concerns regarding penalties. Again, we feel constrained to point out to you that the penalties provided for under this bill are, so far as our research has established, considerably higher than in any other jurisdiction.

In this regard I should stress the nature of the offence to which these penalties attach. The offence here is a failure to keep the record required by the act or the regulations. The offence is not money laundering itself. It is simply a failure to keep a record.

législatif, mais dans la réglementation, force nous est de dire que ce manque de précision nous paraît inacceptable. Par conséquent, nous formulons la recommandation que vous trouverez à la page 10 de notre mémoire, à savoir que l'alinéa 5.(3)b) soit retranché du projet de loi.

Comme solution de rechange, nous recommandons que le terme «modification de fond» soit défini dans le projet de loi, de manière à inclure au minimum tout changement ayant pour effet de modifier les obligations ou responsabilités de toute personne visée par la loi ou par la réglementation. Nous sommes fermement d'avis, et je le répète, puisque l'essentiel de cette mesure, et plus particulièrement la presque totalité des obligations incombant à ceux qui seront visés par le projet de loi, se trouvera énoncée dans la réglementation, qu'à tout le moins tout changement modifiant ces obligations ou la responsabilité éventuelle de toute personne visée par le projet de loi soit soumis à l'exigence de la publication préalable.

Le troisième point concerne l'alinéa 5.(1)d) du projet de loi, qui se trouve à la page 2 de la version imprimée. Encore une fois, je tiens à dire un mot pour féliciter le ministre et ses collaborateurs de la façon dont ils ont su répondre aux préoccupations exprimées par le Barreau relativement à cette disposition. La Cour suprême du Canada a reconnu à maintes reprises l'importance de maintenir l'indépendance des avocats. Ces derniers, a-t-elle dit, doivent pouvoir représenter les intérêts de leurs clients sans aucune ingérence de l'État. En fait, bien souvent, les avocats sont là, dans une certaine mesure, pour protéger leurs clients contre l'État.

Dans sa version antérieure, l'alinéa 5.(1)d) aurait fait des avocats des agents de l'État, obligés d'enquêter sur leurs clients au nom de l'État. Aux termes de l'ancien projet de loi, ils étaient tenus de faire enquête et de vérifier l'exactitude de tous les renseignements devant être consignés. Le Barreau avait conclu que cette obligation allait à l'encontre du caractère confidentiel des communications entre l'avocat et son client et qu'elle aurait certainement pu empêcher les avocats de bien représenter leurs clients. Le Barreau est donc très heureux de constater qu'on a réduit la portée de l'alinéa 5.(1)d), de manière que la seule obligation qui incombe à la personne qui tient les documents est de s'assurer de l'identité du client avec laquelle elle effectue une opération.

Le projet de loi dont vous êtes saisis ne tient pas compte des préoccupations exprimées par le Barreau canadien relativement aux sanctions à appliquer. Encore une fois, nous nous sentons dans l'obligation de vous faire remarquer que, d'après les recherches que nous avons effectuées, les sanctions prévues aux termes de ce projet de loi sont bien plus sévères qu'elles ne le sont dans n'importe quel autre secteur de compétence.

À cet égard, je voudrais insister sur la nature de l'infraction à laquelle se rattachent ces sanctions. L'infraction en cause est le défaut de tenir les registres requis par la loi ou la réglementation. Il ne s'agit pas d'avoir participé à une opération de blanchissage d'argent, mais simplement de n'avoir pas tenu les dossiers exigés.

[Texte]

The penalties that attach to that failure to keep a record are up to a half-million-dollar fine and five years' imprisonment. Again, this is not a punishment for money lending itself. It is failure to keep a record.

We do feel that penalties of this magnitude attached to an offence of this kind could readily prove counter-productive. A point that is made in our submission to you is that nothing undermines public confidence in the justice system more than the perception that sentencing judges do not impose maximum sentences often enough.

It is our view that faced with a potential penalty of a half-million-dollar fine and five years' imprisonment for failure to keep a record, most sentencing judges, especially when they are sentencing individuals, will impose sentences that are way down at the bottom end of that scale. And there will doubtless be comment and perception among the public that judges are not "being tough on money laundering", whereas the offence charged of course is failing to keep a record.

We do acknowledge that penalties of this kind may be desirable to deal with corporate entities that fail to keep records. We do feel that the bill could have distinguished between corporate accused and individual accused.

There are two other points I would like to address very briefly. They are not part of the bill itself, but under the legislative scheme proposed in this bill, in our view, they must be addressed in the regulations to be made under it.

First, we believe it is essential that either the word "cash" or the words "cash transaction" be defined in the regulations. Under the draft regulations, under the previous bill, they were not defined, and there was certainly a fear that without an appropriate definition of cash or cash transaction, the way was open to do what was done in the United States where, under one similar piece of legislation, currency was defined to include all monetary instruments, including cheques, not just cash.

It is our view that the point and very acceptable goal of this legislation is to catch the profits from proceeds of crime, particularly drug trafficking, at the point where they enter the monetary system in cash form.

Second, we are of the view that the regulations should ensure that the record-keeping requirement does not apply to moneys paid to lawyers on account of legal fees or retainers. A record-keeping requirement attaching to the payment of legal fees would, in our view, chill the right to counsel, to independent representation.

The draft regulations under the previous bill required that records be kept of moneys paid "for the benefit of another". This raises a particular concern in the context of the practice of law, because almost all moneys paid to lawyers

Quiconque manque à cette obligation de tenir les registres exigés s'expose à une amende de 500,000$ et à une peine de prison de cinq ans. Je le répète, l'infraction à laquelle se rattachent ces sanctions est, non pas le blanchissage de l'argent, mais le manquement à l'obligation de tenir les dossiers exigés.

Nous considérons même que des peines aussi sévères rattachées à une infraction de ce genre pourraient facilement aller à l'encontre du but recherché. Dans notre mémoire, nous faisons notamment remarquer que rien ne mine autant la confiance du public dans le système judiciaire que la perception selon laquelle les tribunaux n'imposent pas assez souvent les peines maximales prévues.

À notre avis, le juge, voyant que les sanctions prévues pour le manquement à l'obligation de tenir les dossiers exigés peuvent aller jusqu'à 500,000$ et cinq ans d'emprisonnement, aura le plus souvent tendance, lorsqu'il a affaire à un particulier, à imposer des peines qui se trouvent plus près du minimum prévu. Le public y verra sans doute le signe que le blanchissage de l'argent n'est pas puni assez sévèrement par les tribunaux, alors qu'en réalité, l'infraction commise aura bien sûr été celle de ne pas tenir les dossiers exigés.

Nous reconnaissons qu'il est peut-être souhaitable de prévoir des sanctions aussi sévères pour les personnes morales qui manquent à l'obligation de tenir les registres exigés. À notre avis, le législateur aurait dû faire la distinction entre les personnes morales et les personnes physiques.

Je voudrais maintenant vous présenter brièvement deux autres arguments. Ces arguments ne concernent pas le projet de loi comme tel, mais il faudra en tenir compte dans la réglementation qui sera prise en application du projet de loi.

Premièrement, nous considérons qu'il est essentiel de définir dans la réglementation, soit le terme «comptant» soit le terme «transaction au comptant». Ni l'un ni l'autre de ces termes n'ayant été défini dans la réglementation proposée en application du projet de loi précédent, l'on s'inquiétait réellement du fait que ce manque de précision pourrait ouvrir la porte à ce qui s'était produit aux États-Unis, où, en application d'une loi semblable, le terme «monnaie» avait été défini de manière à inclure tous les instruments monétaires, y compris les chèques, et pas seulement l'argent comptant.

Nous soutenons que l'intention et le but fort louable de ce projet de loi est de saisir les produits de la criminalité, notamment du trafic des drogues, au moment où ils font leur apparition dans le système monétaire sous forme d'argent comptant.

Deuxièmement, nous sommes d'avis que la réglementation devrait faire en sorte que l'obligation relative à la tenue de registres ne s'applique pas aux sommes versées aux avocats pour le paiement d'honoraires ou de provisions. L'obligation de tenir des dossiers relatifs aux paiements des honoraires aurait pour effet, à notre avis, de nuire au droit de consulter un avocat et à l'indépendance de celui-ci.

Le projet de réglementation présenté en application du projet de loi précédent exigeait que des registres soient tenus à l'égard des sommes versées au bénéfice d'une tierce personne. Cette obligation soulève une inquiétude are paid in trust. They are received into the lawyer's trust account and are therefore technically received for the benefit of another, although in fact they are paid for the benefit of the client.

Again, we feel that this point must be addressed in the regulations. You will find a recommendation on page 14 of our submission addressed to this question, it being recommended that the regulations make it clear that the obligation to create a record should arise only where a lawyer is involved in a transaction that also involves a third party.

In other words, we recommend that the words in the previous draft regulation "for the benefit of another" be reworked to make it clear that they are not intended to apply in the ordinary course of events to moneys received in trust on account of professional fees or retainers. Again, given the sympathetic hearing we had from the minister and his officials, we are confident that those two concerns will be addressed in draft regulations to be made under this bill.

That, Mr. Chairman and members of the committee, concludes the opening presentation, the highlights, and I would be very pleased to respond to any questions members of the committee may have.

The Chairman: Thank you very much, Mr. Wade.

Mr. Rideout (Moncton): Have the members of the Canadian Bar Association established amongst themselves whether they think there is a problem as far as money laundering is concerned with barristers and solicitors?

Mr. Wade: We have certainly not carried out any empirical study. The only study, of which we are aware, of the Canadian legal profession was in a document published in, I believe, October 1990 by the Department of the Solicitor General entitled, "Tracing Illicit Funds". A small number of pages in that document dealt with money laundering, dealing in illicit funds by the legal profession. Essentially it was acknowledged that there were two high-profile cases identified, and other than that any evidence was purely anecdotal. It was suggested, I should add, in the document that the RCMP might have files relating to money laundering by the legal profession, or alleged money laundering, but nothing more than that.

Mr. Rideout: They do seem to indicate as well that the barristers society is really not in a position to police itself with respect to money laundering. Have you any comments with respect to that contained in that report on tracing illicit funds?

Mr. Wade: We suspect that the report may have confused different reporting requirements between jurisdictions which are designed to respond to the realities of practice in a particular jurisdiction, with an inability to police.

particulière pour ce qui est de la pratique du droit, puisque les sommes versées aux avocats le sont presque toujours en fidéicommis. Les sommes étant placées dans le compte en fidéicommis de l'avocat, elles sont, par définition, placées là au bénéfice d'une tierce personne, même si, en réalité, elles sont payées au bénéfice du client.

Nous considérons, encore une fois, qu'il faudra tenir compte de ce fait dans la réglementation. A la page 14 de notre mémoire, une recommandation porte sur cette question, et nous recommandons que les règlements stipulent clairement que c'est uniquement lorsqu'un avocat est impliqué dans une transaction à laquelle une tierce partie est mêlée que l'obligation d'établir un document survient.

Autrement dit, nous recommandons que les termes utilisés dans l'ancien projet de règlement, «pour le bénéfice d'autrui», soient supprimés, afin de bien montrer qu'ils ne sont pas censés s'appliquer normalement à de l'argent reçu en fiducie, à titre d'honoraires, ou de provision. Là encore, étant donné que le ministre et ses fonctionnaires ont semblé comprendre notre point de vue lorsque nous les avons rencontrés, nous avons donc l'espoir que ces deux préoccupations seront prises en compte dans le projet de règlement qui sera élaboré en application de ce projet de loi.

Monsieur le président, membres du comité, je viens de terminer l'exposé des grandes lignes de notre mémoire, et je serais très heureux de répondre à vos questions.

Le président: Merci beaucoup, monsieur Wade.

M. Rideout (Moncton): Les membres de l'Association du Barreau Canadien ont-ils pu établir s'il arrive souvent que des avocats et des notaires soient impliqués dans ce blanchiment des produits de la criminalité?

M. Wade: Nous n'avons fait aucune étude empirique de la question. À notre connaissance, la seule étude faite sur la profession juridique au Canada était un document publié, me semble-t-il, en octobre 1990 par le ministère du solliciteur général, intitulé «Le dépistage de profits générés par le crime». Un petit nombre de pages de ce document traitait du blanchiment de l'argent, et de l'utilisation de profits illicites par des membres de la profession juridique. Essentiellement, à part deux affaires de ce genre qui ont défrayé la chronique, rien d'autre n'a pu être prouvé, bien qu'on ait pu raconter toutes sortes de choses. Je devrais ajouter que d'après cette étude, la GRC pourrait avoir des dossiers concernant le blanchiment, ou des allégations de blanchiment de l'argent par des membres de la profession juridique, mais c'est tout ce que nous savons.

M. Rideout: On semble indiquer aussi que les associations d'avocats ne sont pas en mesure de contrôler leurs membres au sujet du blanchiment de l'argent. Avez-vous des observations à faire sur ce que dit ce rapport du dépistage des profits générés par le crime?

M. Wade: Le manque d'uniformité des critères de divulgation a amené les auteurs de cette étude à dire que cette profession ne pouvait pas contrôler ses membres. Or, les différents barreaux n'ont pas les mêmes critères de

[Texte]

In our view it is a simple fact that differences in reporting requirements amongst law societies reflect the different realities of practice in, for example, rural Saskatchewan and downtown Toronto, nothing more than that. There is no indication we are aware of that the law societies are unable to police their members. In fact the alacrity with which law societies respond to complaints and reimburse victims of fraud by lawyers would suggest the opposite.

Mr. Rideout: Right.

Mr. Wade: I would point out to you that there is, in fact, no other profession that takes upon itself the reimbursement of clients of any member of that profession who have been dealt with fraudulently by one of its members.

Mr. Rideout: In the area of regulation, I presume you are same as we are in that you have not seen any regulations relating to the new bill?

Mr. Wade: That is the case.

Mr. Rideout: Have you had any discussions with any departmental officials as to the new regulations and the impact or changes that might be associated with that?

Mr. Wade: Between the death of Bill C-89, if I can put it that way—a lament insofar as we are concerned—and the birth of Bill C-9, which as we indicated we certainly welcome—

Mr. Rideout: We have had a lot of resurrections around here in the last little while.

Mr. Wade: —there were extensive discussions with departmental officials, and we are happy that the matters canvassed are in fact in Bill C-9. There are a couple of small points relating to prepublication which I have addressed. We certainly have confidence that the matters we raised with regard to regulations will be similarly dealt with.

Mr. Rideout: Would it be fair to say that in the previous bill the Canadian Bar Association was very upset with what was contained in that legislation? I gather from your comments today that you are less upset. Are you now supportive of this legislation?

Mr. Wade: That we were certainly very upset would be a mild way of describing our reaction to the previous bill, indeed. We acknowledge that there are some matters in Bill C-9 that represent a compromise that is probably inevitable. For example, we would have preferred to see the elements of the offence defined in the act itself rather than in the regulations, but we do find that the bill is an acceptable compromise on all matters that concerned us.

Mr. Rideout: I was intrigued by your comment that record-keeping with respect to legal fees at $10,000 not be required, because I would like to get on the list of anybody who is paying $10,000 for legal fees. Why would you mention that? What is your concern there?

Mr. Wade: In relation to fees or retainers in particular?

divulgation uniquement en raison des réalités concrètes de cette profession, et ce qui vaut pour une ville agricole comme la Saskatchewan ne s'applique pas à une grande agglomération, comme Toronto. Mais d'après ce que nous savons, rien ne semble indiquer que les barreaux ne puissent pas surveiller leurs membres. En fait, la rapidité avec laquelle ils réagissent en cas de plaintes, et remboursent les victimes des fraudes d'avocats semble indiquer le contraire.

M. Rideout: Très bien.

M. Wade: Je vous dirais qu'en fait, aucune autre profession ne se charge délibérément de rembourser les clients qui auraient été escroqués par un de ses membres.

M. Rideout: En ce qui concerne les règlements, je présume que, comme nous, vous n'en avez vu aucun, concernant le projet de loi?

M. Wade: En effet.

M. Rideout: Avez-vous discuté avec des fonctionnaires du ministère au sujet du nouveau Règlement, de son incidence, ou des changements qu'il pourrait entraîner?

M. Wade: Entre la mort du projet de loi C-89, si je peux m'exprimer ainsi, mort qui nous a bien attristés, et la naissance du projet de loi C-9, dont nous sommes certainement très heureux...

M. Rideout: Nous avons eu beaucoup de résurrections par ici ces derniers temps.

M. Wade: ...il y a eu beaucoup de discussions avec les fonctionnaires du ministères, et nous sommes heureux que les questions examinées figurent dans le projet de loi C-9. Je me suis penché sur un certain nombre de détails concernant la pré-publication. Nous avons bon espoir que les questions que nous avons soulevées au sujet des règlements seront traitées de la même façon.

M. Rideout: Serait-il juste de dire que l'Association du Barreau canadien était très mécontente de ce que contenait ce projet de loi. Je crois comprendre d'après ce que vous nous dites aujourd'hui que vous l'êtes moins. Appuyez-vous maintenant ce projet de loi?

M. Wade: C'est un euphémisme que de dire que nous étions très mécontents de l'ancien projet de loi. Il est vrai que certains aspects du projet de loi C-9 représentent un compromis qui est probablement inévitable. Par exemple, nous aurions préféré que les éléments de l'infraction soient définis dans la loi plutôt que dans le règlement, mais nous estimons que le projet de loi constitue un compromis acceptable pour toutes les questions qui nous préoccupaient.

M. Rideout: J'ai été intrigué lorsque vous dites qu'il n'est pas nécessaire de conserver des documents lorsque les honoraires ne dépassent pas 10,000$, car j'aimerais pouvoir mettre la main sur ceux qui paient des honoraires aussi élevés. Pourquoi avez-vous dit cela? Quelle est votre préoccupation ici?

M. Wade: À propos des honoraires ou des provisions en particulier?

[Text]

Mr. Rideout: Yes.

Mr. Wade: Simply that the requirement to create a record with regard to fees for representation in particular—and we are distinguishing moneys paid to a lawyer for investment, for example, as part of a commercial transaction—requirement to create a record and to ascertain the accuracy of certain information in regard to those fees places the lawyer in a very difficult situation insofar as independently representing his client is concerned. If he is required to ascertain the source of that money, to make a record, it very easily chills the right to counsel.

The other concern is a lesser concern but nonetheless there, and there have been instances of this kind of behaviour. If a lawyer representing an accused, who is entitled to be represented obviously, is required to create a record, which could be useful to enforcement officers or the prosecution, inevitably the accused's lawyer will get called as a Crown witness, which means he cannot carry on defending that client. That makes it very difficult for an accused to obtain representation of his choice.

Given recent statements as high as the Supreme Court of Canada, we feel this may be regarded as an infringement, in fact, upon the right to counsel. There may in fact be a constitutional danger there insofar as it chills the right to counsel. Certainly that argument is currently being explored before the U.S. courts in relation to their legislation, and while the outcome is not yet clear, there is certainly danger there.

Mr. Rideout: The way it was presented I thought it was okay to get paid with laundered funds but not to report on others, but you have given another explanation. So I will pass over to the other side.

Mr. Langdon (Essex—Windsor): I welcome you to the committee and to further discussion of what was certainly first seen as a fairly simple, straightforward piece of legislation. Certainly the Canadian Bar Association deserves a great deal of credit for probing and for bringing to the attention of Members of Parliament some of the potential problems that existed with the original piece of legislation.

Let me ask a general question to begin. Do you now feel satisfied with the piece of legislation sufficiently that if it goes through the committee without amendment you would recommend that it should be adopted, or do you feel strongly enough about the recommendations for amendment you put to us that you feel that if those are not accepted, the bill represents a continuing problem to the CBA?

Mr. Wade: I thank you for your kind words. I guess the question was directed to a bottom-line assessment of the bill, putting it bluntly.

Mr. Langdon: In a sense.

Mr. Wade: I think the most important amendment we brought to your attention would be that relating to prepublication of regulations, the further 30-day notice period if there is an amendment following the 90-day consultation

M. Rideout: Oui.

M. Wade: C'est tout simplement que l'obligation de tenir un dossier au sujet des honoraires de représentation en particulier—et nous établissons une distinction entre l'argent versé à un avocat pour des investissements, par exemple, dans le cadre d'une transaction commerciale—et de vérifier la véracité de certains renseignements au sujet de ces honoraires place l'avocat dans une situation très difficile, car il ne peut pas vraiment représenter son client en toute indépendance. S'il doit vérifier l'origine de cet argent, pour établir un dossier, il lui sera très difficile de le défendre.

L'autre préoccupation est moindre, mais elle n'en existe pas moins, car il y a eu des cas de comportement semblable. Si un avocat qui représente un accusé—qui a bien sûr le droit d'être représenté—est dans l'obligation de tenir un dossier, qui pourrait être utile à des agents d'exécution de la loi ou au procureur de la poursuite, l'avocat de l'accusé sera inévitablement convoqué en tant que témoin de la Couronne, ce qui signifie qu'il ne pourra pas continuer à défendre son client. Un accusé aura donc beaucoup de mal à obtenir l'avocat de son choix.

Compte tenu de décisions récentes d'instances aussi élevées que la Cour suprême du Canada, nous estimons que cela pourrait être considéré comme étant effectivement un non-respect du droit à être représenté par un avocat, ce qui risque de présenter un danger sur le plan constitutionnel. Les tribunaux américains examinent actuellement cet argument par rapport à leur législation et, bien qu'ils ne soient pas encore parvenus à une conclusion, ce danger existe certainement.

M. Rideout: Vous nous avez présenté les choses de telle façon que j'ai cru qu'on pouvait se faire payer avec de l'argent blanchi, mais qu'il ne fallait pas déclarer les autres fonds, mais vous nous avez donné une autre explication. Je vais donc céder la parole à l'autre côté.

M. Langdon (Essex—Windsor): Je vous souhaite la bienvenue au comité, et je suis heureux que nous puissions poursuivre la discussion au sujet d'une loi qui semble être à première vue très simple et sans complication. L'Association du Barreau canadien mérite d'être félicitée parce qu'elle approfondit les choses, et qu'elle attire l'attention des députés sur les possibilités de difficultés qui existaient dans le projet de loi initial.

Je voudrais tout d'abord vous poser une question d'ordre général. Vous estimez-vous suffisamment satisfaits de ce projet de loi pour en recommander l'adoption sans amendement, si telle était la préférence du comité, ou est-ce que vous êtes si convaincus de la nécessité des amendements que s'ils n'étaient pas acceptés ce projet de loi continuerait de ne pas convenir à l'ABC?

M. Wade: Je vous remercie de vos aimables propos. Au bout du compte, si je peux m'exprimer ainsi, votre question portait sur notre évaluation du projet de loi.

M. Langdon: Si vous voulez.

M. Wade: Je crois que l'amendement le plus important que nous ayons proposé concerne la publication préalable des règlements, avec la période de préavis de 30 jours, au cas où un amendement serait proposé suite à la période de and prepublication period. I say that because the decision to maintain essentially all of the elements of the very serious offence in this bill in the regulations is a compromise that is balanced by that prepublication provision, which enables those affected by the bill not only to consult on the content of the regulations, which will define the offence, but also to have adequate notice of any change in the nature of the offence. I think given that compromise it is important to follow it through to its conclusion and ensure that there is at least that 30-day notice period, given that the elements of the offence are not in the act itself; they are in the regulations. Again, it is not always easy to obtain up-to-date versions of regulations.

Mr. Langdon: You have taken the occasion to point out to us certainly what the most important of your recommendations is with that answer. But I would still like to come back, if I could, to where you stand if that recommendation is not accepted, because for those of us on the opposition side, of course, it is . . . I can tell you that I agree with you, but I am certainly not able to tell you yet whether the committee as a whole will agree with you. Clearly, it would be useful to us in terms of our future strategy with respect to the proposed legislation to get a sense of how you would feel about it if that recommendation was not accepted, the one you have considered, in a sense, your bottom line.

Mr. Wade: We would be bound, I think, to feel that what started out as a compromise was no longer an acceptable compromise, because it is really an essential part of that compromise defining a very, very serious offence. We are talking about a $500,000 fine and five years in jail by regulation, that there be an appropriate notice period to those affected, those to whom the bill applies.

Mr. Langdon: I thank you for that answer. With respect to the way we are proceeding here, did you have a chance to review the previous set of regulations?

Mr. Wade: Yes, we did.

Mr. Langdon: Were you able to agree with respect to certain changes to those regulations that you felt were crucial?

Mr. Wade: We identified in the discussion on policy paper, which you have as an appendix to the submission on this bill, our concerns with the regulations. They were discussed with department officials. As I say, we remain confident that those concerns will be addressed.

Mr. Langdon: Given that it is a piece of legislation that relies so heavily on regulation and given that you have made that important point in your submission, do you think it is important that this committee should see the draft regulations in the process of consideration of the proposed legislation?

Mr. Wade: There is always a trade-off. There are the advantages of working by regulation, which offers speed and efficacy and a good deal more flexibility than being required to come back to Parliament to effect relatively minor consultation et de publication préalable de 90 jours. La décision de conserver dans les règlements tous les aspects du projet de loi qui font de cette infraction une infraction très grave est équilibrée par l'obligation de publication préalable, qui permettra aux parties concernées non seulement de tenir des consultations sur la teneur des règlements visant à définir l'infraction, mais aussi d'être prévenues de manière adéquate de tout changement quant à la nature de l'infraction. Étant donné ce compromis, j'estime qu'il est important de le mener jusqu'à sa conclusion naturelle en garantissant une période de préavis d'au moins 30 jours, étant donné que les éléments de l'infraction ne seront pas définis dans la loi elle-même mais dans les textes règlementaires. Or, vous savez qu'il n'est pas toujours facile d'obtenir des versions à jour des textes réglementaires.

M. Langdon: Vous avez profité de cette réponse pour nous indiquer ce qui constitue à vos yeux la plus importante de vos recommandations mais je voudrais quand même vous demander quelle serait votre position si cette recommandation n'était pas acceptée. Pour nous, de l'opposition, il est important de le savoir. Je puis vous dire que je suis d'accord avec vous, mais je ne sais pas du tout si l'ensemble du comité partage mon avis. Il nous serait donc très utile, pour formuler notre stratégie future, de savoir quelle serait votre réaction si votre recommandation n'était pas acceptée. En d'autres termes, quelle serait votre position finale?

M. Wade: Je crois que nous serions obligés de considérer que ce qui était au départ un compromis acceptable ne le serait plus du tout, puisque cela constituerait un élément essentiel du compromis concernant la définition d'une infraction extrêmement grave. On parle en effet ici d'une amende de 500,000$ et de cinq années d'emprisonnement, sanctions que nous pouvons accepter à moins que l'on ne prévoie un préavis approprié pour les parties concernées.

M. Langdon: Je vous remercie de votre réponse. Avez-vous eu la possibilité d'examiner les textes règlementaires précédents?

M. Wade: Oui.

M. Langdon: Étiez-vous d'accord avec certains changements apportés à ces règlements qui vous paraissaient cruciaux?

M. Wade: Vous trouverez dans l'annexe à notre mémoire sur ce projet de loi l'exposé de nos préoccupations au sujet des règlements. Nous en avons discuté avec les représentants du ministère et, comme je l'ai déjà dit, nous restons convaincus que nos préoccupations seront prises en compte.

M. Langdon: Étant donné que ce texte de loi est tellement tributaire des règlements, et considérant ce que vous avez dit dans votre mémoire, croyez-vous qu'il est important que le comité puisse examiner l'ébauche des textes réglementaires avant l'adoption du projet de loi lui-même?

M. Wade: Il y a toujours un compromis. Agir par voie réglementaire présente certains avantages, aux chapitres de la rapidité, de l'efficacité et de la souplesse, puisque cela évite de dépendre du Parlement pour mettre en oeuvre des changes. It is a difficult call with regard to any particular package, as to where the line should be drawn between what is in the statute and what is in the regulations and how those regulations should be dealt with. We would have to express the view that most of the content of this bill, definition of the obligations upon those who will be subject to the bill, are to be found in the regulations. I guess the only realistic answer I can give is that some assessment has to be made as to whether the language of the statute, the bill itself, is a sufficiently confining framework that one can be satisfied that the regulations will not be untoward.

Mr. Langdon: You have talked about the bill primarily from the point of view of questions of client confidentiality and concerns of that sort, the question of whether the penalties provided for are appropriate for what is set out in this piece of proposed legislation. Let me explore an additional point. From the economic perspective of your membership, people you are representing, is the record-keeping period a problem or is it something you think your profession would be able to cope with?

Mr. Wade: I guess everybody was so overwhelmed by the more basic concerns regarding solicitor-client confidentiality and privilege that we didn't address that specifically. At first blush—and I cannot pretend to speak for the entire membership on this—I don't see a problem with that. First, the circumstances in which a record will be required and the nature of that record are now far less onerous and far more acceptable to the profession. I think the period for which that record is required to be kept would be acceptable to the profession.

Mr. Kempling (Burlington): I have a couple of short questions, Mr. Wade. First of all, with regard to penalties, you made a comment that you felt the $500,000 fine, including five years, is a pretty heavy penalty to put down on, let us say, a lawyer merely for failing to keep records. You said that other legislation you had examined was not quite that onerous. Can you tell us what you found in other countries?

Mr. Wade: Yes. You will find it set out in the discussion paper on Bill C-9, but I could summarize very quickly.

Under the United States Bank Secrecy Act, which does not apply to lawyers, there is a potential penalty for civil liability of $10,000, a potential criminal penalty of $250,000 and five years. I think that is the most substantial of the penalties, if I'm not mistaken. In fact, I will ask our research office, Robin Geller, who has prepared the grid, to respond to that. She will do it perhaps a little more effectively than I.

Ms Robin Geller (Research Officer, Legal and Governmental Affairs, Canadian Bar Association): Under the U.S. Bank Secrecy Act, there are both civil and criminal penalties. The civil penalty, as Mr. Wade has just mentioned, is up to a maximum of $10,000. In the event of a negligent offence committed under that act, the penalty is only $500.

modifications relativement mineures. Il est cependant difficile de dire précisément ce qui devrait être mis en place par voie réglementaire et ce qui devrait l'être par voie législative. A notre avis, la plupart des dispositions de ce projet de loi, qui définissent les responsabilités de ceux qui y seront assujettis, devraient figurer dans les règlements, mais à condition que la loi soit rédigée de manière suffisamment précise et claire pour nous donner la garantie que les règlements n'auront pas d'effets délétères.

M. Langdon: Dans votre analyse du projet de loi, vous avez abordé les questions de la confidentialité des relations avec vos clients et de la gravité des peines proposées. Je voudrais aborder maintenant un autre aspect, celui de la tenue des registres. Du point de vue économique, pensez-vous que cela risque de causer des difficultés à vos membres ou non?

M. Wade: Je dois dire que nous n'avons pas examiné cette question de manière détaillée, étant donné que les problèmes plus fondamentaux concernant la confidentialité des relations clients-avocats revêtaient pour nous une importance beaucoup plus considérable. De prime abord, et je précise que je ne m'exprime pas ici au nom de tous nos membres, je ne vois pas de problème grave avec cet aspect du projet de loi. En effet, les dispositions concernant la nature des registres et les circonstances dans lesquelles ils seraient nécessaires sont aujourd'hui beaucoup moins lourdes et plus acceptables par la profession. En outre, je crois que nous sommes prêts à accepter la période durant laquelle ces registres devraient être conservés.

M. Kempling (Burlington): J'ai quelques brèves questions à vous proposer, monsieur Wade. Vous avez d'abord dit qu'une peine de 500,000$ et cinq années d'emprisonnement constituent une sanction très lourde pour un avocat dont la seule infraction a été de ne pas tenir de registre. Vous avez indiqué que les autres textes de loi que vous avez examinés dans ce domaine n'étaient pas aussi sévères. Pourriez-vous donc nous dire ce que vous avez constaté dans les lois d'autres pays?

M. Wade: Oui, vous trouverez des détails à ce sujet dans notre document de réflexion sur le projet de loi C-9, mais je vais vous les résumer très rapidement.

La loi américaine sur le secret bancaire, qui ne s'applique pas aux avocats, prévoit une peine civile de 10,000$, une peine pénale de 250,000$ et une peine d'emprisonnement de cinq ans. Si je ne me trompe, ces sanctions sont les plus lourdes que nous ayons identifiées. Comme c'est notre recherchiste, Robin Geller, qui a préparé cette étude, je vais lui demander de vous répondre. Elle connaît mieux la question que moi.

Mme Robin Geller (agent de recherche, Affaires juridiques et gouvernementales, Association du Barreau canadien): La loi américaine sur le secret bancaire prévoit des peines civiles et pénales. Comme l'a dit M. Wade, la peine civile peut atteindre 10,000$. En cas d'infractions non délibérées, la peine n'est que de 500$.

[Texte]

The criminal penalties under that act are up to $250,000 or five years. When that offence is combined with another offence, for instance a money laundering offence added to a failure to keep a record, the penalties go up to a maximum of $500,000 or five years.

The penalties under the U.S. Internal Revenue code for failure to make a recording, or in their case a reporting requirement similar to that in our legislation, are up to $25,000 or five years.

The Australian legislation is quite similar to ours and has two types of offences that can be committed, either a strict liability offence that could be committed negligently, for which the penalty for individuals is up to $5,000 or two years imprisonment, or where there is a full mens rea requirement, it is up to $10,000 and five years.

There are, in addition to those, different penalties for corporations, which, if I recall, involve monetary penalties of approximately ten times those provided for individuals.

Mr. Kempling: So they have separated the individuals and the corporations.

Ms Geller: Yes, under the Australian legislation they have.

Mr. Speller (Haldimand—Norfolk): I have two very quick questions regarding page 18 under your recommendations.

I want to preface this by saying I am not a lawyer, so I don't understand what you are talking about here. You are saying in recommendation number 3 that the regulations should only require that persons to whom the act applies ascertain the identity of those with whom they are dealing in according with sound business practices. What does that mean?

Mr. Wade: The provision in the bill itself that deals with requirement to ascertain the accuracy of what is being recorded is paragraph 5.(1)(d), which I addressed myself to a while ago. That has now been considerably restricted in scope to deal only with the identity of the person with whom one is dealing—the client, in other words—and not the accuracy of any other information.

This would provide, under the regulations, a standard with which one is to comply in ascertaining the accuracy of the information recorded, namely the identity of the client, and this would simply be in accordance with sound business practice; in other words, whatever a member of the legal profession or in other cases, an accountant, or somebody else to whom this bill applies, would normally do to verify for his business purposes the identity of the person with whom he is dealing.

Mr. Speller: That seems to me a little bit broad.

Mr. Wade: The kind of problem we had in mind here, which is difficult to identify specifically, is, for example, the lawyer dealing with refugee clients, who often have no means of identification. In our view the appropriate standard to

Pour ce qui est des sanctions pénales, elles peuvent atteindre 250,000$ ou cinq années d'emprisonnement. Si l'infraction s'ajoute à une autre, par exemple s'il y a une infraction de blanchiment d'argent ajouté à l'absence de registre, la peine peut atteindre un maximum de 500,000$ ou cinq années d'emprisonnement.

Selon le code des services américains du Revenu, une personne qui ne tient pas de registre ou qui ne fait pas de déclaration selon l'exigence de la loi, comme chez nous, est passible d'une peine de 25,000$ ou cinq années d'emprisonnement.

La loi australienne est tout à fait semblable à la nôtre dans la mesure où elle prévoit deux types d'infraction, soit une infraction de responsabilité stricte pouvant être commise par négligence, pour laquelle la peine peut atteindre 5,000$ ou deux années d'emprisonnement, dans le cas des particuliers, soit une infraction tout à fait délibérée, avec mens rea clairement établi, auquel cas la peine peut atteindre 10,000$ et cinq années.

Il faut ajouter à cela les sanctions dont sont passibles les sociétés qui, si je me souviens bien, peuvent représenter des sanctions monétaires dix fois supérieures à celles dont sont passibles les personnes.

M. Kempling: La loi australienne établit donc une distinction entre les particuliers et les sociétés?

Mme Geller: Oui.

M. Speller (Haldimand—Norfolk): Je voudrais vous poser deux brèves questions au sujet de vos recommandations.

Laissez-moi vous dire tout d'abord que je ne suis pas avocat, ce qui signifie que je ne comprends pas l'objet de ces recommandations. Vous dites dans votre troisième recommandation que les règlements devraient exiger seulement que les personnes à qui la loi s'applique établissent l'identité des personnes avec lesquelles elles ont des relations d'affaires, selon de saines pratiques commerciales. Qu'est-ce que cela veut dire?

M. Wade: C'est à l'alinéa 5.(1)d) du projet de loi que l'on trouve l'obligation d'établir l'exactitude de ce qui est enregistré, ce dont j'ai parlé un peu plus tôt. Cette disposition a cependant été considérablement restreinte, dans la mesure où elle ne porte plus que sur l'identité de la personne, c'est-à-dire du client, et non plus sur l'exactitude des renseignements.

Cela signifie que les règlements obligeraient les avocats à vérifier l'exactitude des renseignements enregistrés, c'est-à-dire l'identité du client, et que cela pourrait se faire selon de saines pratiques commerciales. Autrement dit, un avocat, un comptable ou toute autre personne assujettie au projet de loi répondrait à cette exigence en procédant aux vérifications normales qu'il devrait de toute façon faire pour établir l'identité de la personne avec laquelle il établit des relations commerciales.

M. Speller: Cela me paraît très général.

M. Wade: Le problème que nous voulions envisager, et qu'il est difficile d'exposer avec précision, pourrait être celui d'un avocat traitant avec des réfugiés, qui n'ont souvent aucune pièce d'identité. Selon nous, le critère qu'il convient apply to somebody in that situation is that which he would normally do in accepting that person as a client for his practice. Obviously these are not people to whom one can say, where is your passport, where is your driver's licence, where are your credit cards?

Mr. Speller: Moving down to number 4, your recommendation is that the regulations make it clear that only where a lawyer is involved in a transaction also involving a third party does any obligation to create a record arise. I read from this that if someone comes into your office, gives you $1 million and says, put this into a trust account for me, hold onto this for me, that is fine. You don't think there should then be any obligation. But if three weeks later that same person says, we will transfer this money to somebody else, then there should be an obligation to report. Is that what you are saying?

Mr. Wade: We are talking $1 million cash at the outset.

Mr. Speller: You are taking $1 million cash.

Mr. Wade: None of that money is to be applied to legal fees or retainers. In that event, where money is brought to the lawyer for investment, it is cash, it is more than $10,000—and by cash we mean bank notes and coin—I think we accept that as part of dealing with the proceeds of drug trafficking or the proceeds of crime in general there ought to be an obligation to create a record in those circumstances.

What this recommendation is addressed to is this somewhat arcane technical problem for lawyers, but nonetheless a very real one, in that essentially all moneys they take in are received in trust and therefore received technically for the benefit of another, which was the term used in the earlier draft regulations. So they would have caught every single cash payment, although that was unclear under the regs as well, made to a lawyer, and it was our concern in particular that the right to counsel, the right to representation, ought not to be chilled by a record-keeping requirement for professional fees and retainers.

We acknowledge that where very large sums of cash are brought to a lawyer for investment there ought to be a record. Otherwise, we accept that if all other avenues of money laundering are closed off but the legal profession is still an open avenue, then at least there will be attempts to use the legal profession for money laundering.

The Chairman: Thank you very much, Ms Speller and Mr. Wade. We appreciate your coming before the committee here today and submitting a brief.

We will move along now to the department officials.

Mr. Wade: Mr. Chairman, members of the committee, we thank you very much on behalf of the bar for a sympathetic, kind hearing, and we are pleased to have been of assistance.

d'appliquer dans ce genre de situation est d'exiger que l'avocat fasse ce qu'il ferait normalement avant d'accepter que cette personne devienne son client. Il est en effet évident que l'on ne peut demander à cette personne de présenter un passeport, un permis de conduire ou une carte de crédit.

M. Speller: Votre recommandation suivante est que l'on indique clairement dans les règlements que c'est seulement au cas où un avocat est impliqué dans une transaction impliquant également une tierce partie qu'il devrait être obligé d'établir un registre. Si je comprends bien, cela signifie que vous n'aurez strictement aucune obligation si quelqu'un entre dans votre bureau et vous remet un million de dollars en vous demandant de les placer dans un compte de fiducie. Par contre, si cette personne vous demande trois semaines plus tard de transférer la somme à quelqu'un d'autre, alors là vous auriez certaines obligations à respecter. Est-ce bien votre position?

M. Wade: Vous voulez parler d'un dépôt de un million de dollars en espèces?

M. Speller: Oui.

M. Wade: Cette somme n'aurait donc strictement rien à voir avec des honoraires juridiques. Si tel est le cas, cela signifie que la somme serait remise à l'avocat pour être investie et, comme il s'agit de plus de 10,000$ en espèces, c'est-à-dire en billets de banque et en pièces, nous sommes prêts à accepter l'obligation d'établir un registre car il pourrait en effet s'agir du produit du trafic de la drogue ou d'activités criminelles.

Cette recommandation vise à résoudre un problème assez mystérieux que connaissent les avocats, mais qui n'en est pas moins très réel, celui résultant du fait que toutes les sommes qui leur sont versées, le sont en fiducie et sont donc techniquement destinées à quelqu'un d'autre, ce qui était précisément le cas qui avait été envisagé dans l'avant-projet des règlements. Autrement dit, l'avant-projet pouvait s'appliquer à tout paiement en espèces, même si cela n'avait pas été explicitement indiqué dans le texte, et notre souci était de veiller à ce que le droit du client à retenir les services d'un avocat et à se faire défendre ne soit aucunement entravé par l'obligation de tenir un registre des honoraires professionnels et des provisions.

Nous reconnaissons parfaitement qu'il est normal d'enregistrer les sommes très importantes versées en espèces à un avocat pour être investies. Si tel n'était pas le cas, et si toutes les autres méthodes de recyclage de l'argent étaient inaccessibles, il est probable que certains s'efforceraient d'utiliser les services des avocats pour blanchir leur argent.

Le président: Merci beaucoup, madame Speller et monsieur Wade. Nous vous remercions d'être venus témoigner aujourd'hui et de nous avoir adressé un mémoire.

Nous allons maintenant entendre les représentants du ministère.

M. Wade: Merci beaucoup, monsieur le président et messieurs les membres du comité de nous avoir écoutés avec attention et intérêt.

The Chairman: I want to welcome the officials from the Department of Finance before this committee. For the benefit of the translators, I would ask if each of you would identify yourself before we start.

Mr. Mark Jewett, Q.C. (Assistant Deputy Minister (Justice), Department of Finance): Mr. Chairman, I am the Assistant Deputy Minister of the Law Branch. With me is Ray LaBrosse, Director of Financial Institutions Division; James McCollum; and Yvon Carrière from the Tax Council Division of Finance.

Mr. LaBrosse will have some remarks.

Mr. Ray LaBrosse (Director, Financial Institutions Division, Department of Finance): Mr. Chairman, we have a brief statement relating to Bill C-9 which we would like to read into the record, and then we are prepared to answer questions that you or members of the committee may have.

First of all, the bill is primarily about record keeping. Its purpose is to ensure that adequate records are in place so that the police can carry out—

Mr. Langdon: On a point of order, can we get a copy of this?

The Chairman: Do you have copies of your presentation available?

Mr. LaBrosse: I was going to read from parts of it. I can have a copy made available to the committee from the parts I have if that would please the committee, Mr. Chairman.

The Chairman: Yes, I think we should have it if it is requested.

Mr. LaBrosse: The primary purpose of this bill is to ensure that adequate records are in place so that the police can carry out money laundering investigations in an effective manner. It establishes a separate statute linked to Bill C-61, which made money laundering a criminal offence.

An extensive consultation process has been carried out, and the bill has the support of those who will be required to maintain records. It is designed to be thorough and flexible yet as unobtrusive as possible. It should have little effect on the way ordinary Canadians go about their business. For drug traffickers and others engaged in business crimes, life will be more complicated. It will help ensure that crime does not pay.

Money laundering, as I'm sure the members of this committee know, is the process of disguising or concealing illicit funds in order to make them appear legitimate. Laundering illegal proceeds or dirty money into usable, apparently legitimate forms is essential for many criminal enterprises. Laundering is particularly essential for drug trafficking, which generates large volumes of cash. Cash is awkward, it is bulky, and it attracts attention in large quantities. There is a strong incentive to try to integrate these funds into the financial system. It is at the placement stage when cash is first introduced into the financial system that money launderers are most vulnerable. It is for this

Le président: J'accueille maintenant des représentants du ministère des Finances. Dans l'intérêt des traducteurs, je vais demander à chacun d'entre vous de vous présenter.

M. Mark Jewett, c.r. (sous-ministre adjoint (Justice), ministère des Finances): Monsieur le président, je suis le sous-ministre adjoint responsable de la Direction juridique. Je suis accompagné de Ray LaBrosse, directeur de la Division des institutions financières, de James McCollum, et de Yvon Carrière, de la Division du droit fiscal.

M. LaBrosse souhaite faire quelques remarques.

M. Ray LaBrosse (directeur, Division des institutions financières, ministère des Finances): Monsieur le président, nous aimerions lire un bref exposé sur le projet de loi C-9, après quoi nous pourrons répondre à vos questions.

La première chose à dire est que le projet de loi porte essentiellement sur la tenue de registres. L'objectif est d'assurer l'existence de registres adéquats pour permettre à la police...

M. Langdon: Pourrions-nous obtenir un exemplaire de ce texte?

Le président: Avez-vous des copies de votre déclaration?

M. LaBrosse: J'allais vous en lire des extraits. Si vous le souhaitez, je peux en faire une copie et la remettre au greffier du comité.

Le président: Je crois que ce serait une bonne chose.

M. LaBrosse: L'objectif primordial du projet de loi est d'assurer l'existence de registres adéquats pour permettre à la police d'effectuer des enquêtes efficaces sur les activités de blanchiment de l'argent. Ce projet de loi est donc destiné à accompagner le projet de loi C-61, qui dispose que le blanchiment de l'argent est une activité criminelle.

Comme le projet de loi a fait l'objet de vastes consultations, il a recueilli l'appui de tous ceux qu'il obligera à tenir des registres. Il est destiné à être exhaustif et souple, mais en causant le moins de problème possible aux parties concernées. De fait, il ne devrait avoir qu'une incidence minime sur les activités commerciales de la plupart des Canadiens. Par contre, il rendra la vie plus difficile aux trafiquants de drogues et aux autres criminels. Il permettra d'assurer que le crime ne paye pas.

Comme vous le savez, blanchir de l'argent consiste à déguiser ou dissimuler des sommes illicites de façon à les faire paraître légitimes. Le blanchiment de l'argent sale ou obtenu de façon illégale, pour en faire de l'argent utilisable et apparemment légitime, est une activité essentielle pour beaucoup de criminels. C'est notamment le cas des trafiquants de drogues, dont l'activité produit des sommes en espèces considérables. Or, les espèces sont difficiles à manipuler, elles sont visibles et elles attirent l'attention. Les trafiquants sont donc fortement incités à tenter de les recycler dans le système financier normal. Or, c'est au moment où les criminels tentent d'introduire l'argent illégal reason there is a special focus on cash in anti-money-laundering programs.

This bill should make it more difficult and riskier to attempt to use Canada's financial system to launder money. It should help ensure that our country does not become a haven for money launderers.

There are three main factors motivating this bill, Mr. Chairman. Of principal importance was the experience of the RCMP in conducting money laundering investigations. Their experience was that while Canadian financial institutions generally maintain reasonable records, there was lack of consistency.

In carrying out investigations, they could not be sure that required records would actually be there. There was considerable variation in retention periods, for example, and as a consequence investigations could be thwarted. As committee members know, the Minister of State for Finance, Mr. Gilles Loiselle, chaired a private sector advisory committee to deal with the issue of money laundering. This group included representatives from a broad cross-section of Canada's financial industry. All the major financial industry associations were represented. This group quickly focused on record keeping as an area of prime attention and recommended that the government introduce legislation.

The work of the G-7 Financial Action Task Force is also a factor. The first report of the task force contained a series of 40 recommendations for action against money laundering. At the Houston summit, the Prime Minister and other G-7 leaders signalled their intention to implement the task force recommendations fully and expeditiously. In general, Canada measures up well to the task force recommendations. The main area where we fall short is record keeping. This bill will change that.

In designing the bill, the government engaged in an extensive consultative process. A key element was the advisory committee which the Minister of State for Finance chaired. At the time, the focus of attention was on financial institutions and the composition of the advisory group reflected this. Representatives of all groups explicitly mentioned in the legislation were included on the advisory committee.

The Financial Action Task Force report and accumulated experience in Canada and elsewhere suggested that professionals who handled large amounts of cash were also a cause for concern. While contact was made with the legal community, the Canadian Bar Association continued to have their concerns. As you are aware, Mr. Chairman, it has been possible to take the Canadian Bar Association concerns into account, and an improved bill has resulted.

dans le système financier qu'ils sont le plus vulnérables. Voilà pourquoi les programmes de répression du blanchiment de l'argent sont toujours spécialement axés sur le traitement des espèces.

Avec ce projet de loi, il devrait être plus difficile et dangereux d'utiliser le système financier canadien pour blanchir de l'argent. Cela devrait garantir que notre pays ne deviendra pas un sanctuaire pour ceux qui pratiquent ce type d'activité.

Trois raisons principales justifient l'adoption de ce projet de loi, monsieur le président. La première, qui revêt une importance fondamentale, est reliée à l'expérience enregistrée par la GRC dans le cadre de ses enquêtes sur le blanchiment de l'argent. En effet, la GRC a pu constater que, si les établissments financiers canadiens tiennent généralement des registres raisonnables, ceux-ci manquent de cohérence.

Dans l'exécution de ces enquêtes, la GRC ne peut donc avoir la certitude que les registres dont elle a besoin auront été tenus. Il existe par exemple des variations considérables quant à la période de rétention des dossiers, ce qui peut entraver les enquêtes. Comme le savent les membres du comité, le ministre d'Etat aux Finances, M. Gilles Loiselle, a présidé un comité consultatif du secteur privé saisi du problème du blanchiment de l'argent. Ce comité comprenait des représentants de toutes les branches de l'industrie canadienne des services financiers. Toutes les grandes associations financières y étaient représentées. Or, le comité est rapidement parvenu à la conclusion que les registres constituaient un élément central du système de répression du blanchiment de l'argent, et il a recommandé au gouvernement de légiférer en la matière.

Le deuxième facteur est relié aux travaux du groupe de travail financier mis sur pied par les sept Grands. Le premier rapport de ce groupe de travail comportait 40 recommandations portant sur la répression du blanchiment de l'argent. Lors du sommet de Houston, le premier ministre et les autres chefs de gouvernement des sept Grands ont exprimé l'intention de mettre en oeuvre rapidement et complètement les recommandations du groupe de travail. Dans l'ensemble, les mesures en vigueur au Canada sont assez proches de ce que recommandait le groupe de travail, sauf en matière de registre. Avec ce projet de loi, le problème aura été résolu.

Pour rédiger le projet de loi, le gouvernement a tenu de vastes consultations, notamment par le truchement du comité consultatif présidé par le ministre d'Etat aux Finances. A l'époque, l'attention était focalisée sur les institutions financières, ce que reflétait d'ailleurs la composition du groupe consultatif. Tous les groupes explicitement mentionnés dans le projet de loi ont été représenté au sein du comité consultatif.

Le rapport du groupe de travail sur les finances et l'expérience acquise au Canada et ailleurs ont fait ressortir qu'il fallait également s'intéresser de près aux activités des professionnels qui manipulent de vastes sommes d'argent. Bien que des contacts aient été pris avec les professions juridiques, l'Association du Barreau canadien continuait d'exprimer des doutes au sujet du projet de loi. Comme vous le savez, monsieur le président, nous avons pu tenir compte des préoccupations de l'association, ce qui nous a permis d'améliorer le projet de loi d'origine.

[Texte]

The provinces were also consulted in the formulation of this legislation. At the officials level, there were several consultations.

Finally, there has been extensive consultations on the draft regulations. The regulations were designed with the input of the groups affected and draft regulations were released when the previous version of the bill, Bill C-89, was tabled last fall. The draft regulations are being refined on the basis of comments that have been received since that time, with input from the RCMP. Bill C-9 calls for regulations to be prepublished in The Canada Gazette at least 90 days before becoming effective.

Thank you, Mr. Chairman. We are prepared to answer any questions the committee may have.

The Chairman: Thank you very much. For the first round of questioners we will go to Mr. Rideout, following by Mr. Langdon. It will be 10 minutes each, then over to Mr. Kempling.

Mr. Rideout: I think we all agree that the largest portion of this bill is going to be dealt with through regulation, and we had a discussion before the committee yesterday. Are those regulations yet available and are they going to be produced to this committee before we report?

Mr. LaBrosse: Mr. Chairman, we have been working on the regulations, but the draft regulations related to Bill C-89 were tabled when the bill was tabled in October. We have been endeavouring to make sure the changes that were necessary as a result of the changes to the bill are then fully reflected in the regulations. We do not yet have them finished to provide them to the committee.

Mr. Rideout: When do you anticipate those being available? I think in fairness this committee ought not to report until we have had an opportunity to review the regulations.

Mr. LaBrosse: We are working as quickly as we can to get the regulations out. They are fundamentally based on the October 25 version with the required changes because of the changes to the bill.

Mr. Rideout: Let me put it this way. In the spirit of the non-partisan attitude that has developed since the last Speech from the Throne and in our desire to co-operate with government, we have been going out of our way to expedite this particular legislation, but I think that we, at least in the Liberal party, are not prepared to see this pass until we have had an opportunity to review the regulations. So it will be entirely in your hands as to how soon this becomes effective. Perhaps you could give the committee a rough idea as to when that would be available.

Mr. Jewett: It is difficult to say. We can probably produce regulations within a week to 10 days if we move. We may or may not have them in 10 days. We will do what we can to produce them.

Nous avons également consulté les provinces, à plusieurs reprises, au niveau des hauts fonctionnaires.

Finalement, nous avons tenu de vastes consultations au sujet de l'ébauche des règlements. Ceux-ci ont été formulés avec la participation des groupes concernés, et un avant-projet des textes réglementaires avait été publié lors du dépôt de la version précédente du projet de loi, l'automne dernier, sous le titre C-89. Nous procédons actuellement à l'amélioration du projet de texte réglementaire, en fonction des commentaires recueillis et avec la participation de la GRC. Le projet de loi C-9 exige que le règlement soit publié dans La Gazette du Canada au moins 90 jours avant son entrée en vigueur.

Merci, monsieur le président. Nous sommes maintenant prêts à répondre à vos questions.

Le président: Merci beaucoup. Je vais d'abord donner la parole à M. Rideout, puis à M. Langdon. Ils auront 10 minutes chacun, après quoi nous passerons à M. Kempling.

M. Rideout: Nous convenons tous que les éléments les plus importants de ce projet de loi seront mis en oeuvre par voie réglementaire, et notre comité en a discuté hier. Je dois donc vous demander si le règlement est maintenant disponible et si le comité pourra l'examiner avant de préparer son rapport.

M. LaBrosse: L'avant-projet du règlement avait été publié lors du dépôt du projet de loi C-89, en octobre. Nous avons tenté d'y apporter les changements jugés nécessaires par suite des modifications apportées au projet de loi lui-même. Ce travail n'est cependant pas encore achevé et nous ne pouvons donc pas fournir les règlements d'exécution au comité.

M. Rideout: Quand pourrez-vous le faire? Vous conviendrez que le comité ne devrait pas préparer son rapport tant qu'il n'aura pas eu la possibilité d'examiner les règlements.

M. LaBrosse: Nous essayons d'apporter les modifications aux règlements le plus rapidement possible. Les modifications sont destinées à refléter la version du 25 octobre.

M. Rideout: Je vais m'exprimer autrement. Étant donné l'esprit de collaboration qui règne depuis le dernier discours du Trône, et notre volonté de coopérer avec le gouvernement, nous avons fait tout notre possible pour accélérer le débat sur ce texte de loi. Je dois cependant vous dire que le Parti libéral ne veut pas que ce projet de loi puisse être adopté sans que nous ayons eu la possibilité d'en examiner les règlements d'exécution. Autrement dit, la date d'entrée en vigueur du projet de loi dépend complètement de vous. Peut-être pourriez-vous donc nous donner maintenant une idée générale de la date à laquelle les règlements seront disponibles?

M. Jewett: C'est difficile à dire. Si nous nous y mettons sérieusement, nous pourrions probablement avoir le texte d'ici sept à dix jours. Peut-être que non. Nous ferons tout notre possible.

[Text]

Mr. Rideout: That would be great, because we would like to see the legislation in effect as soon as possible, but at the same time we don't want to enact it until we see the regulations. That was the beauty of the previous bill; we did have the regulations at the same time.

Mr. Jewett: What we could do that might advance your consideration of it is perhaps indicate to you the areas of the regulations that are going to be changed from the old regulations. Perhaps from that you could then see what we are going to do.

Mr. Rideout: That might be a good suggestion, to look at all the other areas in regulation. By that time, maybe the other will be available.

Mr. Jewett: We can probably do that either later today or tomorrow.

Mr. Rideout: That would be super if that is agreed, if that is the way we are going to proceed. Maybe we can talk about that afterwards.

Obviously the effect of this legislation is that there is an intrusion into people's lives to a degree, with information going to the RCMP or to whoever is going to be responsible for taking this the next step. I get the impression from reading some of the other literature that this information is again going to be shared with other countries, and other countries are going to know... I was looking at the co-ordination of the American national drug policy. They make a comment in this as follows:

> The purposes of the negotiation under this subsection are to reach one or more international agreements to ensure that foreign banks and other financial institutions maintain adequate records of large U.S. currency transactions and to establish a mechanism whereby such records may be made available to the United States law enforcement agencies.

Are there going to be reciprocal agreements as far as Canada is concerned with those same bases in place?

Mr. Jewett: On the subject-matter of this bill, Mr. Chairman, this bill is a record-keeping bill. It does not have any provision for sharing that information or moving it out. It is simply to ensure that when an investigation is undertaken, say, by the RCMP, when they go in to look for the record there will be something there. If there is to be any sharing or moving of the information, that will be under another statute. It is not under this bill.

Mr. Rideout: So the information that is gathered by this bill could be shared in another fashion.

Mr. Jewett: Only if someone, for example, seizes it with a search warrant or something like that. It isn't directly related.

Mr. Rideout: I don't want to belabour it. It is just that when you read some of the.... I gather this flows from the G-7 and all of that intent of having an international drug laundering situation set up so that all of these countries are

M. Rideout: Ce serait parfait car nous souhaitons que ce projet de loi entre en vigueur le plus vite possible, mais nous ne pourrons absolument pas donner notre accord tant que nous n'aurons pas vu les règlements. Je vous rappelle que la version précédente du projet de loi était accompagnée des règlements.

M. Jewett: Ce que nous pourrions peut-être faire pour ne pas retarder vos travaux serait de vous indiquer où nos modifications seront apportées dans les règlements. Cela pourrait peut-être vous donner une meilleure idée de nos intentions.

M. Rideout: C'est peut-être une bonne idée. Quand nous aurons fini ce travail, tout le texte sera peut-être disponible.

M. Jewett: Nous pourrions faire cela plus tard aujourd'hui ou demain.

M. Rideout: Ce serait parfait, si tous les membres du comité sont d'accord. Nous pourrions peut-être en parler plus tard.

Il est évident que ce texte de loi constituera dans une certaine mesure une ingérence dans la vie des citoyens, puisque des informations seront communiquées à la GRC ou aux autres organismes de répression concernés. Cependant, j'ai aussi l'impression que ces informations seront communiquées à d'autres pays. Par exemple, j'examinais un document concernant la coordination de la politique nationale américaine de répression du trafic des drogues, où je lisais ceci:

> Le but des négociations prévues par cet alinéa est de signer une ou plusieurs ententes internationales pour garantir que les banques et autres institutions financières étrangères tiennent des registres adéquats des grosses transactions en devises américaines, et d'établir un mécanisme permettant à ces registres d'être mis à la disposition des organismes policiers des États-unis.

Envisagez-vous donc des ententes de réciprocité entre le Canada et d'autres pays?

M. Jewett: En ce qui concerne strictement ce projet de loi, monsieur le président, il porte uniquement sur la tenue de registres. Il ne contient aucune disposition de partage de renseignements. Il vise simplement à veiller à ce que les dossiers existent lorsque la GRC entreprend une enquête, par exemple. Si l'on doit procéder au partage de renseignements, ou à la communication de renseignements à d'autres autorités nationales, cela devra se faire dans le cadre d'un autre texte de loi et pas de celui-ci.

M. Rideout: Donc, les renseignements qui seront rassemblés en vertu de ce projet de loi pourraient être partagés d'une autre manière?

M. Jewett: Seulement si quelqu'un les obtient grâce à un mandat de perquisition, par exemple. Il n'y a pas de lien direct entre le partage et ce texte de loi.

M. Rideout: Je ne veux pas trop insister sur cette question mais cela ne me paraît pas clair. Je suppose que cela découle du groupe de travail des sept Grands et de l'objectif de mettre sur pied une structure internationale de providing information and exchanging information. All I'm really trying to know is whether Canada is going to be part of it and whether the information that is gathered here is going to be made available to other foreign jurisdictions. I gather that is not the case.

Mr. James McCollum (Chief, Industry Analysis and Relations Section, Financial Institutions Division, Department of Finance): I could speak to that.

The way information is shared internationally is through something called an MLAT, a mutual legal assistance treaty. Canada has a number of mutual legal assistance treaties, but the data and records created pursuant to this bill would be no different from any other data or records that are available. They would have to go through the same process that would occur in any case. So there is no particular change in that respect.

Mr. Rideout: What is going to happen with this information?

Mr. McCollum: As Mr. LaBrosse indicated at the beginning, the purpose of this bill is to ensure that there are adequate records in place and that there is consistency in terms of those records so the police can carry out investigations. As he remarked earlier, for the most part these records are available. The problem is lack of consistency, and there were a few gaps in the case of some institutions.

In fact, the first round of draft regulations, which were developed in consultation with the various industries affected, were designed in a way that would minimize any additional record-keeping burden on those institutions.

Mr. Rideout: That is what I was wondering. So this is really more on the basis of proving your case afterwards, rather than having it as a trigger to identify possible criminal activity, then?

Mr. McCollum: Yes, that is absolutely correct.

Mr. Langdon: My first question has to do with the issue of consultation and your suggested statement—and that is why it would have been useful to have the written document. If I wrote it down properly, you said that the legislation has the support of those affected.

I am not certain if you were here for the entire testimony from the Canadian Bar Association, but they indicated to us that if an amendment was not made that would require those regulations that are being changed to be published at least 30 days before they came into effect, then they would certainly feel that we should not support the legislation.

Can I ask you therefore, from the perspective of the department—and I do not know, you may wish the minister to deal with this—whether you feel comfortable with that suggested amendment they have put forward?

Mr. LaBrosse: Bill C-9 does have a provision related to the pre-publication of 90 days, which I guess is not usual in legislation, but I think that would provide a full period of time for comments of all interested parties. I think the répression du trafic de drogues, ce qui exige que les pays concernés partagent des renseignements. Tout ce que j'essaie de savoir, c'est si le Canada fera partie de cette structure et si les informations compilées en vertu de ce texte de loi seront communiquées à des organisations étrangères. Si je vous comprends bien, ce ne sera pas le cas.

M. James McCollum (chef, Section de l'analyse de l'industrie et des relations, Division des institutions financières, ministère des Finances): Je vais répondre à cette question.

Le mécanisme permettant les échanges internationaux de renseignements est ce que l'on appelle un TAJM, un traité d'assistance juridique mutuel. Le Canada en a signé plusieurs, mais les données et registres créés en vertu de ce projet de loi ne seront absolument pas traités différemment des autres données ou registres disponibles. Ils devront être traités exactement de la même manière. Il n'y a donc aucun changement particulier à cet égard.

M. Rideout: Que deviendront ces renseignements?

M. McCollum: Comme l'a dit M. LaBrosse au début, le projet de loi vise à garantir l'existence de registres adéquats et cohérents pour permettre à la police d'exécuter ses enquêtes. Comme il l'a dit, dans la plupart des cas, ces registres existent déjà. Le problème provient du fait qu'il n'y a pas vraiment de cohérence à ce chapitre, et qu'il y a parfois certaines carences dans certains établissements financiers.

En fait, le premier avant-projet de règlements, qui avait été rédigé après avoir consulté les diverses branches de l'industrie des services financiers, était destiné à minimiser tout fardeau relié à la tenue de registres supplémentaires.

M. Rideout: Voilà précisément ce que je me demandais. Si je comprends bien, il s'agit essentiellement de faire ce qui est nécessaire pour vous permettre de prouver vos allégations après coup, plutôt que d'avoir un mécanisme destiné à repérer d'éventuelles activités criminelles.

M. McCollum: C'est tout à fait exact.

M. Langdon: Ma première question portera sur les consultations que vous avez tenues et sur ce que vous avez dit dans votre déclaration préliminaire. Voilà d'ailleurs pourquoi il eut été utile que nous ayons ce document. Si j'ai pris de bonnes notes, vous avez dit que le projet de loi recueillait l'appui de toutes les parties concernées.

Je ne sais pas si vous avez entendu les témoins de l'Association du Barreau canadien, mais ils nous ont dit qu'ils ne seraient certainement pas prêts à appuyer le projet de loi si un amendement n'était pas adopté pour exiger la publication préalable des changements réglementaires au moins 30 jours avant leur entrée en vigueur.

Je vous demande donc si vous seriez prêts à accepter un tel amendement? Peut-être voudriez-vous que le ministre réponde lui-même à cette question?

M. LaBrosse: Le projet de loi C-9 comporte une clause de publication préalable de 90 jours, ce qui n'est pas inusité dans ce domaine et qui offrira à toutes les parties la possibilité de faire connaître toutes leurs préoccupations. Je importance of the legislation is to ensure that we get broad coverage for it so that we do not open up a channel for money launderers, and that is why we felt that coverage in relation to the legislation should be as extensive as it is.

Mr. Langdon: Yes. It is not that that I am concerned about. I agree with you on that point.

What they are referring to is paragraph 5.(3)(a), which makes it possible for a proposed regulation to come into effect immediately if it has been published pursuant to subsection (2) and consultation has taken place. So if I understand correctly the point they are making, if there is therefore a change as a consequence of the consultation and a new regulation is published, that new regulation according to the legislation as it is presently written would come into effect immediately.

Basically, the Canadian Bar Association has suggested that in those circumstances there should be at least a 30-day period before the regulations come into effect. In other words, if somebody makes representations but the regulation is changed, and that runs counter to the interests or concerns of some other group, they should have at least 30 days to be able to contact you and indicate that to you.

Mr. Jewett: I think in practice that is probably done anyway, Mr. Langdon. My principal concern, just thinking out loud on this because I have not had an opportunity either to discuss it with the minister, obviously, or to give it any considered thought, is that I would think a delayed period like that would give officials an incentive not to change the regulation. In effect, one would be more tempted to stand pat and not to make a change as a result of the representations. That is a bias that one would not want to put in.

Mr. Langdon: I cannot believe that bureaucrats in our government would not approach a question with a completely open mind, but instead be concerned with saving themselves work. Surely that would not be the case, would it?

Mr. Jewett: I think it is unlikely to be a question of that. But if one were in the circumstance where time did make a difference, if one wanted to bring the regulations into effect fairly expeditiously and one did not want to extend beyond the 90 days, I just suggest that that would be a disincentive to making any change and one would simply go with the regulations notwithstanding that there might be some defect that had been pointed out. This does not strike me as a major point, though it might be something we would want to consider.

Mr. Langdon: Certainly the Canadian Bar Association saw it as the most major point they wished to put before us. I think they had a total of six recommendations that they put before us and they suggested that that was the really critical one. Now, that suggests that certainly it is significant from their perspective. It is probably unfair to ask you to give an assessment at this stage, but I certainly would appreciate it if you could consider that and come back to the committee with a response.

Mr. Jewett: We will do that.

crois qu'il est essentiel que ce projet de loi ait la portée la plus vaste possible pour ne laisser aucune solution à ceux qui voudraient blanchir de l'argent.

M. Langdon: Je vous comprends bien, et ce n'est pas ce qui me préoccupe. Je suis d'accord avec vous là-dessus.

Ce qui inquiète l'ABC, c'est l'alinéa 5.(3)a), qui permet à un projet de règlement d'entrer en vigueur immédiatement s'il a été publié conformément au paragraphe (2) et si des consultations ont été tenues. Donc, si je comprends bien, un nouveau règlement élaboré après consultation et publié conformément au paragraphe (2) pourrait entrer en vigueur immédiatement.

L'Association du Barreau canadien estime qu'il devrait y avoir un délai d'au moins 30 jours avant que ce nouveau règlement n'entre en vigueur. Autrement dit, si quelqu'un obtient qu'un texte réglementaire soit modifié, et si cette modification va à l'encontre des intérêts ou préoccupations d'un autre groupe, ce dernier devrait avoir au moins 30 jours pour pouvoir vous communiquer son opinion.

M. Jewett: C'est probablement ce qui se fait déjà en pratique, monsieur Langdon. Ce qui m'inquiète avec cette proposition, et je dois dire que c'est là une réaction à brûle-pourpoint, car je n'ai manifestement pas eu la possibilité d'y réfléchir attentivement ni d'en discuter avec le ministre, c'est que cela risque d'inciter les hauts fonctionnaires à ne pas changer les textes réglementaires. En effet, ils seront alors plus incités à préserver le statu quo, ce qui n'est manifestement pas souhaitable.

M. Langdon: Je n'arrive pas à croire que nos fonctionnaires ne soient pas prêts à aborder un problème de cette nature avec un esprit complètement ouvert, c'est-à-dire que leur seule préoccupation soit de travailler le moins possible. Ce n'est certainement pas cela que vous vouliez dire?

M. Jewett: Non, pas du tout. Je veux simplement dire que s'il était important qu'un texte réglementaire soit publié très rapidement, sans aller au-delà de la période de 90 jours, cette recommandation aurait pour effet de décourager les fonctionnaires d'apporter des changements et de simplement s'en tenir aux règlements existants, même s'ils s'avéraient inadéquats. Je ne crois pas que ce soit là un problème majeur, mais nous devrons bien sûr y réfléchir plus sérieusement.

M. Langdon: C'était en tout cas un problème majeur pour l'Association du Barreau canadien, puisqu'elle a tenu à nous le signaler. Elle nous a proposé six recommandations, en disant que celle-là était la plus importante. Il n'est probablement pas juste de vous demander une réaction définitive à ce sujet, pour le moment, mais je vous serais très reconnaissant d'examiner le problème et de nous communiquer votre réponse.

M. Jewett: Nous le ferons.

[Texte]

Mr. McCollum: Perhaps I could make a couple of comments on that. I think their concern is that they not be surprised. In that regard, I think the whole process of issuing these draft regulations—they have been in the public domain since October 25. . . In fact, prior to that there was a long period of consultation with the industries affected. As a result of any consultations during that 90-day consultation period, if anything, the regulations would be changed in favour of those persons making representations.

Mr. Langdon: That is precisely the problem. If somebody makes representations and succeeds in winning the change in regulations and that causes problems for some other group, it seems to me that it is a fair point to ask that there be at least a 30-day period in which that counter-group has the possibility of responding.

As I would see the 90-day period working, if this amendment suggested by the CBA is put into effect, in practice it would probably mean a change in regulations that you accepted. You would want to publish in the Canada Gazette within a 60-day period instead of within a 90-day period so that there was still 30 days for people who were surprised by this and wanted to respond. It would not necessarily lengthen the period of time out. It would instead give at least that 30-day period for response.

Mr. Jewett: We will certainly take that under advisement, Mr. Langdon, and perhaps we will come back with something. I must say, I am stretching my imagination to think of a situation in what is effectively a record-keeping bill where a concession to one party would have adverse impacts on others.

Mr. Langdon: In the original briefing we received on this legislation, I was assured that everybody was on-side. It was not until we did some telephoning that we found out that in fact everybody was not on-side. The Bar Association in fact was so far off-side that it had passed a national resolution calling on the government to withdraw Bill C-89. It was not until we learned those sorts of things that we discovered there were people who were off-side.

Let me put it this way. I think that you see this, and frankly I see this, as somebody on the finance committee, as essentially a record-keeping bill too. But obviously there are other groups that see other important implications with respect to the justice system in particular, which we, coming at it from an economics perspective, perhaps do not perceive. I think we have to take those considerations seriously if we really are to be certain that the support of those affected is there, because, at least as I interpret the CBA's testimony, if we do not make amendments in the present legislation, they in fact would be opposed to the bill.

Mr. Jewett: We will get back to you on that.

[Traduction]

M. McCollum: Puis-je apporter quelques précisions là-dessus? Je crois que l'objectif principal de l'ABC est d'éviter toute surprise. En ce qui concerne l'avant-projet de règlements, il a été publié le 25 octobre, après de vastes consultations auprès des diverses branches concernées. Si des consultations doivent se tenir durant la période de 90 jours, il est probable que les règlements seront modifiés en faveur des personnes qui auront été consultées.

M. Langdon: Et c'est précisément le problème. Si quelqu'un entreprend des démarches auprès du ministère et réussit à faire changer les règlements alors que cela crée un problème pour un autre groupe, il me paraît tout à fait juste de donner à cet autre groupe au moins 30 jours pour réagir.

Si je comprends bien la proposition de l'ABC, conjuguée à la période de 90 jours, elle signifie qu'il s'agirait probablement d'un changement réglementaire que vous auriez accepté. Avec la proposition, vous devriez publier le changement dans la Gazette du Canada dans un délai de 60 jours au lieu de 90 jours, de façon à donner encore 30 jours aux autres parties pour pouvoir réagir. Cela n'aurait pas nécessairement pour effet d'allonger la période totale.

M. Jewett: Nous examinerons sérieusement cette recommandation, monsieur Langdon, et nous vous communiquerons notre réaction. Je dois cependant dire que j'ai beaucoup de mal à concevoir une situation dans laquelle un projet de loi concernant seulement la tenue de registres puisse aboutir à faire une concession à certaines parties qui puisse avoir un effet négatif sur d'autres.

M. Langdon: Lors de la première séance d'information organisée au sujet de ce projet de loi, on m'avait donné l'assurance que tout le monde était d'accord. Quelques coups de téléphone nous ont cependant rapidement permis de constater que tel n'était pas le cas. En fait, l'Association du Barreau canadien était tellement loin d'être d'accord qu'elle avait adopté une résolution nationale demandant au gouvernement de retirer le projet de loi C-89. C'est à l'occasion de telles réactions que nous avons constaté que tout le monde n'était pas d'accord.

Parlons franchement. Comme moi, vous considérez que ce projet de loi concerne fondamentalement la tenue de registres. Il y a cependant d'autres groupes qui y perçoivent d'autres conséquences importantes, notamment du point de vue de la justice, auxquelles nous ne sommes peut-être pas sensibles parce que nous abordons la question d'un point de vue purement économique. Si nous voulons vraiment recueillir l'appui de toutes les parties concernées, nous allons devoir tenir très sérieusement compte de ces préoccupations. Si j'interprète bien le témoignage de l'ABC, elle va en fait s'opposer au projet de loi si celui-ci n'est pas modifié conformément à ses recommandations.

M. Jewett: Nous vous communiquerons notre réaction là-dessus.

Mr. Langdon: When did provincial consultations take place on the legislation?

Mr. LaBrosse: We have been consulting with officials in the provinces, I guess for almost a year now, with respect to this legislation. As members of the committee would know, we have also been involved in discussing with the provinces the financial sector reform that the government has been bringing forward, and we have been in consultations with those same people, because they are the same officials that would be concerned with the issue of record-keeping. So we have had a number of visits to the provinces where this subject has been raised for about a year.

Mr. Langdon: Can I just confirm with you that where governments have changed in the interim period, consultation has taken place after the change has occurred?

Mr. LaBrosse: We have dealt with the officials. They seem to be pretty much the same.

An hon. member: Bob Rae fired all his.

Mr. Langdon: That is what I am asking, basically.

The last question I have is with respect to penalties. We have heard, again from the CBA, a concern with respect to the level of penalties and the suggestion that the penalty levels given are out of line with those in countries like the United States and Australia. Do you have a response to some of those suggestions?

Mr. McCollum: Perhaps I could speak to that. First of all it has to be recalled that the offence has to be committed knowingly. The person has to decide deliberately not to keep records. I think that is an important aspect.

Another aspect of it is that in some ways in this legislation there is an analogy with environmental legislation, basically. If somebody is allowing the financial system to be used in a way that is socially detrimental, the penalty should reflect the seriousness of that situation, because we are dealing, after all, with a very serious underlying crime here.

Mr. Langdon: So I take it that you would feel that these penalties are appropriate, despite the fact that they are much higher than in those other jurisdictions?

Mr. McCollum: It must be recalled too that the penalties are maximums. In fact, somewhat ironically, had we not put the half-million-dollar maximum on the indictable offence there would be no maximum, so it seemingly, in fact, would have been without limit.

Mr. Kempling: Will the regulations define cash as the Canadian Bar Association is recommending?

Mr. McCollum: Yes, that is correct.

Mr. Kempling: They will define cash?

Mr. McCollum: Yes.

Mr. Kempling: Mr. Chairman, I have been through this and read all the briefing material. I have spoken to the officials in my office beforehand, and I do not have any more questions.

M. Langdon: Quand y a-t-il des consultations provinciales au sujet du projet de loi?

M. LaBrosse: Nous tenons des consultations avec des fonctionnaires provinciaux depuis près d'un an. Comme vous le savez, nous avons également tenu des discussions avec les provinces au sujet de la réforme des institutions financières, proposée par le gouvernement, et ce sont les mêmes représentants provinciaux qui s'occupent de la question des registres. Nous avons donc eu plusieurs occasions de rencontrer les représentants provinciaux à ce sujet depuis un an.

M. Langdon: Pouvez-vous me confirmer que les nouveaux gouvernements qui ont pu être élus depuis lors ont également été consultés?

M. LaBrosse: Nous n'avons traité qu'avec les fonctionnaires, qui ne changent pas avec chaque gouvernement.

Une voix: Bob Rae a mis tous les siens à la porte.

M. Langdon: J'accepte votre réponse.

Ma dernière question porte sur les peines. L'ABC estime que les peines sont trop lourdes, notamment si on les compare à celles prévues dans des pays comme les États-Unis et l'Australie. Que pouvez-vous répondre à ces suggestions?

M. McCollum: Je dois d'abord rappeler qu'une infraction doit être commise sciemment. Il faut que la personne ait décidé délibérément de ne pas tenir de registre. C'est un aspect important du problème.

Dans une certaine mesure, ce projet de loi est analogue à la loi concernant la protection de l'environnement. Si quelqu'un permet une utilisation socialement néfaste du système financier, il faut lui infliger une peine correspondant à la gravité du problème, et il faut bien comprendre que nous parlons ici d'un crime extrêmement grave.

M. Langdon: Donc, vous pensez que ces peines sont appropriées, mêmes si elles sont beaucoup plus lourdes que dans d'autres pays?

M. McCollum: Laissez-moi vous rappeler aussi qu'il s'agit là de maximums. De fait, si nous n'avions pas établi un maximum de un demi-million de dollars il n'y aurait aucun maximum, ce qui signifie que la peine pourrait être beaucoup plus lourde.

M. Kempling: Y aura-t-il dans les règlements une définition de l'argent comptant comme le recommande l'Association du Barreau canadien?

M. McCollum: Oui.

M. Kempling: Ce sera défini?

M. McCollum: Oui.

M. Kempling: Je n'ai pas d'autres questions à poser, monsieur le président, puisque j'ai lu toute la documentation au préalable et que j'ai obtenu toutes les réponses que je voulais jusqu'à présent.

[Texte]

Mr. Speller: I am trying to get a better sense of this bill and really the reasons for it.

I want to know how serious this problem is in Canada. What sort of records do you have, or information do you have about the seriousness of this problem in Canada? Are we a major player, or are we just sort of as is happening around the G-7 table and we are getting involved because we are sitting at the table? Have you identified a real problem here in Canada and therefore this legislation is coming out now?

Mr. LaBrosse: This is a serious problem. Drug trafficking is very serious, and I understand that the committee will be hearing from the RCMP on this issue perhaps tomorrow.

It has been a concern internationally as well as domestically. The G-7 has certainly been focusing their attention on this issue. That is why they established the task force, and it was not very long before the G-7 task force widened it to include a number of other countries that were not part of the G-7. I think 15 or so countries ended up being represented, plus a number of geographic regions.

It involved a lot of work in order to review the kinds of procedures that could be used to discourage drug money laundering through financial institutions, and there were a number of recommendations. We went through the recommendations and looked at the practice in Canada and we found that this was one area where Canada came up a little short. We felt it was important to recommend to ministers that appropriate records be maintained, and so I think that it is a serious problem.

In terms of the details and the extent of that, I think the RCMP would be better placed to try to respond to that question.

Mr. Speller: So you have not seen any statistics or any studies done on how serious it is?

• 1740

Mr. McCollum: Yes, there are a number of studies in terms of the amount of money laundering, but the problem is that, by its very nature, it is difficult to assemble statistics on this issue. The type of number that the G-7 task force was talking about was in the neighbourhood of $85 billion for North America.

Mr. Speller: Was there anything on Canada specifically in that study?

Mr. McCollum: No. But at the same time, I think it has to be remembered that Canada is equally susceptible to the same type of problems as these other countries.

Mr. Speller: I guess the idea of the bill is to make it easier for the RCMP to obtain information. Instead of having to go through a court system to get a search warrant to go into a person's home to get statistical information or to get money-laundering information, they can go to a bank, which has to provide this information. Is that the general idea of the bill?

[Traduction]

M. Speller: J'aimerais pour ma part mieux comprendre ce qui motive ce projet de loi.

Autrement dit, je voudrais me faire une idée de la gravité du problème au Canada. Disposez-vous de registres ou d'information vous permettant de conclure qu'il s'agit d'un problème très grave? N'essayons-nous pas plutôt d'intervenir tout simplement parce que les sept grands l'ont décidé et que nous étions autour de la table à ce moment-là? Avez-vous pu identifier un problème grave en la matière au Canada, justifiant l'adoption de ce projet de loi?

M. LaBrosse: Le problème est grave. Le trafic de drogue est un problème très grave, et je crois comprendre que vous entendrez bientôt, peut-être demain, des représentants de la GRC à ce sujet.

Le problème est grave aussi bien à l'échelle internationale que nationale. Et les sept grands ont décidé de s'y attaquer très sérieusement. Voilà pourquoi ils ont mis sur pied le groupe de travail, et il n'a pas fallu attendre longtemps pour que d'autres pays souhaitent également en faire partie. Je crois qu'il y a eu en fin de compte une quinzaine de pays représentés au sein du groupe de travail, plus un certain nombre de grandes régions.

Le groupe de travail a étudié beaucoup de procédures pouvant être utilisées pour décourager le blanchiment de l'argent de la drogue par les établissements financiers, et il a formulé diverses recommandations. Nous les avons analysées et nous sommes parvenus à la conclusion qu'il y avait des carences dans la structure de répression canadienne, considérant la nature du problème au Canada. Nous avons donc pensé qu'il était important de recommander aux ministres que des dispositions soient prises pour garantir la tenue de registres appropriés, face à un problème très grave.

En ce qui concerne la nature exacte et détaillée du problème, les représentants de la GRC seront beaucoup plus mieux placés que moi pour vous l'indiquer.

M. Speller: Vous n'avez donc pas vu de statistique ou d'étude concernant la gravité du problème au Canada?

M. McCollum: Oui, bon nombre d'études ont été faites sur les montants impliqués dans le blanchiment de l'argent, mais il est difficile de recueillir des statistiques sur la question à cause de la nature de cette activité. Le groupe de travail des sept estime qu'il s'agit d'environ 85 milliards de dollars pour l'Amérique du Nord.

M. Speller: L'étude avait-elle des données précises pour le Canada?

M. McCollum: Non. Par ailleurs, il ne faut pas oublier que le Canada risque autant de rencontrer ce même genre de difficultés que ces autres pays.

M. Speller: Le but du projet de loi est de faire en sorte que la GRC puisse obtenir des renseignements plus facilement. Au lieu de recourir aux tribunaux pour obtenir un mandat de perquisition soit pour fouiller un domicile, soit pour obtenir des renseignements statistiques ou pour obtenir des renseignements sur le blanchiment de l'argent, la GRC peut se rendre dans une banque, qui sera obligée de leur fournir les renseignements. Est-ce bien l'idée maîtresse de ce projet de loi?

[Text]

Mr. McCollum: No, that is not quite correct. In terms of access to information, this bill changes nothing. The traditional safeguards in terms of accessed information continue to apply. All this bill does is to ensure that the appropriate records that are needed will be there if in fact an investigation is carried out. But in terms of access to those records, it is still the traditional search warrants.

Mr. Speller: So I take it that it is really not going to mean much to the grandmother who has $10,000. There is no more access to this information from other people or from other government departments. This information will not be shared with any other country.

Mr. McCollum: To get back to your question, no, there is no change in that regard. As Mr. LaBrosse mentioned at the beginning, for the ordinary Canadian this bill will be invisible. As I mentioned previously, in designing the record-keeping requirements, we took into account existing practices as much as possible and tried to key those so that the institutions would not be faced with excessive extra costs. To the extent we can rely on existing information—

Mr. Speller: Do you have any idea what it will cost?

Mr. McCollum: No. In the case of some institutions, I think possibly that number will be very close to zero. It is really filling in gaps, and because we do not know exactly what those are, it is difficult really to be precise about that question.

M. Couture (Saint-Jean): J'aimerais avoir un renseignement technique. À l'article 8, on dit:

> 8. Les poursuites fondées sur l'alinéa 6a) se prescrivent par un an à compter du fait en cause.

À l'alinéa 6a), naturellement, c'est par procédure sommaire. Pourquoi fait-on une distinction au niveau de dans les procédures sommaires versus une mise en accusation directe? C'est peut-être une procédure juridique que je ne connais pas, mais. . .

M. Yvon Carrière (conseiller juridique, Division du droit fiscal, ministère des Finances): Les accusations par voie de procédure sommaire sont en général moins graves, ce qui explique que, dans les causes moins importantes, on peut s'attendre à ce qu'une période d'un an après la commission de l'infraction soit une période raisonnable.

M. Côté: Si je fais du money laundering, si je suis un pusher à seulement 25,000$ alors que mon ami Ricardo est un pusher à plusieurs millions de dollars par année, je peux passer par la procédure sommaire tandis que lui sera mis en accusation parce que les sommes sont plus grosses. Est-ce bien cela?

M. Carrière: Le choix de procéder par procédure sommaire ou par mise en accusation appartient à la Couronne. C'est la Couronne qui décide. Il faut dire que le projet de loi ne traite pas du crime de traffic de stupéfiants.

M. Couture: Non, il s'agit de money laundering.

[Translation]

M. McCollum: Non, pas tout à fait. Ce projet de loi ne change rien en ce qui concerne l'accès à l'information. Les mesures de protection habituelles seront encore en vigueur. Le but de ce projet de loi est plutôt de s'assurer que l'information essentielle soit disponible dans le cas d'une enquête. Quant à l'accès à ces dossiers, il faudra encore obtenir le mandat de perquisition.

M. Speller: Donc cela ne changera rien pour la grand-mère qui a 10,000$. Les ministères et d'autres personnes n'auront pas davantage accès à cette information. Un autre pays n'y aurait pas accès non plus.

M. McCollum: Pour revenir à votre question, non, il n'y aura pas de changement à cet égard. Comme l'a dit M. LaBrosse au début de la séance, ce projet de loi sera invisible pour le simple Canadien. Je vous ai déjà dit que lorsque nous avons étudié la question concernant la tenue de dossiers, dans la mesure du possible, nous voulions garder les mêmes pratiques et nous assurer que les institutions ne devront pas débourser des sommes importantes. Dans la mesure où on peut compter sur l'information existante. . .

M. Speller: Avez-vous une idée des coûts?

M. McCollum: Non. Pour certaines institutions, le coût sera très minime. Il s'agit vraiment de colmater les brèches, et puisqu'on ignore le nombre de carences, il est difficile de vous donner un chiffre précis.

Mr. Couture (Saint-Jean): I would like some information on a technical matter. Section 8 says:

> 8. Proceedings under paragraph 6(a) may be instituted within, but not after, one year after the time when the subject-matter of the proceedings arose.

Obviously, paragraph 6(a) pertains to a summary conviction. Why is there a distinction between «se prescrivent par un an à compter du fait en cause»?

summary conviction and indictment? Perhaps I am not familiar with that legal procedure, but. . .

Mr. Yvon Carrière (Legal Counsel, Tax Counsel Division, Department of Finance): Summary convictions are usually less serious, which is why a period of one year after committing the offence seems to be a reasonable length of time.

Mr. Côté: If I were involved in money laundering or pushing $25,000 worth of drugs while my friend Ricardo did several millions of dollars worth of pushing per year, I would be tried on summary convictions while he would be tried on indictment because it involves a more substantial amount of money. Is that correct?

Mr. Carrière: It is up to the Crown to choose between a summary conviction or an indictment. I might point out that the Bill does not deal with drug trafficking crimes.

Mr. Couture: No, it deals with money laundering.

M. Carrière: Si on omet de garder des dossiers, la Couronne peut juger que ce n'est pas une cause qui mérite une procédure par voie de mise en accusation, c'est-à-dire un jury de 12 personnes. C'est le choix de la Couronne.

M. Couture: Par procédure sommaire, je limite cela à un an. Tout à l'heure, quand je parlais du volume, je ne parlais pas du volume de drogue. Je parlais du volume d'argent que je voulais blanchir.

M. Carrière: Si l'omission est très importante, la Couronne peut toujours procéder par voie de mise en accusation même après le délai d'un an. C'est simplement la procédure simplifiée par voie sommaire...

M. Couture: Qui, elle, est limitée.

M. Carrière: ... qui se prescrit à compter d'un an.

Mr. Langdon: I wonder if you could give us a sense of key areas in which the draft regulations have been changed?

Mr. McCollum: On the first page there will be a definition of "cash". We have not formulated a definition at this point. What is in mind there insofar as Canada is concerned are bank notes issued by the Bank of Canada. We felt that was implicit in the previous regulations, but we would just make that explicit. In addition to that, it would cover the equivalent concept for the currency of other countries.

Turning to section 3 for deposit-taking institutions, trust companies, banks, and the like, there are two things that we are examining there in conjunction with the RCMP and institutional officials themselves. One is the question of branch ledger statements. These are computer printouts that are produced by each branch each day. They are helpful in conducting money-laundering investigations because they are annotated and they provide a guide to other records. Some institutions claim that there are alternative ways of accessing those records, so it is really a question of determining whether in fact those ways are practical and are suitable as far as the police are concerned.

Another item in section 3 that we are looking at is customer files. These contain an ad hoc assortment of records, notes, memos, letters, and what have you. The concern of some institutions is that this could take undue storage space. Many of these records are not particularly germane in any event. But it is really a question of being able to draw a line where you do not inadvertently eliminate records that are useful. But again we are looking at that in a sympathetic way. I think the point is that if they are not needed, they will not be there.

Turning then to paragraph 7, again this is a question of making the language somewhat more precise. We intend to change the language: "receives currency on behalf or the benefit of another". This will address, I feel, some of the concerns expressed by the Canadian Bar Association. What we had in mind there from the very beginning were cases where a professional was really acting as a financial intermediary. They were receiving cash, perhaps some of that

Mr. Carrière: If records are not kept, the Crown can decide the case does not warrant a trial by indictment, that is a 12-member jury. It is up to the Crown.

Mr. Couture: A summary conviction is limited to one year. When I spoke of amount earlier, I was not talking about drugs. I meant the amount of money being laundered.

Mr. Carrière: If a crucial omission is made, the Crown can still proceed by indictment even after the one-year period. A summary conviction is just a simpler procedure.

Mr. Couture: Which has limits.

Mr. Carrière: Which may be instituted within one year.

M. Langdon: Pourriez-vous nous donner une idée des principaux changements au projet de règlements?

M. McCollum: À la première page il y aura une définition de «argent comptant». Nous n'avons pas encore de définition. Il s'agira de billets de banque émis par la Banque du Canada. C'était implicite dans les règlements antérieurs, mais nous voulons le préciser. En outre, cela englobera les devises étrangères.

L'article 3 fait mention de sociétés de crédit, sociétés de fiducie, banques, entre autres. Nous étudions deux aspects qui y ont trait avec des membres de la GRC et des directeurs d'institutions. Premièrement, il y a la question des grands livres des succursales. Chacune en fait un imprimé chaque jour. Ces documents sont utiles pour les enquêtes sur le blanchiment de l'argent car ils sont accompagnés de remarques et servent de documents de référence. Certaines institutions financières prétendent qu'il y a d'autres façons d'obtenir ces renseignements, alors il s'agit vraiment de voir si les méthodes seraient utiles pour le travail de la police.

Autre aspect du problème, les dossiers des clients, mentionnés à l'article 3. Il s'agit de dossiers contenant une multitude de documents, notes, mémorandums, lettres, etc. Or, certains établissements craignent que la conservation de tous ces dossiers ne prenne trop de place, alors que beaucoup des documents en question ne seront d'ailleurs pas particulièrement pertinents. Le problème consiste donc à éviter d'éliminer par inadvertance des dossiers qui pourraient être utiles. Ici encore, nous examinons le problème d'un point de vue favorable. Si les documents ne sont pas nécessaires, on peut penser qu'ils ne seront pas là.

Passons maintenant au paragraphe 7, encore une fois pour rendre les termes un peu plus précis. Nous avons l'intention de changer le texte: «reçoit des devises au nom ou dans l'intérêt d'une autre partie». Je crois que cela répondra à certaines des préoccupations de l'Association du Barreau canadien. Dès le départ, nous voulions tenir compte ici du cas d'un professionnel qui joue en fait le rôle d'intermédiaire financier. Il s'agirait d'une personne recevant cash being illegitimate, commingling that with legitimate sources of sums, depositing it in a financial institution, and then it became impossible to distinguish where it was coming from.

The language we changed so that it reflects the notion that in the case, say, of a professional they are acting as an intermediary or conduit. It would not apply to legal fees, for example. We felt that was implicit, I must say, in the previous language, but we would simply make it explicit.

Turning to paragraph 10, this of course was linked back to the section of the act referring to accuracy of information. In the regulations, of course, that was limited to client identification. Effectively what Bill C-9 did in this area was to bring information from the regulations into the act itself. So it limited the determination of accuracy where there was client identification. So this section would be changed appropriately to reflect that. Again, we do not want to be too explicit about the type of records, because institutional practices vary; but it would be something along the lines of undertaking client identification consistent with normal and sound business practices.

Mr. Langdon: So, in fact, in that case it is very much what the Canadian Bar Association has in its amendment.

Mr. McCollum: That is correct.

Mr. Langdon: That is very helpful. Thank you very much.

I will express an opinion here. If it were possible to see the actual drafts of some of those changes in which you have left things slightly uncertain at this point—exactly where you would be drawing the line with respect to customer files and whether it will be possible to see the change with respect to branch ledger statements, to see how you will actually define cash—that would probably provide more security for those of us who have listened to some of the concerns about the legislation. But it certainly seems to me, on the basis of the changes you have pointed out, that you are responding to most of the points that have been put forward to you.

There is just one other point the CBA suggested as a change to the regulations, and perhaps it is in fact something that you are going to incorporate. They suggest in their brief to us that the regulations make it clear that only where a lawyer is involved in a transaction also involving a third party does any obligation to create a record arise.

I take it that could well be the question of whether they are being paid their fees or something like that. That is not something they have to keep a record of for purposes of this legislation, while obviously they do for other legislation.

Mr. McCollum: That is correct.

Mr. Langdon: The other point they suggested in terms of a change to the bill itself was that paragraph 5.(3)(b) be deleted, or if not deleted that "substantive change" be at least defined. Have you considered that amendment and whether it is something you would find difficulties with?

des espèces, dont une partie pourrait être illégitime, qu'elle mélangerait avec des sommes d'origine légitime en les déposant dans un établissement financier, ce qui ne permettrait plus ensuite de faire la distinction entre les deux catégories d'espèces.

Le texte a été modifié de façon à bien indiquer qu'il s'agit du cas d'un professionnel jouant le rôle d'intermédiaire. Le texte ne s'appliquerait pas aux honoraires juridiques, par exemple. Nous pensions que cela était implicite dans le texte précédent mais nous avons tenu à l'expliciter.

En ce qui concerne le paragraphe 10, il est évidemment relié à l'article de la loi concernant l'exactitude des renseignements. Dans les règlements, on se limitait à l'identification du client. L'effet du projet de loi C-9 dans ce domaine était de faire passer les renseignements des règlements à la loi elle-même. Donc, on limitait la détermination de l'exactitude des renseignements à l'identification du client. Cet article sera changé de manière à refléter cet objectif. Encore une fois, nous ne voulons pas être trop explicites quant à la nature des documents, étant donné que les pratiques peuvent varier d'un établissement à l'autre. Il convient cependant d'établir un mécanisme permettant de s'assurer que l'identification des clients soit cohérente et conforme à des pratiques commerciales normales et saines.

M. Langdon: Cela correspond pour l'essentiel à la modification demandée par l'Association du Barreau canadien.

M. McCollum: C'est exact.

M. Langdon: Très bien. Merci beaucoup.

Je vais maintenant exprimer un avis. Il serait probablement très utile que nous puissions examiner le texte réel de certaines des modifications dont vous avez parlé et pour lesquelles les choses restent encore assez incertaines. Ainsi, nous pouvons encore nous demander où vous allez fixer la limite au sujet des dossiers des clients et s'il sera possible de voir la modification concernant les grands livres des succursales et la définition concrète de l'argent comptant. Malgré cela, si j'en crois les modifications dont vous venez de parler, j'ai le sentiment que vous répondez à la plupart des objections qui ont pu être soulevées.

Il y avait une autre modification que l'ABC avait recommandée, pour les règlements, et je me demande si vous seriez prêts à l'accepter. L'ABC recommande dans son mémoire que les règlements indiquent clairement que c'est seulement dans le cas où un avocat est impliqué dans une transaction impliquant aussi une autre partie qu'il devrait avoir l'obligation de créer un registre.

Si je comprends bien, il faudrait faire la distinction avec le cas où l'avocat reçoit des espèces au titre de ses honoraires, par exemple. Dans un tel cas, il ne serait évidemment pas obligé de tenir un registre pour respecter les dispositions de cette loi, même s'il est évident qu'il devrait le faire en vertu de l'autre loi.

M. McCollum: C'est exact.

M. Langdon: L'Association recommandait également que l'alinéa 5(3)b) soit supprimé ou que l'on accepte au moins de définir exactement l'expression «modification de fond». Avez-vous envisagé un tel amendement ou s'agit-il là d'une proposition qui vous cause des difficultés?

[Texte]

Mr. McCollum: We have not considered that up to this point. My understanding, however, is that this is fairly standard syntax in bills of this kind. What we had in mind there of course is a change that is simply cosmetic or that really does not change the record-keeping requirements in any substantial way at all.

Mr. Kempling: I have a short question—I am sure you have an answer to it—and that is that a gentleman I knew several years ago was involved in a bankruptcy and he wanted to shelter some of his cash so it would not be seized by the courts and the trustee, so he sent the money to the Department of National Revenue to put in against his account in the department's income tax account.

What access do you have to that sort of record, given the confidentiality of income tax records? I happen to know that the trustee in bankruptcy was not able to get the money back from Revenue. It had to go back to the individual, and they were not able to get it back. I am just wondering: $10,000 is not very much money, but if someone could do that, would you be able to recover it?

Mr. Jewett: I think that is an income tax question.

Mr. Kempling: It is outside your jurisdiction.

The Chairman: I thank the witnesses.

The next meeting will be tomorrow afternoon, in room 269, West Block, at 3.30 p.m. The witness will be the RCMP. It will be a meeting that is open to the public.

This meeting stands adjourned to the call of the chair.

[Traduction]

M. McCollum: Nous n'avons pas encore examiné ce problème. Je crois cependant comprendre que cette expression est relativement standard dans des projets de loi de cette nature. Nous voulions évidemment parler ici de modifications qui sont simplement superficielles ou qui ne changent pas fondamentalement les exigences relatives à la tenue de registres.

M. Kempling: Je voudrais vous poser une brève question, à laquelle je suis sûr que vous avez une réponse. J'ai connu il y a quelques années quelqu'un qui était en faillite et qui voulait mettre une partie de ses espèces à l'abri pour qu'elles ne puissent être saisies par les tribunaux ou par le syndic de faillite. Sa solution a été d'envoyer l'argent au ministère du Revenu national, pour le porter au crédit de son compte d'impôt sur le revenu.

Etant donné le caractère confidentiel des dossiers de l'impôt, pouvez-vous avoir accès à ce type d'information? Il se trouve que le syndic chargé de régler cette faillite n'avait alors pas réussi à récupérer l'argent de Revenu Canada. Il ne pouvait le faire qu'en s'adressant à la personne concernée qui a évidemment refusé. Certes, 10,000$ ne représentent pas une grosse somme mais, si quelqu'un agissait comme cela, pourriez-vous récupérer l'argent?

M. Jewett: C'est une question qui concerne l'impôt sur le revenu.

M. Kempling: Elle n'est donc pas de votre ressort.

Le président: Je remercie les témoins.

Nous tiendrons notre prochaine réunion demain après-midi, à 15h30, dans la salle 269 de l'édifice de l'Ouest. Nos témoins seront alors des représentants de la GRC. Ce sera une séance publique.

La séance est levée.

EVIDENCE

• 1535

The Chairman: I call this meeting to order. This is the legislative committee on Bill C-9. We are hearing witnesses. Today we have the deputy commissioner of the Royal Canadian Mounted Police, J.L.G. Favreau. Mr. Favreau, please, you have a presentation.

Deputy Commissioner J.L.G. Favreau (Operations, Royal Canadian Mounted Police): Thank you, Mr. Chairman.

J'aimerais tout d'abord présenter les gens qui m'accompagnent. Voici le commissaire adjoint Marcel Coutu, responsable de notre Programme de la police des drogues; et voilà l'inspecteur Bruce Bowie, responsable de la Section des enquêtes économiques antidrogue. On le considère notre spécialiste dans le domaine. Voici également le commissaire adjoint Normand Doucette, responsable de notre Direction de la police économique.

Je réalise, monsieur le président, que tout le monde a une copie de mon document. Est-ce que vous voulez que j'en fasse quand même la lecture.

The Chairman: There are only three pages, so I would suggest we go ahead.

D/Commr Favreau: Thank you. Mr. Chairman and members of the committee, on behalf of the Royal Canadian Mounted Police I wish to thank you for the opportunity of appearing before you today to discuss this important legislative proposal.

The principal focus of our drug enforcement effort is directed against organized criminal groups which are active in the importation and distribution of large quantities of illicit drugs within Canada. The scope of the drug trade is international. The attack against powerful drug organizations that extend across international boundaries presents a unique challenge to the enforcement agency of any country.

Despite the hundreds of millions of dollars expended on world-wide enforcement effort over the last several decades, the international drug trade has continued to flourish, with crime groups growing more powerful. There are strong indications that the drug problem in our country has not yet reached its peak.

Canadian seizures of illicit drugs have reached unprecedented levels. During the last 20-month period, over 96,000 kilograms of cannabis were seized in Canada, compared to a total of 58,000 kilograms during the previous 15-year period.

The incidence of cocaine seizure is increasing at an even more dramatic rate. Thus far in 1991, we have seized 779 kilograms of cocaine, which is more than the total of any previous year. Additionally, since 1985 nearly 5,000 kilograms of cocaine en route to Canada have been seized by foreign states. Despite seizures of this magnitude, we continue to experience full availability of illicit drugs throughout Canada at lower prices, increased purity and in greater volume.

Le mercredi 12 juin 1991

Le président: La séance est ouverte. Nous formons le comité législatif chargé d'étudier le projet de loi C-9. Nous allons entendre des témoins. Aujourd'hui, nous entendrons le sous-commissaire J.L.G. Favreau de la Gendarmerie Royale du Canada. Je crois savoir que vous avez un texte, monsieur Favreau.

Le sous-commissaire J.L.G. Favreau (Police opérationnelle, Gendarmerie Royale du Canada): Merci monsieur le président.

I would like to introduce the officials who are here with me today: Marcel Coutu, the assistant commissioner, who is responsible for our Drug Enforcement Branch; inspector Bruce Bowie, in charge of the Anti-Drug Profiteering Section, our specialist in this field; deputy-commissioner Normand Doucette, in charge of the Economic Crime Directorate.

I realize that you all have a copy of my text, Mr. Chairman. Do you want me to read it nonetheless?

Le président: Je vous en prie, votre texte n'a que trois pages.

S.-comm. Favreau: Merci. Monsieur le président, membres du comité, je voudrais d'abord vous remercier, au nom de la Gendarmerie Royale du Canada, de m'avoir fourni l'occasion de vous adresser la parole aujourd'hui sur cet important projet de loi.

Dans ses efforts visant à réprimer les problèmes de la drogue, la Gendarmerie s'intéresse plus particulièrement aux organisations criminelles qui se livrent à l'importation et à la distribution de grandes quantités de drogues illicites au Canada. Le trafic des stupéfiants est un commerce d'envergure internationale, et la lutte contre les puissantes organisations de trafiquants qui débordent les frontières nationales offre un défi unique aux forces de l'ordre de tous les pays.

Malgré les centaines de millions de dollars qui ont été dépensés pour vaincre ce fléau au cours des dernières décennies, le trafic international des stupéfiants n'a pas cessé de prospérer, et les groupes de criminels sont encore plus puissants qu'auparavant. Ici, au Canada, on pense que le problème de la drogue n'a pas encore touché son point culminant.

Les saisies canadiennes de drogues illicites ont atteint de nouveaux sommets. Dans les 20 derniers mois, plus de 96,000 kilogrammes de cannabis ont été saisis au Canada, contre un total de 58,000 kilos au cours des quinze années précédentes.

La fréquence des saisies de cocaïne augmente à un rythme encore plus alarmant. Ainsi, la Gendarmerie a déjà saisi 779 kilogrammes de cette drogue jusqu'à maintenant en 1991, soit plus que pendant toute autre année. En outre, depuis 1985, près de 5,000 kilos de cocaïne à destination du Canada ont été interceptés par des États étrangers. Malgré ces coups de filet de la police, les drogues continuent d'abonder au pays, et on peut se les procurer à meilleur marché, en plus grande quantité et à des niveaux de pureté plus élevés.

[Text]

The profits available from the traffic of illicit drugs represent a double-edged threat to the success of conventional enforcement measures. On the one hand, the potential for profit is a motivating factor which encourages new entrants to the drug trade. On the other hand, a criminal organization with accumulated financial resources is able to finance sophisticated importation and distribution networks, as well as being able to absorb periodic enforcement actions. As a result, since 1981 the RCMP has focused on attacking the profits derived from the drug trade as well as the drug offences.

Un aspect essentiel du trafic organisé des stupéfiants est le recyclage de l'argent, un procédé qui consiste à transformer l'argent liquide provenant d'activités illicites de manière à en dissimuler l'origine, la propriété et tout autre facteur potentiel incriminant. Pour ce faire, ces activités recourent bien souvent à des moyens assez subtils dont le transfert de l'argent dans des refuges fiscaux à l'étranger afin de bien brouiller les pistes.

Une enquête menée dernièrement par notre service sur une affaire importante a révélé que des membres désignés de l'organisation visée s'occupaient exclusivement du recyclage de narcodollars. Une chaîne de 47 sociétés établies ici et dans six pays étrangers avait été constituée pour faciliter le déplacement des grosses sommes d'argent. Le groupe avait ainsi blanchi plus de 100 millions de dollars sur une période de quatre ans. Si un stratagème d'une telle envergure est plutôt inhabituel, on découvre en revanche des systèmes de recyclage plus ou moins élaborés à tous les niveaux du commerce de la drogue. En l'absence de preuves documentaires suffisantes établissant l'origine de l'argent, les poursuites intentées dans des cas semblables sont pratiquement vouées à l'échec.

On associe beaucoup le recyclage de l'argent au trafic des stupéfiants, mais je pense qu'il importe de noter que cette activité est aussi courante dans toute forme de criminalité organisée. L'aptitude de retracer les fonds découlant d'activités criminelles, telles que la fraude, permettra éventuellement de restituer aux victimes les biens qui leur ont été subtilisés.

Nos enquêtes sur le recyclage de l'argent ont souffert d'un manque de preuves documentaires suffisantes pour intenter des poursuites. Si nous jouissons d'une excellente collaboration de la part des institutions bancaires et de dépôts, les dossiers des transactions effectuées couramment ne sont pas toujours conservés. La destruction prématurée de ces dossiers peut échapper à l'instruction d'une affaire qui s'annonçait prometteuse. L'inclusion, dans le projet de loi C-9, d'exigences uniformes relativement à la conservation des dossiers financiers constitue une mesure encourageante.

Outre la question de la conservation des dossiers existants, le manque de rigueur en matière de tenue de dossiers dans certains secteurs financiers pose également certains problèmes. On a remarqué notamment que les

Les profits tirés du trafic de stupéfiants compromettent doublement le succès des mesures de répression conventionnelles: d'une part, l'appât du gain est un facteur incitatif certain pour les criminels dans l'âme; d'autre part, l'organisation criminelle qui a su accumuler des richesses est en mesure de financer des réseaux d'importation et de distribution élaborés, et aussi d'absorber des pertes périodiques attribuables aux actions policières. La GRC a donc résolu, depuis 1981, de s'attaquer aux profits générés par le trafic des stupéfiants et les autres infractions liées aux drogues.

An essential aspect of the organized drug trade is money laundering. The process whereby cash from illegal activities is converted to an alternate form in a manner that conceals its origins, ownership, or other potentially incriminating factors. Criminal organizations often employ sophisticated techniques to accomplish this, including moving monies through several off-shore financial havens in an effort to conceal the audit trail of the money flow.

A recent major drug case investigated by our force uncovered the fact that specific members of the trafficking organization were delegated solely to the process of laundering the drug monies. An elaborate series of 47 interlocking corporations established here and in six foreign jurisdictions was designed to facilitate the movement of large sums of money. In excess of $100 million was laundered by this group over a four-year period. While the magnitude of this particular case makes it relatively unusual, we frequently encounter money-laundering schemes of varying degrees of sophistication at all levels of the drug trade. Without the availability of sufficient documentary evidence to demonstrate the monetary flow, effective prosecutions of such offences are impossible.

While discussions with respect to the money laundering problem have tended to focus on the drug trade, I think it is important that this activity is also prevalent in relation to enterprise crime offences. The ability to effectively to trace the flow of funds generated from offences such as fraud will ultimately lead to greater opportunities to provide restitution to victims of such crimes.

In our efforts to pursue money laundering investigations, we have encountered difficulties with respect to the availability of sufficient documentary evidence to support an eventual prosecution. While we enjoy an excellent co-operative relationship with banks and other deposit-taking institutions, the records of transactions created during the course of regular business are not retained on a consistent basis. Premature destruction of such records may preclude prosecution of an otherwise promising case. The inclusion within this bill of uniform requirements for the retention of financial records is an encouraging development.

In addition to the issue of the retention of existing records, the lack of any record-keeping requirements within certain sectors of the financial industry has also created problems. We have noticed a significant increase in the criminels faisaient un usage accru de maisons de change plus modestes qui souvent ne gardent aucun dossier sur les transactions effectuées ou sur leurs clients. Ces commerces servent d'intermédiaires entre l'élément criminel et le système bancaire conventionnel. Je suis très heureux de voir que le projet de loi C-9 traite de la constitution de dossiers appropriés dans tous les secteurs pertinents.

L'usage accru des maisons de change et de certaines professions afin de faciliter le blanchissage des produits de la criminalité coïncidait avec l'intensification des efforts déployés par les banques canadiennes afin de relever les transactions douteuses. Cela démontre que les organisations criminelles changeront inévitablement leur méthode de recyclage afin d'échapper au contrôle législatif. Les modifications à la réglementation prévues dans ce projet de loi, afin de réagir rapidement à l'évolution de la criminalité, constitue une initiative importante.

We were pleased to have been afforded the opportunity to participate fully in the discussions that resulted in Bill C-9. We look forward to continuing this process with respect to a number of other important issues concerning the improvement of our ability to address the money laundering problem in Canada. Of significant benefit to law enforcement would be measures providing for increased reporting of suspicious transactions by all sectors of the business and financial communities. I appreciate that this is a complex legislative issue, and we look forward to participating in future discussions toward this end.

This bill appears to be a very worthwhile legislative initiative that should improve our effectiveness in attacking the proceeds generated by organized drug trafficking and other profitable criminal endeavours. By establishing procedures for the creation and retention of records of financial transactions, it will ensure that the appropriate evidence is available to support prosecution.

Merci, monsieur le président.

The Chairman: Thank you, Commissioner. The first questioner will be Mr. Rideout, then Mr. Blackburn.

Mr. Rideout (Moncton): We have not really been presented with a lot of detail to indicate that money laundering is a major problem in Canada. Have you statistics or background data that can give us a clear indication that money laundering is a major problem and a major crime in Canada?

D/Commr Favreau: One of the examples we stated briefly in the remarks I just made refers to a very important investigation. We anticipated that you might be interested in those kinds of details and Inspector Bowie has figures he can share with you.

criminal use of small currency exchange houses, many of which maintain no records whatever of individual transactions or customers. In effect, these businesses serve as intermediaries between the criminal and the conventional banking sysem. I am very pleased to see that this bill addresses the issue of the creation of appropriate records in all relevant areas.

The increased use of currency exchanges and certain professions to facilitate laundering of criminal proceeds coincided with the hightened efforts of Canadian banks to indentify suspicious transactions. This exemplifies the fact that criminal organizations will inevitably alter their money laundering methods in order to circumvent legislative controls. Facilitating regulatory changes within this bill to permit relatively rapid responses to a changing criminal environment is an important initiative.

Nous sommes heureux d'avoir pu participer activement aux discussions concernant le projet de loi C-9, et nous espérons faire de même relativement à d'autres questions importantes liées à l'amélioration de notre capacité de solutionner le problème du recyclage de l'argent au Canada. La force publique profiterait grandement de mesures qui obligeraient tous les secteus du milieu des affaires et des finances à dénoncer les transactions douteuses. Je comprends qu'il s'agit là d'une question législative complexe, et j'attends avec intérêt les prochaines discussions sur le sujet.

Ce projet de loi me semble être une mesure législative fort valable, qui devrait relancer, avec plus d'efficacité, la lutte contre les profits générés par le commerce organisé de la drogue et les autres activités criminelles lucratives. En définissant des modalités pour la création et la conservation des dossiers sur les transactions financières, il garantira l'existence de preuves documentaires pertinentes aux fins des poursuites.

Thank you, Mr. Chairman.

Le président: Merci, monsieur le sous-commissaire. La première question sera posée par M. Rideout, suivie de M. Blackburn.

M. Rideout (Moncton): Nous aimerions savoir dans quelle mesure le blanchiment de l'argent constitue un problème grave au Canada: avez-vous des détails à ce sujet? Avez-vous des chiffres quelconques qui peuvent démontrer clairement que le blanchissage de l'argent est un problème important et un crime important au Canada?

S.-comm. Favreau: L'un des exemples que j'ai mentionné brièvement dans mes remarques préliminaires est lié à une enquête très importante. Nous avions prévu que vous seriez intéressé à connaître des détails de ce genre, et l'inspecteur Bowie a apporté quelques chiffres qu'il peut vous donner.

[Text]

Inspector Bruce Bowie (Officer-in-charge, Anti-Drug Profiteering Section, Drug Enforcement Directorate, Royal Canadian Mounted Police): It is very difficult to provide any kind of a definitive assessment of the magnitude of money laundering. We observe individual investigations involving many tens of millions of dollars. I do not have empirical data as to the magnitude, but I can give you some anecdotal indications.

For example, in one case two years ago we observed a single small foreign currency exchange with premises not much larger than this room transact over $150 million in an 18-month period. We have seen individual investigations that we are conducting involving the transfer within Canada or through Canada of amounts in the tens of millions of dollars. What we are seeing gives us reason to believe that certainly it involves over a billion dollars per year in Canada.

Mr. Rideout: This is the type of information that is helpful to justify this legislation.

The witnesses for the Justice Department yesterday indicated that the thrust of this legislation is not aimed at identifying people who may be involved in money laundering as much as to aid in the conviction of those individuals by preserving the records. Is this also your view of the legislation?

D/Commr Favreau: Yes, that is correct. We are looking more at having a paper trace. Where infractions are being committed, you are able to go back and investigate using the documents.

Mr. Rideout: Would there be any advantage in using some of the information in actually determining people who should be investigated or you do not see this as going to facilitate that?

D/Commr Favreau: I do not think we would have the time and the resources to use this legislation in such a mode. That would be more looking for new investigations and I do not think we could do that.

Mr. Rideout: We also are given to believe that arising out of the G-7 meetings and the task force on money laundering internationally there is a design or an intent to exchange information with other foreign governments. Will you be involved in this aspect?

If I could, I could read it to you. It came out of the American situation. It says that

> The purposes of negotiations under this subsection are—(A) to reach one or more international agreements to ensure that foreign banks and other financial institutions maintain adequate records of large United States currency transactions, and (B) to establish a mechanism whereby such records may be made available to United States law enforcement officials.

Are you involved in an exchange with the Americans and other foreign governments with this same idea in mind?

L'inspecteur Bruce Bowie (officier responsable, Section d'enquête sur les profits des trafiquants, Direction de la police des drogues, Gendarmerie royale du Canada): On peut très difficilement donner une évaluation précise de l'importance du phénomène. Il y a des enquêtes individuelles qui sont menées sur des opérations impliquant des dizaines de millions de dollars. Je ne peux vous donner de chiffres précis quant à l'ampleur de ces opérations, mais je peux vous citer quelques cas qui vous en donneront une idée.

Par exemple, il y a deux ans, nous avons observé qu'une petite maison de change, dont le bureau n'était pas tellement plus grand que la salle où nous nous trouvons, avait transigé pour une valeur de 150 millions de dollars sur une période de 18 mois. Certaines enquêtes individuelles nous ont permis d'observer le transit, à l'intérieur du Canada ou par le Canada, de montants représentant des dizaines de millions de dollars. Tout nous porte à croire que ces opérations s'élèvent sûrement à un milliard de dollars par année au Canada.

M. Rideout: C'est un renseignement utile pour justifier l'adoption de cette loi.

Les témoins du ministère de la Justice, que nous avons reçus hier, ont indiqué que le but de cette loi n'est pas tellement d'identifier les gens qui peuvent être impliqués dans des opérations de blanchissage d'argent, comme de faciliter, surtout, la mise en accusation de ces personnes en prévoyant la préservation des documents pertinents. Etes-vous aussi de cet avis?

S.-comm. Favreau: Oui, c'est juste. Nous tenons davantage à pouvoir utiliser une piste documentaire. Lorsque des infractions sont commises, nous pouvons alors remonter les événements et enquêter à l'aide des documents.

M. Rideout: Ce projet de loi offrirait-il aussi l'avantage, avec l'aide des renseignements qui sont préservés, d'identifier les gens au sujet desquels il faudrait faire enquête, ou ne lui voyez-vous pas cette utilité?

S.-comm. Favreau: Je ne pense pas que nous aurions ni le temps ni les ressources nécessaires pour utiliser cette loi à cette fin. Nous ne ferions que découvrir de nouvelles enquêtes à effectuer, et je ne pense pas que nous pourrions nous le permettre.

M. Rideout: Il semblerait aussi qu'il est ressorti des réunions du Groupe des sept et du groupe d'étude sur le blanchiment international de l'argent qu'il existe une intention d'échanger des renseignements avec d'autres gouvernements étrangers. Contribuerez-vous à ces échanges de renseignements?

Si vous me le permettez, je vais vous lire ceci. Ce sont des recommandations qui ont été faites en raison de la situation qui prévaut aux Etats-Unis. On dit que:

> Le but des négociations qui sont entreprises dans ce groupe sont—(A) de conclure un ou des accords internationaux visant à faire en sorte que les banques étrangères et les autres institutions financières conservent des dossiers adéquats relativement aux opérations de change importantes effectuées aux Etats-Unis, et (B) d'établir un mécanisme qui permettra de mettre ces dossiers à la disponibilité des autorités américaines compétentes.

Echangez-vous des renseignements avec les Américains et d'autres gouvernements étrangers dans ce contexte?

[Texte]

D/Commr Favreau: We are indeed involved with several governments, and I think Mr. Coutu, who has been traveling extensively on drug money laundering and drug anti-profiteering matters, might want to elaborate a little bit more on that.

Assistant Commissioner J.J.M. Coutu (Director of Drug Enforcement, Royal Canadian Mounted Police): Indeed, one of the key documents behind the answer to your question is really the United Nations Convention that was signed in 1988 in Vienna by which the signatories agreed to exchange information.

If you wish to discuss some of the details of the convention, we could perhaps do that, but in addition, to be more specific, Canada has concluded a number of mutual legal assistance treaties with other countries, and via this process as well there are undertakings by which we would exchange information.

Mr. Rideout: So that information gathered under Bill C-9 could be traded or exchanged with other foreign law enforcement agencies?

A/Commr Coutu: It could. It would also help us fulfil our obligations under the agreements Canada has concluded.

Mr. Rideout: And we in turn might be getting some information from other foreign law enforcement agencies as well?

A/Commr Coutu: That is an ongoing process. We do that all the time.

The Chairman: Thank you, Mr. Rideout. Mr. Blackburn.

Mr. Blackburn (Brant): I welcome our witnesses here today. I think this is a very important piece of legislation. It is not a controversial one, at least not from my point of view.

I have a couple of questions. Are there any countries that even this kind of legislation will not help us improve relations with in terms of co-operation? Are there countries that are simply not co-operating in this paper trail or paper chase we could be embarking on?

D/Commr Favreau: I will give a general answer and maybe some of my colleagues would be more specific.

Through the Interpol we have a lot of exchange with more than 150 countries. The thrust of each country seems to be going after the moneys and exchange of information in that aspect. However, laws vary with different countries and unfortunately, sometimes it is difficult to be able to continue one investigation into another country. But again, I have two very experienced confreres with me, Monsieur Doucette and Monsieur Coutu, and they might want to add to that answer.

Mr. N. Doucette (Director, Economic Crime, Royal Canadian Mounted Police): In some countries, because of the legislation relating to the banking system, the evidence has not been as forthcoming as possible. However, we are

S.-comm. Favreau: Nous travaillons, en effet, de concert avec plusieurs gouvernements, et je pense que M. Coutu, qui a rencontré bien des gens de par le monde pour discuter du blanchissage de l'argent et d'autres questions connexes, pourrait vous en dire un peu plus long là-dessus.

Le commissaire adjoint J.J.M. Coutu (directeur de la police des drogues, Gendarmerie royale du Canada): En effet, l'un des principaux documents à cet égard est la convention des Nations unies signée à Vienne, en 1988, par laquelle les signataires s'engagent à échanger des renseignements.

Si vous voulez discuter de certains des détails de la convention, nous le ferons volontiers, mais en outre, plus précisément, le Canada a conclu de nombreux traités d'assistance mutuelle à caractère juridique avec d'autres pays, et ces traités nous permettent aussi d'échanger des renseignements.

M. Rideout: Donc, ces renseignements que permet de recueillir le Projet de loi C-9, pourraient être échangés avec des autorités de pays étrangers?

Comm. adj. Coutu: Oui. Cela nous aiderait aussi à respecter les obligations que nous avons en vertu des accords que le Canada a conclus.

M. Rideout: Et, nous pourrions aussi obtenir des renseignements de ces autorités étrangères?

Comm. adj. Coutu: C'est un processus continu. Cela fait partie de nos activités courantes.

Le président: Merci, monsieur Rideout. Monsieur Blackburn.

M. Blackburn (Brant): Soyez les bienvenus, messieurs. Cette loi me paraît très importante. Elle n'est pas controversée, en tout cas, pas pour moi, personnellement.

J'ai une couple de questions à vous poser. Y a-t-il des pays avec lesquels une loi de ce genre ne nous permettra pas d'améliorer les relations que nous avons déjà sur le plan de la collaboration? Y a-t-il des pays qui refusent tout simplement de collaborer sur ce plan?

S.-comm. Favreau: Je vais vous donner une réponse plutôt générale, et peut-être que mes collègues pourront être plus précis.

L'Interpol nous permet d'échanger de nombreux renseignements avec plus de 150 pays. Chaque pays semble s'acharner sur l'argent illicite du trafic des stupéfiants, et échange des renseignements à cet égard. Toutefois, les lois sont différentes dans certains pays et, malheureusement, il arrive parfois qu'il soit difficile de poursuivre une enquête dans un autre pays. Mais j'ai avec moi deux confrères très versés en la matière, M. Doucette et M. Coutu, qui ont peut-être des choses à ajouter.

M. N. Doucette (directeur, Direction de la police économique, Gendarmerie Royale du Canada): Dans certains pays, les lois régissant le système bancaire freinent quelque peu la communication des renseignements utiles. Toutefois, trying to bypass that with the mutual agreement treaties we are now signing more and more with various countries, even as recently as in Switzerland, where they are now realizing the importance of the exchange of information. We are going through the growing pains, but we are getting there.

Mr. Blackburn: Is it permissible for me to ask, and is it permissible for you to answer, which countries are recalcitrant, which countries are deliberately obstructing? It is my uneducated guess that there are perhaps several countries that will not co-operate at all, and therefore this kind of legislation really will not help in terms of offshore investigations. I will name them: the Cayman Islands, possibly the Bahamas, possibly Bermuda—I am not certain—countries like that, which we hear about at least anecdotally.

D/Commr Favreau: I think it is fair to say that from our perspective this bill is not for other countries; it is really for our record here in Canada. It does not change anything, whether positive or negative, with our relations with other countries. The countries you have named do represent some problems. This will not help us change any of those, no.

Mr. Blackburn: To the best of your knowledge, do countries such as those I mentioned play a leading role or an important role in the laundering of illegal profits made from the illicit drug trade here in Canada?

Insp Bowie: Yes, sir. It varies. Different individual trafficking groups have been observed to favour different jurisdictions. Certainly the country that represents a perception of being the weakest link in the international chain will attract attention. We see a lot of drug moneys being laundered through most of the so-called financial havens, including the countries you have mentioned.

Mr. Blackburn: Are there any Canadian institutions currently, or have there been in the past, suspected of being involved directly or indirectly in the laundering of money here in Canada? Without naming them. . .

Insp Bowie: We have a number of specific industries and specific businesses within those industries that have been identified as significant players. However, I would also mention that in terms of the chartered banks, for example, it is not the case that there is an individual institution in that league—

• 1555

Mr. Blackburn: Trust companies or money-lending institutions, some of the down-scale ones.

Insp Bowie: We are talking about some very low-scale organizations.

Mr. Blackburn: And you feel that Bill C-9 will greatly enhance your capability of charging that kind of institution or individual?

D/Commr Favreau: "Charging" might be a bit too strong, but it will certainly—

Mr. Blackburn: Investigating.

D/Commr Favreau: Yes. It will certainly give us a tool to force them to have records and keep records.

nous tentons de contourner cette difficulté à l'aide de traités d'assistance mutuelle que nous arrivons à conclure de plus en plus souvent avec divers pays, et même dernièrement, avec la Suisse, où l'on comprend maintenant l'importance d'échanger des renseignements. Nous ne sommes pas encore au bout de nos peines, mais nous progressons.

M. Blackburn: Puis-je oser vous demander quels pays sont récalcitrants, quels pays refusent délibéremment de collaborer? Sans trop vraiment savoir, je suppose qu'il y a peut-être plusieurs pays qui ne voudront pas collaborer du tout, et une loi de ce genre ne facilitera pas vraiment les enquêtes à l'étranger. Je pense aux Îles Caïmans, aux Bahamas, peut-être aux Bermudes—je ne sais pas trop—des pays comme ceux-là au sujet desquels on entend raconter bien des choses.

S.-comm. Favreau: On peut dire, à juste titre, que ce projet de loi n'aidera pas tellement les choses par rapport aux autres pays; il est vraiment destiné à faciliter nos enquêtes, ici, au Canada. Il n'a aucun effet positif ou négatif pour ce qui est de nos relations avec les autres pays. Les pays que vous avez nommés posent certains problèmes. Ce projet de loi ne nous aidera pas à les changer, non.

M. Blackburn: Selon vous, les pays comme ceux que j'ai mentionnés jouent-ils un rôle important dans le blanchissage des profits illégaux du trafic illicite des stupéfiants au Canada?

Insp. Bowie: Oui, monsieur. A divers degrés, toutefois. Nous avons observé que divers groupes de trafiquants favorisent des pays différents. Il est évident que le pays qu'ils perçoivent comme le lien le plus faible dans la filière internationale les intéressera particulièrement. Il y a beaucoup d'argent provenant du trafic des stupéfiants qui est blanchi dans la plupart des paradis fiscaux, y compris les pays que vous avez mentionnés.

M. Blackburn: Soupçonne-t-on, aujourd'hui, ou a-t-on déjà soupçonné des institutions canadiennes de participer directement ou indirectement au blanchissage de cet argent au Canada? Sans les nommer. . .

Insp. Bowie: Nous avons identifié de nombreuses entreprises qui semblent participer d'une manière importante au blanchissage de cet argent. Toutefois, aucune de nos banques à Charte ne semble être du nombre. . .

M. Blackburn: Il s'agit plutôt de sociétés de fiducie ou d'institutions de prêt, au bas de l'échelle.

Insp. Bowie: Nous parlons ici de très petites institutions.

M. Blackburn: Et vous pensez que le projet de loi C-9 va grandement vous aider à porter des accusations contre ce genre d'institution ou de particulier?

S.-comm. Favreau: «Porter des accusations», c'est beaucoup dire, mais il nous aidera sûrement. . .

M. Blackburn: À enquêter.

S.-comm. Favreau: Oui. Il va certainement nous donner un instrument qui nous permettra de les obliger à tenir et conserver des dossiers.

[Texte]

Mr. Blackburn: How did you hit on the figure of $10,000? Is that an international minimum figure that is used?

A witness: It is in the regulations.

Mr. Blackburn: I guess the government did that. Maybe I am asking the wrong people that. The Department of Justice, is it?

Mr. William Kempling (Parliamentary Secretary to President of the Treasury Board and Minister of State (Finance)): The regulations.

What kind of a group do you have within the RCM Police? How are they trained to handle this kind of rather sophisticated commercial crime? Are there chartered accountants? Are there people trained in business, commerce, and banking who are acting as police officers in the RCM Police?

D/Commr Favreau: I think Mr. Doucette will be very pleased to have a chance to answer this, because a great number of members, if not all of them, have a BA in economics, administration, comptable, etc. On top of that, we give them proper training. Those who do not have a university degree we send on courses, etc. But Mr. Doucette might want to elaborate a bit more.

Mr. Doucette: Yes, it is true that most of our investigators have degrees either in commerce, law, or business administration. Also, we have a great exchange program with the Americans on courses on money laundering as well as establishing a network where an analysis of the flow of money is made on an international scale. Therefore the in-house training, as well as the exchange with the other agencies, is well established and is quite worth while.

Mr. Blackburn: It seems to me that many of these people you are dealing with are extremely creative in their bookkeeping practices and you really have to... It never ceases to amaze me when I read in the newspaper of an RCM Police inquiry into an extremely complicated commercial, or alleged commercial, crime problem where it takes months, if not years sometimes, to get it all sorted out. So you are confident that you have the expertise. I guess obviously, you have, after you have answered my question.

Mr. Kempling: Any time we hear about money laundering or illegal money, we always hear about Switzerland and numbered accounts, and so forth. Is Switzerland party to the 1988 UN agreement? Are they one of the countries that have agreed to it?

A/Commr Coutu: I could not be 100% positive. I am quite certain they have signed. Whether they have finally ratified the convention I could not confirm just now. I am not sure.

Mr. Kempling: I understand that they are going away from this numbered account and they are becoming a little more open with information than they have been in the past.

A/Commr Coutu: I can say that Switzerland is co-operating very well, as are the other countries. I must add that today, the way money flows from one country to the other, it is very difficult not to work with other countries. Switzerland is working.

[Traduction]

M. Blackburn: D'où vient le chiffre de 10,000$? Est-ce le seuil utilisé à l'échelle internationale?

Un témoin: Il est mentionné dans les règlements.

M. Blackburn: Je suppose que c'est le gouvernement qui l'a établi. Je ne m'adresse peut-être pas aux bonnes personnes. C'est au ministère de la Justice qu'il faudrait poser la question, n'est-ce pas?

M. William Kempling (secrétaire parlementaire du président du Conseil du Trésor et ministre d'État (Finances)): Les règlements.

Quel genre de personnes avez-vous pour s'occuper de ces cas à la GRC? Quel genre de formation leur donne-t-on pour enquêter sur ce genre de crime commercial plutôt complexe? Avez-vous des comptables agréés? Avez-vous des gens qui ont une expérience des affaires, une formation dans le domaine du commerce et des opérations bancaires au sein de la GRC?

S.-comm. Favreau: Je pense que M. Doucette répondra très volontiers à cette question, parce qu'un grand nombre de nos agents concernés, si non tous, possèdent un baccalauréat en sciences économiques, en administration, sont comptables, etc. Nous leur donnons, de plus, la formation appropriée. Nous faisons suivre des cours à ceux qui n'ont pas de diplôme universitaire. Mais M. Doucette voudra peut-être vous en dire un peu plus long là-dessus.

M. Doucette: Oui, il est vrai que la plupart de nos enquêteurs possèdent un diplôme en commerce, en droit ou en administration commerciale. Nous avons aussi un important programme d'échange avec les Américains dans le contexte de cours qui sont donnés sur le blanchissage de l'argent ainsi que sur l'établissement d'un réseau, où l'on analyse les déplacements de l'argent à l'échelle internationale. Par conséquent, la formation que nous offrons et les échanges avec les autres organismes sont bien établis et fort valables.

M. Blackburn: J'ai l'impression que bien de ces gens que vous côtoyez sont d'une extrême créativité dans leur tenue de livres, et que vous devez vraiment... Je suis toujours étonné, lorsqu'on relate dans le journal une enquête de la GRC sur un crime commercial extrêmement complexe, qui a pu durer des mois, sinon des années, que l'on ait pu réussir à tout démêler. Vous avez donc la conviction d'avoir tous les gens compétents qu'il vous faut. Je suppose que oui, évidemment, après la réponse que vous m'avez donnée.

M. Kempling: Chaque fois que l'on entend parler de blanchissage d'argent ou d'argent illégal, la Suisse et ses comptes à numéro sont toujours mentionnés. La Suisse a-t-elle signé la convention de l'ONU qui a été conclue en 1988? Est-elle du nombre des pays qui y ont adhéré?

Comm. adj. Coutu: Je n'en suis pas complètement sûr. Mais, je le pense bien. Je ne peux toutefois pas confirmer que la Suisse a signé la convention. Je n'en suis pas certain.

M. Kempling: Je pense qu'elle a tendance à réduire un peu l'utilisation de ses comptes à numéro, et qu'elle devient un peu plus ouverte qu'auparavant pour ce qui est des renseignements.

Comm. adj. Coutu: Je peux dire que la Collaboration de la Suisse est très bonne, à l'instar de celle d'autres pays. Je dois ajouter qu'aujourd'hui, compte tenu de la façon dont l'argent se déplace d'un pays à l'autre, il est très difficile de s'isoler des autres pays. La Suisse collabore donc.

[Text]

Mr. Kempling: Is the money laundering in Canada usually in Canadian or American dollars? Is that the usual currency we are dealing with? We are not dealing with D-marks or yen or something like that? Are we usually dealing in our own currency?

D/Commr Favreau: The two most popular currencies are the U.S. and Canadian currencies.

Mr. Kempling: What happened in the Bank of Nova Scotia case? Can you tell us anything about that at all? They had records seized by the Americans. Are you free to. . .? I do not want to ask you to betray any confidences, but I have been sort of fascinated by that. I understand that the Americans, on their side, seized some records from the Bank of Nova Scotia, which were involved in money laundering.

D/Commr Favreau: Bruce, can you go a distance with that without difficulty?

Insp Bowie: Are you referring to the case where the Americans wanted documentation from a branch of the Bank of Nova Scotia in the Cayman Islands?

Mr. Kempling: That is right.

Insp Bowie: I am sorry, in Nassau.

Mr. Kempling: Nassau, right.

Insp Bowie: That case was resolved. Of course, the Bank of Nova Scotia was in a dilemma. If they complied to the subpoena that was delivered in the U.S. by the U.S. Department of Justice, they were violating the laws of the country that their branch was in.

It was a case involving Robert Twist, a drug trafficker. Eventually the Bank of Nova Scotia complied and delivered up the documentation. That was the end of it. The Bank of Nova Scotia was fined not for laundering, but for failing to comply with the subpoena. Twist, the drug trafficker, subsequently sued the Bank of Nova Scotia for disclosing his records. I am not aware of any resolution of the civil suit.

Mr. Kempling: He has a lot of nerve, hasn't he? But I see this bill would overcome that, I would think, with the uniformity of records and the transfer of information between Canada and the United States through this UN convention. The Nova Scotia thing should not arise again, I would not think. Or would it?

Insp Bowie: If I can expand a little bit, sir, the biggest problem that the Bank of Nova Scotia had was that they were being delivered a subpoena in one country, which placed them in a situation of violating the law and their charter in the other country, as I understand the circumstances.

From our point of view, we regard this legislation as being a good piece of legislation to ensure that the records within Canada are created and are available through whatever process, presumably most of the time, a search warrant. They are there if an investigation develops sufficient evidence to warrant a judicial process such as a search warrant.

M. Kempling: Le blanchissage de l'argent au Canada se fait-il habituellement en dollars canadiens ou en dollars américains? Est-ce la devise qui est habituellement utilisée? Il n'est pas question de marks allemands, de yen, ou de quelque autre devise? Est-ce habituellement en dollars canadiens?

S.-comm. Favreau: Les devises qui sont les plus couramment utilisées sont le dollar américain et le dollar canadien.

M. Kempling: Qu'est-il advenu dans l'affaire de la Banque de Nouvelle-Écosse? Pouvez-vous nous en parler un peu? Les Américains ont saisi certains de ses dossiers. Je ne vous demande pas de trahir des secrets, mais je dois dire que l'affaire m'a plutôt fasciné. Les Américains ont saisi un certain nombre de dossiers de la Banque de Nouvelle-Écosse, qui avaient à voir avec une opération de blanchissage d'argent.

S.-comm. Favreau: Bruce, pouvez-vous en parler un peu?

Insp. Bowie: Vous parlez de la fois où les Américains avaient besoin de certains documents d'une succursale de la Banque de Nouvelle-Écosse aux Îles Caïmans?

M. Kempling: Oui.

Insp. Bowie: Je m'excuse, c'était une succursale de Nassau.

M. Kempling: Oui, de Nassau, c'est juste.

Insp. Bowie: L'affaire a été résolue. Evidemment la Banque de Nouvelle-Écosse se trouvait dans un dilemme. En se conformant à la requête du ministère de la justice américain, elle dérogeait aux lois du pays où est située sa succursale.

L'affaire concernait Robert Twist, un trafiquant. En bout de course, la Banque de Nouvelle-Écosse s'est pliée à la demande des Etats-Unis. L'affaire s'est arrêtée là. La Banque de Nouvelle-Écosse a été mise à l'amende, non pas pour avoir blanchi de l'argent, mais pour ne pas s'être conformée à la requête. Twist, le trafiquant, a par la suite poursuivi la Banque de Nouvelle-Écosse pour avoir divulgué le contenu de son dossier. Je ne sais pas quelle a été l'issue de la poursuite au civil.

M. Kempling: Quel culot! N'est-ce pas? Ce projet de loi permettrait donc d'éviter cela grâce à l'uniformité des dossiers et l'échange de renseignements entre le Canada et les Etats-Unis que prévoit la convention de l'ONU. L'aventure de la Banque de Nouvelle-Écosse ne devrait pas se reproduire, je pense. Cela peut-il encore arriver?

Insp. Bowie: Si vous me permettez de développer un peu plus, monsieur, la grande difficulté, pour la Banque de la Nouvelle-Écosse, était d'avoir reçu une requête qui avait été émise dans un pays, ce qui la plaçait en violation de la loi et de sa charte dans l'autre pays, selon ce que je comprends de l'affaire.

De notre côté, nous pensons que cette loi permettra de faire en sorte que les dossiers pertinents soient établis au Canada et qu'ils soient accessibles par un processus quelconque, dans la plupart des cas je suppose, au moyen d'un mandat de perquisition. Nous pourrons compter sur le fait que des dossiers existeront lorsqu'une enquête justifiera le recours à un instrument judiciaire comme un mandat de perquisition.

[Texte]

Mr. Kempling: Would the Bank of Nova Scotia in Nassau be keeping records as required under C-9, or just domestically?

Insp Bowie: I would suggest that a bank with branches in different countries would be bound to conform with the laws in the countries in which they are operating, sir. It is a very complicated question.

Mr. Kempling: I can see that. In your brief you mentioned sophisticated importation. I was kind of struck by the words. What do you mean by "sophisticated methods of importation"? Of course the more money they get, the more sophisticated they become. They are not coming in by hang glider or skateboard, I assume.

D/Commr Favreau: I will give you an example, and I am sure that Mr. Coutu could elaborate on a few more. You will have a mother ship operation whereby a huge quantity of cocaine or other drugs will be transported toward the coast—east coast or west coast—and then one group will be responsible for supplying the mother ship, obviously a crew. Another group will be responsible for finding places where they can land. Another group will see what kind of vehicle they need, what kinds of communications they need, how the payment is going to be done and how they are going to wash the money afterwards.

So you have a lot of people involved. A good example is a recent case where 17 people were arrested. That is one type of complicated operation. You have to be there at the right time, otherwise you might have a ship and a few people on board, but you will not have the people who are responsible for the importation.

When we say they could afford police enforcement, this means that if you do that kind of importation on a regular basis you can afford to lose one shipment and it won't damage your operation too much.

Another sophisticated means is using a landing strip and flying directly from South America to Canada. In a recent survey of possible places to land, in New Brunswick alone we found 52 landing strips that could be used. So it is a very difficult task to be there at the right time, when these operations could take months of preparation and a relatively short time to really unfold.

Mr. Speller (Haldimand—Norfolk): I have two very quick questions. As for the proceeds of crime, when Bill C-61 was discussed, the seize-and-freeze aspect, there were those who said the provisions of seize and freeze wouldn't be operative without some sort of money laundering bill to help that. Does this complement that bill? Do you feel satisfied that this bill will help in the seize and freeze?

[Traduction]

M. Kempling: La succursale de la Banque de Nouvelle-Ecosse, à Nassau, tiendrait-elle des dossiers comme l'exige le projet de loi C-9, ou la loi voterait-elle uniquement pour les succursales en territoire canadien?

Insp. Bowie: Je dirais que toute banque ayant des succursales dans différents pays devrait se conformer aux lois des pays en cause, monsieur. La question est très complexe.

M. Kempling: Je vois. Dans votre mémoire, vous parlez de réseaux d'importation élaborés. Ces mots m'ont frappé. Que voulez-vous dire par «réseaux d'importation élaborés»? Evidemment, plus les trafiquants font d'argent, plus ils deviennent raffinés. Ils ne servent pas de deltaplanes ou de planches à roulettes, je suppose.

S.-comm. Favreau: Je vais vous donner un exemple, et je suis convaincu que M. Coutu pourrait aussi vous en donner quelques uns. On peut se retrouver devant une opération dans laquelle on utilise un navire central, si vous voulez, d'où partent des navettes qui transportent d'énormes quantités de cocaïne ou d'autres stupéfiants—à destination de la côte est ou de la côte ouest—et un groupe est alors chargé d'approvisionner le navire central, évidemment, une équipe. Un autre groupe est chargé de repérer des endroits où l'on pourra décharger la marchandise. Un autre groupe, encore, détermine le genre de véhicule requis, les moyens de communication nécessaires, comment le paiement s'effectuera et comment on blanchira ensuite l'argent obtenu.

Il y a donc de nombreuses personnes qui participent à l'opération. L'affaire récente, où 17 personnes ont été arrêtées, est un bon exemple. C'était une opération complexe. Il faut intervenir au bon moment, sans quoi, on risque de débarquer sur un navire où il n'y aura presque personne, et l'on ne parviendra pas à mettre la main sur les vrais responsables.

Quand nous disons qu'ils peuvent faire fi des opérations policières, cela signifie que les trafiquants qui importent régulièrement des stupéfiants peuvent se permettre de perdre un chargement sans que cela n'ait tellement de conséquences pour l'opération dans l'ensemble.

Un autre moyen élaboré consiste à utiliser une piste d'atterrissage et à transporter directement par avion les stupéfiants d'Amérique du Sud au Canada. Au cours d'une enquête récente sur les endroits où il était possible d'atterrir, au Nouveau-Brunswick seulement, nous avons découvert 52 pistes qui pourraient être utilisées. Il est donc très difficile d'être là au bon moment, quand on sait que de telles opérations pourraient prendre des mois à préparer et se dérouler relativement rapidement.

M. Speller (Haldimand—Norfolk): J'ai deux questions très brèves à vous poser. Au sujet des produits de la criminalité, au moment où l'on a discuté du projet de loi C-61, de l'aspect de la saisie et du gel de ces biens, certains ont exprimé l'avis que ces dispositions seraient sans effet sans une loi quelconque sur le blanchissage de l'argent. Le projet de loi C-9 complète-t-il le projet de loi C-61? Pensez-vous qu'il facilitera les choses en ce sens?

[Text]

D/Commr Favreau: I would like Mr. Coutu to elaborate, because he did have a lot of participation in it.

A/Commr Coutu: Clearly this would complement Bill C-61 and allow the law enforcement agencies to put their case together in less time and with supportive evidence that is not always available today. In addition, I would suggest that the bill as proposed would also discourage foreigners from landing their money in Canada, and to me that by itself is an important step forward.

Mr. Speller: The second question deals with page 3 of your brief, the second paragraph. You say:

> this exemplifies the fact that criminal organizations will inevitably alter their money laundering methods in order to circumvent legislative controls.

Is there any forward thinking? Is there anything we should be putting in the bill now to anticipate how they are going to get around it?

D/Commr Favreau: What we anticipate there is that through the regulation we hope the government and the law will be adjustable and flexible enough to change with new methods. That's why we mention that the responsibility—maybe not responsibility, it would be too strong a word—the process whereby commercial establishments and bank establishments would have to report suspicious transactions might be something we want to look at in the future.

Mr. Speller: Yesterday we recognized the importance of the regulations. I take it, then, that we are going to see the regulations before we go any further.

The Chairman: I understand there are officials here. I'm not sure if they have any regulations or not. But perhaps we could continue on if there are other questions. Mr. Langlois, do you have any questions? Mr. Blackburn?

Mr. Blackburn: Could I ask one supplementary that flows from the line of questioning of Mr. Kempling. This is probably not a question for the RCMP, but I want to put it on the table anyway. Maybe they can answer it, maybe they cannot. Is it possible to write legislation governing, for example, Canadian banks that would be applicable in their operations in the Caribbean? We have a lot of banks in the Caribbean.

Mr. Kempling: And in the United States.

Mr. Blackburn: And in the United States. These are two areas in the world where there is a heck of a lot of drug activity, transportation and illicit trade. I'm not suggesting it's a loophole. It may be something that could be added to this legislation, or maybe not. I don't know. I agree that when any company opens a branch in a foreign country it has to abide by the laws and regulations of that country. Is it possible to work in such a way as to get an international agreement among the Caribbean countries and the United States so that when we pass anti-money-laundering legislation here it would apply to our branches in the Caribbean, just as it would American banks in Canada and in > cela démontre que les organisations criminelles changeront inévitablement leurs méthodes de recyclage afin d'échapper aux contrôles législatifs.

S.-comm. Favreau: Je voudrais que M. Coutu réponde à votre question, parce qu'il a beaucoup participé aux discussions à ce sujet.

Comm. adj. Coutu: Il est évident que le projet de loi C-9 complète le projet de loi C-61 et permettra aux organismes chargés d'appliquer la loi de mener à bien leurs enquêtes plus rapidement et d'obtenir les preuves à l'appui qui ne sont pas toujours disponibles aujourd'hui. J'ajouterai, en outre, que le projet de loi dissuadera aussi les étrangers de venir blanchir leur argent au Canada, et personnellement, je trouve que c'est un progrès important.

M. Speller: Ma deuxième question porte sur le deuxième paragraphe de la troisième page de votre mémoire. Vous dAites:

Y a-t-il moyen de contrer cela? Pourrions-nous ajouter quelque chose dans le projet de loi pour anticiper la façon dont ils vont tenter d'échapper aux contrôles législatifs?

S.-comm. Favreau: Nous espérons que les règlements et la loi demeureront suffisamment souples pour être ajustés aux nouvelles méthodes qui seront utilisées. C'est pourquoi nous disons que la responsabilité—peut-être pas responsabilité, le mot serait peut-être un peu fort—mais le processus selon lequel les établissements commerciaux et bancaires devraient rapporter les opérations douteuses pourrait être un aspect à examiner.

M. Speller: Hier, nous avons reconnu l'importance des règlements. Je suppose, alors, que nous aurons l'occasion de voir les règlements en question avant d'aller plus loin.

Le président: Je pense qu'il y a des hauts fonctionnaires, ici, aujourd'hui. Je ne sais pas s'ils ont déjà des règlements à nous présenter ou non. Mais, nous pourrions peut-être poursuivre s'il y a d'autres questions. Monsieur Langlois, avez-vous des questions à poser? Monsieur Blackburn?

M. Blackburn: Puis-je poser une question additionnelle dans la même veine que celle de M. Kempling. Ce n'est probablement pas une question à poser aux représentants de la GRC, mais je veux l'inscrire au procès-verbal, de toute façon. Ils peuvent peut-être y répondre, et peut-être pas. Pourrions-nous rédiger une loi qui régirait, par exemple, les banques canadiennes, et qui s'appliquerait à leurs activités dans les Caraïbes? Plusieurs de nos banques y sont installées.

M. Kempling: Et aux États-Unis.

M. Blackburn: Oui, aux États-Unis aussi. Ce sont deux parties du monde où le trafic, le transport et le commerce illicite des stupéfiants sont extrêmement développés. Je ne dis pas qu'il s'agit d'une lacune. Ce serait peut-être quelque chose que nous pourrions ajouter à cette loi, ou peut-être pas. Je ne sais trop. Une société qui ouvre une succursale dans un pays étranger doit se conformer aux lois et règlements de l'endroit. J'en conviens. Ne pourrions-nous pas chercher à conclure un accord international avec les pays des Caraïbes et les États-Unis, qui permettrait de faire en sorte qu'une loi canadienne contre le blanchissage de l'argent s'appliquerait à nos succursales dans les Caraïbes, tout the Caribbean and that kind of thing. There could be some very big loopholes here through which you could drive the proverbial Sherman tank. I don't know whether there is an answer to that situation.

D/Commr Favreau: I think your question raises a lot more questions. It seems that the Department of Justice would be better able to answer than the RCMP, obviously. Mr. Coutu might have some interesting comments to make on that point.

A/Commr Coutu: There is no doubt that legislation passed in Canada will not cover all the loopholes in other countries or the weaknesses of systems in other areas, but at least it will provide the Canadian system with the means to fulfil its role in a more efficient manner.

I would not want to imply that all the Caribbean countries are at fault in this particular money laundering problem. For one thing, as we go on, more and more countries are ratifying the United Nations convention, meaning they are slowly passing legislation by which they will comply with the conditions of the convention, including money laundering, other investigative methods, support and mutual assistance between countries via the United Nations convention.

As we pass legislation in Canada to help us those countries are coming under increasing pressure to do the same, because, not unlike drugs, if they allow crime money to flow into their country, they are also asking criminals to establish themselves in that country, and that soon becomes obvious. Therefore it is an incentive to come along and pass legislation there as well. But I can say that more and more countries are moving, not quickly, but slowly in the same direction. I suggest that would include many Caribbean countries as well.

The Chairman: Thank you, gentlemen; that appears to be the end of our questions. We appreciate your candid remarks, your answers, and certainly the brief you presented. It was excellent, and gave us a real insight into the magnitude of the problem we have to deal with.

D/Commr Favreau: Thank you, Mr. Chairman.

The Chairman: We have a letter dated June 12 from The Canadian Bankers Association, which reads as follows:

> Dear Mr. Farrell: You recently called the CBA to invite us to appear this week as witnesses before the House of Commons Legislative Committee on Bill C-9.
> The CBA is grateful that the committee has extended this invitation, but, given the format of the bill, we do not believe we could productively assist the deliberations of the committee. If, however, the members of the committee wish testimony from the association, Mr. Ballard will be able to appear on Thursday, June 13, 1991, and he can be contacted through the CBA's Ottawa office.

However, they say they have nothing to add to what is already in the bill. So what is your pleasure, gentlemen?

comme ce serait le cas pour les banques américaines au Canada et dans les Caraïbes? Il se pourrait fort bien qu'il y ait quelques trous béants dans cette loi, où l'on pourrait faire passer un éléphant. Je ne sais pas s'il y a une solution à cela.

S.-comm. Favreau: Votre question en soulève de nombreuses autres. Le ministère de la Justice serait évidemment mieux placé que la GRC pour y répondre. Mais, M. Coutu pourrait avoir quelques observations intéressantes à faire sur ce point.

Comm. adj. Coutu: Il ne fait aucun doute que la loi adoptée au Canada n'éliminera pas toutes les échappatoires qui existent dans les autres pays ni les faiblesses de leur système, mais elle fournira au moins au système canadien le moyen d'être plus efficace.

Je ne veux pas donner l'impression que tous les pays des Caraïbes contribuent au problème du blanchissage de l'argent. Un aspect encourageant, c'est qu'il y a de plus en plus de pays qui adhèrent à la convention des Nations Unies, ce qui signifie qu'ils adoptent lentement des lois en conséquence, notamment sur le blanchissage de l'argent, d'autres méthodes d'enquête et des réseaux d'appui et d'aide mutuelle entre les pays par le biais de cette convention.

En adoptant des lois au Canada, ces pays se sentent de plus en plus obligés à en faire autant, parce que comme dans le cas des stupéfiants, s'ils donnent libre accès aux produits de la criminalité dans leur pays, ils incitent en même temps les criminels à venir s'établir chez eux, et cela à tôt fait de devenir évident. C'est donc un encouragement à en faire autant pour ces pays. Mais je dois dire qu'il y a de plus en plus de pays où les choses bougent, pas rapidement, mais lentement dans la même direction. Cela vaut aussi pour plusieurs pays des Caraïbes.

Le président: Merci, messieurs; cela semble mettre un terme aux questions que nous avions à vous poser. Nous vous remercions pour les observations et les réponses franches que vous nous avez faites, ainsi que pour le mémoire que vous nous avez présenté. Il est excellent, il nous a donné une bonne idée de l'ampleur du problème auquel nous devons faire face.

S.-comm. Favreau: Merci, monsieur le Président.

> Monsieur Farrell: Vous avez dernièrement invité l'ABC à comparaître cette semaine, devant le Comité législatif de la Chambre des communes, chargé de l'examen du projet de loi C-9.
> L'ABC est reconnaissante de l'invitation du comité, mais, compte tenu de la formulation du projet de loi, nous ne pensons pas pouvoir être utile aux délibérations du comité. Toutefois, si les membres du comité tiennent à recevoir le témoignage de l'Association, M. Ballard pourra comparaître le jeudi, 13 juin 1991, et vous pouvez le rejoindre au bureau de l'ABC à Ottawa.

Ils disent, toutefois, ne rien avoir à ajouter au projet de loi. Qu'en pensez-vous, messieurs?

[Text]

Mr. Kempling: I have no questions for them. They have been through the legislation, have seen it, and are obviously happy with it, which means they have no difficulty with complying with the record requirement. That has been the view of the chartered accountants, the credit union people, and so forth. So unless there is some compelling reason to get them here, I would say let them go.

Mr. Speller: We have no problem.

The Chairman: Are there any other witnesses the committee would like to call on this bill?

Mr. Speller: Perhaps we should call a couple of drug lords.

Mr. Blackburn: You go get them.

Mr. Kempling: The reason the bill is drafted the way it is, where it is mainly record keeping and the rest of it is in the regulations, is that the regulations are changed by Order in Council. If it was in the statute we would have to bring it in for an amendment each time, which becomes a problem, as you know. So it is much easier to control it that way. If there is a change in the system of laundering money it might take six months or a year for us to catch it up in the House in legislation, but they can do it by Order in Council on pretty short order. That is why it is drafted that way.

If I may make one other comment, Mr. Chairman, I tried to get the minister to be here today or tomorrow, but he will be in Quebec City. He left for Quebec City right after Question Period. So unfortunately he cannot be here, but perhaps we could proceed with the officials, if the committee is in agreement.

The Chairman: In clause-by-clause, you mean?

Mr. Kempling: Yes.

The Chairman: Is the committee ready for clause-by-clause?

Mr. Blackburn: I may have a problem. I am just filling in for Mr. Langdon, and I am wondering whether. . . I don't know what to say; I have to ask you. Is he generally in agreement with the bill, or has he expressed serious concern about it?

Mr. Kempling: I spoke with him before we started this process, before we went into our second reading debate. He had no difficulties with the bill at all, because we have already been through it once, as you know. When he was here yesterday he was asking questions about regulations. We produced the regulations that we had on the bill previous to this one. The officials explained that there were two or three changes. That seemed to satisfy him. I think we said we would have the changes as soon as we could get them and that would be it. I don't think there is any difficulty, but if you want to make some reservation we could go clause by clause, stand clause 1, and go through the rest of it—if you feel that is necessary, but I don't think it is.

M. Kempling: Je n'ai pas de questions à leur poser. Ils ont examiné le projet de loi, l'ont vu, et en sont évidemment satisfaits, ce qui signifie qu'ils se conformeront sans difficulté aux exigences concernant les dossiers. C'est aussi l'avis des comptables agréés, des représentants des caisses de crédit, etc. À moins qu'il y ait une très bonne raison de les faire venir, je propose de laisser tomber.

M. Speller: Cela nous convient tout à fait.

Le président: Y a-t-il d'autres témoins que le comité voudrait convoquer afin de discuter de ce projet de loi?

M. Speller: Nous pourrions peut-être inviter quelques seigneurs de la drogue.

M. Blackburn: Allez les chercher, vous.

M. Kempling: Si le projet de loi est rédigé de cette façon, à savoir qu'il porte surtout sur les dossiers, et le reste figurera dans les règlements, c'est que les règlements sont modifiés par décret. Si tout était dans la loi, il faudrait proposer une modification chaque fois, ce qui devient un problème, comme vous le savez. C'est donc beaucoup plus facile de cette manière. S'il advient un changement dans les méthodes utilisées pour blanchir l'argent, il pourrait s'écouler six mois à un an avant que nous puissions le rattraper à la Chambre en modifiant la loi, mais ainsi, on peut apporter la modification nécessaire assez rapidement par décret du conseil. C'est pourquoi la loi est rédigée de cette façon.

Si vous me permettez d'apporter une autre observation, monsieur le président. J'ai tenté d'inviter le ministre pour aujourd'hui ou demain, mais il sera à Québec. Il est parti pour Québec tout de suite après la période de questions. Il ne pourra donc malheureusement pas venir nous rencontrer, mais nous pourrions peut-être aller de l'avant avec les hauts fonctionnaires, si le comité est d'accord.

Le président: Et procéder à l'examen article par article, vous voulez dire?

M. Kempling: Oui.

Le président: Le comité est-il prêt à procéder à l'étude article par article du projet de loi?

M. Blackburn: Il y a peut-être une difficulté. Je remplace M. Langdon, et je me demande si. . . Je ne sais trop quoi dire; je dois m'en remettre à vous. Comment voit-il ce projet de loi? Est-il d'accord, ou a-t-il exprimé de fortes réticences à son égard?

M. Kempling: J'ai discuté avec lui avant d'entreprendre cet examen, avant d'entreprendre le débat en deuxième lecture. Il n'y avait absolument rien qui l'embêtait; nous avons déjà examiné le projet de loi, comme vous le savez. Hier, il a posé des questions au sujet des règlements. Nous avons montré les règlements que nous avions sur le projet de loi antérieur à celui-ci. Les hauts fonctionnaires nous ont expliqué que deux ou trois modifications avaient été apportées. Il en a semblé satisfait. Je pense que nous avons dit que nous ferions apporter les modifications dès que possible, et l'affaire serait conclue. Je ne pense pas qu'il y ait quelque difficulté que ce soit, mais si vous voulez réserver votre jugement, nous pourrions entreprendre l'étude article par article du projet de loi, en reporter l'article 1, et régler le reste—si vous pensez que cela est nécessaire, mais je ne le pense pas.

[Texte]

Mr. Blackburn: I don't think it is either. I am guessing here, but I appreciate your information. I was given no instructions, just simply to come over and fill in. I don't know whether his office knew we would be getting into clause-by-clause today. I'm prepared to go ahead.

The Chairman: Okay.

Mr. Speller: Perhaps when the officials are brought forward they can give us an update as to how long it will be before the regulations are produced. Yesterday I think they mentioned somewhere around ten days. Is it the intention to pass this through the House before we see the regulations, or...?

Mr. Kempling: Mr. Speller, this is an unusual bill. In the normal course of a bill going through the process in the House, we do not see the regulations at all. This being an unusual bill, we leave the bulk of the control to the regulations. The minister brought the regulations... As far as I am concerned, I have been through the regulations...yesterday they gave us a copy of the old bill. I see nothing there, other than the few minor changes they are talking about. Mr. Chairman, why don't we bring the officials forward and ask them if they can update us as to where they are in the process?

The Chairman: Thank you, Mr. Kempling. Mr. James McCollum and Yvon Carrière are here from the Department of Finance. If they would come forward, please, to answer any questions the members may have as we proceed...

Members can seek the floor after each question is put, either to debate or to ask the parliamentary secretary questions or to propose amendments. Amendments within a clause should always go in the order of where they start to amend the text.

Do the officials have any comments in terms of the regulations before we start through clause by clause? Is there any update since yesterday?

Mr. James F. McCollum (Chief, Industry Analysis Relations, Financial Sector Policy Branch, Department of Finance): In terms of the regulations, we would expect to have a draft by Monday of next week.

Mr. Kempling: Could I ask the other members if there is any objection to proceeding to and completing clause-by-clause, on the understanding that on Monday, if we report to the House on Monday, you would have the full copy of the regulations before we proceed to report stage and third reading? Is that a reasonable request?

Mr. McCollum: Yes.

Mr. Kempling: Would you be sure that we would have them by the Monday?

Mr. McCollum: Certainly.

Mr. Kempling: Fine. Then why do we not proceed with clause-by-clause and report the bill?

[Traduction]

M. Blackburn: C'est aussi mon avis. Je vous remercie de ces renseignements. On ne m'a donné aucune directive. On m'a tout simplement dit de venir le remplacer. Je ne sais pas si les gens de son bureau savaient que nous allions entreprendre l'étude article par article du projet de loi aujourd'hui. Je suis disposé à aller de l'avant.

Le président: D'accord.

M. Speller: Lorsque nous rencontrerons les hauts fonctionnaires, ils pourront peut-être nous dire combien de temps il faudra encore pour que les règlements soient prêts. Hier, je pense qu'ils ont mentionné environ 10 jours. A-t-on l'intention d'adopter ce projet de loi à la Chambre avant que nous ayons pu voir les règlements, ou...?

M. Kempling: Monsieur Speller, ce projet de loi déroge un peu à la règle. Habituellement, avant qu'un projet de loi ne soit adopté par la Chambre, nous ne voyons absolument pas les règlements. Ceci dit, dans le cas de ce projet de loi, le plus gros du contrôle s'exercera par les règlements. Le ministre a présenté les règlements... Je les ai personnellement examinés... hier, on nous a remis un exemplaire de l'ancien projet de loi. Je n'y vois rien d'autre que les quelques modifications sans conséquence dont on nous a parlé. Monsieur le président, pourquoi ne demandons-nous pas aux hauts fonctionnaires de nous dire un peu où ils en sont maintenant dans le processus?

Le président: Merci, monsieur Kempling. M. James McCollum et M. Yvon Carrière, du ministère des Finances, sont ici. Je les prierais de venir nous rejoindre afin de répondre aux questions que les membres du comité auront à leur poser...

Les membres du comité peuvent prendre la parole après chacune des questions, soit pour en débattre, ou pour poser des questions au secrétaire parlementaire, ou proposer des modifications. Les modifications à un article devraient toujours apparaître là où elles commencent à modifier le texte.

Les hauts fonctionnaires ont-ils des observations à faire au sujet des règlements avant que nous n'entreprenions l'étude article par article du projet de loi? Y a-t-il du nouveau depuis hier?

M. James F. McCollum (chef, analyse de l'industrie, direction de la politique du secteur financier, ministère des Finances): Nous devrions avoir terminé l'ébauche des règlements lundi prochain.

M. Kempling: Y a-t-il objection à ce que nous entreprenions et complétions l'étude article par article du projet de loi, étant entendu que lundi, si nous faisons rapport à la Chambre lundi, vous recevrez un exemplaire complet des règlements avant de passer à l'étape du rapport et à la troisième lecture? Cela vous paraît-il raisonnable?

M. McCollum: Oui.

M. Kempling: Aurons-nous, à coup sûr, cet exemplaire des règlements lundi?

M. McCollum: Sûrement.

M. Kempling: Très bien. Alors, pourquoi ne pas procéder à l'étude article par article du projet de loi et en faire rapport?

[Text]

Mr. Blackburn: That would be Monday morning then, would it not?

Mr. Kempling: Yes, I would think so.

The Chairman: We might have a technical problem here. Perhaps the clerk should explain this.

Mr. Kempling: Is it Beauchesne's or Erskine May?

The Clerk of the Committee: No. I am just saying that if we go clause by clause and we report back on Monday, we cannot direct the House not to take up the bill.

Mr. Kempling: No, I didn't mean it that way.

The Clerk: The government decides what their timetable is. The bill cannot be taken up for 48 hours, unless by consent.

Mr. Speller: That's something we can discuss later. That's the only thing we are concerned about.

Mr. Kempling: Unofficially, that is the way we will do it. Nothing that much is involved. So if that is agreeable, let's make progress.

Clauses 1 to 11 inclusive agreed to

The Chairman: Shall the title carry?

Some hon. members: Agreed.

The Chairman: Shall the bill carry?

Some hon. members: Agreed.

The Chairman: Shall I report the bill to the House?

Some hon. members: Agreed.

The Chairman: Thank you, gentlemen, for your co-operation. Thank you, staff. Thank you everyone.

This committee stands adjourned.

[Translation]

M. Blackburn: Lundi matin, alors, n'est-ce pas?

M. Kempling: Oui, je le pense.

Le président: Il y aura peut-être toutefois une petite difficulté d'ordre technique. Le greffier pourrait peut-être nous expliquer de quoi il s'agit.

M. Kempling: Est-ce dans le Beauchesne ou Erskine May?

Le greffier du Comité: Non. Je dis seulement que si nous terminons l'étude article par article et que nous faisons rapport du projet de loi lundi, nous ne pouvons pas dire à la Chambre de ne pas aller de l'avant avec le projet de loi.

M. Kempling: Non, ce n'est pas ce que j'ai voulu dire.

Le greffier: C'est le gouvernement qui décide du programme. Le projet de loi ne peut pas être examiné avant 48 heures, à moins qu'il n'y ait consentement.

M. Speller: Nous pourrons en discuter plus tard. C'est le seul aspect qui nous inquiète.

M. Kempling: C'est ainsi que nous allons procéder de façon non officielle. Il n'y a pas tellement de difficultés. Si nous sommes tous d'accord, allons-y!

Les articles 1 à 11, inclusivement, sont adoptés

Le président: Le titre est-il adopté?

Des voix: D'accord.

Le président: Le projet de loi est-il adopté?

Des voix: D'accord.

Le président: Dois-je faire rapport du projet de loi à la Chambre?

Des voix: D'accord.

Le président: Merci, messieurs, de votre collaboration. Merci aussi au personnel. Et merci à tous.

Le comité est ajourné.

GOVERNMENT RESPONSE

Mr. Charles A. Langlois (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Industry, Science and Technology): Mr. Speaker, pursuant to Standing Order 36(8), I have the honour to table, in both official languages, the government's response to four petitions.

BILL C-9

REPORT OF LEGISLATIVE COMMITTEE F

Hon. Ralph Ferguson (Lambton—Middlesex): Mr. Speaker, I have the honour to present in both official languages the report of the Legislative Committee F on Bill C-9, an act to facilitate combatting the laundering of proceeds of crime without amendment.

[Editor's Note: See today's Votes and Proceedings.]

WAGE CLAIM PAYMENT ACT

Hon. Pierre Blais (Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs and Minister of State (Agriculture)) moved for leave to introduce Bill C-22, an Act to enact the Wage Claim Payment Act, to amend the Bankruptcy Act and to amend other Acts in consequence thereof.

June 18, 1991 [House of Commons]

forthwith put all questions necessary to dispose of both report stage and third reading of said bill.

Motion agreed to.

BILL C-9

Mr. Albert Cooper (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of State and Leader of the Government in the House of Commons): Mr. Speaker, I move:

That, when Bill C-9, an act to facilitate combating the laundering of proceeds of crime, is called for debate, the Speaker shall recognize one speaker from each of the three recognized parties to speak for a period not to exceed ten minutes each following which the speaker shall forthwith put all questions necessary to dispose of the report stage and third reading of said bill.

Mr. Riis: Mr. Speaker, on a point of order, I wonder if I could seek clarification from the government House leader. Regarding Bill C-9, one of the amendments proposed by the New Democratic Party has been accepted by the government, which of course would be dealt with at report stage.

Mr. Andre: The parliamentary secretary is not here this evening, but barring any change from this afternoon, it is my understanding that that one amendment would be recognized.

Mr. Riis: Mr. Speaker, we are prepared to certainly give our consent, with the clear understanding that arrangements have been made on that particular critical motion.

Some hon. members: Agreed.

Motion agreed to.

Mr. Dingwall: Mr. Speaker, on a point of order, perhaps when the parliamentary secretary is on his feet with regard to the motions which he is going to present in the next number of minutes, as well as those that have passed, I presume he will indicate that these motions will be called for tomorrow, namely June 19.

• (2250)

Mr. Cooper: Mr. Speaker, I can confirm that it is our intention to move these various bills and motions tomorrow, June 19.

BILL C-19

Mr. Albert Cooper (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of State and Leader of the Government in the House of Commons): Mr. Speaker, I move:

That the Standing Committee on Finance be authorized to pre-study Bill C-19, an act respecting banks and banking;

That the committee or a subcommittee hear witnesses and take evidence as it sees fit on this reference.

Motion agreed to.

WAYS AND MEANS

Mr. Albert Cooper (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of State and Leader of the Government in the House of Commons): Mr. Speaker, I move:

That, notwithstanding any Standing Order or usual practice of the House, on Wednesday, June 19, 1991, forthwith upon disposition of the Ways and Means proceeding concerning a bill respecting insurance companies and fraternal benefit societies (notice of which was given on Tuesday, June 18, 1991) the bill based thereon (notice of which was given on Monday, June 17, 1991) shall be introduced and read a first time pursuant to Standing Orders 68 and 69.

Motion agreed to.

INSURANCE COMPANIES AND FRATERNAL BENEFIT SOCIETIES

Mr. Albert Cooper (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of State and Leader of the Government in the House of Commons): Mr. Speaker, I move:

That the Standing Committee on Finance be authorized to pre-study the government bill on notice dated June 17, 1991, an act respecting insurance companies and fraternal benefit societies; and

That the committee or a subcommittee hear witnesses and take evidence as it sees fit on this reference.

Motion agreed to.

BILL C-22

Mr. Albert Cooper (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of State and Leader of the Government in the House of Commons): Mr. Speaker, I move:

That the Standing Committee on Consumer and Corporate Affairs be authorized to pre-study the government bill, C-22, an act to enact the Wage Claim Payment Act, to amend the Bankruptcy Act and to amend other acts in consequence thereof, upon the completion of a 10-minute speech from one member of each of the three recognized parties; and

That the committee or a subcommittee hear witnesses and take evidence as it sees fit on this reference.

Motion agreed to.

APPOINTMENT OF COMMISSIONER OF OFFICIAL LANGUAGES

Mr. Albert Cooper (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of State and Leader of the Government in the House of Commons): Mr. Speaker, I move:

June 19, 1991 [House of Commons]

The bill is not retroactive, particularly for workers. There is no retroactivity. We have come through the worst part of the recession. This bill will not get passed till some time in the fall, so all of the victims of this government's inept economic policies have all gone by the wayside. There is no retroactivity in the bill, so we have a problem with that.

We have a problem with the taxation to small business. This is another tax on small business. No matter how you cut it, no matter how you twist it, it is a taxation on small business.

Then the minister says he is going to tie this into the unemployment insurance program. This one we have to explore because the UI Act says any moneys received from an employer have to be counted as income. We have to see how these two things relate.

Last, but by no means least, we are concerned about the ripple effect. The minister says that at some point maybe the provinces will have also to pay into this fund and probably the municipalities. The municipalities can only get their money from one group of people, and that is from taxpayers, homeowners. We have a problem with that.

While I welcome the fact that you have actually brought in a bill and that it is going to go to study, I want to say to the minister that I hope he is going to be as open-minded in terms of amendments, when we get into the discussion of the bill, as he has been when he wanted us to give support for this matter to go for study.

I hope he will maintain the same generous spirit, brother, when we get down to the short strokes.

PROCEEDS OF CRIME ACT

The House proceeded to the consideration of Bill C-9, an act to facilitate combating the laundering of proceeds of crime, as reported without amendment from Legislative Committee F.

Mr. Steven W. Langdon (Essex—Windsor): Mr. Speaker, I rise on a point of order. I think that you will find, if you examine the amendments which have been put forward with respect to report stage of this bill, that they are all in my name. I would like to withdraw all those motions, with the exception of Motion No. 9, which I would like to continue to have stand.

Let me read the motion to you, then, that would continue to stand:

> That Bill C-9 be amended in Clause 5 by striking out lines 6 to 13 at page 3 and substituting the following therefor:
> "(3) When a regulation under this Act is changed during the 95-day period referred to in subsection 2 above, such regulation shall be published in the Canada Gazette at least 30 days before the proposed effective date thereof".

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): So, the Chair takes into account the request made by the hon. member for Essex—Windsor.

Pursuant to the order of Tuesday June 18, the Speaker will now recognize one speaker from each the three recognized parties to speak for a period not to exceed 10 minutes each, following which the Speaker shall fortwith put all questions necessary to dispose of the report stage and third reading of said bill.

Mr. Gérin: On a point of order, Mr. Speaker.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Deblois): The hon. member for Mégantic—Compton—Stanstead on a point of order.

Mr. Gérin: Mr. Speaker, the order of the House, from last night, in the middle of the night, must be taken integrally. Now that you have accepted the motion of the hon. member for Essex—Windsor, you must allow all the other members, including the independent members, to take the floor.

Mr. Speaker, it is undemocratic that the whips of three parties exclude the independent members, including those of the Bloc Quebecois.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): I remind the hon. member for Mégantic—Compton—Stanstead that he should be careful and use a parliamentary language that is in accordance with tradition.

That being said, Motion No. 9, to which the member for Essex—Windsor is referring to, is part of the report of the committee. It is not necessary here to get anybody's approval.

Mr. Rocheleau: On a point of order, Mr. Speaker. To my knowledge, this report belongs to the House and the decision rests with the House and not mutual agreements concluded between the three parties last night, without the knowledge of Canadians.

I request a declaration from the House on that issue.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): The motion proposed by the member for Essex—Windsor is in accordance with the rules, but the debate on this motion must take place according to the order which is binding for the Chair and which is in the proceedings.

Consequently, I recognize, pursuant to the order, one speaker from each of the recognized parties.

Mr. Lapierre: On a point of order, Mr. Speaker. The question put to you and for which we request a ruling does not have to do with those who will take the floor. We know that ourselves; we read the order and we saw the gimmick. That is not what the question is about.

We want to know if a member can withdraw a motion, like that, without unanimous consent. That is what I want to know.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): I apologize, but we are dealing with technicalities and, once again, the member for Essex-Windsor—I may have used the wrong wording—has not moved a new motion. He is simply indicating that, in the series of motions on the Order Paper, he is only keeping motion no 9.

In that regard, we are authorized, at the report stage, to recognize only three speakers on the motion kept.

• (1900)

Mr. Lapierre: Point of order, Mr. Speaker.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): The hon. member for Shefford on a point of order.

Mr. Lapierre: Mr. Speaker, that is not the point. According to the rules of this House, we have to put forthwith every question necessary, to dispose of proceedings not only those indicated by the hon. member for Essex—Windsor. We want to vote on and dispose of every question and motion before the House, Mr. Speaker. That is the question I raise.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): Order, please. We are again dealing with technicalities. The hon. member for Essex—Windsor has only given notice of his motions. He has not introduced them yet. The hon. member just pointed out to Motion No. 9, and I must say about this motion and all other questions that have to be disposed of on this Bill, that I am bound under the rules of this House to recognize one member of each of the three officially recognized parties.

Mr. Steven W. Langton (Essex—Windsor): I move: Motion No. 9

That Bill C-9 be amended in Clause 5 by striking out lines 6 to 13 at page 3 and substituting the following therefor:

"(3) When a regulation under this Act is changed during the ninety-five day period referred to in subsection (2) above, such regulation shall be published in the Canada Gazette at least thirty days before the proposed effective date thereof."

Mr. Gérin: I rise on a point of order, Mr. Speaker.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): I regret, but, pursuant to Standard Order 30(6), since it is 7 p.m., the House will now proceed to the consideration of Private Members' Business as listed on today's Order Paper.

PRIVATE MEMBERS' BUSINESS

ACCOUNTING OF USE OF RESOURCES

On the Order: Private Members' Business

May 16, 1991—That, in the opinion of this House, the government should require each government department and agency to include in their budget submissions an accounting of the use of resources whose use or disposal has an impact on the environment and annual targets for reduction and to report any associated cost savings.

[Translation]

Mr. Peter Milliken (Kingston and the Islands): I rise on a point of order, Mr. Speaker.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): The hon. member for Kingston and the Islands on a point of order.

Mr. Milliken: Mr. Speaker, the hon. member for Ottawa-West is not available at the moment. I would then ask that the motion—

—be left in its order of precedence, retain its precedence in the Order Paper and accordingly we are unable to proceed with private members' hour at this time.

Mr. Lapierre: I rise on a point of order, Mr. Speaker.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): The hon. member for Shefford on a point of order.

Mr. Lapierre: Mr. Speaker, the member was here a few minutes ago. I do not know if she had something urgent to attend to, but I myself am prepared for this motion. I was advised of it this morning, and I am now ready to proceed with my speech.

[English]

Mr. Hawkes: Mr. Speaker, according to Standing Order 42, I think if the government is willing to accede to the request that comes from the official opposition it can be granted by the Chair. We would suggest that it keep its order of precedence. We make such a request.

[Translation]

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): I want to refer the hon. members to section 42(1) of the Standing Orders. It is stated that: Questions put by members and notices of motions, not taken up when called may (upon the request of the government) be allowed to stand and retain their precedence.

Since, that is the case of motion 473, the government just called the motion will stand.

Mr. Lapierre: Mr. Speaker, I would like for you to explain the meaning of the expression "not taken up". For myself, I am ready to take it up, I am ready to speak, I am available.

Mr. Allmand: But she is not even here to move the motion!

Mr. Lapierre: Someone could do it for her. She was here just three minutes ago.

Mr. Rocheleau: That is what we call cohabitation!

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): Order, please. To open consideration of a motion, the mover must be present in the House to introduce it. The member knows as well as I that it is not the case.

The House resumed consideration of Bill C-9, an Act to facilitate combatting the laundering of proceeds of crime, as reported without amendment from a legislative committee, and the motion of Mr. Langdon (p. 2111).

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): The hon. member for Mégantic—Compton—Stanstead, on a point of order.

Mr. François Gérin (Mégantic—Compton—Stanstead): Mr. Speaker, considering that we gained an hour by not dealing with private members' business because the member was hiding, I move that the House do now adjourn until 8 o'clock, to allow members to see to their business, which could prove more interesting for Quebecers than what is going on now.

I move that the House stands adjourned until 8 o'clock.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): Order, please. As you know, the Chair is bound by the Order of Business as set out in the Order Paper which provides for extended hours to 10.52 tonight. Since there is no other private member's business according to notices on the Order Paper, I have no choice but to pass on to the next order.

Mr. Lapierre: Mr. Speaker, on a point of order, would it be possible for a member, me for instance, to move Mrs. Catterall's motion, given her absence?

An hon. member: No.

Mr. Lapierre: You are not the Speaker!

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): Is there unanimous consent of the House?

Some hon. members: No.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): There is not unanimous consent.

[English]

Mr. Steven W. Langdon (Essex—Windsor): Mr. Speaker, it has been an interesting 20 minutes. We now start to look at the question of money laundering which Bill C-9 deals with. Bill C-9 is an important piece of legislation which requires financial institutions to keep the various paper records which will be essential in the tracing of money laundering operations associated with organized crime.

This attempt to deal with money laundering more effectively is certainly something that we in the New Democratic Party support. We were especially pleased to be able to persuade the government in the course of the previous session of Parliament that it was important in a bill such as this, which leaves so much of the details of what will take place to regulation, to see to it that regulations would not be put into effect until there had been a period of at least 90 days after their publication in the Canada Gazette, during which time people would be able to make presentations to the government with respect to those regulations.

We feel that is an important precedent for future pieces of legislation which have the same reliance on regulations as Bill C-9 does.

We also feel, and I gather that the government is in agreement with us now on this point, that if during that 90-day period there is a change in those regulations which leads to a different set of regulations being put out within that 90-day period for reflection and representation, it shall then be possible still to have a further 30 days for those people who were prepared to accept and to live with the previous regulation to be able to adjust to the regulation change, and to be able to make representations with respect to the change and so on and so forth.

The recommendations which came first to the government for this extended 90-day period and subsequently, were presented to a legislative committee which reviewed this bill, came from the Canadian Bar Association. They represent an important principle in the view of the Bar Association that you should not have regulations put into effect without some period of possibility for dealing with those regulations and responding to those regulations on the part of those who will be affected by the regulations.

We would have preferred to move this particular amendment at the legislative committee stage, but some mix-ups in communication at that stage made it impossible to do so and so we have moved it at report stage on the basis of the representations made to us during the legislative committee hearings by the Canadian Bar Association. It felt this legislation should not proceed without this further 30-day period if there is a change in regulations as a consequence of representations during the 90-day period allowed with respect to the original regulations set out.

With this change, which I understand the government is prepared to accept, there is the possibility that it will be moving a subamendment which will put this particular amendment into conformity with the original piece of legislation; making it 90 days as opposed to 95 days. We would support and accept this change. We think that this now represents a good piece of legislation.

It is a piece of legislation which will make it easier for our police forces to deal with money laundering associated with drug trafficking and with other forms of money laundering. We think it is an important step for the government to be taking. We are pleased that step is being taken as part of a broad series of moves on the part of various countries throughout the world to try to get better control over money laundering in order to deal with the serious problems which it represents and which drug trafficking represents to our society, to our children, and to the world itself.

Mr. Bill Kempling (Parliamentary Secretary to President of the Treasury Board and Minister of State (Finance)): Mr. Speaker, I do not believe I will be taking 10 minutes.

I want to thank the members on the legislative committee for their co-operation. We had a good hearing and we heard some very interesting witnesses. It was the feeling of the members that we could move along and bring this to the House in report stage, get it through report stage and third reading at this sitting.

I am sincerely thankful to the members of the Official Opposition and the New Democratic Party for their co-operation and assistance. It is an example of how we can work together when we really want to.

As the member for Essex—Windsor has said, this is a very important bill and is part of the drug strategy that we have in Canada. We also have an agreement with the G-7 nations to try and track the money laundering or money that is used or acquired in the sale of illegal drugs. It is also part of a United Nations' initiative which is going to grow into, I believe, a very, very important strategy on the part of various governments to control the funds acquired through the sale of illegal drugs.

The member for Essex—Windsor moved Motion No. 9, and I, as he has indicated, intend to amend Motion No. 9 as follows:

> That the motion be amended by deleting the word "95" and substituting therefor, the word "90".

As the member for Essex—Windsor indicated, this will bring Motion 9, which amends C-9, into conformity with the bill.

I think that is about all I can say on it. It is an interesting bill. We had some good briefings from the Canadian bankers, the RCMP and others. I think the initial co-operation of members to pass the bill with a speaker from each party and with the speed with which it was dealt in committee shows the will of the members to get this bill into law as fast as we can.

• (1920)

Mr. Bob Speller (Haldimand—Norfolk): Mr. Speaker, I rise today to speak on Bill C-9 and the amendments put forward by my colleague from the New Democratic Party.

The bill before us would provide for the tracking of money laundering in Canada by requiring Canadian financial institutions to comply with bookkeeping requirements.

The draft regulations published with the bill indicate that any transaction of $10,000 or more would be recorded. The penalties for a violation of the provisions of this legislation would range from fines of $50,000 to $500,000 and prison terms from six months to five years.

As it has been noted by the government, my party has been supportive of the basic aims and intentions of the government with regard to combating and laundering of proceeds of crime. The bill builds on the so-called freeze and seize legislation, Bill C-61, which in addition to giving new powers to both the courts and the police to seize crime proceeds, created the offensive money laundering.

Money laundering is a process by which illegal profits are transformed through financial markets and to legitimate—

[Translation]

Mr. Gilles Rocheleau (Hull—Aylmer): On a point of order, Mr. Speaker.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): Order, please. The hon. member for Hull—Aylmer on a point of order.

Mr. Rocheleau: I would like to have quorum in the House so that I can give a speech that the Canadian people appreciate, but not the hon. members it seems. So, I am calling for a quorum count.

And the count having been taken:

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): There is quorum. The hon. member for Haldimand—Norfolk has the floor.

[English]

Mr. Speller: Mr. Speaker, I thank my hon. friend for his concern.

As I was saying earlier, money laundering is the process by which illegal profits are transformed through financial markets into legitimate funds serving to obscure the real identity of the real owners of the funds and to obscure the nature and the source of these funds.

These activities are being pursued on an international scale and there has been a move afoot in the G-7 and other international forums to develop domestic programs and encourage co-operation to combat this program.

There is little question that a fundamental part of any attempt to control and combat the smuggling of illegal drugs must be the development of effective monitoring and evidence gathering systems in the laundering of drug profits.

There has been general consensus in this country for some time that there are great shortcomings in Canada's financial reporting laws. It has been because of these shortcomings, coupled with our proximity to major drug routes and our large, open border with the United States, that Canada has gained a reputation world-wide as an easy and safe place to launder the profits of illegal activities.

In testimony to the legislative committee studying the bill before us, RCMP officials confirmed that the problem of money laundering in Canada has indeed been a large one. In fact, over $1 billion a year is laundered in Canada through illegal drug practices.

What this has meant is that police agencies, once having identified someone believed to be engaged in criminal activities, were severely hampered in the collection of evidence that might help convict these people. As such, we are very eager on this side of the House for this government to bring down legislation that will correct these matters.

After the disappointment with the government's first attempt in the last session with Bill C-89, we are considerably more satisfied with the bill before us today. We are pleased that the government has given consideration to the shortcomings of the previous bill brought to the attention of this House by members on this side of the House.

The draft regulations accompanying the bill are also an improvement. There are now definitions of cash and of the nature of the records that must be kept. There is still some concern however in our party that too much is left to regulation. As such, the operation of this legislation could change dramatically without being brought before this House, again requiring only an Order in Council.

We do understand the need as was articulated in the committee for flexibility in such a moving area. We recognize that, as many people are engaged in money laundering activities, they are very quick to find and exploit any loophole in the law. We must be just as quick to stop them from doing this.

There also remains a concern that the recording of large transactions will be extended to overseas branches of Canadian banks. We know, for instance, that there is a significant amount of money laundering activity going on in the Caribbean. It is our hope that this will not provide for the significant undermining of our efforts. We are pleased that more countries are joining the effort to curb laundering activities at this time.

I will leave it at that, but I would just like to leave you with a note. We want to send a message to this government and to the people who would do these illegal activities in our country. We as parliamentarians will not stand for this.

[Translation]

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): Pursuant to the order made on Tuesday, June 18, 1991, it is my duty to interrupt the proceedings and to put forthwith every question necessary to dispose of the report stage and third reading of Bill C-9, An Act to facilitate combatting the laundering of proceeds of crime.

The question is on the amendment to the amendment of Mr. Kempling.

Is it the pleasure of the House to adopt the motion?

Some hon. members: Agreed.

Some hon. members: No.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): All those in favour will please say yea.

Some hon. members: Yea.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): All those opposed will please say nay.

Some hon. members: Nay.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): In my opinion, the yeas have it.

And more than five members having risen:

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): Call in the members.

[English]

Mr. Hawkes: I would like to defer the vote until 9.45 p.m.

[Translation]

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): Stop the bells now. Pursuant to Standing Order 40(5)(a), the division stands deferred until 9.45 p.m. tonight.

And the bells having stopped:

Mr. Lapierre: On a point of order, Mr. Speaker.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): The hon. member for Shefford on a point of order.

Mr. Lapierre: Mr. Speaker, there are precedents. Once the bells have started ringing—You know full well, ask your old colleague, the hon. member for Yukon, Mr. Neilsen. We have been through that bell ringing before, Mr. Speaker. Members were called in. You cannot stop that, we are not in a lawless place, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. Kindy: On a point of order, Mr. Speaker.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): The hon. member for Calgary Northeast on a point of order.

Mr. Kindy: Mr. Speaker, once the bells start ringing, I think we cannot stop them. Maybe you could indicate how you go about having them stopped.

• (1930)

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): I am sorry, but the rules are very explicit about that.

An hon. member: Which rule?

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): Standing Order 45(5(a), page 27, latest edition.

(5)(a) When the Speaker has put the question on any debatable motion, including any votable Opposition motion on an allotted day— except as provided pursuant to section (3) of this Standing Order, the bells to call in the Members shall be sounded for not more than thirty minutes—

And carefully note this:

—provided that, while the Members are being called in, either the Chief Government Whip or the Chief Opposition Whip may approach the Speaker to request that the division be deferred—

This is what I have just noticed.

Mr. Gérin: On a point of order, Mr. Speaker.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): The hon. member for Mégantic—Compton—Stanstead, on a point of order.

Mr. Gérin: Mr. Speaker, you are right. Standing Orders state it clearly. But we are now told the division will take place at 9.45 p.m., if I am not mistaken. Can the Chief Government Whip guarantee that the Prime Minister's party, which is being held at 24 Sussex Drive, while Canadians go hungry, will be finished at—

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): Order, please! That was no point of order.

NATIONAL ENERGY BOARD ACT

MEASURE TO AMEND

The House proceeded to the consideration of report stage of Bill C-2, An Act to amend the National Energy Board Act, on which Legislative Committee C reported without amendment.

[English]

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): Pursuant to the order made Tuesday, June 18, 1991, the Chair will now recognize one member from the government party, two members from the Official Opposition, and one member from the New Democratic Party to speak for a period of time not to exceed 10 minutes each, following which the Speaker shall put forthwith all questions necessary to dispose of report stage and third reading of Bill C-2, an act to amend the National Energy Board Act.

Mr. Rocheleau: On a point of order, Mr. Speaker.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): The hon. member for Hull—Aylmer on a point of order.

Mr. Rocheleau: Mr. Speaker, I wish to ask you permission to speak, because Bill C-2 relates to the National Capital—

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): Order. I remind the hon. member for Hull—Aylmer that the Chair is bound by an order of the House unanimously agreed to by the members present and that, after having recognized each of the members named in the motion, if the House unanimously agrees, I will be pleased to recognize the hon. member.

Mr. Gérin: On a point of order, Mr. Speaker.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): The hon. member for Mégantic—Compton—Stanstead on a point of order.

Mr. Gérin: Mr. Speaker, the whips can agree for their own party, but they cannot agree for independent members.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): It is not a point of order. The hon. member knows very well that there is an order of this House and that the Chair is bound by it.

Mr. Rocheleau: On a point of order, Mr. Speaker.

June 20, 1991 [Senate]

That the Joint Committee be empowered to sit during sittings and adjournments of the Senate;

That the Joint Committee be empowered to hold joint hearings with committees of legislatures or with individual members of provincial and territorial legislatures;

That the Joint Committee be empowered to send for persons, papers and records, and to examine witnesses and to print such papers and evidence, from day to day, as may be ordered by the Joint Committee;

That the Joint Committee be empowered to authorize television and radio broadcasting, as it deems appropriate, of any or all of its proceedings and of the proceedings of its sub-committees, pursuant to the principles and practices governing the broadcasting of proceedings of the House of Commons;

That the parties represented on the Joint Committee be granted allocations for expert assistance with the work of the Committee in proportion to representation of the said parties in the House of Commons;

That the Joint Committee be empowered to retain the services of professional, clerical, and stenographic staff as deemed advisable by the Joint Chairs; and

That a Message be sent to the House of Commons to acquaint that House accordingly.

Hon. Allan J. MacEachen (Leader of the Opposition): Honourable senators, I have not had a chance to examine this motion in detail, but I do notice that the motion contains the following paragraph:

That the members, to act for the Senate, on the Joint Committee be named at a later time by the Standing Committee on Selection.

I think it would be very wise to proceed to name these members tomorrow, and I would hope that the government would consider amending the motion with respect to the Senate so that the Senate name the members rather than face the difficulty of going to the Standing Committee on Selection. I just ask the Deputy Leader to give that some consideration.

Senator Doody: Thank you. I will, notwithstanding rule 66(1).

Hon. Gildas L. Molgat: Honourable senators, while the Deputy Leader will be considering other matters, I wonder if he might also consider the paragraph that reads as follows:

That the parties represented on the Joint Committee be granted allocations for expert assistance with the work of the Committee in proportion to representation of the said parties in the House of Commons;

Would it not be better to have the motion say the "representation in both houses," in view of the fact that it is a joint committee?

Senator Doody: It is the same as the wording that was used when the last joint committee was set up, and it was acceptable at that time. However, once again, it can be considered.

[Senator Doody.]

Hon. Thomas H. Lefebvre: Honourable senators, I have a further question for Senator Doody. I was distracted momentarily and perhaps someone else has asked this question. However, it is with regard to the third paragraph. From my parliamentary experience, I thought the resolution would say that the quorum of the joint committee would be thirteen members whenever a vote, resolution or other decision is to be taken. It says "so long as both houses are represented." From my own experience in both houses, that means as long as the major parties are present. In this case, both houses could be represented by only one party. Perhaps Senator Doody could look into having this modified as well.

Senator Doody: I do not think that the recognition of the parties in the context that the honourable senator is referring to has been mentioned in previous resolutions of this type, but I will certainly have it researched.

PROCEEDS OF CRIME (MONEY LAUNDERING) BILL

FIRST READING

The Hon. the Speaker informed the Senate that a message had been received from the House of Commons with Bill C-9, An Act to facilitate combatting the laundering of proceeds of crime.

Bill read the first time.

SECOND READING

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, when shall this bill be read the second time?

Hon. Nathan Nurgitz: Honourable senators, with leave of the Senate and notwithstanding rule 44(1)(f), I move that the bill now be read the second time now.

The Hon. the Speaker: Is leave granted, honourable senators?

Hon. Senators: Agreed.

[English]

Hon. Nathan Nurgitz: Honourable senators, in moving second reading I wish to make a few brief comments on the subject matter of this bill and on the strategy of dealing with this terrible curse.

A national drug strategy was launched by this government in 1987. There have been many initiatives by many governments. I suspect there will be many more initiatives by many more governments because of the evergrowing problem. The objective of the strategy announced in 1987 was to reduce the harmful effects of substance abuse on individuals, families and communities by addressing the supply and demand aspects of the problem in a balanced approach tailored to our own country's needs.

In recent years there has been widespread recognition that to effectively combat drug trafficking and other organized criminal activities, there must be measures in place which will make these activities less profitable. Drug trafficking generates large amounts of cash which must be converted into seemingly legitimate forms. The act of doing that has acquired the term "money laundering". By taking effective action on money laundering, we make these underlying crimes less attractive from a financial point of view and thereby discourage them.

Bill C-61, which amended the Criminal Code, the Food and Drug Act and the Narcotics Control Act, came into effect on January 1, 1989. It was an important milestone in Canada's efforts to combat money laundering. That act made money laundering a criminal offence and it allowed the police authorities, once they had obtained the necessary judicial authorization, to search for and seize property suspected of being the proceeds of crime.

The fight against money laundering must be made with the cooperation of governments and the private sector. For this reason, an Advisory Committee on Money Laundering was established in January 1990 with membership from financial institutions and associations as well as officials from a large array of government departments, including the Department of Finance, the Royal Canadian Mounted Police, the Office of the Superintendent of Financial Institutions and the Federal Department of Justice.

At the first meeting of this advisory committee in February 1990, there was unanimous support for a law requiring that adequate records be kept in order to support the investigation and prosecution of cases of money laundering.

In April of 1990, the report of the G-7 Financial Action Task Force was released. This report contained 40 recommendations to combat money laundering. Although Canada was in substantial compliance with the recommendations, it fell short on the matter of record-keeping. Following further discussion among our own advisory committee and private sector associations, and also following discussions with provincial officials, the government approved the introduction of Bill C-89, which was entitled, "An Act to Facilitate Combating the Laundering of the Proceeds of Crime." C-89 was tabled in October of 1990 but died on the order paper when that session of Parliament prorogued.

The bill was revised and introduced recently in the House of Commons as Bill C-9. The revisions make it clear that intent is required to commit the infraction created in the bill. Changes to the regulations will be prepublished in the Canada Gazette at least three months before they are finalized. Finally, the scope of the regulation-making powers of the government with respect to determining the accuracy of the information contained in records is limited to identification of clients. All of these changes are consistent with the intent of the original bill, but actually, I might say, serve to improve it.

There have been a number of other important initiatives in the fight against the drug problem in our country. Canadian financial institutions such as the chartered banks and the major trust companies have developed internal programs against money laundering. These programs include employee training and the recognition of suspected instances of money laundering, which can then be referred to law enforcement agencies such as the RCMP for further investigation. Similar programs have been or are being developed through the financial services industry.

The office of the Superintendent of Financial Institutions, which is responsible for the supervision of federally chartered financial institutions, has issued a paper entitled Best Practices for Deterring and Detecting Money Laundering. This paper contains guidelines for financial institutions covering such matters as how to deal with suspicious transactions. In addition, a review of anti-money laundering procedures and practices forms a part of the regular review of that department of all federally supervised financial institutions.

Honourable senators, on July 5, 1990 Canada ratified the United Nations Convention Against Illicit Traffic in Narcotic Drugs and Psychotropic Substances. That is referred to as the Vienna Convention. The Canadian government has also passed legislation, Bill C-58, enabling the negotiation of Mutual Legal Assistance Treaties. These treaties are designed to facilitate international co-operation among law enforcement authorities in dealing with criminal activities.

In conclusion, I would note the government's belief that the fight against money laundering requires a partnership and co-operation between various sectors in our society—governmental and private sector. For this reason the government will continue the ongoing dialogue with the private sector and with provincial governments in order to ensure that Canada's measures against money laundering, already considered by many to be reasonably advanced in the world, remain up to date and effective.

Honourable senators, it would be my intention, assuming this bill receive second reading, to ask that it be referred to the Committee of the Whole later this day.

Hon. Allan J. MacEachen (Leader of the Opposition): Honourable senators, I want to ask a question with respect to the stage we are at. I understand that the Senate gave consent to give second reading to this bill later this day. We are now on second reading, which would place us under Orders of the Day, but we have not called the other items that would get us to the Orders of the Day. I think we should regularize our procedure so that we get to the Orders of the Day in the proper way and not make a leap over all these other items. If we are to proceed to second reading, we had better go through the Order Paper.

Hon. C. William Doody (Deputy Leader of the Government): Senator MacEachen is perfectly correct; we are on routine proceedings. There is some time for us to continue with routine proceedings and then we continue on with the regular Orders of the Day and government business as called. Perhaps we could suspend debate on this bill until later this day, and Mr. Speaker could continue with the messages under the routine proceedings.

The Hon. the Speaker: Is that agreed?

Hon. Senators: Agreed.

Debate suspended.

GOODS AND SERVICES TAX

PRESENTATION OF PETITIONS

Hon. Royce Frith (Deputy Leader of the Opposition): Honourable senators I have some petitions. We continue to be showered by them. When I say that, I am not complaining.

[The Hon. the Speaker.]

Today I have the usual form of petition against the GST and in favour of an early election to correct its iniquities and others inflicted by this government on the people of Canada.

The people of Canada presenting petitions today are represented, first, from Ontario. One petition comes from Toronto and Don Mills and contains 22 names. Then from Quebec I have two petitions today, honourable senators. They come from St. Damase, St. Clothilde, Arthabaska, St. Albert, St. Valere, St. Eulalie, Victoriaville, Danville and Montreal. The total number of names on those petitions is 40 . All of them are signed, of course. That means that the grand total of petitions is three, one from Ontario and two from Quebec; and the total number of names is 62, 40 from Quebec and 22 from Ontario.

QUESTION PERIOD

THE SENATE

ABSENCE OF GOVERNMENT LEADER FROM CHAMBER

Hon. C. William Doody (Deputy Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, Senator Murray is at a cabinet meeting at the present time. He has indicated that he will be present at 2 o'clock and, if honourable senators wish to have a question period at that time, he is quite prepared.

Senator MacEachen: We will carry on in the normal way.

On the Order:

Resuming the debate on the motion by the Honourable Senator Nurgitz, seconded by the Honourable Senator Macquarrie, for the second reading of Bill C-9, and Act to facilitate combatting the laundering of proceeds of crime.

Hon. Richard J. Stanbury: He said: Honourable senators, the bill before us which Senator Nurgitz has introduced so well, Bill C-9, entitled "An Act to facilitate combatting the laundering of proceeds of crime," is a very strong bill and one which has benefited from all-party agreement in the other place. The intention of the bill is to discourage the use of Canada's financial system by criminals and to ensure there is adequate opportunity for police to carry out the appropriate investigations and subsequent prosecutions that have been allowed for in this and other recent legislation.

Specifically, the bill was designed to inhibit the flow of illicit drug funds. It would establish, for the first time in Canada, record-keeping requirements in the financial field. Honourable senators will recall that the legislation that we passed earlier did not require this record-keeping; it was left to the financial institutions to police themselves.

Honourable senators may know that Bill C-9 is essentially the same as Bill C-89 which was introduced into the house last year. For those honourable senators who are familiar with Bill C-89, which died on the House of Commons order paper at prorogation and which had some problems, I am pleased to assure you that this current bill represents improvement in those areas that were identified as problematic in the last bill.

Clauses 2, 4 and 5 set out the record-keeping requirements for financial institutions to be installed into the Criminal Code, Food and Drugs Acts and the Narcotics Control Act. Clause 3 broadens the definition of financial institutions subject to record-keeping requirements to include non-banks such as life insurance companies, trust companies, security brokers and other similar institutions.

Portions of clauses 5 and 6 reflect some of the changes made in this bill from Bill C-89. For instance, Bill C-9 has made requirements for identifying customers more specific and workable. As well, the bill adds the term "knowingly" to the definition of the offence. The intention is to ensure that inadvertent violations of the law would not be subject to the serious punishment proposed in the bill.

Draft regulations have not as yet been introduced with Bill C-9. Department of Finance officials have indicated that these will be changed from those that accompanied Bill C-89 which have been subject to some objections. I am sure the joint committee will do the necessary monitoring of these new regulations.

I would recommend that all honourable senators support this bill and that it proceed to discussion in Committee of the Whole.

Motion agreed to and bill read second time.

The Hon. the Speaker: When shall this bill be read the third time?

REFERRED TO COMMITTEE OF THE WHOLE

Hon. Nathan Nurgitz: I move that the bill be referred to Committee of the Whole later this day.

The Hon. the Speaker: Is it your pleasure, honourable senators, to adopt the motion?

Hon. Senators: Agreed.

Motion agreed to.

NATIONAL ENERGY BOARD ACT

BILL TO AMEND—SECOND READING

Hon. Pat Carney moved the second reading of Bill C-2, to amend the National Energy Board Act.

She said: Honourable senators, I should like to make a few clarifying remarks about the intent of this bill. You will recall that on February 26, 1991, the Hon. Michael Wilson announced in the budget speech the Government of Canada's decision to relocate the National Energy Board from Ottawa to Calgary. Bill C-2, a bill to amend the National Energy Board Act, will make it possible for the government to follow through with these plans.

By way of introduction, many honourable senators know that the National Energy Board was created by an act of Parliament in 1959. For the first time, an independent tribunal was created to provide advice to the federal government on certain major energy matters drawing heavily on evidence put before it at public hearings.

The board wields a broad range of regulatory authorities including the licensing of the export of oil, gas and electricity, the issuance of certificates for international interprovincial pipelines and international power lines, and the setting of just and reasonable tolls for pipelines under federal jurisdiction.

In addition to these regulatory responsibilities, the board, at the specific request of the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources, serves as a provider of expert advice and information to the government on energy issues and energy markets.

These amendments to the National Energy Board Act contained in Bill C-2 will in no way affect the board's regulatory stature or mandate. The purpose of the legislation is to allow the National Energy Board of Canada to relocate from Ottawa to Calgary; nothing more and nothing less.

Why Calgary? Calgary is generally accepted as the centre of Canada's oil and gas industry. The board spends by far the largest portion of its time dealing with oil and gas related issues. For these reasons alone, most Canadians—and this includes members of both opposition parties as reflected in their comments in the House of Commons on second reading—viewed the relocation to Calgary as a relatively straightforward and sensible decision.

It is important, however, to recognize that there is a much broader context for this move. Western Canadians in particular have increasingly felt that their problems were not always well understood in Ottawa and that decisions were sometimes taken without a full appreciation of their views and perspectives. National policy must be seen, particularly at this time, to be responsive to the aspirations of Canada's regions for a fuller participation in our national life and greater proximity to the making of decisions which will shape their economic future.

Some have alleged that moving the NEB will somehow throw into question the integrity and impartiality of its decisions. This argument, however, is totally preposterous and insults the intelligence of the audience, in particular, western Canadians, and of the board's staff.

The board will continue to hold its public hearings in centres right across Canada in close proximity to the major impact of the project and where public concerns are the greatest. The government is managing the relocation in a manner which is fair to the board's employees, the industry and taxpayers who share the financial burden of the move.

I am not taking a holier-than-thou attitude, I assure you, because when I was in the government I did issue licences for the sale of arms, under the stringent controls that we had in place and now have in place. But it seems to me that in these circumstances we ought to give some signal to the world that we are not ready and we are not eager to join in the sale of arms, particularly to the Middle East, and to join in the sale of arms to Saudi Arabia, which is in the very centre of this area of tension. We cannot support this bill. We will not support it because of the concerns which I have stated in my short remarks.

Hon. Royce Frith (Deputy Leader of the Opposition): Honourable senators, I want to add a word about how much I support what Senator MacEachen has said and why I cannot support this bill. The reasons expressed by Senator MacEachen are quite adequate reasons, but I want to piggyback a voice, perhaps in the wilderness, citing this as another example of the continued use of euphemistic terms to describe the arms trade and the defence industry.

I believe that the arms trade is a mean, inhuman business. I think most people engaged in it realize that it is and, therefore, ease their consciences by using euphemistic expressions to describe it. The purpose of the arms trade is to produce arms, and arms are tools to kill and wound people. They do not exist to demolish buildings and replace buildings. They sometimes have the effect of demolishing buildings, but they are there to kill people. However, no one seems to say so any more. They use euphemistic words like anti-personnel devices. Well, the anti-personnel device exists, like all weapons, to kill people or to threaten them.

Senator Doody: Collateral damage.

Senator Frith: Yes, collateral damage is another beautiful euphemism. The word "defence industry" means the manufacture and sale of arms to kill people. When one talks about the defence industry one does not mean building an industry to defend ourselves against some attack that will happen tomorrow or at any time that we can articulate. The word "defence" does not mean defence any more; it is simply another euphemism, another attempt to create some sort of mask for the arms trade and for the manufacture of tools to kill people.

I support entirely the analysis and all of the points made by Senator MacEachen, but I just want to add that in my view it would be useful for us to face the fact that when we use these euphemistic terms, we are not talking about anti-personnel devices and "defence", but about devices to kill and wound people and create all the consequences described by Senator MacEachen which flow from that.

I believe that Canada's legislation in this area should not be making exemptions to a structure that puts us in the forefront of nations with strict policies against the arms trade. It should be legislation toward conversion to peaceful uses of these industries that, if we are honest, are designed and committed to the production and proliferation of weapons destined for the killing or intimidation of other human beings.

Motion agreed to and bill read second time, on division.

REFERRED TO COMMITTEE

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, when shall this bill be read the third time?

On motion of Senator Kelleher, bill referred to the Standing Senate Committee on Foreign Affairs.

BUSINESS OF THE SENATE

Hon. C. William Doody (Deputy Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, I intend to move that the Senate go into Committee of the Whole to consider the matters referred to it today, namely, the money laundering bill and the National Energy Board bill.

Hon. Allan J. MacEachen (Leader of the Opposition): When the work of the Committee of the Whole is completed, government orders will have been completed. What is the intention then for today? I know we have business for tomorrow.

Senator Doody: It is the intention, after the business of the Senate is concluded today, to adjourn until nine o'clock tomorrow morning.

Honourable senators, I should like to refer back to the bill which was just under discussion. I am told that the Foreign Affairs Committee has made arrangements to hear the Minister at eight o'clock this evening.

CONSIDERED IN COMMITTEE OF THE WHOLE

Hon. C. William Doody (Deputy Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, I move that the Senate resolve itself into a Committee of the Whole to consider Bill C-9, to facilitate combatting the laundering of proceeds of crime.

The Hon. the Speaker: It is agreed, honourable senators?

Some Hon. Senators: Agreed.

The Senate was accordingly adjourned during pleasure and put into a Committee of the Whole on Bill C-9, Senator Rhéal Bélisle in the Chair.

Senator Doody: I would ask that the Honourable Minister Loiselle be invited to participate in the deliberations of the Committee of the Whole. The minister has two officials with him and I would ask leave to admit them as well.

The Chairman: Honourable senators, while the minister is being brought in with his aides, I wish to thank you for giving me the opportunity to chair the Committee of the Whole. Since this is the first time that we are sitting under the new rules, may I bring to your attention rule 65 (1) (a) and (b):

(1) The Rules of the Senate shall apply to Committee of the Whole with the following exceptions:

(a) a Senator may speak any number of times;.

(b) during debate in Committee of the Whole no senator shall speak for more than ten minutes at any one time;

And there are other rules on pages 64 and 65. It is my intention to recognize those who will raise their hands and I will recognize take them as I see their hands up.

Pursuant to rule 18 of the Rules of the Senate, the Honourable Gilles Loiselle, President of the Treasury Board and Minister of State (Finance); Mr. Yvon Carrière, Counsel, Text Counsel Division, Department of Finance; and Mr. James F. McCollum, Chief Industry Analyst Senior Sector Policy Branch, Department of Finance, were escorted to seats in the Senate chamber.

Senator Doody: Honourable senators, I am pleased to introduce the Minister, Mr. Loiselle, who will be pleased to answer any questions that honourable senators might have. I understand that he does not have an opening statement but is available for questioning.

I should also like to introduce Mr. James McCollum, Chief Industry Analyst, Senior Sector Policy Branch of the Department of Finance; and Mr. Yvon Carrière, Counsel, Text Counsel Division of the Department of Finance.

Senator Frith: What are we on?

Senator Doody: Bill C-9, the Money Laundering Bill.

The Chairman: Honourable senators, the Senate is in Committee of the Whole on Bill C-9, an act to facilitate combatting the laundering of proceeds of crime.

Shall the title be postponed?

Senator Frith: I think we will have some questions first, before we proceed to a clause-by-clause study.

Senator Stanbury: Mr. Chairman, may I ask the minister some questions?

The Chairman: Yes, you may.

Senator Doody: We will have some questions, Mr. Chairman, before we proceed to the clause-by-clause study.

The Chairman: Does the minister have any opening statement?

Senator Doody: No.

Senator Stanbury: Mr. Minister, all of us appreciate the fact that this bill has finally come to us. We have read clause 2 of the bill, which sets out the object and application of the proposed act. It would be only fair for us to point out that the Standing Senate Committee on Legal and Constitutional Affairs made a strong recommendation, when it was dealing with the Criminal Code amendments which came considerably earlier, that this kind of legislation should have been introduced at that time; so that it does not sit well with us to criticize this act very much, because it is doing what we said should be done some time ago.

There are several things that I should like to ask about the wording of the bill and the application of it as I understand it.

Proposed section 3 substantially broadens the definition of financial institutions. The only problem I see with it is that it opens the door substantially to the government to develop its own definition of to whom it is intending to apply the proposed act. For example, clause 3(h) will let businesses or professions be added by regulation. We have no regulations, so they will not know whether or not they are covered. There is no provision for notice to them other than the publication in the Canada Gazette. It concerns me that there may well be businesses or professions added to the regulations without their realizing they have been added, and therefore will not begin making their records until some issue arises. Can you give us any satisfaction in terms of this problem?

Mr. Loiselle: Thank you, senator. You said that you should have come forward some time ago with regard to this particular bill. I should like to inform you that we have been consulting extensively with financial institutions, the private sector and the provinces in order to ensure that what we were doing was acceptable, efficient and covered the areas that we wanted to cover.

Referring to the definition of the institutions or people to be eventually targeted by this legislation, at the present time it is clear that we are dealing with the banks, the credit unions, Caisse Populaires, life insurance companies, trust and loan companies, securities firms and foreign exchange houses. Inasmuch as money laundering is an ongoing crime that evolves, we want to retain the capacity to act should the RCMP or other enforcement authorities indicate to us that there is a need to extend it.

At the present time we indicate in the bill that it would cover the professionals who handle large sums of money. We have been in touch with and have consulted and discussed—and I personally have consulted with representatives of the legal profession, who are now satisfied that what we are doing is acceptable. They were worried that the relationship between solicitor and client would be affected by this bill, but it is not; also, the intent had to be there. We covered that. Presently we are there. We want to retain capacity to extend to other professions or other groups should indications arise that they have become used more and more for money laundering purposes.

Senator Stanbury: I can understand your need to have flexibility in the matter, but the problem for me is that you are not obliged to let people know in advance that they are involved. Yet clause 4 goes on to say that they have to keep certain records. How will they know whether they are supposed to keep certain records if you are able to add their professions at a particular time when an issue arises, when they have not realized that they were to be added before that?

Mr. Loiselle: You raise a valid point. In the regulations you will have a prepublication. We will do with the new groups what we have done with the institutions. We started with the institutions because they had already been identified as vehicles for the money laundering; but there would be consultation and then prepublication. We would be sure that these groups are fully aware of their legal responsibility. To us, that is important.

Senator Stanbury: That is an important aspect of it. We will have to depend upon the Joint Committee on the Scrutiny of Regulations to draw to our attention anything that seems to be outlandish.

Senator Frith: May I ask a supplementary question?

Senator Stanbury: Yes.

Mr. Loiselle: Before you do, may I indicate immediately that we do share this concern? It is our intention to address this problem with great care because we realize that we cannot immediately move to a new target group and try to catch them off guard. We will have to give them the time to adjust and make information available.

• (1200)

Senator Frith: However, the effectiveness of the regulation and the imposition of responsibility that flows from it will not be dependent or conditional upon notice having been given and received?

Mr. Loiselle: That is right.

Senator Frith: The imposition of the responsibility to which Senator Stanbury and the minister have been referring will take place even in the absence of such notice, unlike, for example, in any official imposition of responsibility by a court where one has to give notice to the person affected. And as for the imposition of an injunction, one has to prove that the person knew its terms and application, which is not—

Mr. Loiselle: A precondition.

Senator Frith: The imposition of the obligation is not conditional upon notice having been given and received. First, is that correct, Mr. Minister? Second, if it is correct, is that the area in which you will be exploring improvement?

Mr. Loiselle: We will use the ordinary or usual means of doing that, apart from the consultation process. These things move very quickly. Whenever we talk about lawyers, for example, representatives of the profession—and very rightly so—immediately ask to discuss matters with us. They have their own journals, so that the information gets out to their members. I repeat that a notice will be published in the Canada Gazette for at least 90 days before the regulation takes effect. That, having been preceded by discussion, consultation and information, should allow us to feel confident that these people will be—

Senator Frith: If anything like that falls between the cracks, the person will be covered and responsible even though he may not have known; is that right?

Mr. Loiselle: Indeed. Once the publication—

Senator Frith: In other words, for the obligation to be imposed, you do not have to prove that notice was given, or that notice was taken?

Mr. Loiselle: The 90-day prepublication will be a legal obligation.

Senator Frith: I understand. You will not go any further than that?

Senator Stanbury: I realize this is not connected, but I thought that perhaps I should draw it to the attention of the minister. Under, Offences and Punishment, clause 6, it states, "Everyone who knowingly contravenes . . .". I assume that that does not refer to knowing that they have such a responsibility, but a question of knowing they were in breach of the act.

Senator Loiselle: You are right, senator.

Senator Stanbury: I keep coming back to the regulations since our main concern is that there are so many open doors and that careful monitoring will be required. For instance, clause 4, which is the essence of the bill, states:

> Everyone to whom this Act applies shall keep and retain records relating to financial activities in accordance with the regulations made under subsection 5(1).

Yet we do not know what those records, the extent or nature of them, will be.

Mr. Loiselle: The regulations will determine what the record-keeping obligations are. They will be established in a similar fashion, I suppose, to those that have already been established in financial institutions, something which was done at their request. I do not see any particular difficulty there. We have to reconcile the full need of the law enforcement agency, in particular the RCMP and other police forces, to have the information they need and, at the same time, the desire not to impose on any institution, group or professional the need to keep useless information that can become very costly. That has not proven to be a difficulty. I would say that most professions keep this information in any case. What is important is the way in which they organize it so that it can be accessed in a more useful and practical way. Again, I do not think that should be too much of a problem. It will be discussed with the groups which will become target groups, and the regulations would provide for that. The draft regulations are presently and publicly available.

Senator Stanbury: I have not had an opportunity to look at the regulations that were developed under Bill C-89, which died at the end of the last session of Parliament. Will the regulations be roughly the same in that particular area?

Mr. Loiselle: I am told that they will be pretty well the same.

Senator Stanbury: Mr. Minister, under clauses 5(1)(a) and 5(1)(d)—and I am thinking now about the measures that are to be used to identify customers or clients who should not be dealt with in these circumstances—I find something rather troublesome. Can you give us any indication as to how that will be determined? How are people to identify the customers and clients with whom they should not be dealing ?

Mr. Loiselle: Mr. Chairman, I would ask Mr. McCollum to respond, if he may.

Mr. James McCollum, Chief Industry Analyst, Senior Sector Policy Branch, Department of Finance: Honourable senators, the current draft regulations call for client identification in keeping with sound business practices. In keeping with what is standard currently in the industry, for example, in the case of a bank, we are basically concerned with the bank knowing its client. The same applies to the other industries involved.

Senator Kinsella: May I ask a supplementary question? Under clause 5(1)(d) and the regulatory power that the act is to provide, banks can be required to take steps to ascertain the identity of these persons. Can you give us some practical examples, sir? Will you use ordinary means to impose upon the banks or co-operatives measures to know with whom they are dealing in order to identify these people; or will there be extraordinary means such as the use of surveillance?

Mr. Loiselle: No, senator, not at all. The banks themselves, and all financial institutions, have in place a policy within their branch networks to know their clients. If someone comes in with a large sum of money, the banker should have a normal curiosity about that money, unless he has been dealing with that person and knows that he is a businessman who comes in every Friday with a certain amount of cash from his company. So the banks get to know their clients, and they accept that. It is a general definition of a normal kind of relationship with clients. No one comes into a bank with $2 million and drops it on a desk without the banker asking, "So, where does this come from?" The banker wants to know who these people are. It is the ordinary responsibility of institutions to know their clients. This is accepted in the industry without too much difficulty.

Senator Neiman: Mr. Chairman, I have a couple of questions. I received on my desk this morning the June edition of the National, the publication of the Canadian Bar Association. In it was an insert called "Ottawa Report", which is prepared by the Legal and Governmental Affairs Committee of the Canadian Bar Association. You will be happy to know, Mr. Minister, that it says, "C-89 is dead. Long live C-9." I have read through this report, and the gist of it is that the Canadian Bar Association is extremely happy with the changes that have been made in C-9 as compared to the contents of C-89. One thing the report mentions is that C-89 established recording requirements for transactions of $10,000 or more. I have looked through C-9 quickly and I do not see any figures cited. I assume that they will be established by the regulations. How will this be made clear to everyone who might be affected by the bill?

Mr. Loiselle: The United States has an approach whereby all institutions have to report to the agency and other people who have to look at these reports. The international community has looked at this approach and found that it does not produce the results that were expected when that provision was implemented. With this rule anyone can come in at $9,999, just push it through and they do not have a problem anymore. We want all transactions to be reported. So it will be defined in the regulation, but there will not be a number under which you do not report. All transactions will have to be recorded. So if there is a need for the authority, through the proper process of access—a judge who will give access to the information—it will be easier to find a trace, instead of having to go through a room full of documents from all over the place that you do not know what to do with, and that you may work on for a long time without finding a lead. The regulations will define the transaction but there will be no $10,000 limit.

Senator Neiman: Again, this "Ottawa Report" states on behalf of the Canadian Bar Association that the association is quite satisfied with whatever the definition will be as regards the responsibility of lawyers to report just those matters not defined as lawful client transactions. I wonder how that protection will extend to the other groups that you may define under those sections of the act to which Senator Stanbury and Senator Kinsella referred.

Mr. Loiselle: To be precise, it is not reporting. Institutions or lawyers have to keep records of transactions in their offices. In the case of lawyers, because they do not deal as frequently with this kind of thing, anything above $10,000 has to be recorded. So if a transaction by a certain person becomes suspicious, after accessing the information through the legal process, there will be a trace. So they have to keep a record. It will be the same for other groups, such as car dealers, if we find that they have become targets for money launderers.

Senator Neiman: I have one short question. We were given this morning a copy of a motion introduced by Mr. Langdon in the other place amending clause 5 of the bill. I do not understand it. There is simply written on the bottom "Agreed June 19, 1991" and a signature that I cannot identify. Is this an amendment to the act or is it simply a motion that did not carry?

Mr. Loiselle: It is an amendment that was accepted. Basically, it changes the numbers, but not to a point that would cause any particular problem.

Senator Stanbury: Mr. Chairman, I have one further question. There has been some concern expressed in connection with the act about the definition of the word "person". Clause 7 says:

> Where a corporation commits an offence under section 6, any officer, director or agent of the corporation who directed, authorized, assented to . . . is a party to and guilty of the offense . . .

What about other businesses? For instance, is a junior lawyer, what they now call "an associate", responsible and liable to be convicted of this offence? Generally speaking, what about people in relatively minor roles in other professions or businesses?

Mr. Loiselle: I am told that the law will apply only if they are incorporated.

Senator Stanbury: So, in terms of unincorporated businesses, let us say limited partnerships, associations or professional firms, each person is individually responsible; is that true?

Mr. Loiselle: Yes.

Senator Stanbury: Regardless of their position in the firm or business?

Mr. Loiselle: Indeed.

Senator Stanbury: I thought it would be useful to have that clarification on record.

Mr. Chairman, those are my questions.

The Chairman: Are there any other questions?

Mr. Loiselle: Mr. Chairman, if I may, I would like to thank you for having received me today. It is always a pleasure to come to this house.

The Chairman: Thank you for coming.

Honourable senators, shall the title be postponed?

Hon. Senators: Agreed.

The Chairman: Shall the short title stand?

The Chairman: Shall clause 1, the short title, carry again?

Hon. Senators: Carried.

The Chairman: Honourable senators, shall I report the bill without amendment?

Hon. Senators: Agreed.

Senator Doody: Mr. Chairman, before the Committee of the Whole reports the bill, I would suggest that the Committee of the Whole remain in session and that we now proceed to Bill C-2. Then both bills can be reported at the same time.

Therefore, with leave of the Senate, I would ask that Mr. Epp and his officials be invited to join us in Committee of the Whole.

The Chairman: Is it agreed, honourable senators?

Hon. Senators: Agreed.

NATIONAL ENERGY BOARD ACT

BILL TO AMEND—CONSIDERED IN COMMITTEE OF THE WHOLE

The Chairman: Honourable senators, the Committee of the Whole will now consider Bill C-2, to amend the National Energy Board Act.

Senator Doody: Honourable senators, I would welcome the Honourable Mr. Jake Epp to our committee. He has agreed to answer questions on Bill C-2. He has with him two officials and I would ask him to introduce them. I believe he has a short opening statement.

Hon. Jake Epp, Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources: Honourable senators, although I have a prepared statement, I will not read it; rather, I will give you the general background to Bill C-2.

As all of you are aware, the National Energy Board was created in 1959. Its purpose was to regulate not only the oil and gas industry but also the export of energy both interprovincially and internationally. The National Energy Board has gone through a number of changes over the last several years, not the least of which is that it received environmental responsibilities in the last mandate of this government.

The location of the National Energy Board has been a matter of debate in the country from many years. About 80 per cent of the National Energy Board's activities are now related to the oil and gas sector and, while that may vary slightly from year to year, depending on the types of applications before the NEB relating to the mix between oil and gas particularly, and electricity and electricity exports, that is about the average percentage.

There have been resolutions before the houses for the moving of the National Energy Board dating back to the early 1970s. In fact, if we go back to the inception of the board, there was debate even then as to what should be the location of the board.

With the changes in administration and in the purpose of the NEB, intervenors and applicants were to pay, on a cost-return basis, the costs of the board, and with 80 per cent of the board's work being in the oil and gas field, it became important to reduce costs to those making application before the board.

The Acting Chairman (Mr. Sobeski (Cambridge)): Order, please.

There are some motions that we would like to discuss. However, lacking a quorum, we will move the motions when Mr. Soetens arrives.

Pursuant to Standing Order 108.(2), an inquiry into the closure of the Bank of Credit and Commerce Canada and other related matters, our first witnesses this morning are from the Royal Canadian Mounted Police. Inspector Bruce Bowie is the Officer in Charge of the Anti-Drug Profiteering Section, and Superintendent George Kaine is the Officer in Charge of the Criminal Operation Branch.

If you gentlemen have opening statements and would like to make those, you can start when you are ready.

Superintendent George Kaine (Officer in Charge, Criminal Operation Branch, Economic Crime Directorate, Royal Canadian Mounted Police): Thank you, Mr. Chairman. I would first like to say how pleased we are to assist the committee with its work. I would like to ask Inspector Bowie to make a preliminary statement concerning money laundering in general and then, with your permission, Mr. Chairman, I would like to make some comments about the co-operation and some of the tools and the monitoring that goes on in law enforcement in Canada.

Inspector Bruce Bowie, (Officer in Charge, Anti-Drug Profiteering Section, Drug Enforcement Directorate, Royal Canadian Mounted Police): Mr. Chairman, members of the committee, we have been asked to appear today in order to brief the committee on money laundering activities in Canada and abroad as well as the means used to monitor this activity. The profits available from the traffic in illicit drugs represent a double-edged threat to the success of conventional enforcement measures. On the one hand, the potential for profit is a motivating factor that encourages new entrants to the drug trade. On the other hand, the criminal organization with accumulated financial resources is able to finance sophisticated importation and distribution networks as well as being able to absorb periodic enforcement actions.

As a result, since 1981 the RCMP has focused on attacking the profits derived from the drug trade as well as the drug offences. An essential aspect of the organized drug trade is money laundering, the process whereby cash from illegal activities is converted to an alternate form in a manner that conceals its origins, ownerships or other potentially incriminating factors. Criminal organizations often employ sophisticated techniques to accomplish this, including moving moneys through several offshore financial havens in an effort to conceal the audit trail of the money flow. Banks and other financial institutions remain the common carrier of money, including drug moneys. The trafficker is faced with the

Nous devons discuter de certaines motions. Cependant, étant donné qu'il n'y a pas quorum, nous allons reporter cette discussion jusqu'à l'arrivée de M. Soetens.

Conformément à l'article 108(2) du Règlement, examen de la fermeture de la Banque de crédit et de commerce Canada et d'autres sujets connexes, nos premiers témoins ce matin représentent la Gendarmerie royale du Canada. L'inspecteur Bruce Bowie est officier responsable de la Section des enquêtes sur les profits des trafiquants et le surintendant George Kaine est sous-directeur des Affaires criminelles.

Si vous avez des remarques préliminaires à faire, je vous prie de bien vouloir commencer dès que vous serez prêt.

Le surintendant George Kaine (sous-directeur des Affaires criminelles, Direction de la police économique, Gendarmerie royale du Canada): Merci, monsieur le président. Je tiens d'abord à dire à quel point nous sommes heureux de pouvoir aider le comité dans ses travaux. Je cède maintenant la parole à l'inspecteur Bowie qui fera quelques remarques préliminaires sur le blanchissage de l'argent en général, puis, si vous le permettez, monsieur le président, je ferai quelques observations sur la collaboration et sur les outils de contrôle dont dispose la police au Canada.

L'inspecteur Bruce Bowie (officier responsable de la Section des enquêtes sur les profits des trafiquants, Direction de la police des drogues, Gendarmerie royale du Canada): Monsieur le président, membres du comité, on nous a demandé de faire aujourd'hui un exposé sur le blanchissage de l'argent, tant au Canada qu'à l'étranger, et sur les méthodes utilisées afin de surveiller ces activités. Les profits tirés du trafic des stupéfiants compromettent doublement le succès des mesures de répression conventionnelles: d'une part, l'appât du gain est un facteur incitatif certain pour les criminels dans l'âme; d'autre part, l'organisation criminelle qui a su accumuler des richesses est en mesure de financer des réseaux d'importation et de distribution complexes, et aussi d'absorber les pertes périodiques attribuables aux interventions de la police.

La GRC a donc résolu, dès 1981, de s'attaquer aux profits générés par le trafic des stupéfiants et comme aux autres infractions liés aux drogues. Un aspect essentiel du trafic organisé des stupéfiants est le recyclage de l'argent, un procédé qui consiste à transformer l'argent liquide provenant d'activités illicites de manière à en dissimuler l'origine, la propriété et tous autres facteurs potentiellement incriminants. Pour ce faire, les criminels recourent bien souvent à des moyens assez subtils, dont le transfert de l'argent dans des refuges fiscaux à l'étranger, afin de bien brouiller les pistes. La banque, avec d'autres institutions financières, demeure le transporteur public de l'argent, y problem of placing cash into the banking system without generating speculation as to its origin. Large quantities of cash tend to generate suspicion.

A common device used to deposit moneys into financial institutions involves the employment of "smurfs", money couriers of innocuous appearance who make large numbers of small transactions at various financial institutions. In this manner, large quantities of cash can enter the banking system without attracting undue attention. Once in the banking system, drug moneys can be transferred almost instantaneously to any point on the globe.

We have noticed a significant increase in the criminal use of small currency exchange houses, many of which maintain no records whatever of individual transactions or clients. In effect, these businesses serve as intermediaries between the criminal and the conventional banking system. The increased use of currency exchanges and certain professions to facilitate laundering of criminal proceeds coincided with the heightened efforts of the Canadian banks to identify suspicious transactions.

Traffickers will often use domestic business organizations to launder drug moneys. Firms that traditionally involve cash transactions such as vending machines, arcades, and retail stores are popular.

The use of offshore tax haven countries in the laundering process and as repositories for drug moneys has traditionally been a popular device for traffickers of all levels. In choosing an offshore destination for his moneys, the launderer will seek certain attributes. These include bank secrecy laws, little or no tax on certain sources of income, the ease in setting up a foreign-owned corporation, accessibility, and political and monetary stability.

The key to effective use of offshore facilities to launder money is to move the funds in such a manner as to distort or destroy any audit trail that the authorities could track, either forward to the ultimate recipient or backwards to the criminal origin of the funds. To accomplish this the launderer will often utilize dummy corporations and financial institutions in several foreign jurisdictions.

Money laundering investigations tend to be very complex, especially in cases involving foreign jurisdictions. Legislative improvements, both domestic and foreign, have been positive developments in our efforts to attack this problem. We rely heavily on co-operation from the financial sector in initiating investigations. Timely reporting of suspicious transactions to the police is a key consideration. Our co-operative relationships with foreign authorities are also critical elements.

I will endeavour to answer any questions you may have concerning the money laundering situation. Thank you.

compris les narco-dollars. Le trafiquant se voit dans l'obligation de confier son argent au système bancaire sans ouvrir la voie aux conjectures, quant à son origine; les sommes importantes éveillent les soupçons.

Pour déposer des capitaux dans les établissements bancaires, on a souvent recours aux «schtroumpfs», c'est-à-dire à des passeurs au-dessus de tout soupçon, pour effectuer un grand nombre de petites opérations bancaires dans divers établissements. Par ce stratagème, d'importantes quantités d'argent liquide sont intégrées au système bancaire sans trop attirer l'attention. Une fois entrés dans le système bancaire, les narco-dollars peuvent être transférés, presque instantanément, en tout point du globe.

On a remarqué que les criminels faisaient un usage accru des maisons de change plus modestes, qui souvent ne gardent pas de dossier ni sur les transactions effectuées, ni sur leurs clients. Ces commerces servent d'intermédiaires entre l'élément criminel et le système bancaire conventionnel. L'usage accru des maisons de change et de certaines professions afin de faciliter le blanchissage des recettes de la criminalité a coïncidé avec une intensification des efforts déployés par les banques canadiennes afin de relever les transactions douteuses.

Les trafiquants ont souvent recours à des entreprises du pays pour blanchir les narco-dollars. Les entreprises appelées à effectuer des opérations au comptant, tels que les commerces de machines distributrices, les salles de jeux électroniques et les commerces au détail sont très prisées.

Le refuge fiscal à l'étranger, en tant qu'étape dans le processus du blanchissage de l'argent et dépôt de narco-dollars, a toujours eu la faveur des trafiquants de tous genres. Avant de choisir un refuge fiscal pour ses liquidités, le blanchisseur recherche certaines garanties, notamment des lois portant sur le secret bancaire, l'absence ou presque d'impôts sur certaines sources de revenu, la possibilité pour un étranger d'y constituer une compagnie, l'accessabilité et la stabilité politique.

L'utilisation efficace des refuges fiscaux repose sur l'aptitude à faire circuler les fonds de façon à brouiller ou à détruire toute piste qui pourrait amener les autorités à découvrir, soit le destinataire ultime, soit l'origine criminelle des fonds. Pour réussir, le blanchisseur utilise souvent des compagnies et des institutions financières fictives dans plusieurs nations étrangères.

Les enquêtes sur le blanchissage d'argent sont de nature très complexe, particulièrement les dossiers impliquant les juridictions étrangères. Les améliorations législatives, tant nationales qu'internationales, ont été des contributions positives à nos efforts pour combattre ce problème. Nous comptons grandement sur la coopération du secteur financier pour qu'il nous prête son assistance lors de l'ouverture des enquêtes. Le signalement opportun de transactions suspectes est capital. Entretenir de bonnes relations avec les autorités étrangères est tout aussi crucial.

Je m'efforcerai maintenant de répondre à vos questions concernant le blanchissage de l'argent. Merci.

Supt Kaine: Thank you, Bruce. Mr. Chairman, with your permission I want to make a few brief comments about some of the things that the RCMP and other law enforcement agencies do in a co-operative effort with the Canadian Bankers' Association and the Office of the Superintendent of Financial Institutions.

At the present time Canadian law enforcement has at its availability section 462.3 of the Criminal Code, which is the proceeds of crime portion of the Criminal Code. It is a recent introduction to the Criminal Code in 1989. Basically what it does is that once certain offences designated as drug offences and enterprise crime offences have been identified and charges have been laid, the police can go beyond the penalties that might flow from those particular charges and attack the proceeds of a crime. This is done by way of special warrants and freezing orders, warrants to seize tangible assets, and freezing orders to freeze for future forfeiture of intangible assets, bank accounts.

As well, recently royal assent was given to Bill C-9, which deals with money laundering. Bill C-9 is a record-keeping requirement that will require financial institutions such as banks, loan companies, trust companies, to maintain records of financial transactions so that if the police identify areas of concern, criminal offences, we will be able to go back and retrieve the records that will assist us in establishing the trail.

In terms of co-operation, the RCMP and other law enforcement agencies participate in talks and seminars to banking groups, particularly to sensitize them to money laundering. At the present time the RCMP has an exchange program going on between the force and the Bank of Montreal, where we have exchanged employees. Two of our members are currently working in the international portion in the Bank of Montreal in Toronto to familiarize themselves with international banking. Their employee is working with our commercial crime section in Toronto to familiarize himself with it. He is an auditor and he is familiarizing himself with the requirements and the operations of the RCMP in conducting white-collar crime investigations.

At the present time we are very close to establishing an exchange of information with the Canadian Bankers' Association that will give them access to our criminal records information. The purpose of this is to ensure that employees who will be occupying sensitive positions are properly cleared, and it is with the consent of the employee, of course.

Interpol and the RCMP publish circulars in relation to fraudulent activities and modus operandi. At the present moment my boss, Norm Doucette, who is the Director of Economic Crime Enforcement and Assistant Commissioner, is the chairman of the crime in industry committee of the Canadian Association of Chiefs of Police.

A similar co-operative activity goes on between the RCMP and the Office of the Superintendent of Financial Institutions as well. We assist the office in investigating complaints relating to sections 302 and 310 of the Bank Act, Sdt Kaine: Merci, Bruce. Monsieur le président, si vous me le permettez, j'aimerais faire quelques brèves remarques sur les initiatives de la GRC et d'autres services de police en collaboration avec l'Association des banquiers canadiens et le Bureau du surintendant des institutions financières.

A l'heure actuelle, la police canadienne dispose de l'article 462.3 du Code criminel portant sur les produits de la criminalité et qui a été ajouté au Code criminel en 1989. Essentiellement, grâce à cette disposition, dès qu'on constate qu'il y a infraction désignée en matière de drogue ou infraction de criminalité organisée et que des accusations sont portées, la police peut aller au-delà des amendes habituellement prévues pour ces infractions et s'attaquer au produit même du crime. Pour ce faire, on a recours à des mandats spéciaux et à des ordonnances de blocage, à des mandats de saisie des actifs corporels et à des ordonnances de blocage pour confiscation future des actifs incorporels, les comptes bancaires.

En outre, le projet de loi C-9 sur le recyclage des produits de la criminalité a récemment reçu la sanction royale. Cette loi établit des obligations de tenue de documents qui s'appliquent aux institutions financières telles que les banques, les sociétés de prêts et les sociétés de fiducie, lesquelles doivent consigner les transactions financières afin de permettre à la police de relever les infractions criminelles et de disposer d'une piste documentaire pour ses enquêtes.

En ce qui concerne la collaboration, la GRC et d'autres services de police participent à des discussions et à des séminaires avec des groupes de banquiers, précisément pour les sensibiliser au blanchissage de l'argent. Il existe aussi un programme d'échange d'employés entre la GRC et la Banque de Montréal. Deux de nos membres travaillent actuellement au sein de la Section internationale de la Banque de Montréal à Toronto afin de se familiariser avec les opérations bancaires internationales. Un employé de la banque est en stage dans notre Section des crimes économiques de Toronto afin de se familiariser avec ce domaine. Il est vérificateur et il s'intéresse particulièrement aux exigences et aux opérations de la GRC reliées aux enquêtes sur les crimes des cols blancs.

Nous sommes également en bonne voie d'établir un réseau d'échange d'informations avec l'Association des banquiers canadiens, laquelle aura alors accès à nos renseignements sur les casiers judiciaires. Ainsi, on pourra vérifier les dossiers des employés de banques occupant des postes névralgiques, avec le consentement de ces employés, évidemment.

Interpol et la GRC publient des circulaires sur les activités frauduleuses et les modus operandi. De plus, mon supérieur, le commissaire adjoint Doucette, directeur de la Police économique, préside le Comité sur le crime dans l'industrie de l'Association canadienne des chefs de police.

Une collaboration semblable existe entre la GRC et le Bureau du surintendant des institutions financières. Nous aidons le Bureau dans ses enquêtes sur les plaintes relatives aux articles 302 et 310 de la Loi sur les banques, c'est-à-dire and basically that is the unauthorized operations of a bank and the unauthorized use of the word "bank". We exchange information on a case-by-case basis both with the Canadian Bankers' Association and with the Office of the Superintendent of Financial Institutions.

Those are my general comments on that, Mr. Chairman.

The Acting Chairman (Mr. Sobeski): Thank you. Mr. Manley.

Mr. Manley (Ottawa South): Thank you for those comments concerning money laundering in general and in respect of what the RCMP is involved with in communication with the banking association and other police agencies.

However, these hearings primarily concern the Bank of Credit and Commerce Canada and related organizations, and my questions relate to what knowledge the RCMP had concerning the activities of BCCC or BCCI, if I can refer to them that way, when that knowledge was obtained, and to whom it was communicated. I would like to ask you first of all, and perhaps in light of your comments concerning money laundering, whether the Bank of Credit and Commerce Canada was ever investigated by the RCMP in respect of suspected money laundering operations.

Supt Kaine: At the present time the RCMP do not have any active investigations ongoing concerning money laundering involving the BCCC. In the past the bank's name has surfaced in relation to other investigations, much the same as it would surface if another bank had been used as a place of deposit for banks for the transfer of funds.

Mr. Manley: When it has surfaced, have investigations been conducted of the BCCC by the RCMP?

Supt Kaine: Investigations were conducted of specific incidents or fact situations, and as I indicated earlier, the name of the bank came up from time to time, much the same as it would if another bank had been used.

Mr. Manley: Was there an investigation carried out as a result of published stories concerning the link of Manara Travel to the Libyan government in 1988 and allegations in the United States that the BCCC was being used to avoid U.S. Treasury regulations?

Supt Kaine: We assisted the FBI in that regard.

Mr. Manley: Did you conclude that the BCCC was being used as a facilitator for money laundering in respect to that investigation?

Supt Kaine: I have no personal knowledge of that particular investigation, Mr. Manley.

• 0945

Mr. Manley: Do you know whether the results of that investigation were communicated to management of the BCCC?

Supt Kaine: I do not have an answer to that, sir.

Mr. Manley: Were the results of the investigation communicated to the Solicitor General of Canada?

essentiellement les activités non autorisées d'une banque et l'emploi non autorisé du titre «banque». Nous échangeons aussi des informations avec l'Association des banquiers canadiens et le Bureau du surintendant des institutions financières sur certains cas particuliers.

Voilà les observations que je désirais faire, monsieur le président.

Le président suppléant (M. Sobeski): Merci. Monsieur Manley, vous avez la parole.

M. Manley (Ottawa–Sud): Je vous remercie de vos remarques sur le blanchissage de l'argent en général et sur la collaboration de la GRC avec les associations de banquiers et les autres services de police.

Cependant, ces audiences portent avant tout sur la Banque de crédit et de commerce Canada et ses organes connexes, et j'aimerais savoir ce que la GRC savait des activités de la BCCC ou de la BCCI, si je peux me permettre d'employer ces acronymes, à quel moment elle a obtenu ces informations et à qui elle les a communiquées. Tout d'abord, à la lumière des observations que vous venez de faire sur le blanchissage de l'argent, j'aimerais savoir si la Banque de crédit et de commerce Canada a déjà fait l'objet d'une enquête de la GRC en ce qui a trait à des opérations possibles de blanchissage d'argent.

Sdt Kaine: À l'heure actuelle, la GRC ne mène activement aucune enquête sur le blanchissage d'argent à la BCCC. Dans le passé, le nom de cette banque a été cité dans le cadre d'autres enquêtes, tout comme on aurait cité celui d'une autre banque qui aurait servi de lieu de dépôt pour un virement de fonds.

M. Manley: Lorsqu'on a fait mention de la BCCC, la GRC a-t-elle ouvert une enquête?

Sdt Kaine: Des enquêtes ont été menées sur des situations ou des incidents particuliers et, comme je le disais plus tôt, on a mentionné cette banque comme on aurait pu en mentionner une autre.

M. Manley: A-t-on entrepris une enquête par suite des articles qui ont été publiés sur les liens qui existaient entre Manara Travel et le gouvernement libyen en 1988 et par suite des allégations qui ont été faites aux États-Unis voulant qu'on ait utilisé la BCCC pour se soustraire aux règlements du Trésor américain?

Sdt Kaine: Nous avons prêté main-forte au FBI à cet égard.

M. Manley: Dans le cadre de cette enquête, en avez-vous conclu que la BCCC avait facilité le blanchissage d'argent?

Sdt Kaine: Personnellement, monsieur Manley, je ne suis pas au courant de cette enquête-là.

M. Manley: Savez-vous si les résultats de cette enquête ont été communiqués à la direction de la BCCC?

Sdt Kaine: Je ne peux vous répondre, monsieur.

M. Manley: Les résultats de cette enquête ont-ils été communiqués au Solliciteur général du Canada?

Mr. Michael Mackenzie (Superintendent, Office of the Superintendent of Financial Institutions): Thank you very much. As you know, we have prepared a fairly short opening statement, which we distributed on Friday last. I hope the members of the committee have had a chance to read it.

An hon. member: I don't have it.

Mr. Mackenzie: I can't explain that. I will read it, but I am sorry if there are no copies available because—

Mr. Langdon: We have copies.

Mr. Mackenzie: Okay.

The Acting Chairman (Mr. Sobeski): Maybe I could ask Mr. Mackenzie to highlight some of the key points in the presentation and we will put it as read into the minutes.

Mr. Mackenzie: If I could, sir, I would like to take the committee through the presentation in terms of setting the stage for—

The Acting Chairman (Mr. Sobeski): You had better get started with the presentation. Carry on.

Mr. Mackenzie: Mr. Chairman, in this presentation, what I would like to do is take the committee through the history of our involvement as regulators with the Bank of Credit and Commerce Canada from the date of its application and incorporation as a bank through the years leading up to 1988, very briefly, then from 1988 to the time that we took possession of the assets on July 5, with a few remarks on events subsequent to that.

As I start, there is an attachment, which is a partial organization chart, that might be helpful to the committee to look at in order to understand the corporate structure in its bare bones.

The Bank of Credit and Commerce Canada was a continuation of a company that had been incorporated before they were allowed to come into Canada as a bank. It was a company called BCCI Canada Inc., incorporated in 1970 to carry on as an investment or finance company, not as a bank. It was that entity that was, with the introduction of the new Bank Act, converted into a bank under the provisions of the Bank Act providing for the entry of foreign banks into Canada as bank subsidiaries.

If you look at this partial organization chart, the bank we are concerned with this afternoon at the bottom left-hand corner is a wholly owned subsidiary of BCCI S.A. incorporated in Luxembourg. You might also find it helpful to note that that bank in Luxembourg carried on a number of banking activities, the principal one of which was the operation of branches in the United Kingdom.

At the time of its application, we applied the same basic criteria to judge whether it should be permitted to come into the country as we applied to all other banks at the time. That procedure involved us in doing the following, amongst other things.

M. Michael Mackenzie (surintendant, Bureau du surintendant des institutions financières): Merci beaucoup. Comme vous le savez, nous avons préparé une déclaration assez brève qui a été distribuée vendredi dernier. J'espère que les membres du comité ont déjà pu la lire.

Une voix: Je ne l'ai pas reçue.

M. Mackenzie: Je ne sais pas pourquoi. Je vais lire le texte, et je suis désolé s'il n'y a pas d'exemplaire disponible, car. . .

M. Langdon: Nous avons le texte.

M. Mackenzie: Parfait.

Le président suppléant (M. Sobeski): Monsieur Mackenzie, vous pourrez peut-être tout simplement présenter les éléments essentiels de vos remarques qui seront considérées comme ayant été lues et versées au procès-verbal.

M. Mackenzie: Si possible, monsieur le président, j'aimerais indiquer la teneur de cette présentation au comité de façon à dresser un tableau. . .

Le président suppléant (M. Sobeski): Je crois que vous pouvez commencer. Vous avez la parole.

M. Mackenzie: Je voudrais donc, monsieur le président, présenter, très rapidement, l'historique de nos rapports en tant qu'organisme de réglementation avec la Banque de crédit et de commerce Canada à partir de la date où elle a déposé une demande et a été constituée en société bancaire jusqu'à 1988, et examiner ensuite les événements survenus de 1988 au 5 juillet de l'année en cours, quand nous avons pris possession des actifs de cette banque. J'ajouterai quelques remarques sur les événements qui ont suivi.

Je vous signale dès à présent que nous avons porté en annexe au texte de notre exposé un organigramme partiel et les membres du comité jugeront peut-être utile d'y jeter un coup d'oeil pour comprendre la structure fondamentale de ce groupe.

La Banque de crédit et de commerce Canada a repris les activités d'une société constituée en personne morale avant que ce groupe ne soit autorisé à travailler au Canada comme institution bancaire. Cette société s'appelait la BCCI Canada Inc., constituée en 1970 comme société de placement; ce n'était pas une banque. Après l'adoption de la nouvelle Loi sur les banques, cette entité est devenue une institution bancaire aux termes de la Loi sur les banques qui autorisait des banques étrangères à établir une filiale au Canada.

La banque qui nous intéresse apparaît en bas et à gauche sur l'organigramme que j'ai mentionné. Elle est la filiale, en propriété exclusive, de la BCCI S.A., société constituée au Luxembourg. Vous voudrez également noter que la banque luxembourgeoise avait de nombreuses activités bancaires dont la principale était la gestion de succursales au Royaume-Uni.

La demande qui fut déposée à ce moment-là fut jugée selon les mêmes critères que les demandes provenant d'autres banques étrangères qui voulaient venir travailler au Canada à l'époque. La procédure établie prévoyait un certain nombre de mesures dont je vais mentionner quelques-unes.

We contacted both the authorities in Luxembourg, which was the regulatory body charged with the regulation of the parent bank to the bank in Canada. We also contacted the Bank of England, both then and later, and at the time we received assurances from the Luxembourg authorities that the bank was in good standing, had the legal power to make this investment in Canada and so forth. As we always do, we also received that confirmed in writing. We received a letter of undertaking from that bank—that is to say, BCCI S.A. in Luxembourg—the standard letter of comfort, a letter of undertaking and support to the Canadian bank.

As in all cases with the incorporation of a new bank, there was a provision of the Bank Act that permits someone to call for an investigation or make some inquiries, and to that purpose, the intention to form the bank was published over, I think, four consecutive weeks in The Canada Gazette. Nothing turned up at that time—this was before my time as Superintendent, back in 1981 or 1982—that indicated that there were any particular problems with this bank or that it had been associated with any untoward banking or near-banking activities, and the process seemed to be in order.

It should be noted that both the Luxembourg authorities and the Bank of England as well as ourselves are all members of the BIS Banking Committee on Supervision, and that organization and that committee had at that time in existence, which is still in existence, a concordat that provides for an orderly flow of communications between a home regulator—in this case, effectively the authority is in Luxembourg, but to a degree also, although not legally so, I suppose, the Bank of England with respect to the U.K. operations—and a host regulator, being ourselves, in this case, in Canada.

No information was given to us by those regulators or any other source. No formal protests were lodged against the formation of the bank. There was no evidence we could see that was brought to our attention of wrongdoing or improper practices at that time. It was, therefore, licensed as a bank in 1982, with a head office in Montreal, and from that time until December of last year the licence of the bank was renewed each year.

We examined the bank in each of those years, focusing on the things we normally focus on, which were, of course, the condition of the credits, the internal controls, the management control practices and so forth and so on, and although we had a lot to say about some of the documentation problems and some of the administration problems, nothing was brought to our attention until 1988 that would indicate that there was anything more to the story than that.

Nous nous sommes mis en rapport avec les autorités de surveillance au Luxembourg responsables de l'administration des règles qui devaient être respectées par la société bancaire mère de la banque canadienne. Nous nous sommes également mis en rapport avec la Banque d'Angleterre—que nous avons également approchée ensuite. Les autorités luxembourgeoises nous ont donné l'assurance que la banque était en règle, possédait les pouvoirs requis pour procéder à cet investissement au Canada, etc. Comme toujours, ceci nous a été confirmé par écrit. La banque, c'est-à-dire la BCCI S.A. au Luxembourg, nous a également adressé une lettre d'engagement, la lettre de confort type, indiquant qu'elle s'engageait à appuyer et soutenir la banque canadienne.

Lors de la création d'une nouvelle banque, la Loi sur les banques prévoit que toute personne peut demander qu'il y ait enquête ou poser un certain nombre de questions; pour respecter cette disposition, un avis fut publié pendant, je crois, quatre semaines consécutives dans La Gazette du Canada annonçant l'intention de créer cette banque. Rien ne fut signalé—ceci s'est produit avant que je n'occupe mon poste de surintendant, vers 1981 ou 1982—pouvant indiquer la présence de difficultés ou l'association de cette banque à des activités bancaires ou quasi-bancaires suspectes. Tout semblait être dans les règles.

Il convient de noter que les autorités luxembourgeoises et la Banque d'Angleterre, comme nous-mêmes, font partie du Comité des règles et pratiques de contrôle des opérations bancaires constitué par la Banque des règlements internationaux. Ce comité et cette banque étaient parties à un concordat, qui existe toujours, qui assure le bon ordre des échanges de renseignements entre un organisme de réglementation national—dans ce cas particulier celui du Luxembourg mais également dans une certaine mesure, sans qu'il y ait sans doute d'obligation légale, la Banque d'Angleterre en ce qui concerne les activités se déroulant au Royaume-Uni—d'une part, et, d'autre part, un organisme de réglementation dans le pays d'accueil, dans le cas présent, le Canada.

Nous n'avons reçu aucun renseignement de ces organismes ou de toute autre source. Personne ne s'est opposé formellement à la création de cette banque. Parmi les renseignements reçus nous ne pouvions rien trouver qui pourrait nous signaler inconduite ou méthode malhonnête. Cette société a donc reçu en 1982 un permis l'autorisant à exercer des activités bancaires, permis qui a été renouvelé annuellement jusqu'en décembre dernier.

Pendant cette période, nous avons procédé à un examen annuel des activités de la banque en mettant plus particulièrement l'accent sur les sujets qui retiennent normalement notre attention, c'est-à-dire, bien sûr, le statut des crédits, les contrôles internes, les méthodes de contrôle de gestion, etc. Nous avons constaté qu'il y avait beaucoup à dire au sujet des questions de documentation et, dans certains cas, d'administration, mais rien n'a été porté à notre attention avant 1988, qui aurait pu indiquer qu'il y avait anguille sous roche.

[Texte]

In 1988, as I think you know, charges were brought in the state of Florida against BCCI Overseas operating in that state. These were charges related to an accusation of money laundering. Accordingly, in that year we did expand our review and analysis of the bank's activities to see if there was evidence of unusual cash transactions or other transactions that might be evidence of money laundering, or similar kinds or other kinds of illicit or improper activity.

In 1988 we received an anonymous phone call and documentary evidence, some of which was reprinted in the newspaper a week or two ago, identifying a number of large cash transactions. We investigated these transactions. We brought them to the attention of the RCMP, and we brought them to the attention of the bank auditors. Our further investigations did not indicate—while those transactions were unusual—that there was anything criminal or untoward about them. But I can't judge that wholly because this evidence was given over to the police and it is the police who have the power to make criminal investigations—

Mr. Langdon: Which police force?

Mr. Mackenzie: The RCMP. We did, however, at the time examine the banks's own processes for detection of suspicious transactions and for the reporting of suspicious transactions. We thought they were not up to scratch and we worked with them to improve those processes and, on subsequent examinations, did part of our examination to ensure that the bank was complying with these new procedures.

Early in 1990, after there had been a good deal of publicity and interest in the whole subject of money laundering in banks, and the passage of Bill C-9, we issued a "Best Practices for Deterring and Detecting Money Laundering" paper, which of course went to this bank and all other banks in the system.

During 1990 there were other allegations, both domestically and in foreign jurisdictions, the U.S., with respect to money laundering and fraud, related to this bank or its affiliates. But I can assure the committee that our investigations and the investigations done by the auditors, with whom we had more than casual contact during this period, did not reveal anything that we considered to be fraudulent or illegal, and any transactions of any kind that seemed to be suspicious again were referred by us to the RCMP.

There was then, I guess at an escalating volume, a lot of talk and discussion about this bank on an international basis and the activities it carried on in these areas, but up to this point we ourselves had not seen any evidence that would put us in a position of identifying criminal money laundering or related transactions as such.

Vous savez déjà sans doute que des plaintes ont été déposées en 1988 contre la BCCI Overseas, en Floride, où cette banque était installée. Ces plaintes résultaient d'une accusation de blanchiment de fonds. En conséquence, nous avons alors étendu la portée de notre examen et de notre analyse des activités de la banque afin de voir s'il existait des preuves de transactions au comptant inhabituelles ou de toute autre transaction établissant l'existence d'un blanchiment de fonds ou d'autres activités similaires ou encore d'autres activités illicites ou malhonnêtes.

En 1988, nous avons reçu un appel téléphonique anonyme et des documents, dont certains ont paru dans la presse il y a une semaine ou deux, qui signalaient un certain nombre de transactions au comptant portant sur des sommes considérables. Nous avons procédé à une enquête et avons signalé ces cas à la GRC ainsi qu'aux vérificateurs bancaires. Même si ces transactions présentaient un caractère exceptionnel, nos enquêtes complémentaires n'ont rien trouvé d'illégal ou de malhonnête à leur sujet. Je ne peux pas toutefois formuler un jugement définitif car les éléments de preuve ont été remis à la police et c'est elle qui a les pouvoirs requis pour procéder à une enquête criminelle. . .

M. Langdon: Quelle police?

M. Mackenzie: La GRC. À l'époque, toutefois, nous avons examiné les procédures auxquelles la banque a recours pour déceler et signaler les transactions suspectes. Nous avons estimé que ces procédures n'étaient pas satisfaisantes et nous avons travaillé avec la banque pour les améliorer. Lors des examens ultérieurs, nous nous sommes assurés que la banque respectait ces nouvelles procédures.

Au début de 1990, à la suite de la publicité donnée à la question du rôle des banques dans le blanchiment des fonds et de l'intérêt soulevé par cette question, et après également l'adoption du projet de loi C-9, nous avons diffusé un document intitulé «Mécanismes efficaces de repérage et d'élimination des opérations de blanchiment de fonds». La banque qui nous intéresse, ainsi que toutes les autres banques, a reçu ce document.

Au cours de 1990, tant au Canada qu'à l'étranger, essentiellement aux États-Unis, on a encore laissé entendre que cette banque ou ses banques associées s'adonnaient à des activités de blanchiment de fonds. Je peux toutefois vous donner l'assurance que nos examens et ceux effectués par les vérificateurs, avec lesquels nous étions en rapport assez étroit pendant cette période, n'ont rien révélé qui nous paraisse frauduleux ou illicite, et toute transaction de quelque nature que ce soit qui semblait suspecte a été référée à la GRC par nos soins.

On parlait alors beaucoup, et je crois de plus en plus, du réseau international de cette banque et de ses activités dans divers domaines mais, jusqu'à présent, nous n'avons pas nous-mêmes constaté la présence d'indications qui nous permettraient de repérer des activités de blanchiment de fonds ou des transactions de ce type.

It is interesting that in our ongoing contacts with the Federal Reserve in the United States, with the Bank of England, with the Luxembourg authorities, with Cayman Island authorities, with the auditors, and repeatedly with the police, no evidence has been brought to my attention that would indicate that this bank was contaminated with a lot of the transactions that have been alleged with respect to either money laundering or arms activities or other kinds of payments. We are not police investigators, but nothing has come to our attention that would indicate that this bank is contaminated with this stuff, whatever this stuff is. I have read the famous Price Waterhouse report that the Bank of England commissioned, with, I am afraid, all the names blanked out so it is an incomplete reading, but they would not give us the report without those names blanked out. There is nothing in that report that touches Canada.

As I say, we made repeated attempts to find out if anybody had any evidence of this nature. As of yesterday the Bank of England not only reassured me that nothing had come to their attention and nothing had come to the attention of the Touche Ross people, who are engaged internationally to liquidate or to manage out this situation, that would indicate there are problems in Canada of this order. In fact, he told me that they had not found any evidence in England either. It is astonishing, but that is what I am told.

Moving on to the financial affairs of the bank, I would like to refer you to a summary sheet entitled "Balance Sheet Data", which has been attached. We worked with the bank starting in 1988-89, and through the early part of 1990, partly in the light of these allegations and concerns. We were in frequent contact with them, and partially as a result of that—and I may say the bank has co-operated—the number of branches in Canada was reduced from eight to four.

As you can see from this table, the total assets of the bank were reduced from $448-odd million to $198 million at the time we took possession of the assets. The deposit liabilities, the CDIC-insured deposit base, was reduced to a third, from $66 million to about $22 million. The uninsured domestic deposit base was reduced from $289 million to $91 million, that is, to about a third in each of these categories.

At the same time the parent bank, mainly through its branches in the United Kingdom and in part through its affiliate in the Cayman Islands, increased its deposits with the bank from $3.6 million to $42.4 million or thereabouts.

In other words, over this period, one way or another, the exposure of the Canadian depositors was reduced to about a third of what it had been a year or a year and a half earlier.

Il est intéressant de noter que lors de nos rapports normaux avec la Banque fédérale de réserve aux États-Unis, avec la Banque d'Angleterre, avec les autorités de réglementation, tant au Luxembourg que dans les îles Caïmans, avec les vérificateurs et, fréquemment, avec la police, rien ne m'a été signalé, qui pourrait indiquer que cette banque a été contaminée par ces transactions qui, a-t-on dit, porteraient sur le blanchiment de fonds, le trafic d'armes, ou des paiements de nature douteuse. Nous ne sommes pas des policiers, mais rien ne nous a été signalé, qui indiquerait que cette banque a été contaminée par un trafic, quelle que soit sa nature. J'ai lu le fameux rapport préparé par Price Waterhouse à la demande de la Banque d'Angleterre. Tous les noms y étaient biffés, ce qui fait que ma lecture a été incomplète. Mais c'est à cette seule condition que le rapport m'a été remis. Rien dans ce rapport ne touche le Canada.

Comme je l'ai déjà dit, nous nous sommes efforcés à plusieurs reprises de voir si des preuves de cette nature existaient. Pas plus tard qu'hier, la Banque d'Angleterre m'a assuré que rien n'avait été porté à leur attention ou à celle du personnel de Touche Ross, cabinet qui a été retenu pour liquider ou gérer la situation sur le plan international, qui pourrait indiquer que des problèmes de cet ordre existent au Canada. En fait, on m'a dit qu'aucune preuve n'avait été trouvée en Angleterre également. C'est plus que surprenant, mais c'est ce qu'on m'a dit.

Pour passer aux activités financières de cette banque, je vous réfère au bilan qui est joint au texte de notre allocution d'ouverture. À partir de l'exercice 1988-1989 et jusqu'au début de 1990, nous avons travaillé en liaison étroite avec cette banque, en partie du fait de ces allégations et de ces préoccupations. En partie tout au moins du fait de ces rapports fréquents—et je dois dire que la banque a fait preuve de coopération—le nombre de succursales au Canada a été ramené de huit à quatre.

Comme vous pouvez le voir sur ce tableau, le total de l'actif de la banque a été ramené de 448 millions de dollars environ à 198 millions quand nous avons pris possession de l'actif. Dans le passif-dépôts, les dépôts assurés par la Société d'assurance-dépôts du Canada ont été réduits d'un tiers, passant de 66 millions à 22 millions de dollars environ. Le montant des dépôts non assurés est passé de 289 millions de dollars à 91 millions de dollars; autrement dit dans chacune de ces catégories, le montant n'était plus que le tiers du montant antérieur.

Parallèlement, la banque mère, essentiellement par l'entremise de ses succursales au Royaume-Uni et, en partie par le biais de sa banque affiliée dans les îles Caïmans, a augmenté ses dépôts à la banque en les portant de 3,6 millions de dollars à 42,4 millions de dollars, approximativement.

En d'autres termes, au cours de cette période, d'une façon ou d'une autre, le risque pour les déposants canadiens a été réduit d'environ un tiers de ce qu'il avait été un an ou un an et demi auparavant.

During our examination toward the end of 1990, and again on our ongoing monitoring through 1991, at our insistence and with co-operation of the bank and its auditors, very substantial loan loss provisions were put up, and you can see the retained earnings account went from $7 million or thereabouts in April 1990 to a deficit of $26 million a year later and at the time of taking possession.

In addition to increasing the interbank deposit to finance the bank, the shareholders put up an additional $25 million in 1991, under pressure from us. At this point in time you have a very substantial increase in the financial commitments of the shareholders to this bank, and a very substantial reduction of the exposure of the Canadian depositors to loss or risk in this bank.

We had a lot of concerns about the bank, and these concerns were clearly intensified through the years 1988-89-90 into the first six months of this year. We were in frequent communication with the Bank of England authorities, and with the bank itself and others, who told us that with the assistance of Price Waterhouse and some other people they were arranging and working on a major international restructuring of BCCI's operations. There were commitments, or were to have been commitments, related to that restructuring that would have massively increased the investment of the shareholders. The majority shareholder at this point was, I guess his title is the Sheikh of Abu Dhabi, but we are talking here about hundreds of millions of pounds, if not more.

It thus appeared to us that despite the fact that the bank was in an unsatisfactory financial condition, although it was still solvent because of these injections of deposit money and additional capital, and it was losing money, because of the—I guess now it would have to be described as possibility, but we thought at that time probability—based on what we were told, of a major refinancing of the bank to put it into a proper and orderly financial structure in Canada, we saw no reason to close it down or do anything very drastic.

At the same time, as you know, we had at the end of last year renewed the licence for a three-month period only. The reason we did that was that we wanted to ensure that we would get the bank to put up loan loss provisions to the degree that our examiners found necessary at the time, and secondly, that they would make the improvements in internal controls and internal audit that we were demanding. Thirdly, and perhaps most importantly, we wanted to see the audited international balance sheets of the parent bank, which would be as of December 31, 1990. Of course we wanted to put the pressure on, which I think was successful, to inject capital, which the bank did in April-May of this year. Of course, as

Lors de notre examen vers la fin de 1990 et aussi au cours de notre surveillance continue en 1991, à notre insistance et avec la coopération de la banque et de ses vérificateurs, des provisions importantes pour pertes sur prêts ont été constituées, et vous pouvez constater que le compte des bénéfices non distribués est passé de 7 millions environ en avril 1990 à un solde négatif de 26 millions un an plus tard quand nous avons pris possession des actifs.

Les actionnaires avaient donc augmenté le dépôt interbancaire pour financer la banque et ils ont, de plus, augmenté leur contribution de 25 millions de dollars en 1991 à la suite des pressions que nous avons exercées. On constate donc qu'à ce moment-là, les actionnaires ont considérablement augmenté leurs engagements financiers vis-à-vis de la banque et que le risque pour les déposants canadiens a été considérablement réduit.

Cette banque nous a causé beaucoup de soucis et ces soucis n'ont fait qu'augmenter au cours de 1988-1989-1990 et au cours des six premiers mois de cette année. Nous nous sommes mis fréquemment en rapport avec les responsables de la Banque d'Angleterre, avec la banque elle-même et avec d'autres parties intéressées, qui nous ont dit qu'avec l'aide de Price Waterhouse et de quelques autres personnes, on travaillait à une restructuration internationale importante des activités de la BCCI. Des engagements avaient été pris, ou il devait y avoir des engagements, concernant cette restructuration, qui allaient entraîner une augmentation massive de l'investissement des actionnaires. L'actionnaire majoritaire était alors, je crois que son titre est Cheik d'Abu Dhabi, mais ici nous parlons de centaines de millions de livres sterling, sinon plus.

La banque se trouvait donc dans une situation financière assez mauvaise, mais elle demeurait solvable du fait de ces injections de fonds sous forme de dépôts et de capitaux additionnels, et elle enregistrait des pertes; toutefois, du fait de—je crois qu'il faut parler de la possibilité mais à l'époque nous pensions qu'il s'agissait de la probabilité—d'après ce qui nous avait été dit, d'un refinancement important de la banque qui la placerait dans une situation financière convenable au Canada, nous n'avons vu aucune raison de la fermer ou de prendre des mesures très drastiques.

D'autre part, comme vous le savez, nous avions décidé à la fin de l'année dernière de ne renouveler le permis que pour une période de trois mois. Nous voulions en effet nous assurer que la banque porterait les provisions pour pertes sur prêts au niveau jugé nécessaire par nos examinateurs à l'époque et, deuxièmement, nous voulions que la banque apporte les améliorations requises au contrôle interne et à la vérification interne, comme nous l'avions demandé. Troisièmement, et c'est peut-être la chose la plus importante, nous voulions voir les bilans internationaux vérifiés de la banque mère, datés du 31 décembre 1990. Naturellement, nous voulions exercer une certaine pression, et je crois que you know, in the spring we reduced the renewal period from three months down to one month to maintain this pressure.

Three weeks before the July 5 date, I was in London at the Bank of England talking to the head of banking supervision at the Bank of England, and he described the situation in this way. He said: what we know is that we think we have a basket of apples, and in that basket there are a lot of good apples and there are a lot of bad apples, and our job through this restructuring is to pick out the bad apples and throw them out, reduce the bank's operations internationally to a basket of good apples, and hope to stabilize the situation on that basis.

When, three weeks later, that same person phoned me to tell me about the closing they had put in, he said: we have now discovered with this Price Waterhouse report that it isn't a basket of apples, a mixture of good and bad, as described; it's one lousy, bad apple all the way through, to use his words. That is why they had decided to close down the banks and the bank operations in Luxembourg, the U.K., Cayman Islands, and most other jurisdictions in which this bank internationally does its business.

At that point in time, even though as far as we could see this bank was solvent at that point in time because of the injections of more capital, we felt that in order to protect the interests of Canadian depositors we had to take possession of the assets, and we had to do it and decide this because we had just discovered this at 9 a.m. and we had to exercise that possession by mid-day that day. Our concern was that if we didn't put a ring fence around this bank, money could move out to the detriment of Canadian depositors.

Until that time we didn't feel it was likely that this would create, or that we had a situation which could lead to, a loss for CDIC or a loss to Canadian depositors. But that judgment was based on the understanding—as I say, repeated to us as recently as mid-June—that the Bank of England and other authorities felt that the bank could be restructured to put it on a more orderly basis.

Taking possession of assets in this way and the use of a liquidator—in this case, Arthur Andersen—to act on our behalf has led to the series of steps, as you know, which is involving application for the winding up of the bank, because once these events play out, it is as clear as a bell now that this bank, in the absence of any other addition or relatively massive injection of new money, is not viable in the Canadian market. We have to take our steps, of course, essentially and always to protect the interests of depositors and minimize or mitigate the potential for losses. But obviously we have to do things in an order where the rights of shareholders are not unduly abridged, and they don't have an opportunity to make nous avons réussi, pour qu'il y ait injection de capitaux, ce qui a été fait en avril-mai 1991. Enfin, comme vous le savez, nous avons ramené, ce printemps, la période de renouvellement du permis de trois mois à un mois, et ce, afin de continuer à exercer une pression.

Trois semaines avant le 5 juillet, je me suis rendu en Angleterre pour rencontrer le responsable de la surveillance des opérations bancaires à la Banque d'Angleterre. Pour me décrire la situation, il m'a dit: «Nous croyons avoir devant nous un panier de pommes; certaines de ces pommes sont saines et d'autres sont pourries. La restructuration vise à trouver les mauvaises pommes et à les rejeter pour que les activités internationales de la banque ressemblent à un panier de pommes qui sont toutes saines, et nous espérons stabiliser la situation sur cette base.»

Trois semaines plus tard, ce responsable m'a téléphoné pour me dire qu'ils avaient pris des mesures pour fermer les banques. Il m'a dit essentiellement: le rapport préparé par Price Waterhouse nous apprend qu'il ne s'agit pas d'un panier de pommes, d'un mélange de pommes saines et de pommes pourries comme je vous l'avais dit. Il s'agit d'une seule pomme complètement pourrie. Et je reprends ses termes. C'est pour cela qu'ils avaient décidé de fermer les banques ainsi que les activités bancaires au Luxembourg, au Royaume-Uni, dans les îles Caïmans et dans la plupart des autres endroits où cette banque effectue des transactions internationales.

Alors, et bien qu'autant que nous puissions en juger, la banque était solvable du fait de l'injection de capitaux, nous avons décidé que pour protéger les intérêts des déposants canadiens, nous devions prendre possession des actifs; nous devions prendre cette mesure car nous avions reçu ces nouveaux renseignements à 9 heures, et la prise de possession devait se faire avant midi le même jour. Ce que nous craignions, c'est que les fonds sortent du pays au détriment des déposants canadiens si nous n'imposions pas de restrictions très sévères à la banque.

Jusqu'à ce moment-là, nous ne pensions pas que la situation puisse entraîner des pertes pour la SADC ou pour les déposants canadiens. Mais ce jugement était fondé sur le fait que la Banque d'Angleterre et divers autres spécialistes nous avaient dit—et, comme je l'ai dit, nous l'avaient répété encore à la mi-juin—que la banque pourrait être restructurée et que ses affaires pourraient être remises en ordre.

La prise de possession de l'actif de la banque et la nomination d'un liquidateur—Arthur Andersen en l'occurrence—chargé d'agir en notre nom ont entraîné une série de mesures, comme vous le savez, portant sur la demande de fermeture de la banque parce que, avec le temps, il est maintenant tout à fait clair que cette banque n'est pas viable sur le marché canadien en l'absence de nouvelles additions ou d'une injection relativement massive de fonds. Bien sûr, nous devons toujours tenter de protéger les intérêts des déposants et de limiter les risques de perte. Mais nous devons évidemment veiller aussi à ne pas empiéter inutilement sur les droits des actionnaires, et empêcher ces representations and to deal with the situation. To that degree, all the way through this we were in constant contact with the Bank of England authorities, the Touche Ross people representing the shareholders both internationally and domestically, and anyone else we thought was relevant to the situation.

You have heard from CDIC as to their involvement in making sure that, through compassionate payments programs and others, people are not too badly hurt in the process. There is no doubt that small though this is, and it is a bank that operated in a certain fairly narrowly defined market in terms of many of its clientele, in this process people get hurt. I have great sympathy for people who get hurt in their pocketbooks, with the anxiety this creates for them as families or as individuals or as owners and proprietors of businesses and so forth. I realize that you can sometimes get into situations where you are damned if you do and damned if you don't, but I honestly believe, sir, that we worked as carefully as we could throughout this to both safeguard their interests and reduce to a minimum whatever losses there may be.

There are some aspects of this that lead me to be quite optimistic about how all that may work out in the end, but I can't go further than to say that I am cautiously optimistic. It hinges on a number of things, and some of them are legal, that have to do with the extent to which that undertaking, the letter of comfort from the parent, can be invoked.

That really amounts to making sure those deposits from the parent bank are effectively subordinated, and second, that it is . . There is a whole host of reasons for this, but if you are in a declining market—and some of these are, I am afraid, real estate exposures in terms of the loan book of the bank—once it is clear that you have a liquidator, or an agent, or a possession of this kind, there is no doubt that we get into liquidation scenarios one way and another on a loan-by-loan basis, and you get into situations where values tend to dissolve. For one, the customer is no longer dealing with a viable, ongoing, energetic bank. You have some demoralization of people in terms of their administration of the loan book. You have the fact that you can't go on advancing more money in order to keep the situations alive, and we are very conscious of not pouring good money after bad or even half bad.

So we have concluded that in addition to the very substantial loan loss provisions that were put up at the end of the last fiscal year and that we were identifying going on into early 1991, on any kind of basis that we can be realistic about, there are more losses on that loan book as of today.

That concludes my end of the story. I hope you have enough time for some questions.

The Acting Chairman (Mr. Sobeski): I am sure there will be some. We will make time for questions. I will be going to Mr. Soetens, Mr. Langdon, Mr. Gray, Mr. Tremblay—.

derniers de faire les représentations qui s'imposent et de tenter de régler le problème. En ce sens, nous avons été en contact constant avec les autorités de la Banque d'Angleterre dans toute cette affaire, ainsi qu'avec les gens de Touche Ross qui représentent les actionnaires, tant au Canada qu'au niveau international, et avec toutes les autres parties en cause.

Les représentants de la SADC vous ont dit qu'ils allaient s'assurer, par exemple en faisant des paiements de commisération, que toute cette affaire ne causerait pas trop de tort à la population. Il est bien évident que, même s'il s'agissait d'une banque assez petite, dont la clientèle était relativement restreinte, il y a des gens qui vont en souffrir. J'ai beaucoup de sympathie pour les gens dont le portefeuille s'en ressentira, et je comprends bien les inquiétudes que cause ce genre de situation pour ces familles, ces particuliers, ces propriétaires d'entreprises, etc. Je me rends bien compte qu'il y a des situations dont on ne peut pas sortir gagnant, quoi qu'on fasse, mais je crois honnêtement, monsieur, que nous avons été aussi prudents que possible dans toute cette affaire pour sauvegarder les intérêts des déposants et réduire le plus possible les pertes éventuelles.

Il y a toutefois certains éléments qui me portent à un certain optimisme au sujet de la façon dont le problème finira pas se résoudre, mais je ne peux être que prudemment optimiste. Tout dépendra d'un certain nombre de choses, et notamment de certains aspects juridiques, c'est-à-dire de la mesure dans laquelle il sera possible d'invoquer la lettre de confort de la banque mère.

Il s'agit en réalité de s'assurer que les dépôts de la banque mère sont effectivement subordonnés et, deuxièmement, que . . Il y a toutes sortes de raisons à cela, mais si le marché est à la baisse—et j'ai bien peur que certains prêts consentis dans le domaine immobilier aient été plutôt risqués—une fois qu'il est clair qu'il y a un liquidateur en place, ou un agent, ou une tutelle quelconque, il ne fait aucun doute qu'il y a liquidation sous une forme ou sous une autre pour chaque prêt, et il y a des cas où la valeur baisse. Notamment, les consommateurs n'ont plus affaire à une banque viable, dynamique et pleine d'avenir. Et les gens qui s'occupent des prêts sont parfois démoralisés. Il faut bien se rendre compte qu'il est impossible d'avancer de nouveaux fonds pour maintenir une institution en vie; nous sommes très conscients du fait qu'il ne faut pas gaspiller de l'argent pour régler un problème insoluble, ou même à peu près insoluble.

Nous en avons donc conclu qu'en plus des très importantes provisions pour pertes sur prêts qui ont été établies à la fin de la dernière année financière et maintenues après le début de 1991, il y a aujourd'hui davantage de pertes sur ces prêts, si l'on veut être réaliste.

Voilà qui termine mon exposé de la situation. J'espère que vous aurez assez de temps pour poser des questions.

Le président suppléant (M. Sobeski): Je suis sûr que oui. Nous allons prendre le temps nécessaire. Je vais d'abord donner la parole à M. Soetens, puis à M. Langdon, M. Gray, M. Tremblay.

The Acting Chairman (Mr. Sobeski): Order, please.

Pursuant to Standing Order 108.(2) this is an inquiry into the closure of the Bank of Credit and Commerce Canada and other related matters.

Our witnesses today are from the Royal Canadian Mounted Police, led by Deputy Commissioner Favreau.

Deputy Commissioner J.L.G. Favreau (Operations, Royal Canadian Mounted Police): Merci, monsieur le président.

I have no opening remarks because I thought I would give my time to the committee to ask all the questions they want. However, I have with me other members of the force, including Assistant Commissioner Norman Doucette. He is responsible for the Economic Crime Program within the RCMP. For the benefit of everyone, that means that economic crime investigations across Canada are monitored by Mr. Doucette and he is responsible for the policy and the program itself.

Also with me is Assistant Commissioner Marcel Coutu. Mr. Coutu is responsible for the drug program across Canada. All policies and the way we should and are doing police work concerning the drug program is under his responsibilty.

With him is Inspector Bruce Bowie. Bruce is looking after the Anti-Drug Profiteering Program. We consider him a specialist in the field of drug anti-profiteering and money laundering.

I am responsible for all the the operational programs of the force, and Mr. Coutu and Mr. Doucette report directly to me. When I say responsible for all programs of the force on the operational side of the house, I mean from traffic to drug enforcement to economic crime, and all aspects of investigations. Therefore, with the assistance of these directors I am responsible for the policies and for monitoring major operations across Canada. I report directly to the Commissioner of the RCMP.

The reason I brought these people with me, besides the fact that they are experts in their field, is that the last time we were invited to this committee we had the impression—a false impression—that we were invited to give advice to this committee on what is money-laundering, how it works, etc., and that is why we had Mr. Bowie here and Mr. George Kaine.

TÉMOIGNAGES

Le jeudi 3 octobre 1991

Le président suppléant (M. Sobeski): Je déclare la séance ouverte.

Conformément à l'article 108(2) du Règlement, nous étudions la fermeture de la Banque de crédit et de commerce Canada et autres sujets connexes.

Nous accueillons aujourd'hui des représentants de la Gendarmerie royale du Canada; la délégation est dirigée par le sous-commissaire Favreau.

Le sous-commissaire J.L.G. Favreau (Police opérationnelle, Gendarmerie royale du Canada): Thank you, Mr. Chairman.

Je n'ai pas de déclaration liminaire, car j'ai cru bon de m'en remettre aux membres du comité et de me mettre à leur disposition pour répondre à toutes leurs questions. Je signale cependant que je suis accompagné d'autres membres de la GRC, notamment du commissaire adjoint Norman Doucette. Il est chargé du programme de la police économique à la GRC. Cela veut dire que toutes les enquêtes sur les crimes économiques, d'un bout à l'autre du Canada, sont placées sous la direction de M. Doucette, qui est responsable de l'application des politiques et programmes dans ce domaine.

Je suis également accompagné du commissaire adjoint Marcel Coutu. M. Coutu est chargé de la police des drogues dans tout le Canada. Tous les programmes et politiques concernant la lutte contre la drogue relèvent de son autorité.

Il est lui-même accompagné de l'inspecteur Bruce Bowie. Bruce s'occupe des enquêtes économiques antidrogue. Nous le tenons pour un spécialiste dans le domaine des enquêtes économiques antidrogue et du blanchiment de l'argent.

Pour ma part, je suis chargé de la mise en oeuvre de tous les programmes opérationnels de la Gendarmerie et MM. Coutu et Doucette relèvent directement de moi. Quand je dis que je suis chargé de tous les programmes opérationnels, cela va de la lutte contre le trafic de drogue à l'application des lois sur les drogues, en passant par les crimes de nature économique, et cela comprend tous les aspects des enquêtes. Par conséquent, avec l'aide de ces divers directeurs, je suis responsable de l'application de nos politiques dans ces domaines et de la surveillance des principales opérations d'un bout à l'autre du Canada. Je relève directement du commissaire de la GRC.

Si je me suis fait accompagner de ces collaborateurs, outre le fait qu'ils sont experts dans leurs domaines respectifs, c'est que la dernière fois que nous avons été invités à témoigner devant votre comité, nous avons eu l'impression, à tort, que nous avions été invités pour conseiller le comité au sujet du blanchiment de l'argent, pour vous expliquer en quoi cela consiste, comment cela fonctionne, etc., et c'est pourquoi nous avions fait venir M. Bowie et M. George Kaine.

[Texte]

However, when they came here—and it was obviously the right of members of the committee—the orientation was quite different. They were asked about specific cases and they did not have the required knowledge about those cases. Therefore, I hope, by having the four of us here, we will be able to help the committee and be able to answer all the questions here and now, saving time for the committee and saving time for everybody and being very straightforward with what we can say.

This is it, Mr. Chairman, for my opening remarks.

The Acting Chairman (Mr. Sobeski): Thank you for your remarks. Indeed, you were quite correct. I had invited the RCMP at the opening to discuss money laundering. However, the questions went in a different direction. Inspector Bowie said he would come back, and since you are here today we will open the meeting to questions.

D/Commr Favreau: With your permission, Mr. Chairman, I would like to add just one thing in order not to create confusion.

Mr. Coutu and Bruce Bowie are responsible, as I say, for the drug anti-profiteering aspect, and that is all under section 462.3 of the Criminal Code. They look after investigations that, as a rule, start as ordinary drug investigations and bring you into the facet of money laundering or of assets acquired via drug-related crime.

Mr. Doucette—this is where I want to make sure that nobody is confused—also looks after offences under section 462.3 of the Criminal Code but on the enterprise crime offence side, and there is a great list of offences under the enterprise crime offence portion of the section.

Mr. Manley (Ottawa South): Thank you for coming before us this morning.

You are quite right, Deputy Commissioner, that the information that many of us were interested in at the time of the last appearance was not available. I do not think any of us felt that Inspector Bowie or his colleague were responsible for that. We quite understood that they were asked to come to give a certain kind of information. However, several of us felt it was important to put the questions on the record that we wanted to have answered, so thank you for coming this morning.

I presume you have not only had a chance to review the transcript following your last visit here but I hope you might have also had an opportunity to see the transcript from Monday evening of this week. Is that the case?

D/Commr Favreau: Not the transcript, but we had good reports about the meeting.

Mr. Manley: So you are aware of some of the information discussed with Mr. Sargent and some of the investigations that he referred to that involved information concerning the Bank of Credit and Commerce International and Bank of Credit and Commerce Canada.

[Traduction]

Nous avons toutefois constaté à notre arrivée ici que l'on s'est orienté dans une tout autre direction, ce qui est évidemment le droit légitime des membres du comité. On les a interrogés au sujet d'affaires précises qu'ils ne connaissaient pas de première main. J'espère donc qu'à nous quatre, nous serons en mesure d'aider le comité et de répondre aux questions sur-le-champ, ce qui évitera au comité et à tout le monde de perdre du temps. Nous essaierons de répondre directement et franchement.

Voilà tout ce que j'ai à dire pour l'instant, monsieur le président.

Le président suppléant (M. Sobeski): Merci. Vous avez absolument raison. J'avais invité des représentants de la GRC pour discuter du blanchiment de l'argent. Les questions ont toutefois porté sur autre chose. L'inspecteur Bowie a dit qu'il reviendrait et, puisque vous êtes ici aujourd'hui, nous allons passer directement aux questions.

S.-comm. Favreau: Avec votre permission, monsieur le président, je voudrais ajouter quelque chose afin de dissiper toute confusion.

M. Coutu et Bruce Bowie sont responsables, comme je l'ai dit, des enquêtes économiques antidrogue, ce qui relève du paragraphe 462.3 du Code criminel. Ils s'occupent d'enquêtes qui, en règle générale, commencent sous forme d'enquêtes ordinaires portant sur la drogue et mettent ensuite en cause le blanchiment d'argent ou d'autres produits de la criminalité dans le domaine des drogues.

M. Doucette—et ici, je tiens à m'assurer qu'il n'y a aucun malentendu—s'occupe également des infractions visées au paragraphe 462.3 du Code criminel, mais il s'occupe plus précisément des infractions de criminalité organisée; on trouve dans ce paragraphe toute une liste d'infractions de criminalité organisée.

M. Manley (Ottawa-Sud): Je vous remercie d'être venus nous rencontrer ce matin.

Vous avez tout à fait raison, monsieur le sous-commissaire; les renseignements que beaucoup d'entre nous cherchions à obtenir lors de votre dernière comparution n'étaient pas disponibles. Aucun d'entre nous n'en imputait la faute à l'inspecteur Bowie ou à son collègue. Nous savions bien que l'on vous avait demandé de venir pour nous renseigner dans un domaine précis. Cependant, plusieurs députés ont jugé important de poser les questions auxquelles, nous semblait-il, il fallait répondre, et nous vous remercions donc d'être revenus ce matin.

Je suppose que vous avez eu l'occasion de lire le compte rendu de votre dernière visite et j'espère que vous avez également pu prendre connaissance du compte rendu de notre réunion de lundi soir. L'avez-vous fait?

S.-comm. Favreau: Pas le compte rendu, mais on nous a bien renseignés au sujet de cette réunion.

M. Manley: Vous êtes donc au courant de la discussion que nous avons eue avec M. Sargent et de certaines enquêtes auxquelles il a fait allusion et qui mettaient en cause la Banque de crédit et de commerce international et la Banque de crédit et de commerce Canada.

I would like to begin by simply asking if you would tell us about those investigations in which the Bank of Credit and Commerce, either International or of Canada, or both, were involved, and what knowledge the force had of activities of the bank arising from those investigations.

D/Commr Favreau: I will start, and I will invite my colleagues who might be more familiar with some of the details to jump in after I have finished my opening remarks on it.

The first correction I would like to make, just to be a little bit more precise, is that, from our point of view anyway, the fact that a bank or a financial institution, or a person for this matter, is mentioned in an investigation does not mean that it is an investigation on him or on that financial institution. So I will talk about the Manara Travel Agency investigation.

This investigation was under the Security Offences Act group, so I might have to limit some of the details, as you will understand. It started in 1987 when we were asked by the FBI to verify some information about the travel agency in question. We did that. This travel agency was having an account with the BCCC.

We had co-operation during the investigation. We transmitted information back and forth with the FBI, and the end result was that several people in the States were charged, were arrested for diverting funds in violation of the U.S. International Emergency Economic Powers Act, and several of them received sentences. One person was subsequently released. It is obviously on the public record in the States that he was released from the court. Mr. Mousa Hawamda was released on bail and did not return, so the RCMP does not know the whereabouts of this person at the present time, and there is a warrant for his arrest, which remains in effect in the U.S.

This Mr. Hawamda was a client of the BCCC, and that is the only relation to this financial institution. And, as I said, the investigation was for violation of the U.S. International Emergency Economic Powers Act.

Mr. Manley: May I ask you, arising from that, whether you are aware that the manager of BCCC in Ottawa, Anwar Khan, apparently was in touch with Mr. Hawamda as late as October 1988 when he was a fugitive from the FBI?

D/Commr Favreau: No, I do not know that.

Mr. Manley: I believe we had this information previously as well from Mr. Bowie, that the force had assisted the FBI in this investigation. Did you endeavour to determine whether any officials from BCCC had knowledge of the fact that the money was being used to attempt to avoid the effect of U.S. law?

D/Commr Favreau: I will leave Mr. Bowie to answer that one.

Je voudrais, pour commencer, vous demander simplement si vous pouvez nous parler des enquêtes qui mettaient en cause la Banque de crédit et de commerce international ou sa filiale canadienne ou les deux et nous dire ce que la Gendarmerie savait au sujet des activités de la banque à la suite de ces enquêtes.

S.-comm. Favreau: Je vais donner un début de réponse, après quoi j'inviterai mes collègues, qui connaissent peut-être le dossier plus en détail, à prendre le relais.

Je voudrais d'abord apporter une petite précision. De notre point de vue, en tout cas, le fait qu'une banque ou une institution financière ou même un simple particulier soit mentionné dans le cours d'une enquête ne signifie pas que l'enquête porte sur l'institution financière ou la personne en question. Je vais donc vous parler de l'enquête sur l'agence de voyage Manara.

Cette enquête avait été lancée aux termes de la Loi sur les infractions en matière de sécurité; vous comprendrez donc que je devrai omettre certains détails. Tout a commencé en 1987 quand le FBI nous a demandé de vérifier certains renseignements sur l'agence de voyage en question. Nous l'avons fait. Cette agence de voyage avait un compte à la BCCC.

Nous avons collaboré pendant l'enquête. Nous avons échangé des renseignements avec le FBI et, au bout du compte, des accusations ont été portées aux États-Unis contre plusieurs personnes qui ont été arrêtées pour avoir détourné des fonds en infraction de la loi américaine intitulée International Emergency Economic Powers Act, et plusieurs de ces personnes ont été condamnées. L'une d'entre elles a été libérée par la suite. C'est évidemment du domaine public aux États-Unis que cette personne a été libérée par le tribunal. M. Mousa Hawamda a été libéré sous caution et est disparu, de sorte que la GRC ne connaît pas les coordonnées de cette personne à l'heure actuelle. Il y a un mandat d'arrestation à son nom qui demeure en vigueur aux États-Unis.

Ce M. Hawamda était un client de la BCCC; c'est le seul lien que l'on a établi avec cette institution financière. Je le répète, l'enquête portait sur une infraction à la loi américaine intitulée International Emergency Economic Powers Act.

M. Manley: Puis-je vous demander, compte tenu de ce que vous venez de dire, si vous savez que le directeur de la BCCC à Ottawa, Anwar Khan, a apparemment communiqué avec M. Hawamda jusqu'en octobre 1988, quand ce dernier était un fugitif recherché par le FBI?

S.-comm. Favreau: Non, je ne le savais pas.

M. Manley: Je crois que c'est M. Bowie qui nous a fourni ce renseignement; il a dit que la GRC avait aidé le FBI dans cette enquête. Avez-vous cherché à savoir si des dirigeants de la BCCC étaient au courant du fait que l'argent était utilisé de manière à chercher à échapper à l'emprise d'une loi américaine?

S.-comm. Favreau: Je laisserai à M. Bowie le soin de répondre à cette question.

[Texte]

Inspector B.W. Bowie (Officer in Charge, Anti-Drug Profiteering Section, Drug Enforcement Directorate, Royal Canadian Mounted Police): I am sorry, I think it was Mr. Kaine who was referring to it last. I do not know anything about that particular case at all.

D/Commr Favreau: Maybe in order to help a bit I will—

Mr. Manley: The essence of the question is this: did anyone in the RCMP endeavour to investigate whether the BCCC connection in this case was with the knowledge that illegal activities were going to occur? Did anyone ask those questions or attempt to investigate that?

D/Commr Favreau: Yes. To my knowledge, there was no illegality in Canada to start with. It was a question of the Libyans rerouting money to the States because of United States laws at that time.

Mr. Manley: In other words, you would not regard it as offensive for a Canadian financial institution to be a co-conspirator in contravention of U.S. laws.

D/Commr Favreau: No, that is not what I said at all. What I am saying is—

Mr. Manley: I know that is not what you said, but—

D/Commr Favreau: Yes, but you said, "In other words" that is what I said. So I say, no, that is not what I am saying.

Mr. Manley: Then clarify, because really that is the essence of this question, that if the bank's officers knew what was going on and knowingly helped to do it, they were conspiring with, in this case, Hawamda, to breach the U.S. Treasury Department order.

D/Commr Favreau: No, this is not correct. My recollection of the case is that there was a bank account. Some people would deposit some money in that bank account and somebody else would make some retraits, withdrawals. As for what the bank knew about it, it is going a bit too far to assume they knew that. This kind of business could be done through other financial institutions, and nothing would permit us to assume under this investigation that the bank—or the manager of the bank, or any person from the bank—was aware of what was going on.

Mr. Manley: Except that there is nothing to cause you to assume that. The purport of the question—and this is in the context of what you may or may not have known about BCCI from other sources—was whether you made any further investigation that would have led you either to believe or not to believe that conspiracy was occurring here.

D/Commr Favreau: There was nothing that made us believe that there was conspiracy, and if my memory serves me right, we received co-operation from the financial institution in question.

Mr. Manley: You did receive co-operation?

D/Commr Favreau: Yes, we did.

Mr. Manley: Do you have anything more that you want to say about Manara Travel before we move on?

[Traduction]

Inspecteur B.W. Bowie (officier responsable, Section des enquêtes économiques antidrogue, Direction de la police des drogues, Gendarmerie royale du Canada): Je vous demande pardon, mais je crois que c'est M. Kaine qui en a parlé la dernière fois. Je ne sais rien de ce cas-là.

S.-comm. Favreau: Je pourrais peut-être vous aider en disant. . .

M. Manley: Voici ma question: Y a-t-il quelqu'un à la GRC qui a tenté de déterminer si le contact à la BCCC savait qu'allaient se produire des activités illégales? Quelqu'un a-t-il posé ces questions ou tenté de pousser l'enquête?

S.-comm. Favreau: Oui. À ma connaissance, il n'était pas question au départ d'illégalité au Canada. Les Libyens acheminaient des fonds vers les États-Unis en raison des lois en vigueur à cette époque aux États-Unis.

M. Manley: Autrement dit, vous ne jugeriez pas répréhensible qu'une institution financière canadienne conspire avec d'autres pour enfreindre les lois américaines.

S.-comm. Favreau: Non, ce n'est pas du tout ce que j'ai dit. J'essaie plutôt de dire. . .

M. Manley: Je sais que ce n'est pas ce que vous avez dit, mais. . .

S.-comm. Favreau: Oui, mais vous avez dit: «Autrement dit», c'est ce que vous avez dit. Alors je réponds, non, ce n'est pas ce que je dis.

M. Manley: Alors s'il vous plaît expliquez-vous, parce que c'est le coeur même de cette question. Si les dirigeants de la banque savaient ce qui se passait et en ont été sciemment complices, ils conspiraient alors en réalité avec Hawamda, pour enfreindre une ordonnance du Département du trésor américain.

S.-comm. Favreau: Non, ce n'est pas exact. Si ma mémoire de l'affaire est bonne, il y avait un compte à la banque. Certaines personnes y déposaient des fonds et quelqu'un d'autre effectuait les retraits. C'est aller un peu trop loin que de présumer que la banque savait ce qui se passait. Le même genre de transaction aurait pu se faire par le biais d'autres institutions financières, et rien ne nous permettait de supposer dans le cadre de cette enquête que la banque, ou le directeur de la banque, ou l'un de ses employés, savait ce qui se passait.

M. Manley: Sauf qu'il n'y a rien qui vous permette de supposer que ce n'était pas le cas. Le but de cette question—il s'agit de déterminer ce que vous pouviez avoir appris au sujet de la BCCI d'autres sources—c'est de déterminer si vous avez fait d'autres enquêtes qui vous auraient amenés à croire, ou à ne pas croire, qu'il y avait complot.

S.-comm. Favreau: Rien ne nous a fait croire qu'il y avait complot et, si ma mémoire est fidèle, l'institution financière en question a collaboré avec nous.

M. Manley: Vous avez pu compter sur leur collaboration?

S.-comm. Favreau: Oui.

M. Manley: Avez-vous autre chose à ajouter au sujet de l'agence de voyage Manara avant que nous ne passions à autre chose?

[Texte]

D/Commr Favreau: To my knowledge, at that period of time, no, we did not know about what you are saying—to my knowledge.

Mr. Langdon (Essex—Windsor): To your knowledge or the force's knowledge?

D/Commr Favreau: To my knowledge.

Mr. Manley: Would anyone else on the force have had knowledge of that?

D/Commr Favreau: I suppose I would have to have some analysts review files and try to find out about it, but the reason I say that is because we were in direct relations with the FBI at the time of the travel agency investigation. Had they had suspicions about BCCI—there was obviously an exchange of communication all the time—they would have mentioned that to us. And that is not the case. That is why I say, to my knowledge, I do not recall anything of that nature.

Mr. Manley: The piece that does not add up for me on this is why you were not suspicious, "you" being the force, of BCCC.

This is quite remarkable that a small travel agency is being implicated in this kind of activity in northern Virginia and Washington, and to do so without the knowledge of the local manager, if not of his assistants, strikes me as being something that I would want to investigate if I were in your shoes. That is why I am asking you, did it not raise any flags at all? Did it not make you curious about whether or not there might be some reason for this connection?

D/Commr Favreau: It did not raise any flag, to use your expression, because we received co-operation. The information from the FBI did not raise that kind of implication, and we received assistance from the bank. That kind of transaction is possible within all other systems of the système bancaire.

To go from a gut feeling and start investigating a bank is not permissible in Canada, and thank God for that.

Mr. Manley: Well, it is not a matter of just going from a gut feeling. Of course, hindsight is always perfect, but now we are looking at a situation where we have been told by our chief financial regulator that this was one big bad apple and Canadian depositors have lost a lot of money because nobody asked this kind of question in a timely fashion.

What I am asking you is why you would simply rely on the fact that the FBI did not make that connection for you. They have successfully prosecuted seven people in the United States. Some were deported at this timeframe, and you have a clear connection in this case—and we have not yet got to any of the other cases Sargent talked about, which are perhaps more suspicious than Manara Travel. Why would you not investigate whether the bank, through its local

S.-comm. Favreau: À ma connaissance, non, nous n'étions pas au courant de ce que vous venez de nous dire—pas à ma connaissance.

M. Langdon (Essex—Windsor): À votre connaissance ou à la connaissance de la Gendarmerie?

S.-comm. Favreau: À ma connaissance.

M. Manley: Est-ce que quelqu'un d'autre au sein de la Gendarmerie en avait connaissance?

S.-comm. Favreau: Il faudrait, j'imagine, que je demande à mes analystes de revoir les dossiers pour m'en assurer, mais je le dis parce que nous étions directement en relations avec le FBI à l'époque de l'enquête menée au sujet de l'agence de voyage. Si le FBI avait eu des soupçons au sujet de la BCCI—car bien sûr nous échangions constamment des informations—il nous l'aurait dit. Il ne l'a pas fait. C'est pourquoi je dis qu'à ma connaissance, je ne pense pas qu'il y ait eu quelque chose de cette nature.

M. Manley: Ce qui m'apparaît étrange dans cette affaire, c'est que vous n'ayez eu aucun soupçon au sujet de la BCCC. Quand je dis «vous», je veux parler de la Gendarmerie.

Il est assez étrange qu'une petite agence de voyage se lance dans ce genre d'activités dans le nord de la Virginie et à Washington et qu'elle puisse le faire à l'insu du directeur de la succursale locale ou de ses assistants, me paraît quelque chose qui mérite que l'on s'y intéresse si j'étais à votre place. C'est pourquoi je vous demande pour quelle raison cela ne vous a pas fait dresser l'oreille. N'avez-vous pas cherché à savoir s'il pouvait y avoir une explication quelconque à l'existence d'une telle relation?

S.-comm. Favreau: Cela ne nous a pas fait dresser l'oreille, pour reprendre votre expression, parce que nous agissions en collaboration. Les informations fournies par le FBI ne permettaient pas de tirer ce genre de conclusion et nous recevions l'aide de la banque. Ce genre de transaction est possible dans tous les autres secteurs du «banking system».

Il n'est pas possible d'entreprendre une enquête sur une banque en se fiant uniquement à ses convictions intimes, et c'est très bien comme ça.

M. Manley: Il ne s'agit pas simplement de se fier à ses convictions intimes. On peut toujours argumenter, bien sûr, après coup, mais nous nous retrouvons aujourd'hui dans une situation qui fait que notre principal contrôleur financier nous déclare que l'affaire était d'importance et que les déposants canadiens ont perdu beaucoup d'argent parce que personne n'a posé les questions qu'il fallait en temps utile.

Je vous demande pour quelle raison vous vous êtes contentés du fait que le FBI n'avait pas fait le rapprochement pour vous. Il avait poursuivi avec succès sept personnes aux États-Unis. Certaines d'entre elles avaient déjà été déportées à l'époque et il y avait un lien évident dans cette affaire—et je n'ai pas encore parlé des autres affaires que nous a mentionnées Sargent, qui éveillent peut-être encore davantage de soupçons que celle de l'agence de manager, was encouraging or in some way facilitating this kind of banking practice?

D/Commr Favreau: Simply put, we did not have any grounds to believe that.

Mr. Langdon: I, too, welcome the representatives from the RCMP here today. Certainly the testimony of the two people who were here before was very helpful, despite the fact that they were here in a sense with some direction that they were not to be answering those sorts of questions. So now that you are here actually to answer those questions, I look forward to even more co-operation and more helpfulness.

There has been a reference to Monday's testimony by Mr. Sargent. What position did Mr. Sargent have?

D/Commr Favreau: Do you mean when he was in the force? He was a constable and he was working for Economic Crime.

Mr. Langdon: And he was with the force for 13 years, as he testified?

D/Commr Favreau: That is right.

Mr. Langdon: He testified Monday night, and I quote from the transcript:

> I was aware of the Bank of Credit and Commerce's reputation at the international level and so was everybody else.

I then asked him what that reputation was. His answer was

> I think the recent Maclean's article summed it up. They called it the Bank of Crooks and Criminals, or whatever. That seemed to be a reputation that was widely held, particularly in the United States.

He went on to refer to the investigation in Tampa, Florida as some evidence of this.

Given that we are talking about a fair number of cases, as Mr. Bowie indicated at the last hearing where he testified, in which BCCC was involved as one of the transmitting agents in money-laundering situations, but given especially that reputation and the fact that it was known to and accepted by members of the force, why was there not an investigation of the bank itself as early as 1988, when the information from the Tampa case had been communicated? Mr. Sargent indicated that he had read a memo with respect to that case as a member of the force. So we are talking 1988, and I have to ask why an investigation was not initiated at that stage.

voyage Maniara. Pourquoi n'avez-vous pas fait enquête pour savoir si la banque, par l'intermédiaire du directeur de sa succursale locale, encourageait ou facilitait d'une manière ou d'une autre ce genre de pratique bancaire?

S.-comm. Favreau: Tout simplement, parce que nous n'avions aucune raison de le penser.

M. Langdon: Je souhaite moi aussi la bienvenue aux représentants de la GRC qui comparaissent devant nous aujourd'hui. Le témoignage des deux personnes qui vous ont précédés s'est révélé particulièrement utile, en dépit du fait qu'elles se sont en quelque sorte présentées devant nous en ayant plus ou moins la directive de ne pas répondre à ce genre de questions. Vous êtes maintenant ici pour répondre effectivement à ces questions et je m'attends à encore davantage de collaboration de votre part et à des témoignages encore plus utiles.

Nous avons fait allusion au témoignage fourni lundi par M. Sargent. Quel était le poste de M. Sargent?

S.-comm. Favreau: Vous voulez dire, lorsqu'il faisait partie de la Gendarmerie? C'était un gendarme qui travaillait à la Section de la police économique.

M. Langdon: Et, d'après son témoignage, il était au service du corps de police depuis 13 ans?

S.-comm. Favreau: C'est exact.

M. Langdon: Il a témoigné lundi soir et je cite la transcription:

> Comme tout le monde, je connaissais la réputation de la Banque de crédit et de commerce au niveau international.

Je lui ai alors demandé quelle était cette réputation et il m'a répondu.

> Je pense que l'article publié récemment par Maclean's la résume bien. On y parle d'une bande d'escrocs et de criminels ou de quelque chose comme ça. Il semble que cette réputation était largement répandue, surtout aux États-Unis.

Il a cité ensuite en exemple l'enquête menée à Tampa, en Floride.

Étant donné que nous parlons ici d'un assez grand nombre d'affaires, comme M. Bowie l'a mentionné dans son dernier témoignage, qui impliquaient la BCCC en tant qu'agent intermédiaire dans des opérations consistant à blanchir de l'argent, mais étant donné surtout la réputation de la Banque et le fait que les membres de la Gendarmerie en avaient parfaitement connaissance, pour quelle raison n'a-t-on pas procédé à une enquête sur la Banque elle-même dès 1988, lorsque les renseignements au sujet de l'affaire de Tampa ont été communiqués? M. Sargent nous a indiqué que lorsqu'il était membre de la Gendarmerie il avait lu une note de service au sujet de cette affaire. Ça remonte à 1988 et il me faut vous demander pour quelle raison une enquête n'a pas été entreprise à ce moment-là.

D/Commr Favreau: I think I have a few comments before I pass the floor to Mr. Doucette. I think it is always extremely risky in anybody's testimony to use words like "everybody knows something" and to use articles of the media as reference to imply that somebody or everybody is crooked, etc.

Constable Sargent went into the force. If he had all that criminal intelligence and knowledge, he should have done something at that time and brought it to the attention of his superior. I think he is talking in retrospect. At the time, in all the cases we have mentioned so far, and a few more I am sure we will be touching, you have a bank, among other banks most of the time, that is named. To this day we do not have grounds in Canada to investigate the BCCC—I am not talking about the BCCI—and this is after communication with our counterparts in the States and the U.K.

I think in previous testimony Mr. Bowie made it very clear that you do not have any more privileges toward a financial institution than you have toward any citizen of Canada. You just do not start an investigation when you do not have grounds. I think maybe Mr. Doucette will want to continue on that. Did I answer?

Mr. Langdon: I think you have answered the question, but let me pursue it, because you suggest that Mr. Sargent should have taken this further. Well, of course, he did. He testified to us on Monday that in 1989 he had discussions with the Superintendent of Financial Institutions' office and that these discussions specifically involved the activities of the bank, specifically their request to be able to transfer cash amounts each morning and each afternoon in the city of Ottawa of $250,000. He also suggested that he took this further by suggesting that this entire subject of investigation, which he was following, required more staff and more resources to be put into it. He put a request to his superiors, and according to his testimony on Monday night that request was turned down.

I have two questions that come out of that. Did Mr. Sargent carry on discussions with the Office of the Superindendent of Financial Institutions simply on his own initiative or was this part of an investigation process that was understood and approved by the RCMP?

Secondly, why was Mr. Sargent's request for more help turned down in this case?

A/Commr Doucette: Well I think the investigation that he was relating to was the one that he was involved in personally. This particular. . .maybe in retrospect I should like to give it—

Mr. Langdon: I am sorry. "Personally" means what?

[Traduction]

S.-comm. Favreau: J'aimerais faire quelques observations avant de passer la parole à M. Doucette. Je considère qu'il est toujours très risqué de dire dans un témoignage des choses comme «Je connaissais comme tout le monde» et de se servir d'articles de presse pour laisser entendre que quelqu'un est un escroc, que tout le monde est pourri, etc.

M. Sargent était un agent appartenant au corps de police. S'il avait obtenu tous ces renseignements sur des activités criminelles, il aurait dû faire quelque chose et les signaler à l'attention de son supérieur. Et je pense qu'il raisonne à posteriori. A l'époque, dans toutes les affaires que nous avons mentionnées jusqu'à présent et dans un certain nombre d'autres que nous ne manquerons pas d'évoquer, il y a la plupart du temps une banque qui est nommée parmi d'autres. Aujourd'hui encore, nous n'avons aucun motif au Canada pour enquêter au sujet de la BCCC—je ne parle pas de la BCCI—et cela après les communications qui ont eu lieu avec nos collègues des États-Unis et du Royaume-Uni.

Je considère que le témoignage antérieur de M. Bowie a bien montré que l'on n'a pas plus de prérogatives vis-à-vis d'un établissement financier que l'on en a vis-à-vis d'un quelconque citoyen au Canada. On ne peut tout simplement pas faire enquête lorsqu'on n'a pas de motifs de le faire. Je vais maintenant laisser la parole à M. Doucette. Est-ce que j'ai bien répondu à la question?

M. Langdon: Je pense que vous avez répondu à la question, mais j'aimerais poursuivre dans cette voie parce que vous laissez entendre que M. Sargent aurait dû poursuivre davantage l'affaire. C'est bien ce qu'il a fait. Il nous a déclaré lundi dans son témoignage qu'il avait eu en 1989 des entretiens avec les responsables du Bureau du surintendant des institutions financières et que ces entretiens avaient porté précisément sur les activités de la banque, et notamment le fait qu'elle voulait pouvoir transférer tous les matins et tous les après-midi des montants de 250,000$ en liquide à Ottawa. Il a aussi indiqué qu'il était allé plus loin en mentionnant que toute l'affaire qu'il était en train de suivre exigeait davantage de personnel et davantage de ressources. Il a fait une demande en ce sens à ses supérieurs et, d'après le témoignage qu'il nous a donné lundi soir, il a essuyé un refus.

J'ai deux questions à vous poser à ce sujet. Est-ce de sa propre initiative que M. Sargent s'est entretenu avec les responsables du Bureau du surintendant des institutions financières ou est-ce que cela faisait partie d'une enquête reconnue et approuvée par la GRC?

En second lieu, pour quelle raison la demande de M. Sargent, qui voulait avoir davantage d'aide dans cette affaire, a-t-elle été refusée?

Comm. adj. Doucette: En fait, je pense que l'enquête qu'il a mentionnée était celle dans laquelle il était personnellement impliqué. Cette affaire. . .il faudrait peut-être avec le recul que je. . .

M. Langdon: Excusez-moi, mais qu'entendez-vous par «personnellement»?

[Text]

A/Commr Doucette: No, I mean the force. As a member of the force we had, in 1988, an investigation related to sophisticated money transfer systems that involved a number of chartered banks—a number of chartered banks. We investigated this particular group for over a year and a half, and we were unable to trace. As you know, the law states that to prove an offence under the Criminal Code as stipulated in section 462.3, you must link those funds to an enterprise crime offence or to a drug-related offence. In other words, it must be proceeds of crime.

We investigated these large transfers of money, again through many chartered banks, and after a year and a half we were unable to trace the money to a specific criminal offence. Therefore, after a year and a half we concluded the file.

Mr. Langdon: Well, I am sorry that—

A/Commr Doucette: And the second part of your question is if he asked for additional personnel. That was his own personal view. It was submitted through channels and his supervisor turned it down. That's the way the process goes. That was only his personal view—he was a constable—and at the time it was decided after a year and a half of investigation, not being able to link this money to proceeds of crime, the investigation was concluded. Again, I would like to stress we were never able to link where the source of that money came from. Secondly, never, never were any officials or any directors or any employees of any chartered banks even suspected.

Mr. Langdon: Let me go back to the two questions that I asked and, with respect, that you have not answered. Did discussions take place, as Mr. Sargent testified, with OSFI, the Office of the Superintendent of Financial Institutions, with respect to the specific BCCC request to be able to transfer in cash, both morning and afternoon, $250,000 to a branch that Mr. Sargent suggested might have cash needs of just $20,000 in a day? First, did that take place, and was it part of an RCMP official investigation?

Second, I understand, of course, the lines of authority by which a request for additional resources is either approved or not approved, but what I am asking you as people responsible is what reason was. . . Given the significant amount of money that was being moved here—something like $60 million a year in the one case that was related to us by Mr. Sargent—why was that request refused?

A/Commr Doucette: Again, to be specific, it was close to $53 million, which is again very significant. I did mention that it was a sophisticated money transfer system. That we agree. The financial institution, OSFI, was advised. There were general discussions with them.

Comm. adj. Doucette: Non, je veux parler du corps de police. En tant que membre de la Gendarmerie, menait en 1988 une enquête portant sur des mécanismes de transfert d'argent très complexes impliquant un grand nombre de banques à charte—un certain nombre de banques à charte. Nous avons fait enquête sur ce groupe en particulier pendant plus d'un an et demi et nous n'avons pas pu retracer les fonds. Vous n'ignorez pas que la loi nous oblige, pour qu'on puisse prouver l'existence d'une infraction en vertu des dispositions de l'article 462.3 du Code criminel, à relier ces fonds à une entreprise criminelle ou à une infraction liée à la drogue. Autrement dit, il faut que l'argent soit le produit du crime.

Nous avons fait enquête sur ces gros transferts de fonds, qui passaient là encore par l'entremise de nombreuses banques à charte, et au bout d'un an et demi nous n'avons pas pu relier l'argent à une infraction criminelle précise. En conséquence, au bout d'un an et demi, nous avons clos le dossier.

M. Langdon: Eh bien, je regrette que. . .

Comm. adj. Doucette: Dans la deuxième partie de votre question, vous me demandez s'il avait requis du personnel supplémentaire. Il s'agissait de son opinion personnelle. Il l'a transmise par la voie hiérarchique normale et son supérieur a rejeté sa demande. C'est la façon dont fonctionne le système. C'était uniquement son opinion personnelle—il n'était que gendarme à l'époque—et il a été décidé au bout d'un an et demi d'enquête, alors qu'on ne parvenait pas à rattacher cet argent au produit du crime, de clore l'enquête. J'insiste à nouveau sur le fait que nous n'avons jamais pu remonter à la source de cet argent. En second lieu, jamais aucun responsable, aucun administrateur et aucun employé d'une banque à charte n'a été soupçonné.

M. Langdon: Laissez-moi vous reposer mes deux questions car je vous fais remarquer respectueusement que vous n'y avez pas répondu. Est-ce qu'il y a eu des entretiens, comme l'a déclaré M. Sargent dans son témoignage, avec le BSIF, le Bureau du surintendant des institutions financières, au sujet d'une demande bien précise de la BCCC, qui voulait pouvoir transférer tous les matins et tous les après-midi 250,000$ en liquide dans une succursale qui, selon M. Sargent, n'avait vraisemblablement que de 20,000$ en liquide par jour? Est-ce que ces entretiens ont tout d'abord eu lieu et ensuite est-ce qu'ils faisaient partie d'une enquête officielle de la GRC?

Deuxièmement, je comprends bien entendu qu'il y a une voie hiérarchique à suivre lorsqu'on demande des ressources supplémentaires et que cette demande est ensuite acceptée ou refusée, mais ce que je veux que vous me disiez en tant que responsable c'est pour quelle raison. . . étant donné les sommes importantes qui étaient transférées en espèces quelque chose comme 60 millions de dollars par an dans l'affaire qui nous a été signalée par M. Sargent—pour quelle raison a-t-on refusé cette demande?

Comm. adj. Doucette: Là encore, pour être précis, il s'agissait de près de 53 millions de dollars, ce qui est évidemment très important. J'ai indiqué qu'il s'agissait d'un mécanisme de transfert d'argent très complexe. Nous sommes bien d'accord avec ça. Le service responsable des institutions financières, le BSIF, a été informé. Nous avons eu avec lui des entretiens de nature générale.

[Texte]

Mr. Langdon: Were there specific discussions with respect to the point regarding BCCC that Mr. Sargent related to us?

• 1015

A/Commr Doucette: I can check in the file. I know there was continuous communication because of the large amount of money that was transferred. The bottom line was that at the end of a year and a half, we could never link it to a criminal activity. It is legal to transfer money—the amount does not matter—to banks. That is the nature of their business.

The problem is that we have to link it to a criminal activity. If you do not have a criminal activity, you have no offence. After a year and a half, we could never link it to a criminal activity; therefore, we concluded the file.

Mr. Langdon: I recognize that you concluded the file, but that is still not the question.

A/Commr Doucette: Again, you asked—

Mr. Langdon: I understand that you are going to check your files for that, and I appreciate that, but my other question is specifically why the request for assistance was turned down. I am not an expert on police investigations, but if we are talking about $53 million, you indicate, in flows, and you are talking about a very sophisticated system... I understand from Mr. Sargent's testimony that there were simply two people investigating it. You say, well, nothing was found. Surely if more resources had been put into it, you would feel more confident about your conclusion that no criminal activity was involved.

A/Commr Doucette: That is a presumption and an opinion from Mr. Sargent. We had very capable supervisors at the time, and with the priorities of other investigations it was decided by the supervisor at the time that the resources put at their disposal were sufficient.

Mr. Langdon: What was the name of this project or this investigation from the RCMP's perspective? What label did you attach to it?

A/Commr Doucette: Project Albus.

Mr. Langdon: Project Albus is the investigation that led to an investigation of the force's activities with respect to Senator Cogger. Is that correct?

A/Commr Doucette: Yes, it is.

Mr. Langdon: One of the clear issues that emerged in Mr. Sargent's testimony was the role of Paul Vidosa, who was one of the people who drew direct connections with BCCC according to Mr. Sargent's testimony.

I have two questions. This is a question that has been asked in other contexts, but I wanted to ask first why Mr. Vidosa was hired or commissioned, or whatever the correct phrase would be, to play a role in Project Albus given the prohibition against contact with him that had been established by the RCMP Commissioner in the early part of the 1980s.

M. Langdon: Y a-t-il eu des entretiens portant précisément sur la question que nous a mentionnée M. Sargent de la BCCC?

Comm. adj. Doucette: Je peux vérifier dans les dossiers. Je sais qu'il y a eu une communication constante parce qu'une grande quantité d'argent était transférée. Il n'en reste pas moins qu'au bout d'un an et demi, nous étions dans l'incapacité de rattacher ces transferts à une activité criminelle. Il est légal de transférer de l'argent—le montant importe peu—dans les banques. C'est pour cela qu'elles existent.

Il nous fallait pouvoir rattacher ces transferts à une activité criminelle. Sans activité criminelle, il n'y a pas d'infraction. Au bout d'un an et demi, étant dans l'incapacité de constater la présence d'une activité criminelle, nous avons clos le dossier.

M. Langdon: Je sais bien que vous avez clos le dossier, mais je vous répète que ce n'est pas la question.

Comm. adj. Doucette: Une fois de plus vous m'avez demandé...

M. Langdon: Je sais que vous allez vérifier dans vos dossiers, et j'en prends bonne note, mais mon autre question porte précisément sur la raison pour laquelle cette demande d'aide a été refusée. Je ne suis pas un spécialiste des enquêtes de police, mais lorsqu'on parle de transferts de fonds du montant que vous mentionnez, soit environ 53 millions de dollars, lorsqu'on parle d'un système très complexe... J'ai cru comprendre d'après le témoignage de M. Sargent qu'il n'y avait que deux personnes qui faisaient enquête. Vous nous dites qu'on n'a rien trouvé. J'imagine que si l'on avait accordé davantage de ressources à cette enquête, il vous aurait été possible de conclure plus sûrement qu'aucune activité criminelle n'était en cause.

Comm. adj. Doucette: Ce ne sont que des suppositions et qu'un jugement personnel de la part de M. Sargent. Nous avions des responsables très compétents à l'époque et, compte tenu des priorités devant être accordées à d'autres enquêtes, son supérieur hiérarchique a décidé à l'époque que les ressources qui étaient mises à sa disposition étaient suffisantes.

M. Langdon: Quel était le nom de ce projet ou de cette enquête pour les besoins de la GRC? Quel était le nom de code que vous lui aviez donné?

Comm. adj. Doucette: C'était le projet Albus.

M. Langdon: Le projet Albus est le nom de l'enquête qui a amené la Gendarmerie à enquêter sur les activités du sénateur Cogger. C'est exact?

Comm. adj. Doucette: Oui, en effet.

M. Langdon: L'un des éléments clés du témoignage de M. Sargent est le rôle joué par Paul Vidosa, l'une des personnes en relations directes avec la BCCC d'après le témoignage de M. Sargent.

J'ai deux questions à vous poser à ce sujet. L'une a déjà été posée dans d'autres circonstances, mais j'aimerais vous demander tout d'abord pour quelle raison M. Vidosa a été engagé ou recruté, si vous préférez, pour jouer un rôle dans le projet Albus étant donné que le commissaire de la GRC avait interdit tout contact avec lui au début des années 80.

[Text]

Second, I want to ask specifically why Mr. Vidosa was asked to approach the manager of BCCC here in Ottawa as part of this investigation.

D/Commr Favreau: I will answer the first part for you, sir.

Why was Mr. Vidosa, in our terms, reactivated? It was definitely, first of all, a mistake to reactivate him. There was instruction by the commissioner at the time across Canada that this source was not to be used again. It is now public knowledge through the Cogger investigation and through Mr. Marin's report that the Deputy Commissioner, Operations, at the time—

Mr. Langdon: That was Mr. Jensen.

D/Commr Favreau: Yes. In the absence of the commissioner of the time, he decided, probably because of numbers like we have in front of us, to reactivate this person under the recommendation of Constable Sargent and Sergeant Elrick.

Mr. Langdon: I am sorry. May I just ask you to explain "numbers such as those we have in front of us"?

D/Commr Favreau: When you are talking about huge transfers of funds, the objective—

Mr. Langdon: Oh, those were the numbers to which you were referring.

D/Commr Favreau: That is right, the objective of the force of attacking proceeds of crime, etc.

Then there was a recommendation made to him, supported by a director, and Mr. Jensen decided to reverse that decision. That is the first part of the answer, I believe.

The other part—Norm could address it better than I can.

A/Commr Doucette: As you know, Mr. Langdon, in investigations we have certain police techniques at our disposal. I must say that we tried everything because of the amounts of money that were being transferred, all polytechnics. In fact, it brings back to memory, we were using our surveillance teams. We were using whatever investigative abilities we had at our disposal, including sources—and Mr. Vidosa was that source—in order to try to obtain some kind of information, some background information. Where is this money coming from? What is the criminal link here? It just did not work out.

Coming back again to the aspect of resources, here in headquarters, as a co-ordinator and directing this investigation, we used our resources in the field as well, so therefore there were not just two investigators doing the whole thing across Canada. We had our surveillance teams, we had our investigators in the field assisting these members, and that is on record as well.

Therefore, just to mention your question, why Vidosa? Again, the deputy answered that particular question. It is a normal technique of policing using sources and we used. . . He was the one.

[Translation]

En second lieu, j'aimerais que vous me disiez précisément pour quelle raison il a été demandé à M. Vidosa de contacter le directeur de la BCCC, ici à Ottawa, dans le cadre de cette enquête.

S.-comm. Favreau: Je vais répondre à la première partie de votre question.

Pourquoi a-t-on réactivé M. Vidosa, c'est le terme que nous employons? Tout d'abord, ce fut de toute évidence une erreur. Le commissaire avait donné instruction à l'époque, dans tout le Canada, de ne plus utiliser cette source. Il est désormais de notoriété publique, grâce à l'enquête concernant M. Cogger et au rapport de M. Marin que le sous-commissaire à la police opérationnelle, à l'époque. . .

M. Langdon: C'était M. Jensen.

S.-comm. Favreau: Oui. En l'absence du commissaire à l'époque, il a décidé, probablement en raison des sommes en jeu, de réactiver cette personne sur la recommandation du gendarme Sargent et du sergent Elrick.

M. Langdon: Excusez-moi, mais pouvez-vous me dire exactement ce que vous entendez par «les sommes en jeu»?

S.-comm. Favreau: Lorsqu'on parle de transferts de fonds aussi importants, l'objectif. . .

M. Langdon: Ah, ce sont là les sommes dont vous parlez.

S.-comm. Favreau: L'objectif du corps de police qui était de s'en prendre aux produits du crime, etc..

Il y a eu une recommandation en ce sens, appuyée par un directeur, et M. Jansen a décidé d'annuler cette décision. C'est la première partie de la réponse, je crois.

Quant à la deuxième partie—Norm pourra vous en parler mieux que moi.

Comm. adj. Doucette: Comme vous le savez, monsieur Langdon, lors des enquêtes, nous avons un certain nombre de techniques de police à notre disposition. Je dois vous dire que nous avons tout essayé en raison de l'importance des sommes qui étaient transférées, tout un éventail de techniques. Ça me rappelle d'ailleurs que nous faisions usage de nos équipes de surveillance. Nous avons fait appel à toutes les techniques d'enquête que nous avions à notre disposition, y compris à l'utilisation d'informateurs—et M. Vidosa était l'informateur—pour essayer d'obtenir des renseignements, des renseignements de base. D'où venait cet argent? Quel était le lien avec la criminalité en l'espèce? Ça n'a tout simplement rien donné.

Pour en revenir une fois de plus aux ressources, nous coordonnions et nous dirigeons l'enquête ici au quartier général, mais nous avions aussi des ressources sur le terrain et il n'est donc pas juste de dire que nous n'avions que deux enquêteurs sur l'ensemble de l'affaire au Canada. Il y avait nos équipes de surveillance, nos enquêteurs sur le terrain qui aidaient les membres du corps de police, et ça figure là aussi au dossier.

Donc, je reviens à votre question, pourquoi Vidosa? Là encore, le sous-commissaire a répondu à cette question. C'est une technique normale de police que de recourir à des informateurs et nous avons employé. . . C'est lui qu'on a choisi.

Mr. Langdon: If I may go back again to the specific question I asked, which was why, as part of this investigation—there were two questions I asked—Vidosa was hired, and secondly, why Vidosa was . . I do not know whether he was instructed or whether it was suggested or what was the mechanism of communication, but why, in any event, did he make the approach that he did to the manager of BCCC here in Ottawa? That approach certainly was a source of considerable suspicion for Mr. Sargent as a member of your force.

A/Commr Doucette: I will answer that as well.

I mentioned in the beginning that various chartered banks were used by this particular group. In order to establish a line of credit and a bank account, we opened a bank account, and we just happened to use BCCI. He was asked to go there in order to have some kind of credibility.

I checked that particular point, even as far as yesterday. Again, we just happened to use that particular bank because someone knew that manager, and he opened a line of credit there in order to establish some kind of credibility to further his—

D/Commr Favreau: Infiltration.

A/Commr Doucette: —infiltration of the group.

Mr. Langdon: Excuse me, but what we have here is a bank about which a member of your force has had direct personal discussions with OSFI, because of concern about the methods of transferring money that they are using, which leads him to think there is something involving money laundering here, and an agent under his authority just happens to choose that bank to open an account. Are you seriously asking us to believe that this is all sheer happenstance?

• 1025

A/Commr Doucette: No. It is clearly indicated—

Mr. Langdon: Surely there was some kind of logic that directed Mr. Vidosa to go to the BCCC, the same bank that was being discussed by a member of your force with OSFI at the very moment this was taking place.

A/Commr Doucette: I totally agree. As I said, there were many banks involved on this particular occasion. We have documented on file that Mr. Vidosa was asked to go by his brother-in-law because he knew Mr. Khan at the BCCC, and that is exactly what he did. He met with him for 15 minutes to open a line of credit, and that was it and that is all. There was no follow-up even by the investigators and that was the end of it.

Mr. Langdon: Why was there no follow-up by the investigators if in fact they indicated considerable suspicion—

[Traduction]

M. Langdon: Si je puis me permettre de revenir une fois de plus à la question précise que je vous ai posée, c'est-à-dire pourquoi, dans le cadre de cette enquête—je vous ai posé deux questions—pourquoi a-t-on engagé Vidosa et, deuxièmement, pourquoi a-t-on. . Je ne sais pas si on l'a suggéré à Vidosa, si on lui en a donné l'instruction ou quel a été le mécanisme de communication employé, mais quoi qu'il en soit, pour quelle raison a-t-il choisi de s'adresser comme il l'a fait au directeur de la BCCC ici à Ottawa? Cette façon de faire a dû éveiller bien des soupçons chez M. Sargent en tant que membre de votre corps de police.

Comm. adj. Doucette: Je peux aussi vous répondre sur ce point.

Je vous ai indiqué au début que le groupe en question avait fait appel à différentes banques à charte. Afin d'obtenir une marge de crédit et un compte bancaire, nous avons ouvert un compte bancaire et il se trouve que nous l'avons fait à la BCCI. On lui a demandé de s'adresser là pour qu'il puisse avoir une certaine crédibilité.

Pas plus tard qu'hier, j'ai vérifié ce point en particulier. Si là encore nous avons eu recours à cette banque, c'est parce que quelqu'un en connaissait le directeur et y a ouvert une marge de crédit pour pouvoir acquérir une certaine crédibilité et entreprendre. . .

S.-comm. Favreau: Son infiltration.

Comm. adj. Doucette: . . son infiltration du groupe.

M. Langdon: Excusez-moi, mais nous avons là une banque au sujet de laquelle un membre de votre corps de police a eu des entretiens directs avec le personnel du BSIF parce que l'on s'inquiétait des méthodes de transfert de fonds qui y étaient employées, ce qui l'amenait à penser que l'on y blanchissait de l'argent, et il se trouve qu'un agent placé sous son autorité ouvre justement un compte dans cette banque. Est-ce que vous pensez sérieusement qu'on va vous croire quand vous dites que c'est un simple concours de circonstances?

Comm. adj. Doucette: Non. Il est clairement indiqué. . .

M. Langdon: Il y a certainement une certaine logique qui veut que M. Vidosa se soit adressé à la BCCC, la banque qui faisait justement l'objet d'entretiens entre un membre de votre corps de police et le BSIF au moment où l'opération a eu lieu?

Comm. adj. Doucette: Je suis tout à fait d'accord. Comme je vous l'ai dit, de nombreuses banques étaient impliquées dans cette affaire. Il est consigné au dossier que M. Vidosa s'est adressé à cette banque sur la recommandation de son beau-frère, qui connaissait M. Khan à la BCCC, et c'est exactement ce qu'il a fait. Il s'est entretenu avec lui pendant 15 minutes pour ouvrir une marge de crédit et ça s'arrête là. Les enquêteurs n'ont pas suivi l'affaire et on n'en a plus parlé.

M. Langdon: Pourquoi les enquêteurs n'ont-ils pas suivi l'affaire puisqu'ils avaient de forts soupçons. . .

A/Commr Doucette: It was used afterwards for other things, but all he did was open an account, as he would have done with any other bank account, but we are not targeting the bank here. We are talking about the group. We have no reason to believe that at the time that the bank, the employees or officials . . . We were just opening a bank account, and that is documented on the file.

Mr. Langdon: This despite the fact that the investigation that was taking place in Dallas, which Mr. Sargent talked to us about, indicated that there were phone calls by the people who were subsequently charged and convicted under U.S. law to the BCCC head office in Toronto and to the BCCC office in Vancouver. Again, the fact that this was taking place had nothing to do with the discussions with OSFI about BCCC and had nothing to do with the fact that Mr. Vidosa approached this specific bank.

D/Commr Favreau: Just a second, just to make sure, I want to try to give as clear an answer as possible, and correct me if I am wrong. My understanding of this case is that it is Mr. Vidosa who chose the bank and the handler went along.

Mr. Langdon: Could you check that for us.

D/Commr Favreau: That was one of the problems we had in all cases with Mr. Vidosa. He would run his own thing and the handler would have very much difficulty to control him. That is one of the reasons why we did not want to do business with Mr. Vidosa anymore, and that is another example—that he, through his brother-in-law, chose that bank and we went along in the persons of the two investigators.

We were discussing the possibility of bringing in another piece of information for the benefit of the committee, but I am not able to do that because of ongoing process.

Mr. Manley: In the discussion with Mr. Langdon, you talked about opening a bank account and a line of credit, which very often are opened simultaneously. But to get a line of credit you usually have to produce financial statements or give some kind of security. They are not 15-minute sign-up-at-the-counter operations. What did Vidosa have there, and if it was a line of credit, do you have any knowledge of how he was able to provide security for that?

A/Commr Doucette: Mr. Manley, to answer that question, there was a mention of his mortgage and also some kind of business relationship with his brother-in-law. Therefore, it was a normal line of credit.

Mr. Manley: Was it limited?

A/Commr Doucette: I have no idea.

Mr. Manley: Did the force do anything to assure payment of that line of credit if it was used?

A/Commr Doucette: It was never used.

Mr. Manley: No, but banks do not give lines of credit with Christmas cards. You have to be able to establish that you can repay.

Comm. adj. Doucette: On s'en est servi plus tard pour d'autres choses, mais tout ce qu'a fait notre informateur, c'est ouvrir un compte, comme il aurait pu le faire dans n'importe quelle banque, la banque n'était pas visée dans l'affaire. Nous n'avions aucune raison de croire qu'à l'époque, la banque, les employés ou les responsables. . . Nous n'avons fait qu'ouvrir un compte bancaire, et c'est consigné dans le dossier.

M. Langdon: Cela en dépit du fait que l'enquête menée à Dallas, M. Sargent nous en a parlé, avait révélé que des appels téléphoniques avaient été faits au siège social de la BCCC à Toronto ainsi qu'au bureau de la BCCC à Vancouver par des gens qui par la suite ont été inculpés et reconnus coupables en vertu de la législation des États-Unis. Vous nous dites là encore que tous ces événements n'avaient rien à voir avec les entretiens qui ont eu lieu avec le BSIF au sujet de la BCCC et rien à voir avec le fait que M. Vidosa s'est adressé à cette banque en particulier.

S.-comm. Favreau: Un instant; pour être sûr que nous nous comprenons bien, j'aimerais donner une précision, vous me reprendrez si j'ai tort. D'après ce que je comprends de cette affaire, c'est M. Vidosa qui a choisi cette banque et son contact a accepté son choix.

M. Langdon: Pourriez-vous vous en assurer?

S.-comm. Favreau: C'est l'une des difficultés que nous a posées M. Vidosa chaque fois que nous avons eu affaire à lui. Il en faisait à sa tête et son contact avait bien de la difficulté à le contrôler. C'est pourquoi nous ne voulons plus avoir affaire à M. Vidosa et nous en avons ici un autre exemple—c'est lui qui, par l'entremise de son beau-frère, a choisi la banque et les deux enquêteurs ont entériné son choix.

Nous avons envisagé la possibilité de fournir une autre information à l'intention des membres du comité, mais ça m'est impossible parce que l'affaire reste en cours.

M. Manley: En répondant à M. Langdon, vous avez parlé de l'ouverture d'un compte bancaire et d'une marge de crédit, deux opérations qui se font souvent simultanément. Toutefois, pour obtenir une marge de crédit, il faut généralement fournir des états financiers ou donner une certaine forme de garantie. Ce ne sont pas des opérations qui peuvent se faire en 15 minutes au guichet de la banque. De quoi disposait M. Vidosa, et, s'il s'agissait d'une marge de crédit, savez-vous s'il a pu donner quelque chose en garantie?

Comm. adj. Doucette: Je puis vous répondre, monsieur Manley, en vous disant qu'il était question de son hypothèque et aussi de certaines relations d'affaires qu'il avait avec son beau-frère. C'était donc une marge de crédit normale.

M. Manley: Y avait-il une limite?

Comm. adj. Doucette: Je n'en ai aucune idée.

M. Manley: Est-ce que le corps de police a fait quelque chose pour garantir le paiement de cette marge de crédit au cas où elle serait utilisée?

Comm. adj. Doucette: Elle n'a jamais été utilisée.

M. Manley: Très bien, mais les banques ne donnent pas des marges de crédit dans des pochettes-surprises. Il vous faut prouver que vous êtes en mesure de rembourser.

Mr. Soetens (Ontario): Standard Trust do.

The Acting Chairman (Mr. Sobeski): Your question is really if the force—

Mr. Manley: Mr. Sargent told us that the line of credit he had was unlimited, which makes me more curious, if this was a normal banking relationship, about how payment was assured.

D/Commr Favreau: I do not believe that is so. We will have to check on that specific question.

Mr. Langdon: Mr. Chairman, I would like to ask a procedural question. A number of people from the RCMP who are here were introduced at the start. Somebody seems to be providing a good deal of information on this, and I wondered if he might be introduced to the committee as well.

The Acting Chairman (Mr. Sobeski): That is fine, but it seems a lot of people on all sides of the table are getting a lot of other people, too.

I will ask the inspector if he wants to clarify.

D/Commr Favreau: The person who came to us is Sergeant Goulet. He is a review analyst for the director in the Economic Crime group.

Mr. Thompson (Carleton—Charlotte): Gentlemen, I have not been as involved as some of the committee members on this. I think this is only the second day I have been here as you have appeared before us.

I will back up a little. What sorts of flags, bells, and whistles have to go off to initiate an investigation by the RCMP on any bank, whether it is a Schedule A or Schedule B bank? What precipitates an investigation by you people, particularly, of course, as it relates to money laundering, which of course is the question here today?

D/Commr Favreau: I think the answer Mr. Bowie gave the last time is still valid. I might ask him to elaborate a bit more.

To start an investigation by the RCMP, whether you are talking about laundering of money or you are talking about something else, you need grounds. You need complaints, you need people coming forward and telling you that this thing is going on, or you need to learn through another investigation that something worth investigating is going on. There is always that ground that if you want to go further in any grounds other than allegations, you are going to have to go to a court and convince the judge that you have reasonable doubt to believe that an offence is being committed here. You cannot just go into a bank because in one investigation the account happened to be at that bank, because somebody opened a credit line in a bank, or because somebody else made some telephone call to that bank. These are things that are being done every day, hundreds of times across this country, in other financial institutions.

I think Mr. Bowie explained that very properly the last time.

[Translation]

M. Soetens (Ontario): C'est ce que fait la Standard Trust.

Le président suppléant (M. Sobeski): Vous voulez en fait savoir si le corps de police...

M. Manley: Monsieur Sargent nous a dit que la marge de crédit dont il disposait était illimitée, ce qui m'amène à me poser des questions, s'il s'agissait d'une relation bancaire normale, sur la façon dont le paiement était garanti.

S.-comm. Favreau: Je ne crois pas que cela se soit passé comme cela. Il nous faudra faire des vérifications sur ce point en particulier.

M. Langdon: Monsieur le président, j'aimerais poser une question de procédure. Un certain nombre de représentants de la GRC qui sont ici parmi nous ont été présentés au départ. Il semble que quelqu'un se charge de donner de nombreux renseignements sur cette question et j'aimerais qu'il soit présenté lui aussi au comité.

Le président suppléant (M. Sobeski): C'est très bien, mais il semble aussi que des deux côtés de la table on fasse appel aussi à de nombreuses personnes.

L'inspecteur peut-il nous donner les précisions demandées?

S.-comm. Favreau: La personne qui est venue vers nous est le sergent Goulet. C'est un analyste attaché au directeur de la Police économique.

M. Thompson (Carleton—Charlotte): Messieurs, je ne suis pas aussi assidu que certains des autres membres de ce comité. Je pense que c'est la deuxième fois seulement que j'assiste aux travaux du comité alors que vous comparaissez parmi nous.

Je vais revenir un peu en arrière. Quelle sorte de sonnettes, de cloches et d'alarmes doivent retentir pour que la GRC déclenche une enquête sur une banque, que cette dernière relève de l'annexe A ou de l'annexe B? Qu'est-ce qui vous amène à déclencher une enquête, notamment lorsqu'il s'agit d'opération consistant à blanchir de l'argent, ce qui est évidemment la question qui nous occupe ici?

S.-comm. Favreau: Je pense que la dernière réponse que vous a donnée M. Bowie reste toujours valable. Je peux lui demander de préciser davantage sa pensée.

Pour que la GRC déclenche une enquête, qu'il s'agisse d'argent blanchi ou d'autre chose, il faut des motifs. Il faut des plaintes, il faut que des gens s'adressent à nous pour nous dire que telle ou telle chose ne va pas ou il faut apprendre au cours d'une autre enquête qu'il se passe quelque chose qui mérite que l'on s'y attarde. On en revient toujours au fait que lorsqu'on veut agir parce que l'on a des motifs et non pas sur de simples allégations, il faut pouvoir aller devant un juge et le convaincre que l'on a des doutes raisonnables de croire que l'on est en train de commettre une infraction. On ne peut pas s'en prendre à une banque simplement parce qu'on s'est aperçu au cours d'une enquête qu'un compte a été ouvert dans cette banque, que quelqu'un a obtenu une marge de crédit ou que quelqu'un d'autre a fait un appel téléphonique à cette banque. Ce sont des choses qui se font tous les jours, des centaines de fois au pays, dans d'autres établissements financiers.

Il me semble que M. Bowie vous l'a très bien expliqué la dernière fois.

[Text]

Bruce, would you like to add a bit to that?

Insp Bowie: Essentially, to initiate an investigation. . . We are always looking through various files and trying to determine what institutions might be weak links and what might be a promising avenue of investigation. It just does not halt with the initial scenario. If there is a possibility of expanding an investigation, then it is done.

Specifically in the BCCC, in 1988, and the times that were alluded to by Mr. Sargent, as far as I am concerned there was no indication that would substantiate the opening up of an investigation into the entire institution. The grounds legally and the grounds that would motivate someone to initiate an investigation were not there.

Mr. Thompson: Would the $53 million that has been mentioned as moving in and out of BCCC not be suspect in and of itself? Is that a normal transfer of dollars from one country to another, from one banking institution to another?

Insp Bowie: In terms of the money-laundering activity that we see continually, $50 million is a significant amount, but it is not by any stretch the largest type of case we have seen.

The Acting Chairman (Mr. Sobeski): Just on a point of clarification—I saw some nods—Mr. Doucette.

A/Commr Doucette: I would like to clarify for the committee. The statement made was that $53 million was to BCCC, which is incorrect. There were many chartered banks involved in Canada.

Mr. Thompson: Mr. Bowie mentioned in his initial remarks that you are always looking for a weak link. Is a Schedule B bank, for example, one of those weak links, if you are comparing a Schedule B bank to a Schedule A bank? To clarify this, could you point out some of the weak links or some of the things that constitute a Schedule B bank versus a Schedule A bank that might indicate that it is a weak link?

Insp Bowie: I do not think it is fair to characterize Schedule B or Schedule II banks as being weak links in comparison to Schedule A or Schedule I banks. Again, I cannot recall whether it is I and II or A and B.

Some Canadian chartered banks engage in very little, if any, retail banking at all. So that criterion cuts out an awful lot of the Schedule B banks for money laundering at all. They simply do not engage in retail banking as we know it.

A number of banks engage in specialized types of activities.

When I said "weak link", I was referring to if an institution, whether it is a branch of a bank, whether it is a bank itself, comes up continually in files, then that is a trigger for investigative agencies such as ours to pursue it a bit further, if it is possible, to keep open the possibility that there might be a way of expanding the investigation. We are always looking, and we always ask our investigators, to ensure, in the course of investigations, that they satisfy themselves that the investigation has gone as far as it is going to go.

Bruce, avez-vous quelque chose à ajouter?

Insp. Bowie: Grosso modo, pour entreprendre une enquête. . . On examine toujours différents dossiers pour essayer de déterminer quels sont les établissements qui sont susceptibles d'être les maillons faibles de la chaîne et d'offrir les meilleures possibilités d'enquête. On ne s'en tient pas simplement au scénario original. S'il y a la possibilité d'étendre l'enquête, on le fait.

En ce qui concerne plus précisément la BCCC, en 1988, et à l'époque mentionnée par M. Sargent, rien ne justifiait à mon avis que l'on déclenche une enquête sur l'ensemble de l'établissement. Il n'y avait pas de motifs juridiques et de raisons susceptibles d'amener quelqu'un à entreprendre une enquête.

M. Thompson: Les 53 millions de dollars dont vous avez parlé qui entraient à la BCCC et en ressortaient n'étaient-ils pas suspects en soi? S'agit-il d'un transfert normal de fonds d'un pays à un autre ou d'un établissement bancaire à un autre?

Insp. Bowie: Par rapport à l'argent qui est blanchi en permanence, 50 millions de dollars, c'est une somme importante, mais c'est loin d'être la plus grosse affaire que nous ayons vue.

Le président suppléant (M. Sobeski): Si vous voulez apporter une précision—j'ai vu quelques hochements de tête—monsieur Doucette, vous avez la parole.

Comm. adj. Doucette: J'aimerais apporter une précision à l'intention du comité. On a déclaré que les 53 millions de dollars concernaient la BCCC, ce qui est inexact. Il y avait de nombreuses banques à charte impliquées au Canada.

M. Thompson: M. Bowie a dit au début de son intervention que vous recherchiez toujours le maillon faible de la chaîne. Est-ce qu'une banque figurant à l'annexe B, par exemple, est l'un de ces maillons faibles lorsqu'on la compare à une banque figurant à l'annexe A? Pour plus de précisions, pourriez-vous nous donner des exemples de ces maillons faibles ou dire ce qui peut faire qu'une banque de l'annexe B constitue un maillon faible par rapport à une banque de l'annexe A?

Insp. Bowie: Je ne crois pas qu'il soit juste de qualifier de maillons faibles les banques de l'annexe B ou de l'annexe II par rapport à celles de l'annexe A ou de l'annexe I. Là encore, je ne me rappelle plus si l'on parle de I et II ou de A et B.

Certaines banques à charte canadiennes ne font pas, ou pratiquement pas, d'opérations bancaires au détail. Ce critère fait qu'une grande quantité de banques figurant à l'annexe B ne peuvent absolument pas blanchir de l'argent. Elles ne font tout simplement pas d'opérations bancaires au détail, si vous voulez.

Un certain nombre de banques exercent des activités spécialisées.

Lorsque j'ai parlé de «maillon faible», je voulais parler d'un établissement, que ce soit une succursale bancaire ou la banque elle-même, qui revient constamment dans les dossiers, ce qui amène des services d'enquête tels que le nôtre à pousser les recherches un peu plus loin, si c'est possible, pour élargir éventuellement l'enquête. Nous nous efforçons toujours, et nous demandons à nos enquêteurs, de faire en sorte, au cours de nos enquêtes, d'être certains que l'on est allé aussi loin dans l'enquête qu'il était possible d'aller.

[Texte]

Mr. Thompson: Getting back to Schedule A, Schedule B, is there anything in the make-up of the ownership of the Schedule B bank—that is, foreign investment or foreign ownership—that could be a weak link versus a Schedule A bank, which is virtually Canadian ownership? In other words, offshore interests could have and would have the controlling interest in a Schedule B bank. Would that in itself present a problem or difficulty, or make or create that weak link to which you have referred?

Insp Bowie: That is very difficult to say, because I do not think the criterion for having a Schedule B implies foreign ownership. I think Schedule I banks are restricted because they are widely held. I think the criterion is that no more than 10% of a Schedule I bank—or 5%—can be held by one individual, regardless of whether they are foreign or domestic.

Mr. Thompson: Maybe someone on the committee could clarify, either on this side of the table, the other side or maybe the chairman himself, whether it is true that a Schedule II bank could be entirely foreign owned.

Mr. Basil Zafiriou (Committee Researcher): In fact, most Schedule II banks are subsidiaries of foreign banks. You can have a domestically owned Schedule II bank, but only as a start-up. For the first 10 years you are allowed to have a closely held, domestically owned bank, but then you have to divest, and the criterion is that you have to go down to 10%. So Schedule II banks, essentially, are all foreign owned.

Mr. Thompson: I guess the point I am trying to make, Mr. Chairman, through you to Mr. Bowie, is that the make-up, the composition of that Schedule II bank would tend to indicate to me that if there is going to be a case of money laundering, they may be more suspect, or the potential for suspect, than a Schedule I bank.

Insp Bowie: I do not subscribe to that criterion, sir, with respect. I do not think the ownership of the bank necessarily implies that it is going to be susceptible to money laundering.

Mr. Thompson: How do Schedule II banks take possession of money? Can you walk in with cash in a Schedule II bank and deposit cash in a Schedule II bank? Is it possible? Do they take cash deposits?

Insp Bowie: Yes, there are a number that take cash deposits, that deal in retail banking.

Mr. Thompson: Of course, we understand the nature of a Schedule I bank and the retail aspect of a Schedule I bank, but again, because of the make-up and the ownership of a Schedule II bank, there is a possibility in my mind that this type of thing, this money laundering, could occur there a little bit easier than it could in a Schedule I bank.

[Traduction]

M. Thompson: Pour en revenir aux banques figurant à l'annexe A ou à l'annexe B, y a-t-il quelque chose dans la composition des banques figurant à l'annexe B—investissement étranger ou propriété étrangère—qui constituerait un maillon faible par rapport à une banque de l'annexe A, dont la propriété est pratiquement canadienne? En d'autres termes, des intérêts étrangers sont susceptibles de contrôler une banque figurant à l'annexe B. Est-ce que c'est pour vous un problème ou une source de difficulté ou est-ce que cela vous amène à y voir le maillon faible dont vous avez parlé?

Insp. Bowie: C'est très difficile à dire parce que je ne crois pas que le critère qui fait qu'une banque figure à l'annexe B soit celui de la propriété étrangère. Il me semble qu'on est limité dans le cas des banques figurant à l'annexe I parce que leurs actions sont largement réparties dans le public. Je pense que le critère, c'est qu'une seule et même personne ne peut pas détenir plus de 10 p. 100—ou 5 p. 100—des actions d'une banque figurant à l'annexe I, qu'elle soit étrangère ou canadienne.

M. Thompson: Quelqu'un ici pourrait-il nous dire, que ce soit de ce côté de la table, de l'autre côté ou peut-être même le président lui-même, s'il est vrai qu'une banque figurant à l'annexe II peut être intégralement possédée par des étrangers.

M. Basil Zafiriou (recherchiste du Comité): En effet, la plupart des banques figurant à l'annexe II sont les filiales de banques étrangères. On peut avoir une banque de l'annexe II à propriété nationale, mais seulement pour démarrer. Pendant les 10 premières années, on est autorisé à posséder une banque nationale en limitant le nombre des propriétaires, mais il faut ensuite répartir plus largement les actions et le critère, c'est qu'on ne peut plus en avoir plus de 10 p. 100. Donc, pour l'essentiel, les banques inscrites à l'annexe II sont toutes à propriété étrangère.

M. Thompson: Monsieur le président, ce que je m'efforce de faire comprendre par votre intermédiaire à M. Bowie, c'est que la nature, la composition d'une banque figurant à l'annexe II me donne à penser que si l'on constate que de l'argent est blanchi, il est possible qu'elle soit davantage suspecte, ou risque d'être plus suspecte, qu'une banque figurant à l'annexe I.

Insp. Bowie: Excusez-moi, mais je ne suis pas d'accord avec ce critère. Je ne crois pas que le type de propriété de la banque implique nécessairement qu'elle sera davantage susceptible de blanchir de l'argent.

M. Thompson: Comment les banques qui figurent à l'annexe II se procurent-elles l'argent? Peut-on entrer avec de l'argent liquide dans une banque figurant à l'annexe II et le déposer? Est-ce possible? Est-ce qu'elles acceptent des dépôts en liquide?

Insp. Bowie: Oui, il y en a un certain nombre qui acceptent des dépôts en liquide, qui font des opérations bancaires au détail.

M. Thompson: Évidemment, nous comprenons bien quelle est la nature d'une banque figurant à l'annexe I et les opérations qu'elle fait au détail, mais je vous répète qu'en raison de la composition et du type de propriété d'une banque figurant à l'annexe II, il est possible à mon avis que ce genre d'opération, le fait de blanchir de l'argent, soit un peu plus facile que dans une banque figurant à l'annexe I.

[Text]

D/Commr Favreau: With all due respect, and also with all good intention to give as much information as we can, I am not sure it is up to us, the RCMP, to start giving an opinion about one kind of bank being a little bit better than the other one, and it translates. . .

Mr. Thompson: We are not talking about that, sir.

D/Commr Favreau: No, but whether we like it or not, it translates into this, exactly this.

Mr. Thompson: The only point I am attempting to make. . . Something flags a problem. As I say, the bells and whistles go off. I am just attempting to point out that because of the make-up of that bank, there seem to be more bells and whistles, and there seems to be more potential for wrongdoing in a Schedule II bank than there would be a in Schedule I bank.

Mr. Gray (Windsor West): Did you tell Mr. Wilson that?

Mr. Thompson: You are not going to change the Bank Act; that is to change the Bank Act.

The Acting Chairman (Mr. Sobeski): The ownership issue gets into a whole bunch of other things that I think Mr. Gray is talking about.

Mr. Thompson: Is there anything inherent in the structure of a Schedule II bank that would make you watch that institution a little more closely?

D/Commr Favreau: In the case that we are talking about—a large sum of money, almost $53 million being moved to banks—we are talking about other very reputable, bonne réputation banks, and we are talking about five of them. I appreciate what you are trying to get at, about waving flags and being more careful about some institutions than others, but the other institutions involved are very reputable. That is why I find the question. . .

Mr. Thompson: Very reputable institutions.

D/Commr Favreau: I do not think it is fair to ask Mr. Bowie to go that deep into your question.

Mr. Thompson: Again, I am just giving out the structure of that. I guess the chairman is indicating he does not want me to pursue that line of questioning.

The Acting Chairman (Mr. Sobeski): Before I go over to Mr. Gray, I would like to ask a question. What is the working relationship between the Office of the Superintendent and the RCMP? The RCMP are obviously interested in regulating banks. At some point in time—I will pick up a Mr. Thompson point—maybe a red flag is raised and then it moves over to be economic crime or money laundering. Can you enlighten us on the relationship between the RCMP and OSFI?

[Translation]

S.-comm. Favreau: Avec tout le respect que je vous dois et en même temps dans l'intention de vous informer le mieux possible, je ne suis pas sûr que ce soit à nous, qu'il appartienne à la GRC de donner son avis concernant telle banque qui serait mieux à même que telle autre, et voilà à quoi se ramène. . .

M. Thompson: Il ne s'agit pas de ça.

S.-comm. Favreau: Bien sûr, mais que nous le voulions ou non, ça se ramène à ça, exactement à ça.

M. Thompson: Tout ce que je veux dire. . . Il y a à un moment donné un signal qui révèle l'existence d'un problème. Comme je vous l'ai dit, les sonnettes et les cloches se mettent à retentir. Je veux tout simplement faire remarquer qu'en raison de la composition de ce type de banque, il semble qu'il y ait davantage de cloches et de sonnettes et que les possibilités d'agissements irréguliers dans une banque figurant à l'annexe II soient plus grandes que dans celles qui relèvent de l'annexe I.

M. Gray (Windsor-Ouest): L'avez-vous dit à M. Wilson?

M. Thompson: Vous n'allez pas changer la Loi sur les banques; ça revient à changer la Loi sur les banques.

Le président suppléant (M. Sobeski): La question de la propriété renvoie à une quantité de choses et c'est à mon avis ce à quoi fait allusion M. Gray.

M. Thompson: Y a-t-il quelque chose d'inhérent à la structure des banques figurant à l'annexe II qui vous fait surveiller d'un peu plus près ce type d'établissement?

S.-comm. Favreau: Dans l'affaire dont nous parlons—des sommes considérables, près de 53 millions de dollars, étant passées par les banques—il est question d'autres banques de «bonne réputation», jouissant d'une excellente renommée, cinq en tout. Je comprends bien où vous voulez en venir lorsque vous nous dites qu'il y a des signaux qui doivent mettre la puce à l'oreille et qu'il faut prendre davantage de précautions avec certains établissements qu'avec d'autres, mais les autres établissements en cause jouissent d'une excellente réputation. C'est pourquoi je trouve la question. . .

M. Thompson: Des institutions qui ont très bonne réputation.

S.-comm. Favreau: Je ne pense pas qu'il soit juste de demander à M. Bowie d'aller tellement plus loin pour répondre à votre question.

M. Thompson: Je ne fais qu'en décrire la structure. Le président semble préférer que je change de sujet.

Le président suppléant (M. Sobeski): Avant de passer la parole à M. Gray, j'ai une question à poser. Quel lien la GRC entretient-elle avec le Bureau du surintendant? La GRC s'intéresse évidemment à la réglementation des banques. Il arrive parfois—pour reprendre un point qu'a soulevé M. Thompson—qu'une sonnette d'alarme retentisse, et il peut arriver que l'on ait affaire à un crime à caractère économique ou à une activité de blanchiment d'argent. Pouvez-vous nous parler un peu des rapports qui existent entre la GRC et le BSIF?

[Texte]

A/Commr Doucette: As far as my directorate is concerned we have a very close relationship on any offences relating to the Bank Act. I have a unit within my directorate that regularly, on a weekly basis, either through screening of employees or whatever, conducts investigations on behalf of OSFI for any aspects relating to the Bank Act. That is as far as my directorate is concerned.

Insp Bowie: In terms of the drug money-laundering field and relations with OSFI, we have a fairly close relationship. There is a continual, informal flow of information. If we uncover a case where a bank, a particular institution, may have been somewhat lax in taking an individual deposit, that information would be communicated.

Conversely, I have had discussions with officials of OSFI with respect to how this bank is being viewed, or have we had problems in terms of unacceptable or lax behaviour on behalf of individual banks? There is that exchange of information.

The Acting Chairman (Mr. Sobeski): I believe that during your first visit here you made a comment that Canada was a good place to do business from a money laundering point of view. Could you expand on what you meant, and maybe that might help Mr. Thompson on how money laundering works? Why is Canada such a good place for money launderers?

Insp Bowie: In my estimation Canada is no different from many of the other industrialized countries of the world. We have a relatively stable currency. We have a stable political system. We are in fairly close proximity to established trafficking routes, and we have a highly developed financial infrastructure. All of those attributes are things that a money launderer or an individual seeking to find a haven for their funds will seek out.

They are not necessarily going to want to invest their moneys in an undeveloped Third World country. Those are the criteria that cause Canada to be an attractive target, as well as other countries, the U.K., France, the United States and so on.

Mr. Gray: I think it was Mr. Favreau who said that in fact you have to have something to go on in starting an investigation, and one of the things Mr. Favreau mentioned was what people tell you.

I presume you are aware of the successful prosecution by the FBI of certain Libyans in Washington in a case that was linked with Manara Travel in Ottawa, and I presume you are aware of the prosecution of a group of people in Dallas. In both cases the common link that I note is a connection with the Ottawa branch of the Bank of Credit and Commerce International.

Comm. adj. Doucette: Ma direction s'intéresse de très près à toute infraction à la Loi sur les banques. Au sein de ma direction, j'ai un service qui, régulièrement, de façon hebdomadaire, soit à partir de renseignements obtenus par les employés ou autrement, mène des enquêtes au nom du BSIF sur tout ce qui a trait à la Loi sur les banques. Cela vaut pour ma direction.

Insp. Bowie: Pour ce qui est du blanchiment de l'argent tiré du trafic de la drogue, nous entretenons des rapports assez suivis avec le BSIF. Nous échangeons continuellement des renseignements d'une manière informelle. Lorsque nous découvrons qu'une banque, ou une institution en particulier, peut avoir accepté un peu trop facilement un dépôt de la part d'une certaine personne, nous en faisons part au BSIF.

J'ai aussi déjà eu des entretiens avec des employés du BSIF au sujet de certaines banques, à savoir si une institution ou une autre a déjà semblé agir d'une manière inacceptable ou un peu trop laxiste. Nous échangeons ainsi des renseignements.

Le président suppléant (M. Sobeski): Je me souviens vous avoir entendu dire, la première fois que vous êtes venu témoigner au comité, que le Canada est un endroit de prédilection pour le blanchiment de l'argent. Pouvez-vous développer un peu votre pensée là-dessus? Cela aidera peut-être M. Thompson à mieux comprendre le processus du blanchiment de l'argent. Pourquoi dites-vous cela au sujet du Canada?

Insp. Bowie: La situation au Canada n'est pas différente de celle qui prévaut dans les autres pays industrialisés. Notre devise est relativement stable, on peut en dire autant de notre système politique. Nous sommes assez près des voies établies qui servent au trafic des stupéfiants, et nous sommes dotés d'une infrastructure financière très développée. Tous ces attributs sont des conditions qui intéressent un individu à la recherche d'un refuge pour ses fonds.

Cela ne l'intéresse pas tellement d'investir son argent dans un pays du Tiers monde. Ce sont là les critères qui font du Canada une cible attrayante, comme d'autres pays, comme le Royaume-Uni, la France, les États-Unis, etc.

M. Gray: Je pense que c'est M. Favreau qui a dit qu'il faut pouvoir s'appuyer sur quelque chose pour pouvoir ouvrir une enquête, et l'une des choses qu'il a mentionnées, ce sont des renseignements donnés par certaines personnes.

Je suppose que vous êtes au courant de la réussite de l'enquête qu'a menée le FBI au sujet des activités d'un certain nombre de Libyens à Washington, dans un cas qui était lié à l'agence de voyage Manara d'Ottawa, tout comme, je suppose, des poursuites qui ont été entamées contre un groupe de personnes à Dallas. Dans les deux cas, le trait commun que je retiens est un lien avec la succursale d'Ottawa de la Banque de crédit et de commerce international.

There is also the prosecution of people by the American authorities in Tampa. These people were officials of the Bank of Credit and Commerce International, I believe, in that country. If, as you or one of your colleagues said, analysts keep looking for a name to pop up in files, why was that not a basis for you to take a special interest in the Bank of Credit and Commerce in Canada?

D/Commr Favreau: One of the cases you have referred to is obviously the travelling agency, where several people were charged under violation of the U.S. International Emergency Economic Powers Act, not under laundering money. Because the account was in Canada, we obviously asked questions.

I do not want to go by what was in the media, but a member of the committee has asked this question to the Americans, if there was any implication of the BCCC. The answer is still no, according to the Americans, and the answer is still no, according to the British. So it does not matter how many times you repeat a name or a number, in one investigation or two investigations, you need grounds to start something and those grounds are not there.

Mr. Gray: Perhaps you could explain why in this matter you relied so fully on the views of the American and British authorities as to whether there are grounds for an investigation in Canada.

D/Commr Favreau: You rely on them because they are already inside the system investigating, which we're not. Obviously, if you do not have the grounds, you do not go to the bank and start asking questions and asking for documents. They were already asking questions and asking for documents. We expected that if something had come to light there, it would certainly help us in our grounds to start something here in Canada.

Mr. Gray: Did you have a member of your force go to the United States to look through the files of evidence or potential evidence in these cases, to see whether or not there were grounds for a specific Canadian investigation of BCCC?

Insp Bowie: It might be helpful, Mr. Gray, if something was clarified about the nature of some of these investigations in the States. I am speaking about the Tampa investigation, for example.

We are not talking about an all-encompassing sweep of the BCCI. We are talking about a relatively minor, narrowly focused, sting operation involving some of the employees of the bank. The essence of the charge was that an undercover operator gave them government money, told them it was drug money, and had them move the money out of the country, into Nassau and back. My directorate was fully aware of the nature of the investigation.

Il y a aussi les poursuites qui ont été intentées contre certaines personnes par les autorités américaines à Tampa. Ces gens sont des administrateurs de la Banque de crédit et de commerce aux États-Unis. Si, comme vous ou l'un de vos collègues l'avez dit, vos analystes n'ont besoin que d'un nom, pourquoi ces indications n'ont-elles pas suffi pour que vous vous intéressiez de plus près à la Banque de crédit et de commerce Canada?

S.-comm. Favreau: Vous avez évidemment fait allusion au cas lié à l'agence de voyage, dans le contexte duquel plusieurs personnes ont été mises en accusation en vertu de l'International Emergency Economic Powers Act des États-Unis, et non pas pour avoir participé à une opération de blanchiment d'argent. Parce que le compte était au Canada, nous avons évidemment posé des questions.

Sans vouloir reprendre ce que l'on a dit dans les médias, un membre du comité a demandé aux Américains si la BCCC avait trempé dans l'affaire. La réponse est encore non, selon les Américains, et encore non, selon les Britanniques. Donc, peu importe le nombre de fois que l'on entend répéter un nom ou un numéro, pour entreprendre une enquête ou deux enquêtes, il faut des motifs, et il n'y en a pas.

M. Gray: Vous pourriez peut-être nous expliquer pourquoi, dans cette affaire, vous vous êtes tellement fiés aux autorités américaines et britanniques pour déterminer s'il y avait des motifs justifiant une enquête au Canada.

S.-comm. Favreau: Parce qu'ils sont déjà en train d'enquêter, mais pas nous. Évidemment, sans motif, il n'est pas question de se présenter dans une banque et de commencer à poser des questions et à demander de voir des documents. Les autorités américaines et britanniques le faisaient déjà. Si elles découvraient quelque chose là-bas, nous pensions que cela nous aiderait sûrement à obtenir des motifs suffisants pour entreprendre une enquête au Canada.

M. Gray: Avez-vous envoyé quelqu'un de la GRC aux États-Unis pour examiner les dossiers afin d'y relever quelques indices qui auraient pu permettre d'établir des motifs suffisants pour entreprendre une enquête auprès de la BCCC au Canada?

Insp. Bowie: Il pourrait être utile, monsieur Gray, d'apporter quelques précisions au sujet de la nature de certaines de ces enquêtes qui sont menées aux États-Unis. Je pense précisément à l'enquête à Tampa, par exemple.

Il faut préciser qu'il ne s'agissait pas d'une descente complète sur toutes les activités de la BCCI. Nous parlons plutôt d'une petite arnaque portant sur une activité très limitée et impliquant un certain nombre d'employés de la banque. Un agent d'infiltration des autorités américaines a remis à la banque de l'argent appartenant au gouvernement en lui disant qu'il s'agissait d'argent provenant du trafic de stupéfiants, et lui a demandé de sortir cet argent du pays, à destination de Nassau, et de le ramener aux États-Unis. Ma direction était parfaitement au courant du caractère de l'enquête.

It is simply something that is relatively minor, and it is not particularly relevant to any Canadian operations. It is akin to a corrupt manager of the Bank of Nova Scotia in Nassau. If that occurs, it has no relevance to us triggering an investigation into Nova Scotia as an institution in Canada.

Mr. Langdon: The bank itself paid a fine of $15 million.

Insp Bowie: Yes, they did.

Mr. Langdon: So this was not just individuals within the bank; it was the bank itself that was indicted. In fact, in the end it pleaded guilty and paid $15 million.

Insp Bowie: Yes, and that is common practice under that particular U.S. statute. The Bank of America in 1985 paid a fine of $7 million under similar circumstances.

Mr. Gray: Can you explain what the statute is? Do you have any knowledge of the nature of the offence that we are talking about in this Tampa case?

Insp Bowie: Yes. They were charged under the Money Laundering Control Act and also, if my information is correct, under a provision of the Bank Secrecy Act. One involves conducting the movement of moneys in such a way as it would constitute money laundering under U.S. law, even though the moneys were not criminal proceeds.

The second is failing to keep adequate records concerning the financial transactions.

Mr. Gray: Obviously, I presume at some point the committee will want to make recommendations based on what is learned about this total situation, recommendations for changes in our legislation or methods of administration and so on. Do I take it that there is a difference between the American law on money laundering and the Canadian one? Would you like to put that on the record so...?

Insp Bowie: Yes, there are differences between U.S. legislation and Canadian legislation. I am not suggesting for an instant that the U.S. legislation is better. It is just that there are differences.

For example, in our legislation we have a very comprehensive description of money laundering. But to proceed with a charge of money laundering against someone, it is incumbent that the funds being laundered are from a criminal activity. If there is simply the associated movements of money, regardless of the suspicious nature of the movement, if they are not criminal proceeds it is not money laundering.

Mr. Gray: I would like to suggest that our research officer provide us with a paper showing the distinctions.

I have before me a report in The Globe and Mail by Canadian Press that cash deposits of more than $65 million by a single customer at the Bank of Credit and Commerce in Toronto took place over a period of seven years. Was this something that came to the attention of your force? Are you aware of this?

[Traduction]

Il s'agit tout simplement d'une opération d'une importance relative, qui n'est pas particulièrement liée à des activités quelconques au Canada. C'est un peu comme s'il s'agissait du cas d'un directeur corrompu de la succursale de la Banque de Nouvelle-Écosse à Nassau. Cela ne justifierait pas que nous entreprenions une enquête sur l'ensemble de la Banque de Nouvelle-Écosse au Canada.

M. Langdon: La banque a payé une amende de 15 millions de dollars.

Insp. Bowie: Oui.

M. Langdon: Ce n'était donc pas uniquement des employés de la banque; la banque elle-même a été reconnue coupable. En bout de course, elle a plaidé coupable et versé 15 millions de dollars.

Insp. Bowie: Oui, et c'est pratique commune dans le contexte de cette loi américaine. La Bank of America, en 1985, a versé une amende de 7 millions de dollars dans des circonstances analogues.

M. Gray: Pouvez-vous nous indiquer un peu ce que dit cette loi? Savez-vous de quel genre d'infraction il s'agit dans le cas de Tampa?

Insp. Bowie: Oui. Dans le cas de Tampa, on invoque la Money Laundering Control Act et aussi, si mes renseignements sont justes, une disposition de la Bank Secrecy Act. Dans le premier cas, l'accusation est d'avoir déplacé des sommes d'argent d'une manière que la loi américaine reconnaît comme une opération de blanchiment d'argent, même si les fonds en question ne provenaient pas du crime.

Dans le deuxième cas, on a manqué à l'exigence de tenir des dossiers appropriés sur les opérations financières.

M. Gray: Évidemment, je suppose qu'à un certain moment, le comité voudra faire des recommandations partant de ce qu'il aura appris et qu'il voudra recommander d'apporter des modifications à nos lois ou à nos méthodes administratives, etc. Dois-je conclure qu'il y a une différence entre la loi américaine sur le blanchiment de l'argent et la loi canadienne? Voudriez-vous consigner cela au procès-verbal, afin que...?

Insp. Bowie: Oui, il y a des différences entre les lois américaines et les lois canadiennes en la matière. Je ne prétends absolument pas que les lois américaines sont meilleures. Je dis seulement qu'il y a des différences.

Par exemple, dans notre loi, nous avons une description très complète de ce qui constitue une activité de blanchiment d'argent. Mais pour porter des accusations contre quelqu'un pour avoir blanchi de l'argent, il faut que les fonds proviennent d'activités criminelles. S'il ne s'agit que de déplacements d'argent, quels que soient les doutes qu'ils soulèvent, si l'argent n'est pas le fruit d'activités criminelles, ce n'est pas considéré comme une activité de blanchiment d'argent.

M. Gray: Je souhaiterais que notre attaché de recherche nous prépare un document sur les différences qui existent.

J'ai ici un rapport de la Presse canadienne dans The Globe and Mail, dans lequel on relate que des dépôts en argent de plus de 65 millions de dollars ont été faits par un seul client à la Banque de crédit et de commerce à Toronto sur une période de sept ans. Êtes-vous au courant de cela?

[Text]

Insp Bowie: I am aware of the nature of the disclosure, yes.

Mr. Gray: The Globe and Mail reported that the deposits were carried out by a mysterious stranger, a mysterious customer carrying a briefcase full of cash, made over seven years until mid-1988 when they suddenly stopped.

Are you saying that this situation was brought to your attention?

Insp Bowie: Yes. That situation was brought to the attention of the RCMP.

Mr. Gray: And what happened?

Insp Bowie: There were no charges pursued because, again, the source of the moneys was not and could not be attributed to any criminal activity. There was no criminal source of the funds.

Mr. Gray: Did you maintain surveillance on the individual?

Insp Bowie: There was a small investigation at the outset of that particular activity; then it was folded into a larger investigation that was conducted by Economic Crime.

Mr. Gray: Are you talking about the case that you previously referred as Project Albus?

Insp Bowie: Yes, there are links in that situation.

Mr. Gray: Did I hear one of the witnesses in the force say that the investigation into Project Albus is concluded? Is this investigation concluded or is it still open?

Insp Bowie: I believe Assistant Commissioner Doucette would be—

A/Commr Doucette: As far as the RCMP is concerned, the criminal activity on money laundering is concluded, yes.

• 1100

Mr. Gray: We have just been informed in the course of this hearing that the media, when they ask about this matter, have always been told by your force that the investigation is still ongoing.

A/Commr Doucette: Not by the RCMP.

D/Commr Favreau: The problem we find ourselves in here, Mr. Gray, is that we do not want to damage things that are ongoing, not by the force, but we do not want to damage this, so we have to be very prudent. And we are in an open context here, so you will understand that we have difficulty answering this.

Mr. Gray: All right. If I can just move along with some other questions I have on Project Albus, that was the investigation in which Mr. Sargent was involved. Am I right in that?

A/Commr Doucette: Yes, that is correct.

Mr. Gray: That is what he was telling us about the other night.

In response to a question as to why, even though Mr. Sargent thought that there was enough for the investigation to be given more resources, a member of the force, one of the witnesses here, said that Mr. Sargent should have brought his information to the attention of his superiors. My recollection of Mr. Sargent's evidence was that he did that.

Insp. Bowie: Je suis au courant de cette divulgation, oui.

M. Gray: Dans The Globe and Mail, on dit que les dépôts étaient faits par un mystérieux étranger, un mystérieux client qui se présentait à la banque avec un porte-documents bourré d'argent. Ce petit manège a duré sept ans, jusqu'au milieu de 1988, où il a pris fin soudainement.

Vous dites que la chose a été portée à votre attention?

Insp. Bowie: Oui. Cet événement a été signalé à la GRC.

M. Gray: Et qu'est-il arrivé ensuite?

Insp. Bowie: Aucune accusation n'a été portée parce que, je le répète, on ne pouvait attribuer la provenance de l'argent à une quelconque activité criminelle. On n'a identifié aucune source à caractère criminel.

M. Gray: Avez-vous exercé une surveillance de l'individu en question?

Insp. Bowie: Nous avons fait une petite enquête, au début, relativement à cette activité particulière; puis, cette enquête en est venue à faire partie d'une enquête plus vaste que menait la Direction de la police économique.

M. Gray: Dans le cadre du projet Albus auquel vous avez déjà fait allusion?

Insp. Bowie: Oui, c'est cela. Cette enquête est liée à ce projet.

M. Gray: L'un des témoins, aujourd'hui, nous a-t-il dit que l'enquête menée dans le cadre du projet Albus est terminée? Pouvez-vous nous confirmer la chose?

Insp. Bowie: Je pense que le commissaire adjoint Doucette serait. . .

Comm. adj. Doucette: Pour la GRC, l'enquête sur le blanchiment de l'argent est terminée, oui.

M. Gray: Nous venons tout juste d'apprendre, au cours de cette audience, que les médias se sont toujours fait dire par des représentants de la GRC que l'enquête était encore en cours.

Comm. adj. Doucette: Pas par la GRC.

S.-comm. Favreau: Notre problème ici, monsieur Gray, c'est que nous ne voulons pas risquer de nuire à des enquêtes qui sont en cours, pas par la GRC, mais nous ne voulons pas courir ce risque. Nous devons donc être très prudents. Et, la séance d'aujourd'hui est publique. Vous comprendrez donc qu'il nous est difficile de répondre à cette question.

M. Gray: Très bien. J'ai quelques autres questions à poser au sujet du projet Albus. C'est l'enquête à laquelle participait M. Sargent, n'est-ce pas?

Comm. adj. Doucette: Oui, c'est juste.

M. Gray: C'est ce qu'il nous disait l'autre soir.

En réponse à une question sur les raisons pour lesquelles on a mis un terme à l'enquête malgré le fait que M. Sargent pensait qu'il était justifié de lui accorder des ressources additionnelles, un membre de la GRC, l'un des témoins, a dit que M. Sargent aurait dû transmettre ses renseignements à ses supérieurs. Si je me souviens bien, M. Sargent a dit l'avoir fait.

[Text]

D/Commr Favreau: I think Mr. Doucette did correct that, that it was, and stated that the investigation lasted a certain time, and after that it was an operational decision not to go any further.

Mr. Gray: Who made that decision?

D/Commr Favreau: It would be in Mr. Doucette's directorate.

A/Commr Doucette: At the time it would have been that supervisor.

Mr. Gray: Did that have to be reviewed at a higher level?

A/Commr Doucette: I will have to check the file, Mr. Gray, who actually made... I can find out who actually made the decision, if you want that.

Mr. Gray: Okay.

D/Commr Favreau: Maybe in order to help the committee a bit, and I know you are all familiar, at least partially, with the chain of command of the RCMP, but every manager along the road, Sargent being a constable, obviously reported to a sergeant, who reported to an inspector, who reports in headquarters to a director, who is usually an assistant commissioner. If Sargent at that time made a proposal to continue or to start an investigation, and after discussion, his boss, his immediate supervisor, decided, "No, we can't go any further on this one", unless he sees, really, a reason to push it further, this will not go to the attention of upper authorities, as the matter has been decided, and properly so, at a lower level of management. That is why your question is very, very detailed as to who at that time decided that the investigation had been lasting long enough.

Again, we already have a question that we want to come back to in writing, so we will be pleased to include that at the same time in our response.

Mr. Gray: I draw your attention to my recollection of Mr. Sargent's evidence the other night when he said that he reported to Mr. Stammler, who reported to Mr. Jensen. Could you comment on that at this point?

D/Commr Favreau: My recollection is that Sargent was working with Elrick and it is quite possible, yes, that in the special circumstances where Constable Sargent and Sergeant Elrick were working that they had access directly to the director, which is normal in our organization, following the Cogger and the Marin inquiry after that. But that has been corrected.

Sargent might be right in the sense that he had access to the director.

Mr. Gray: I would like to ask another question about this matter and then turn to one of the other cases mentioned.

I believe that Mr. Sargent told us the other night that there were only two members of the force involved in the Project Albus investigation, but I understood Assistant Commissioner Doucette to have said a little while ago that there were more than two people involved in Project Albus. Could Mr. Doucette clarify this for the committee?

[Traduction]

S.-comm. Favreau: Je pense que M. Doucette a précisé la chose, que c'est ce que l'on a fait, et a déclaré que l'enquête avait duré un certain temps, et que c'était une décision administrative qui y avait mis fin.

M. Gray: Qui a pris cette décision?

S.-comm. Favreau: Quelqu'un de la direction de M. Doucette.

Comm. adj. Doucette: À ce moment-là, c'est ce superviseur qui en aurait pris la décision.

M. Gray: Était-elle censée être examinée à un palier supérieur?

Comm. adj. Doucette: Je vais devoir vérifier dans le dossier, monsieur Gray, pour déterminer qui a vraiment... je peux trouver qui a pris la décision finale, si vous y tenez.

M. Gray: D'accord.

S.-comm. Favreau: Pour aider un peu le comité, et je sais que vous connaissez tous, au moins partiellement, la hiérarchie de commandement de la GRC, mais chacun des gestionnaires, M. Sargent étant un constable, relève évidemment d'un sergent, qui relève d'un inspecteur, qui lui, relève d'un directeur à l'Administration centrale qui est habituellement un commissaire adjoint. Si M. Sargent, à ce moment-là, a proposé de poursuivre ou d'entreprendre une enquête, et qu'après discussion, son patron, son supérieur immédiat, l'a décidé du contraire, à moins d'avoir trouvé, en réalité, une raison d'aller plus loin, la décision ne sera pas portée à l'attention des échelons supérieurs étant donné qu'elle a déjà été prise, et à juste titre, à un niveau administratif inférieur. C'est pourquoi votre question demande une réponse très précise, à savoir qui, à ce moment-là, a décidé que l'enquête avait assez duré.

Il y a déjà une question à laquelle nous sommes censés répondre par écrit. Nous vous donnerons aussi la réponse à celle-là en même temps.

M. Gray: J'attire votre attention sur le témoignage de M. Sargent, qui nous a dit l'autre soir avoir fait rapport à M. Stammler, qui a à son tour fait rapport à M. Jensen. Avez-vous des choses à nous dire là-dessus?

S.-comm. Favreau: Je me souviens que M. Sargent travaillait avec M. Elrick, et il est tout à fait possible, oui, que dans les circonstances particulières où le constable Sargent et le sergent Elrick travaillaient ensemble, ils aient eu accès directement au directeur, ce qui est normal chez-nous, après l'enquête Cogger et Marin. Mais, cette situation est maintenant redressée.

M. Sargent peut avoir raison de dire qu'il avait accès directement au directeur.

M. Gray: J'ai une autre question à poser à ce sujet, et je passerai ensuite à un autre cas qui a été mentionné.

Je pense que M. Sargent nous a dit, l'autre soir, qu'il n'y avait eu que deux membres de la GRC qui avaient travaillé à l'enquête dans le cadre du projet Albus, mais je pense que M. Doucette a dit, il y a quelque temps, que plus de deux personnes avaient travaillé à ce projet. M. Doucette pourrait-il nous donner quelques éclaircissements à ce sujet?

[Text]

A/Commr Doucette: I certainly will. As far as headquarters was concerned, that is correct. There were two members here.

However, with the span of the investigation, which actually went to other provinces, we also utilized the resources of other divisions, which were in support of the investigation, as well as our surveillance, etc. Therefore, there were other resources utilized across Canada.

Mr. Gray: All right. I want to ask you, if you do not mind—

D/Commr Favreau: Again, Mr. Gray, in order to give you a little bit more insight as to how an investigation would work, you might have only one person doing an investigation, but because he is doing this investigation he has access to all other services from within the organization. At one time he might have as many as 30 or 40 people a day working for him on a specific surveillance. He might have specialists with electronic devices and so on. So when you say this guy is alone doing this investigation, he has all the support of the organization, depending on what he has to do.

Mr. Gray: Can you assist the committee by telling us why Mr. Sargent the other night said specifically that he asked the superiors for more resources to work on this Project Albus?

D/Commr Favreau: Why do you ask that? I do not know why he asked that. If the question is, do we have enough resources, we could use more.

Mr. Manley: You will have to tell that to another committee.

D/Commr Favreau: I will be happy if you would like to transmit that.

The Acting Chairman (Mr. Sobeski): I believe Mr. Langdon asked that question.

Mr. Gray: Now if I can just turn back to the Manara Travel case. Do we not, through our Export and Import Permits Act or other legislation, have sanctions against dealing with Libya, or did we not at that relevant time?

D/Commr Favreau: If my recollection is right, sir, at that time, no. That is why Libya was using Canada to transfer funds to the States.

Mr. Gray: I am informed that in January of 1986, sanctions under our law were applied to dealing with Libya. When were the incidents involving the use of Manara Travel and the Bank of Credit and Commerce International?

D/Commr Favreau: I think what you are referring to is a different law under the import and export bank. I stand to be corrected, but I do not believe at that time—and I am talking November 1987—that funds that were channelled from Libya via Canada represented any illegality in Canada. I stand to be corrected on that.

Le comm. adj. Doucette: Bien sûr, oui. En ce qui concerne la Direction générale de la GRC, c'est juste. Il y a eu deux membres de la GRC qui ont travaillé à l'affaire.

Toutefois, avec l'envergure de l'enquête qui s'est étendue à d'autres provinces, nous avons aussi utilisé les ressources d'autres divisions, qui sont venues appuyer l'enquête, ainsi que notre personnel de surveillance, etc. D'autres ressources ont donc été mises à contribution dans l'ensemble du Canada.

M. Gray: Très bien. Si vous n'avez pas d'objection, je veux vous demander. . .

S.-comm. Favreau: Encore une fois, monsieur Gray, pour que vous sachiez un peu mieux comment fonctionne une enquête, il peut n'y avoir qu'une seule personne qui travaille à une enquête, mais se faisant, elle a accès à tous les autres services de l'organisation. Il peut parfois arriver qu'il y ait de 30 à 40 personnes chaque jour qui travaillent pour elle dans le contexte d'une opération de surveillance particulière. Elle peut aussi avoir recours aux services de spécialistes en électronique, etc. Donc, quand on dit qu'une personne travaille seule à une enquête, il ne faut pas oublier qu'elle a l'appui de l'ensemble de l'organisation, selon la tâche à accomplir.

M. Gray: Pouvez-vous nous dire pourquoi M. Sargent nous a dit, l'autre soir, avoir demandé des ressources additionnelles à ses supérieurs dans le cadre du projet Albus?

S.-comm. Favreau: Pourquoi me posez-vous cette question? Je ne sais pas pourquoi il l'a demandé. Si vous me demandez si nous avons suffisamment de ressources, je vous répondrai que nous voudrions bien en avoir davantage.

M. Manley: Vous allez devoir aller dire cela à un autre comité.

S.-comm. Favreau: Je vous serais reconnaissant de transmettre le message.

Le président suppléant (M. Sobeski): Je pense que c'est M. Langdon qui a posé cette question.

M. Gray: Permettez-moi maintenant de revenir à l'affaire de Manara Travel. Notre Loi sur les licences d'exportation et d'importation ne comporte-elle pas des sanctions contre le commerce avec la Lybie? Était-ce le cas à ce moment-là?

S.-comm. Favreau: Si je me souviens bien, monsieur, ce n'était pas le cas à ce moment-là. C'est pourquoi la Lybie utilisait le Canada pour transférer des fonds aux États-Unis.

M. Gray: On me dit qu'en janvier 1986, des sanctions ont été appliquées en vertu de notre Loi à l'égard du commerce avec la Lybie. Quand les incidents impliquant Manara Travel et la Banque de crédit et de commerce internationale se sont-ils produits?

S.-comm. Favreau: Je pense que vous faites allusion à une disposition différente régissant la Banque d'importation et d'exportation. On me corrigera là-dessus, si je fais erreur, mais je ne pense pas qu'à ce moment-là—en novembre 1987—il était illégal de faire transiter des fonds de la Lybie par le Canada selon nos lois canadiennes. On pourra me corriger là-dessus.

Mr. Gray: It is my impression that one of the uses of our Export and Import Permits Act is that Canada should not be used as a pass-through for money or goods originating from the United States in a way that is contrary to their economic or financial sanctions.

You're suggesting that at the relevant time in 1987 there was no Canadian law breached in the Manara Travel case. We are not talking about money laundering of proceeds of a drug committee, but simply the dealing with Libya.

D/Commr Favreau: At that time, sir, in 1987, the RCMP investigation failed to reveal any evidence of breach of Canadian laws either by the BCCC or this person who is now wanted, Mr. Hawamda.

Mr. Gray: I would like to turn now to something that I recall coming up in the hearing some weeks ago. I do not have the exact reference in the transcript in front of me, but I recall Mr. Bowie or one of his colleagues saying that the force did not have the resources to carry out an investigation of a bank—I think I am fairly summarizing the language in question—therefore, the matter had to be left to the Office of the Superintendent of Financial Institutions.

My recollection also is that we asked the Superintendent of Financial Institutions about who should be looking into the possible offences that the officers became aware of in the course of their work. He said it had to be turned over to the RCMP.

In view of what has been said, it seems to me that there is some type of gap in the enforcement of Canadian law with respect to banks, and there is a risk that some serious situation could fall between the cracks.

I would like to know how you respond to what seems to be some conflict in evidence, as to responsibilities put on the record at the last hearing of this committee—not the last one, but the one before—on the one hand, by representatives of your force and, on the other hand, by representatives of the Office of the Superintendent of Financial Institutions.

D/Commr Favreau: I welcome coming back to the minutes, because I must say that when Mr. Bowie and Mr. Kaine came back . . The way the answer came out was a little bit of a surprise to me. I will welcome Mr. Bowie to explain what he was talking about.

There is one thing I would like to explain to this committee, if I could. If we were able for a minute to put the legal side of the issue aside and say that we will go into a functioning bank and look at their transactions—as an example, let us say all the transactions over $10,000—we would need a multitude of people to do that.

The reason is that every transaction is going somewhere, coming from somewhere, who had it from somewhere else, etc. I asked Inspector Bowie to give a little bit of an insight—I think it will be useful to the committee—into what one investigation, one clarification of a file, might need.

Mr. Bowie has a chart. He will mention the number of documents and the number of hours spent on that, and the number of dollars.

M. Gray: Il me semble que l'une des utilités de notre Loi sur les licences d'exportation et d'importation est de faire en sorte que le Canada ne serve pas de lieu de transit pour de l'argent ou des marchandises en provenance des États-Unis d'une manière qui est contraire à leurs sanctions économiques ou financières.

Vous laissez entendre qu'à cette époque-là, en 1987, on n'a enfreint aucune loi canadienne dans l'affaire de Manara Travel. Il n'est pas question de blanchissage d'argent, mais tout simplement de commerce avec la Libye.

S.-comm. Favreau: À ce moment-là, en 1987, l'enquête de la GRC n'a permis de recueillir aucune preuve que la BCCC ou cette personne, qui est maintenant recherchée, M. Hawamda, avait enfreint une loi canadienne quelconque.

M. Gray: Je voudrais maintenant passer un sujet qui a été abordé à l'occasion d'une audience, il y a quelques semaines. Je n'ai pas la référence exacte, mais je me souviens avoir entendu M. Bowie ou l'un de ses collègues dire que la GRC ne disposait pas de ressources suffisantes pour mener une enquête sur une banque—je pense que je résume passablement ce qui a été dit—et que par conséquent, l'affaire avait dû être confiée au Bureau du Surintendant des institutions financières.

Je me souviens aussi que nous avons demandé au Surintendant des institutions financières qui devrait enquêter sur les infractions possibles que les agents ont découvertes au cours de leur travail. Il a dit que cela relevait de la GRC.

Compte tenu de ce qui a été dit, j'ai l'impression qu'il y a une lacune dans l'application de la loi canadienne en ce qui a trait aux banques, et que l'on risque de voir certaines situations graves passe inaperçues.

Je voudrais avoir votre réaction à ce qui semble être des témoignages divergents quant aux responsabilités, témoignages que nous avons entendus à la dernière réunion de notre comité—non, pas la dernière, plutôt l'avant-dernière—d'une part, par des représentants de la GRC et, d'autre part, par des représentants du Bureau du Surintendant des institutions financières.

S.-comm. Favreau: Je suis bien content que nous revenions sur ce procès-verbal, parce que je dois dire que lorsque M. Bowie et M. Kaine sont revenus . . La réponse m'a un peu étonné. J'aimerais que M. Bowie explique ce qu'il a dit.

Il y a un éclaircissement que je voudrais donner au comité, si vous le permettez. Si nous pouvions, pour un instant, mettre de côté l'aspect juridique de la question et parler des inspections sur les opérations effectuées dans une banque—par exemple, toutes les opérations bancaires dépassant 10,000$—nous aurions besoin d'une multitude de gens pour le faire.

Cela s'explique par le fait que l'objet de chaque opération a une destination et une provenance, et était parti d'ailleurs avant cela, etc. J'ai demandé à l'inspecteur Bowie de préparer quelque chose—qui sera utile au comité, je pense—sur ce que requiert une enquête, l'éclaircissement d'un dossier.

M. Bowie a préparé un tableau. Il va vous mentionner le nombre de documents et le nombre d'heures qui ont été requises, et le coût de l'opération.

[Text]

When the question was raised, do you have enough—I do not think the question was raised—the answer was, we would not have enough resources to do this. That is what the RCMP is talking about. I will leave Mr. Bowie to explain what he meant.

• 1115

The Acting Chairman (Mr. Sobeski): Perhaps I could then ask Mr. Bowie to give us a précis and to table with the committee the document he is discussing from.

Insp Bowie: Actually, I am just looking at the transcript, sir, and my quote of the transcript. Essentially, the reports that came out about the transcript, I respectfully suggest, do not reflect what was said, what I recall saying and what the transcript reflects that I said.

In answer to the question "Why did you not institute an investigation of the whole bank?" I said, "I draw the attention of the committee to the distinction between regulatory action and criminal investigation". We rely on a search warrant to go in and collect the documentation to support an investigation. We have no right whatever to go into a bank and simply cull through your account, and your account, to determine what is good and what is bad. We must go in with a search warrant. To get a search warrant we must establish reasonable grounds that an offence has occurred and there are reasonable grounds to believe that the items are in the institution and will support the investigation. That is the distinction, and that, I suggest, is what was said. We depend on the criminal process to conduct our investigation. For somebody to simply walk into an institution and cull through the records, that is within regulatory powers but not within the powers of the police.

If you are interested in seeing what a criminal investigation entails, I have a very brief description of money laundering, and we are quite capable, I suggest, of conducting money laundering investigations and have done so.

Mr. Gray: I assume you have a very big chart.

Insp Bowie: This, sir, is the corporate structure of an actual criminal group that was recently terminated. These are 47 corporations that they set up in 7 different countries to launder about $100 million worth of drug money. We have just finished the prosecution. This is not the Columbian Medellin cartel; this is a homegrown marijuana trafficking organization.

To prosecute this case, our investigators were forced to accumulate just over one million individual documents to prove the monetary flow. This, sir, is a money-laundering investigation. If you look at investigating an entire bank—and remember that there are 40 million bank accounts in Canada and that they process two billion cheques every year in the Canadian clearing system—we are looking at factors of significance compared to what this entails.

Mr. Gray: That, sir, is very helpful. I just wanted to make sure, in the light of your evidence at the initial meeting, that there was not some type of enforcement gap that might involve criminal sanctions that you were leaving to

Quand on a demandé si nous avions suffisamment de ressources—je ne pense pas que la question ait été soulevée—la réponse a été que nous n'aurions pas suffisamment de ressources pour mener une telle enquête. C'est ce que l'on dit à la GRC. Je vais laisser M. Bowie vous expliquer ce qu'il a voulu dire.

Le président suppléant (M. Sobeski): M. Bowie pourra peut-être nous faire un résumé et déposer le document qu'il a préparé auprès du comité.

Insp. Bowie: Je suis en train de lire la transcription de ce que j'ai dit au cours de cette réunion. Sauf tout le respect que je vous dois, le rapport ne reflète pas ce que j'ai dit, ce que je me souviens d'avoir dit.

En réponse à la question: «Pourquoi n'avez-vous pas instituer une enquête sur l'ensemble de la banque?» j'ai dit: «J'attire l'attention du comité sur la distinction à faire entre une action réglementaire et une enquête criminelle». Il nous faut un mandat de perquisition pour obtenir les documents nécessaires à une enquête. Nous n'avons aucunement le droit de nous présenter dans une banque et de tout simplement examiner les opérations qui ont été faites dans un compte ou un autre pour déterminer celles qui sont douteuses et celles qui ne le sont pas. Nous avons besoin d'un mandat de perquisition pour le faire. Et, pour obtenir un mandat, nous devons prouver que nous avons des motifs raisonnables de croire qu'une infraction a été commise et que les pièces justificatives qui seront utiles à l'enquête se trouvent dans l'institution en cause. C'est là la distinction, et c'est ce que j'ai dit. Nous devons suivre le processus criminel dans le cadre d'une enquête. Les pouvoirs réglementaires permettent à quelqu'un de se présenter dans une institution et de parcourir les dossiers, mais pas la police.

S'il vous intéresse de savoir ce qu'exige une enquête criminelle, j'ai ici une très brève description d'un cas de blanchissage d'argent, et nous avons la capacité de mener des enquêtes dans ce domaine, et nous l'avons d'ailleurs déjà fait.

M. Gray: Je suppose que votre tableau est très imposant.

Insp. Bowie: Ceci, monsieur, est la structure d'un véritable réseau criminel qui a été démantelé dernièrement. Vous avez là 47 sociétés qui ont été créées dans sept pays différents pour blanchir environ 100 millions de dollars tirés du trafic des stupéfiants. La poursuite vient tout juste de prendre fin. Ce n'est pas le cartel de Medellin; il s'agit seulement d'un réseau de trafic de marijuana cultivée ici.

Avant d'entamer des poursuites, nos enquêteurs ont dû accumuler un peu plus d'un million de documents afin d'illustrer les déplacements de l'argent. Ceci, monsieur, est une enquête sur un cas de blanchissage d'argent. Enquêter sur toute une banque—et n'oubliez pas qu'il y a 40 millions de comptes bancaires au Canada et que l'on traite 2 milliards de chèques par an dans le système de compensation canadien—est une entreprise colossale comparativement à cette enquête.

M. Gray: Ces renseignements sont très utiles, monsieur. Je voulais seulement m'assurer, à la lumière du témoignage que vous avez donné à la première réunion, qu'il n'y avait pas de lacune dans l'application de la loi, qu'il n'y avait pas the Office of the Superintendent of Financial Institutions and that they, in turn, thought should be in your hands, so that matters were not looked into where there was a proper basis for doing so. I am not talking about a fishing expedition that is not consistent with our laws or traditions of investigation, but certainly what was said at the hearing in August could have given rise to some doubt as to whether all the ground was covered between the force and the Office of the Superintendent of Financial Institutions.

Insp Bowie: If I could just again clarify, I do not believe there was any doubt, or any confusion, in either the minds of the witnesses who were attending there or the members of OSFI as to their responsibilities. The issue at hand was how do you initiate a criminal procedure? The only point I was trying to make at the earlier testimony was that if we have evidence or indications that some type of criminal activity is present in any institution or done by any person, we will undertake the investigation to the best of our ability. There is no question of that. But the answer that was so widely quoted was based on how we get in to look at the documents to initiate any type of criminal proceeding, and there is the difference. We do not have that power.

Mr. Gray: One final question. Am I right in saying that in the United States there is a federal law that all cash deposits or transfers above $10,000 have to be reported by the bank in question that handles that transaction, to a U.S. regulatory authority? It is the responsibility of the bank, or is it the responsibility of the depositor? There is that law in the United States at the national level, which I gather does not exist here.

Assistant Commissioner J.J.M. Coutu (Director, Drug Enforcement, Royal Canadian Mounted Police): That is correct. There are provisions in the U.S. legislation that require this reporting for most transactions of $10,000 and up. There are exceptions where some transactions of $10,000 or more are ongoing, government transactions and so on. There are exceptions, but there are provisions for reporting those indeed.

Mr. Langdon: There are just a few points I would like to clear up. First, we have had the Canadian Bankers' Association suggest to us that they recommended Mr. Jensen to the BCCC as someone who should be hired as a consultant. I checked through the transcript on that, Mr. Sobeski, and the actual statement in the preliminary transcript anyway was that the president of the CBA, Ms Sinclair, had checked and their last notation in the file was December 1988, so they felt that it must have taken place before December 1988.

Our understanding from Mr. Sargent, and of course from other information, was that Mr. Jensen did not leave the force as Deputy Superintendent until well after that time. Do you have some information with respect to this?

D/Commr Favreau: Mr. Jensen left the force on December 31, 1989. That is the date of his departure. As to exactly how Mr. Jensen was approached, I am afraid this question will have to go to Mr. Jensen if the committee de choses que vous pensiez être de la responsabilité du Bureau du Surintendant des institutions financières, lui pensait à son tour qu'elles relevaient de la GRC, empêchant ainsi une enquête justifiée. Je ne parle pas ici d'une expédition de pêche qui dérogerait à nos lois ou traditions en matière d'enquête, mais il ne fait aucun doute que ce qui a été dit en août aurait pu soulever certains doutes sur la coordination entre les activités de la GRC et celles du Bureau du Surintendant des institutions financières.

Insp. Bowie: Si je peux apporter une précision, je ne pense pas qu'il existait un doute ou une confusion quelconque dans l'esprit des témoins qui étaient là ou des membres du BSIF au sujet de leurs responsabilités. La discussion portait sur la façon d'entreprendre une poursuite criminelle. Tout ce que j'ai dit, la dernière fois que je suis venu témoigner devant le comité, c'est que si nous avons des preuves ou des indications qu'une institution se livre à une activité criminelle quelconque, nous entreprendrons l'enquête du mieux que nous pouvons. Cela ne fait aucun doute. Mais, la réponse qui a été tellement citée partait de la façon dont nous parvenons à examiner les documents nécessaires pour entreprendre une poursuite criminelle, et c'est là la différence. Nous n'avons pas ce pouvoir.

M. Gray: Une dernière question. Est-il vrai qu'aux États-Unis, il existe a une loi fédérale qui exige que la banque signale tous les virements ou dépôts d'argent comptant de plus de 10,000$ à une autorité réglementaire américaine? Est-ce la responsabilité de la banque, ou celle du déposant? Cette loi existe aux États-Unis, au niveau fédéral, et nous n'avons rien de tel au Canada, je suppose.

Le commissaire adjoint J.J.M. Coutu (directeur, Police des drogues, Gendarmerie royale du Canada): C'est juste. Il y a des dispositions dans la loi américaine qui exigent que la plupart des opérations de 10,000$ et plus soient signalées. Il y a certaines exceptions lorsque ces opérations sont continues, des opérations du gouvernement, etc. Il y a des exceptions, mais il y a, en effet, des dispositions qui prévoient que ces opérations soient signalées.

M. Langdon: Il y a quelques points que je voudrais éclaircir. Premièrement, l'Association des banquiers canadiens nous a dit qu'elle a recommandé M. Jensen à la BCCC comme expert-conseil. J'ai vérifié dans la transcription à ce sujet, Monsieur Sobeski, et la déclaration dans la transcription préliminaire était que la présidente de l'ABC, M^me^ Sinclair, avait vérifié, et la dernière note à ce sujet dans le dossier remontait à décembre 1988. Elle pensait donc que cette recommandation avait dû être faite avant décembre 1988.

Selon ce que M. Sargent nous a dit, et selon d'autres sources d'information, évidemment, M. Jensen n'a pas quitté son poste de sous-commissaire avant 1988. Avez-vous des renseignements à nous fournir à ce sujet?

S.-comm. Favreau: M. Jensen est parti le 31 décembre 1989. C'est la date de son départ. À savoir précisément comment on a approché M. Jensen, je crains bien que c'est une question que vous allez devoir lui poser vous-même si wants to hear from his point of view of what happened. However, I know that in meetings having to do with other matters, maybe Mr. Coutu could be helpful to the committee, and Mr. Bowie, having had personal discussions, but I think I cannot go any further than that as to what exactly transpired.

Mr. Langdon: Let me be more precise in the question that flows from that. Was there, therefore, as far as any of you are aware, a contractual relationship or a consulting relationship between Mr. Jensen and BCCC during 1989, as suggested by the Canadian Bankers' Association?

D/Commr Favreau: To my knowledge not in 1989. In 1989 Mr. Jensen was still Deputy Commissioner of Operations, and again to my knowledge—and I stand to be corrected by my two confrères—it was in the month of May, or five months after, that Mr. Jensen worked for BCCC.

Mr. Langdon: I understand that it is the case, because it would not have been proper, it would not have been legal, under RCMP regulations, for such a relationship to have existed, if it did exist in 1989, as the CBA is suggesting.

D/Commr Favreau: In 1989 it would have been improper, in the sense that Mr. Jensen would still have been a deputy commissioner in the force.

Mr. Langdon: That clears that point up.

The second point that—

Mr. Manley: If I could just interject—and I do not want to interrupt the questioning, but it is a very sensitive matter, of course—I want to put into the record that information we received this morning from Mr. Randle of the Canadian Bankers' Association suggests that in fact Ms Sinclair was incorrect the other night, in that the referral occurred in March 1990.

The Acting Chairman (Mr. Sobeski): Thank you, Mr. Manley.

Mr. Langdon: That certainly helps to clear it up.

There is a second point that I wanted to clarify. I have here the report of the board of inquiry on activities of the RCMP by Judge Marin. This is related to allegations made in the Senate of Canada. This is just the summary in which he discusses Project Albus. In the context of discussing Project Albus, he indicates that it is in the context of that project that, I take it, Mr. Vidosa was to ask Senator Cogger for his assistance to release moneys that had been seized by Canada Customs on the west coast.

Mr. Sargeant suggested, in his testimony the other night, that this was money that had been seized as part of this investigation of money laundering which had involved various direct connections to BCCC.

I want to confirm with you that it was to try to get this money back—the specific money that had been seized as part of that investigation dealing with BCCC—that the approach to Mr. Cogger was. . .at least, that is how it was framed.

vous voulez savoir ce qui s'est passé. Je sais toutefois qu'à l'occasion d'autres réunions portant sur autre chose, M. Coutu pourra peut-être être utile au comité, ainsi que M. Bowie, car ils ont eu des discussions personnelles avec lui, mais je ne pense pas pouvoir vous en dire tellement plus long à ce sujet.

M. Langdon: Permettez-moi donc d'être un peu plus précis dans la question suivante. Selon les renseignements que vous possédez, y a-t-il eu une entente contractuelle ou une entente de consultation entre M. Jensen et la BCCC qui a été conclue en 1989, comme le laissait entendre l'Association des banquiers canadiens?

S.-comm. Favreau: À ma connaissance, pas en 1989. Cette année-là, M. Jensen était encore sous-commissaire à la police opérationnelle, et je répète qu'à ma connaissance—et mes deux confrères pourront peut-être me corriger là-dessus—ce n'est qu'en mai, soit cinq mois plus tard, que M. Jensen a commencé à travailler pour la BCCC.

M. Langdon: Je comprends bien cela, parce que s'il en avait été autrement, si une telle entente avait existé en 1989, comme le laissait entendre l'ABC, cela n'aurait pas été acceptable ni légal en vertu du règlement régissant la GRC.

S.-comm. Favreau: En 1989, la chose aurait été inacceptable, parce que M. Jensen était encore sous-commissaire à la GRC.

M. Langdon: Voilà une question de réglée.

Le deuxième point qui. . .

M. Manley: Si je peux me permettre de vous interrompre—et ce n'est pas pour vous empêcher de poser des questions, mais la question est très importante, évidemment—je veux consigner au procès-verbal que des renseignements que nous avons reçus ce matin, de la part de M. Randle, de l'Association des banquiers canadiens, laisse entendre que M^me^ Sinclair s'est trompée, l'autre soir, et que la recommandation a été faite en mars 1990.

Le président suppléant (M. Sobeski): Merci, monsieur Manley.

M. Langdon: Cela contribue sûrement à régler la question.

Il y a un deuxième point que je veux tirer au clair. J'ai ici le rapport de la commission d'enquête sur les activités de la GRC, dirigée par le juge Marin. Cela a trait à des allégations qui ont été faites au Sénat du Canada. Ce n'est que le résumé dans lequel il discute du projet Albus. Dans ce résumé, il indique que c'est dans le contexte du projet Albus, je suppose, que M. Vidosa devait demander au sénateur Cogger de l'aider à faire libérer des sommes d'argent qui avaient été saisies par les douaniers sur la côte ouest.

Au cours de son témoignage, l'autre soir, M. Sargent a laissé entendre que cet argent avait été saisi dans le contexte de l'enquête sur le blanchissage d'argent, qui s'impliquaient des liens directs avec la BCCC.

Je veux confirmer auprès de vous que c'était dans le but de récupérer cet argent—celui que l'on avait saisi dans le cadre de l'enquête impliquant la BCCC—que l'on a approché M. Cogger. . . en tout cas, c'est la façon dont ce fut organisé.

[Texte]

D/Commr Favreau: No, I do not think it is in the proper context.

Mr. Langdon: Perhaps you could correct the context then.

D/Commr Favreau: I will not go into whether it was right or wrong because it has already been beaten to death, but the context of doing this about the $1 million was more or less to get Senator Cogger to activate and use his influence to do that. Again, I do not want to debate the question of whether it was right or wrong; somebody else did that. But the context was not to get this $1.8 million, I believe, back into the investigation. It was, according to Mr. Vidosa, to implicate the senator.

Mr. Langdon: Right, I understand that. I just wanted to clarify that the $1.8 million that we are talking about, in the context of the money-laundering investigations that Mr. Sargent described to us the other night, was the money that was involved in Mr. Vidosa's approach.

D/Commr Favreau: The $1.8 million, yes.

Mr. Langdon: I have two broader questions. The first is—

• 1130

Insp Bowie: Yes. That was $1,080,000, but also it was our directorate that handled the seizure of the money. There was absolutely no connection whatever to BCCC, which is what you indicated in your question, sir. Just to clarify it, it was strictly a cash transport across the border. There is no bank connection at all.

Mr. Langdon: I am sorry, but that contradicts the testimony. Mr. Sargent suggested that in fact there were various direct connections in the context of Project Albus involved with respect to these transfers of money back and forth across the border and ongoing transfers of that money to Switzerland.

Mr. Soetens: Mr. Langdon, if I might comment. If my recollection is correct, the money was being followed but it was not seized at the border. Specifically, if I recall Mr. Sargent saying, it was seized at the border by some very thorough customs agents, period.

Mr. Langdon: Right. He testified to that.

Mr. Soetens: It was seized accidentally, you might say.

Mr. Langdon: Could I continue with the question to Mr. Bowie, because it may deal with the same issue?

You have suggested—and I take it that it is a suggestion on the part of the force as a whole—that grounds were simply not there for any investigation of the bank's operations in Canada despite what we now know of its operations in Britain and in the United States. I want to ask you why you would say that, given that the phone number on the safety deposit box used in the Royal Bank in Toronto went directly to the head office of BCCC. Why were there

S.-comm. Favreau: Non, je ne pense pas que c'était dans ce contexte.

M. Langdon: Vous pourriez peut-être alors nous dire ce qu'il en est vraiment.

S.-comm. Favreau: Je ne discuterai pas de la légitimité du geste, parce qu'on en a déjà parlé à satiété, mais ce que l'on voulait vraiment, c'était plus ou moins d'inciter le sénateur Cogger à faire jouer ses influences pour débloquer 1 million de dollars. Je répète que je n'ai pas l'intention de discuter du bien-fondé de ce geste; quelqu'un l'a déjà fait. Mais, ce n'était pas pour ramener cette somme de 1.8 million de dollars, je pense, dans le contexte de l'enquête. Selon M. Vidosa, c'était pour piéger le sénateur.

M. Langdon: Oui, je comprends cela. Je voulais seulement vous entendre préciser que les 1.8 million de dollars en question, dans le contexte de l'enquête sur le blanchissage de l'argent dont M. Sargent nous a parlé l'autre soir, était bien la somme d'argent dont avait parlé M. Vidosa.

S.-comm. Favreau: La somme de 1.8 million de dollars, oui.

M. Langdon: J'ai deux autres questions plus générales. La première. . .

S.-comm. Favreau: Un instant, M. Bowie a peut-être une précision à apporter.

Insp. Bowie: Oui. La somme s'élevait effectivement à 1,080,000 dollars mais c'est également notre direction qui a effectué la saisie. Il n'existait pas le moindre lien avec la BCCC, comme le laissait entendre votre question. Donc, pour bien préciser les choses, il ne s'agissait que de traverser la frontière avec des fonds. Il n'existait aucun lien avec la banque.

M. Langdon: Excusez-moi, mais cela contredit le témoignage. Il semblerait, selon M. Sargent, qu'il existait un certain nombre de liens directs, dans le cadre du projet Albus touchant ces fonds qui traversaient la frontière, dans un sens comme dans l'autre et le transfert de cet argent en Suisse.

M. Soetens: Monsieur Langdon, me permettez-vous une observation? Si j'ai bonne mémoire, les fonds ont été suivis mais n'ont pas été saisis à la frontière. Je pense notamment me rappeler que M. Sargent a dit que l'argent a été saisi à la frontière par des agents des douanes particulièrement consciencieux. Cela me semble régler la question.

M. Langdon: Il a effectivement dit cela.

M. Soetens: Dans une certaine mesure, on pourrait dire que l'argent a été saisi un peu par hasard.

M. Langdon: Puis-je poursuivre dans le cadre de la question que je posais à M. Bowie, car peut-être a-t-elle trait au même point?

Selon vous—et je suppose que cela représente l'avis de la GRC—il n'existait pas de motifs suffisants pour justifier une enquête sur les activités de la banque au Canada, malgré ce que nous avons depuis appris sur ses activités en Grande-Bretagne et aux États-Unis. J'aimerais savoir ce qui vous fait dire cela, étant donné que le numéro de téléphone inscrit sur le coffre loué à la Banque Royale à Toronto était celui du siège social de la BCCC. Pourquoi des contacts directs avec direct contacts from the people in Dallas who were charged and convicted under U.S. law dealing with money laundering? Why did they make direct calls to the BCCC office in Toronto and in Vancouver?

I would like you to take into account as well the report of cash transfers within the Ottawa branch of BCCC, which were so large as to lead to direct discussions with OSFI and an expression of concern on the part of OSFI that these could not be justified as in any sense normal and were therefore something that needed to be examined and investigated. Finally, of course, there are Mr. Vidosa's own reports of his rather remarkable reception that he received from the BCCC branch in Ottawa with respect to the line of credit, which certainly Mr. Sargent suggested was connected with money laundering in his testimony on Monday night. Given all of these very specific connections to BCC Canada, why no decision? Why do you come to a conclusion that there were absolutely no grounds for suspicion with respect to this bank?

Insp Bowie: Sir, I could duplicate your question with the majority of financial institutions in Canada. Again, I can bring up an instance of $7 million going into this bank on this date and $5 million going into another branch of this bank on this date. I can construct exactly the same scenario dealing with far larger amounts of money and far greater numbers of individual instances.

Mr. Langdon: It is not the amounts of money that we are talking about; it is the connections in terms of phone numbers and communication and so forth.

Insp Bowie: Again—and I hate to answer you indirectly—let me give you a case scenario. Just two months ago a drug trafficker was arrested in the United States, a large quantity of drugs seized, indications of large money transfers in the States and suspected into Canada.

• 1135

In his possession at the time was the business card of an employee of one of the large banks in Canada. That happens all of the time. Banking references are used in the drug trade. It is something that we see literally every day. It is not unusual, in my estimation—this type of scenario. We are witnessing enormous transfers of money under circumstances that an individual might not necessarily be accustomed to, but it is not enough to start opening up an investigation into an entire financial institution. I call that chasing a rainbow. It is just not there, sir.

Mr. Langdon: With respect to this question of resources of the force to undertake such an investigation, I want to go back to your answer, which, as you say, was widely quoted:

> ...for us to undertake an investigation into the money laundering dealings of a bank, which would involve obtaining the necessary criminal process to scrutinize the records of that bank in a fairly comprehensive fashion, les personnes qui, à Dallas, ont été inculpées et déclarées coupables aux termes de la législation américaine sur le blanchiment d'argent? Pourquoi ont-ils téléphoné au bureau de la BCCC à Toronto et à Vancouver?

J'aimerais également que vous teniez compte de ce que l'on sait sur les transferts d'argent comptant au sein de la succursale de la BCCC à Ottawa, transferts d'une telle importance qu'ils ont attiré l'attention du BSIF, qui a fait savoir qu'en aucun cas ces transferts ne sauraient être considérés comme normaux et que, cela étant, il convenait de se pencher sur la question et d'entreprendre une enquête. Et puis, enfin, il y a tout de même les déclarations de M. Vidosa qui font état de l'accueil plutôt remarquable que lui a accordé la succursale de la BCCC à Ottawa et de cette marge de crédit qu'on lui a consentie et qui, selon M. Sargent du moins, dans ce qu'il nous a dit lundi soir, n'était pas sans rapport avec des activités de blanchiment d'argent. Ainsi, étant donné l'existence de ces liens très précis avec la BCCC Canada, pourquoi n'a-t-on pris aucune décision? Comment pouvez-vous conclure à l'absence de motifs de soupçon à l'égard de la banque?

Insp. Bowie: Monsieur, votre question pourrait aussi bien s'appliquer à la plupart des établissements financiers du Canada. Je peux citer l'exemple de 7 millions de dollars versés à cette banque à une date donnée, et de 5 millions de dollars versés dans une autre succursale de cette même banque à telle ou telle date. Je peux établir le même scénario avec des sommes beaucoup plus importantes et des exemples encore plus nombreux.

M. Langdon: Mais ce ne sont pas les montants qui sont en cause ici; il s'agit plutôt des contacts et des liens, des numéros de téléphone et des communications qui ont pu être notés.

Insp. Bowie: Encore une fois—et je regrette d'avoir à vous donner une réponse indirecte—permettez-moi de vous citer un autre cas. Il y a à peine deux mois, un trafiquant de drogues a été arrêté aux États-Unis. Une grande quantité de stupéfiants a été saisie et on a relevé des indications de fortes sommes d'argent transférées d'un point à l'autre des États-Unis et aboutissant, pense-t-on, au Canada.

Il avait alors en sa possession la carte d'affaire d'un employé d'une des grandes banques du Canada. Cela se produit constamment. Dans le trafic des stupéfiants, les références bancaires sont monnaie courante. On voit cela tous les jours. Pour moi, ce scénario n'a rien de curieux. Il y a des transferts portant sur des sommes énormes et qui se produisent dans des circonstances qui peuvent paraître inhabituelles, mais cela ne suffit pas, je vous assure, à lancer une enquête sur un établissement financier. C'est courir après la lune. Il y a pas assez de preuves.

M. Langdon: Mais, au sujet des ressources dont dispose la GRC pour entreprendre de telles enquêtes, j'aimerais revenir à votre réponse qui, comme vous l'avez dit vous-même, a été largement reprise:

> ...entreprendre une enquête sur les activités de blanchissage de l'argent d'une banque, ce qui exigerait que nous obtenions d'un juge l'autorisation d'examiner à fond les dossiers de cette banque, dépasserait les would be beyond the resources of many or most, if not all, police organizations, certainly in Canada and most in North America, if a bank is the target of the investigation in terms of the manner in which they conduct business.

We later heard testimony from OSFI that suggested they did not see this as something that they could do either because it was a criminal matter, not a regulatory matter.

We just passed a bill in the House of Commons with respect to record keeping by banks in order to permit investigations of money laundering—Bill C-9. It was passed in June of this year, I believe. It was a bill with which I had some involvement. I have to wonder why we should have passed a bill like that if the RCMP does not feel it has the resources to be able to investigate a bank with respect to money laundering—systematic money laundering—because of an absence of people or an absence of sophisticated techniques.

Why are we asking the banks to keep all of these records for years if there is not at least the potential for banks to engage in systematically trying to expand their business through money-laundering activity, as clearly this bank tried to do in the United States and other parts of the world? If there is not the possibility of doing that, what use is a bill like that?

D/Commr Favreau: Could I start the answering of this, sir, please?

The bill in question does not change the Criminal Code. In order to get access to these documents that you ask the banks to keep, you first have to have reasonable grounds, go see a judge, go there and ask to see these documents. The bill does not give you the right to go in a bank and start checking their documents. That is the difference.

Mr. Gray mentioned the United States system whereby they have to supply all these transactions over $10,000. What is happening there, in our estimation, is huge, bulk documents after documents after documents, and then only a thin part will be used for investigation. The bill in Canada—like you say, you are well aware of it—was more appropriate for Canada, from a police point of view anyway. If I have an investigation, I could go in and the documents have to be there; otherwise there is an offence. Do not send all these documents to me—where I am going to pack them, I do not know—in case of. I thought the bill was very good, but the bill does not change the première approche, which is to start an investigation with the proper grounds. Maybe Bruce will want to comment a bit more on it.

ressources de la plupart, sinon de toutes les organisations policières. Cela est vrai au Canada mais aussi presque partout en Amérique du Nord, chaque fois qu'il s'agit d'enquêter sur la manière dont une banque exerce ses activités.

Nous avons ensuite recueilli le témoignage du BSIF laissant entendre que cela ne relevait pas vraiment de lui, étant donné qu'il s'agissait d'une affaire criminelle et non d'une affaire de règlementation.

La Chambre des communes vient d'adopter un projet de loi touchant la comptabilité et les registres bancaires afin de faciliter les enquêtes sur le blanchiment de l'argent. Il s'agit du projet de loi C-9. Je crois qu'il a été adopté en juin dernier. J'ai participé aux travaux qui ont donné naissance à ce projet de loi et je me demande pourquoi nous avons adopté un texte pareil dans la mesure où la GRC n'estime pas avoir les moyens nécessaires pour enquêter sur les établissements bancaires susceptibles de se livrer au blanchissage de l'argent—c'est-à-dire de manière systématique—à cause d'un manque de ressources humaines ou de moyens techniques.

Pourquoi, dans ce cas-là, demander aux banques de conserver pendant des années la preuve documentée de leurs opérations s'il n'existe pas au moins une possibilité de voir les banques se lancer de manière systématique dans le blanchissage de l'argent pour accroître leur rentabilité comme a essayé de le faire cette banque aussi bien aux États-Unis que dans d'autres pays. Si cette possibilité n'existe pas, pourquoi avoir adopté un tel projet de loi?

S.-comm. Favreau: Me permettez-vous de donner un premier élément de réponse?

Le premier projet de loi que vous venez de citer ne modifie pas le Code criminel. Pour avoir accès à la documentation que les banques sont maintenant tenues de conserver, il faut avoir des motifs raisonnables. Il faut obtenir l'autorisation d'un juge et demander ensuite le cas échéant à la banque de produire les documents. En effet, ce projet de loi ne confère pas aux services policiers le droit d'aller, de leur propre initiative, dans une banque pour faire une vérification. Voilà toute la différence.

M. Gray a dit qu'aux États-Unis les établissements bancaires doivent transmettre les documents relatifs à toutes les transactions portant sur une somme dépassant 10,000$. Selon nous, cette obligation a engendré d'énormes quantités de documents dont seulement une très faible partie va être utilisée dans le cadre d'une enquête. Le projet de loi adopté au Canada convenait mieux à la situation canadienne, du moins du point de vue de la police. En cas d'enquête, je peux me présenter et je suis censé trouver les documents nécessaires, sinon la banque est en contravention. Nous ne tenons pas à ce que les établissements nous envoient systématiquement tous leurs documents—où allons-nous les mettre? D'après moi, le projet de loi est un bon texte, mais il ne modifie pas le principe de base qui est que l'enquête doit être fondée sur des motifs suffisants. Bruce va peut-être vouloir vous en dire un peu plus là-dessus.

Mr. Langdon: If I can, Mr. Deputy Commissioner, I think perhaps the question is best directed at you with respect to the resource constraints issue, which, with respect, Mr. Bowie did raise in his answer. He certainly raised the other question, too, and I think everybody on the committee understood that you could not decide to launch an investigation of BCCI and go into the bank and seize documents and so forth simply on your own say-so. It would take a court order. But the question is whether an investigation can take place. Do you have the resources for that and, if not, are we not simply saying to banks: go ahead and systematically try to promote money laundering as a source of growth in the future.

D/Commr Favreau: It is a very delicate question for a fonctionnaire to answer because I would tell you that I could use more resources, as I said before. The thing is that in our work, just as in any other work in the public domain or the business domain, you have to priorize. There is no doubt that you have to priorize. We cannot do all the investigations that might look good at the beginning. We have to look at those that have the greatest chances of success, more importance, etc. To answer that, if we had more, we could do more, but I guess that you better than anybody else know that we are all limited in what we can afford.

Mr. Langdon: The only problem is that we have $60 million in deposits that are lost as a consequence.

The Acting Chairman (Mr. Sobeski): Steven, come on now, we have pursued this. Again, the CDIC will look into that.

D/Commr Favreau: Assistant Commissioner Coutu wanted to add something.

A/Commr Coutu: Thank you. I wanted to say that I am not aware of any major investigation, as the one that you are alluding to, that would not have been pursued for lack of resources within the RCMP. In fact, we would place priority on the large investigations if we found there were grounds to investigate a systematic organization that would launder money, and I can assure you that if this financial institution was not investigated, assuming that there had been grounds to investigate it, it would not have been for lack of resources. We would have mobilized resources to do that.

We have undertaken large operations before and it is not the size that will stop us. In fact, it would be our priority to go after the big guy, if you want. In this case, I think that it has been established that the bank did not justify the

M. Langdon: Si vous me permettez, monsieur le commissaire adjoint, j'aimerais vous poser à vous la question de l'insuffisance des ressources bien que cette question ait été évoquée par M. Bowie dans sa réponse. Il a également évoqué l'autre question et je crois que tous les membres du comités ont fort bien compris qu'il ne vous était pas possible de lancer une enquête sur la BCCI, de vous présenter à la banque et, de votre propre initiative, saisir ses documents. Il vous aurait fallu, pour cela, une ordonnance judiciaire. Mais la question est de savoir s'il es possible de mener une telle enquête. Avez-vous les moyens nécessaires et, sinon, la situation n'équivaut-elle pas simplement à encourager les banques à se lancer systématiquement dans le blanchissage de l'argent pour assurer leur croissance.

S.-comm. Favreau: C'est pour un fonctionnaire une question un peu délicate car, comme je le disais tout à l'heure, j'ai besoin de ressources supplémentires. Dans notre domaine, et cela est vrai dans tous les domaines de l'action publique et dans le monde des affaires, il faut établir des priorités. Cela ne fait aucun doute. Il est impossible de mener des enquêtes dans tous les cas où il semblerait indiqué de le faire au premier abord. Il faut examiner les cas et voir les situations qui sont les plus importantes ou les plus prometteuses. Il est certain que si nous avions davantage de moyens, nous pourrions entreprendre davantage d'enquêtes, mais vous êtes particulièrement bien placés pour savoir que l'on ne peut pas s'offir tout ce que l'on voudrait.

M. Langdon: Le hic c'est que 60 millions de dollars de dépôts ont été perdus.

Le président suppléant (M. Sobeski): Steven, je vous en prie, vous avons déjà examiné cette question. Encore une fois, la Société d'assurance-dépôts du Canada va se charger de cette question-là.

S.-comm. Favreau: Le commissaire adjoint Coutu aurait aimé ajouter une observation.

Comm. adj. Coutu: Je vous remercie. Je tiens simplement à préciser que, selon moi, à la GRC, l'insuffisance des moyens n'a jamais fait obstacle à la tenue d'une enquête importante telle que celle que vous venez d'évoquer. Au contraire, nous accordons la priorité aux grandes enquêtes dans la mesure où elles sont fondées sur des motifs suffisants comme, par exemple, le blanchissage systématique de l'argent par un établissement financier. Je suis en mesure de vous dire que si nous n'avons pas enquêté sur cet établissement financier, à supposer qu'il y ait eu des motifs de le faire, ce n'était pas à cause de l'insuffisance des moyens. Dans un pareil cas, nous aurions trouvé les moyens nécessaires.

Nous avons déjà, dans le passé, mené des opérations de grande envergure et ce n'est pas l'importance des moyens à mettre en oeuvre qui nous empêche d'agir. Au contraire, nous ciblons en priorité les gros poissons. Dans le cas dont investigation because of its activities. The activities that took place through the bank were investigated, the bank itself, as the other financial institutions did not justify an investigation, and I can assure you it is not for lack of resources.

Mr. Manly: I would like to wrap up three items, one of which is new and the other two we have been over partly before. The new one is this. In the Price Waterhouse report that led ultimately to the undoing of the BCCI, a name that keeps reoccuring is the international shipping concern, the Gulf Group, which was owned, I gather, by a family named Gokal. It seems that they were big debtors in relation to BCCI and certainly their accounts figure prominently in the Price Waterhouse study. The Gulf Group does operate in Canada. Its headquarters are in Toronto.

I would like to know whether the RCMP had knowledge directly or whether you had knowledge indirectly through the Office of the Superintendent of Financial Institutions, and either on your own initiative or on behalf of other national police forces, investigated the relationship between the Gokals or the Gulf Group and BCCI or BCCC.

D/Commr Favreau: No, I cannot.

Mr. Manley: Not to your knowledge?

The second item I would like to wrap up has to do with the former Deputy Commissioner Jensen. I would like to know, first of all, do there exist within the force any kind of guidelines with respect to either conflict of interest or post-retirement employment and so on?

D/Commr Favreau: At the present time the policy—and I am far from being an expert in that field—refers you to the Conflict of Interest Post-Employment for Public Office Holders. It refers you directly to this book. We are working at the present time on more specific policies for the force, but as I am speaking to you that is the reference. You go to this book and it applies to you, mostly in part 3 on page 21, up to around section 59, in the present case.

Mr. Manley: Can you clarify this for me. I have been trying to listen closely, but I am not sure I yet know whether you have confirmed or not confirmed that Mr. Jensen did play a role, at least in part, as a supervisory function with respect to the investigations that included BCCC?

D/Commr Favreau: I do not know if, for one, I could try to clarify this. I think you are going to have to ask Mr. Jensen that question.

Maybe in order to help the committee as to what the job of a deputy of operations is, the job I am in now, I would be aware of major investigations. I would be aware of investigations that have to be brought to the attention of the nous parlons, je pense qu'il a été démontré que les activités de la banque ne semblaient pas motiver la tenue de l'enquête. Il y a eu enquête sur les activités menées par l'intermédiaire de la banque, mais il n'y avait pas de motifs suffisants pour mener une enquête sur la banque ni sur les autres établissements financiers. Je suis en mesure de vous dire que ce n'est pas par insuffisance des moyens.

M. Manly: J'aimerais maintenant finir d'examiner trois questions, une qui est nouvelle mais aussi deux que nous avons déjà évoquées. D'abord, la nouvelle question. Dans le rapport rédigé par Price Waterhouse, rapport qui a fini par entraîner la chute de la BCCI, on retrouve à maintes reprises le nom d'une compagnie internationale de transport maritime, le Gulf Group qui, si je comprends bien, appartient à la famille Gokal. Il semblerait que cette famille doive beaucoup d'argent à la BCCI et que ses comptes à la banque occupent une grande place dans l'étude rédigée par Price Waterhouse. Le Gulf Group fait affaire au Canada. Son siège est à Toronto.

J'aimerais savoir si la GRC, que ce soit directement ou par l'intermédiaire du Bureau du Surintendant des institutions financières, connaissait le lien existant entre les Gokal ou le Gulf Group et la BCCI ou la BCCC. Vos services ont-ils enquêté sur ce lien, soit de leur propre chef, soit à la demande des services de police d'autres pays?

M. Manley: Vous n'êtes donc au courant d'aucune démarche en ce sens?

La seconde question que j'aimerais voir réglée touche l'ancien sous-commissaire Jensen. En premier lieu, j'aimerais savoir s'il existe, à la GRC, des directives touchant les conflits d'intérêts ou le genre d'emploi que peuvent, après leur retraite, occuper d'anciens cadres de la GRC?

S.-comm. Favreau: Bien que je ne connaisse pas très bien la question, la politique actuelle renvoit à l'ouvrage «Code régissant la conduite des titulaires de charges publiques en ce qui concerne les conflits d'intérêts et l'après-mandat». La politique applicable en ce domaine renvoit explicitement à cet ouvrage. À l'heure actuelle, nous sommes en train d'élaborer dans ce domaine des politiques plus précises applicables aux membres de la GRC mais pour l'instant c'est cet ouvrage qui fixe les règles applicables. En ce qui concerne le cas que vous venez d'évoquer, les règles applicables vont se trouver à la partie III, page 21, jusqu'à l'article 59 environ.

M. Manley: Pourriez-vous m'expliquer ceci. Je vous écoute avec attention, mais je ne sais pas encore si vous avez confirmé ou non le fait que M. Jensen aurait joué un rôle, même restreint, dans la surveillance des enquêtes portant notamment sur la BCCC?

S.-comm. Favreau: Je ne sais pas, à vrai dire, si je suis en mesure de vous éclairer sur ce point. Il vous faudrait plutôt, je pense, poser la question à M. Jensen.

Mais pour expliquer aux membres du comité en quoi consistent les fonctions d'un sous-commissaire à la Police opérationnelle, c'est le poste que j'occupe actuellement, je dois dire que je serais effectivement au courant des grandes

II. Proceeds of Crime (Money Laundering) and Terrorist Financing Act, S.C. 2000, c. 17 (Bill C-22, 2000)

December 15, 1999 [House of Commons]

Hon. Jim Peterson (for the Minister of Finance) moved for leave to introduce Bill C-22, an act to facilitate combating the laundering of proceeds of crime, to establish the Financial Transactions and Reports Analysis Centre of Canada and to amend and repeal certain acts in consequence. (Motions deemed adopted, bill read the first time and printed).

April 5, 2000 [House of Commons]

Hon. Jim Peterson (for the Minister of Finance, Lib.) moved that Bill C-22, an act to facilitate combatting the laundering of proceeds of crime, to establish the Financial Transactions and Reports Analysis Centre of Canada and to amend and repeal certain acts in consequence, be read the second time and referred to a committee.

Mr. Speaker, I would ask before I start that instead of taking the 40 minutes of speaking time and 10 minutes for questions and comments, that I be allowed to split the time. The parliamentary secretary and I would take no more than 20 minutes of speaking time with 10 minutes for questions and comments, but I would need consent for that.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. McClelland):

I would remind members that the first three speakers do not have the opportunity for questions and comments. Therefore, we will just be splitting the time.

Does the hon. Secretary of State for International Financial Institutions have the consent of the House to split his time?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Hon. Jim Peterson:

Mr. Speaker, I appreciate the co-operation of hon. members. This bill on money laundering deals with an emerging crime, and one that is getting worse. Dirty money is that money earned from criminal activities, mainly drug dealing, but also such activities as smuggling cigarettes and theft, and is often the product of organized crime. Money laundering is the process by which that dirty money is cleaned in such a way that it cannot be readily or easily traced back to its illegal activities, therefore allowing crime to profit.

The financial action task force, of which Canada is a member, consists of 26 countries. It consists of the OECD countries, plus Singapore. It estimated that the global amount of money laundering is in the area of $300 billion to $500 billion U.S. every year.

Hon. Jim Peterson:

Mr. Speaker, I will try to be brief so that hon. members from other parties have as much time as they would want to debate this important measure.

The financial action task force also indicated that the extent of money laundering going on in Canada—and we will never know for certain what it is—is somewhere between $5 billion and $17 billion a year.

This bill is aimed at doing one thing, and that is to help take the profit out of crime.

What do we currently have in place in terms of law? We have the Proceeds of Crime (Money Laundering) Act, 1991, which does three things. It requires that records be kept of cash transactions over $10,000. It requires that client identification procedures be followed, that is, financial institutions are required to know the client. Third, it provides for the voluntary reporting of suspicious transactions by the financial institution directly to the police.

Why do we need this new bill in light of the existing law? This new bill retains the record keeping and client identification provisions of the old law. However, it has extended beyond the current institutions which must report, such as financial institutions, casinos, intermediaries, lawyers and accountants, to other types of financial institutions.

Money laundering is not just a phenomenon which takes place through financial institutions. There are expanded means, including the Internet. This new legislation will apply to cheque cashing businesses, crown owned institutions and crown owned casinos.

The old law, as I said, provided for the voluntary reporting of these suspicious transactions. We are moving beyond this to mandatory reporting. Where there is a suspicious transaction, it must be reported.

We will have three types of reporting. First, it will be mandatory for financial institutions and others who have reasonable grounds to suspect that a transaction is linked to money laundering to report that transaction.

Second, there will be mandatory reporting of prescribed transactions. We are proposing that they be cash transactions, or the equivalent, of $10,000 or more.

Third, we want to deal with the importation and exportation in and out of Canada of large amounts of cash or negotiable instruments. We are proposing that one has to report any sum exported or brought into Canada in the order of $15,000 or more.

Those are the guts of the new law. We have struggled. It is not an easy task to balance the requirement to have an updated, modern, crime fighting legal system in Canada with protecting the privacy of individuals.

Having reviewed many international situations and examples and after extensive consultations, we have proposed that in order to safeguard individual privacy but at the same time ensure that crime is stopped we would institute a financial transactions and reports analysis centre of Canada, or the FTRACC.

The centre would be an agency reporting to the Minister of Finance, who would be responsible for it. It would be run by a director. It would have approximately 60 employees and cost approximately $10 million a year. The centre will receive reports from financial institutions or others required to report. In other words, they will not report directly to the police or to the government. They will report to the centre.

The centre will gather, collect and analyze all the information. It will then refer the information to the appropriate policing authorities, only when it is satisfied there are reasonable grounds to suspect that the information would be relevant to the crime of money laundering. The centre must satisfy itself first.

What does the centre pass on? It passes on only tombstone or bare bones information: the name of the account, the date of the transaction, the account number and the value of the transaction. If the police authorities want to get more information from the centre they would have to do so by virtue of a warrant issued by a judge.

This information can also be passed on by the centre to CSIS, to Revenue Canada and to immigration authorities. It cannot be passed on willy-nilly. It can be passed on only in the event the centre has determined there are reasonable grounds to suspect money laundering and has determined that there may be, for example, tax fraud involved as well.

Any individual who feels that privacy rights have been hampered would be entitled to go to the privacy commissioner to have the case looked at. The centre will not be exempt from examination by the privacy commissioner.

Let us look at why it is important that we pass the bill quickly. The financial action task force on money laundering has pointed out that Canada, one of its members, is the only member that does not have mandatory reporting. We have the commitment of our Prime Minister at the G-8 summit in Birmingham in 1998 to this type of law. This was reconfirmed again last year at the Cologne summit.

We have had extensive consultations starting in May 1998 when the solicitor general issued a consultation paper. We in finance issued a consultation paper in December. We have considered wide consultations with all interested parties.

In conclusion, I believe that we have found a way to expand the reporting requirements, to make them mandatory and at the same time to balance the rights of individuals to privacy and freedom from unjust or unreasonable search and seizure.

This is through using this unique concept of the centre. The centre will be able to analyze trends in money laundering. It will be able to work with international law enforcement agencies. I think it will be a great addition to our war against crime.

By enacting the bill, Canada will be a much less attractive target for money laundering. We will be sending a clear message to the world that organized crime and criminals should not try to do business in Canada. We will appreciate the support of all parties.

Mr. Roy Cullen (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Finance, Lib.):

Mr. Speaker, I want to thank the members of this House for allowing me to take part in the debate on this very important bill.

There is a lot we do not know about organized crime and money laundering, but we do know, from informed sources, that it involves a constant battle always in a state of flux. It is a substantial problem.

According to independent estimates for the Department of the Solicitor General of Canada, up to $17 billion is laundered in Canada each year.

There are a number of other estimates that reveal the scope of the problem. No one knows exactly how much is involved, but everyone knows that there is a real and serious problem, in Canada and throughout the world.

According to a recent study by the financial action task force, established at the G-7 summit in Paris in 1989, the way money is laundered in Canada and in the other member countries has changed in recent years.

Money launderers no longer limit their activities to banks and other deposit institutions.

Other kinds of businesses are being used for money laundering such as securities dealers, insurance companies, casinos, currency exchange houses, money transmitters and non-financial professionals including lawyers and accountants.

We know that proceeds of crime are often laundered through legitimate businesses. Criminal Intelligence Service Canada backed this up in its annual report on organized crime just last year. The physical movement of proceeds of crime across our borders is also part of this problem.

The new system proposed in Bill C-22 will be an important step in helping to prevent cross-border money laundering through airports and other border points. More than that, Bill C-22 builds on the excellent work that we continue to do in partnership with the provinces, territories and law enforcement agencies as part of a larger global network of countries fighting this problem together.

Despite vigorous efforts the current government and its partners continue to apply in Canada and abroad, we can still do much more. Bill C-22 represents a major step forward in the fight against organized crime.

I should remind hon. members that in the budget the government devoted significant new resources to increase federal policing activities, particularly in the area of organized crime. Over the next three years the RCMP will receive $584 million in extra funding. In the next fiscal year alone the RCMP will receive $59 million extra for federal policing services. This means more resources to fight organized crime activities such as drug trafficking, smuggling of commodities and people, telemarketing and commercial fraud.

The bill is further proof of our commitment to giving our law enforcement agencies the tools they need to do the job. By implementing the bill not only will Canada be living up to its international commitments to the G-8 and its financial action task force, but we will also be making good on commitments here at home.

The RCMP and police forces across the country will benefit from the system proposed in the bill as information from the new agency will go directly to the police to support investigations. Other federal agencies will also receive information from the agency to help investigate certain national security, revenue and immigration offences, but only when they are also related to suspicions of money laundering.

Allowing the new agency with suitable protections to share information with similar agencies in other countries will allow us to play our full role against money laundering on an international scale. It will also allow us to benefit from information that foreign agencies may have about money laundering going on in our country.

When dealing with global organized crime sharing information is vital, but we are also aware of the need to respect privacy in the process of investigating these crimes. We take these concerns very seriously.

We must bring our investigative methods up to date to fight against today's money laundering techniques. We need centralized and automated systems to discover the links between dubious financial operations and the movement of illicit funds, and to ensure their follow-up. This is exactly what Bill C-22 does.

Our consultations have shown strong support for a new and tighter anti-money laundering system. Officials continue to work closely with financial institutions and other stakeholders to make sure that the new requirements are clear and reasonable. We are also consulting provincial governments, the police and others to ensure that the new arrangements will address the needs that have been identified.

Bill C-22 strikes a sound and effective balance between the legitimate needs of law enforcement and respect for individual privacy. It will also make Canada a less attractive target for money laundering and send a clear message around the world that this is a country where organized criminals should not try to do business.

Mr. Gurmant Grewal (Surrey Central, Canadian Alliance):

Mr. Speaker, I rise on behalf of the people of Surrey Central to participate in the debate on Bill C-22, an act to facilitate combatting the laundering of proceeds of crime, to establish the financial transactions and reports analysis centre of Canada and to amend and repeal certain acts in consequence.

Canada is a party to international agreements asking us to report transactions that may involve money laundering. The official opposition believes that the vast majority of law-abiding Canadians want legislation that will fight crime and that will prevent crime.

The weak Liberal government introduced this bill as Bill C-81 on May 31, 1999, and let it die on the order paper. Now we are only at second reading of the bill and still it will have to be sent to the committee for much study and amendment.

I listened very carefully to the comments of the Secretary of State for International Financial Institutions. I am convinced that the government did not evaluate, did not look into the pros and cons of the bill in depth. I would like to give an overview whereby we will look into the gravity of the situation first and then look into the problems and concerns. I would also like to provide some suggestions and amendments.

Organized criminals, particularly in the drug trade, generate and launder billions of dollars annually. They have to do that to continue their illegal operations. They move from jurisdictions with strong controls to jurisdictions with weak or no controls. This criminal activity undermines Canada's financial and social systems and increases the power and influence of illegal businesses.

Experts estimate that from $300 billion to $500 billion of criminally driven funds enter the international market annually. In Canada alone the ballpark estimate is around $20 billion.

The Financial Action Task Force estimates that about 70% of the money laundered through Canada is derived from drug trafficking.

There are many ways to launder money, including through financial institutions, foreign exchange dealers, significant cash purchases, brokerage houses, foreign tax havens, real estate, the operation of shell companies, travel agencies, insurance agencies or companies, and dealing in gold and other precious metals. Even some professionals such as lawyers and accountants help in money laundering. Criminals launder money through gambling and cross-border transfers. It is a wide open area.

Some other methods are more sophisticated, for example smurfing, human mules, over-invoicing for import-export purposes. I will not mention the details for security reasons.

Canadian banks are reportedly favoured for the transfer of funds because of their wide international presence, stability, efficiency, strong tradition of banker-client confidentiality and facilities of transfer such as wire transfers, currency exchange, denomination exchange, savings deposit boxes, and please do not laugh, even government savings bonds.

The foreign currency exchange houses being less regulated than the chartered banks provide the second most common vehicle for money laundering, at least in Canada. There is a potential for concealing the identity of the launderers because the negotiable instruments or the wire transfers are deposited in the banks and the client is perceived as the currency exchange house, not those people who are laundering the money. The perception is created that the financial negotiable instrument comes from the currency exchange house and is then deposited in the bank and the laundering of the money continues.

Other illicit funds are also laundered through the purchase of stocks and bonds in the securities market through a shell company located in a tax haven somewhere where the laws protect the anonymity of the owners. Therefore money is laundered through the stock exchange.

Investing in a private company also is a way of laundering. The private company will go public and then the earnings from the sale of shares create an illusion that the profits generated are legitimate.

These side issues of money laundering or its byproducts have serious consequences. Street gangs channel criminal profits to fund terrorism or military operations abroad. Money laundering feeds armed conflicts and illegal activities that threaten everything from our families to our society to our national and international security and economy and perhaps even world peace.

A staggering variety of activities such as extortion, home invasion, murder, theft, drugs and arms trafficking, counterfeit currency and passports, migrant smuggling, prostitution, mafia, casino and lottery frauds are additional costs to society at the expense of the taxpayer and at the expense of our future. These activities make our streets unsafe. It is not only money laundering which affects our economy and undermines society, but other criminal activities piggyback on it and affect our children, our future and undermine our security.

These activities are escalating. It will likely become more difficult for police to deal with them if the weak Liberal government does not wake up. The Liberals can have a deep sleep if they want to, if they are tired and cannot remain awake. Someone else can sit in the driver's seat. We now have a licence to do that and we could do that for them.

The House will remember that in 1997 one of the six key platforms of the former Reform Party was to make our streets safer. A Canadian Alliance government would do that.

Canadians are fed up and have had enough. We do not want Canada to be a haven for money laundering. I urge the government to look at this bill very diligently and look through lens of the importance of the issue and not through the lens of politics, selfishness or arrogance as it usually does.

The broad purpose of Bill C-22 is to remedy shortcomings in Canada's anti-money laundering legislation. It was identified by the G-7 Financial Action Task Force on Money Laundering in its 1997-98 report.

The financial task force recommended that reporting requirements in Canada be made mandatory rather than voluntary as is currently the case. Why has the reporting been voluntary in the first place? That means every honest person was supposed to report whereas the criminals escaped reporting. This does not make sense. The other recommendation made by the task force was that a financial intelligence unit be established to deal with the collection, management, analysis and dissemination of suspicious transaction reports and other relevant intelligence data.

Bill C-22 proposes to bolster Canada's anti-laundering efforts by making it mandatory for financial agencies to report information relating to certain types of transactions. The information is to be sent to a central data gathering and analysis body called the financial transactions and reports analysis centre of Canada. This analysis centre would authorize the release of information to domestic and foreign law enforcement agencies.

Bill C-22 will also establish in association with Canada Customs and Revenue Agency a system of reporting large cross-border transactions.

The Liberal government not only lacks vision but it is also very weak. It does not have the political will nor is it capable of fixing the ailing departments. It thinks that the status quo is the only option.

Even when international organizations tell it to fix something serious it does it half-heartedly. It has a mentality and culture of only doing a patchwork job. The patchwork does not work, particularly when dealing with organized crime. The criminals are light years ahead of our government. We need to overhaul the whole system. Corruption and abuse in the system is enormous.

Canadians suffer as a consequence of abuse and fraud in many areas. These include the GST refund, welfare, employment insurance, social insurance numbers, insurance, workers compensation board, immigration, and so on.

Criminals are buying mansions, boats and luxury cars with the proceeds from organized crime. They have hefty bank accounts. What is the reason? The loopholes in the system and the law are not plugged. There are so many loopholes and the criminals are exploiting them. Tax evasion and the underground economy are putting pressure on small businesses and legitimate taxpayers who cannot bear the huge Canadian tax burden.

The tax burden is responsible for a poor quality of life, the brain drain and so many other things. Due to the illegal activities of some individuals, the legitimate taxpayers suffer. The whole nation suffers.

There are criminals who do not pay taxes but they pay bribes or political donations, and they continue to enjoy the government's most favoured status. Many organizations enjoy charitable tax free status only to rake in money to finance organized crime or even wars in other countries.

A Canadian multinational trading company, which I will not name, whose stock was valued at about $600 million, was found to have very close ties to the eastern European mafia. It was laundering the money through the stock exchange and sending the money to its counterparts in other countries.

Canada is a candy store for these criminals. It is a shame that the government cannot come up with legislation that would be effective and would do the job.

The blurred vision of the Liberal government has caused the dismantling of the Vancouver port police. This makes the port a gateway for the importation of drugs and narcotics. It opens up the way for the criminals and makes their jobs easier rather than tougher. It is a shame the Liberal government gives international organized criminals VIP treatment while those same criminals according to the Immigration Act are supposed to be inadmissible into Canada.

The human smugglers and criminals who live on organized crime should be given the toughest penalties. That is what Canadians are telling us. That is the only way to discourage them. Otherwise unfortunately, they have the motivation to come to Canada and commit crimes because they consider Canada to be a crime haven.

How about stopping the federal government when it launders the money?

It appears that CIDA contracts and EDC loans have been given to businesses which donated huge sums of money to the Liberal campaign before the elections. We all know those figures. When we ask a question, the government does not reply.

I am sure that everyone in Canada knows about the billion dollar boondoggle. Do we need a bill to fix all that is wrong with the government? No, I do not think so. Rather, we need to replace the federal Liberal government, which we can and which we are prepared to do with the Canadian Alliance.

Let us look at some other aspect of the bill. When Bill C-22 comes into force, it will replace the existing Proceeds of Crime Act. However, the existing proceeds of crime regulations would remain in effect until the mandate regulations are promulgated.

There are four key principles of the bill.

The first would provide tools for law enforcement agencies, giving them the information to identify charges to be laid.

The second would strike a balance between privacy rights and law enforcement needs. We need to place strict controls on the collection, use and disclosure of personal financial information.

The third would minimize compliance costs for financial institutions and other stakeholders. We have to minimize compliance costs. We need to establish a workable regime with the full co-operation of all stakeholders, without unnecessary red tape.

The fourth would provide for contributions toward international efforts to combat money laundering.

We need to see the government's definition for these efforts. These definitions are not given in this bill. We do not know what they mean. They are too vague. I will come to that later.

The principles are ones that any law abiding citizen would support, but as always, we know we cannot trust the government because it does not keep its promises.

Let me dwell on the concern we in the official opposition have about the cautions we should take. One of the problems with Bill C-22, other than what I have mentioned, is that while the policy objective is laudable and Canada should not be a haven for laundering the proceeds of crime, the bill raises many concerns. The bill is too vague in many areas.

The official opposition is concerned that the bill is too vague concerning who is affected by the act. The Liberals have to show us clarity in this bill.

There is a lack of precision in this bill. There are no definitions of many terms, for example, the definition of “suspicious transaction”. What is a suspicious transaction? There is no definition.

The United States of America opposed this legislation because it presented problems of probable invasions of privacy. We in Canada are also concerned that the privacy of Canadian citizens could be unreasonably invaded inadvertently through overly restrictive regulations defining transactions that must be reported. There should be sufficient protection and freedom of law abiding citizens should be preserved.

Another issue is that customs officers are being given broad powers to search anyone they want when they have reasonable grounds to suspect that the person has hidden currency or monetary instruments which are of greater value than the amount prescribed or declared.

Also, we are concerned that the powers to search should have safeguards to ensure that customs officers do not hassle persons lawfully crossing the border. They should not be hassled. It may grant customs officers the power to strip travellers of undeclared cash. The financial transactions and reports analysis centre of Canada could end up with a licence to harass innocent and legitimate people.

If passed, Bill C-22 would give bureaucrats fresh authority to trap the innocent, infringe on privacy, gather information on citizens and put routine money transactions under suspicion.

There are broad delegations of authority to the cabinet, including making regulations to define what transactions must be reported and who must report them. The government has overall authority to make those regulations.

Also, it will conscript lawyers, banks, accountants and others into a national subculture of informants and snitches. Routine legitimate business transactions could be disrupted as a result of the bill. The bill will restructure the relationship of trust between lawyers and clients.

There has to be a reasonable balance between entrapment of innocent citizens and effective tools of law to help our law enforcement agencies to do their jobs effectively and efficiently.

Let us talk about securing a conviction of money laundering. Securing a conviction of money laundering requires the crown to prove four elements of the offence beyond a reasonable doubt. It must be proven that the accused dealt with the laundered property with intent to convert or conceal it. The property must have been derived from the commission of a predicated offence. The accused must have had knowledge of this fact.

The enactment could now allow the police to arrange sting operations even though the above may not be proven by the crown. It could also help the police to get someone convicted of a companion crime, the crime which is attached to the money laundering crime, even if the laundering cannot be proved. That is dangerous. The legislation should be driven by need and not by police hype, political or international pressure. It should be needs based.

The Department of Finance issued a consultation paper on January 17. The paper promises that after Bill C-22 becomes law, proposed regulations will be published in the Canada Gazette for 90 days to allow further public input. This addresses some of the concerns about the broad discretion. But the proposed regulations include cheque cashers, money order vendors, crown owned or controlled deposit-taking institutions, which are banks, credit unions, trust companies and so on, and even Canada Post money order businesses.

Generally, transactions involving $10,000 would have to be reported, as would any transaction involving five or more $1,000 bills. Cheque cashers, money vendors and money transmitters would be required to retain a record of every transaction of $1,000 or more.

Everything is hidden in these regulations. Nothing has been clearly defined in the bill.

Let us talk about regulations. As the House knows, I am co-chair of the Joint Standing Committee on Scrutiny of Regulations, so I can talk about regulations. I can say that this government governs by regulations only. The House will recognize that 10% to 15% of the laws are made in this Chamber and 80% to 90% of the laws are brought in through the back door. Only 20% come through the front door and 90% are hidden in the regulations. The regulations will hold the real story which no one will know because they will be buried under tonnes of paperwork.

My committee is responsible for examining and scrutinizing regulations that accompany a bill which is passed by both houses, this House and the other house, the Senate. This weak Liberal government that lacks vision, like the Tories before it, crippled our committee's work by not giving it the resources it needs to scrutinize hundreds and thousands of regulations. The bill will have so many regulations attached that only the courts will be able to tell us about the mayhem and the damage done to our economy by this bill's regulations. Every small business will sue the government.

In the Joint Standing Committee on Scrutiny of Regulations, there are about 800 regulations in the pipeline. Those 800 regulations are on questionable files that have been backlogged for years and years.

The House will be surprised to know that some of the regulations have been operating for as long as 25 years against the wishes of the committee which is supposed to be scrutinizing those regulations. For 25 years those regulations have clogged the pipeline and thus the work of the committee. Successive ministers have kept the stonewalling going. The regulations that the committee objects to are kept in place and are fully operable. That is shameful.

I have criticized this bill enough. Let me now discuss some of the suggestions for the government if it is listening. There are only three members here in the House who are listening.

I will call them proposed amendments. Broad delegation to cabinet to make regulations to define what transactions must be reported or who must report should be restricted. There should be precision in the legislation. The term, for example, “suspicious transaction” should be clearly defined, otherwise properties will be seized, like in the case of the flawed gun control legislation under Bill C-68. Broad powers of customs officers to search anyone or open mail should be limited and carefully crafted so that legitimate citizens do not suffer. Privacy and freedom of citizens should be respected. There should be safeguards in place to curtail hassling of persons by customs officers while lawfully crossing the border.

Witnesses before the committees must be representative of a cross-section. Regional and provincial police authorities, businessmen, federal and provincial government officials, all should be invited so that the committee can hear their concerns and ensure that the bill is crafted very carefully.

Law enforcement agencies should be prepared and equipped to deal with sophisticated activities of organized crime. The government does not put its money where its mouth is. We need to invest in the facilities and the tools given to law enforcement agencies so that they can effectively control crime in this country.

Hard positions, intransigence and thoughtlessness have no place in our deliberations when talking about this bill.

We must arrive at the best possible solution to this complex problem. Therefore, all parties must co-operate in the committee work. The committee work should not be like other committee work, which is a sham and so partisan that everyone looks through the lens of politics rather than the lens of issues. Sometimes the actual issue is lost.

I remember once, when I was on the immigration and citizenship committee, we introduced a motion to study fraud and criminal activities under the Immigration Act for illegitimate immigrants coming to this country, but the Liberal members refused the motion. Even when we want to discuss the future business of the committee, the discussion is based on partisan lines. In committees, when we need a minister to appear to answer some of the opposition members' questions, the motions are often declined.

I urge government members and all members of the House to work seriously at the committee on this serious legislation and come up with a constructive solution that will be the best solution to deal with this issue.

Another suggestion I have is to keep regulations to a minimum because businesses and financial institutions have to deal with so many regulations that they can cause serious problems.

In conclusion, we want to support the bill in principle but the contents and details need to be worked out at committee. We agree with the spirit of the bill but it should be workable. It should offer effective tools to our law enforcement agencies.

The Liberals should take fair warning that we want to see specifics during the committee hearings. The official opposition wants to know exactly what is being done with the bill and what the specifics are in the bill. As it is written, it is very vague. The terms are unclear and will not help to contain the serious money laundering situation. They will also not help the undermining of our economy. The black market, which is another byproduct of money laundering, affects our economy very seriously and puts extra onus on law-abiding citizens who pay taxes.

If we do not define the bill very clearly, we will have the same old story, the catch-22. If we look at the courts, lawsuits will follow, businesses will be hurt and small businesses, which create jobs in the country, will suffer. Jobs are not created by contributions and grants. Jobs are created by small businesses and we should support them by making sure we have clear legislation that will work.

The Liberals have not done that so far with this bill and they should have done that. Hopefully they will listen to the witnesses who came before the committee and accept the amendments that I just put forward which Canadians want us to make in the bill.

In a nutshell, I ask the government and all members of the House to support the intent of the bill. However, we need to look at the substance of the bill, which is not clear at the moment. I am sure at committee, with the hard work and diligence of all party members, we will be able to produce effective legislation.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. McClelland):

It is my duty, pursuant to Standing Order 38, to inform the House that the questions to be raised tonight at the time of adjournment are as follows: the hon. member for York North, The Environment; the hon. member for Dauphin—Swan River, Human Resources Development; the hon. member for Lévis-et-Chutes-de-la-Chaudière, Shipbuilding.

Mr. Yvan Loubier (Saint-Hyacinthe—Bagot, BQ)

Mr. Speaker, I am pleased to have the opportunity to speak at second reading of Bill C-22, which is, as hon. members are aware, intended to remedy the flaws in the present legislation as far as money laundering is concerned, which is the common term for laundering the proceeds of crime.

It is estimated that, every year, up to $17 billion from the proceeds of crime are laundered in Canada alone, most of that amount coming from the drug trade, heroin, cocaine, cannabis and hashish in particular.

It is estimated that, out of that $17 billion from the proceeds of crime that are laundered in Canada alone, the bulk of it, some $10 billion, is connected to the traffic in illegal drugs.

This is a major problem. Internationally, according to federal government figures, the total proceeds of crime that are laundered are in the order of $500 billion U.S., a considerable sum.

Since our arrival in the House of Commons, we in the Bloc Quebecois have been calling for money laundering to be considered a violent crime and to be treated as such by judges hearing money laundering cases.

I must say that the government listened to us—a first really for the Bloc Quebecois since we got here—because, when the Criminal Code was recently amended, the government paid heed and decided that money laundering would now be considered a violent crime.

The word “violent” is not used lightly. As I mentioned, in Canada, the laundering of proceeds of crime is a $17 billion business, including $10 billion from drug trafficking. There are human tragedies behind these figures.

For example, every year, thousands of children in Canada become addicted to so-called hard drugs. Perhaps we should stop making a distinction between hard and soft drugs. For example, while, 100 years ago, cannabis was considered a soft drug, it now has an hallucinogenic content 7 to 30 times greater than the cannabis that was being sold in the 1970s. Therefore, we can no longer talk about a soft drug. All drugs are becoming hard drugs.

Associated with the laundering of proceeds of crime are human tragedies, particularly in the case of illicit drugs. Thousands of children become addicted to these hard drugs, with all the social costs that this situation might generate.

Every week there are tragedies, such as killings between biker gangs for control over criminal activities, including the drug market. In the end, the laundered money is the product of these tragedies, these wars between biker gangs, which often claim innocent lives.

We must never forget or lose sight of the fact that, in addition to the thousands of children who become addicted to hard drugs every year, there was also an 11-year old boy who died in Montreal in 1995 because a bomb exploded right beside him as a result of this war between biker gangs to control the drug trade.

Associated with money laundering are also murders. In 1994 alone, no fewer than 79 murders were committed in Quebec alone to gain control over the drug trade. Ultimately, the proceeds of such crime turn up as laundered money.

There were 89 attempted murders, 129 cases of arson, and 82 attempted bombings. In 1998, there were 450 acts of violence related to control of the drug trade. Such are the social and economic ramifications of this laundered money. Just to help children who have turned to hard drugs because of criminals get off them is costing Canada a minimum of between $4 billion and $7 billion annually. This is quite a sum of money.

Considering money laundering a violent crime and improving the existing legislation concerning the laundering of proceeds of crime is a step in the right direction.

As I mentioned earlier, without blushing, the fact that money laundering is now considered a violent crime is the product of the work of several members of the various political parties in the House, but particularly those of the Bloc Quebecois, who worked relentlessly to have this included in the Criminal Code, with everything that resulted from that in terms of toughening our laws.

Before getting into the provisions of this bill, I would like to make an important comment. Justice in this country has always been one of the Bloc Quebecois' main concerns. Our party has always wanted to see justice done. It has always wanted justice to be effective and to stop the real criminals.

Apart from money laundering, we have devoted our attention to at least six other issues. That has allowed us to progress in this parliament, with the measures that were announced both recently and earlier. They are the product of the work members of the Bloc Quebecois have done in the area of justice.

Take for example the removal of the $1,000 bill from circulation. Our colleague from Charlesbourg went on a crusade to have those Canadian bills taken out of circulation. Why was that so important?

First of all, Canada is the only country to have such high denominations. When one looks at the United States or Europe—and it has been demonstrated around the world—that having $1,000 bills in Canada facilitates criminal transactions. It also facilitates money laundering.

In order to better illustrate the crucial need for the elimination of the $1,000 bill, something the Bloc Quebecois has worked to convince the government on, let me give the following example.

A street sale of 20 kilos of cocaine generates profits of between $2 million and $4 million, depending on its purity. How much does a mix of bills of $10, $20, $50 or $100 denominations weigh? The small denominations weigh 120 kilos. Imagine the handling involved for the criminals doing the laundering, who collect the proceeds of crime, of the sale of the 20 kilos of cocaine, how much easier it would be for them to carry higher denominations such as $1,000 bills and to launder them. It would be a lot easier.

If they just use $1,000 bills, if they have them to convert $5, $10 or $100 bills, they have to handle only two kilos worth of bills. They start off with 120 kilos of bills of small denominations and, with $1,000 bills, they cut the weight of the proceeds of crime to two kilos. It is a lot easier to go around with a two kilo bag of money from the sale of cocaine, heroin or some other illicit drug than to have to handle $5, $10, $20 or $100 bills.

We worked very hard with law enforcement authorities to convince this government that the $1,000 denomination needed to be withdrawn. The Secretary of State for International Financial Institutions recently announced that he would soon be withdrawing the $1,000 bill from circulation. That is good news, and I would again like to congratulate my colleague from Charlesbourg for his considerable efforts in this connection, along with my leader, the hon. member for Laurier—Sainte-Marie, and all of the Bloc Quebecois. They have fought long and hard to get this measure implemented, in order to have the $1,000 bill taken out of circulation.

Any measure—and we can never say this too often—that can hinder organized crime is a welcome one. Any improvement to the Criminal Code, like the other measures created to make the police forces' work easier, is a welcome one, if the objective is to fight more effectively against organized crime and to make it harder and harder for them to operate in Canada and internationally.

We in the Bloc Quebecois have addressed one other important matter, on which we have also taken action: pawnbroking. My colleague from Hochelaga—Maisonneuve has done an admirable job in this connection to ensure compliance with municipal bylaws concerning record keeping by pawnshops. Such compliance prevents these businesses from becoming a means of laundering money, the proceeds of crime, or other crime related property. This represents a considerable victory for the Bloc Quebecois, and this action again arose out of a concern for greater justice and for making it easier for law enforcement officers to collar real criminals.

The efforts by the Bloc Quebecois member for Hochelaga—Maisonneuve have led to tighter controls on pawnbroking establishments. Following these efforts, 70 pawnshops closed in Montreal. These businesses did not comply with municipal bylaws and they bordered on being illegal. These 70 pawnshops were probably used to launder money.

The fourth issue that we in the Bloc Quebecois tackled because we care about justice, which is also reflected in Bill C-22—and we will get back to this a little later—is the fight against organized crime. A few months ago, the hon. member for Berthier—Montcalm, who is here today, tabled a motion in the House to establish a justice subcommittee to find ways to fight organized crime more effectively.

I was very pleased to see that, through the work of the hon. member for Berthier—Montcalm and all members of the Bloc Quebecois, we were able to convince not only the government but all the parties in this House of the need to set up such a committee. Incidentally, the subcommittee will begin its work next week to report back in the fall, with a series of recommendations on how to increase the effectiveness of our fight against organized crime. These measures will not only allow us to catch petty criminals, but also the leaders, for crimes that they commit or that they ask others to commit.

I hope the work of that committee will be successful, because it is in everyone's interest. I do hope that the consensus achieved by the hon. member for Berthier—Montcalm and the Bloc Quebecois is a guarantee that we will get recommendations that will take us one step further in the fight against crime.

The fifth issue concerns the increase in the RCMP budgets, particularly as regards the fight against drug traffickers.

It is something that we have often talked about here. Recently, under special circumstances which you know, I had the opportunity to express to you the terror experienced by farm families not only in my riding, but throughout Quebec and Canada, particularly in southeastern Ontario.

That feeling of terror sets in every year as criminals confiscate certain plots of farmland in May, at the beginning of the farming season, to prick out cannabis seedlings and let them grow until late fall. During that period, not only thousands of farm families throughout Canada live in terror, but they can no longer enjoy their property. These farmers receive death threats. They are told their children could be harmed. They are told they themselves could be physically harmed should they venture too close to the cannabis planted by these criminals.

We had the opportunity to discuss that. From the example we saw in the Montérégie region, particularly in Saint-Hyacinthe, we, in the Bloc Quebecois, had the opportunity to demand that the government increase the budgets of police forces and give them the tools they need to do their job.

It was ridiculous. Since 1994, the Minister of Finance, who prides himself on being a good manager, had reduced the RCMP budget to fight money laundering and drug trafficking by 12% or 15%, depending on the item.

While we were witnessing exponential growth in organized crime activity, the Minister of Finance, with his usual wisdom—when something does not concern him or his shipping companies and his profits, I think he is less interested in the common good—had cut budgets to fight criminals.

I want to make the point again that Bloc Quebecois members, who are concerned about justice and brought pressure to bear, have managed to get the RCMP budget increased this year and additional resources allocated to the various RCMP detachments in order to wage a more effective battle against drug traffickers.

In addition, Bloc Quebecois representations resulted in the maintenance of all RCMP detachments in Quebec threatened with closure, in many cases because of bureaucratic decisions that ignored the fact that an effective fight against organized crime must be like a chess game. If there are gangs of organized criminals in one location, there must be a strong police presence nearby.

There has been such a presence for several years now. Trust must be established between these police forces, which include the RCMP, the Sûreté du Québec and municipal forces, and the public, particularly in a case where the law of silence reigns, where there is a regime of terror surrounding the activities of drug traffickers. It take time to build up this trust.

And yet the federal government threatened to close down many detachments in Quebec when what should be done is to increase the resources in order to wage a more effective anti-crime campaign. It should not be forgotten that it is Ottawa that has the means to increase budgets to wage a more effective battle against organized crime.

Once again, because of the Bloc Quebecois' efforts, budgets were increased and RCMP detachments kept open in order to wage the battle against organized crime more effectively.

One more step remains—increasing resources in the short term—and I will have an opportunity to get into this a little later on. If there is to be another year this year of "agricultural" activity by drug pushers in the fields of Quebec and Ontario, and it takes two or three years before any action occurs, this means two or three years more of a reign of terror threatening whole families, with the billions these criminals pocket from their illicit activities.

Another productive effort by the Bloc Quebecois in its concern for improving justice and the means available to the government and to justice to fight organized crime involved the requirement to disclose any dubious transaction involving $10,000 or more and increasing the number of institutions obliged to report such transactions or any other dubious transaction.

In its 1997 election platform, the Bloc Quebecois expressed its concern at identifying all dubious transactions and ensuring that all institutions and individuals suspected of handling dirty money be obliged, in case of doubt about the amount of a transaction, to report such a transaction.

The law was distinctly lacking in this regard. Under it, an impressive number of financial institutions were and still are not obliged to report dubious transactions of $10,000 or more or any other transaction. They do so on a voluntary basis.

As far back as 1997, we were calling for this declaration to be made mandatory, for there to be a ceiling above which all dubious transactions of sizeable amounts, say $10,000, would have to be reported, along with any other suspicious transactions or transactions by suspicious individuals. We called for the scope of this legislation to be expanded to other institutions, bodies or individuals liable to be dealing with such suspicious amounts or transactions.

We are pleased to see that, with Bill C-22, the government has finally grasped what the Bloc Quebecois has been calling for since 1997, out of concern for justice and effectiveness of police and customs operations to nab criminals. The government has finally understood that it was in the common interest, the national interest and the interest of Quebecers and Canadians, to implement these recommendations by the Bloc Quebecois.

Essentially, Bill C-22 does what the Bloc Quebecois had proposed. This was essentially what had to be done, for the present at least. There are some questions, but we are only at second reading. Other steps are yet to come, including consideration by a committee and report stage. We will have some questions to ask, but overall what we find in this bill is satisfactory to us in principle. It is also satisfactory in its application, with a few minor reservations I shall go into later.

First of all, the bill makes it mandatory to report suspicious transactions, at a level that has been set at $10,000 or more, but also any other transaction where there are grounds for suspicion about the origin of the funds, in other words transactions which might involve the proceeds of crime, whether drug trafficking or any other criminal activity.

The bill also broadens the scope of existing legal provisions. Again, this responds to our repeated representations, since 1997, regarding certain flaws in the provisions dealing with money laundering. The bill specifies that this reporting, which is now compulsory in the case of suspicious transactions, has been broadened to include all regulated financial institutions, casinos, businesses involved in foreign exchange dealings, persons engaged in the business of dealing in securities, insurance companies and persons acting as financial intermediaries, such as lawyers and accountants.

We feel this is an improvement. As I said, we will have questions for the government, officials and numerous witnesses who will soon appear before the Standing Committee on Finance, but, on the face of it, the Bloc Quebecois is pleased with this measure.

The bill also increases the penalties for illicit or criminal activities, namely the laundering of proceeds of crime.

As I mentioned earlier, since money laundering is now recognized as a violent crime, these penalties are harsher than they used to be.

A second improvement found in Bill C-22 is the series of provisions dealing with transborder operations, such as imports or exports of currencies or instruments, such as travellers cheques, and any illegal trafficking of these currencies or instruments. The provisions have been strengthened precisely to catch the real criminals who engage in this type of illicit trafficking.

First of all, the bill increases the powers of customs officers to search people and vehicles. In this regard, we have certain reservations but, overall, we agree with the principle that when there is serious and reasonable suspicion—and customs officers are well trained—with respect to the trafficking of such currency or the failure to report such currency or monetary instruments—it would be normal—let us be honest—to check whether or not such instruments should be seized, the traffickers pursued and the real criminals required to pay.

There are also provisions for co-operation with foreign countries. Too often, discussions about globalization ignore the fact that it is not just about trade and legal matters in the noblest sense. One example given is international tribunals trying war criminals. Globalization also has to do with very close co-operation between governments to catch criminals. We must never forget this.

Recently, there was a conference in Russia on the evolution of organized crime. We must remember that organized crime is becoming increasingly international. I repeat what I said earlier: every year, world wide, approximately $500 billion U.S. is laundered—and money launderers do not file tax returns. This is the amount laundered internationally. Part of this money falls into the hands of organized crime in Quebec and in Canada.

This is a lot of money and it leads to some tragedies, as I mentioned earlier. Co-operation between governments is essential. Such co-operation, which was also called for in a recent international conference on the subject, is made possible by Bill C-22.

Finally, Bill C-22 provides another innovation. Following consideration in committee and questioning of officials and witnesses appearing before the committee, we will be more certain of our final analysis. At first glance, though, the third major clause of this bill, which provides for the creation of a financial transactions and reports analysis centre of Canada, is a step in the right direction in that, at the moment, information on criminals, money laundering and interprovincial transactions is spread here and there.

All efforts to centralize this information or to obtain the co-operation of other police forces or between the investigators of the financial transactions and reports analysis centre of Canada, the various police forces and even Revenue Canada are welcome.

In the future, with this centre, all information on suspicious transactions and those that may lend themselves to money laundering will be centralized. There will also be information on individuals or institutions found guilty of failing to make the mandatory disclosure in the case of a suspicious transaction or of having been accused of money laundering themselves.

I am pleased to note the bill provides that information disclosed by the centre—very confidential information will pass through it—will be carefully controlled and governed by the Privacy Act. This is good news, but we would like to question the government and the officials who worked on the bill, and hear them as witnesses before the Standing Committee on Finance to be sure this information will not be used and cast to the four winds or, more importantly, sold for financial gain.

Very sensitive information will pass through the centre. We want to make sure the requirements of the Privacy Act are met.

As I have said, we do have certain reservations about the bill nevertheless. The first of these relates to increasing the powers of customs officers. This may be beneficial. Often, customs officers may have their hands tied by various constraints that make it impossible, even if they are suspicious, to carry out the necessary search in order to collar real criminals.

We are concerned, at the same time, about people's rights and freedoms. This will be one of our concerns during the next stages of examination of this bill. We would like tight controls over the work of the customs officers, with strict regulations, so that there will not be any abuse relating to searches of individuals or their vehicles. Customs officers must have a framework of operation.

Second, a question arises, particularly in the light of clause 73 of Bill C-22: the extraordinary power assigned to the Governor in Council, and the minister responsible, for making any regulations relating to the legal provisions of Bill C-22.

We have misgivings about this. To give so much power to a group of individuals, to the Governor in Council or the minister responsible, on matters that might become criminal in nature, without involving parliament, has always meant to us that the powers of the departmental employees and the minister are extraordinary. This has also come up in other bills.

We want to know if it would be possible to ensure that the House has a say in the process, to make sure that the powers are not concentrated in the hands of a few individuals when it comes to such important issues, particularly as regards the regulations that have yet to be drafted to implement Bill C-22.

This is another concern we will raise when a more in-depth review of the bill is conducted by the Standing Committee on Finance and at the various legislative stages.

We have a third concern regarding this bill, but also the whole issue of organized crime. Next week, the justice subcommittee will be meeting. It enjoys the unanimous support of the House of Commons, with regard to what still needs to be done to give adequate tools to police forces and what changes must be made to the Criminal Code to fight organized crime more effectively.

Last year, I went through a harrowing experience, not just me, but several other people too. Some people have been going through that experience for years. I am referring to the reign of terror, the law of silence imposed by organized crime on people whose lands they invade. These people cannot say anything, otherwise they are beaten or receive death threats.

I would like to send a message to the government. Will this subcommittee get the government's co-operation so that, by early fall, we can have measures that will truly help us fight organized crime effectively?

Second, was the government's support for the establishment of that subcommittee just a smoke and mirrors operation, or will it truly help the subcommittee to propose a series of recommendations with, of course, the input of opposition members, including Bloc Quebecois members, to fight organized crime more effectively? The hopes of several thousand people rest on that subcommittee.

I do not say that as a figure of speech. I have met people who have been living in terror for the last three, four or five years because of threats from organized crime. They place a lot of hope on the work of the justice subcommittee, on measures to fight organized crime more effectively and to protect them.

They also place a lot of hope on short term measures. I will put particular emphasis on the illegal production of cannabis on Quebec and Ontario farms, for obvious reasons.

I remind the government that, in the short term, before the justice subcommittee can make its recommendations in the fall, it is imperative that we take a series of measures immediately, this year, to fight the illegal production of cannabis, with the farming season that will start at the beginning of May and with the pricking out of cannabis seedlings in our farmers' fields.

If we do not take action this year, we are giving one more farming season, one more year of illegal profits to criminal organizations in Quebec, Ontario, British Columbia and throughout Canada, but particularly in eastern Canada and in the westernmost part of Canada. It is one more year of extraordinary profits, or proceeds of crime, that we are giving them.

It is also one more year to convince even more school children—and the Standing Committee on Finance will have an opportunity to hear from people involved in the schools who see what is happening—to sell them not just cannabis or hashish, but also heroin and cocaine. They will have another year in which to damage the future of thousands of children in Quebec and in Canada.

If action is not taken immediately in April or May to let organized crime know that things will no longer be the same and that, this year, measures will be implemented on the strength of increased budgets, for the RCMP among others, I think that a good opportunity will have been missed to show that we are really serious about fighting organized crime.

As I said, starting with my riding of Saint-Hyacinthe—Bagot, there are thousands of farm families and owners of woodlots who are waiting for short term action from the government and who are probably glad that money laundering provisions are being tightened.

The more we cut the ground out from under organized crime and money laundering, which is the key to the long term profitability of criminal activity, the less it will tend to increase its annual production or squatting on land in order to grow cannabis, exchange it for cocaine or heroin on the American market and so forth, and profit from the proceeds.

People are also happy that the continued pressure brought to bear by the Bloc Quebecois has meant an increase in budgets to fight organized crime. That is undeniable. But they are waiting for short term action.

I bring this message to the government. We must see improvements before the start of the next criminal cannabis production season. We must see improvements. After breaking the law of silence, and I am not the only one to have done so, there were others after me in my riding and throughout Canada, we have to improve the situation. Organized terrorism in the fields of Quebec and Canada must stop this year or at least there must be a marked improvement, because it cannot continue. I have met farm families who are victims of organized crime, and this has to stop.

If the government hears us as members, and I think that opposition members are very aware of this issue, it must announce, this year, in the coming weeks, that it is taking steps to reduce criminal activities, beginning with those of the drug dealers.

We will continue to analyze this bill considering it a step in the right direction but recognizing that there are many things yet to be done so that the freedom we were proud of in Quebec and in Canada is not a false freedom, but rather true freedom because we will deprive organized crime of the power to threaten the freedom of the majority of the people.

Hon. Jim Peterson:

Mr. Speaker, I rise on a point of order. I neglected to acknowledge the great battle against criminals and crime that has been waged by the hon. member who has just spoken, and I must congratulate him on behalf of the Liberal Party and all members of this House.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. McClelland): That is not a point of order, but never mind.

Mr. John Solomon (Regina—Lumsden—Lake Centre, NDP):

Mr. Speaker, on behalf of the New Democratic Party caucus I am pleased to stand in this assembly and join with all of my colleagues to trash money laundering and to say to Canadians that we unanimously support eliminating criminal activity in this country. Otherwise, it would be a very different debate, if some of us defended the criminal activity that exists in our economy.

Bill C-22, which deals with the proceeds of crime from money laundering, is a very important piece of legislation in many ways, but it could be better. We have heard some of the speeches from the minister and others who talked about the wonderful and positive things it might do, and I believe that it will have a positive effect on our economy. However, I am concerned about a number of issues with respect to the bill.

The NDP supports this bill in principle. It is obviously important to support the introduction of legislation that curbs illegal activity.

However, there is a problem because of the wariness concerning the lack of certainty and clarity in some parts of the bill. Before I address that, Mr. Speaker, I would like to share with you some of the concerns I have with this bill.

First, I am concerned that this is going to be a piece of feel good legislation. The Liberals in the past have introduced legislation which I classify as feel good legislation. I hope this bill will not fall under same definition. What I mean by that is that the Liberal government tends to address very serious criminal activity in this country with a piece of legislation that makes Canadians feel good that something is happening to protect them, but in fact nothing ever happens to protect them. There is a law on the books, but there are never any resources to back up the legislation.

I would use two examples. There was cigarette smuggling in Quebec and Ontario a few years ago when the Liberals were cutting everything, including customs agents, police and security forces. A certain group of individuals started smuggling cigarettes into Canada, selling them in Quebec and Ontario. Rather than pass legislation which supported the customs and duty officers and our police forces in nabbing the people who were smuggling, they introduced a piece of feel good legislation. They made people feel good because they were doing something by passing a law which took federal tax off cigarettes in Quebec and Ontario, but that cost taxpayers $2 billion a year. Guess what. The smugglers went from smuggling tobacco to smuggling guns.

Rather than dealing with legislation like the Firearms Act, they should have committed resources to nab the gun smugglers. What did the government do? It passed a gun registration law, which has nothing to do with protecting Canadians, but it made them feel good that the Liberal government was actually doing something to protect Canadians. In fact, it was not doing a darned thing. It was encouraging smugglers to continue to smuggle.

We have these two pieces of feel good legislation which the Liberals passed. One was on tobacco taxes, which cost us $2 billion a year, and which will probably add tens of thousands to the debt because more people will be smoking in Ontario and Quebec because of the low price of tobacco. Then they passed the Firearms Act, which forces criminals to register their guns. As we know, criminals do not register their guns. Nothing has changed.

We now have Bill C-22, which is supposed to stop money laundering in Canada. If anybody believes this is going to be the epitome of legislation, they are dreaming in technicolour. I hope it has some effect, but if the bill is not backed up with some cash and resources to provide our country with more security, more police officers and more customs agents to look into these issues, then the law will be useless. It is a feel good piece of legislation. The government is trying to make Canadians feel good about it, but nothing will ever happen. The same old story continues, the money laundering, smuggling and all the criminal activities committed by people who want to use handguns and other kinds of illegal weapons.

The potential in this bill is very great, but I want to raise a couple of issues which I feel have to be addressed.

First, I am hoping the Liberals will put some money where their mouths are for a change when it comes to a piece of legislation which is in principle very good, but will not work unless there are some resources put behind it.

Another problem we see with the legislation is the potential for charter violations. The guarantees of reasonable search and seizure in the charter are at risk in our view with this bill.

The Criminal Lawyers' Association argues that the standard of suspicion outlined “fails to meet even the first and fundamental requirements of reasonable grounds”.

The legislation may create an irreconcilable conflict for professionals, such as lawyers, who remain subject to certain codes of conduct that prohibit them from disclosing information. It must also provide a mechanism to absolve an individual from the potential liability that may result from disclosing this particular confidential information.

The third issue in terms of our concerns is a possible pressure on consumers. As the consumer affairs critic, I am very concerned about every piece of legislation that comes before the House which would cost consumers more money than it would benefit them. We feel that the reporting regime set up to track and communicate suspicious transactions from criminal activity have at least two financial repercussions for consumers.

First, there is a cost to be borne by the taxpayers for the establishment and maintenance of the financial tracking system that will be set up. Second, in having to establish compliance mechanisms, there is a concern that the cost for setting up reporting mechanisms for financial institutions will be borne by these institutions' customers. That means that the consumer stands to pay the fare one more time.

The fourth issue of concern for us is the question about the system's effectiveness. There remains a series of concerns about the planned reporting scheme's effectiveness. There is a warning that the new regime has the potential to create a bureaucratic behemoth and the chance that organized crime could short-circuit such a system through a series of shadowy sophisticated transactions. Money might be better spent by granting law enforcement investigative bodies additional resources to detect and prosecute money laundering offences.

The fifth concern we have is that the bill does not address technology based crimes. Technology based crimes include credit card and debit card fraud, telephone fraud, stock market manipulation, computer break-ins and so on. These are very important because they are on the rise. More and more people are using the Internet. There is a huge growth in the debit card business. More and more consumers are using cards for instant transactions. A lot of personal information is on the Internet and is in the hands of tens of thousands of businesses in the country.

Increasingly organized crime syndicates are using technological and digital means of communication, such as encryption and scanning devices, potentially circumventing the provisions of the bill. People can buy a scanner for $200. Things can be scanned quickly, and then that information is put into a computer, which puts it all at risk.

What is more important is that money laundering is taking place in many cash businesses, not just with card transactions. I will not mention any particulars, but take for example a cash business such as a fast food franchise.

I happen to know someone from New Jersey who owns a fast food franchise. I asked him why he had it, because he was a very wealthy person. He said he had a couple of other businesses, but when his five-year-old daughter was asked what her father did he did not want her to have to answer something that was really not important or perhaps on the verge of not being legal. So he bought a fast food franchise and his daughter can now say that her dad owns a fast food franchise that sells ice cream. It is actually quite nice.

Of course, a cash business like that opens all kinds of opportunities for people to launder money. I am not suggesting that person is doing that, but it is one way to do it.

Another way to launder money would be for a family to buy five or six business class airline tickets to Europe, decide not to use them, cash them in and the money goes to the money launderer who gave them the money to buy the tickets in the first place, and then they split. I am not sure if that situation would be covered by the bill, but there are thousands of ways to launder money, more ways than I could recall.

We feel that we have to toughen up the bill and put some resources behind it to assist the lawkeepers and the peacekeepers in ensuring that the laundering issue is addressed in a tighter way.

A clearer and more precise definition of what constitutes a suspicious transaction is needed. The subjective nature of the definition could provide an excuse for compliance failure and, as a result, many suspicious transactions may not be reported.

In addition, the use of a vague definition could result in institutions over-reporting for fear of involuntary non-compliance, thus creating unnecessary and unwarranted scrutiny of innocent individuals.

The proposed legislation must clearly address the issue of the threat to the privacy of Canadians, specifically the possible disclosure of information to Revenue Canada, should it involve a taxation matter. Strict guidelines must be established.

It must also address the possible violation of the guarantees of reasonable search and seizure under the charter or rights and freedoms.

In addition, the issue of tax related offences should be addressed. Tax offences occur when money is transferred to offshore tax havens through offshore companies, trusts and bank accounts when the purpose is to conceal assets from Revenue Canada.

Money laundering, on the other hand, involves the intent to conceal criminal profits to make them appear legitimate. We have seen the Royal Bank, the Bank of Montreal, the Bank of Nova Scotia and the Canadian Imperial Bank of Commerce account for 80% of local banking in the Bahamas. Both the Royal Bank and the Bank of Nova Scotia have been implicated in money laundering cases in the Caribbean on more than one occasion. In one case the court ordered the Bank of Nova Scotia to pay $2,500,000 in fines, noting that laws should not be used as a blanket device to encourage or foster criminal activity.

What I am really worried about is that small aircraft and boats can land in our country and in the U.S. at tiny airports or marinas and they rely on the honour system when it comes to customs declarations.

The federal government also has plans to implement signing accords with major shippers that will allow them to cross into the U.S. without stopping. Companies would provide computerized updates to Revenue Canada of their shipments and custom agents would make spot checks at company locations rather than at the border.

The Liberal government has cut in half the customs enforcement budget, and it is still cutting. I am concerned that if this is not stopped and reversed, then this feel good legislation will be just that; it will not solve the problem, but through the public relations offices of the Liberal Party of Canada and the federal government they will try to persuade people that they should feel good because the legislation is there.

We heard that money laundering is the world's third largest industry by value. Between $5 billion U.S. and $17 billion U.S. is laundered in Canada each year. Money laundering extends far beyond hiding profits from narcotics. It includes trade fraud, tax evasion, organized crime in arms smuggling, and bank and medical insurance fraud. I would hope the government would provide the appropriate resources to address and look into these issues further.

American tax collectors estimate that they lose about $9 billion yearly to tax evasion. This comes from a book by Diane Francis entitled Contrepreneurs . At a rate of 1:10, because Canada's population is about 10% of the population of the United States, we stand to lose at least $1 billion. That sounds like a lot of money over a period of a year. When we look at it in terms of how the Liberals have helped their friends evade taxes, it is a drop in the bucket. Some members may be wondering what I mean by that.

If members will recall, the Liberals allowed the Bronfmans to transfer billions of dollars in trust accounts to the U.S. without paying taxes on the accounts. This created a loss to the Canadian taxpayers of almost a billion dollars. I think it was $750 million but we would not know because we were not told the value of the tax evasion, which was supported by the Liberals and the member for Wascana who also supported it front and centre. The Liberals allowed the Bronfmans to take this trust fund, which was set up in trust for the Bronfman family to use in Canada, and move it outside the country, thereby avoiding taxes.

I think Canadians view this kind of legal money laundering or legal tax evasion, which the Liberals support, as something that is a very big concern.

If the hon. member for Wascana has some suggestions we would appreciate his participation in the debate. I am sure he would be able to provide more information on that than I can.

The other concern I and the NDP have is that we have a money laundering bill that will be tough and that will addresses the issue of criminal activity and proceeds from criminal activity. Obviously if the government had the wherewithal it would try to shut down all the criminal activity in this country. That would be an honourable objective but I am not sure how the government views that. It has not really undertaken, in my view, a comprehensive attempt to do that.

In particular, the RCMP, which has really been choked for funds, has been strangled in terms of trying to hire and train enough officers in the country to handle just the bare, basic bones of police provisioning. The Liberals have choked back funding to the RCMP over the years to the point where in Saskatchewan alone we are 200 RCMP officers short. Over the last three years the Liberals have not provided enough funding to the Regina RCMP training depot.

I am happy to say that in this budget the Liberals did provide more money to the RCMP training academy, and I thank the member for Wascana for that effort. I think it is a very important initiative but it is too little too late. We are still waiting for the weather station that the Liberals promised in the last election.

Hon. Ralph E. Goodale: It is there. It is up and running in Bethune.

Mr. John Solomon: It is up and running in Bethune?

Hon. Ralph E. Goodale: It has been there for two years now.

Mr. John Solomon:

It was in my riding and he never invited me. He should have invited me to the opening. He has to be more co-operative.

I am glad to see that is happening. One of his promises has been completed.

I want to get back to the RCMP because it is a very important institution in my riding. I know the RCMP were very concerned about the lack of funding and the lack of money involved in recruiting and training new officers. Hopefully the government opposite will provide sufficient funding for these individuals.

While I am at it, I want to say that I am very concerned about the privatization of the RCMP depot. Many of the workers there have worked hard to support the RCMP and to make sure that it is one of the best policing institutions in the world, but they are not treated as fairly as we think they should be treated.

My final point is that if the bill can provide some sort of controls on laundering money from criminal activity, why can the government not introduce a bill that will provide a Tobin tax on financial transactions that are legal?

By unanimous consent, the House of Commons passed a motion, which was introduced by my colleague, the NDP member of parliament for Regina—Qu'Appelle, that would undertake to institute a Tobin tax for Canada and the rest of the world but I have not seen any kind of initiative by the government.

The member for Wascana is here today and he has done a couple of good things in the last while. He has not done as much as we would have liked but he is progressing. We are training him well and we are happy he is finally taking some of our ideas to heart. I was wondering why he will not undertake with his colleagues, the Minister of Finance and the Secretary of State for International Financial Institutions, to initiate the promise in the motion that was passed in the House to support a Tobin tax which is a financial transaction tax on all the stock market transactions. There are no taxes on those particular transactions. Most members of parliament in Canada believe there should be a tax. Most elected officials in the world believe there should be a tax. The people who do not believe there should be a tax are the people in wealthy corporations and in very wealthy families.

The Liberals continue to support that kind of approach, that of the very wealthy corporations and very wealthy families in this country.

I am very concerned whether they will allow more tax evasion by wealthy families like the Bronfmans, whether they will allow more tax evasion by wealthy individuals and companies on the stock market or whether they will undertake to do what Canadians want them to do, which is to institute a Tobin tax, a fair tax on financial transactions on the stock market and throughout exchanges in the world so we can have a very controlled, steady and stable system that would not encourage people who get money through illegal means, such as money laundering, to use the stock market for their particular advantage.

In summary, we support the bill in principle. It has many more positive things to address. The government needs to put in some resources to support the bill to make sure that the law it is passing can actually be carried out by our law enforcement agencies.

Hon. Lorne Nystrom (Regina—Qu'Appelle, NDP):

Madam Speaker, I want to ask the member a question because, unknown to the House, he is an expert on laws around the world concerning money laundering and has a great deal of background in this area.

In the member's opinion, why did the government leave out the whole question of tax evasion? I see the member from Saskatchewan across the way. The minister is in the cabinet and I would ask him this question but I cannot because this is not question period. Tax evasion is not addressed in this bill.

The Internal Revenue Service in the United States estimated that the tax collector loses about $9 billion a year in the U.S. because of tax evasion. Nine billion dollars a year is a lot of cash. If one were to extrapolate that into Canadian dollars, where we have one-tenth the population, it would mean, if we were similar to the United States in terms of our loss of money through tax evasion, that we would lose about $1 billion a year. That is a lot of cash. It could pay for a lot of health care and a lot of educational systems that we all need. It could also address some of the farm crisis. It could address all kinds of major problems that we have in the country.

In his very studied and learned opinion, why does the member for Regina—Lumsden—Lake Centre think this is not part of the bill. Is it too complicated or just not a high enough priority? Why would this not be part of the bill?

I also appreciated his comments on the Tobin tax. If we can follow the flow of money in terms of criminal activity—and I remind the House again that the third largest industry in the world is criminal activity in terms of the flow of illegal money, dirty money—by setting up rules and regulations in the OECD and the G-8, then it puzzles me as to why we cannot do the same thing on currency speculation in terms of what is called the Tobin tax. I maintain that if there is a will, there is a way as well.

Anyway, I will go back to the tax evasion issue and ask why it is not included in the bill.

Mr. John Solomon:

Madam Speaker, I thank my colleague, the member for Regina—Qu'Appelle, for that very important question because I actually never addressed that in my remarks. I ran out of time but I had many more things to say.

Tax evasion is not addressed in this legislation because it is a possibility that many Canadians have a lot of flexibility in terms of accessing sophisticated offshore companies. Trusts and bank accounts can be set up in places like the Bahamas, which I mentioned earlier. Canada's chartered banks all offer banking services and tax savings, with most services offered in the Caribbean and Switzerland. Money that is in an offshore tax haven is not only out of reach of Revenue Canada, it is also safe from creditors.

In my remarks earlier I said that the reason it is not in the bill, I suspect, is because the government's very wealthy friends do not want it to be in the legislation. One example of why I say that is the Bronfmans. They had a trust account in this country which was set up under legislation created by the Liberals in the 1970s on a 20 year term. It was extended by the Conservative government for a number of extra years. When the term was coming to an end and they had to actually pay taxes on the trust account, the Liberals encouraged and gave permission for the Bronfmans to transfer this multibillion dollar trust account outside of the country, thereby avoiding taxes in Canada.

It is estimated that we lose about $1 billion a year on tax evasion. That one transaction that the Liberals undertook, encouraged and allowed the Bronfmans to undertake, cost us about $750 million in lost taxes on one transaction. I think the estimate of $1 billion is really out to lunch.

The bottom line is that the reason tax evasion is not in the bill is because the wealthy friends of the Liberals, the wealthy powerful corporations who support the Liberals, do not want it in here. Guess who pays the piper?

Mr. Peter MacKay (Pictou—Antigonish—Guysborough, PC):

Madam Speaker, I congratulate the previous speaker on his recent designation as world expert in the area of money laundering.

Bill C-22 is of course a very important bill before us today and it is long overdue. In the final analysis it will bring about some very necessary and important changes in the country.

Put quite simply, Bill C-22 will make it mandatory for financial institutions to report suspicious transactions and will create a new federal centre to receive and manage reported information with respect to potential criminal activity, both inside and outside our borders.

It is quite obvious that this should and is a priority for many in the country. Sadly, the government has waited a significant period of time before introducing the legislation, although there was an outcry from around the country, particularly within the policing sector, asking that something be done to assist them and to give them the tools to address this growing problem.

We all know that this is but part of a larger problem. That larger problem obviously being organized crime, again here in Canada.

To reflect upon the government's addressing of that, it took a motion from the Bloc Quebecois to bring this matter to the forefront, based on the fact that one of their own members was under threat of violence as a result of his addressing the issue.

This particular legislation focuses the efforts of the law enforcement community and the entire system on addressing the problem. The money that is often shifted between countries and financial institutions, investments of that sort without a paper trace, is something that opens the door to a significant ability to launder money, which is highly criminal and obviously highly attractive to criminal organizations.

We have to be more aggressive and more vigilant in addressing this problem. I commend the solicitor general for the legislation at this time because it does empower law enforcement agents to address this. This centre I do hope will become a focal point and will receive the funding necessary to do that good work.

Giving law enforcement agents the tools is the belief of the Progressive Conservative Party. I know the member for St. John's East, as do all members of our party, do support the idea that law enforcement agencies throughout the country, sadly, have not been given the resources and the support from the government to achieve the very important task that they have before them. This legislation does move in the right direction in that regard.

Canada has been under heavy criticism in recent years with respect to the fact that the United States is feeling more vulnerable as a result of our lax internal security measures.

When I am talking about trafficking, it is not only in money that we see this occurring. It is often very much the illicit drug trade, firearms, pornography and all those things which Canadians want to feel a significant degree of protection from and where we should be focusing our efforts to close down our borders with respect to that type of material.

Money laundering, in and of itself, poses to law enforcement personnel one of the greatest challenges in the ongoing battle of organized crime. To fight organized crime effectively, law enforcement agencies and we as legislators must address those challenges posed specifically by current trends in money laundering, and adapt strategies to respond to those challenges.

The Acting Speaker (Ms. Thibeault):

We must stop at this time, but the hon. member will have approximately 15 minutes left when the bill is again brought back before the House.

It being 5.30 p.m., the House will now proceed to the consideration of Private Members' Business as listed on today's order paper.

April 6, 2000 [House of Commons]

The House resumed from April 5 consideration of the motion that Bill C-22, an act to facilitate combatting the laundering of proceeds of crime, to establish the financial transactions and reports analysis centre of Canada and to amend and repeal certain acts in consequence, be read the second time and referred to a committee.

Mr. Peter MacKay (Pictou—Antigonish—Guysborough, PC):

Mr. Speaker, I am very pleased to continue debate with respect to this very important piece of legislation, Bill C-22, which deals with money laundering.

Money laundering poses a great challenge these days to law enforcement agents in their battle against organized crime. For example, a few months ago in the United States, American officials discovered the biggest money laundering operation ever in the history of the United States. Federal investigators believe that Russian gangsters had channelled up to $10 billion through the Bank of New York, the 15th largest bank in the United States. This news sent extreme shock waves throughout the entire financial services sector and proved that money laundering can certainly affect even the big banks.

It is vital that we get more aggressive in the fight against money laundering and give law enforcement agencies better tools to do their job. For Canadians to feel a sense of security and faith, we must arm our police agencies with all the necessary resources to make sure they can take up their fight against organized crime.

Canada has continued to come under heavy criticism in recent years as a result of being identified as an easy place for criminal organizations to launder money. Criminals have found Canada as an attractive place to hide large financial transactions because of our proximity to the United States, our stable political system, the high volume of cross-border transactions and because the odds of being caught in this country are lower than in other jurisdictions.

The Liberal government has been talking about tougher reporting rules for at least three years. As far back as May 1996 federal officials said that they were considering a mandatory reporting system. This was reported in the Financial Post on May 3, 1996.

Globally, approximately $3 billion to $5 billion American in criminally diverted funds enter the international capital markets annually. The federal government estimates between $5 billion and $17 billion in criminal proceeds are laundered in Canada each year.

Bill C-22 was first introduced in May 1999 as Bill C-81 which died on the order paper when parliament prorogued. It was one of the many pieces of legislation that were victims of partisan proceedings and manoeuvres by the government. Currently Canada has money laundering legislation, the Proceeds of Crime (Money Laundering) Act which was passed in 1991 as a Progressive Conservative initiative.

As a backward glance, the G-7 Financial Action Task Force established in 1989 drafted 40 recommendations aimed at enhancing and co-ordinating the international effort against money laundering.

According to that task force, the major weakness of Canada's current legislation which was passed in 1991 is the inability to effectively and efficiently respond to requests for assistance in relation to restraint and forfeiture. The use of domestic money laundering proceedings to seize, restrain and forfeit the proceeds of offences committed in other countries is recognized as sometimes ineffective. Legislation to allow Canada to enforce its responsibilities in foreign forfeiture requests is needed.

The task force also recommended that mandatory reporting requirements be legislated. Currently the reporting transactions in Canada are voluntary. A financial intelligence unit should be established to deal with the collection, management, analysis and dissemination of suspicious reports and other relevant intelligence data.

Many of these recommendations are embodied in Bill C-22 which proposes to bolster Canada's anti-money laundering efforts by requiring mandatory reporting by financial agencies of information relating to certain types of transactions. This information would then be sent to a central data gathering and analysis body, the financial transactions reporting and analysis centre of Canada. This would be an independent government body which would be separate from the RCMP but presumably would work closely with all law enforcement agencies.

The disclosure of information by the centre would then be strictly controlled. The centre would be authorized to provide key identifying information of suspicious transactions, for example, the name, date, account number and value of transaction, to the appropriate police force as it has the reasonable grounds to suspect that the information would be relevant to investigate and prosecute if money laundering offences have occurred.

This is also subject to restrictions set out in other legislation, for example the Privacy Act and the Access to Information Act. This same information may be provided to Revenue Canada, the Canadian Security Intelligence Service, Citizenship and Immigration Canada or other relevant agencies. It would also be relevant, for example, to tax evasion offences or threats to national security. For the police to have access to additional information from the centre, they would first have to obtain a court order for disclosure and meet with the standard of reasonable and probable grounds that applies to all offences.

This mandatory reporting is a step certainly in the right direction. The new law would require individuals or entities importing, exporting or transporting currency or monetary instruments in excess of $10,000 across the border to report all activities to Canada Customs. Failure to do so would result in the seizure of the cash or monetary instruments being transported.

The bill does not however define what is and what is not a suspicious transaction, nor has the government yet published its draft regulations. These will certainly flesh out the substance of the bill.

The current system of voluntary reporting of suspicious transactions would be replaced with mandatory procedures. Reporting requirements would apply to regulated financial institutions, casinos, currency exchange businesses, as well as any individuals acting as financial intermediaries, such as lawyers or accountants. These individuals would therefore be required to file reports for certain categories of financial transactions, as well as any transaction where there is reasonable grounds to suspect that the transaction is related to the commission of a money laundering offence. Making ill-gotten gains essentially appear legitimate is what is at the root cause of money laundering and it is an attempt to wash or cleanse this dirty money.

There has been great concern in legal circles over the issue of solicitor-client privilege and confidentiality. Lawyers and accountants acting as intermediaries would have to report suspicious financial transactions carried out by their clients or face stiff fines and possible prison sentences. The Criminal Lawyers' Association in particular said that this kind of reporting violates guarantees of reasonable search and seizure under the Canadian Charter of Rights and Freedoms. Alan Gold of that association states that the bill ignores these concerns.

Certainly ethical considerations already apply for all lawyers and accountants. I would suggest that the reasonable person test would be applied and that there is a greater good at issue here. That greater good is to ensure that we do everything we can to dissuade individuals who would be trying to embark on this type of criminal activity so that we can eradicate it. Certainly there can be a common ground and a middle ground that would satisfy the constitutional requirements of freedom of expression and freedom from unreasonable search.

Penalties for failing to report suspicious transactions are quite heavy. They can be up to $2 million and imprisonment for five years. This certainly expresses the seriousness and the punitive sanctions reflect this.

The Americans have already moved in this direction with their own tough new law on money laundering. They are very concerned about Canada's approach to crime prevention, particularly since the government changed in 1993. There must be some attempt to at least have a degree of co-operation and parity with the steps the United States has taken.

The Liberal government has given the Americans much evidence to validate their concerns. In December 1999 a U.S. customs officer discovered an Algerian Canadian with Algerian terrorist connections attempting to enter the United States through Seattle with a carload of explosives. In February 2000 the American government suspended firearms and ammunition sales to Canada, which was done at the request of our government. Legal import licences were being used to import large quantities of handguns, rifles and ammunition. The firearms were then being smuggled into other countries and often back into the United States.

It is an embarrassment for our country. We cannot have the reputation of being soft on crime. It is another blow to the relationship that we have, in particular with respect to the open border relationship with the United States.

Since 1993 the Liberal government has talked about increasing penalties for money laundering as a matter of increasing public safety. Yet the RCMP still very much lacks a proper budget to deal with today's sophisticated criminal. For example, the budget this year saw $810 million spread over three years, much of it being earmarked to fight organized crime, including activities such as money laundering.

Let us put this into perspective. Some 62% of this new money will not be available until 2001-02. This will be added to the RCMP base budget of approximately $2.1 million. We suggest this is still not enough.

Mounties already have to curtail their undercover operations which target organized crime, along with a reduction in training. The inability to conduct proper fraud investigations in British Columbia has been highlighted, as has the important issue of inadequate resources.

To correct these problems the Progressive Conservative Party is proposing that over 5,000 RCMP officers are needed. As well, there is a lack of staff at forensic laboratories needed to analyze DNA data and other data that has to be placed on the CPIC system. The police forces need to know that this quickly advancing technology will be incorporated into their services, yet the government will not commit enough money to even upgrade the new CPIC system. It gave $115 million when it was clearly indicated by the RCMP that $283 million was needed to bring it up to snuff.

The British Columbia mounties may shift away from organized crime to deal with more pressing needs such as filling police vacancies and simply paying their officers to show up for work.

In rural areas this is of extreme concern. There is a problem with RCMP detachments being closed, or losing municipal police forces in small communities. Granby, in the riding of Shefford, is facing this threat. At the same time, we know that biker gangs are terrorizing farmers, forcing them to grow marijuana in their fields, and even threatening members of the House of Commons.

This is part of a larger problem. The financial transactions and reports analysis centre is certainly a welcome relief to one aspect of the ongoing struggle that the RCMP faces in trying to protect Canadians, but the RCMP is being stretched to the limit.

We must guard against the beginning of a rivalry between agencies, such as we have seen taking place between the RCMP and CSIS. The breakdown in communications and not sharing information is certainly counterproductive.

The Department of Finance has set an approximate cost for the centre at $10 million per annum to staff and operate. I suggest this is a small price to pay for public safety, especially when compared with the over $300 million that the Liberal government has already spent on a very inefficient, ineffective and discriminatory gun regulation scheme, which is certainly not a priority when faced with the ongoing problems of simply staffing RCMP detachments.

In August 1999 the solicitor general told a meeting of police chiefs that this bill was a top priority for the federal government. However, we saw that this bill languished on the order paper for some time and it has taken a full seven months for it to be presented to the House for debate.

Reaction from various organizations concerned and affected by the legislation has been positive thus far. The RCMP calls it long overdue. Superintendent Ben Soave, head of the RCMP's combined forces and special enforcement unit, said that this legislation will make a significant difference.

Gene McLean, director of security for the Canadian Bankers Association, has also referred to this legislation as having been long awaited by the banking industry. Organized criminals will be less likely to consider bringing their money to Canada as a result.

Even as we debate this legislation today, criminals are finding more and more sophisticated ways to launder money in this country. There are many concerns that the Conservative Party of Canada has. Although we support Bill C-22, there are examples by which the legislation could be improved.

Smurfing, which is the practice of breaking down transactions into smaller amounts so that they will not be reported, is still a way that money launderers have to undermine and come in behind this legislation.

There are all kinds of new tricks, including dummy corporations or avoiding banks by using money transmitters such as Western Union and storefront businesses that cash cheques, sell money orders or travellers cheques and then exchange them for foreign currency.

The Progressive Conservative Party of Canada believes very strongly that it is time for the government to do more and to be more proactive in fighting organized crime. Instead of simply being reactive and following the lead of other countries, it is time for Canada once again to be a pioneer, to step forward and to set an example.

Why is Canada the last G-7 country in the world to implement money laundering legislation? Surely the Minister of Finance, while attending meetings around the world, must have been embarrassed that we are the last G-7 country to implement such anti-money laundering legislation.

Enforcement issues and the burden of investigation continue to be top priorities. Draft regulations are not set out in terms of the precise information which will be required with respect to disclosure.

There are all kinds of other ways to improve this legislation. What about the exemption for retailers? The bill aims at detecting large cash transactions as an indication of suspicious activity. Why are retailers not required to report purchases made with large amounts of cash?

Money laundering frequently takes place in the form of big ticket purchases, for example, real estate, boats, cars, jewellery, et cetera. Disclosure issues as well will have to be addressed and the centre is only authorized to share information with police forces, Canadian Customs, revenue agencies, CSIS and Citizenship and Immigration. There may be others with whom this information will need to be shared.

While we certainly acknowledge that this is a step in the right direction, we are going to have to try to improve this legislation at the committee, and we will endeavour to do so.

Mr. Scott Brison (Kings—Hants, PC):

Mr. Speaker, I thank my colleague for his worthwhile intervention this morning on Bill C-22.

My question for him is, does the legislation and this new agency, and in fact does the government have plans to investigate some of the more advanced types of money laundering? I am speaking specifically of e-laundering, the ability to transmit large amounts of money via technology, the Internet in this case. These transactions are almost impossible to track today, and with sophisticated financial instruments such as derivatives it will become increasingly difficult for governments or regulatory agencies to oversee this type of thing.

I would be concerned if the government did not have a strategy to address this in the future because, clearly, with the increased sophistication of organized crime in this area, this will be a problem; not just for tomorrow, it is probably already a problem today.

I hope this legislation does not simply address yesterday's problem because of the hesitancy of the government to address the issue earlier. I hope that we are well on the way to addressing today's and tomorrow's problem, that is, electronic commerce being used as a vehicle to launder money.

Mr. Peter MacKay

Mr. Speaker, I want to thank my colleague from Kings—Hants. I know he is greatly concerned with this issue. Coming from Nova Scotia, which is bounded by a large body of water, we often face a great deal of importation, not only of money, obviously, but potentially drugs and other contraband material.

The question was very probing. The legislation itself is not crafted in such a way to address the specific question with respect to e-commerce.

The hon. member quite rightly points out that this is very much the wave of the future with respect to financial transactions and potential criminal activity on the Internet.
The new centre which is being set up, because it will be in its infancy, will be very early on faced with the task of trying to craft a response, a way to police the Internet in an attempt to prevent this.

I would suggest that establishing the centre is a step in the right direction. Having personnel will be the crucial response to the hon. member's question, ensuring that we have individuals who are trained, intelligent and up to speed on the latest technological advances. Hopefully the centre, with shared resources and with the ability to hear from agencies such as those in the United States, will be able to address this serious problem in the future.

Mr. Lynn Myers (Waterloo—Wellington, Lib.)

Mr. Speaker, I have a long history in this kind of issue. I sat for 10 years on the Waterloo Regional Police Commission. As chairman, I can tell members that this was an area of primary concern.

We went across Canada and, in fact, went to international conferences where we looked at these issues because they were very, very important, not only to Canada, but to nations around the world.

I was quite heartened by the fact that the hon. member opposite deemed it appropriate to make his comments. I know that he has a very strong interest in this area. I congratulate him for some of the recognition that he gave to the government with respect to the kind of initiative we are taking.

This initiative will require not only physical resources but human resources to accomplish the desired result. I applaud the government and members on this side of the House for the kind of measures we are taking. It is always a question of whether we should go further or faster, more money, and those kinds of issues. It is often a question of priorities. However, I think at the end of the day Canadians will applaud what the government is doing in this very important area.

In light of the globalization that is taking place and in light of the interconnectedness of the world, does the hon. member see that this is a problem which will escalate over time? I am sure he will say yes. I would like to know his views with respect to how best to try to curtail this very severe problem in a globalized world. After all, it is a very severe problem. People, no matter where they live in the world, find themselves caught in the trap with these kinds of criminal activities.

When I was chairman of the Waterloo Region Police Commission, with 700 police officers and civilians, we went to great lengths to look at this issue. We had symposia and went to places across Canada and internationally to see what could be done. I would be very interested in his views because of his background and his very strong interest in this area.

Mr. Peter MacKay:

Mr. Speaker, I thank the hon. member opposite for his question and his intervention. I certainly acknowledge his similar interest in matters of justice and policing around the country. As a former police officer I am sure he appreciates the incredible pressures that frontline police officers and those who specialize in areas such as organized crime are faced with on a daily basis.

I also want to acknowledge his commentary with respect to the usefulness of the bill. We in the Progressive Conservative Party applaud this government initiative. In fact, it is a continuation of a bill that we put in place when we were in government in 1991. I do not want to get into a partisan rant, but we have seen similar instances where the current government was not so complimentary of the Progressive Conservative government of the day and absolutely castigated the government for things such as free trade and the GST, but then, similarly, when in office, enhanced, expanded, embraced and took credit for bills and legislation put in place by the Progressive Conservative government. We will not follow that path. We will acknowledge that the Liberal government has done the right thing by continuing to move in the right direction, which was started by a Progressive Conservative government.

To address his specific question, this legislation and the setting up of this centre will very much put in place a process that will allow us to embark on the further information sharing that the hon. member referred to, the ability to see what other countries are doing, in particular the United States, and to draw on the best minds, the best personnel and the best intelligence that is available to see that we address this very serious global problem to which he referred quite correctly.

That and recruiting individuals from the country, keeping our very best and brightest here, and offering them opportunities in this area is another suggestion that I have as to how we can continue to fight this problem and enhance our ability to guard against this type of criminal activity that is becoming very much a global problem.

I would suggest, and he alluded to it in his question, that it has a great deal to do with the personnel and the intellectual property that we have to preserve and enhance in the country in our attempt to address what is a wonderful opportunity when it comes to technology and the Internet and the use of global communication, but it is also something that can leave us very vulnerable if we are not prepared to put in place the safeguards.

The centre can be a centre of excellence. It can be a great opportunity for those trained in this capacity, and hopefully we will, and I have every confidence that we will, continue to produce very bright, intelligent people who will be able to help us in this task.

Mr. Roy Bailey (Souris—Moose Mountain, Canadian Alliance):

Mr. Speaker, I want to congratulate the hon. member for the message that he gave us this morning. It is a given that in order to attack the problems in organized crime or any crime we need the manpower.

Speaking from a personal basis, in my constituency I believe I have more ports of entry than any other constituency in Canada. Every detachment along the border with Montana in the United States has been cut in half. When I attended a banquet of a rural municipality government, the sergeant in control of that area reported that because of cutbacks they were not able to investigate all reported crimes.

Knowing that the staff is not available, people are failing to report crimes such as break and enter. The statistics show that the crime rate is going down, simply because they are not being reported. I would like the member to comment.

Mr. Peter MacKay:

Mr. Speaker, I could not agree more with the hon. member. He has made a very useful and very straightforward commentary on the task before our law enforcement agents, not only police and RCMP but very much with respect to our ports and our border police.

This country, if I can make the analogy, is like a big, beautiful racehorse and these criminals are like horseflies buzzing around it. We are very much in danger of the parasites taking over the host if we do not allow our police agents the ability and give them the necessary resources to do something about it.

We must be prepared to take the necessary steps, put the money into resources, and when we are made aware of situations like the Sidewinder file outside the country we better be ready to lay the money down and give police the backup they need.

Mr. Jim Abbott (Kootenay—Columbia, Canadian Alliance):

Mr. Speaker, we are debating today Bill C-22, an act to facilitate combatting the laundering of proceeds of crime, to establish the financial transactions and report analysis centre of Canada and to amend and repeal certain acts in consequence.

On December 3, 1998, the solicitor general said that early in the new year of 1999 the government would introduce legislation to curb money laundering. It did not happen in early 1999. In fact it happened in May 1999, but due to the agenda of the government the legislation ended up dying on the order paper. This vital legislation, which was supposed to have been introduced according to the words of the solicitor general in early 1999, was finally reintroduced for passage by the House on December 15, 1999, not exactly early 1999.

Yesterday the solicitor general came to the standing committee on justice and told us that when he had last appeared before the committee he said they would do it and now they have done it. Yesterday was the first day, one full year after he had been there in the first place, that he could sit there and boast about the fact that they had done it. What is involved? It strikes me that if the Liberals were given a hamburger franchise they would do away with the term fast food. I do not understand.

Let us take a look at an article from the Globe and Mail of April 4. It is important that the government get on with it. The article reads:

"The effect of organized crime can be traced in the smallest, most remote communities and in areas as diverse as insurance premiums and ice cream retailing", law enforcement officers told a conference that ended yesterday in Montreal. "For the first time, organized crime, serious criminal organizations, are actually threatening the democratic institutions of this country and the values that we hold dear. It is a real threat to the way of life we have in this country. It is that serious".

That was a quote by an RCMP deputy commissioner. The article continues:

—said former Crown prosecutor Louis Dionne, now head of the organized crime directorate for the Surete du Quebec, "You can't see it. You can't smell it. But if you have the misfortune of putting your wet fingers in the socket, it'll hurt you".

That is where we are. I have actually been questioned by reporters on its significance, on what money laundering is all about. Although Canada is a member of the Paris based international task force against money laundering, it does not get good grades from world experts on this problem. They also say that it would be a good idea, perhaps, to set up money laundering in Canada because the charges are less and the risks are lower.

Why has the government delayed and delayed the introduction of the bill? We will be supporting the bill, but the point is that we would have supported similar legislation if it had been brought in, in a timely manner, two years ago. The bill will leave the House after second reading, go through the committee process, come back to the House, go through report and third reading stages, and then to the other place for senators to do their thing. Why has there been this delay on legislation which I dare say all members of the House would support?

There are members of the House of Commons who are threatened by organized crime directly and personally. They and their families are directly and personally threatened by organized crime. How close can we get to the bone when even members of the House are threatened? I say shame on government members for taking so long to bring in the legislation.

Bill C-22 received first reading in the House of Commons on the December 15, 1999. The purpose of the bill is to remedy the shortcomings in Canada's anti-money laundering legislation as defined in the G-7's financial action task force on money laundering in its 1997-98 report which said:

The only major weakness is the inability to effectively and efficiently respond to requests for assistance in relation to restraint and forfeiture. The use of domestic money laundering proceedings to seize, restrain, and forfeit the proceeds of offences committed in other countries is recognized as sometimes ineffective, and legislation to allow Canada to enforce foreign forfeiture requests directly should be introduced.

In addition, the FATF recommended that reporting requirements in Canada be made mandatory rather than voluntary, as is currently the case, and that a financial intelligence unit be established to deal with the collection, management, analysis and dissemination of suspicious transaction reports and other relevant intelligence data.

Organized criminals, particularly in the drug trade, generate and launder billions of dollars annually. They launder money in order to continue their illegal operations. They move to jurisdictions with strong controls to jurisdictions with weak or no controls, and I have just unfortunately described where the government has allowed Canada to fall. Financial transactions conceal criminal profits to make them appear legitimate.

Yesterday my colleague from Surrey Central gave some examples of the criminal use of money laundering, but it is more than just the criminal use of money laundering. There is also the whole issue of terrorist organizations being involved.

On January 5, 1999, a television report reported on criminal organizations that want to launder money through Canadian business. A multinational company trading in the stock market was found to have ties to the Russian mob. While investigating the company, YBM Magnex, this market investigator traced the company's corporate history back to one of the world's top criminals and head of the eastern European Mafia. The company, now delisted, had stocks valued at $600 million and its principal business was laundering money for organized crime.

The story went on to say there are an estimated $400 billion in profits from the sale of state assets that are now looking to be laundered. It is more than just ordinary criminal activity that we associate with drugs. Now we are talking about the use of money laundering to move state assets from Russia.

As one investigator puts it, Canada and the U.S. are like candy stores for criminals. The unanswered question is how many investors were hurt with the evaporation of the $600 million equity in YBM Magnex.

We have just seen in the last couple of days billions of dollars removed from the stock exchange. Probably hundreds of thousands of retail investors in Canada have been seriously hurt with their speculation in the stock market, but this was a situation where $600 million evaporated in value from the stock market. What about those investors?

Even the former premier of the province of Ontario and very high profile Canadians in the public eye were sucked into the YBM Magnex vortex. The Ontario Stock Exchange and Securities Commission got a deserved black eye for not adequately protecting investors. This followed on the heels of the $6 billion Bre-X debacle. It is little wonder Canada has a less than stellar reputation in the global investment market.

Capital investment is what builds an economy. It is well past time for the federal government to take its responsibilities more seriously and to do things in a more timely manner.

As I mentioned, the member for Surrey Central yesterday gave some good examples of how money is laundered, but what about the issue I have raised of terrorism? According to an RCMP report, Toronto and Montreal groups support the Tamils and Hamas. According to the Ottawa Citizen of Monday, March 27, 2000:

Violent street gangs in Toronto and Montreal are channelling criminal profits to Tamil terrorists waging a bloody fight for an independent homeland in Sri Lanka, says an RCMP intelligence report. An extensive probe by the Mounties found “strong connections” between the outlaw gangs and the Liberation Tigers of Tamil Eelam, one of the world's most dangerous guerrilla groups. “There is clear evidence to support the relationship and that the money involved is being funnelled to the LTTE for extremist purposes in Sri Lanka,” says the newly declassified report, obtained through the Access to Information Act. The RCMP implicate the Tamil criminal groups in a staggering variety of activities, including extortion, home invasion, attempted murder, theft, importation and sale of brown heroin, arms trafficking, production and sale of counterfeit passports, migrant smuggling, bank and casino fraud, and money laundering. The activity is escalating and likely will become more difficult for police, adds the report.

This is an exceptionally serious issue. I say one last time, shame on the government for the unnecessary delay in bringing the legislation to the House.

Some concerns have been raised about the legislation. Criminal defence lawyers and the federal privacy commissioner warned the reporting scheme could turn Canada into a nation of snitches. The Canadian Security Intelligence Service said the transaction reporting regime could become “a bureaucratic monster”. CSIS proposed more selective measures that would target parties known to engage in dubious activities. A writer in the Financial Post , Terence Corcoran, indicated:

If passed, Bill C-22 would give Ottawa fresh authority to trap the innocent, infringe on privacy, collect mountains of information on citizens and put routine money transactions under suspicion. It would also conscript lawyers, banks, accountants and others into a national subculture of informants and snitches.

In a letter to the justice minister last December, the Canadian Bar Association listed some of the threats posed by Ottawa's plan to increase its surveillance over money transactions greater than $10,000. It said routine legitimate business transactions could be disrupted and solicitor-client relationships undermined. “The mandatory reporting of information which may be confidential is a drastic measure and a gross intrusion into a previously protected sphere”. The bill, it said, amounted to “restructuring the relationship of trust between lawyers and clients”.

There are protections under criminal law. I have read that:

At common law, securing a conviction for money laundering requires the Crown to prove four elements of the offence beyond a reasonable doubt. Specifically, it must be proven that the accused (i) dealt with the laundered property (ii) with intent to convert or conceal it. Moreover, the property must have been (iii) derived from the commission of a predicate offence, and (iv) the accused must have had knowledge of that fact. As a result of legislative enactments, however, the Crown is now required to prove only the accused's subjective belief that the proceeds were derived from the commission of the predicate offence, even if this is not the case. This allows the police to arrange “sting” operations.

This is another tool in the ability of the police to be able to go after that.

In addition, all the money laundering offences include a companion offence relating to possession of proceeds, which may result in a conviction even where the Crown is unable to prove the laundering offence. The “possession of proceeds of crime” provision is broader in the Criminal Code than in other statutes; it applies to the possession of proceeds of any indictable offence, not only to predicate offences. While these are not money-laundering provisions themselves, they have proven useful to police in securing convictions in the absence of sufficient evidence to secure a conviction for a laundering offence.

I suggest that this is exactly the fine tuning the committee will have to get into.

There will always be exceptions in criminal law, but on balance the criminal law, as it is presently constituted, works as far as it has gone. Late though the government may be, it is now adding another tool to the tool kit so the police will be able to enact enforcement. This gives us an idea of the balance between entrapment of the innocent and effective tools of law to help our enforcement agencies do their job.

In another article from the Montreal Gazette on December 4 1999, Tom Naylor, an economics professor at McGill University in Montreal, wrote:

Yet money laundering is a contrived offence that has no business in the Criminal Code. And perfectly satisfactory instruments for stripping criminals of their ill-gotten gains already exist.

That is not the point. The point is not to strip the criminals of their ill-gotten gains. It is a byproduct of this and other legislation. The point is to interdict the flow of ill-gotten gains and determine its source. By determining its source, the police can then proceed with proper criminal investigations and proper criminal prosecutions against people who are involved in these illegal activities, which are not only dangerous to our families and our society in the broader context but perhaps even dangerous to the very sovereignty of our nation as we understand it.

Therefore, inflammatory comments about the effect of this legislation are not helpful in this dialogue. Sincere concerns about ensuring that our individual rights and freedoms are protected and sincere concerns about drawing out what the trade-off will be are valuable contributions to this. However, with every law there is a degree of trade-off for the person who is involved in the illegal activity against the freedoms that we as law-abiding citizens have a right to enjoy in our society.

Let us deal with the funding issues of this legislation. Previous attempts to curb money laundering have been hampered at every step by budget problems. Curbing money laundering is a very effective weapon against the drug trade and frontline RCMP officers risk their lives every day in the fight against organized crime. I am not only thinking of frontline RCMP officers who risk their lives, but I am also thinking of the people who co-operate with the RCMP and funnel information to them. Those people also put their lives on the line. We have read and are aware of many situations where people have put their lives on the line and then, due to lack of adequate legislation, the perpetrators of the offence have been able to either walk away or get off with a reduced charge.

The benefits of crime control far outweigh the cost of implementing the programs to curb money laundering. We must ensure resources are available to get the job done.

I have been advised that a separate agency is required to create protection for our freedoms. With the agency standing alone and enforcement regimes like the police and CSIS having to substantiate further requests through courts of law, it is expected there will be sufficient protection for law-abiding citizens. Again, this is something that all members of parliament will be examining very closely when the legislation is before a committee.

We have to make sure that we have proper laws for Canada so that we are not a haven for the proceeds of crime. However, at the end of the day, what we also have to be very clear about is that when we give these tools to the enforcement officers in our community, we also have to be sure that there are proper safeguards built in so that law-abiding citizens are not drawn in.

I will reflect back for a second on the YBM Magnex International Inc. example. We also need this legislation to ensure that law-abiding citizens are not also drawn into the vortex of the money laundering that is currently going on within the boundaries of our sovereign nation.

We will be supporting this legislation but not blindly. We will be ensuring that the rights of all Canadians are protected as this comes back to this legislature.

Mr. Lynn Myers (Waterloo—Wellington, Lib.):

Mr. Speaker, I was somewhat heartened to hear the member opposite talk in terms of the benefits of the bill. Of course, we on the government side take these kinds of issues very seriously, as well we should, because Canadians, no matter where they live in our great country, take it seriously.

As we have done historically and specifically with regard to this bill, we have proceeded in a timely fashion, unlike the member opposite who thinks we should have taken more time. We have taken the required time to review the circumstances and talk with partners around the world, not only in terms of policing agencies but to get the kind of bilateral and multilateral arrangements in place that are part and parcel of the Canadian way of doing business.

I am heartened to hear that some members opposite are indicating that this is a good bill. It certainly underscores the commitment of the Government of Canada to do the kinds of things that are appropriate when it comes to this all important issue of money laundering and the exchanges of cash that take place, et cetera, and in trying to secure our banking and monetary systems in a way consistent with the values of Canadians and the international community.

As we move into more globalization in the future, would the hon. member agree that we should bring in more partners to be a part of this process? Should other countries in the world be assisting in this area?

Could he also outline not only his position but especially the Canadian Alliance's position vis-à-vis this criminal activity? Could he perhaps, in point form fashion, outline his party's position on the steps that would be appropriate to curtail, in a globalized economy, these kinds of things, especially as it relates to bringing in other partners from around the world? I will be interested in his response.

Mr. Jim Abbott:

Mr. Speaker, I appreciate the question from the member. From time to time he has been quite vocal in his criticism of the Canadian Alliance, and I do not take his intervention today as being that. I take it as being a very responsible intervention. I cannot resist the temptation to say, for a change.

I would suggest very gently that his statement that the government takes these issues seriously is a catch-all phrase for the government. I will be answering his question, but I do want to make this statement. My criticism is that the government has not acted in a timely fashion.

The government had a clear understanding in 1997-98, fully two years ago, about what the expectations were of the G-7. I seriously question the member's intervention when he says that the government has acted in a timely fashion taken the time required. How much time is required? The legislation in its basic form, as it presently sits, was brought before the House and due to the legislative calendar set up by the House leader on behalf of the Prime Minister, who is the leader of this government, it ended up falling off the legislative agenda for a full 12 months. I do not think that is taking the issue seriously and I do not think it is working in a timely fashion.

To answer the member's question, I am stating this as the solicitor general critic for Her Majesty's Official Opposition, the Canadian Alliance. I believe that the government, if it is going to do the things necessary in terms of, as he puts it, bringing on more partners and working in co-operation with other international agencies, the government will have to step up with more resources, more resources in legislation and more resources in dollars and cents.

The government has squeezed the heck out of the RCMP to the point where it did not even have wheels to be able to turn to go down the highway. The RCMP has reached a point of rust-out. The RCMP is a very dispirited organization at this point in terms of its manpower because of the constant squeeze on the salaries of the RCMP.

If the government is going to do what is necessary there has to be full global co-operation between the Canadian government, the other governments of the G-7, the OECD and indeed all governments. The government cannot be seen to be what it is presently, which is kind of treating this whole issue almost like a poor orphan son.

The government needs to step up the resources required in order to get the job done. I do note that the government did come forward with some $500 million plus for the RCMP. It is a start but it is late. The point I am trying to make is that the RCMP requires more resources in terms of dollars and cents and CSIS requires more resources in terms of dollars and cents, but they also require a heavier attention by the government to this very important issue because it permeates every part of our society.

The government is on the right track. I prod it once again though because I do not think it is working nearly quickly enough on this and other very important issues that relate to organized crime and terrorism and the sharing of criminal intelligence around the world.

Mr. Michel Bellehumeur (Berthier—Montcalm, BQ):

Mr. Speaker, it is a rare thing for me to agree with the Canadian Alliance, but I agree 100% with the comments by the hon. member on the job the Liberals are doing.

We have always had to force the government to act, whether in connection with crime, with legislative amendments, or other things that had to be done.

Take, for example, the $1,000 bill. A while ago, they announced their intention of taking it out of circulation. The Bloc Quebecois has been calling for this famous $1000 bill to be withdrawn ever since 1994, because this was one of only a few countries with such a high denomination.

We are well aware that these notes were used by organized crime. I realize that the member opposite does not like to hear the truth, that he is running away to avoid hearing it, but the Bloc Quebecois had to introduce private members' bills in this House to convince the government to take the $1,000 notes out of circulation.

The issue of money laundering and the introduction of a measure similar to Bill C-22 were discussed as early as during the Bloc Quebecois' first mandate. The issue was also part of our platform in 1997. Everyone knew that there was a major money laundering problem in Canada. It was only after the Americans ridiculed it that the government opposite finally decided to do something about this problem.

The Liberals had better not tell us that they have been diligent in this area. I fully agree with the Canadian Alliance member about the government's negligence. Since the Liberals took office, and while they were not taking any action, between $80 billion and $100 billion were laundered in the Canadian economy. This is unacceptable.

Mr. Jim Abbott:

Mr. Speaker, of course we are in agreement. It is unusual for the Canadian Alliance to agree with the Bloc on many things. Clearly, when one of the members of the Bloc Quebecois has been threatened by organized crime in his constituency, we must pull together. This brings the importance of this to the attention of the House.

On another up note, as a result of a Bloc Quebecois motion which I believe was supported 100% by the House, a subcommittee has been struck to examine the whole issue of organized crime in Canada. I commend the Bloc Quebecois for that. The subcommittee was struck just two days ago. The committee chair has been named and we will start to work on this issue.

Again, I agree with the Bloc it is unfortunate that the opposition has had to push the Liberal government so hard to get it to do the things necessary to get on with the very important job of protecting Canadian society.

Mr. Michel Bellehumeur (Berthier—Montcalm, BQ):

Mr. Speaker, I am pleased to rise to speak to Bill C-22.

We should make it clear right off that the bill was introduced by the Minister of Finance. It is surprising from its title, because it could have been introduced by the Minister of Justice or even the Solicitor General of Canada. This bill is entitled an act to facilitate combatting the laundering of proceeds of crime, to establish the financial transactions and reports analysis centre of Canada and to amend and repeal certain acts in consequence.

From the contents of the bill, we can see that the Minister of National Revenue is the minister primarily concerned, since the bill concerns a number of matters relating to income.

The fact that this bill could have been introduced by a variety of ministers is not insignificant. It means that Bill C-22 involves of matter of some scope affecting various facets of our society.

Bill C-22 is in fact a tool to help us fight a scourge, whose impact can be felt on the streets, in the schools, in the vaults of our financial institutions and in our penitentiaries. It is even felt by our farmers, as we saw last fall, and in a number of economic, social and even cultural sectors of our community.

This scourge has a name. It is called organized crime. It comprises many aspects: the bikers, the Italian mafia, the Russian mafia, the Asian triads, street gangs and so on. Each aspect operates in its own way and has its own varied and effective methods of intimidation.

Thus, members will understand that organized crime is an evil poisoning our lives in many ways. And it is precisely because it is organized that this type of crime is so hard to fight.

There is only one way this can be done: we must get organized ourselves. This means that, like crime, justice must be organized. We must also provide adequate funding—I am happy to hear members of other parties in the House say so—to the police to help it organize its efforts. Stiff measures are needed and they must be organized. In a nutshell, it would be better if we started calling the shots or others will keep calling them for us.

But all this is not easy—far from it. Organized crime is not just the occupation of a few influential masterminds. It is no longer the playground of people like Al Capone and the mobsters of the early 1900s.

Organized crime involves many kinds of individuals, some of whom may often bear a strong resemblance to you or me. Most of them are anonymous members of the public who appear to lead their lives in an entirely above-board and ordinary manner. All the players in organized crime do not bear some easily identifiable mark. On the contrary, the people involved in organized crime are often anonymous.

Obviously, there is a more visible type of crime that often makes the news and appears in the headlines. There was the biker war that was splashed all over the media a while back, and which makes a return appearance from time to time. But the whole biker war phenomenon is only the tip of the iceberg.

Members will therefore understand that the phenomenon we are now seeing is extremely complex. It was time that the government suggested some effective responses to one of the most harmful aspects of organized crime, money laundering.

On more than one occasion, the Bloc Quebecois has been critical of the failure of Canadian legislation to prevent money laundering. Even so, the government waited until Canada found itself in the unenviable position of money laundering centre of the world before it decided to take action. It was high time that Canada did something because it has become, in the opinion of many international experts, a real sieve.

What exactly is “money laundering”? It is the process by which revenue from criminal activities is converted into assets that are difficult to trace to their criminal origins. What is involved here is the concealment of the proceeds of crime by making them appear legitimate. The bulk of these assets are related to drug trafficking, and most of the rest to criminal activities such as robbery or cigarette smuggling.

Since, by their very nature, money laundering and the criminal activities it attempts to camouflage are clandestine activities, it is hard to have any clear idea of the scope of money laundering activities. According to experts, however, the annual figure for the laundering of the proceeds of organized crime is about $17 billion.

What weapons did we have, then, against such a huge problem? Far from enough. A brief overview of Canadian legislation would be appropriate here. Hon. members will recall that the federal government passed legislation in 1988 amending the Criminal Code, the Food and Drugs Act, and the Narcotics Act, creating a distinct criminal offence of money laundering and providing for the seizure and forfeiture of the proceeds and property derived from various criminal and drug offences.

Section 462.31(1) of the Criminal Code provides that everyone is guilty of an offence who deals in any way with property or proceeds of property with the intent of concealing or converting them, while knowing or believing that all or part are derived, directly or indirectly, from the commission of either an enterprise crime offence or a designated substance offence.

The Criminal Code includes a list of 35 crimes coming under the definition of enterprise crime offence. We can see that something has been around since 1988, but we have to look at the decisions, the jurisprudence directly concerned with this section to realize it is inadequate, that it is insufficient to effectively fight crime. There is no need to be a great expert in criminal law to recognize this. It is enough to visit the courts to see how easy it is for a defence lawyer to get around these sections.

In 1991, there were other amendments to the Proceeds of Crime (Money Laundering) Act. Legislation was enacted in an extremely important area—financial institutions, real estate brokers, portfolio managers, and so on. It provided that, for any transaction of over $10,000 of a suspicious nature, information was to be taken and kept for five years. However, this was left to the discretion of the institution.

When a client of a financial institution has several million thousand dollars, and his portfolio is managed there, members will understand the reticence of the financial institution to report these sums. There is a problem.

In the last election campaign, the Bloc Quebecois included an approach in its platform to tighten things up, to provide major legislation to fight money laundering. Finally, the government seems to have understood with Bill C-22.

In introducing this bill, the government significantly remedies the situation by establishing three mechanisms to control suspicious transactions. The first is the mechanism of mandatory reporting of suspicious operations, as provided in clauses 5 to 11 of the bill. The second is a mechanism for the reporting of major cross border movements of currency, as provided in clauses 12 to 39. The third is the establishment of the financial transactions and report analysis centre of Canada, as defined in clauses 40 to 72.

Let us examine these mechanisms and the centre. With Bill C-22, the reporting of suspicious operations relating to money laundering, currently voluntary under existing provisions of the law, would become mandatory.

In addition, the obligation to report would extend to non banking financial institutions and certain other companies. Therefore, the reporting requirements would apply to regulated financial institutions, casinos, foreign exchange traders, stock brokers, insurance companies and persons acting as financial intermediaries, such as lawyers and accountants.

These people and institutions would be required to report certain categories of financial transactions and any other transaction regarding which there are reasonable grounds to believe that they are connected with the laundering of money.

Second, when it comes to transborder operations, people who import or export considerable amounts of currency or instruments, such as travellers cheques, will be required to report these sums of money to Canadian customs officers.

If a Canadian travels to the United States and takes $35,000 in travellers cheques for a three day trip or, conversely, if an American comes to Canada with $35,000 in travellers cheques or in cash, we are justified in asking questioning that person if he is only going to be in Canada for two or three days, or even just a few hours.

Failure to comply with this requirement could lead to the seizure of the currency or instruments carried by the individual, unless he gives up the idea of importing or exporting these sums of money. He can decide to go back to his country of origin.

Third, the financial transactions and reports analysis centre of Canada is an independent government agency that will collect and analyse the information provided on financial transactions and transborder movements involving currency.

The centre will also be a central repository for information on money laundering activities. It will analyse and assess the reports submitted and, if necessary, give leads to law enforcement agencies.

As I said earlier, the government opposite should have acted sooner. It should not have waited until Canada had a reputation as a major centre of organized crime before taking action. The government should have been much more proactive. It should have listened to the Bloc Quebecois.

It is odd that Bill C-22 has finally made it to the House a few weeks before a parliamentary committee begins looking at the issue of organized crime. Members will recall that I introduced a motion in the House a while back calling for the creation of a committee to examine this issue and to propose amendments to the legislation, if necessary, or other approaches. The parliamentary committee will study the issue and report to the House on the whole question of organized crime.

A few weeks before they start their deliberations, the government introduces Bill C-22 on money laundering. The government probably did not want to be criticized for having taken no action in this regard, but the usual drill is that every time the government opposite takes action, it is because the Bloc Quebecois has pushed it right to the wall.

It was the Bloc Quebecois that initiated the anti-gang legislation passed just before the last federal election. The Bloc Quebecois had questioned the government, which decided to do something about the problem just before heading into a general election.

It was the Bloc Quebecois that took the initiative with respect to getting the $1,000 bill withdrawn from circulation, and the government listened to us. With respect to Bill C-22 now before us, again it was the Bloc Quebecois, in its first term of office, specifically in its 1997 election platform, which said that the federal parliament should bring in legislation to do something about money laundering.

Finally, the government over there had no other choice, since the Americans have even told it Canada was an all-round champion as far as money laundering is concerned, but to decide to comply with the Bloc Quebecois' demands by introducing the bill we now have before us.

I have already mentioned the $1,000 note. It is extremely important for the government to heed us on this, and withdraw it from circulation as soon as possible. It is used mainly by organized crime, and must therefore be pulled, so that only denominations of $10, $20, $50 and $100 are available. It takes a whole lot fewer $1,000 notes to make $1 million, and is far less unwieldy, than $1 million in $10s, $20s or $50s.

Care must be taken, however, not to see Bill C-22 as a solution to all our problems. We must point out that this bill does give the government considerable regulatory power. Clause 73 of the bill in fact authorizes the Governor in Council, on the recommendation of the Minister, to "make any regulations that the Governor in Council considers necessary for carrying out the purposes and provisions of this Act".

At first glance, the regulatory power assigned to the minister may seem extremely broad, even too broad, one might say. Although such power could eventually bring about changes in the law without the need to amend it, still, a number of important issues, which should be debated by parliamentarians, will be handed over to officials. That is a bit risky.

Here is an example. The government will set, by regulation, the amount requiring reporting. Under subclause 12(2) as well, regulatory conditions will determine whether individuals may be exempt from the requirement of producing such a report.

Knowing that the required report is the backbone of the mechanisms put in place by Bill C-22, we can see that the government is giving itself vast regulatory powers. With its history, I fear that the government is not too eager to tighten the screw, to require reports, which are difficult to prepare, from offenders, and to be too demanding about the reports people or groups are to do. The public may rest assured, however, that we on this side of the House will be very demanding.

I would be derelict in my duties if I did not mention that Bill C-22 raises significant questions about the protection of certain basic rights covered by the charter.

In a free and democratic society, the legislator may limit certain individual rights, as dictated by the larger interests of the community. However, this limitation must not be exercised outside certain rules. Bill C-22 must comply with certain basic procedural rules. In fact, in the case of seizures and searches, great care must be exercised in the drafting of the bill to prevent effective contest before the courts.

Work in committee will ensure us that these standards are met, before the bill is passed. If parliamentarians fail to examine in minute detail the impact of this bill, lawyers who are well paid by organized crime will review it and arrange to have this law declared illegal and unconstitutional. It is up to us to work properly and effectively on this bill.

Mr. Scott Brison (Kings—Hants, PC):

Mr. Speaker, it is with pleasure that I rise to speak to Bill C-22, which will create a new agency to oversee and try to prevent money laundering in Canada, the financial transactions and reports analysis centre of Canada.

Bill C-22 would bring Canada up to date with the standards of our G-7 trading partners. It does not take us beyond the minimum standard, but it takes us up to that standard. It covers professionals, lawyers and chartered accountants, and even stock brokers and investment bankers would have responsibility to report under this legislation. It does not include, as in some other countries, a “know your client” rule, which would go much further in policing money laundering.

The responsibility to report suspicious transactions is described in this legislation, but it is not really spelled out in terms of what would define a suspicious transaction. I have some concerns about that. I would hope that as the legislation progresses we would define in a more comprehensive way what criteria would be required for an agency, an individual or a professional to define a transaction as being suspicious.

It would also expand the reporting by financial agencies of any transactions over $10,000 beyond banks. Currently banks report voluntarily. This would expand to include money marts and casinos. It does not delve into the retail side of commerce, which perhaps should be considered.

I have some concerns about that. Earlier I heard some members refer to the potential of the legislation being expanded at some point to include retail operations, for instance, jewellers or car dealers, where allegedly this type of money laundering exists quite a bit in terms of large sum purchases.

I would caution against expanding the scope too much, thereby creating a regulatory nightmare that would be extremely difficult to administer and could potentially have a negative impact in terms of the abilities of Canada's retailers to actually keep up with the paperwork and other requirements.

The legislation addresses cash transactions but does not address what is really the greater current and future issue of e-commerce or e-laundering.

It is very difficult to track financial transactions today that occur over the Internet or electronic financial transactions, particularly with sophisticated financial vehicles or instruments, for instance, derivatives. It is possible to hide transactions through derivatives and other financial instruments. In fact, cross-border electronic transactions, from a tax perspective, are becoming increasingly difficult to tax.

I would suggest to the government that the legislation is definitely long overdue, but that it addresses a problem which is really yesterday's problem, as opposed to addressing a problem which is clearly a problem of today and the future, that of electronically based money laundering.

The whole issue of smurfing, breaking large transactions into smaller units to get them below the $10,000 threshold which would trigger some level of activity by the new agency, is a real issue. For instance, in terms of deposits, several people could use various bank machines to deposit cash into the same account. Something as simple as a bank machine could play a role in money laundering, simply by breaking down transactions into smaller amounts to bring the transactions below the threshold that would trigger some level of investigation.

I am also concerned about the budget of the agency. I understand that the budget would be anywhere between $7.5 million and $10 million. Some suggestion has been made that there would be about a hundred people doing this.

I would suggest that it may be a very, very difficult job to police this type of activity with that size of budget. It sounds to some as a large budget, but I would suggest it is not really a very large budget at all.

I would also suggest to the government, as this agency and the government investigates ways to police the electronic money laundering side of it, that the government look toward some of the private sector solutions.

What I am speaking of are some of the companies that have developed technologies to deal with these issues—security issues on the Internet, et cetera—which may in fact be outpacing the technological advances capable of being developed by government. I think there will have to be some private-public sector engagement on some of these issues, particularly as we delve into the new world of electronic commerce.

I have some concerns about Bill C-22. The legislation would create a new agency that is at arm's length from the government. That is positive from the perspective of preventing political interference in an investigation, but it is negative from the perspective that this new, all powerful agency could conceivably overstep its boundaries on an investigation of an individual case.

A Canadian citizen being persecuted by this agency on a given case would not have the protection offered by ministerial intervention to potentially defend that citizen. Only if systemic abuse is suspected would the minister be able to intervene. Whenever I see these new agencies, whether it is the new Revenue Canada agency or this new agency to police money laundering, I have some concerns about the lack of direct ministerial accountability and potential intervention on behalf of an individual Canadian who may be treated unfairly by one of these agencies.

Another concern I have is that this new agency would have the power to release information to Revenue Canada in accordance with the act. If reasonable grounds existed for the agency to believe that money laundering had occurred, there would be potential for abuse.

We have to be very clear that if the agency has some reasonable grounds to pursue an individual case of money laundering, that is one thing. However, if the agency does not have enough evidence to pursue a case of money laundering and determines that while the evidence does not exist it may be able to get the person on tax evasion, conceivably the agency could release the information to Revenue Canada. This would help Revenue Canada or the new Revenue Canada agency pursue the individual. Therefore, while there may not be a case against an individual for money laundering, this agency could potentially help the new Revenue Canada agency in pursuing someone on a tax evasion charge.

That is absolutely, fundamentally wrong. The two agencies have to be separate. Unless there are very clear grounds for a case of money laundering, it would be wrong for this agency to work with Revenue Canada on individual cases or to share information. We have to ensure on behalf of Canadian taxpayers that this does not become some souped up Revenue Canada annex or addendum.

If the new agency had reasonable grounds to suspect money laundering, that is one thing. However, if it was simply a case where it did not have enough grounds to pursue someone on that basis and determined that there was some level of evidence for tax evasion, it would be clearly wrong for the sharing of information to exist.

It is still nebulous as to whether or not this agency would have the ability to do spot or random audits on banks, money marts or casinos. I would assume that would be the case but it has to be spelled out. Again, we have to ensure in our pursuit of doing something that is valuable and important, which is policing and reducing the incidents of money laundering, that we do not create some new godzilla agency that would have an immense amount of power to hurt legitimate Canadian enterprise, impede legitimate Canadian transactions, and effectively pursue some of the negative and oppressive activities we have seen from Revenue Canada in the past.

Those are my cautions. We are supporting this legislation with some concerns. We hope as this evolves, the government's policies on some of these issues will become more proactive in terms of addressing the real issues of today and in the future, and in particular embrace the notion of the electronic issues facing Canadians and law enforcement agencies.

Again these border on questions of resources. I have significant concerns with the extent to which the government has starved Canada's law enforcement agencies. It has prevented the RCMP from having the ability to enforce some of Canada's laws. As we expand these types of oversight agencies we have to ensure they are properly funded and that we give them the tools to do the job.

In that regard it may be very important for the government to consider some level of private participation. At least it should dialogue with the private sector on the electronic commerce side to ensure that the government is using the most up to date technologies to address these issues. A lot of these technologies exist in the private sector. The government should be more responsive to those forces and more amenable to work with private sector entities within Canada and elsewhere to develop solutions to these very real problems.

Mr. John Williams (St. Albert, Canadian Alliance):

Mr. Speaker, I appreciate the opportunity to speak to Bill C-22 which deals with money laundering. As my colleagues on this side of the House have pointed out, this has been a long time coming from the government. We are the last of the G-7 countries to get around to doing something about money laundering.

One of the great scourges of our modern society is the illegal movement of products such as drugs. That has an effect on our society. It affects the minds of our young kids. They get themselves bent out of shape by using drugs. It ruins their careers. It ruins their futures, ruins their minds and ruins their potential. It also leads them into crime to generate the cash required to pay for the drugs and to keep the cartels supplied with billions of dollars in profits.

The proceeds of these drugs move through many countries in many ways in order to get into this country. People stand there with their hands out. They know it is illegal and illicit and therefore they are capable of demanding some kind of payment, a form of bribery, for them to turn their eyes in another direction as the drugs pass by. We in the House have talked about crime and how young kids feel the need to commit crimes such as shoplifting and a lot worse than that in many cases, in order to feed and pay for their habit.

I am glad the government is doing something about money laundering. Most of us have no real concept of how big the movement of drugs is and the amount of money, the billions of dollars that are moving around because of it. I understand that the largest cash based industry in British Columbia today is the growth of marijuana. The export of marijuana across the country and to other parts of the world is perhaps one of the largest industries in British Columbia today. That is shocking.

I have met with parliamentarians in other parts of the world. I am thinking of parliamentarians in South America. I recently attended a speech by our ambassador for Colombia who was here in Ottawa telling us about the situation there. We were told of the insurrection, the track that the government is losing control of its own country. In essence there is a civil war going on, not between two factions over who should rule the country, but the drug cartels do not want government anywhere near the growth of the drugs or the plants that produce the drugs. The cartels have their own air forces. They are able to fly the drugs out of South America through the Caribbean and up to the United States and Canada. This is a scourge on our society.

Money laundering is only one part of it. I want to broaden the debate. Money laundering deals with the movement of cash by illicit and illegal means but it is not just drugs we are talking about. We see bribery and corruption in all parts of the world. Believe it or not, Canada is not exempt; it happens here too. There are horrendous problems in South America. A year ago the commissioners of the European Union had to resign because of corruption. Members may have read about it in the paper. In Canada in the Prime Minister's riding, police investigations are going on because of potential misappropriation of government funds. If this is proven to be so, this would also be corruption. It is everywhere.

We read about it in the papers in the United States. Numerous elected officials in senior positions have been bought. I read one article just the other day regarding a governor who insisted on a $400,000 payment before he would vote in a certain way. It goes on. China has acknowledged that corruption is a major problem.

I would hope that we would start to do something about it. Transparency and openness is how to deal with bribery and corruption. It has to be brought out into the open so everybody can see what is going on. If a transaction cannot stand up to the light of day, it is likely illegal. If it is automatically going to be exposed in the light of day, it likely will not happen in the first place.

Look at what has happened with the HRDC scandal. Numerous audits were done and none of them were brought out into the open. On January 20 the last HRDC audit became part of the public debate. What has happened since then? The minister has told us that there has been a major review of all processes that go on in the department to ensure that the administration of the programs will now be done properly. Why were they not done properly before? Because there was no openness, no accountability and no transparency. We were not privy to the fact that previous audits had slammed that department and the administration of the files. It gets sloppy.

People with power and influence start using their influence and now numerous police investigations are going on. If these result in convictions, then that will show there has been corruption right here.

I am glad the world is finally waking up to the fact that bribery and corruption are perhaps the greatest scourge to economic development around the world. People with power and influence skim 10% and 20% right off the top and the money is going straight into Swiss bank accounts. There are also the people at the bottom end of the economic scale who, because they do not get paid enough money, have no choice but to insist on bribes for the work that they do or do not do.

In some cases we have people in positions of influence and power, such as policemen writing tickets or others granting permits, insisting on bribes to feed a large group of people or an extended family that depends on them for support because there is no cash in the economy.

We need economic development. We want to help the poor not only in this country but around the world. We can help the poor by attacking this cancer on society, the scourge of bribery and corruption. The OECD passed a protocol that was endorsed by a number of countries including Canada which says that bribery in a foreign country is no longer a tax deduction but a crime to be prosecuted in the home state. These are small beginnings.

I compare the current attitude on bribery and corruption to the position of society on the environment and human rights back in the 1960s. When we talked about the environment and our concern for the degradation of the environment in those days, people said that it was awful and asked why somebody did not do something about it. Then they would continue their daily routines.

It is 30 years later and the environment is now a core issue not only of this government and this country but of every developed country around the world. It is a core part of policy making. When they make policy the environment is a major consideration.

Human rights is the same. Back in the 1960s when people's human rights were being violated around the world, they would say it was awful and that somebody should do something about it, and they would continue their daily routines. Today we have war crimes tribunals. We have agreements and protocols. We insist on human rights when we enter into other agreements. Human rights is now a core principle of democracy.

I hope in a number of years, and hopefully not too many years from now, that the battle against bribery and corruption will also be at the core of civilized society in order for us to ensure that economic benefits accrue to all in society and that the cream or the profit is not ripped off illegally by those who happen to have power and influence.

It is everywhere. I have heard numerous examples, small and large. I will not bore the House with the details, but I would like to see the government and Canadians recognizing that bribery and corruption can and should be fought at every turn.

Bill C-22 on money laundering is a small start. I hope we will continue on from here and join forces with parliamentarians in other parts of the world to ensure that we carry the momentum forward so that in a number of years from now not only will we say that the environment and human rights are at the core of our policy making but that the fight against bribery and corruption is also at the core of our policy making.

The Deputy Speaker: Is the House ready for the question? The House has heard the terms of the motion. Is it the pleasure of the House to adopt the motion?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

An hon. Member: On division.

The Deputy Speaker: I declare the motion carried. Accordingly, the bill stands referred to the Standing Committee on Finance.

(Motion agreed to, bill read the second time and referred to a committee)

April 11, 2000 [House of Commons Standing Committee on Finance]

The Chair (Mr. Maurizio Bevilacqua (Vaughan—King—Aurora, Lib.)): I'd like to call the meeting to order and welcome everyone here this morning.

Let me, first of all, apologize to the officials for the room. Unfortunately, due to lack of meeting rooms because of the Auditor General's report and lock-ups and what have you, we have to use these close quarters. This is yet another example of where perhaps some renovations should take place in this place. Of course this is a great idea by the Reform Party.

First of all, the order of reference today is Bill C-22, an act to facilitate combating the laundering of proceeds of crime, to establish the Financial Transactions and Reports Analysis Centre of Canada, and to amend and repeal certain acts in consequence. This is the order of reference we received from the House of Commons. This is what we'll be doing today. We will hear from the parliamentary secretary and a member of this committee, Mr. Roy Cullen. Welcome.

Later on other officials will also participate in the question and answer session. As you may know, we usually give 10 to 15 minutes for opening remarks, and thereafter we engage in a question and answer session.

Mr. Cullen, welcome.

Mr. Roy Cullen (Parliamentary Secretary to the Minister of Finance): Thank you very much, Mr. Chairman. Merci beaucoup, monsieur le président.

Let me first introduce the people at this table here, the officials who will be prepared to take questions later. With me are Mr. Horst Intscher, who is the executive director of the transition team, Financial Transactions and Reports Analysis Centre of Canada; Mr. Richard Lalonde, who is the acting chief, financial crimes section, financial sector policy branch; Yvon Carrière, senior counsel; and Charles Seeto, director, financial sector division, financial sector policy branch, and other officials who we can introduce more fully later.

Mr. Chairman, I appreciate the opportunity to speak to the committee today about Bill C-22, the proceeds of crime or money laundering bill. I'll keep my remarks brief so that we can have plenty of time for questions. This bill, Mr. Chairman, updates and strengthens the existing act by the same name that has been in force since 1991. The legislation improves the detection, prevention and deterrence of money laundering here in Canada.

[Translation]

Before going further, I should define the expression "laundering of proceeds of crime". It is a process by which money illegally gained from criminal activities is converted into assets which cannot be easily tracked back to their origins.

[English]

In other words, Mr. Chairman, this is money that is laundered to hide its origin. While open borders encourage competitive international markets and greatly benefit trading nations like Canada, they also have a potential downside in that criminals can use them to infiltrate financial markets for the purposes of money laundering. Today's globalized financial markets make it very easy for criminals to launder millions of dollars every day in illegal profits from drugs and proceeds from other crimes such as burglaries and cigarette smuggling.

It is estimated that between $5 billion and $17 billion are illegally moved in and through Canada every year. Mr. Chairman, this is a serious problem, one that requires that adequate measures be put in place to deter and detect money laundering and ensure that financial intermediaries exercise due diligence in the conduct of their business.

In addition, the reputations of financial intermediaries that are victims of money laundering could be adversely affected.

[Translation]

Here in Canada, we are committed to combat money laundering as efficiently as possible. If traditional investigation methods are no longer as effective as they should be, new measures must be adopted for that purpose.

[English]

Bill C-22 provides these new measures. It does so by responding to calls by Canadian law enforcement agencies for legislation requiring the mandatory reporting of suspicious transactions and cross-border movements of currency. This legislation was designed with the goals of giving law enforcement agencies the tools they need while at the same time protecting individual privacy. Bill C-22 meets both these goals.

Bill C-22 also addresses concerns raised by the Financial Action Task Force on money laundering, a group established by the G-7 in 1989, that Canada was not meeting international standards on mandatory reporting of suspicious transactions and in centralized collection and management of reports. Indeed, Canada is the only country not to require mandatory reporting. With the passage of this legislation, our reporting regime will be in compliance with Financial Action Task Force standards and in line with most industrialized countries around the world.

Before I outline the specifics of the bill, it is important to note that this legislation was not developed in isolation but is the result of extensive consultations with many interested parties, including the provinces and territories, stakeholders from the financial and law enforcement communities, consumer groups, and organizations with an interest in privacy issues.

[Translation]

Mr. Chairman, I would like to take some time to explain the main elements of this bill.

First, Bill C-22 maintains the requirements about record keeping and client's identification already provided by the Laundering of proceeds of crime (money laundering) Act.

[English]

Second, the new measures being introduced include the requirement for financial intermediaries to report where there are reasonable grounds to suspect that there are financial transactions that are related to money laundering. In addition, regulations are being developed that will describe specific transactions, such as the receipt of $10,000 or more in cash, which must be reported. Regulated financial institutions, casinos, money service businesses, and currency exchange businesses, as well as lawyers and accountants, will all be subject to these reporting requirements. Failure to report suspicious transactions can result in jail terms of up to five years or fines of up to $2 million.

Third, large cross-border movements of currency must also be reported. The importation or exportation of large amounts of cash or monetary instruments like traveller's cheques will have to be declared to Canada Customs. Failure to comply may result in the cash being seized. Review and appeal mechanisms will be in place to deal with cross-border seizures and penalties. Seized currency will be returned once a fine has been paid, unless Customs suspects it represents proceeds of crime.

Fourth, this bill establishes the new Financial Transactions and Reports Analysis Centre of Canada.

[Translation]

The Centre, which will be independent from law enforcement agencies, will receive the reports that are required by the law, analyze and assess those reports and disclose to law enforcement agencies from everywhere in Canada information regarding any activities suspected of being related to the laundering of proceeds of crime.

[English]

The centre will be authorized to provide information to the appropriate police force if, on the basis of its analysis, the centre has reasonable grounds to suspect that the information would be relevant to a money-laundering offence. The bill also allows the centre to disclose information to the Canada Customs and Revenue Agency, the Canadian Security Intelligence Service, and Citizenship and Immigration Canada if, in addition to being relevant to money laundering, the information is also relevant to their activities.

As a central point for the collection, analysis, and disclosure of information, the centre will cooperate internationally in the exchange of information with similar agencies, enhancing Canada's role in the global fight against money laundering. Further, the centre will be responsible for monitoring compliance with record keeping, client identification, and financial transaction reporting requirements, and where appropriate, it will seek partnerships—for example, with provincial regulatory bodies—to assist with carrying out this function.

I can assure this committee that the collection, use, and disclosure of information by the centre will be strictly controlled. Only a specified, limited amount of information reported to the centre will be passed to the police and other designated agencies, and only under specified conditions. The information that can be disclosed is limited to key identifying information, such as the name of the client, the account number involved, the amount and location of the transaction, and other similar information. Law enforcement authorities will be required to build a case for prosecution purposes and obtain a court order for disclosure before any further information could be passed on. The centre and its employees will also be immune from subpoena, search warrants, and other compulsory processes, except with respect to money-laundering investigations and prosecutions.

Finally, the Centre will be subject to the Access to Information Act and to the Privacy Act, and legal penalties will be imposed for the unauthorized use or disclosure of personal information held by the Centre.

[English]

Bill C-22 provides regulation-making authority with respect to the coverage of entities, client identification, record keeping, and reporting requirements. Mr. Chairman, such regulation-making authority provides the needed flexibility to respond quickly to the ever-changing nature of money laundering, and to adapt the regime to changes in the way financial intermediaries conduct their business. It also allows greater flexibility to respond to issues raised by stakeholders in complying with the legislation.

Extensive consultations have already begun on proposed regulations, with the release of the Department of Finance's consultation paper last December. Submissions were received and departmental officials have met with many stakeholders to hear their views. Further consultations will be required over the coming months to further refine the current regulatory proposals and to develop additional proposals regarding the form and manner of reporting.

It should be noted, Mr. Chairman, that Bill C-22 provides a statutory minimum 90-day pre-publication requirement for any regulation proposed under the act, and a minimum 30-day notice period if further changes are made to the proposed regulation. This requirement goes well beyond what is provided in many federal statutes, reflecting the importance that the government attaches to public consultations in this particular area.

Mr. Chairman, the benefits of this new reporting system are numerous. The new system will rely on the individuals—for example, financial intermediaries—who are in the best position to detect money laundering as it is occurring. It will also provide more reliable and consistent reporting in a more timely manner.

[Translation]

The reports, being centralized at the new Centre, will provide essential analyses which will allow police forces to follow reliable tracks and to use law enforcement resources more efficiently.

[English]

Successful investigations and prosecutions can ultimately lead to court-ordered forfeiture of the proceeds of criminal activities. This will also allow Canada to better shoulder its international responsibilities and anti-money-laundering efforts by enhancing its ability to cooperate with other countries.

In conclusion, Mr. Chairman, Bill C-22 targets the financial rewards of criminal activity, and protects the integrity of our financial system in Canada. It creates a balanced and effective reporting scheme to uncover criminal activity while protecting individual privacy. It also complements other federal initiatives against organized crime, along with helping Canada to meet its international commitments in this area.

[Translation]

Mr. Chairman, those are the main provisions in bill C-22. Myself and the officials here will now be happy to answer your questions.

Thank you.

[English]

The Chair: Thank you very much, Mr. Cullen.

We'll now proceed to the question and answer session, and we'll begin with Mr. Abbott.

Mr. Jim Abbott (Kootenay—Columbia, Canadian Alliance): Thank you. Could you tell me what the format is, just before we start?

An hon. member: We can have as much time as we want.

The Chair: You have a ten-minute round, so make the questions nice and brief so that we can get as many in as possible.

Mr. Jim Abbott: Okay, thank you.

Mr. Cullen, thank you for your presentation. To the officials and everyone else squeezed into this room, welcome. This is what it must feel like to be in a sardine can, but I'm not really sure.

First, let me just quickly restate what I said in the House. If the Liberals were given a hamburger franchise, I think they'd do away with the concept of fast food. This legislation has been an awfully long time coming, and certainly the Canadian Alliance is in favour of this legislation in principle. There are some questions that I have, though.

In a private briefing that I had with some of the officials, they explained something to me that I would like to get on the record. Whoever feels they can most appropriately respond to this question can do so: Why do we need a separate transaction centre? Why can we not use the existing bureaucracy and perhaps do some fine-tuning within the existing system, rather than adding a new level of bureaucracy and more people? I'd like to get that on the record, please.

Mr. Roy Cullen: Thank you. Maybe I can start and then refer it to perhaps Mr. Lalonde.

The reason for an agency is to ensure and safeguard the privacy provisions of citizens so that there is a vetting of information and so that only high-level information will be submitted to the police if there's a suspicion of money laundering. What we're doing is consistent with all G-7 countries, as I understand it, and it's mostly geared to making sure only serious concerns about alleged money-laundering activities are reported to the police and the privacy of citizens is maintained.

Perhaps Richard or Charles can add to that.

Mr. Richard Lalonde (Chief, Financial Sector Division, Department of Finance): Thank you, Mr. Chairman.

That's right. The need for an independent agency here is underscored. Other countries of the Financial Action Task Force have this particular model. Independence from government bureaucracy and from law enforcement agencies is critical, because this agency will be collecting and analysing sensitive information, personal information, about Canadians' financial transactions. It will need to safeguard the information it does gather, and it needs independent judgment from government to determine whether or not to disclose certain information to law enforcement agencies and other appropriate organizations.

Mr. Jim Abbott: I'm a little concerned with some specific phrasing used there. Would it be at the discretion of the government to release the information? Is that what you said?

Mr. Richard Lalonde: No, quite the contrary. I meant to say it's at the discretion of the agency itself, and that's why it needs this independence to carry out its mandate.

Mr. Jim Abbott: Okay.

Why would a libertarian not be concerned about further intrusion into the affairs of Canadians with this legislation and with this transaction organization?

Mr. Roy Cullen: I suppose, Mr. Abbott, you can't have your cake and eat it too. On the one hand, the creation of a centre is designed to make sure the privacy concerns of Canadians are respected. In designing the legislation and in designing the agency in the consultations to date, we've taken great care and great pains to make sure the privacy of Canadians is respected. I'm sure some individuals, organizations, and stakeholder groups will make representations to this committee that there is a concern about privacy issues, but we feel we've dealt with them in a very comprehensive way.

Richard, would you like to add anything?

Mr. Richard Lalonde: That's fairly comprehensive. A number of safeguards have been set in the legislation to protect the information that is collected from Canadians by this proposed agency, and we can certainly go into more detail about that if you wish.

Mr. Jim Abbott: Should there be any concern on the part of Canadians, either individuals or businesses, about part 4, subclause 73(2) of the legislation? It reads:

A copy of each regulation that the Governor in Council proposes to make under subsection (1) shall be published...
etc. I realize that's fairly standard in this kind of legislation, but I put that up against a letter I think a lot of us received, dated February 8, from H&R Block. The individual here makes a point about the $1,000 record-keeping threshold. He says:

Our principal concern is section IV... which requires that we retain a record for five years or more of every transaction of $1,000 or more.
and so on and so forth.

I haven't had an opportunity to inquire of the writer, Mr. Irving, from H&R Block. I haven't interviewed him at all. But I found this letter kind of confusing when I took time to refer to the legislation, where I don't see anything about $1,000. But then that raises the question: should Canadians and should business be concerned about the fact that this is, with due respect, a form of blank cheque, and an onerous amount of regulations and record keeping might end up being piled onto individuals and businesses in Canada under this open-ended subclause, 73(2)?

Mr. Roy Cullen: To start off, we tried in the legislation to strike the right balance in the number of organizations or sectors included in the reporting requirements. At this point it's limited to financial intermediaries. Once you go beyond that, you can put some compliance costs onto other businesses that may not be necessary.

In the whole process, because we're breaking new turf, we'll be guided by the idea of developing regulations in consultation with stakeholders, and we'll also be guided by the experience as we implement the act and the agency.

Clearly the intent is not to put an excessive burden on businesses, but we feel it will be the responsibility of those who are involved at the front end of receiving cash or receiving that kind of information to report.

With respect to H&R Block, perhaps Richard or Horst would like to comment.

Mr. Richard Lalonde: Sure. H&R Block provided us with comments on the consultation paper on the proposed regulations. My understanding and my recollection is that their concerns were about some of the thresholds being proposed. These thresholds are provided for, or at least the regulation-making authority is provided for, in clause 73 of the bill. We are in ongoing dialogue with stakeholders now to refine those proposals.

It's clear we have no intention of unduly burdening anyone. In fact in advancing the consultation paper, we stated quite clearly that our objective here is to minimize the compliance burden, and we're very sensitive to that. That is why we will be discussing these issues directly with stakeholders over the coming months to get it right.

Mr. Jim Abbott: I have the greatest respect, in all sincerity, for everyone sitting at this table and indeed everyone in this room, and I don't question the intent of any individual in this room. What I'm concerned about is the growing encroachment of bureaucracy and the reporting functions required for business that are absolutely strangling business around Canada.

As I said, the Canadian Alliance supports this legislation in principle. We understand why it is required, and indeed it should have been here a couple of years ago. That being said, we're still very concerned about the fact that although every good intent in the world is going into this thing, it has the potential to become a real paperwork nightmare if it is not very, very tightly regulated.

Mr. Roy Cullen: Mr. Abbott, you're right that we need to be very careful about the reporting requirements we've put in place. Because the act also calls for a 90-day period for gazetting any additions or changes to the regulations, it gives Canadians a lot of time to respond and express their concern if they feel the government is going too far. It's something that has to be monitored very carefully.

Our coming forward now at this time with this legislation means we've taken the time to consult extensively and we want to ensure we have it right. We think we're getting close, but the consultations with this committee and with other stakeholder groups on the regulations will be very beneficial in setting the right course.

The Chair: Thank you, Mr. Abbott.

[Translation]

Mr. Marceau.

Mr. Richard Marceau (Charlesbourg, BQ): First, thank you Mr. Cullen for your presentation. I also want to thank all those who dared to come here with you in this closed room.

Mr. Cullen, I would just like to understand somewhat better the link between FATF and bill C-22. As I understand it, bill C-22 was proposed after some recommendations from FATF, which brings together countries not only from Europe but also from the Gulf and North America.

• 0930

Are we heading towards systems that would be quite similar in all countries of the world by following FATF's recommendations?

Mr. Roy Cullen: I think we must coordinate our efforts with those of other countries. Member countries of G-7 have established that Action group with a view to improve the situation and to coordinate activities aimed at minimizing money laundering in all countries.

[English]

Perhaps the officials could...

The Chairman: Mr. Lalonde.

Mr. Richard Lalonde: Sure. Money laundering is a global problem which, therefore, requires world-wide solutions or combatting measures, hence the need for international cooperation.

FATF was created in 1989 to establish international standards in order to allow member countries to cooperate more efficiently in combatting money laundering.

Bill C-22 of course draws its inspiration from the standards that were established by FATF as well as from FATF's reviews about the situation in Canada.

Mr. Richard Marceau: All right. Therefore, the Centre which is going to be created has its equivalents in other countries in the world; that's what you are telling me. It has or will have equivalents in other countries of the world.

Will the canadian centre be able or have to disclose certain information to other centres throughout the world in order to combat precisely what you call that world-wide problem? I assume that it will.

I am getting at my question. In Canada, we have established certain standards after which such a centre will have to operate. You mentioned the Access to Information Act and the Privacy Act. Now, some countries in the world do not necessarily have such protections. I'm asking you that question, but let me tell you at once that we support that bill. Is there not a danger that some protected information the disclosure of which is forbidden here in Canada could then be diverted, communicated to another country and ultimately reappear somewhere in Canada through another channel? In one word, could we be brought to do through the back door what we are not allowed to do through the front door? Via agreements with other countries, will it be possible for us to avoid the exportation of our protected information and ensure that the safeguards which you have very rightly provided in the bill are not bypassed?

Mr. Roy Cullen: I'm sorry, but I'm going to answer you in English.

[English]

First of all, the kind of information that would be shared would be subject to the same kind of rigour. Only high-level information would be shared, but it would be governed by a protocol with every individual country. It's really only in the area of the police investigation, where there's obviously cooperation through INTERPOL and other agencies, that the law and the standards of subpoena of information, etc., would apply.

In terms of sharing information with other countries, there would be protocols established and the privacy and confidentiality of information would be respected. It would only be at the first blush, at the agency level... the high-level information that would mark the types of activities in a very general sense.

Is that fair enough?

[Translation]

Mr. Richard Lalonde: I would simply add that any exchange of information with other entities similar to our Centre would be governed by protocols as provided in the bill. These would concern not only the exchange of information, but they would also restrict the use of that information by the other country.

Mr. Richard Marceau: In what section can the provisions regarding the protocols be found? Is it section 56?

My question is: Do you think the bill would be improved, if we want to have an additional safeguard, by adding to that section a provision to the effect that any such protocol should by all means respect the Canadian legislation regarding privacy or access to information?

I had a quick look at those three subclauses and I have seen no mention that such agreements must be governed by the same rules or conditions which have been provided in Canada with regards to protections.

The Chairman: Mr. Carrière.

Mr. Yvon Carrière (Counsel, Transition Team, Financial Transactions and Reports Analysis Centre of Canada, Department of Finance): Every country has its own legal system. In the United States, for example, police have direct access to the database which contains information about suspicious transactions. Of course, if we were to impose Canadian standards, just no information could be transmitted from Canada to the United States.

In some other countries, like Belgium, it is for judges to decide what can be made public or not. Again, in the Canadian context, magistrates are not allowed to decide whether information should be disclosed or not. Therefore, I believe that it would be like trying to impose our own standards to completely different judicial systems.

Mr. Richard Marceau: I agree with you. I understand your views, but it brings me back to my first point. You are saying that in the United States—and that frightens me a bit—, any policemen can access that database. If, for example, the House ruled that for a certain transaction, Richard Marceau is suspected of having committed a money laundering offence—and we will come back later on the nature of such suspicion—and if such a protocol had been concluded between Canada and the United States, it seems to me that, given the tremendous number of policemen in the United States, many people could then access information which is extremely personal to me.

So, there is a danger that we be brought to do through the back door what we are not allowed to do through the front door, that is to give access to very personal information, to things that should only be known by very few people. With such a bill, we are already intruding the private life of individuals, and we accept it because the problem we want to combat is serious. On the other hand, if you are telling me that police forces in the United States are also going to be allowed to intrude into our private life, that means a lot of people. There might be more policemen in the United States than there are citizens in many countries.

Mr. Yvon Carrière: I would like to make it clear that the Centre would be entitled to disclose information to another country only where there are reasonable grounds to suspect that such information would be useful for investigation or prosecution purposes regarding offences related to money laundering. So it comes to saying that there is in all cases a basic condition which has to be met: there must be suspicions.

Second, it will apply only to information which is designated or defined in the law, that is the client's name, the amount of the transaction and the site where the operation took place. Even then, protocols might include conditions which would limit the use of such information. Each protocol might have its own proceedings. I am sure that we will show a great deal of discrimination in deciding which countries we are going to conclude agreements with.

Mr. Richard Marceau: I would have some additional questions, Mr. Chairman, though I know that time goes by.

You mentioned which criteria should be used in order to determine what can be considered as reasonable grounds to suspect money laundering. Now, nowhere in the law those criteria are defined. Furthermore, there is no provision in the law concerning the making of regulations which would establish which criteria are going to be applied to determine what constitutes a reasonable ground. It seems to me that the Centre will hold an extensive discretionary power. I believe it should rather fall to the legislative power if not to the governments to define what are the reasonable grounds, rather than to an agency which is not accountable to the government. I would like to know your opinion on that.

[English]

Mr. Roy Cullen: Mr. Marceau, don't forget, what we're talking about here is a different... The comparable agencies in other countries, who, only on the basis that there are grounds for suspicion that there is a money-laundering activity being undertaken...

That is defined right now to some extent in the guidelines already being used, and it perhaps will be expanded upon with the regulations that go with this bill.

So only certain high-level information would be shared if there's a suspicion of a money-laundering activity. There will be protocols. Also, these agencies have to work with each other in order to make our mutual efforts more effective. There has to be a certain community of effort here that respects the individual laws and privacy concerns of each individual country. Those would be incorporated into the protocols that are developed.

[Translation]

Mr. Richard Marceau: I was rather talking about the criteria which are going to be used to determine the reasonable grounds to suspect that there is money laundering activity. That is not defined in the bill. Nowhere in the law it is said that it will be incumbent upon the government to define such criteria by virtue of its regulatory power. So I assume that it is left to the discretion of the Centre itself. We are going to give the Centre the discretionary power to decide what are going to be those reasonable grounds. Does it not seem to you somewhat extensive as a power?

[English]

Mr. Horst Intscher (Executive Director, Transition Team, Financial Transactions and Reports Analysis Centre of Canada, Financial Sector Policy Branch, Department of Finance): If I may, I will perhaps offer a bit of explanation. First of all, the initial determination as to a suspicion will be made by the reporting entity when a suspicious transaction is reported. They will judge that, really, in the context of their own business: transactions that are sufficiently out of the ordinary that they cause the reporting entity—for example, a bank or a trust company—to believe that the transaction might be suspicious in regard to money laundering.

In terms of the centre making its determination, it will to some extent depend on the individual case. Again, depending on the information that has been reported by reporting entities and information received from other entities, it will make a judgment to assist reporting entities in making a judgment as to whether or not a transaction is suspicious.

The centre will be issuing guidelines from time to time that describe types of transactions that are specific to the banking industry or specific to credit unions, to casinos, or to other kinds of money service businesses, transactions that have been found to be related to money laundering in other cases or in other jurisdictions. So it is done as a means of helping reporting entities form a view as to whether a particular transaction gives rise to suspicion and should be reported to the centre.

Mr. Roy Cullen: If I could add something to Mr. Marceau's points, right now there are guidelines that are in play on a voluntary basis. These to some extent define or give examples of suspicious transactions and provide some guidelines. One of the challenges, of course, is that in financial intermediaries the activities or the way they go about things are changing all the time, so we need some flexibility. But it's not as though this is a blank page. There are already guidelines and these are going to be modified and expanded with this current bill.

Mr. Stan Cohen (Senior Counsel, Human Rights Law Section, Department of Justice): If I could just add a word on the matter of the meaning to be attributed to the phrase “reasonable suspicion”, there is a Charter of Rights overlay on the whole of this exercise. These grounds that have been identified—“reasonable grounds to suspect”—are grounds that have a meaning within decided case law.

It admittedly is not as high a standard as “reasonable and probable grounds”, but the Supreme Court of Canada has endorsed a meaning that basically requires that in order for a reasonable suspicion to exist there must be—and I'm quoting here—“a constellation of objectively discernible facts which give the detaining officer reasonable cause to suspect that”, in this case, “the detainee is criminally implicated in the activity under investigation”. It goes on to say that importantly, “a hunch based on intuition gained by experience cannot suffice”, no matter how accurate that hunch may prove to be.

So what we're looking for, and what the case law insists upon—and ultimately this might shake down in any litigation ever brought involving this—is something that is based upon objective criteria that will have to be established. They would look to criteria that are developed through regulations, guidelines, etc. So it's not a totally arbitrary standard that has been established here, nor is it a standard that is without any meaning within jurisprudence.

Mr. Roy Cullen: While the agency is quite independent of the minister, if the centre is getting out of line with what he or she views as the best interest of the public, then the minister does have the power under the bill to step in and review it from a policy point of view and to chart a new course.

The Chair: Thank you, Mr. Marceau.

Mr. Nystrom.

Mr. Lorne Nystrom (Regina—Qu'Appelle, NDP): Thank you very much, Mr. Chair.

I'd like to welcome everybody here this morning.

As we said in the House, the New Democratic Party is in support of the legislation. This brings us up to par with other countries around the world in the OECD.

I want to ask a couple of questions along the same lines as those of my colleagues here. First, perhaps you could give us a bit more information as to how suspicious transactions would be defined in regulations. These are very tough questions. I don't expect you to have the precise answer for that, but perhaps you could give a bit more information as to how this definition will be made in terms of regulations. It's not of course part of the bill, but it will be part of the law. If you could shed a bit more information on that, it might be helpful.

Mr. Richard Lalonde: As we indicated a little earlier, there is no definition in the legislation of what constitutes a suspicious transaction.

Of course, the legislation does provide for two kinds of reporting of financial transactions. One is the reporting of prescribed transactions, and it can be those above a certain threshold or certain kinds of very objective transactions. The second kind is the reporting of suspicious transactions. As we've indicated, the approach taken by many other jurisdictions, including the United Kingdom, is simply to provide guidance through guidelines to financial intermediaries on things they should consider in coming to a determination of what is or is not suspicious, and that is the approach we intend to take.

Mr. Roy Cullen: Mr. Nystrom, I have a list here of maybe 12 examples of suspicious transactions under the guidelines that are currently in use, examples where cash is involved or bank or trust company accounts are involved, unusual large cash deposits made by an individual company that would normally not generate that kind of cash, customers whose deposits contain counterfeit notes or forged instruments, etc. There are about a dozen of those, which we could go over if you'd like. They will evolve and change as money launderers and financial intermediaries become more creative and more inventive.

Mr. Lorne Nystrom: I assume the guidelines will be similar to those of the other OECD countries.

Mr. Roy Cullen: Yes.

Mr. Lorne Nystrom: In terms of privacy, this bill would permit the centre to turn over relevant information on tax offences to Revenue Canada, and again there could be a threat to privacy in certain circumstances. Can you add anything to what you've already said in terms of what the guidelines might be with regard to turning over tax information to Revenue Canada?

Mr. Roy Cullen: I'll just make a general point. The focus of the bill is money laundering. If money laundering is involved, probably tax evasion is involved. But the reverse is not necessarily true. If there's a suspicion of money laundering and at the same time a suspicion of tax evasion, that information could be passed simultaneously through the revenue agency and the police, if there was a joint suspicion. At that point there would be a coordinated effort between the police agencies and the revenue agency.

It seems to me that the first priority would be to look at the money-laundering activities, and it would be a coordinated effort between the police and the revenue agency. But the primary focus—I need to emphasize that point—is on money laundering and money-laundering activities.

Richard, would you like to expand on that?

Mr. Richard Lalonde: I think you've been quite complete on that one. The initial thing is that there has to be a reasonable suspicion by the centre that money laundering is occurring before any information can flow to any authority other than the law enforcement body. The other thing to remember is that in including these additional organizations as possible recipients of information, it's in recognition that they do of course play a role in combating organized crime in Canada, and that is the focus here.

Mr. Lorne Nystrom: I have another question, Mr. Chair. Maybe I'm wrong on this or a bit naive, but I don't think the bill addresses things such as credit card or debit card fraud. If I'm right on that, why doesn't it address those areas? Is this not an area where money could be laundered?

Mr. Richard Lalonde: You're absolutely right, these are areas where money can be laundered. This bill does target the laundering of the proceeds of credit card fraud, along with the proceeds of other enterprise crimes that are defined in the Criminal Code, as well as designated drug offences. So it does target these particular crimes.

Mr. Lorne Nystrom: I have one last question. Going back to Mr. Abbott's question about why a centre instead of an existing agency, do all the other countries that have similar legislation have centres that administer it independently, or do some use their national police, such as the RCMP in this country? We're not unique in that, I assume.

Mr. Richard Lalonde: There are different models around the world. Some do indeed have their law enforcement agencies involved, but more often than not these are newly created independent agencies. They can be an arm of an existing financial services regulator, or they can be a stand-alone. Their powers will differ from country to country, and so will their mandates. But they all have a responsibility to channel, if you want, information to law enforcement.

Mr. Roy Cullen: The idea behind that, Mr. Nystrom, is to make sure there's not an overzealous pursuit of suspicions, that there's a first vetting at the deposit-taking or money-receiving level in terms of suspicious transactions or transactions that by regulation will be required to be reported. Then there's a further vetting at the agency level where they're using other information and other patterns. At that point, if there's another suspicion of money laundering, only then would it be referred to the police. If the police then aggregate that with their information and want more information, they'd actually have to go to a court and get a subpoena to get some detailed information.

Mr. Lorne Nystrom: Thank you.

The Chair: Maybe to go a little bit outside of the bill itself, whenever a piece of legislation like this is placed in front of the Canadian people, of course there are resources that are required to implement the bill itself, the law. Based on our prebudget consultation hearings, the RCMP and all the other law enforcement agencies require much more money.

I think this bill is long overdue, and it's great that we're moving on this and at least getting to the same level as some of our counterparts. But while in theory this is a great bill, what type of commitment has the government made to make sure this can actually become reality?

Mr. Roy Cullen: Thank you, Mr. Chairman.

In budget 2000 additional resources were committed to the RCMP, and about $5 million of that is to complement their existing anti-money-laundering activities. With regard to the centre itself, estimates are being pulled together on the cost of supporting such a centre. It's early days, but it looks as if it's in the vicinity of $10 million to $15 million a year, something in that order of magnitude.

Again, if one wants to deal with this very serious issue of drug money increasingly being laundered through our country and if we want to respect the privacy concerns of Canadians, sometimes you don't have many options. But you're point is well taken. Resources are scarce. But in budget 2000 there were additional resources allocated to the RCMP for activities related to this.

The Chair: Yes, but let's be frank with one another here. From the background notes that I have here, it says that money laundering is a serious criminal offence entailing the illegal movement of funds estimated between $5 billion to $17 billion in and through Canada each year. Now we're going to combat that with an additional $5 million. I'm just wondering—and perhaps this is the wrong place to ask the question, I'm not sure—if we really want to implement this, shouldn't we be giving the law enforcement agencies or the centre real money to address the issue?

Mr. Roy Cullen: First of all, the additional money for the RCMP is complementing some of their existing resources. As to whether that's enough, whether $10 million to $15 million is sufficient for the new centre, how much is enough? Your point is taken. As we get into this and the patterns are identified, we may find there is more money laundering than we're happy with, and it may mean that more resources need to be applied to it. I would think that at this point the government's probably reasonably confident that we've initially assigned or will assign the required resources to get it launched, but it will be constantly and continuously monitored.

We have Mr. Deacon up from the RCMP.

Mr. Jamie Deacon (Director, Anti-Organized Crime Division, Ministry of the Solicitor General of Canada): Mr. Chairman, I would just add on the point of resources that in 1997 the government approved resources to establish 13 integrated proceeds-of-crime units in the RCMP. They're located in major centres across the country. They're managed by the RCMP, but they include provincial and local police, CCRA personnel, and crown counsel and forensic accountants to deal with complex money-laundering cases. So there have been, as well as the more recent investments that Mr. Cullen mentioned, earlier investments in money-laundering enforcement, and the arrangements in Bill C-22 will very much support the activities of those units and make them more efficient.

The Chair: So you're happy with the amount of money?

Mr. Jamie Deacon: I wouldn't want to comment on that specifically. I simply note that there have been investments to date.

Mr. Roy Cullen: Have you a better number?

The Chair: I'm not saying I have a better number, but if it's in fact organized crime, and it's $5 billion to $17 billion, yes, I have a question. I don't think $10 million is a lot of money to seriously look at this particular issue. I may be proven wrong, but I think if you're in fact dealing with $17 billion, you'll need a lot more resources than that.

Mr. Szabo.

Mr. Paul Szabo (Mississauga South, Lib.): I have a couple of general questions.

The Canadian Institute of Chartered Accountants, for instance, are going to be in a position where their members will have to go out and look at the books and records of companies, and they're going to find themselves having to ask these questions or look at what obligations they have. Have they had any problems with the proposed approach to dealing with this, in terms of what additional burdens or requirements it may place on their profession?

Mr. Roy Cullen: I think, Mr. Szabo, we have had some representation. Maybe Mr. Lalonde would comment on that, or Charles.

Mr. Richard Lalonde: Sure.

We've had occasion to speak with both the Canadian Institute of Chartered Accountants and the Certified General Accountants' Association of Canada regarding the bill, the proposed regulations, and I think we were able to reassure them in part that we are looking to cover them insofar as they are acting as financial intermediaries—in other words, insofar as they are involved in financial transactions on behalf of their clients.

The accountants did raise the issue of their auditing function and the possibility that they might be put in conflict with their clients if they had to report information to the centre that they have gathered as a result of the auditing function. What we have indicated to them is that the regulations will indicate very clearly that the reporting obligations will not apply to the auditing functions of the accounting profession.

Mr. Paul Szabo: That's a good point, because I think even with regard to charities, for some of their activities they can't possibly give full assurance, and I was wondering whether something like this would lead to an automatic qualification of statements simply on the basis that they would have no basis for making that acclaimed opinion without... There's just no way to do it.

It's estimated that about 70% of laundered money is related to drug trafficking. I'm wondering how much collaboration or coordination has to occur with offshore jurisdictions if this is really going to work.

Mr. Roy Cullen: First of all, the primary focus is money laundering. As we've said before, there is cooperation internationally, and any suspicious transactions will be covered by the act.

Horst, did you have anything to add?

Mr. Paul Szabo: Have we had discussions with our counterparts in other countries about the approach to this problem, and is what we are proposing to do compatible with the facilities or the cooperation that might be available abroad?

Mr. Richard Lalonde: Absolutely. There have been ongoing discussions for over a decade on the issue of international cooperation to combat money laundering. They originated with the G-7 countries, and in fact discussions among G-7 countries continue today on precisely those issues and how to improve cooperation. The FATF, the Financial Action Task Force, was set up to collaborate and develop international standards, and part of those standards deal with international cooperation.

There is another international body that has been formed since the Financial Action Task Force. This is a body that brings in all of the agencies responsible for money laundering, such as our centre here, and they discuss issues of cooperation as well. So this issue is at the forefront of the international agenda.

Mr. Paul Szabo: I have one last question. The estimates of the size of lost revenue resulting from trafficking and laundering money seem to be small relative to the estimates people use with regard to the underground economy in general. While I can understand that there would be a smaller number of incidents of money laundering than there would be generally in terms of underground economic activity, is the plan over the longer term in fact to broaden, let's say, the function of this new agency to deal with the broader question of the underground economy?

Mr. Roy Cullen: Maybe I could start with that one.

First of all, as I said earlier, the intent of this bill is to deal with money laundering, and tax evasion is a secondary issue. If you have money laundering, you undoubtedly have tax evasion, but the reverse is not necessarily true. So the focus of this is money laundering. Only to the extent that money laundering is related to underground activities, it would be a subsidiary kind of effort.

But I'd like to come back to your earlier point about offshore havens, for example. In fact, we had a discussion on this issue in which Mr. Intscher told me the story about how money going out of the country, for example, will be very cloaked and guarded, and clearly there will be a lot of tax evasion attached to it. But let's say it goes to a low-tax or no-tax haven. When it comes back in, they'll want to make sure all the rules are complied with, so all the tax rules will be complied with in the form of a dividend or whatever it is.

As you can understand, Mr. Szabo, with the way these deals are constructed through intermediaries, nominees, and shell companies, it is a challenge. But many of the transactions are in the millions and multi-millions of dollars as well, which makes it simpler in one sense but more complicated in another.

Mr. Paul Szabo: Thank you.

The Chair: Are there any further questions? Mr. Abbott.

Mr. Jim Abbott: I'd like to follow up on what Mr. Bevilacqua was asking. Perhaps I have a slightly different angle compared to where he was coming from.

On exactly the same issue, I find it troublesome that the figure of $5 billion to $17 billion is used. That isn't exactly precise. Then, in response to the questioning of the chairman, we hear you may have to add more resources. Again, that's kind of a blank cheque.

With respect, Mr. Cullen, you've said the government has done a lot of consultation, and that this is the reason it has taken two years to get to this point, and all the rest of that kind of thing. When there are agencies in the world that are comparable to what we're setting up right now, and ones that have a track record, help me to understand why the government can't give a straight answer.

I'm sorry. Let me rephrase that.

Help me to understand why the government is incapable of giving an accurate answer to the finance committee about where we are going in terms of dollars and cents in order to be able to fund this. Why should we not believe that in fact the government doesn't know where it's going as far as the funding is concerned?

Mr. Roy Cullen: First of all, I think we do know where we're going. I said money in budget 2000 was allocated to the RCMP in addition to earlier money, as Mr. Deacon pointed out. The budget for the centre will be in the vicinity of $10 million to $15 million. The estimate for the extent of money laundering in Canada is not terribly accurate because we don't really know how much money laundering is in fact going on in Canada. We have our own suspicions that there is a lot more than we're comfortable with.

The Chair: Is that based on a hunch?

Mr. Roy Cullen: It's based on a hunch, yes. As the centre is developed and put in place and we get better at it, we'll be making assessments as we go. But to launch the centre, I think we're in pretty good shape.

Maybe Richard or Mr. Intscher could expand on that.

Mr. Horst Intscher: In terms of the appropriate size and resource level for the centre, we've looked at a number of other agencies that have a similar mandate. It's difficult to compare them, because all of the agencies have differing mandates and different ways of performing their functions. In some cases, many of the analytic functions that this centre will be performing are located outside or are conducted partially outside. In some cases, the disclosure regime is very light because there are lower privacy concerns than we have.

Given the nature of our mandate and the relationship that we are required to have under this bill with other agencies that would receive our information, we are fairly confident that we can establish an appropriate analytic capacity in the range of somewhere between $10 million or $15 million per year. The transition team is working on this as a matter of considerable priority. It is trying to work out what the systems requirements are to process this kind of data, and what kind of analytic capacity needs to be put in place. Within a few months, we hope to be able to give considerably more precision than we are able to now.

Mr. Jim Abbott: But let's take off a bunch of zeros from the $10 million to $15 million—and I don't find a lot of comfort in those figures, even with that range. You have a basement and you've just finished working in the basement of your home. Somebody comes along and says they'll do the flooring and they'll put down a rug for you for somewhere between $1,000 and $1,500, more or less, and they hope they're right. How comfortable would you feel in signing a work order like that? This is effectively what you're asking.

If you're not asking the government, you're certainly asking the opposition to say everything's fine, and that you think it's going to be here but it might be there. Shouldn't Parliament be apprised of something with more precision and accuracy than what you think, hope and like, or something that's going to be in a range suffering a 50% variance and “Oh, by the way, it might be more”? This really isn't all that terrific, is it?

Mr. Roy Cullen: Well, Mr. Abbott, the department right now is consulting with all the stakeholder groups to develop the guidelines more fully and to set in place the reporting mechanisms and reporting requirements. Over the next few months, as Mr. Intscher said, we'll have a more precise figure in terms of the budget levels that will be required for the new centre. I apologize, but we don't have that precision right now.

Mr. Jim Abbott: Can we hope that prior to this going back to the House for third reading, when we are going to be asked to vote on this, we will have far more precise numbers that we can hold the government accountable for? Right now the government is not being held accountable with this very broad range of numbers you're providing to us.

Mr. Roy Cullen: Depending on the timing and when we come back, I will provide whatever information I can in terms of a clear definition of costs. We'll probably have the operating costs nailed down, but in terms of the information technology infrastructure, I'm not sure if we'll have it at that time. It depends on when it comes back. I'll certainly be willing to share whatever information we have at that time.

Mr. Jim Abbott: Thank you.

The Chair: Isn't the real answer that we have to start somewhere? You need to have a base of resources to start, and then they will either go up or down, depending on the requirements placed upon the agency or others.

I guess this is an amount of money you think is more or less reasonable to start with, but it may actually go up, or if there isn't much business, it'll go down.

Mr. Jim Abbott: May I suggest it'll take about a month to get a renovation project done on your basement?

Mr. Roy Cullen: Your point is well taken. We don't have a mandatory reporting regime now. This is a whole new ball game, so we'll be developing the accuracy in more detail in the next few months. This committee will also have more consultations. It might provide some advice that could change their resourcing requirements.

With respect to that process, we don't want to come out with a finite budget and then go through the charade of a process. Some policy issues may be raised that need some attention. The budget of the centre will obviously come back to Parliament and this committee.

The Chair: Fair enough.

Mr. Marceau, followed by Ms. Leung. They will be the two final questioners.

[Translation]

Mr. Richard Marceau: Mr. Cullen, could you or could one of your colleagues tell me whether the transaction reporting requirements provided in bill C-22 are going to result into additional costs for individuals and entities which are going to be subject to them? Would there be some way of ensuring that the costs, actual or alleged, which the banking system will have to meet won't be passed on to each one of us as clients?

In other words, since banking fees are already quite high, could we make sure that the costs which are going to result from those new requirements will not be passed on by the banks to their customers, so that, at the end of the day, everyone of us will not have to pay higher fees because of the implementation of those new measures?

[English]

Mr. Roy Cullen: Right now the banks and most financial institutions are doing this on a voluntary basis. The costs of their training, the internal collection of information, and internal reporting are already being borne by the banks. There'll probably be an additional burden. We don't see it as being that significant, but it will be the banks' cost burden. With their massive profits, I'm sure they'll have no difficulty absorbing that. We can't really deal with that through this act.

Does anyone else wish to expand on that?

Ms. Sophia Leung (Vancouver Kingsway, Lib.): Assuming you confiscate laundered money, will the proceeds go to general revenue or to the centre? That's assuming you have some income.

• 1015

Mr. Yvon Carrière: The act provides that any money that's confiscated constitutes proceeds of crime and is therefore treated as proceeds of crime. There's the Seized Property Management Act, which provides for possible sharing between levels of government or foreign governments, if they have participated in the actual confiscation. Of course, none of that money goes to the centre directly or indirectly, except through the general revenue and the budget process.

Mr. Roy Cullen: It goes to the parliamentary secretary.

Ms. Sophia Leung: I thought it went to Parliament.

Voices: Oh, oh!

The Chair: Mr. Saint-Denis.

Mr. Paul Saint-Denis (Senior Counsel, Criminal Law Policy Section, Department of Justice): I have an additional point. The Seized Property Management Act to which my colleague referred contains a provision that created a proceeds-of-crime account as part of the general consolidated revenue. So all of the proceeds that are confiscated eventually end up in that proceeds-of-crime account. After that, there is a partitioning. Some of the money is shared with people who have contributed to the investigation or the prosecution and some of that money is then returned to the government, to the general account.

Ms. Sophia Leung: Thank you.

The Chair: Mr. Pillitteri.

Mr. Gary Pillitteri (Niagara Falls, Lib.): Thank you very much, Mr. Chairman.

I had a question on confiscation of property that was answered. I represent Niagara Falls and I think I'm not immune to knowing what laundering is. Of course, nowadays it's money laundering and we're looking at many ways. The number one principle is with the narcotics. Are we going to be confiscating laundered money that comes from narcotics? Do we appraise that as being the property of the government in using that? Are we condoning in any way that the agency will have the power to use some of this money, knowing where it comes from?

Mr. Roy Cullen: I want to answer that just before I turn to Mr. Carrière on the question of the proceeds of crime.

In terms of the money coming across the border through Canada Customs, let's say, there will be a mandatory reporting requirement. If you're coming across with $15,000 in cash or some monetary instruments, you'll be required to declare that. If you don't and it's discovered in your luggage or in your car or something, if it's over the reported amount, as I understand it that will be seized.

A person could make a case later that the money was not from the proceeds of crime or was not laundered money. If they're successful in making that case, I believe the money is returned. Otherwise it's confiscated. I suspect the same rules that apply to the proceeds of crime that Mr. Carrière described would apply.

Mr. Gary Pillitteri: I'd like to follow up on that. Living in a cross-border community, we're crossing back and forth. We're not asking the people crossing and coming over to Canada or vice versa how much money they have with them. People are not asked whether they are carrying any cash, any money. I don't think we're looking to more open borders. As a matter of fact, I'm going to a conference tonight called “More Open Borders: A New Smart Way to do Customs and Immigration”.

Do we intend to make it more mandatory to ask certain questions? Here we are; we're trying to get the Americans to remove section 110 from the Immigration Act so that we don't have the lineups across the borders. Now I'm being told that one of the questions that could be asked is how much they're bringing across. If we're trying to have more of an open border, a more open community with the Americans...

Mr. Roy Cullen: Mr. Pillitteri, as I mentioned at the outset, one of the great advantages with Canada and the United States is this open border. By the same token, it creates other challenges. At this moment, for example, I understand that in the United States you have to declare if you're bringing in any cash or monetary instruments.

The bottom line is that this act, this law and the regulations that accompany it, will make it mandatory to report if you are carrying with you on your person around $15,000—the level hasn't been firmly established yet, but let's say around $15,000—because people could be moving laundered money into Canada and we want to stop that.

Mr. Gary Pillitteri: As I understand it, I think it's anything above $10,000 right now that one has to report, and this becomes recorded after $10,000.

Mr. Roy Cullen: That's U.S. dollars.

Mr. Gary Pillitteri: U.S. dollars, that is.

But I'm kind of worried, because I have Niagara Falls and casinos, one casino and now a larger one coming on, and today some business people travel with much more than that. I wonder if, instead of expanding and opening up the borders and making it more feasible for people to travel across the country, something like this is not really hindering that.

I've just come back from Europe, and this has gone by the wayside in Europe in crossing borders within the European Common Market. What are we coming up with? Is this archaic legislation going backwards rather than going forwards?

Mr. Roy Cullen: I'm not sure it's archaic; I think we're coming into conformity with other countries. But regarding the EU, it has become one big area.

Mr. Lalonde, do you want to expand or comment on that?

Mr. Richard Lalonde: Sure.

The justification, of course, is that in strengthening our domestic regime with mandatory reporting, having plugged that hole, we simply do not want to push the problem to the border and have money laundered down in the United States. So it becomes incumbent upon us to introduce a cross-border declaration regime.

It is very much like in the United States as well. It's not designed to impede the free flow of capital, and certainly we don't want to do that. This regime has been designed not to do that. It's very much like the regime we now have for the crossing of goods across the Canadian border, whereby Canadians and others must declare goods entering into Canada.

It may be as simple as ticking an additional box as to whether or not you are carrying currency and monetary instruments above a certain threshold. The threshold we have in mind, as Mr. Cullen has indicated or is proposing, is $15,000 Canadian, which is roughly equivalent to the American threshold.

Down the road, there may be some cost savings we can achieve by cooperating at the land border crossings with the United States. As they're already collecting this information, perhaps there are some synergies here that we can obtain, ergo the reason we're proposing this kind of threshold.

Mr. Roy Cullen: But I think too, Mr. Pillitteri, the threshold is fairly high. I know there are some wheeling-and-dealing gamblers, but let's say it's $15,000. And maybe the officials could clarify this. If it's over $15,000, if $15,000 is the number that's settled on, they will be required to report it. If they report it—maybe the officials could answer this—if it is someone who's bringing money across to go to a casino, what circumstances would apply then if they were able to convince a customs officer that they were going across to the casino to gamble with $15,000?

Mr. Yvon Carrière: I just want to state that there's no prohibition against carrying more than $15,000. All there is, is a form on which you report the fact that you are crossing the border with $15,000. Once that's done, there's absolutely no further requirement or limit.

Mr. Roy Cullen: The problem develops if a person is carrying more than $15,000 and they don't tick a box on the form. If they say they're carrying more than $15,000—correct me if I'm wrong—that's all that happens. That transaction is then reported to the centre, is it not? But as far as—

Mr. Gary Pillitteri: Mr. Cullen, with all due respect, I would like to get rid of those papers with the boxes on them. That's what I'm intending. That's where the rest of the world's going, and that's what my intent is, to see it go that route.

Any time one carries money from one country to another, as soon as he has to enter an amount and check off a box, all of a sudden he becomes a suspect, he becomes someone you have to look at. You become a number of an investigative block—

Mr. Roy Cullen: Yes, but not really, because it would be mandatory reporting, but if it comes to the centre and there's no suspicion of money laundering, that would be where it dies.

Mr. Carrière, would you like to expand on that?

• 1025

Mr. Yvon Carrière: Yes, on perhaps two things.

First, the centre will favour electronic reporting as much as possible. There might be a way to work in some type of electronic reporting in certain cases and certain circumstances.

I also would point out that the act does provide for authority to enter into agreements with governments of foreign countries for the exchange of information in certain cases, which might avoid having to make two reports—one when you're leaving Canada and one when you're entering the U.S., for example. That way we would reduce the paper burden we're alluding to.

The Chair: Thank you, Mr. Pillitteri.

Mr. Cullen and officials, on behalf of the committee, I'd like to thank you very much. Of course, if we need further help you may be called back to clarify some points. We'll be needing your help during clause-by-clause, so we look forward to seeing you again.

Again, I apologize for the room, but there isn't much we can do about that.

Have a good day.

The meeting is adjourned.

The Chair (Mr. Maurizio Bevilacqua (Vaughan—King—Aurora, Lib.)): I'd like to call the meeting to order and welcome everyone here this morning.

As everyone knows, the order of the day is Bill C-22, an act to facilitate combatting the laundering of proceeds of crime, to establish the Financial Transactions and Reports Analysis Centre of Canada, and to amend and repeal certain acts in consequence.

For those of you whose first time it is appearing in front of the committee, we usually give our witnesses anywhere between five and seven minutes to make their introductory remarks, and thereafter we engage in a question-and-answer session. Today we'll have a ten-minute round, which means each individual asking questions will have ten minutes.

We have representatives from the following organizations: The Credit Union Central of Canada; Certified General Accountants' Association of Canada; Canadian Life and Health Insurance Association Inc.; and the Public Interest Advocacy Centre.

We will begin with the Credit Union Central of Canada, Mr. Brian Topp, vice-president, government affairs. Welcome.

Mr. Brian Topp (Vice-President, Government Affairs, Credit Union Central of Canada): Thank you very much, Mr. Chairman. It's a pleasure to be here. Thank you for inviting us.

I'll give a brief introduction. Credit Union Central of Canada represents credit unions across Canada, except in the province of Quebec. Our system manages $56 billion in assets, Mr. Chairman, and we have 4.3 million members. Our sister organization in Quebec, the caisses populaires, manage another $76 billion in assets and have 6 million-plus members. It might interest you, Mr. Chairman, to know that per capita the largest co-op banking sector in the western world is in Canada. One out of every three Canadians is in a credit union or caisse populaire.

Pertinent to some of the comments I want to make today, the credit union system, Mr. Chairman, is the lead or one of the top three business lenders in every province in western Canada, and our sister organization in Quebec is the top business lender in Quebec.

Mr. Chairman, credit unions have no interest whatsoever in being party to money laundering crimes. We support the thrust of the legislation. We have a compliance agreement with the RCMP signed long ago. Credit unions have worked to comply with Bill C-61, which was passed in 1989, and we've worked to comply with Bill C-9, which was passed in 1991, and we're going to try to comply as best we can with Bill C-22.

My purpose in talking to the committee today is to raise a few operational issues to make sure that this new approach works for the government, for the justice system, and for us.

The first point I want to make, Mr. Chairman, is that clauses 7 and 9 establish in very broad strokes—the bill overall is written in very broad strokes, as I'm sure the committee is aware—some definitions of what's required to be reported. It's necessary to read the consultation paper on what that means to understand what the government is getting at with these clauses. It seems pretty clear from the consultation document on the regulations that what the government has in mind is receiving a report from institutions taking deposits on every cash transaction of $10,000 and more or any wire transfer of $25,000 or more. Mr. Chairman, this is a very wide net that is being cast on transactions that are going to be required to be reported under this act. It's a pretty significant change from the status quo.

It is possible, based on the plain meaning of the words that we have before us so far, that this is going to include a number of transactions that on the face of it are clearly not in any way associated with money laundering crimes. For example, cash deposits from big-box retailers, the local Wal-Mart, cash deposits from high-volume restaurants, a cash deposit from a farmer who has done a bunch of harvest sales, a restaurant or a bar or a retailer who is having a great Christmas or a great season, maybe a big church fundraiser—a whole bunch of potential cash transactions would appear in the plain meaning of the words before us to be captured in the regulations in the bill here.

Mr. Chairman, some would have it that this doesn't pose a problem for the federal government because the federal government is going to invest a significant amount of money in FTRAC, the office that's going to manage these transactions. I'm told that they could handle up to 100 million transaction reports in a year, and that's reassuring. It tells us that the government would be able to handle all of these reports. But unfortunately nobody's buying the credit union in Sturgis, Saskatchewan, a new computer. As a result, we are concerned that credit unions are going to be required to report an awful lot of transactions that clearly cannot have anything to do with money laundering transactions.

The first point I want to make is that it might be helpful if the committee recommended that the government consider exempting obvious exemptions from the reporting requirements set out in the bill and in the consultation regulations that are before us. In the alternate, perhaps the government could consider a regime in which members who are going to make regular or predictable deposits could report once, saying, “We are planning to make x number of deposits in the future.” As a result, this would reduce the number of reports we have to make.

Mr. Chairman, the second point I want to draw your eye to is that clause 97 of the bill is a consequential amendment to Bill C-6, which expands privacy regulations and is currently before Parliament. It's a necessary amendment, because otherwise there's a fairly glaring conflict between the tough privacy approach in Bill C-6 and the very wide disclosure requirements in Bill C-22 that I've just spoken about. Because that amendment is there, federally chartered financial institutions are protected. Bill C-6, as it applies to our friends, the banks... they are going to be whole because of this amendment. But I draw your eye to the fact that credit unions and caisse populaires are provincially regulated. Bill C-6 is basically going to drive all provinces to adopt comparable legislation within the next three years. In the event that a similar exemption or amendment is not included in the provincial legislation, there's a potential conflict between privacy legislation and Bill C-22.

In order to avoid having this stuff litigated in the courts, I think it would be helpful if the committee urged the government to coordinate carefully with provinces to make sure that existing provincial privacy legislation... As an example, there is very strong provincial privacy legislation in the province of Quebec right now, and there's mandatorily going to be provincial legislation in every province within three years. There's no contradiction between that regime and Bill C-22, with the result that we don't end up in a conflict between our provincial regulators and this bill.

The third point I want to make is that Bill C-22 casts a pretty wide net here, and it's not the only project coming out of Parliament to cast a wide net. As a case in point—and I'm not critical of the initiative but just drawing your eye to the operational consequences—Industry Canada is consulting about a pretty major increase in the amount of detail they want to see reported from financial institutions about small business lending.

When we add it all up and look at the potential paper burden that's going to be imposed by this bill, and the record-keeping, plus some of the other potential consequences of financial institution reform that's coming, the result would seem to be that we're going to come out of this session with a pretty significant increase in the reporting requirements to the federal government. In our system, which is very decentralized, the reporting requirement is going to fall directly on credit unions, some of which are quite small.

I think it would be helpful for the committee, because we're focusing on this bill today, to recommend that a good deal of attention be invested in making reporting as simple and inexpensive as possible, and preferably that reporting is possible through our existing computer systems without requirement for major new investments or re-engineering. The optimal solution would be a nice, simple, clean Internet interface, and it wouldn't be bad if the committee urged other federal departments overall to converge on that simple approach to limit the compliance burden, which is becoming fairly significant.

In the interests of time, I'll just allude to a few operational issues that I think are interesting and that are going to merit talking carefully to the department about as the regulations are developed.

For example, I draw your eye to clause 6, which prescribes in very general terms the kind of record keeping that financial institutions would be required to undertake, and we learn a little bit more about what the government has in mind.

In the consultation booklet, we see, for example, on page 10, a requirement that whenever somebody deposits $10,000 or more in cash, a statement be signed by the individual. Mr. Chairman, that will be impossible if the deposit is made at an ATM. So there are some operational issues, and they're going to need to work on the details of how this is going to be implemented.

To summarize, the bill casts a very wide net indeed, and perhaps unnecessarily so, on the kinds of transactions that will have to be reported. I think this can be managed reasonably well by coming up with a good exemptions list or by looking at that one-time report I alluded to.

There are some potential conflicts with existing and future provincial privacy legislation, and we would urge the government to head those off in advance. This is a piece of the puzzle in significant new reporting requirements, which I think need to be carefully studied operationally to make sure they're not overwhelming, especially for a small credit union. Do think about the good folks in Sturgis, Saskatchewan, and try to keep the reporting burden down.

Finally, there are clearly some operational issues, like this ATM issue I'm flagging, that we're going to need to work through with the government once this is in place.

Other than that, it's a good bill.

The Chair: That's encouraging. Thank you, Mr. Topp.

We'll now hear from the Certified General Accountants Association of Canada, with Everett Colby, Dawn McGeachy, and Mark Boudreau. Welcome.

Mr. Boudreau.

Mr. Mark Boudreau (Vice-President, Public and Government Relations, Certified General Accountants Association of Canada): Thank you, Mr. Chairman.

First, I would like to thank you for having us appear before the committee today. With me is Dawn McGeachy, from our professional affairs department, who is a certified general accountant and a fellow associate from the Credit Union Institute of Canada; and Everett Colby of Colby and Associates. He is also an accredited litigation accountant and a certified fraud examiner.

• 1120

Just briefly, the Certified General Accountants Association of Canada is a prominent, respected, self-regulated, Canadian professional body responsible for the education, certification, and professional development of over 60,000 certified general accountants and CGA students in every constituency in our country.

We're going to keep our remarks brief, Mr. Chairman, to about five minutes. I know members of the committee have a copy of our presentation, and I have brought extras if people require or would like them.

I'll turn it over to Mr. Colby.

Mr. Everett Colby (CFE, North American Forensics Accountants; Owner, Colby & Associates): Thank you, Mr. Chairman.

We're pleased to advise that in principle CGA Canada supports the initiatives contained in the proceeds of crime money laundering act, Bill C-22. However, I wish to cover three specific concerns our association has with the bill.

We recognize that money laundering and the cross-border movement of proceeds of crime is becoming increasingly difficult to deter and detect and that traditional means of investigating these activities are proving less effective. The proposals will provide Canada's law enforcement agencies with the tools they need and access to valuable data that they may not otherwise be able to obtain.

First, we recommend that the ambiguous wording contained in part 1, clause 7, relating to the requirement to report suspicious transactions be revised to more properly reflect the true intention, which came out at preliminary discussions we had, that it would apply to a professional who is involved in the business of transacting the moneys—actually involved in the transaction.

Our analysis of the backgrounder to this legislation as well as the consultation paper has identified the potential misunderstanding that entities and individuals acting as financial intermediaries, such as lawyers and accountants, will be required to report any financial transactions that they have reasonable grounds to suspect are related to a money laundering offence merely by becoming associated with the information.

The current reading in the consultation paper is as follows: Section 7 requires every person or entity subject to part 1 to report to the centre every financial transaction where there are reasonable grounds to suspect that the transaction is related to money laundering.

Thus, the current wording would seem to indicate that a professional, during the course of their activities—such as when preparing financial statements—might be responsible for making a report, rather than, as was explained to us during our consultation with the working group, those who are involved in the actual movement of the money. It is not just simply by virtue of being associated with the information.

Secondly, we're concerned with the receipt and management of information being provided to the centre. The bill does not provide for the establishment of regulations regarding criteria for determining what are reasonable grounds to suspect money laundering. Rather, the consultative paper states that the centre will develop guidelines to assist reporting entities to identify characteristics and circumstances that might lead to a determination of reasonable suspicion. The paper further states that the information to be contained in these reports and the means by which the reports are to be transmitted to the centre will also be prescribed by regulation.

As this leaves much to the unknown, we are left with the impression that something will now be designed, it will then be imposed, and we will have to trust that the reporting system will be an efficient and cost-effective process. We would like to see the role of the centre be more clearly defined and that comprehensible information be provided to the Canadian public regarding the accountability of the centre.

Although clause 55 addresses where disclosure by the centre is prohibited, we do not believe the centre should be immune from prosecution in the event the information it provides to law enforcement agencies or others proves to be in error or slanderous.

Additionally, while we agree that the centre should be authorized to provide information to law enforcement agencies, we are alarmed that they are also permitted to disclose this information to the Canada Customs and Revenue Agency, the Canadian Security Intelligence Service, and the Department of Citizenship and Immigration.

Subclause 55(3) states that the centre must first determine whether it has reasonable grounds to suspect that the information would be relevant to investigating or prosecuting a money laundering offence before disclosure can be made to these other authorities. However, the bill does not state what constitutes reasonable grounds to suspect that the information would be relevant.

What springs to mind is data mining, and the safeguards proposed for the release of information appear at this point to be weak. There are no provisions for third-party review of decisions prior to the release of information. Again, we are in a position of trusting that once the regulations are developed, they will be palatable to the public.

To our association, the most distressing aspect of the proposed legislation is contained in clause 62. This provides the power for representatives of the centre to enter and seize documents from a professional's office without the need of due process. We find this highly intrusive. It also raises the question of whether the legislation is contrary to the provisions of section 8 of the Canadian Charter of Rights and Freedoms, which provides that everyone has the right to be secure against unreasonable search and seizure.

While the creators of the centre seem to have gone to certain lengths to ensure that the perception of protection of individual privacy is maintained, a warrantless search of a professional's office seems to violate the same principle of privacy. There is an expectation by the public that an accountant enjoys privilege, much as exists in a lawyer-client relationship. While such is not the case, it is reasonable to expect that a client's file should not be freely available, thus making receipt of a warrant prior to entry a mandatory part of the process, a natural conclusion.

On behalf of CGA-Canada, I would like to thank you for your time here today. For further details on our association's viewpoint, please refer to our written submissions. Thank you.

The Chair: We'll now hear from the Canadian Life and Health Insurance Association Inc., with Mr. Frank Zinatelli, associate general counsel, and David McKee, associate general counsel, Clarica Life Insurance.

Mr. Frank Zinatelli (Associate General Counsel, Canadian Life and Health Insurance Association Inc.): Thank you, Mr. Chairman.

The CLHIA is the national association of life and health insurance companies, representing over 80 member companies that account for over 90% of the life and health insurance business in Canada.

With me today is Dave McKee, associate general counsel of Clarica Life Insurance Company, who is also chairman of the CLHIA working group on money laundering regulations.

The life and health insurance industry has appeared before this committee several times over recent years, and we welcome these important opportunities to discuss significant issues in the financial services sector. It is in a spirit of constructive cooperation that we offer today our thoughts and observations on Bill C-22 and the proposed amendments to money laundering rules it contains.

I would like to note that as the review of these proposals proceeds, my industry colleagues and I are at your disposal to make further contributions to your committee's work on these matters in whatever way you might find most useful.

Very briefly, let me indicate that the industry generally supports the proposals contained in Bill C-22, and we support the need for a strong regime to allow law enforcement agencies to combat money laundering. I would like to point out, however, that we do have some recommendations regarding the application of the act.

Specifically, we would note that, as written, the act does not cover independent insurance agents or brokers, otherwise known as financial services intermediaries. The result of that is that while life insurers and their employees have express duties and obligations under the act—for example, to obtain client records, to verify the identity of a client, to make suspicious transaction reports—the independent intermediaries do not. In fact, it is these intermediaries who will have the most direct knowledge, perhaps the only knowledge, of facts giving rise to reasonable grounds to suspect money laundering. We have raised this issue with the officials working on the legislation, and we urged them to consult with the independent intermediaries in this regard.

At this time I would ask my colleague Dave McKee to outline some of the steps the industry has taken to fight money laundering and to comment on some of the issues raised in the December 1999 consultation paper on proposed revisions to the money laundering rules.

Mr. David McKee (Associate General Counsel, Clarica Life Insurance; Canadian Life and Health Insurance Association Inc.): Thank you, Frank.

To begin, Mr. Chairman, I'd like to point out that life insurance companies look at compliance with money laundering rules as an essential part of a company-wide compliance framework. Let me first describe two examples of industry-wide steps taken to combat money laundering.

First, in order to increase awareness of life and health insurers regarding money laundering rules, a few years ago the CLHIA issued a guideline manual in plain language. It discusses the identification of suspicious transactions and, more generally, how insurers should comply with anti-money-laundering rules. The guide also contains practical information for life and health insurers. This book of guidelines was most recently updated in January 1999. For your information, we've distributed copies, in both French and English, through the clerk of the committee.

Secondly, the life and health insurance industry developed and in 1998 formally adopted guidelines on screening life agents for suitability and reporting on suitability. These national guidelines require, among other things, that life insurance agents and other life insurance intermediaries must be reported to the relevant provincial insurance regulators by an insurer if the insurer, following a company investigation, has evidence to support an allegation of money laundering. Again, we have provided the committee with copies of those guidelines in both French and English.

With respect to the proposals for new regulations described in the consultation paper, which is designed to implement the new reporting requirements in the bill, the life and health insurance industry has been working with government officials to ensure that those proposals are both workable and appropriate.

We have raised some technical issues in relation to those proposed regulations. Our key concern is to ensure that the new rules, as much as possible, do not disrupt normal business practices of life companies. For example, the new regulations should not apply to life and health insurance products where there is only minimal risk of money laundering activity—for example, group insurance and health insurance.

As another example, the new rules around verification of identity of an account holder, especially with respect to corporations, should not be unduly burdensome for small business people, who don't have ready access to their formal corporate records.

We look forward to continued consultation with the officials on these issues.

Thank you, Mr. Chairman. That concludes our opening remarks. We look forward to your questions.

The Chair: Thank you very much.

For the final presentation, from the Public Interest Advocacy Centre, we have Philippa Lawson, counsel. Welcome.

Ms. Philippa Lawson (Counsel, Public Interest Advocacy Centre): Thanks.

I am with the Public Interest Advocacy Centre. First, I'll just give you a bit of background on PIAC. It's a national non-profit organization that has been around for 24 years, representing the consumer interest primarily in the areas of public utility regulation and essential services, including the financial sector. We've been increasingly involved in consumer privacy issues over the past decade, and that's what brings us here today.

I'd like to begin by congratulating you and other members of Parliament on the passage of Bill C-6, which we see as a long overdue set of rules to give consumers some control over their personal information in the private sector.

I won't go into the importance of privacy. Suffice it to say that the right to privacy has been recognized by the Supreme Court of Canada as essential to individual dignity, autonomy, and freedom, and to the meaningful exercise of democratic rights.

Before you today is a bill that will significantly erode consumer privacy, individual privacy, in order to achieve its goal of better detection, deterrence, and prosecution of organized crime. This is a classic example of a clash between effective law enforcement on the one hand and individual privacy on the other hand. Both are compelling societal interests: your job is to ensure that any sacrifices of individual privacy made by Bill C-22 are fully justified.

Let me just highlight some of the ways in which ordinary Canadians will be affected by this bill.

Because reporting is mandatory and failure to report results in significant penalties, organizations can be expected to err on the side of overreporting. This likelihood is enhanced, reinforced, by the provision of the bill that removes the individual's right to legal redress in the event of unnecessary and damaging reporting as long as that reporting was done in good faith.

• 1135

Large amounts of confidential financial information about Canadians, much of it unnecessary, will be collected by this new agency. Because organizations are required to make subjective judgments about the suspicious nature of transactions, there is a disconcerting amount of room for unnecessary and damaging investigation of individuals. Because so much of the collection, use, and disclosure of personal information by the new centre is covert, innocent individuals will simply not be aware of investigations of them, which may be based on false or misleading information, until it's too late and the damage is done.

In brief, this bill will establish a regime of systemic privacy invasion in the name of improved law enforcement.

The first question you must ask, then, is whether the sacrifice of privacy is justified in a free and democratic society. Is money laundering that big a problem? Are the existing tools we have really inadequate? What's in this for Canadians?

Should you decide, based on the evidence, that we do indeed need a mandatory reporting regime along the lines of Bill C-22, then you must ensure that this particular regime impairs the right to privacy as little as possible.

On this point, I'd like to acknowledge the many protections included in Bill C-22 that serve to limit the privacy invasions authorized under the new regime. These are things we like and we support if you decide the bill is necessary: the establishment of an independent, arm's-length centre to collect and analyse information; the requirement for judicial warrants in order for police to access all but the most general information about suspicious transactions; limits on the use and disclosure of information by the new agency to purposes under the act; making the improper disclosure of information by the new agency a punishable offence; and, of course, making the new agency subject to oversight by the privacy commissioner. These are all good things.

We remain concerned, however, about the potential use of regulations to expand the scope of privacy invasions under the bill. Much still has to be decided and determined by way of regulation, and, as is so often the case, I think the devil here may be in the details.

We remain concerned about accountability within FTRAC, the new centre for data protection. We remain concerned about whether FTRAC officials will be sensitive to privacy issues, and we remain concerned about the lack of public awareness of this new regime. Will Canadians be aware of what's happening, particularly behind the scenes, with their personal information?

We therefore recommend—and I have seven brief points here—that the bill require FTRAC to designate an individual official within the centre, such as a privacy officer, who is responsible for ensuring that the collection, use, and disclosure of personal information by the centre is appropriately minimized.

We recommend that one of the qualities sought when hiring personnel for FTRAC is sensitivity to privacy issues.

We recommend that a process be established to ensure that FTRAC officials, as well as those in the private sector who are responsible for reporting—the clause 5 entities—are properly educated as to the importance of minimizing the collection, use, and disclosure of personal information to what is necessary under the act.

We recommend that measures be taken and resources be allocated by the government to ensure public awareness of this regime, through preparation and distribution to clause 5 entities, for example, of brochures and informational materials for public consumption.

We recommend that clause 5 entities be encouraged, if not required, for example, to place stickers on their windows identifying themselves as reporting entities under the act, something similar to the Canada Deposit Insurance Corporation model of public information.

We recommend that the five-year parliamentary review required under clause 72 of the bill be made perpetual, that there be a continual five-year review, the same as exists under Bill C-6 right now.

Finally, we recommend a continuation of the open public process followed to date with respect to the drafting of this bill and the regulations under it.

Thank you very much.

The Chair: Thank you very much, Ms. Lawson.

We'll now proceed to the question-and-answer session. It will be a ten-minute round, and we'll begin with Mr. Abbott, followed by Monsieur Loubier.

Mr. Jim Abbott (Kootenay—Columbia, Canadian Alliance): Thank you very much.

Welcome to all of you. We do appreciate the time that you've taken to share your ideas and your expertise with us. I don't have a lot of questions. I think your presentations are very self-explanatory.

I just have one very gentle challenge to Mr. Topp—and I mean in all seriousness that it's a gentle challenge. I'm wondering about the example you used of the $10,000 limit vis-à-vis ATMs. Perhaps we're unaware, but it strikes me that it would be highly unusual to be dropping $10,000-plus cash into an ATM. In fact, if a person was regularly doing so, because it is unusual, that would be a flag in and of itself. I wonder if you could comment on that.

Mr. Brian Topp: Well, you're quite correct. If somebody's dropping $10,000 through an ATM, especially if it's in nice, crisp, old, and now withdrawn $1,000 bills, it would raise an eyebrow somewhere in the system and would probably be reported as a suspicious transaction. With respect, though, that's not what I was flagging. What I was mentioning is simply that under the regulation about security required in the record-keeping requirements under the act, such a deposit would be accompanied by a signature from the individual. I was simply pointing out that as a technical proposition, a signature is not obtainable. When we get into the going-forward detail of the regulations, then we need to be alert to those kinds of issues, particularly given the penalties prescribed in the bill. We want them to be all executable.

Mr. Jim Abbott: The reason I gave you that opportunity to clarify is that some of the representations that have been made to me—along with other editorial comment—have said this is too far-reaching and that too many innocent people will be sucked into this vortex. As a result, I appreciate your clarification.

Ms. Lawson, on the question of whether money laundering is that big a problem, as the Solicitor General critic for Her Majesty's official opposition, I would suggest that I would concur with the government, and that the opposition would concur with the government, that indeed it is that big a problem. This is therefore a very clear way of tracking illegal, illicit, dangerous activity that is occurring within our community, and it is quite essential.

That having been said, I rather like your idea of, number one, the perpetual five-year review of clause 72. I would be inclined to agree with that, as I think it would be very useful. It could be either a perpetual five-year review, a sunset clause, or something that would cause future parliamentarians to review this legislation in order to make sure we are keeping abreast of whatever the new elements are that organized crime and other people are using.

I also would like to pursue the idea, as I understood it, of a kind of privacy commissioner within the legislation. I wonder if you could expand on that a little bit.

Ms. Philippa Lawson: The idea actually came from Bill C-6, which sets out ten principles of fair information practice, the first of which is accountability. That requires all private sector organizations subject to the bill to designate an individual within their corporation or company as responsible for the protection of consumer data, of the personal information they collect, use, and disclose. The idea is just to apply the same principle to FTRAC, the new centre, and therefore to require that there be an official within FTRAC who has responsibility for ensuring that the collection, use, and disclosure of personal information in the course of the activities of the centre is appropriately minimized.

Mr. Jim Abbott: Would that satisfy your concern? In other words, if we are really suspicious of this legislation and have serious reservations about this legislation, would the inclusion of a capacity like what we just vaguely described as a privacy commissioner really satisfy the deepest skeptic in regard to this legislation?

Ms. Philippa Lawson: Not at all, and I will admit that in the private sector scheme, one of the main purposes of having that designated individual is that it's someone the consumer can go to, can make complaints to, and can ask for access from.

In this scheme, of course, much of what's going on is covert; the consumer doesn't know what's going on. So the advantages are more limited in this respect. It's also much more important that the existing privacy commissioner have oversight over the regime, as he or she does under this legislation. It's just one little step that highlights the importance of privacy. I think it's more important that the individuals working within FTRAC are sensitive to the issues.

Mr. Jim Abbott: But you can't legislate that.

Ms. Philippa Lawson: Exactly—and that's why we suggested what we did.

Mr. Jim Abbott: Your answer would seem to indicate, perhaps, that rather than inserting a privacy commissioner, there should be more access for existing privacy commissioners—access to the centre and to the information—so that there is an external overview. Wouldn't that be more of an answer than just having an extra body there?

Ms. Philippa Lawson: That's already there. The privacy commissioner already has supervisory powers. So we support that. To ensure that the centre has privacy in mind when it's doing its daily operations, we just thought it might help to have someone in charge, someone responsible within the centre.

Mr. Jim Abbott: I'm just wondering about redundancy.

Ms. Philippa Lawson: The issue we're thinking of here is internal, not external, because the existing privacy commissioner is external. He has investigatory powers and so forth, but he's not necessarily going to know what's going on in the day-to-day operational basis. I think it is important that internally there be some accountability.

Mr. Jim Abbott: Thank you very much, Mr. Chair.

The Chair: Thank you, Mr. Abbott.

[Translation]

Mr. Loubier.

Mr. Yvan Loubier (Saint-Hyacinthe—Bagot, BQ): Thank you, Mr. Chairman.

I agree with Mr. Abbott, but I would like to address the issue from a slightly different angle. Ms. Lawson, you mentioned the importance of privacy and suggested that there be someone responsible within the Centre. In money laundering, you are dealing with organized criminals. In the drug market alone, $10 billion is laundered each year, in addition to 7 or 8 billion dollars for other illicit activities. Criminals have a lot of means at their disposal to influence the outcome of a situation.

If the Act is a bit too permissive, these people will be able to get involved in the normal process. If there is an internal commissioner who acts as a privacy watchdog, you can imagine that this person will be under significant pressure from organized crime. They have the means, the tools. We call them the scorpions. These are people who wear white shirts and ties to work and they influence many senior officials, police officers, lawyers and accountants.

Do you not think that not spreading this responsibility among all officials at the Centre, but instead placing it all in the hands of one person, the privacy commissioner, could be dangerous and that it would be a huge responsibility for this person, who would single-handedly take on all privacy-related responsibilities?

[English]

Ms. Philippa Lawson: That's an interesting idea. First of all, the bill does make every individual within the centre responsible by making it an offence to improperly disclose information, so I think we have that there. We are simply proposing that there be one person designated, for the reasons I've already explained, not to remove responsibility from any other officials but just to have someone who is more responsible than anyone else, I guess, for that issue, and who can maybe give seminars internally to their colleagues.

I would also expect that if the nature of organized crime is as you described, probably the identity of individuals working for FTRAC may need to be confidential or not public and not easily determined as to who is who and who is responsible for what within FTRAC. I don't know if that addresses the concern you've raised.

[Translation]

Mr. Yvan Loubier: It would be difficult, because the individual you appoint as senior complaints commissioner, for example, would receive complaints from citizens. So the individual would necessarily be identified as the privacy watchdog. I'm just making this comment off the cuff, because people who launder money are not choir-boys. They launder the money primarily for criminal biker gangs. They have enormous means at their disposal. I think it is rather delicate to place such a huge responsibility in the hands of your senior commissioner without his being known. At some point, if he receives complaints, he will necessarily be known, since he will play an official role and hold an official position.

I just wanted to make a comment on that. If I have understood the bill correctly, spreading the responsibility out is very important: responsibilities are to be spread among all people, all commissioners at the new Centre.

I have another question, this time for the chartered accountant. You talk about the services of insurance intermediaries. Can you give us some examples that could complement the bill, that could identify these intermediary services and that could make the bill more efficient in the fight against organized crime?

[English]

Mr. David McKee: Yes, I believe that question is properly for me. The concern was that the bill doesn't directly apply at this point to insurance agents, to insurance brokers, and I guess potentially to other financial intermediaries and other aspects of the financial services, in that in the absence of that... They're the ones on the front lines who would be most likely to have suspicious transactions come to their attention. Thus, if they aren't obligated to report, there are going to be suspicious events going on in the marketplace that don't get reported and should be reported.

Having the obligation just on the financial institution itself isn't going to get the job done, because those issues aren't going to necessarily surface to the attention of the head office of the financial organization.

[Translation]

Mr. Yvan Loubier: Thank you, Mr. Chairman.

The Chairman: Thank you, Mr. Loubier.

Mr. Cullen.

[English]

Mr. Roy Cullen (Etobicoke North, Lib.): Thank you, Mr. Chairman.

Thank you to all the presenters. I have one question for each of you, if I may.

Mr. Topp, you're probably aware that the bill provides for the exemption of certain reporting transactions. The centre would make a determination and, through regulation, certain routine transactions would be exempted. That's the process of consultation that's going on now.

I'm wondering if you have any advice on the types of transactions or the types of entities that should be exempt. You mentioned, for example, churches: if a church would come to a credit union and deposit an amount over the regulated amount, you were suggesting, I think, that we should exempt churches. Could you expand on that or maybe give us the flavour of the kinds of exemptions you would see as appropriate?

Mr. Brian Topp: You are quite correct that the bill opens the potential for an exemptions list, but the regulations heretofore and in some of our discussions with the department would suggest that there's some thought being put into not doing an exemptions list, that they're first going to see what comes in and then work on an exemptions list in the future.

We would prefer an approach whereby we would anticipate some of the obvious and egregious exemptions that are there. Probably the biggest volume is regular retail deposits in the retail sector. I gave the example of a big-box retailer or a restaurant. I throw out the church example. I don't know how many churches raise $10,000 in cash every fundraiser. Some of them do. A big cathedral would. That's captured in the act. It's obviously not the volume issue; the volume issue is in the business sector.

It would seem clear that somewhere along the line pretty soon, unless the FTRAC is proposing to accumulate an extraordinary amount of utterly useless information and keep it forever, and keep the credit unions and other financial institutions generating enormous volumes of reporting that will never be used, we're going to need an exemption list that exempts regular deposits from retailers.

I threw out four examples that I think are good places to start: high cash volume retailers, high cash volume restaurants that are making regular deposits, farmers at harvest time who are engaged in routine transactions, and seasonal deposits from restaurants and bars, etc., that are foreseeable. That's a good place to start.

Mr. Roy Cullen: I take your point and I'm glad you raised it. Every time you do that, of course, it creates an opportunity to exploit openings in the system, but I take your point.

I'd like to refer a question now to Mr. Colby. You mentioned that the intent of the act is that it's only if accountants are involved in a money laundering activity. I think you make a good point that maybe we need to clarify that in the act. If an accountant in the conduct of a normal accounting engagement or audit engagement comes across something that looks suspicious, it would need to be reported. It would be an interesting idea, but I don't think it's workable. It would put accountants in a pretty tenuous position. I appreciate that comment.

You mentioned search and seizure. The section I'm familiar with is clause 62, with respect to accountants and professionals, which would be germane to accountants. It's only in relation to a part. If there's a suspicion that some entity that is meant to be reporting under part 1 isn't reporting, someone from the centre could go to that accountant's office, for example, and ask to see various records. My understanding is that they couldn't seize records, but they could make copies of information.

I suppose, being the devil's advocate, that if the bill says certain entities must report, there needs to be some way of establishing a way of acting on a suspicion that they aren't reporting. You mentioned seizure, and seizure does not apply to that section. That's the way I understand it. How would you suggest then that government ensure that there is compliance with part 1 of the act if you don't do that?

Mr. Everett Colby: Well, we actually gave this some thought, because there was an understanding that there does need to be some compliance measures. A suggestion is that, similar to the Income Tax Act, which most accountants in public practice are certainly accustomed to dealing with, a request be made in writing to provide whatever relevant information was used. That would provide a report or, if they had suspicion from some other source, they would be able to clearly identify to us what records they were seeking and could in a sense make a written request for that information.

This is so broadly defined that if they suspect I'm not reporting, they can just come and look at all of my records. It doesn't say it limits it just to those records that they have reasonable grounds to believe, due to information they're getting from some other source, I might not be reporting on. They could just decide to do spot audits to make sure that accountants are reporting in general, without necessarily looking at any specific company.

Mr. Roy Cullen: I'm not sure that's how it reads there or that's the intent, but I hear what you're saying.

Finally, Ms. Lawson, you mentioned that a five-year review of the act would be a beneficial thing. A colleague opposite, Mr. Abbott, talked about that as well.

In clause 72 of the bill it says:

> 72. Within five years after this section comes into force, the administration... [of it will] be reviewed by the committee of Parliament that may be designated etc. Were you contemplating something else? Does this not do it for you?

Ms. Philippa Lawson: We were contemplating a perpetual five-year review. The similar clause in Bill C-6 states that the act shall be reviewed every five years after it comes into force.

Mr. Roy Cullen: I see. Thank you.

The Chair: Mr. Topp, did I hear you correctly? You wanted farmers exempted from the provision?

• 1200

Mr. Brian Topp: I'm not proposing a general exemption for all farmers in all their transactions. What I'm suggesting is that particularly larger, commercial farms, ones that are engaged in direct marketing, would be an example of a business that could have a regular cash business in excess of the franchise. For such a member, if they're making regular deposits of $10,000, $12,000, and $15,000 a month—

The Chair: Regardless of what they're growing?

Mr. Brian Topp: I'm just a simple banker, Mr. Chairman. Could you explain to me what you're alluding to?

The Chair: I was just trying to make a point.

Mr. Pillitteri.

Mr. Gary Pillitteri (Niagara Falls, Lib.): Thank you very much, Mr. Chairman. I thought you were going to lead right into me. I thought that was very appropriate.

Mr. Topp, maybe I can relate to what you said more than anyone else around this table, being a businessman. I do know the problems we have to go through sometimes. As it stands right now, anytime you make a deposit of over $10,000 in cash, you have to have that signature. I think that is ludicrous, to say the least, because all you have to do is make a deposit of $9,900 and you don't require a signature; you don't report it. The only thing it does for me is make me make two or three deposit slips. And sometimes for those people who only deposit, which they do—they deal with a lot of cash—it creates more paperwork more than anything else. I don't think that is really... because all of a sudden you are bunching together what you call a money laundering element with regular business people.

I think as we have evolved and moved on as a society, those numbers are not really that hard to come upon for some businesses, some restaurants, in just a day. Every day they do that type of business. Actually, instead of getting out of the businessman's hair, I think we're getting more into it.

When you talk about creating a list, and when we think that we have some 78,000 charitable organizations, I wonder how many different churches we have in there and if there might be a run on people trying to buy churches as an exemption so they will not be checked.

I'd rather not look into that. I'd rather look into finding some way in this bill, through people like yourself, through lending institutions and chartered accountants, to come up with methods and ideas so that instead of creating more work for that business person, and it's “all of a sudden I hear that maybe we should have an individual who has that signing authority”...

Let me put it this way, business people are coming to a point where we have to scale down in order to stay afloat. We don't have to create more jobs and more positions. We're trying to scale down in order to stay afloat because of the expenses we incur. I wonder how we could at this late stage make some amendments or corrections in this bill in order to accommodate legitimate business.

I think we should be looking toward prevention, rather than trying to look at boxes of individuals, what they do, and putting them into categories. I think we should be looking, maybe within our regular system, to see who could be laundering, rather than taking a look at individuals making deposits.

Let's be serious here. Anyone who is laundering money is not going to go and make a deposit of $10,000. That's stupidity to say the least. In laundering money there are many more ways...

If I can say, heck, I'll make two deposits instead of one, surely that individual has many ways of getting around the banking system and legitimizing that money.

We have a world today that is open. Ladies and gentlemen, we're not looking at Canada by itself. When you buy through the Internet, when you're buying and selling in smaller amounts, you could be circling the globe and you could actually launder $10 million in 10 minutes.

So I think what we've done here is just created a jungle of paperwork for legitimate business people. I don't know if you have any answer to it.

Mr. Brian Topp: Mr. Chairman, it's an interesting "is it not true" question, which gives me an opportunity to speak to a common theme in both that comment and the two questions I received earlier. Remember, Mr. Chairman, that the reporting requirement is governed not only by clause 9 of the bill but also by clause 7. According to the regulations, we are required by clause 9 to report every transaction over $10,000, unless we achieve an exemptions list, and we're also required by clause 7 to report any transaction that is in some way suspicious. So, Mr. Chairman, in your example, if a farmer is growing products that are unorthodox and are not approved by Her Majesty the Queen by right of Parliament, that's basically captured by clause 7. So a lot of the potential leakage you're concerned about in an exemptions list is still captured by clause 7 and the current practices of identifying suspicious transactions.

The point I'm making is that as we study how to go forward with the legislation—and this is essentially your point—we should study how we can get rid of egregiously and obviously inappropriate reporting that is simply going to generate a paper burden and unnecessary data, which is a tough proposition in the credit union system, some of which are quite small.

I offered two ways to do that. One is an exemptions list, which I think is the way that seems contemplated by the bill at the moment, although it's not clear there's going to be one. That raises some of the definitional issues I think you're getting at and what happens if we create loopholes here, although I'd argue they're captured by clause 7. As an alternative, I suggested a regime in which perhaps you could get a one-time registration for someone who's reporting regularly.

For an excellent wine grower in the south of Ontario who is doing $10,000 of business every two weeks and is depositing that in registered accounts, his credit union could register that transaction once, until it deviates in some way or until there's something else in the carefully crafted guidelines, which I'm sure we're going to see from FTRAC soon, that would raise a flag saying this is a suspicious transaction. Then on a going-forward basis we're not required to report every cash deposit by every restaurant and every retailer that's before us, but you're still capturing, hopefully, through the due diligence the bill so aggressively imposes on financial institutions most of the transactions you're really interested in.

The Chair: Doesn't it make sense that since financial institutions are the ones receiving a lot of money all the time, they should be doing that, or is it—

Mr. Brian Topp: I'm sorry, Mr. Chairman, I didn't hear you.

The Chair: It's not far-fetched that because you're the recipient of a lot of money and various types of deposits, the government would perhaps ask you to help with this...

Mr. Brian Topp: Mr. Chairman, we are happy to comply with this business. We are already cooperating with the RCMP and with the existing federal legislation. In no way am I saying that we don't want to assist in this issue.

What I'm drawing your eye to is that there may be an unintended consequence in the way the bill and the regulations are currently shaped. You're going to be forcing us to report to you a ton of information that is completely useless to the mission of the bill. That's the basic point. I believe it could be easily managed in such a way that we don't incur a totally unnecessary reporting burden while the government still gets all the data it needs.

The Chair: Your major point is that through exemptions we can achieve that.

Mr. Gary Pillitteri: He doesn't mean only that. What he means also is to have a list and in effect to register once a year, Mr. Chairman. That way, as a legitimate businessman, he doesn't have to report.

Mr. Brian Topp: There would be an exemption or a one-time report that was appropriately framed so that unusual deviations or other suspicious circumstances would raise the flag.

The Chair: Are there any further comments?

Mr. Gary Pillitteri: No, Mr. Chairman. I think it's much more complex, and I don't think we have the time. But I think a bit more work needs to be done on this.

The Chair: Mr. Boudreau.

Mr. Mark Boudreau: I think part of the problem is consistent with what we've seen with government legislation over the last little while when we're asked to respond to something. At no point did the department come to us and say, we have a problem. We've seen this in a number of issues, and it's concerning us in the sense of what the accountants are asked to do or not to do. They put something before us as opposed to saying, we have a money laundering problem. What do you propose? How could we deal with the issue? They were well on the drawing board when the legislation was coming down before we were even consulted on the issue, as opposed to starting from the basic premise: Is there a problem in Canada? Yes. If so, what do you want to do about it? How can the banks, ourselves, or anybody else who's interested in this issue...

We all agree that we want to help the government fight the problem at the end of the day. One of the criticisms we have of the department is that they should come to us much sooner. As it is, they say, “Here it is, folks” at the end of the day; “Is this going to work or not work?”

Mr. Gary Pillitteri: Thank you.

The Chair: Point well taken, Mr. Boudreau.

Likewise when industries do have challenges or feel perhaps that money laundering is a problem in Canada, they could also approach the government and raise that particular issue.

[Translation]

Mr. Loubier.

Mr. Yvan Loubier: Mr. Topp, your Credit Union Central of Canada is required, or rather it can, at its discretion, provide reports on suspicious transactions. It is done on a voluntary basis. Have you taken into account the number of voluntary declarations you have made? If yes, I would like some numbers on that.

Mr. Brian Topp: By way of an example, Mr. Loubier—I am not here to represent the Caisses Desjardins, but we can compare notes—I have seen that in the Desjardins system, which is much bigger than ours, the number of declarations is about 358 for the last two years: 141 in 1998 and 217 in 1999. So there are about 200 to 300 cases per year, under the current system where we are looking for truly suspicious transactions. But there is no doubt that the system towards which we are currently moving will benefit transactions that did not come out. There will be a substantial increase in the number of transactions reported.

Mr. Yvan Loubier: Do you have any idea what that represents in terms of an amount?

Mr. Brian Topp: No, but I could look that information up, Mr. Loubier.

Mr. Yvan Loubier: I think that would be important, because if there are no more declarations than that on a voluntary basis, when calculations show that 17 billion dollars in dirty money is laundered annually in Canada, there is a problem. I don't know your figures. You talked about an average of 140 transactions by Desjardins each year, and there were probably some by the other credit unions and banks.

Mr. Brian Topp: Something like that.

Mr. Yvan Loubier: That's it. It would be interesting to know how many there were in total each year and what amounts were involved. If there were a couple of hundred, that totalled one or two billion dollars, and 17 billion dollars in dirty money is laundered each year, we need measures that are much more...

Mr. Brian Topp: With that question, you are assuming that the billions of dollars are being laundered by the banking system. It is not at all clear that that is the case. There is already a voluntary reporting system for all banks, caisses populaires and credit unions. There are already two acts that govern these transactions and it is not at all clear that the billions of dollars are being laundered by the banking system.

Mr. Yvan Loubier: I am not just talking about the banking system; I am also talking about insurance institutions, financial intermediaries, etc. These declarations must be centralized somewhere. I would be curious to know how many there were and how much they represented. It would be interesting to be able to compare that to the estimates with respect to dirty money that is laundered each year.

I do not think that Mr. Pillitteri's reference to the $10,000 limit is a problem. If the same person makes four or forty $9,900 deposits each week, as you pointed out earlier, they become suspicious transactions that must be identified under clause 7 of the bill. The $10,000 amount is a limit. I imagine that there has to be one somewhere. If I remember correctly, $10,000 is the average amount for drug dealers in the markets in Montreal and Toronto. It is the average weekly amount. Maybe that is why $10,000 was chosen, but I have no idea.

Mr. Brian Topp: What is interesting in his remarks is that he reminds us how easy it could be to play with the rules. The very rules of the game that are in clause 9...

• 1215

Mr. Yvan Loubier: It's a question of judgment. As I said earlier, if the same person deposits $9,900 every day in the same account, it is suspicious. I will give you the example of a criminal biker gang leader who has a huge 20-room mansion, no known employment and a huge bank account. In that case, it's a question of logic, of judgment.

Mr. Brian Topp: It's a question of judgment.

Mr. Yvan Loubier: Yes.

Mr. Brian Topp: You should not be putting in place new rules that are too strict if you cannot come up with a way to manage them, because in the end it always boils down to a question of judgment. In the end, claws 7 and 9 contain the true meaning of the Act. We cannot make a huge investment in clause 9, which would provide us with a huge amount of data that is not useful. In the end, what is at the heart of the bill is always having well-trained staff who understand their obligations under the Act and who use their judgment.

Mr. Yvan Loubier: That would mean that for you clause 7, using judgment and reasonable grounds to suspect would be enough, without the $10,000 limit.

Mr. Brian Topp: Look, it is...

Mr. Yvan Loubier: It holds accountable any person who chooses to let a transaction go through even if he had reasonable doubts as to the origin of the funds.

Mr. Brian Topp: I think we understand the serious nature of the legislation and know that the adoption of this bill will require considerable training for staff in the banking system and in the credit unions throughout Canada to ensure compliance with the Act. We understand why the government is introducing this legislation. The consequences are serious, but at the very least we want to avoid wasting our time. That is more or less our position.

Mr. Yvan Loubier: Thank you.

[English]

The Chair: Mr. Gallaway.

Mr. Roger Gallaway (Sarnia—Lambton, Lib.): I just have one question. I know our witnesses here have already studied this.

To Mr. Topp—and maybe someone else would like to respond—this bill creates a new agency that purports to do a lot of things. In your opinion, will it work?

Mr. Brian Topp: I don't consider myself qualified to judge.

Mr. Roger Gallaway: You should be in politics.

Would anyone else care to comment?

The Chair: He means run in Sarnia.

Mr. Roger Gallaway: We welcome all newcomers.

The Chair: Are there any further comments?

Mr. McKee.

Mr. David McKee: I'd likely give the same comment as Mr. Topp. I think that's an issue for both the officials and the international forces that are at play around this legislation. They're driving some of the obligations that are being imposed on Canadians under this legislation.

Ms. Philippa Lawson: If I might just add, that's the point of the five-year review—to see if it's working.

The Chair: I have a very general question. There's no question there are challenges. Any bill of this nature will create some challenges for government or for individual Canadians, but on the whole, do you think it strikes the right balance between privacy, the administration of business, and individual liberty and freedom on the one side, and combatting the laundering of the proceeds of crime? Do you think it strikes a right balance, in general terms?

Mr. Topp.

Mr. Brian Topp: My first comment, Mr. Chair, is that in a way it's a little hard to judge. As one of my colleagues at the table here has said, it's an unusually vague bill that leaves an awful lot of its substance to regulation.

In a previous life I was involved in doing some of the legislative drafting in a provincial legislature. Our law clerk at that time would have had a hard time with this bill because it delegates so much of its substance to regulation. But maybe this is the new fashion in legislative drafting. I won't comment on that.

If the regulations are carefully crafted and, as my colleague, Ms. Lawson, says, crafted in a transparent manner, and if that is the way they're always going to be done, then potentially it could work fine, bearing in mind the smallest detail, like the one I flagged about ATMs, to the biggest picture of exactly what it is we're collecting here, how it's dealt with, and who uses it. If that's all appropriately tuned as the thing comes into force, potentially it could be fine.

Mr. Loubier mentioned some of the pressures folks are potentially put under by criminals. A mandatory reporting regime, if it's carefully tuned and properly crafted, can be helpful in that way, in the sense that it can remove some element of discretion from the system and thus make the folks in financial industries a little less vulnerable to blackmail and pressure from criminals. In that sense, you could argue it's a step forward.

There are many potential troubles. There are some disturbing elements to the search and seizure provisions that were underlined by a colleague at the table. I return one last time to my obsession that it's an enormously wide net, as currently drafted.

I think, especially because the regulations are apparently being drafted concurrently and will be tabled concurrently, the coming into force will be very quick. I'd urge the committee, at a minimum, to flag some of the issues you've heard about today and you'll hear about in coming days from the department, and take a careful look at those regulations, because they will answer your question.

The Chair: Is there any further comment?

Mr. Colby.

Mr. Everett Colby: I have attended seminars given by police forces around the province of Ontario dealing with this issue, and from law enforcement's point of view, they are extremely happy about this because they do not perceive there being any great difficulty in obtaining information from this centre, which is supposedly going to be accumulated there. Understanding that it is one of the intents of the bill and there have been some safeguards provided within the bill for the release of that information, those limitations do not appear to be well communicated to law enforcement in general.

Additionally, the type of individual needed to staff this centre will have to be well trained in the art and science of detecting and coming up with reasonable grounds of what constitutes a criminal offence, such as money laundering. I hazard to guess that many of these individuals will likely come from law enforcement backgrounds.

From the point of view of privacy and balancing, one would question the propriety. We've seen other issues of tax departments releasing information inappropriately, and there may not be a balance in favour of the individual consumer in terms of privacy, considering who's going to be staffing the centre.

I have just two additional comments, slightly off topic.

Mr. Cullen, you spoke about seizure, and in clause 64, where it talks about privileged documents and how they seem to be limited from the search, it stipulates that only applies to privileged documents in a legal counsel's profession. In both my fraud investigations and certain tax matters I work with, I often have files in my premises that are subject to privilege because I'm acting on behalf of legal counsel.

There doesn't appear to be anything under these search provisions to protect privileged documents that may be in my possession. It only addresses those in the possession of legal counsel themselves.

We're certified general accountants, so as well as chartered accountants, we represent much of the accounting body in Canada, and we would be a good source to consult when trying to determine effective ways for reporting the activity that goes on through business.

Thank you.

The Chair: Do you also cooperate with the RCMP and other bodies in referring what you would consider to be...

Mr. Everett Colby: Are you asking if I'm in favour of cooperation?

The Chair: Yes.

Mr. Everett Colby: I'm in favour of fighting money laundering. My concerns stem more from when we may be on opposite sides. I have worked in conjunction with law enforcement agencies, and there has been no problem in sharing of information in that respect. It just depends on whether or not I'm defending somebody who has been accused of money laundering. I've faced potentially having to report information that came to my attention, in the defence of this client, to a centre that was then free to disclose it to law enforcement that was prosecuting him on the other side. So in that respect, I don't agree with the sharing that would come as a result of this.

The Chair: Okay.

Mr. Cullen.

Mr. Roy Cullen: This has been a good discussion.

With respect to the earlier point, Mr. Colby, about search, certainly the intent—and maybe it needs to be clearer—is that before an authorized person would come to an office to examine documents, there would be dialogue. The agency would try to get the information in a most cooperative way. It would be used as a last resort. Nonetheless, I hear what you're saying.

• 1225

Coming back to the other comment about the regulated amount, let's say it's $10,000. If someone were continually coming under that amount—you know, $9,900 repeatedly—that would under normal circumstances raise a flag of suspicious transactions. So the regulated amount is not the end of it. It's a guide. It's a mandatory reporting, but the agency would be required to look at suspicious transactions of any kind.

Mr. Brian Topp: That is precisely right: you can smurf. You can chop your money laundering amount into pieces, which is the point you were making, and get under the $10,000. Therefore it's a blunt instrument for capturing criminal transactions, but it will sure suck in a lot of legitimate ones. That's the basic problem.

The Chair: Mr. Cullen?

Mr. Roy Cullen: No, I'm here to listen.

Ms. Philippa Lawson: Can I just make one comment in response to your question, Mr. Chairman?

The new centre in this bill will be subject to the Privacy Act, which is a good thing, but we have real problems with the Privacy Act in its current form. It badly needs to be updated and strengthened. For example, if a consumer, an individual, is unnecessarily investigated and suffers some kind of harm or damage, there's no recourse, no redress. There's recourse to the privacy commissioner to investigate and make a report on it, but he has no binding powers. There's no consumer redress for privacy invasions.

The Chair: Are there any further questions? Seeing none, on behalf of the committee, I'd really like to express to you our sincerest gratitude. As I said earlier, you always try to strike the right balance. You've certainly given us a lot of food for thought, and we will certainly take into consideration everything you've raised, with the view of always trying to improve the bill.

Once again, thank you very much for your contribution.

The meeting is adjourned.

The Chair (Mr. Maurizio Bevilacqua (Vaughan—King—Aurora, Lib.)): I'd like to call the meeting to order and to welcome everyone here this afternoon.

As you know, the order of the day is Bill C-22, an act to facilitate combating the laundering of proceeds of crime, to establish the Financial Transactions and Reports Analysis Centre of Canada, and to amend and repeal certain acts in consequence.

We have the pleasure to have with us representatives from the following organizations: the Canadian Institute of Chartered Accounts, the Canadian Bar Association, the National Criminal Intelligence Service from the U.K., and as an individual we have Dr. Mark Zoccolillo.

As you probably know, you have approximately five to seven minutes to make your introductory remarks, and thereafter we'll engage in a question and answer session. This afternoon's session will have a 10-minute round.

We will begin with the Canadian Institute of Chartered Accountants: Mr. Ian Murray, chairman, advisory group on anti-money-laundering legislation; and R. Simon G. Chester, legal counsel. Welcome.

Mr. Ian Murray (Chairman, Advisory Group on Anti-Money-Laundering Legislation, Canadian Institute of Chartered Accountants): Thank you and good afternoon.

Mr. Chairman, members of the committee, on behalf of the Canadian Institute of Chartered Accountants we would like to thank you for allowing us to appear and provide input to the government's proposed legislation to combat money laundering.

My name is Ian Murray, and I am a partner in the firm of KPMG. I chair an advisory group established by the CICA to examine this legislation. With me today is Simon Chester, who is legal counsel to the CICA.

As I think you know, we submitted a brief to the Department of Finance in February that comments on the government's consultation paper on Bill C-22. As the basis for that submission, the CICA drew on the work of the advisory group, which reviewed the consultation paper along with the draft legislation and regulations. Our brief broadly supported the legislation, but we believe it would benefit from some changes.

Our submission dealt with five areas that we want to focus on today: narrowing the scope of the proposed legislation, defining suspicious transaction, addressing the duplication of reporting requirements, restricting powers of access to records, and broadening available defences and protections.

The scope of legislation: I would like to repeat at the outset that the CICA is supportive of the government's proposed legislation and its focus on financial intermediaries. We recognize the importance of having an effective international regime to outlaw money laundering. We believe that financial intermediaries who have direct involvement in financial transactions should have primary responsibility for reporting suspicious transactions. We accept that when a chartered accountant acts as a financial intermediary, he or she should have the same reporting responsibilities as other financial intermediaries.

We understand that the legislation is intended to apply to professionals such as CAs only when they are directly involved in a financial transaction, such as CAs who handle cash for clients or who are in a general management position in a company. This focus is appropriate. Such CAs should know exactly where they stand.

We also understand that the reporting requirements of the legislation are not intended to apply to those who are directly involved in financial transactions within their companies, for example, internal auditors, strategic planners, tax accountants, and system managers. Nor are they intended to apply to CAs acting in an advisory capacity only, essentially those who act in a third-party role providing services to clients, such as auditors, forensic accountants, management consultants, business evaluators, and tax advisers. Notwithstanding the intention, we are concerned that the wording of the proposed legislation and regulations could be interpreted to suggest that the profession as a whole could be subject to these provisions.

Paragraph 5(i) provides for part 1 of the act to apply to persons engaged in a business, profession, or activity described in the regulations. An existing regulation, which we understand will be retained in the new legislation, indicates that the act applies to every person who is engaged in a business, profession, or activity in the course of which cash is received for payment or transfer to a third party. We are concerned that this wording can be read too broadly. It's not clear that the act would apply solely to these individuals who are directly involved in such transactions. It could be interpreted to apply also to all individuals who belong to a profession in which some individuals may engage in such transactions.

This concern is exacerbated by wording contained in clause 7 of the bill, which requires reporting by persons or entities of suspicious transactions that occur in the course of their activities. We believe this wording is so open-ended that it does not limit the reporting requirement to professional accountants who are directly involved in financial transactions.

We are therefore concerned that the broad wording of the existing regulation, taken together with clause 7, could be interpreted as applying the reporting requirements much more broadly to the accounting profession as a whole.

One simple example of the types of problems that would arise under this broad interpretation would be when forensic accountants are asked to assist a client to investigate a potential irregularity. Any forensic accountant would be placed in a position of conflict between assisting his client and reporting to the centre and may have to decline the engagement. The client would be deprived of any needed assistance. There are many other situations where, in the absence of clarification, CAs could be drawn into the scope of the reporting requirements.

However, the proposed legislation includes a provision, under paragraph 5(j), allowing for regulations to be made that will limit the application of part l to defined activities of businesses and professions. We recommend that a regulation be introduced to clarify that the scope of the legislation will apply only to those professional accountants who act as financial intermediaries.

We therefore propose that the regulation in paragraph 73(1)(b) that relates to paragraph 5(j) of the bill contain the following wording: part l of the act applies to every professional accountant who, in the course of engaging in a business or profession, receives cash for payment or transfer to a third party.

We believe that the intended subjects of the new law should be determined by activity, not status; not by the nature of our profession but by the activities we are involved in. This change would make it clear that the legislation will apply only to those directly involved in financial transactions.

We welcome the assurance provided this morning by senior officials regarding the intention to ensure that the legislation will only apply to professionals acting as financial intermediaries.

We were also pleased that officials this morning confirmed that the regulations will indicate very clearly that the reporting obligations will not apply to the auditing function of the accounting profession.

The second issue is the definition of suspicious transaction. Another significant concern is that neither the proposed legislation nor the regulations contain a definition of suspicious transaction. The success of the mandatory reporting regime will depend on the extent to which clear and unambiguous criteria can be developed. In their absence there will be unnecessary, unwarranted, and inconsistent reporting because all professionals will have to make a significant judgment call on what they believe to be suspicious.

Although the reporting centre will develop guidelines that help identify appropriate characteristics and circumstances, these guidelines would not have the force of law. We think clarity belongs in the law and not in the guidelines.

We therefore recommend that the regulations contain a prescribed definition of suspicious transaction, one that sets out clear criteria. A clear and unambiguous definition of suspicious transaction is a tall order. It should be supported by examples, situations, and case studies to illustrate when reporting is required and when it's not.

Should interim guidelines be put in place for any reason, they should ultimately be included in the regulations so that they are subject to public scrutiny and input and have the force of law.

Furthermore, we recommend that the effective date for commencement of reporting of suspicious transactions be deferred until criteria have been established, and examples, and so on.

Third, on duplication of reporting requirements, we are also concerned that there is a lack of clarity with respect to professionals such as CAs who may be working for entities specifically covered under clause 5 and who are directly involved in financial transactions.

On the one hand, such CAs have a reporting role as an employee working in an entity covered by the legislation. On the other hand, they have a responsibility to report suspicious transactions as a professional accountant. This is confusing and would appear to be a duplication of the reporting requirement that applies only to individuals who happen to be both employees of such entities and professional accountants.

Should such an individual report to their supervisor, they are protected by subclause 75(2) from punishment as an employee. However, they could still be open to punishment for failing to report to the centre as a professional accountant. We believe the protections afforded the employee should clearly apply to protect the CA, who is the same person in such situations.

Fourth, on restricting powers of access, the compliance measures in clauses 62 to 65 allow an authorized person from the reporting centre to examine the records and inquire into the business affairs of any person or entity referred to in clause 5 for the purpose of ensuring compliance. We are concerned that these appear to be very broad powers, allowing access to all records, not just those relating to financial intermediation activities, and without a warrant. If the applicability of part 1 of the legislation is not clarified as indicated earlier, we are concerned that these powers could be interpreted to apply broadly to all members of the profession, not merely those involved in relevant activities.

We therefore recommend that the proposed legislation be clarified to restrict the powers of access to only those records that relate to financial intermediation activities. We also think such access should be allowed only under authorization of a warrant.

Last, on defences and protections, we would like to make some comments about the defences and protections available under part 5 of the legislation.

Other jurisdictions include a defence for reasonable excuse—for example, where the fear of physical violence or other menaces makes it unreasonable for someone to report or to refuse to act for a client. There may be circumstances when third parties are able to deduce the source that gave rise to an investigation. While there may be certain defences under common law similar to reasonable excuse, this defence is not available under the proposed legislation. We are also concerned that the legislation does not provide protectional remedies to those who lose their job as a result of making a report in good faith.

Furthermore, the legislation is not clear as to how to deal with situations where the legislation conflicts with other legislation requiring confidentiality, such as the Quebec charter of rights and freedoms.

Therefore, we recommend a reasonable excuse defence be included in the proposed legislation, along with additional protection for reporters.

Finally, we recommend that it be amended to deal with situations where the legislation conflicts with other statutes requiring confidentiality.

In closing, let me stress again that we support the intent of this proposed legislation, that it's applied to those who are directly involved in financial intermediary transactions. However, we believe the wording of the legislation lacks clarity in prescribing who within the CA profession must report. We believe this is a significant issue and strongly encourage you to use clause 73 to clarify the activities to which the legislation would apply for the CA profession.

• 1545

We also strongly urge you to include a clear, unambiguous definition of suspicious transaction in the legislation so that those with the obligation to report will do so under consistent criteria.

We appreciate the opportunity to discuss the bill with you, and we would be happy to answer any questions you have.

Thank you.

The Chair: Thank you, Mr. Murray and Mr. Chester.

We'll now hear from the Canadian Bar Association: Mr. Eugene Meehan, president; Greg DelBigio, member, national criminal justice section; and Ms. Joan Bercovitch, senior director, legal and governmental affairs. Welcome.

[Translation]

Ms. Joan Bercovitch (Senior Director and Lawyer, Legal and Governmental Affairs, Canadian Bar Association): Thank you. On behalf of the Canadian Bar Association, I would like to thank you for the opportunity to appear before you today.

The Canadian Bar Association represents 36,000 lawyers across Canada. The Association's objectives include improvement in the law and in the administration of justice. Our presentation today reflects these objectives.

Our proposals will be presented today by our president, Mr. Eugene Meehan, from Ottawa and by Mr. Greg DelBigio, from Vancouver. Mr. Meehan will start and Mr. DelBigio will present the last section. Both will be available to answer questions.

Mr. Eugene Meehan (President, Canadian Bar Association): As President of the Canadian Bar Association, I appreciate the opportunity to appear before you today.

[English]

We would like to make three preliminary but crucial points on this legislation.

First, cabinet security and confidentiality is important to you. It is important to how government works, it is important to how government should work, and it is in the ultimate interest of the public and their protection. I do not have to tell you the reasons that is important. For all of those same reasons, solicitor-client confidentiality is as important to lawyers and to clients, and likewise, it is in the ultimate interest of the public and their protection. If government and cabinet confidentiality is important to you, then treat solicitor-client confidentiality as important, as sacred, as sacrosanct, and also as protected.

Secondly, just as the state has no place in the confidentiality of the bedroom, the state has no place in the confidentiality of the solicitor-client privilege—no place. Both are sacrosanct, both are sacred, and both must be protected.

[Translation]

Third, the reason why all this is so important is that without an independent bar and without and independent judiciary, there is no democracy. It's that important, and also that simple.

[English]

If you look at any country in the world and ask, are they a democracy, you have to ask only two questions: do they have a completely independent bar, and do they have a completely independent judiciary? Everything else follows.

Canada is special. We have a bill of rights; we have an entrenched, written Charter of Rights and Freedoms. That means something to clients, to our democracy.

We therefore urge you not to pass Bill C-22. This is a dangerous and misguided effort. It is dangerous to Canadian society; it is dangerous to Canadian democracy.

[Translation]

Thank you.

[English]

Mr. Greg DelBigio (Member, National Criminal Justice Section, Canadian Bar Association): I also would like to thank you for the opportunity to be present to make submissions. Our summary of recommendations is set out in the brief.

Underlying that summary is the fundamental concern about protection of the solicitor-client relationship. That relationship is of course premised upon privilege, confidentiality, and the protection of privacy. We are of the view that the bill, as it stands, would seriously undermine those foundations of the relationship.

The bill as it stands has all of the earmarks of criminal law—that is, it has to do with criminal law enforcement, as evidenced in the objectives—but it offers none of the protections of criminal law. So we are of the view that within that context of criminal law enforcement, lawyers will be compelled to act in a manner that is directly contrary to the solicitor-client relationship. It will compel lawyers to act in a manner that is contrary to the law that recognizes the importance of that relationship. The law will undermine the right of Canadians to receive legal advice knowing that those communications are fully protected by privilege and confidentiality.

The Canadian Bar Association acknowledges international obligations in respect of money laundering, and that it is important to respond to money laundering within Canada and globally. However, effective law already exists in part XII.2 of the Criminal Code. Provisions within that part govern lawyers, govern others, and prohibit money laundering. So the conduct that is of concern is captured by already existing law.

We are concerned about the large cost that would be associated with the administration of the centre, and there's an associated cost that would attach to a legitimate business that is carried out on a day-to-day basis within Canada. The added cost can only serve to undermine the effort of Canadian business to effectively participate in a competitive international environment.

In summary of the introductory remarks, the Canadian Bar Association is very firmly and strongly of the view that lawyers must be exempt from the bill. Anything else will undermine the relationship that has been long recognized in law.

Thank you.

The Chair: Thank you very much, Mr. DelBigio.

Dr. Mark Zoccolillo.

Mr. Mark Zoccolillo (Individual Presentation): Thank you for inviting me here today. I'm going to talk about the results of a recent study we did on how common a problem drug use is among Quebec adolescents, which I suppose is one of the main reasons you would be considering a bill such as Bill C-22.

I would like to acknowledge my co-authors Frank Vitaro and Richard Tremblay from the University of Montreal. You have a copy of the study. I'm going to give you just a portion of it.

This is a sample of adolescents who are representative of the province of Quebec. They come from throughout the province. They were studied from 1995 to 1997. As you can see, they were mostly 15 to 16 years of age. Most of them were in secondary three or secondary four, which would be ninth or tenth grade. I want to emphasize that. We're not talking about college students, we're taking about adolescents.

As I said, they are representative of the province, they're not a particularly selected sample other than to be representative. It's around 900 boys and 900 girls.

What we did was ask them about their drug use, along with many other different things. The drug use was through a self-administered questionnaire. They filled out the questionnaire in the home, but away from their parents, and they were promised confidentiality. What I'm going to emphasize most are the drugs rather than the alcohol, except for comparison to alcohol.

I'd like you to notice that with regard to drug use, about half the adolescents have tried illegal drugs by this age in Quebec. Much more importantly, about one-third of the boys and girls have used illegal drugs more than five times. The more than five times was the cutoff that we used to ask the more important question, which was, how often and under what circumstances did you use these drugs?

I would also like you to notice, of course, the most commonly used drug of all is marijuana, and it's the drug I'm going to focus on. The second most common drug used by one in five adolescents was hallucinogens, which also includes phencyclidine, or PCP, a particularly dangerous drug.

Now I'm just briefly going to show this overhead on alcohol, because I'm going to compare it to drugs. These are adolescents who had drunk alcohol more than five times, which is about 60% of the sample by this time. I'd like you to notice two things.

The first is the third line, about ever being drunk while at school. Most adolescents have not gone to school drunk, even though they have drunk alcohol.

The second thing is the bottom set, which is the number of problems, the sum of the other things that we had above. These include playing sports and drinking alcohol, being drunk at school, getting into fights, driving a motor vehicle while drunk, having arguments with parents, having trouble with the police, having arguments with friends, and seeking help.

As you can see, most adolescents had either zero or one of those, and for those who had one, it was usually “while playing sports”. Very few had four or more. The importance of this is the comparison to drugs.

This is the pattern for drug use, which as you see is considerably different from the pattern for alcohol use. This is a third of all adolescents. I want to emphasize it's not a third of those who use drugs, but one in three adolescents in Quebec. The drug in question that we're largely talking about is marijuana, and you can see a very different pattern.

The most common thing they do is go to school high, go to school stoned. They play sports under the influence, and this includes riding bicycles, skateboarding, and swimming, and they use it in the morning. Now, this is quite important, because it means if you start off in the morning high, you're high all day.

Somewhat less common, but still worrisome, was driving a motor vehicle while stoned.

Now I want to also take you to the bottom, the number of drug problems. Remember, for alcohol most adolescents reported zero or one, and very few four or more. The pattern is very different for drug use. Here, the common way that adolescents use drugs, and again it's mostly marijuana, is to engage in a number of these behaviours, with almost half the boys having four or more, and about a third of the girls having four or more. So there's a big difference in how it's used compared to alcohol, and it's quite worrisome.

The next thing we asked was how often they were using it. Again, we can compare drugs to alcohol, and you can look just at the boys' column, because it's very similar for girls. We asked the question, at the time you used the most, how often were you using? Many of these adolescents, even though they were 15 or 16, had started using when they were 13 or 14, so there was a one- or two-year history of drug use. We asked about the peak, when they were using most frequently.

If you look at the alcohol column, you can see that most boys and girls reported that even at the time they were using the most, it was less than once a week or once a week—that is, weekend use. That is not the case, though, for drugs, for marijuana. In this particular case, very few reported that at the time of maximum use they were using less than once a week. The majority of boys and close to the majority of girls had progressed at some point or another to using three times a week or more.

This is particularly worrisome, because this means they are using it frequently, several times a week, and to repeat, they were going to school stoned, using it while involved with sports, and using it in the morning.

To conclude, the problem of the use of alcohol and drugs is relatively common in Quebec adolescents, and particularly worrisome with regard to injury at relatively higher rates when driving a motor vehicle while under the influence, and playing sports, including bicycling or rollerblading, while under the influence.

Attending school while high from drugs is common, with one in four students having been to school high at any time, and one in six in the past six months. The pattern of drug use, particularly cannabis, marijuana, is quite different from that of alcohol use. Alcohol use is more common but appears limited to weekend use, and most alcohol users report no or one problem.

The normal pattern of marijuana use is to use it several times a week to go to school high, to play sports high, to spend much of the day high. The most commonly used drug is marijuana, and it's a myth that most drug use by teenagers nowadays is experimental and limited to occasional marijuana use at parties.

I'd also like to add that there have been a number of monitoring studies here in Canada and in the United States where they look every year at the prevalence of use. There's been essentially a doubling of prevalence of use of marijuana over the past decade. Ten years ago, these figures, in terms of having ever used marijuana, were about half; instead of being about half of the population, it's about 25%. So there seems to have been a considerable increase over the last decade.

It's a serious problem. We see it at the Montreal Children's Hospital. Adolescents are using drugs quite commonly. They are cheaply available and easily available. Their possession is infrequently prosecuted by the police, and the adolescents know this. It seems to be quite tolerated.

I would just end by saying we certainly have a considerable problem. There are probably a number of different ways this can be addressed. You have a copy of the paper there, and I'll be glad to answer other questions later.

Thank you.

The Chair: Thank you very much, Dr. Zoccolillo.

We will now hear from the National Criminal Intelligence Service, the deputy head of the economic crime unit, Martin Comley, welcome.

Mr. Martin Comley (Deputy Head, Economic Crime Unit, National Criminal Intelligence Service (U.K.)): Thank you. I think I'm distinctly privileged, Mr. Chairman and members of the committee, to be invited here. It's a long way from my home, and I hope I have something very useful to contribute to you.

I will first give you some terminology changes, because I will refer to an FIU, a financial intelligence unit, as your centre is often referred to around the world. So if you can indulge me on that, it will be helpful.

I have prepared a copy of my presentation. I hope it's been made available to you. I apologize, there is only a copy in English. You may find it useful because there are some statistics in there I will refer to as I go through it.

I'd first like to put the U.K.'s FIU into context. Ours is not a stand-alone organization, it forms part of the National Criminal Intelligence Service. This service has been functioning for some eight years and was reconstituted two years ago. We've moved away from government; we're an independent body now, not a police service.

We have approximately 650 staff to look at serious crime intelligence as it affects the United Kingdom. Of that, we're drawn from 17 different agencies. We're truly a multi-agency functionality. We also house the United Kingdom's response to INTERPOL, and for our European parts, Europol as well. We're split into different functions. We have an international division, intelligence development, and the United Kingdom division.

I'm going to focus primarily on the United Kingdom division, of which we're a part. We've split the country up into geographical regions, where our serious crime is looked at on a criminal basis. In the strategic and specialists intelligence branch, we look at things the other way round. We look at it from the crime back toward the criminal. So we link two functions of intelligence together to focus on serious crime.

The strategic and specialist intelligence branch has many specialist functions. We look at organized crime, immigration crime, vehicle crime, West African crime, drugs, counterfeit currency, serious sex offenders, and kidnap and extortion. We have a football section, which unfortunately deals with our football hooligans, Turkish intelligence, and cocaine intelligence.

I only mention all of these departments because the main basis or the underlying cause of this is money, so there's a great overlap with what my unit, the economic crime unit, does—the FIU for the United Kingdom. We are the central receiving point for suspicious transactions within the United Kingdom. We research these and disseminate them. We disseminate them to designated investigators around the country, a point I'll come back to.

Looking at our legislative approach, we criminalized money laundering through various acts over many years, acts that we've had to redraft and amend as the years go on. We're still undertaking those amendments today.

Out of the criminalization of money laundering come the disclosure provisions. Those disclosure provisions affect everybody. There are no exemptions in relation to the disclosure provisions. We have a suspicion-based reporting regime through which we do not define suspicion itself; we rely on guidance notes for the particular industries to identify what may be suspicious.

Having heard from your colleagues in the law society here, I'd say there is one exemption: we do have a specific exemption in relation to legal privilege, and that is clearly defined within the act. We have a secondary law that goes on and looks at the systems, the anti-money-laundering systems that financial institutions should invoke within their premises as a secondary way of policing this.

I'll come back to staffing with our unit now. The economic crime unit itself is multi-agency, like the organization. We draw staff from primarily six separate agencies: the police; the customs service; the benefits agency, or welfare; the Financial Services Authority, or the regulators; the gaming board; and Inland Revenue. We also have a support staff, an analytical staff, within that. The current staffing of the unit is 27, but is being reviewed at the moment and is likely to increase in the near future.

The need for multi-agency has been highlighted over the years. That's a recent innovation for us. To evaluate suspicion-based reporting, you need a broad experience. I have a broad policing experience, but that doesn't give me customs experience and it doesn't give me revenue experience, etc. To combine those tools helps us to evaluate that intelligence and place it with its correct investigative body.

I'll very briefly, then, go on to say that there is a need to interface at the domestic level among the various government departments, that being the Treasury, the Ministry of the Interior, and the like, not only for bringing forward legislation but for seeing that legislation goes forward and goes forward properly. Currently we are subject to a review by a cabinet office in order to see that we are correctly on course and are still proceeding in the direction our government sees fit.

Financial services authorities themselves must play an important role in this, because they're involved daily in the financial sector and the policing of that sector.

Last but not least, there is the financial sector itself. I think the only point I stress out of this is that it's not a policing function alone. The police cannot tackle this by themselves.

I'll now trouble you with some statistics, I'm afraid. At the bottom of page 4, you see the bar chart that shows the disclosures as they've been made in the United Kingdom. In our early years, we started with about 600. Then, we spoke directly to the directors of the four main High Street banks. That was the limit of our knowledge of money laundering and financial crime as it involved this sector at the time. Our experience grew and so did the experience of the financial sector.

In 1990 we formed something called the Joint Money Laundering Steering Group. This was as a result of pressure from the financial sector, which was asking questions like, “What is suspicion?” and “Can you help define suspicion?”, in order to make the appropriate reports.

This round-table body got together and formed the first guidance notes in 1990. I must say in hindsight that they were somewhat naive, but they were naive based on the experience we had at that time. Those guidance notes now fill an A-4 ring binder about one inch or two and a half centimetres thick. Again, they're continually evolving as we gain more experience in this.

You'll see two significant changes in the bar charts: 1990 to 1991, where we went from 2,000 disclosures to 4,500 disclosures; and then a significant rise from 1991 to 1992, from 4,500 to approximately 12,000. These rises were caused by proper training taking place within the financial sector. They were directed properly toward the staff who have an interface with the customers, either directly or through a backroom function. You can see a significant rise that really hasn't tailed off ever since, and we've averaged about 14,000 disclosures since then. We break them down by sector on the following charts.

Another function the FIU really undertakes is not just to see who's disclosing, but, most importantly, who's not disclosing. Here we have a close interface with the financial service regulator.

There is room for improvement in most jurisdictions—and I include mine in that. It's only with correct analysis of statistics that you can see where there is the room for improvement. And by "improvement", I don't necessarily mean the prosecution of particular offenders. If they're criminal in their intent, yes, of course they should. It may be by way of education training, and that needs a joint dialogue.

As I said, the economic crime unit itself receives, researches, and disseminates intelligence from all parties, including regulators and others, including the lawyers, accountants, and insurance agents. We disseminate that information to designated bodies within the police customs crime squad, which is a national function in the United Kingdom. Each of the staff has been specially trained to undertake that function. It's very different from the normal policing function. A report of suspicion is not an allegation of crime, so it needs to be handled differently, and the staff need to be aware of that to handle those disclosures.

We have special arrangements with other bodies that have an interest in crime. In particular, I've listed here the Benefits Agency, or the welfare system, and the Inland Revenue. This is not an open, direct dialogue. We have to assess whether or not there is a criminal intent within this and that these are criminal proceeds before we have a dialogue with these agencies.

Last but not least, I include on there our foreign counterparts, a growing part of our work.

If you'll allow me, I'd like to make reference to the Egmont Group, a non-political group that set about in 1995 to see where the FIUs were going. Are we functioning properly? Can we communicate? Many of us, as we've gone into these laws, have looked quite domestically—and rightfully domestically—at our own problems. But the problem we're dealing with in crime is international, so we have to look at the legislation and make sure we have adequate and proper gateways where necessary in order to communicate with our counterparts.

I think it's important for my point here to stress the difference between the sharing of intelligence, defining what intelligence is, and proper judicial process. What I'm talking about here is not to usurp proper judicial process that will go before a court. This is to make the centres or the FIUs able to do their job properly in evaluating suspicion and making that available to the proper law enforcement agencies in order that they can gather the evidence correctly.

The first meeting in 1995 looked to 24 jurisdictions and 7 international organizations. At the time, 14 could have been defined as FIUs.

The Egmont Group splits itself really primarily into three areas, and now maybe four: legal, technology and training, and the last is outreach, or who's next and who else we should be communicating with. The U.K. chairs the training subgroup. For that, we have meetings with our counterparts at which we're not swapping the detail of legislation but are sharing with each other how we can share intelligence, what our confines are, what our powers are, and how we can make the best of financial intelligence on a world scale.

I include at the bottom of this page a little overview of how the Egmont Group has seen it. We want an exchange of information, increased effectiveness, and greater coordination. We don't make any distinction as to who oversees the FIU. For me, arguably we are a policing FIU. Others come under ministries. Others come under central banks. Others come under a ministry of the interior or ministry of justice. The importance is what function they fulfil. Are they specialized in anti-money-laundering? Are they the central receiving point for suspicious transactions or unusual transactions? Do they process and evaluate, and do they disseminate or investigate that intelligence?

That's the loose definition of what an FIU is and how we look at it.

When you're looking at your own, it's very important to remember the national context. I say that because it's very easy for countries to visit other countries and to say this is the way you should do it because it works for them. That doesn't mean it will necessarily work for you. You have to adapt it to your local circumstances. The importance is that all agencies must work together, and there is no right location for this.

In 1995, 14 units met the definition. In 1999, 48 units met the definition of a required FIU. There are 17 still currently under consideration.

Thank you for listening to me. That was a very quick talk round on the U.K.'s and the internationals' approach.

Thank you very much.

The Chair: Thank you very much for that, Mr. Comley, and for taking the time to give us your perspective on this particular issue.

We will now proceed to the question and answer session, and I believe we'll start with Mr. Abbott, for a ten-minute round.

Mr. Jim Abbott (Kootenay—Columbia, Canadian Alliance): I found the data presented by Dr. Zoccolillo to be very compelling. I think it perhaps answers one of the questions that was raised on page 3 of the Canadian Bar Association's submission. Reading from the second paragraph on that page, the Canadian Bar Association says:

> The large and intrusive state apparatus being proposed and the cost to taxpayers for the establishment of the Financial Transactions and Reports Analysis Centre to address a problem that we believe reflects a relatively minor portion of business activity in Canada lead us to conclude that the possible salutary results of Bill C-22 are outweighed by its predictable deleterious effects.

I would like to suggest to the people making the presentation on behalf of the Canadian Bar Association that, indeed, what we saw on this screen is just a very small part, and an exceptionally important part: the young people of our nation. I'm not saying it's not important, but this is just a small part of what we're attempting to get at here.

While I find myself having some feeling of sympathy for the position of the Canadian Bar Association, particularly in dealing with the principles involved, I don't want to cut you off and not give you an opportunity to respond to me, but I think Mr. Comley might be able to give us some help—or at least give me some help—in understanding. If we go to page 5 of his presentation, he shows that there is disclosure and feedback between accountants and lawyers and the economic crime unit. I think he did refer to the fact that there is some kind of organization or some kind of arrangement between his organization and the legal profession.

I certainly would like to have a response from the Canadian Bar Association, but I'm also very interested in what Mr. Comley might be able to add to this dialogue in terms of how the problems that are seen by the bar association have been overcome in a practical way in the U.K.

Mr. Eugene Meehan: I also found Dr. Zoccolillo's remarks very interesting, and I found them interesting in this particular context. The questionnaire that was put out by Dr. Zoccolillo and his colleagues was filled out by the individuals away from home, and complete confidentiality was promised to those individuals. This bill is now, like Dr. Zoccolillo, going back to those teenagers and saying “Yes, I know we promised you confidentiality, and I know you only gave us those answers, at some personal risk, on the basis of guaranteed confidentiality by me and my colleagues. But I am now going to tell your parents and I am now going to fill out a form and give it to the police, and you will be charged with a criminal offence.” That's exactly what this bill does. It breaches the confidence that clients, Canadians, have in their lawyers.

Take yourself back to your own childhood or to the childhood of your colleagues. There are youth who have experience with marijuana. There are also youth that have experience with sexual intimacy. When a young woman decides to have intimate sexual relations with a young man, she trusts that physically that is between them. Imagine her horror to find out that he has videotaped their escapades and played them back later to his friends. It's like a nuclear bomb going off in her head. That's exactly what this bill does. It blows away solicitor-client privilege and confidentiality. Canadians cannot have confidence where they should have confidence.

I pass now to my colleague, Mr. DelBigio.

Mr. Greg DelBigio: If I may, just briefly, with regard to the recognized importance of the solicitor-client relationship, the question is, should it be displaced? Is there good and compelling reason to displace it in favour of a better objective? While those statistics are of interest, the question then becomes, will those statistics be in fact affected by including lawyers within this bill? Conversely stated, I say there's certainly no basis to think that those statistics will be affected by exempting lawyers. Indeed, there's no empirical data to suggest that those statistics will be affected if lawyers are specifically excluded. Having regard to very recent law, a bill, such as it is structured, runs the very great risk of being struck down, at least in part, to the extent that it runs afoul of the solicitor-client relationship.

So having regard to that, the question is, is it necessary to include lawyers? I say no.

Mr. Jim Abbott: How does Mr. Comley and his organization get around this thorny problem?

Mr. Martin Comley: First, the law's already there. I have to be blunt about that.

Mr. Jim Abbott: Yes.

Mr. Martin Comley: We went through similar problems in the early nineties and started a dialogue in about 1993 with the Law Society for England and Wales. Having had the law introduced, we agreed that the only way to take this forward was to act jointly.

The law society produced guidance notes of its own for its own profession. Guidance notes in themselves are actually quite dry and quite meaningless unless you follow them up with some intent. What we did after that was engage in a series of road shows with regional law society associations within the country, making joint presentations in relation to this. These are usually staffed by a member of my office, a member of the law society, and a practising lawyer. So you have a balanced view across the spectrum of where this should stand.

This equally applies to the accountancy profession. We engaged in the same way.

This has been a continuing dialogue. In fact, last month we finished a series of three presentations with the Law Society for Scotland, and we will be engaging in another series of those later in the year for England and Wales. So it's by dialogue and acceptance.

There is a need to protect legal privilege. I would never disagree with that. I say that what privilege is is clearly defined in the legislation. However, confidentiality is overridden with our legislation.

Mr. Jim Abbott: Would the law society see that there might be some advantage in working with the drafters of this legislation to arrive at a position not too dissimilar to that?

With respect, I'm not crazy about the examples you've used. I find them a little inflammatory. I think that if the client is apprised of your reporting responsibility, unlike the example you were using of the videotaping, it is the “Here's the camera, so now let's get on with it” kind of approach. Surely to goodness there's a way to work around this problem.

The reason I refer to the statistics is to say that the whole issue of money laundering directly relates to international organized crime and the scourge it is becoming in even the smallest centres in Canada. We have to get serious about this, and we have to give our law enforcement officers the ability to strain out the necessary information in order to be able to get the job done.

I would feel a whole lot more charitable toward the Canadian Bar Association if you were sitting here saying, this is the principle, and we want to get as close as we can. Here are some ways in which we can do it. What I'm hearing you say is, forget it. I'm not sure that's really helpful to this process.

Mr. Eugene Meehan: Let me respond in two ways. First, the examples I gave are not inflammatory. They are real. They have occurred. There is a breach of confidentiality.

Second, your question to Mr. Comley was, can we go along with the U.K. position? The answer is no. The reason is this. From my accent you may accurately take it that I am originally from there. I'm a graduate in law from the University of Edinburgh. The U.K. does not have a bill of rights. The U.K. does not have a charter of rights and freedoms. The U.K. has no entrenched guarantee of charter democracy. Canada is special. Canada has a Charter of Rights and Freedoms. If you want, there's a mirror image to that. Not only is there a charter of rights and responsibilities, but also there's a charter of obligations and responsibilities behind the freedoms. Canada is different. We are the envy of the world in terms of our democracy.

Third, the criminal court deals with this appropriately. We have heard no indication that the criminal court is not sufficient, not proper, and not sufficiently far-reaching. We believe the criminal court provisions do work—we are not told otherwise by anybody here—and that the criminal court provisions as presently drafted sufficiently protect clients.

This isn't about lawyers. I am in the public service. I serve Canadians. It's about them. If, as you suggest, Mr. Abbott, clients are advised, “You understand I'm under some reporting provisions here”, let's be realistic, they are out the door. They're not going to come to my office or anybody else's office. They will go elsewhere outside of Canada.

I would ask you to consider that Canada is special and has a Charter of Rights and Freedoms. Let's protect that, let's protect democracy, and let's still maintain the Criminal Code and let the Criminal Code do its work.

The Chair: Thank you, Mr. Abbott.

Mr. Marceau.

[Translation]

Mr. Richard Marceau (Charlesbourg, BQ): I'd like to thank all our witnesses for appearing today. Welcome to the Finance Committee. I am particularly pleased to welcome Mr. Chester with whom I had the opportunity to work in Toronto. Mr. Chester, welcome.

Mr. Meehan, I found your presentation quite interesting. As I understand, if you had a choice, first, you would eliminate Bill C- 22. Second, you would perhaps agree with Bill C-22, if it didn't apply to lawyers. Third, you would perhaps agree with Bill C-22, if it included the twelve amendments you mentioned. Is that correct?

Mr. Eugene Meehan: That's correct.

Mr. Richard Marceau: You want lawyers to be exempted from the application of this legislation?

Mr. Eugene Meehan: It's not so much for lawyers as for their clients. It's the clients who are important, not the lawyers themselves.

Mr. Richard Marceau: Okay. I often say jokingly that, as professionals, lawyers are a bit like Quebeckers in Canada: they always want to be distinct.

I would be interested to know why you come before us to tell us that this legislation should not apply to lawyers. Tomorrow, chartered accountants could very well come and tell us that, according to the same principle, the bill should not apply to their clients.

Mr. Eugene Meehan: It's completely different because accountants don't have the same responsibilities. In fact, accountants are bound by a disclosure requirement. We are not. We are bound by a confidentiality requirement.

Mr. Richard Marceau: Yes.

• 1630

Mr. Eugene Meehan: Whatever happens is between us and our client. It's completely different. It's not that, as lawyers, we are special. It's just that when a client decides to consult a lawyer, not an accountant, he or she expects the confidentiality of such a relationship to be preserved.

Mr. Richard Marceau: Fine. But if the client is forewarned about doing something foul, about laundering money, wouldn't it be appropriate for him to know that the door would be closed and that, if he does consult a lawyer, such a transaction will be reported to the Center or the government—whatever we might call it?

Mr. Eugene Meehan: Every bar in Canada, be it in Ontario, in Manitoba, in Saskatchewan or elsewhere, has regulations to that very end.

Mr. Richard Marceau: Okay.

Mr. Eugene Meehan: It's covered either by the bar regulations, or by the Criminal Code.

Mr. Richard Marceau: Yes. In fact, as an aside, between you and me, this is a very boring course, especially in Ontario. Indeed, if the requirement is already there, if the requirement is already in the lawyers' code of conduct, what is the... As I understand, what you are saying is that if the requirement is already in the code of conduct, its inclusion in the bill can be questioned. Is that what you are saying?

Mr. Eugene Meehan: That's it.

Mr. Richard Marceau: Okay. So, conversely, if it does not add much, if the requirement is already there, what risk is there to include it in the bill?

Mr. Eugene Meehan: There is a difference. According to the code of conduct, we are required to disclose such things to the Bar Association. We are not required to go to the police.

Mr. Richard Marceau: Fine, but the Bar Association is a large bureaucracy. God knows it's slow and there is a lot of wasted time there. Papers are lost. The last time I registered as a member of the Law Society of Upper Canada, I had to call three times before getting my bill. I'd say this is not the most dynamic bureaucracy. Once the bar is advised, what happens? Who is informed?

Mr. Eugene Meehan: A lawyer is under two obligations, one vis- à-vis the bar and the other vis-à-vis the Criminal Code. Our position is that the Criminal Code and the bar's code of conduct are enough. We don't need the government in the office when we meet our clients. A lawyer-client relationship, be it professional or sexual, is their business. It's not the government's business. We see this as an intrusion of the federal government in that relationship.

Mr. Richard Marceau: I find it rather difficult, like my colleague, Mr. Abbott, to associate a professional and a sexual relationship for several reasons, particularly because in the second case, it can be more pleasant.

I'd like to come back to another subject you have raised, the issue of confidentiality. You said that one the problems with Bill C-22 is the issue of confidentiality, not only the lawyer-client privilege, but also in a general way. It would send a few shivers down your spine. Are you telling me that as far as you are concerned, it's not enough that the bill stipulates that the Protection of Privacy Act applies?

Mr. Eugene Meehan: It's not enough because it's indicated that it applies only to this section. Now, that applies also to the remainder of the legislation.

Mr. Richard Marceau: Very well.

This morning, we heard officials from the Finance Department who came to make a presentation. I asked them a question which I'm going to ask again to Mr. Comley. I said that the protection granted to Canadians would be guaranteed, through the Protection of Privacy Act and because of the fact that the Access to Information Act would apply to the proposed Center. However, inasmuch some information given to the Center could be passed on to a similar entity in another country, isn't there a risk that what can't be done through the front door would be done through the back door? Indeed, some protections which exist in Canada do not necessarily apply or exist in other countries.

[English]

Mr. Martin Comley: I have a brief reading of your law, and you make specific reference to cooperation with outside agencies and with others by way of memoranda of understanding.

I have to say that's a preferred method of communication for us, because the memorandum of understanding stipulates who, how, what, and what will be done as a result of the communication of this data. It's important that is done, because the laws of each country differ widely. I look particularly within Europe at that, where we're supposed to have a common standard—far from it, I'm afraid.

Explicit MOUs do help in guaranteeing that the information that's provided by one jurisdiction will be honoured by the second jurisdiction. In order to turn this suspicious transaction into something operational, you don't necessarily have to transmit the full detail of the information. That's something that can be discussed at an operational level in order that you guarantee as best you can the protection of individuals in each jurisdiction and respect the confidentiality within that jurisdiction.

[Translation]

Mr. Richard Marceau: Do I still have time?

The Chairman: One minute.

Mr. Richard Marceau: Mr. Murray or Mr. Chester, in your brief, you raised the possibility that Bill C-22 may contravene article 8 of the Canadian Charter of Rights and Freedoms. Why do you raise this possibility? Knowing the way you work, Mr. Chester, I also know that you rarely ask a question if you don't have a ready answer. So what's your answer? If the bill contravenes article 8, how would you rewrite it so that the requirements of the Charter are met?

[English]

Mr. R. Simon G. Chester (Legal Counsel, Canadian Institute of Chartered Accountants): Mr. Marceau, I have two answers. One of them is slightly flippant, which is that the brief you were quoting from is the brief of the Certified General Accountants Association of Canada. My second comment is that I'm more than happy to answer the question.

[Translation]

Mr. Richard Marceau: It's because your name was here along with...

[English]

Mr. Simon Chester: We are the Canadian Institute of Chartered Accountants.

[Translation]

Mr. Richard Marceau: I'm sorry.

[English]

Mr. Simon Chester: To give you a serious answer, we think the bill should probably distinguish between two types of circumstances in which the centre is seeking information. For instances where there is specific inquiry into a breach of the legislation, where specific financial information is going to be carted away, we believe the same safeguards should exist as exist in the rest of the criminal justice system—that is, you would go before an independent authority and seek a warrant.

That warrant constitutes an objective assessment of whether there are reasonable grounds to believe the circumstances exist for the legislation to be triggered. That objective assessment does provide a check on the centre.

If you look at clause 62, it provides that an authorized person may from time to time enter into any premises at any reasonable time. That authorized person is simply anyone the director of the centre stipulates under subclause 45(2). There are none of the safeguards that would exist if the police were doing this, or that would exist in the rest of the criminal law. We believe this legislation should respect the same sorts of safeguards that exist in the rest of the legal system.

That's my facetious answer. I'm more than happy to ask the Certified General Accountants whether they would agree with that assessment.

[Translation]

Mr. Richard Marceau: Thank you.

[English]

The Chair: Ms. Bulte.

Ms. Sarmite Bulte (Parkdale—High Park, Lib.): Thank you very much, Mr. Chair.

I thank you all for coming here today.

• 1640

I'd like to address my questions, Mr. Chairman, through you to the members of the Canadian Bar Association. I do so as a member of the Canadian Bar Association—Ontario and as a member of the Law Society of Upper Canada. I practised law for 18 years. So the people who are sitting around this table are quite aware of solicitor-client privileges. Mr. Marceau is also a lawyer.

I have to start by saying that as a lawyer I agree with my colleagues Mr. Marceau and Mr. Abbott in that I found your sexual analogy, Mr. Meehan, regarding solicitor-client privilege quite offensive. So let me state that for the record.

Let me go on further to state that I also believe, and I will challenge you on this, that there is no absolute client-solicitor privilege whatsoever. There are exemptions to the common law privilege.

You have also, gentlemen, not spoken about clause 11 in the bill, which clearly states—and I will read it into the record: “Nothing in this Part requires a legal counsel to disclose any communication that is subject to solicitor-client privilege.”

Fourth, the regulations do not address those that deal with the fact that sums of money received on account of fees or on account of bail are exempt from the regulations. That was not mentioned at all here today.

Fifth, right now we have before the courts the Murray-Bernardo case. We are determining the extent of solicitor-client privilege. Again, I find you're saying there is absolute solicitor-client privilege, and to compare that to a sexual analogy is quite offensive.

So I'd like you to comment specifically on clause 11 and also on the regulations.

Before I finish, if you'll indulge me, Mr. Chairman, I did not practise criminal law. That was something I chose not to do during my practice. But I did practise real estate law and I was very wary of solicitor-client privilege. But there were times when I received cash payments on real estate transactions, which was not unusual in the late 1980s when there was a lot of influx of Hong Kong money. At that time money appeared, U.S. dollars in paper bags, from young people from their relatives from Hong Kong.

I had no problem at that time reporting to those clients that when I deposit that into my local branch of the Royal Bank, because it is a cash transaction, I will have to fill out a sheet of paper that tells the bank where it came from and what I will use it for. I don't believe I did anything wrong or that I breached any solicitor-client privilege, but this was something that was inevitably going to happen to us. I would think that all lawyers have had to deal with this, even on a voluntary basis.

So again, please comment on clause 11, the exemptions under the regulations.

Mr. Eugene Meehan: I would like to unreservedly apologize to my colleague in the profession. Unreservedly, I apologize for what was taken as an offensive remark. I apologize.

It was not meant to be offensive. It is a true occurrence that occurred. Fortunately, solicitor-client privilege forbids me from saying anything about it other than that it occurred, because it did, and it is a serious and continuing trauma to that young woman.

However, I do apologize, colleague in the profession, for the offence taken. I accept that it shouldn't have been put forward in that way. I apologize; it was made to make a point. And the point was that solicitor-client privilege, including matters of intimacy, is important and should be protected. But I apologize for the offence taken. None was intended, I assure you.

I pass to my colleague, Mr. DelBigio, in regard to clause 11.

Mr. Greg DelBigio: In attending today, we have assumed familiarity with the bill, so a specific reference to clause 11 or any omission was not intended to be deceptive. We assumed that you're all familiar with that. It is there of course. It refers to privilege.

But the Canadian Bar Association takes the position that the inclusion of this provision is not good enough. Privilege and confidentiality must both be recognized. Confidentiality of course is broader than privilege.

The second concern is that even with clause 11 there is going to be, as of necessity, uncertainty at times as to how privilege operates. Those of us who have ever had to deal with an issue of privilege will be well aware that it can be complicated and it's rarely straightforward.

There are penal provisions within the bill. There is a possibility of overreporting. In other words, if a lawyer is uncertain as to whether or not something is privileged in the face of possible penalty for failure to comply, there's a risk that the lawyer will err on the side of reporting rather than not reporting. It would be very useful if there was a mechanism by which a lawyer who is uncertain with respect to a privilege claim could attend before a judge or some other forum in advance to have that privilege issue determined. In that way the outcome is determined through a proper hearing and independent authority, and it eliminates uncertainty. It lets a lawyer know that he or she is truly authorized in making the disclosure that is being requested.

The final point I would like to make is that the recommendations of the CBA do not undermine the objectives of the bill save for one point. Because lawyers are presently captured by both their codes of professional conduct and the Criminal Code, lawyers are already not permitted to engage in money laundering. The only objective of the bill that would not be furthered if lawyers were excluded is the collection of information. It only means that one piece of information, that being the information from lawyers, will not come forward. The bill would otherwise operate in its normal way and the objectives of the bill would not be undermined or threatened in any way whatsoever. So our proposals do not do damage to the objects of the bill.

The Chair: I have three names: Cullen, Szabo, and Gallaway.

Mr. Roy Cullen (Etobicoke North, Lib.): Thank you, Mr. Chairman.

Thank you for all the witnesses and to Mr. Comley for coming all this way.

I have a few questions for Mr. Comley, and then I'd like to come back to the privilege issue. I'm not a lawyer, but I would like to come back to that.

Mr. Comley, this bill defines certain transactions as being de facto reportable over a certain amount, and then other transactions will be a judgment call in terms of whether they're of a suspicious nature. Do you have such an arrangement in the United Kingdom, where certain transactions are de facto reportable and then there are others that would be seen as suspicious and would need to be reported as well? How do you actually define that in the U.K.?

Mr. Martin Comley: There is no de facto reporting. The closest you get to it is out of the European Union directive that is reflecting our money-laundering regulations, which talks of ECU limits, which means certain actions should then be taken. It doesn't then mandate that it's particularly suspicious and necessary for reporting to us. Ours is purely a suspicion-based reporting regime.

Mr. Roy Cullen: So your criterion, then, is solely that if a transaction appears suspicious, then it would be reported as defined or as best one can judge?

Mr. Martin Comley: Correct.

Mr. Roy Cullen: The other question has to do with how this bill focuses on financial intermediaries. There's been some discussion that perhaps it should be expanded to retailers, for example, and to make it broader than financial intermediaries. I'm wondering what your experience has been in that particular domain and what your advice would be.

Mr. Martin Comley: I have a two-part answer. First, our primary legislation covers all people, whether you're a retailer, a lawyer, or whatever else. In answer to that they're already covered.

The second part of the answer is that the regulations stipulate that there should be systems in place in certain institutions, so having systems heightens the level of awareness inside that institution. And that's primarily directed toward the financial sector. There is debate within the European Union at the moment on the second money-laundering directive that looks at these similar issues, as to whether you should enlarge this to these greater sets. That it is a very interesting concept is my honest answer to it. However, I'm not sure how you enforce it. The debate has been, is it a jeweller you're directing this toward? If it is, who will regulate the jeweller? Should it be reflected in the reporting regime, i.e., that they should report, or is it that you're asking them to have systems? We already ask them to report, we just don't ask them to have systems.

I don't know if there's a direct answer for your second question. I'm not sure that by taking this too far away from the main financial sector you can actually have an infinite amount of success in it, because if you can't police it, what is your objective when you set out to do it? I'm not saying that you can't do it in all sectors.

For me, money transmission is an unpoliced sector at the moment. But it is of high concern to us, so we would devote a lot of resources to policing that sector in a different way.

Mr. Roy Cullen: Okay. Thank you.

The agencies and centres are different, and you described yours. One of the issues the committee was asking about this morning was the kinds of resources needed to adequately install a centre and the magnitude of that effort. Can you give us any advice on that at this point?

Mr. Martin Comley: I could bluntly say to resource it properly. It is the greatest criticism that has been levelled against us in how we've gone about this. When I started in the unit, there were five staff members. Some years later, we now have 27. As this year goes on, that is likely to double in strength. That's bearing in mind that I have the resources of the rest of the National Criminal Intelligence Service to draw on, from within its tentacles. So there's quite a vast organization. With that you also need correct IT resources to do the job properly, because you don't envisage your centre or mine to be a post box. They should be doing something more toward it.

Mr. Roy Cullen: Okay. Thank you.

I said I would come back to the privilege issue. Mr. Comley, in the United Kingdom, if someone comes into a lawyer's office or an accountant's office with, let's say, an amount or a transaction that appears to be suspicious, is the lawyer or accountant required under your law to report that to the centre?

Mr. Martin Comley: Yes.

Mr. Roy Cullen: I'd like to come back, if I may, to the Canadian Bar Association. First of all, as my colleague pointed out, the act does respect solicitor-client privilege. But isn't it acknowledged that for activities around trust accounts the question of privilege is not the same as for other types of activities?

I'm reading a 1985 report of the Ontario Canadian Bar Association, which says:

> Some lawyers mistakenly believe that whatever they do, and whatever they are told, is privileged merely by the fact that they are lawyers. This is simply not the case.

They go on to talk about trust accounts being part of the activities that are not covered necessarily by privilege. I'd like you to comment on that.

Mr. Greg DelBigio: First, the report you have referred to is a 1985 report from the Ontario CBA. It does not reflect the official position, then or now, of national... Our position is as set out in the recommendations we made today.

Second, while it might be that certain aspects of a trust account are not privileged, it's important to take a broader perspective. In order to determine suspicion, it might well be that sometimes questions have to be asked. It might be that without an inquiry there is not going to be suspicion, but a lawyer might nonetheless feel inclined toward making an inquiry in order to determine whether or not the suspicion exists. It's the questions and answers of that inquiry in order to determine whether or not there's suspicion that might well be and would be privileged.

So it is not the simple matter of a deposit into a trust account that we can limit ourselves to in considering the issue. It's much broader. Who is the person? What is his or her occupation? What is his or her source of income outside of the occupation? How long has he or she participated in that occupation? It's questions such as those that will give rise to or eliminate suspicion.

• 1655

The Chair: Thank you, Mr. Cullen. Do you have another question?

Mr. Roy Cullen: I have a lot of questions, but I'll defer to my colleagues, and if we have a chance, I'll come back.

The Chair: Okay.

Mr. Szabo.

Mr. Paul Szabo (Mississauga South, Lib.): Thank you, Mr. Chairman. Mr. Cullen is a CA, and so am I, and we have a lawyer over there and another lawyer there, so now we're balanced.

The Chair: Good. Thank you, Mr. Szabo.

Mr. Abbott.

Voices: Oh, oh!

Mr. Paul Szabo: The brief from the CICA was interesting to me because it did raise probably the one aspect that really is a theme in a lot of the testimony, and that has to do with what constitutes a suspicious transaction, the definition. I suspect that around the table we could find all kinds of frustrations to a definition. It's almost like trying to nail Jell-O to the wall. It just isn't going to happen.

But I'm intrigued by the debate about the role or the positioning of lawyers and accountants. It seems to me that in the over 30 years I've spent in either public practice or corporate life, lawyers and accountants can occupy almost any position at any time. It's not just auditors and people in court. They can be agents, advisers, or consultants. They can be involved directly in financial transactions. They can hold absolutely any position possible and still be part of a firm or acting in the capacity as a professional.

Given that that's the case, and given that both professions have codes of conduct in which reports would have to be made to their bar or to their institute, is there a parallel there that has to be taken into account, that there is a reporting requirement in place professionally? Should it not also apply with regard to at least some of the activities of both professions as it relates to this legislation?

Mr. Ian Murray: From the accounting profession's point of view in the legislation, you're exactly right. As accountants, we get involved in numerous ways in business, not just in a professional way. A very large percentage of our members are involved outside the profession in business. It's for this reason that we are concerned with the scope of the legislation and see a need to have the legislation make it very clear that the scope is in fact only aimed at those who are involved in specific financial transactions, and not those who are peripherally involved, either in the profession advising or outside the profession.

So that's our main concern as accountants responding to this proposed legislation, to narrow the scope so it's very clear that it relates only to those who are directly involved in financial and intermediary activities. Beyond that, our responsibility under a professional code of conduct is that we are required to respect confidentiality. However, if there's legislation that overrides, that does require us to report, then we are required to comply with that legislation.

Mr. Paul Szabo: With regard to one of your principal recommendations, about a definition of suspicious transactions, maybe we'd better find out whether or not there's any consensus here. You haven't suggested one. You certainly made it clear that there should be a definition. Are you aware of a definition in another jurisdiction, or are you prepared to suggest a criterion or two that would be included in such a definition?

Mr. Ian Murray: We are not aware of a definition we could just pick up and use for purposes of this legislation. In our discussions throughout this process and in our discussion paper submission, we've suggested that we would be pleased to be involved in consultations on this issue.

As Mr. Comley has indicated in his presentation, this is a very difficult issue to articulate clearly and on which to establish criteria that will result in consistent reporting. It's going to take a lot of time and experience, I believe, to get to a definition that will be workable.

• 1700

Mr. Paul Szabo: I have one last question, and maybe Mr. DelBigio can help me. I appreciate what he believes to be the position of the legal profession. What would happen if a lawyer, in discharging his or her responsibilities as a lawyer, does in fact become aware of a clearly suspicious transaction under any definition? In terms of reporting either to the bar or to the authorities, is there anything...

Mr. Greg DelBigio: Right now?

Mr. Paul Szabo: Right now.

Mr. Greg DelBigio: There is a prohibition upon any reporting except if the information a lawyer comes to be in possession of indicates that there is going to be imminent bodily harm.

Mr. Paul Szabo: Just to follow that, if you had personal knowledge of a colleague, another lawyer, who had been involved in an action you believed to be... Maybe you didn't have absolute proof or it wasn't established in law, but you suspected or believed it to be... Is there obligation on your behalf, under your professional rules of conduct, to report that lawyer to the bar for follow-up on the allegation?

Mr. Greg DelBigio: I stand to be corrected, but I am not aware of such an obligation in British Columbia.

Mr. Eugene Meehan: In Ontario there is. If one is of the belief that a colleague in the profession has committed professional misconduct, there's an obligation to report that individual to the bar. The bar will deal with it appropriately, including taking that matter to the authorities.

Mr. Paul Szabo: And the CICA?

Mr. Ian Murray: Within the provincial institutes, certainly those in Ontario and I believe most of them throughout Canada, we do have a similar requirement to that of the lawyers in Ontario. You'd be required to report it to the institute.

Mr. Paul Szabo: Thank you.

The Chair: Thank you, Mr. Szabo.

We'll now go to Mr. Abbott.

Mr. Jim Abbott: I'll try to be very quick here.

First, the witnesses should realize that it's not normal... It happens from time to time, but it's not a normal practice that a piece of legislation will come to the House of Commons and be passed from the House of Commons on second reading, which is agreement in principle, on division—in other words, without a vote. To my mind—and I think my colleagues might agree—that basically says that the persons elected by the people of Canada have said we want to see this kind of legislation in place. So there is a very strong mandate for this legislation to be going forward.

If it were to go forward, therefore, with the exception for the bar, please explain this to me why, if I were a person of nefarious means, would I ever choose CGAs or CAs to conduct my professional activities. I might have something sufficiently hidden that it wouldn't contravene the bar rules and so on and so forth. Why would you guys not be the agents of choice of people of nefarious means? It's a loophole big enough to drive a Kenworth through.

Mr. Greg DelBigio: I don't think my faith in the integrity of the profession is improperly founded. I don't believe there would be a vacuum such that people would go to lawyers and have lawyers then facilitate criminal transactions on their behalf.

First of all, it presumes a body of knowledge that would be disseminated amongst a suspect community. Even if that dissemination of knowledge does occur and people do flow to lawyers, the presumption is that lawyers might then engage in these transactions. There's no evidence to suggest they will or they have. The transactions, if suspicious, would be stopped at the doorway of the lawyer's office.

Mr. Jim Abbott: Then why shouldn't we also exempt the accountants, the CAs and the CGAs? They're a professional body.

Mr. Greg DelBigio: Well, it's not just the codes of professional conduct. While the codes of professional conduct overlap, the law has very clearly and for many years, not just in Canada, recognized the relationship between lawyers and clients as being different from the relationship between accountants and clients, doctors and clients, or many other professions and clients. It is recognized as a privilege in law, which is different from the relationship that exists for other professions, and that's an inescapable legal factor that needs to be taken into account.

Mr. Jim Abbott: I'll go on the record as having listened to your answer and remained skeptical.

Mr. Greg DelBigio: I'm sorry to hear that.

Mr. Jim Abbott: Thank you.

The Chair: Is that your final question?

Mr. Jim Abbott: That's it.

Mr. Richard Marceau: Is that your final answer?

[Translation]

I'll be very quick, since the briefs were only given to us when you arrived. At least, that's when I got them. Do you believe, Mr. Comley, Mr. Murray and Mr. Meehan, that there should be in the bill a description of the reasonable grounds to suspect that some transactions are related to the commission of an offense? Do you think that should be defined, either in the legislation, or in the regulations?

Mr. Eugene Meehan: I'll answer first. We need to have a universal exemption in the legislation and also to add that the confidentiality is secured to protect our clients, to protect Canadians.

Mr. Richard Marceau: I understand that, but what are reasonable grounds? It's rather vague. Do you think we should say that reasonable grounds could be a, b, c or d, to at least give...

Mr. Eugene Meehan: We have a problem with the terms "reasonable grounds" because it's a standard expression used in criminal law.

Mr. Richard Marceau: I see.

Mr. Murray, it's up to you.

[English]

Mr. Ian Murray: We strongly believe the criteria and guidance established for suspicious transactions should be embraced and documented in the legislation.

Mr. Richard Marceau: Okay.

Monsieur Comley.

Mr. Martin Comley: I have to go with the U.K. model for my answer, and that's in the guidance notes. If you seek to put it in the legislation, I'm not sure how long your legislation would be and how you'd have to amend it. That's the dilemma we've always come up against.

Mr. Richard Marceau: Merci.

The Chair: We'll go back to you, Mr. Cullen.

Mr. Roy Cullen: Thank you, Mr. Chairman. I'll be brief.

First of all, I understand the issue around CAs or CGAs involved normal accounting or audit work and that they might come across a transaction that looks suspicious, but the intent of this bill is only to capture those situations where accountants, CAs or CGAs, would be involved in a transaction. I know the department has been indicating that to you, and if it's not clear from the legislation, maybe we need to deal with that in the legislation or quickly provide the regulation.

Coming back to the Canadian Bar Association for a moment, Mr. DelBigio, you talked about, let's say, an initial encounter with a client or a potential client who has brought in a lot of cash. If this law is enacted, there will be certain prescribed amounts over which it will be obligatory to report. So what would stop a lawyer at that point from saying “Do you realize that if you give me this money to put in a trust account, I'll be obliged to report it, and I may not even have to tell you when or how or whatever?”

By the same token, if someone comes in with $100,000 in cash, and there are some suspicions in your mind, what would prevent a lawyer from saying “Do you realize there is this act in place whereby, if I ask you some questions and after that I have suspicions, by law I'm obliged to report it?” What would be the great hurdle in doing something like that?

Mr. Greg DelBigio: I don't think there's a great hurdle. Indeed, if this passes, I think it would be a lawyer's obligation to advise a client or a potential client in that way.

Having advised the client or potential client of that fact, it is nonetheless inconsistent with the relationship as it presently exists to report upon a client in a manner that might well have penal consequences for the client. That is simply inconsistent with the lawyer's obligations to his or her client as they presently exist. So advising the client of the first step does not erase the damage that would potentially flow from the subsequent reporting.

Mr. Roy Cullen: I'm sure we could pursue this question at some length, but I—

The Chair: Please do. I'm kind of interested.

Mr. Roy Cullen: I must say I don't quite follow that. Given that, the client at that point has some decisions to make and the lawyer has made it pretty clear what's required. If they're not guilty of a money-laundering offence or will not be, then presumably they'd say “I have nothing to hide, so let's go to it.” If they are concerned about the act they will commit or are about to commit, then presumably they'd be more guarded and they'd enter into an arrangement where they absolutely know the rules.

Mr. Greg DelBigio: A client might walk out the door, and that—

The Chair: You'd report him then as well, right? If somebody walked out the door after you said you might have to report them, an alarm bell should go off, shouldn't it?

Mr. Greg DelBigio: One of the questions in the interpretation of clause 7 is that if consultation of that sort constitutes financial transactions... It seems to be limited to the financial transactions. I don't know if clause 7 would capture that sort of initial consultation or not.

Again, it is that uncertainty of interpretation that might well cause a lawyer to decide to err on the side of saving their own skin and make the report. It causes a lawyer to be, on one hand, trying to serve the interests of a client or a potential client, or determine whether or not interest can be addressed within law, and also protecting his or her own interests.

The Chair: In fairness, I wasn't trying to be humorous there. If that were to happen to you, if Mr. Y were to approach you with $50,000, $100,000 or whatever, you would probably say "Look, I may have to report you, because I'm kind of suspicious about this." What would you do, responsibly? Would you in fact report this person or not?

Mr. Greg DelBigio: Well, I think the fact of a large amount of cash, coupled with more information, might well give rise to a suspicion. It might even give rise to something stronger than a suspicion. But as I read it, mandatory reporting of suspicion is to occur for every financial transaction.

I don't mean to answer your question with a question, but one of the questions is how clause 7 is to be interpreted. It is certainly the case that the lawyer should tell the individual that he or she cannot handle their case. The lawyer cannot accept that money as a retainer or as part of a business transaction.

Ms. Sarmite Bulte: I think you can accept it as a retainer, can you not? Cash on account of fees is exempt under the regulations. One of the ways around it would be for someone to come and say "Here's $100,000 on account of fees", and it's a non-reporting requirement.

Mr. Greg DelBigio: It is true that fees are exempt, but that kind of transaction might well be captured by the existing provisions of the Criminal Code. That might well constitute money laundering, and indeed I would argue that it would.

Ms. Sarmite Bulte: But isn't the bank going to catch it anyway, whether you report it or not, when you put that $100,000 into the bank or if you, let's say, put $9,000 in one trust account, $9,000 in another trust account, and you have 10 trust accounts all with whatever? At some point, some other financial institution is going to catch that, whether you report it or not.

Mr. Greg DelBigio: Maybe, and hopefully. And if that is so, if the information is otherwise going to be gathered, then there is no reason to require that lawyers be gatherers and disseminators of information.

Ms. Sarmite Bulte: Okay.

The Chair: Mr. Szabo.

Mr. Paul Szabo: Just to get this straight, and maybe Mr. DelBigio could advise lay people, when does a client become a client with regard to lawyer-client privilege?

Mr. Greg DelBigio: The privilege and confidentiality is triggered as soon as the communication occurs, as soon as a person is seeking legal advice and that communication occurs for the purpose of attaining advice and within the structure of their relationship. Your talking to a lawyer in passing about baseball scores is neither privileged nor confidential. Your going to a lawyer's office and seeking advice with respect to a business transaction—and you're going to that lawyer because he or she has expertise within that area of business—is very clearly both privileged and confidential.

Mr. Paul Szabo: So it doesn't have anything to do with fees. It could be pro bono as long as it's legitimate legal business.

Mr. Greg DelBigio: Yes.

Mr. Paul Szabo: Then on that basis it means that in your view, or at least in the position of the bar, everything lawyers do is subject to lawyer-client privilege and therefore should not be covered or captured in any way by this bill.

Mr. Greg DelBigio: No, it is not every communication. It might be that every communication is confidential, but not every communication is privileged.

Mr. Paul Szabo: I have a last question. With regard to the question I asked earlier, is there any event you could see occurring related to a financial transaction whereby you could imagine that a lawyer would be in a position... and the legal profession would agree that it should be reported where it was suspicious or in fact appeared to be illegal?

Mr. Greg DelBigio: No, I think the considerations of privilege and confidentiality demand that there be no report, but also that the lawyer not participate in the transaction. Once again, all the CBA is asking is that the lawyers not be required to pass the information along. Lawyers are not going to participate in the transactions, and they cannot.

The Chair: Mr. Cullen.

Mr. Roy Cullen: Thank you, Mr. Chairman.

Not to belabour this, but to come back to Mr. Comley, if I may, switching gears from client-solicitor privilege, the way this bill is struck, first of all, there's a reporting requirement to the centre. If the centre, by collaborating with other information... was of the view that there was a suspicion of money laundering, they would pass certain high-level aggregated information to the police. If the police then, using a lot of tools at their disposal, came to the conclusion that, yes, they concurred and in fact they had a strong suspicion but they'd like more information, under our law they actually have to go to a judge and get a court order to require the centre to give additional information. And this is designed that way to deal with privacy concerns.

How does it work in the U.K.? I know you are independent, and yet you're aligned or attached to the police forces in the U.K. How would that work in the U.K.?

Mr. Martin Comley: There are similar provisions, except they wouldn't be coming to me for the information, because the information on which the suspicion is based is held by an institution, whether it be the bank, lawyer, or anybody else. And then they would equally have to go in front of a judge and satisfy the judge that an order or warrant was necessary in order to bring that material available, so that institution would be compelled to bring forward that material.

• 1720

Mr. Roy Cullen: So in practice in the U.K., then, what has happened, what's happening, or what does happen is that the police go directly to the financial institution and not necessarily to your unit for a court order.

Mr. Martin Comley: Correct. They go directly to the judge. It must be a circuit judge, not a lower court.

The Chair: I have a final question for you, Mr. Comley. Looking at page 4 of your handout, you have "suspicious disclosure made to NCIS". You went from 600 to 14,500, with an all-time record in 1996 of 16,125. Are economies of scale kicked in with these cases in the sense that... I mean, you've only doubled your staff since 1967, is that correct?

Mr. Martin Comley: Yes, roughly.

The Chair: That's quite a caseload, isn't it?

Mr. Martin Comley: Absolutely, and the office is currently suffering a backlog at the moment. We're devoting what could be considered a huge amount of resources too, compared to the size of our organization. That's why I can accurately predict that in our next budget for the organization we will be looking to increase our staff. That has already been discussed at directorate level. We're not adequately staffed to undertake the function for which we are set aside.

The Chair: That's good. When you look at the staff you started with, it's phenomenal that you can deal with all these cases.

Mr. Martin Comley: We're not doing the investigation. We'll be somewhat like the centre. We're only doing an assessment of those, and passing them on to the correct investigative body.

The Chair: But still... okay. That's the question again.

Ms. Albina Guarnieri (Mississauga East, Lib.): Mr. Chairman, just to piggy-back on your point, this is for the criminal lawyers' association.

In your brief, you mentioned that you're trying "to address a problem that we believe reflects a relatively minor portion of business activity in Canada". How would you substantiate this observation?

Mr. Greg DelBigio: Nothing that I have seen demonstrates or suggests that lawyers are, in any widespread way, either as a profession or individually, engaged in money laundering.

Ms. Albina Guarnieri: So you're simply offering a personal observation rather than a—

Mr. Greg DelBigio: No, I have looked at reports, I have looked at the data, and nothing I have seen proves it.

Ms. Albina Guarnieri: You have solicitor-client privilege, so lawyers wouldn't be sharing or pooling their information.

Mr. Greg DelBigio: Lawyers would not be pooling their information, but as I think Mr. Comley would be able to indicate, the police have very effective ways of watching and listening to and determining who is doing what. One source of data is simply arrests or charges or convictions. Precious few lawyers have become ensnared in prosecutions, and that is a very effective data source.

Ms. Albina Guarnieri: But that's essentially an assumption on your part.

Mr. Greg DelBigio: No, it's not an assumption. That's based upon data for all of us to see.

Ms. Albina Guarnieri: So then it wouldn't be a big problem if this bill were to become... It wouldn't put lawyers in an awkward position, then, if it's a relatively minor problem.

Mr. Greg DelBigio: No, it would put lawyers in a very awkward position. Although there is no evidence to support any contention that lawyers are engaged in money laundering, on a day-to-day basis lawyers receive information that is privileged and confidential, and this would compromise that. It would be very awkward.

Ms. Albina Guarnieri: Thank you.

The Chair: Thank you, Ms. Guarnieri.

On behalf of the committee, I'd like to thank you very much.

Mr. Comley, once again, thank you very much for making the flight to Ottawa. We certainly appreciate your input.

You've all given us something to think about, lawyers and all. We'll have decisions to make in the very near future, and we want to thank you.

Mr. Greg DelBigio: Mr. Chair, if I might make a final comment, the Canadian Bar Association would like to thank you for the opportunity to be present today. To the extent that further input might be useful, we would invite that opportunity.

The Chair: We'll take you up on that. Thank you.

The meeting is adjourned.

April 12, 2000 [House of Common Standing Committee on Finance]

The Acting Chair (Mr. Paul Szabo (Mississauga South, Lib.)): We are resuming consideration of Bill C-22, an act to facilitate combatting the laundering of proceeds of crime, to establish the Financial Transactions and Reports Analysis Centre of Canada, and to amend and repeal certain acts in consequence.

This afternoon we have representatives from the Canadian Bankers Association; H and R Block Canada, Inc.; the Canadian Police Association; and the Royal Canadian Mounted Police. Welcome to you all. I'd like to begin with the Canadian Bankers Association.

Our normal practice is to receive your presentations for about five to seven minutes, and then the members will have an opportunity to ask questions of the witnesses after all the presenters have given their statements.

We'll begin with the Canadian Bankers Association, Mr. Warren Law. Maybe you'd like to introduce your colleagues.

Mr. Warren Law (Vice-President, Corporate Affairs and Legal Counsel, Canadian Bankers Association): Yes, thank you, Mr. Chairman.

Mr. Chairman, committee members, good afternoon. My name is Warren Law and I'm the vice-president, corporate affairs and legal counsel of the Canadian Bankers Association. On behalf of the banking industry, I thank you for the opportunity to discuss our industry's experience with the deterrence of money-laundering activity.

Specifically, we welcome the opportunity to provide you with our views on the current legislation before the House, as well as the related consultation paper issued by the Department of Finance in December 1999.

With me today is Frank Craddock, chief security officer of the TD Bank Financial Group, who is also the current chair of the CBA corporate security committee; and Mr. Gene McLean, who is the director of security of the Canadian Bankers Association.

Mr. Craddock was with the Toronto police service for 26 years, with responsibility for the investigation of various major crimes. He has been with the TD Bank Financial Group since 1993, where he currently serves as the head of corporate security and is responsible for his bank's money-laundering deterrence programs.

Mr. McLean was with the Royal Canadian Mounted Police for over 25 years, with responsibility for the investigation of organized crime, and occupied the role of liaison officer in England and Switzerland for many years. He is at present responsible for the development and execution of industry-level strategies, including the deterrence of money-laundering activity.

As key intermediaries in the financial system, we recognize the very negative impact of money-laundering activity and we understand its damaging effects upon our society.

I will now turn to Mr. Craddock to review the industry's position with respect to the deterrence of money-laundering activity.

Mr. Frank Craddock (Chair, Corporate Security Committee, Canadian Bankers Association; Chief Security Officer, TD Bank Financial Group): Thank you, Mr. Law, and thank you, Mr. Chairman and committee members, for inviting us here to participate in this important process.

I believe it may be helpful to understand a bank security officer's role within the Canadian financial institutions. The position I occupy is normally recruited from law enforcement. There are two distinct areas within security that require our supervision.

The first is protective service, which includes guards, physical security, security equipment, and technology.

The second area, the one I will be focusing on today, is investigations, which includes our activity related to the deterrence of money-laundering activity. In order to protect against this criminal activity, we have established sound policies and programs that detect and prevent money laundering.

Just a few of the preventative measures taken by Canadian banks include: the right to refuse financial transactions suspected of being proceeds of crime as defined by the Criminal Code; a requirement that a declaration of source of funds be signed by customers for financial transactions involving $10,000 or more; a requirement for bank employees to report any financial transactions that are judged to be suspicious, regardless of the amount; the placement of a senior bank officer in every branch, known as the designated officer, to whom suspicious transactions are reported; a strong emphasis on the know-your-customer rule, whereby employees must obtain appropriate identification and documentation from clients, as well as understand the client's usual pattern of financial transactions; an audit of branch compliance with anti-money-laundering policies; and various staff awareness and education programs, including the distribution of related videos produced by the CBA corporate security committees.

We all work within the scope of the existing legislation, together with the guidelines issued by the Office of the Superintendent of Financial Institutions, known as OSFI, and we believe we have developed a very effective measure to identify money-laundering activities while avoiding high volumes of irrelevant reports.

Most important to our success is our relationship with the law enforcement agencies, the RCMP in particular. The banks have consistently supported the principle of mandatory reporting of suspicious transactions, and for several years there has been a voluntary arrangement between the RCMP and the banks to facilitate the disclosure of those suspicious transactions. We all work together, share appropriate security intelligence, and currently refer many suspicious transactions to the RCMP for investigation.

I will now turn to Mr. McLean to review the industry's position with respect to our specific comments regarding the legislation and regulations.

Mr. Gene McLean (Director, Security, Canadian Bankers Association): Thank you, Mr. Craddock. Thank you, Mr. Chairman and committee members, for the opportunity to participate in this important process.

The Canadian Bankers Association and all of its members are fully committed to the deterrence of money-laundering activity and fully support, in principle, the current proposed legislative changes. We have made some preliminary comments about the proposals in a letter we have sent to the Department of Finance. We have provided a copy of this letter to the committee; therefore, I will now simply highlight some of the matters raised in that letter.

Our main concern is that implementing legislation for a mandatory system of reporting should not be overly prescriptive or complicated in terms of the types of transactions that must be reported. Otherwise, many legitimate transactions will be reported and the resulting huge volume of information may prove ineffective as a means of identifying money-laundering activity.

Bill C-22 requires every person or entity to report to the Financial Transactions and Reports Analysis Centre of Canada every financial transaction where there are reasonable grounds to suspect the transaction is related to money laundering. However, there is no definition or criteria for making this determination, which may lead to inconsistent reporting by the entities covered by the legislation.

While it is anticipated that FTRAC will develop reporting guidelines, we urge the federal government to begin consultations as soon as possible to develop practical measures that ensure consistent reporting.

Bill C-22 provides for the creation of a reporting exemption scheme through regulations. It is our understanding that the intent of these provisions is to reduce reporting of customer transactions that are obviously above suspicion. Some good examples would be deposits from government departments and agencies, or routine transactions by customers that regularly deposit large cash amounts, such as large grocery chains and fast food restaurants.

This concept marries exceptionally well with the current practice of our members, whereby carefully controlled exemptions for such clients currently exist. Unfortunately, the consultation paper states that no specific exemptions are proposed at this time. We believe the use of exemption lists would substantially improve the effectiveness of the mandatory transaction reporting system and specifically prevent the FTRAC from receiving large volumes of irrelevant reports.

Similarly, while Bill C-22 will require the reporting of cross-border flows of currency and monetary instruments, it provides for exemptions from the reporting requirements. Again, and unfortunately, the consultation paper states that no exemptions are contemplated at this time for such transfers.

We believe that the failure to allow exemptions would lead to the unnecessary reporting of cross-border cash transfers, such as those between financial institutions and those made by the federal government or its agencies.

Finally, Bill C-22 sets out relatively severe penalties for failure to comply knowingly with the record-keeping and reporting provisions of the legislation. Although there is provision for a due diligence defence, it must be demonstrated that all due diligence has been exercised.

It is our view that while Bill C-22 uses extremely broad language to describe the scope of the offences, it then provides a defence that is potentially very narrow and difficult to satisfy. Criminal liability should only arise in cases where the employee and/or the institution knowingly and deliberately fail to file a report or keep a record, or act in gross negligence or wilful blindness to the facts.

The use of the word "all" to qualify the due diligence defence means that it becomes very subjective and establishes a test that may be difficult, if not impossible, to meet. We recommend, therefore, that the word "all" be removed from subclause 77(2).

Thank you for your time. I now invite Mr. Law to conclude our presentation.

Mr. Warren Law: Mr. Chairman, the Canadian Bankers Association, together with all of its members, is deeply committed to the fight against money-laundering activity, and we look forward to working closely with the government, law enforcement agencies, and FTRAC to ensure that the measures in Bill C-22 are effectively and efficiently implemented.

On behalf of Mr. Craddock, Mr. McLean, and myself, I would like to thank you all for your attention, and we would be pleased to answer questions later on in these proceedings.

The Acting Chair (Mr. Paul Szabo): Thank you very much, gentlemen. The CBA has always been very thoughtful in its comments to the committee over the past years, and we appreciate it very much.

I'd now like to call on the representatives of H&R Block Canada, Inc.: Mr. Bonar Irving, senior vice-president and general manager, and Mr. Todd McCallum, vice-president. Welcome, gentlemen.

Mr. J. Bonar Irving (Senior Vice-President and General Manager, H&R Block Canada Inc.): Thank you, Mr. Chairman, committee members.

We have prepared bilingual opening statements, which I understand have been circulated to the committee, and we have additional copies, if anybody needs them. Since you already have the document, I'll restrict my comments to our key concerns.

H&R Block has 537 offices and 470 franchise offices across the country. Three years ago we established Financial Stop as a no-frills financial services platform to cater to the underserviced segment of the population that earns less than $25,000 per year. We now have 45 corporate and 32 franchise Financial Stop locations. In addition to cashing cheques, we provide money orders, bill payments, moneygrams, currency exchange, phone cards, mail box rental, business services, and of course income tax preparation.

Cheque-cashing retail outlets exist because a segment of consumers seeks immediate use of their money and is unwilling to wait until a cheque clears through the banking system. A significant percentage of our clients do not use the mainstream banking system. Our service provides easy access to their money and a variety of user-pay services at a one-stop neighbourhood location.

We know that money laundering is a serious problem and that any institution that handles cash has to accept ongoing responsibility to combat that problem. We comply with existing money-laundering regulations, and we support the new legislation. We are prepared to make the necessary investments and to ensure that our staff is properly trained.

We do have three specific concerns: first, our main concern is section IV, record-keeping requirements for the new entities, which requires that we retain a record for five or more years of every transaction of $1,000 or more. This threshold level captures a significant volume of our business. Overwhelmingly, these are ordinary, everyday transactions. People are cashing their bi-weekly pay cheques. They're obtaining money orders to pay their and their roommate's rent or to pay a bill, or they are using money orders to send money to their families in or outside of Canada.

It is simply not clear to us why this arbitrary level was picked and why Canada feels the need to be out of step with other countries. We are told that the United Kingdom established the equivalent recording threshold at £2,000, and the U.S. has established $3,000 as the appropriate level. We would like to see the Canadian threshold for our industry established at $4,500 to $5,000 Canadian.

We have done some rough calculations, and the $1,000 threshold would have captured almost 100,000 of our transactions in the last year in just our corporate offices alone and over 30% of all cheques we cashed. Bringing the threshold to the $4,500 to $5,000 range would remove the pay cheque and rent transactions and have us archiving from 5,000 to 10,000 transactions a year. We believe this is a more realistic and more manageable number.

Our second point relates to the type of information to be gathered. There are common forms of identification that most of us take for granted: driver's licence, social insurance cards, credit cards, medical cards, etc. A significant number of our Financial Stop clients do not have these forms of ID. That does not mean we don't verify our customers' identities. We just do it in ways that would not occur to deposit-based financial institutions.

The regulatory consultation paper refers to corporate and individual account information. Officials are applying the deposit-taking institution mindset to our business, which is totally inappropriate. Deposit-taking institutions are in the relationship business. That is why they have the account information. We don't have this type of relationship with our customers. We do transactions. Every transaction is a separate event, accepted or rejected on its own merits. The way we collect information from our customers reflects the reality of our business. If we are pigeonholed in the same box used for the department's regular bank clients, we'll be forced to collect types of information that many of our customers simply cannot supply. This could drive them away from us toward fringe and underground operators. This would not serve the legislation's overall objectives.

Third, we are concerned about the privacy rights of our customers. We note that the government is about to pass important privacy legislation, Bill C-6, and the privacy concerns have been highlighted in the consultation paper. We expect to fully comply with Bill C-6, and we simply want to know that our obligations under federal or provincial legislation will not be in conflict with our obligations to this upcoming agency.

In summary, irrespective of their income, people need access to basic financial services. We want to ensure that our services are accessible and easy to use.

We support this legislation, but we are worried that its application will lead to a denial of services that pushes some of our clients underground. We want to avoid having our staff standing at their counters gathering unnecessary information from people paying their rent or cashing their paycheque. The bottom line is that this is good legislation, but let's not have the net so tightly structured that we are inundated with information about working people's ordinary, day-to-day transactions. Thank you.

The Acting Chair (Mr. Paul Szabo): Thank you very much, Mr. Irving. We appreciate your input.

I'd now like to turn to the Canadian Police Association, and today we have with us Mr. David Griffin, who is the executive director. Welcome, Mr. Griffin.

Mr. David Griffin (Executive Director, Canadian Police Association): Thank you very much, Mr. Chairman. It's a pleasure to be here today.

The Canadian Police Association welcomes the opportunity to appear before the committee today in support of Bill C-22.

The Canadian Police Association represents approximately 30,000 front-line police personnel across Canada. In addition to nearly 300 member associations from all 10 provinces, the CPA has members from the Royal Canadian Mounted Police, the CN Railway police, the CP Railway police, and first nations police officers.

As professionals who dedicate their lives to community safety and the reduction of crime, our members are acutely aware of the impact of the thriving multibillion-dollar industry known as organized crime. Organized crime affects all Canadians, undermines our economy, reduces our security, and threatens the integrity of our political institutions. Organized criminals are most often associated with the illegal drug trade, as the primary suppliers of illegal drugs to our communities and children, including cocaine and heroin. Their activities also include, but are not limited to, the illegal movement of firearms; illegal gaming; prostitution and the sexual exploitation of our children; and trafficking in stolen commodities, such as alcohol, vehicles, and jewellery. The organized criminal is also the distributor of human commodities through the smuggling of illegal migrants, prostitution, and the sexual exploitation of third world children.

The explosive growth of technology in our increasingly global society has presented new opportunities for organized criminals through technological crime, distribution of child pornography, international telemarketing fraud, and offshore gambling.

Organized crime is far from victimless. In addition to the traditional forms of violence associated with the organized criminal, their illegal activities damage and often destroy the lives of our children and vulnerable persons who fall prey to their illicit trade. The child prostitute, the drug addict, the addicted gambler, and the senior defrauded of their life savings are familiar examples. There is a tremendous economic drain on our economy as businesses and insurance companies pass on to consumers the tremendous costs of fraud and theft.

The Canadian Police Association has for several years now adopted resolutions at each of our annual general meetings calling for increased resources for the Royal Canadian Mounted Police and national police services to bolster our federal policing responsibilities.

We have also highlighted the need to strengthen our borders to combat these growing concerns. We were pleased that the Solicitor General of Canada, the Minister of Finance, and this government responded to these concerns in the recent budget announcements. We will be watching closely in the months ahead to measure the impact of these changes on front-line services.

Funding is an increasingly important issue in the battle against the sophisticated, wealthy, and unencumbered organized criminal, but money is only one element of an appropriate national strategy to combat organized crime.

We were pleased when the federal government recently decided to remove the $1,000 bill from circulation, as suggested by Mr. Marceau in his private member's bill. We were also pleased that Parliament supported the resolution brought forward by the Bloc Québécois in December of last year to convene parliamentary committee hearings on organized crime.

The Canadian Police Association welcomes this opportunity to raise awareness of the increased threats to community safety and national security and, more importantly, to identify strong and effective measures to combat the scourge of organized crime in our communities.

When experts discuss money laundering, Canada has been described as “Maytag of the north”. Bill C-22 is a positive step in addressing this concern.

Most Canadians do not understand the concept of money laundering or its impact on our communities. Simply put, money laundering refers to the methods used by the organized criminal to transfer the proceeds of their dirty criminal activities into legitimate financial instruments. The ultimate goal is to insulate or cleanse the money from any trace back to its criminal origins.

A variety of methods are employed by the laundrymen to accomplish their objectives. These innovative methods include, but are not limited to, the following: "smurfing", where large sums are broken down into smaller parcels to be transacted by a large team of individuals; "flying" money, the process of engaging in cross-border transactions involving the transfer of legitimate goods for cash through jurisdictions with lax or permissive regulatory schemes; smuggling cash to jurisdictions that provide a haven for criminals through banking secrecy, such as the one-quarter of 200 United Nations countries that provide secret banking regulations, including one jurisdiction that has one bank for every 48 people; and the creation of shell companies or legitimate enterprises to process proceeds of crime. For instance, in some jurisdictions criminals are able to establish their own banks for these purposes.

The laundrymen work separately from the drug dealer. Their paths do not cross. This is the first step in separating the proceeds from the crime. The money launderers employ professionals such as money managers, lawyers, and accountants who accept high fees in exchange for their sophisticated services. These professionals pacify themselves with plausible deniability and wilful blindness in accepting that the money they are transacting is anything but drug money.

Technology provides increased opportunity for the laundrymen and increased complexity for criminal investigations. Bill C-22 provides a foundation to build upon as technology continues to change the way criminals exploit emerging opportunities. The ultimate goal for law enforcement is to interrupt the flow of ill-gotten gains and identify its criminal source.

In considering the provisions of the bill, we would offer the following observations.

First, the $10,000 mandatory reporting level is appropriate and should not be softened. Incremental changes in this level increase exponentially the opportunities to the organized criminal who launders money by transacting smaller parcels.

Professionals involved in the movement of illegal money should not be insulated from reporting transactions or suspicious occurrences by professional codes of conduct or standards. There is a corresponding public interest in ensuring that professional ethics, wilful blindness, or plausible deniability do not immunize those who provide services to the organized criminal. We support the direction of the legislation with respect to these individuals.

Third, we consider this bill to be a work-in-progress. There is a need for flexibility to adapt to new technologies and trends, such as e-commerce. We support the reliance on a regulatory scheme to ensure that sufficient flexibility exists in the future to respond to emerging issues.

Consideration should also be given in the foreseeable future to including retail transactions involving large sums of cash. The underlying rationale is the same for police when it comes to tracing the proceeds of crime and the accumulation of assets.

We understand the delicate balance that is needed to ensure that individual privacy rights are not unreasonably compromised. While investigations could be expedited by increased access to information gathered by the proposed agency, FTRAC, we understand the need to safeguard personal information. We believe this bill strikes the right balance.

This committee has already heard evidence suggesting that limits need to be increased and exemptions provided for specific institutions. We would strongly caution against such changes, as any exemptions or changes provide corresponding opportunities or loopholes to be exploited by the sophisticated criminal or his agents. We believe uniformity is a compelling and required feature of this legislation.

Ultimately, the success of this legislation will rely heavily on the successful implementation of this agency and timely re-evaluation of the scope and mandate of the legislation and processes.

We have had the opportunity to meet with officials from the departments of finance, justice, and the Solicitor General to discuss this bill and the proposed agency. We appreciate their cooperation and I'm impressed by their commitment to the success of this legislation. We look forward to continuing these discussions in the future as this vision becomes a reality.

The Canadian Police Association endorses this proposal, and we would encourage this committee and all members of Parliament to facilitate swift passage of this bill. This bill is an essential tool that is required to bolster existing law enforcement efforts. It is not, however, a panacea, and additional measures will be required to effectively combat organized crime. We look forward to working with you and your colleagues in the months ahead as Parliament considers these important issues.

Thank you once again for the opportunity to appear before the committee today. We sincerely appreciate the opportunity and would welcome the opportunity to address any questions.

Thank you.

The Acting Chair (Mr. Paul Szabo): Thank you very much, Mr. Griffin.

Our final witnesses are from the Royal Canadian Mounted Police. We welcome Tim Killam, assistant commissioner, technical operations, and Lou Goulet, staff sergeant.

Welcome, gentlemen.

Assistant Commissioner Tim Killam (Technical Operations, Royal Canadian Mounted Police): Good afternoon, Mr. Chairman, and committee members.

As you said, Mr. Chairman, I have Mr. Goulet with me from our policy centre. As well, for any subsequent questions, I have three officers in charge of our integrated proceeds of crime units across Canada, from Montreal, Regina, and here in Ottawa.

My presentation today is intended to give you the view of the Royal Canadian Mounted Police on Bill C-22 as it pertains to money laundering, the effects on the legitimate economy, and what we see as the way ahead in the attempt to stem the tide against organized crime money laundering.

As the former officer in charge of the proceeds of crime program in Canada, I diligently worked with my colleagues in attempting to ensure that Canada was protected by a broad range of measures aimed at strengthening organized crime enforcement by preventing the laundering of the profits of illegal activities.

It became clear to me early on that Canada's financial systems were being exploited by criminal organizations to conceal, legitimize, and transport their illicit profits, thereby financing their future activities. It was felt that Canada required a systematic, coordinated, and cooperative approach to ensure that our financial systems were sound as well as free of criminal taint.

We've heard some definitions of money laundering, but for me, money laundering is the economic engine that runs all criminal organizations around the world. Preventing dirty money from entering Canada's financial system would mean not allowing those predisposed to this activity from ultimately strengthening criminal organizations. The fight against organized crime is one that the Government of Canada has taken very seriously. By extension, the RCMP, as the federal police force, is on the front line of this fight.

Estimates of the amount of illicit drug money laundered annually, worldwide, range from between $300 billion and $500 billion U.S. The UN estimates that in excess of $1 trillion U.S. in illegal profits are generated by organized crime annually. The inclusion of laundered illicit funds from economic and other non-drug crimes could potentially double these figures. The magnitude of these figures is obviously staggering.

The flight of capital and the chaos spilling over the borders of the former Soviet Union and other east bloc countries and into jurisdictions in Europe, the U.S., and elsewhere are examples of just how complicated these matters can be.

A portion of these illicit funds ends up in Canada, which is seen internationally as a haven. The RCMP is unable to quantify the exact amount of money laundering in Canada annually but have ample empirical data to show that it is in fact happening at an alarming rate.

There are a number of reasons why money launderers are attracted to Canada and consider it a haven.

First, Canada has a stable economy with a relatively strong currency and a banking system whose efficiency, stability, and security is second to none.

• 1610

Second, there is a long, undefended border between Canada and the United States, over which a huge volume of financial trade occurs.

Third, Canada is located next to one of the world's largest illicit drug markets, the United States.

And finally, and likely most important, is the lack of controls in Canada over cross-border movements of currency and the lack of a mandatory unusual transaction reporting system.

What this means for Canada is there exists an ever more challenging regulatory and law enforcement environment, particularly in a time of reduced barriers to trade and finance.

It is the opinion of the RCMP that in order to effectively combat organized crime, Canada must institute a legally defensible, mandatory unusual reporting system to assist in the investigation of the laundering of proceeds of crime. As far back as 1993, during the Commission on Crime Prevention and Criminal Justice held in Vienna, the Secretary-General of the United Nations put forward an unsettling portrait of the control organized crime has on a worldwide scale. He said:

As revenues generated by organized crime increase, the necessity to control banks becomes a priority for criminals. (...) Businesses controlled by organized crime generate a seventy (70) percent profit margin on their investments. This is achieved at the detriment of law-abiding competitors who must worry about profit margins, overhead, repayment of bank loans. All in all the infiltration by organized crime tends to introduce distortions in the interplay of market forces. In the long run it is the taxpayer and consumer who are affected. The profits of organized crime are so huge that no economy is immune to the impact of this underground economy. (...) We must improve investigative techniques and limit secrecy to appropriate dimensions.
The situation described by the Secretary-General seven years ago is identical to the situation being observed in Canada today.

All financial institutions—banks, trust companies, near-banks, insurance companies—and intermediaries such as solicitors, accountants, casinos, and others who deal with client funds on a daily basis have a front-line role to play in reporting unusual and suspicious transactions. Under voluntary disclosure, as we have today in Canada, there is no systematic and reliable way of detecting money-laundering activity.

A permissive system grants wide discretion to individual financial institutions to determine their commitment to the battle against money laundering and ultimately organized crime. The anecdotal evidence the RCMP has seen underscores the varying commitments in Canada.

At this time there is no overall coordination or control of reports, which are fragmented at best, and thus there is no way of ensuring the available information is being used to its full potential by way of a central agency, as proposed under Bill C-22. It is accepted that it is a struggle to reach an appropriate balance between privacy and enforcement considerations, and it seems clear the balance can never be struck once and for all time. Rather the balance requires constant examination, as ways of doing business, record-keeping and retrieval systems, and the methods of fraudulent transfers all evolve.

But from the enforcement viewpoint, the benefits of the creation of the Financial Transactions and Reports Analysis Centre of Canada, as envisioned in Bill C-22, are many. The centre would, among other things, provide a deterrent by making it more difficult to use traditional financial institutions to hide the profits from illegal activities, therefore reducing Canada's reputation as a haven for money laundering. The centre would fulfil our international obligations. We heard that even yesterday. It would provide a mechanism for enlisting the support and cooperation of banks and other financial institutions in identifying possible currency violations. This centre would identify investigatory targets for possible laundering of the proceeds of crime. And finally but not least, it would provide corroborating evidence against individuals identified through other sources, such as informants and other agency referrals.

At the end of the day, countries are only as strong as their weakest link. Of the 26 member countries of the Financial Action Task Force, only Canada, Singapore, and Germany have not yet implemented mandatory systems of reporting suspicious or unusual transactions. In addition, Canada does not meet the standard required for the Egmont Group, a collection of financial intelligence units, of which there are 48 member countries around the world, that set standards and share financial intelligence data in order to combat money laundering.

The bottom line is money laundering ultimately entails the use of the lawful commercial system for unlawful means. The addition of a mandatory suspicious transaction and cross-border reporting regime will serve notice to Canada's criminal organizations, and indeed to the world's organizations, that Canada has an effective transaction reporting system and that their money is not welcome here.

Problems caused by organized crime are not the sole responsibility of the police. Bill C-22 allows for a partnership with police, government, and the private sector. It will discourage the continued use of Canadian financial institutions for depositing large amounts of illicit cash and concealing them in accounts around the world. A word of caution, though. A mandatory reporting regime is by no means a panacea. Rather, it is just an integral part of a broad range of measures aimed at strengthening organized crime enforcement.

It seems logical that we should be obligated to cooperate amongst our national institutions and across international boundaries with at least the same effectiveness as those who launder the proceeds of crime.

Thank you, Mr. Chairman, and we're open for questions.

The Chair: Thank you very much, Mr. McCallum.

I think that's all the testimony, so we're going to move now to questions from the members. We're going to commence with Mr. Abbott from the Canadian Alliance.

Mr. Jim Abbott (Kootenay—Columbia, Canadian Alliance): Thank you, Mr. Chairman.

Just before I go to questions, I want to go on record, Mr. Chairman, as having something of a concern about the process. I'm concerned about the process that we've embarked on here, where we are finishing up with the last of the witnesses at 5:30 tonight. At 9 o'clock tomorrow morning, we're going to be starting on clause-by-clause.

I don't feel I would be doing my job as a representative of Her Majesty's official opposition in permitting that to happen. I haven't had any time from 5:30 p.m. to 9 a.m. to consult with any of my staff, any of my advisers, in any way, as to the testimony of these people or for that matter to have digested the testimony of the other people we've had over the last couple of weeks.

I've made the Canadian Alliance position very clear. We want to see this legislation go forward. We are in fact, as you know, on record as having been critical of the government for having taken two years to get us to this point.

Notwithstanding, the committee process is one that is very important in the development of legislation, where there are legitimate questions and concerns brought forward by these witnesses and prior witnesses that have to be taken into account. And prior to getting into clause-by-clause, if I'm going to be doing my job in the parliamentary system, I must be given some time to be able to consult with my advisers.

Unfortunately, we're seized with the fact that we are now going into a two-week break, which is not of our doing. That's just the way the parliamentary calendar works. I can tell you in all truth that if we were back next week and we were having a committee meeting on Monday or Tuesday, that would be fine. That would at least give me one day to consult with my advisers.

So I want to go on record right now. I certainly want to see the legislation go forward. I'm in support of the legislation in principle. I want to make sure that we do a proper job. I think this haste is not working to the benefit of Canadians who are going to be faced with this legislation and having to work this legislation through.

The Acting Chair (Mr. Paul Szabo): Thank you very much.

Mr. Gallaway.

Mr. Roger Gallaway (Sarnia—Lambton, Lib.): I don't want to subtract from Mr. Abbott's time, but in terms of the basic fairness of this committee in terms of operation, there are probably a number of people who want to propose amendments or perhaps would like to bring back department officials. I would like to have department officials come back. Perhaps we would like to have the minister responsible appear before the committee.

This rush to the finish line because of the break I don't think is a very good idea. The idea that we're going to clause-by-clause tomorrow is unacceptable. I've been at other committee meetings recently discussing legislative counsel. I can tell you we're putting an additional burden on the legal draftspeople here.

I don't know if it's in order or if we have a sufficient quorum here today, but I would like to suggest that the committee not meet tomorrow morning, or if the clerk has other witnesses who could be brought tomorrow morning, that would be fine. I would like to suggest we not go to clause-by-clause tomorrow.

The Acting Chair (Mr. Paul Szabo): Okay. Thank you.

Mr. Marceau.

[Translation]

Mr. Richard Marceau (Charlesbourg, BQ): Mr. Chairman, I simply want to say on this rare occasion that I agree with my Liberal colleague and with my colleague from the Canadian Alliance.

• 1620

[English]

Mr. Jim Abbott: Mr. Chairman, I wonder if you can advise me if we have a quorum.

The Acting Chair (Mr. Paul Szabo): We have a quorum for the purposes of receiving testimony. We do not have a quorum for the purposes of transacting business of the committee.

Mr. Jim Abbott: Okay, thank you.

The Acting Chair (Mr. Paul Szabo): Having said that, all members' input is certainly valuable. It's obviously in our best interest to ensure that we address fully all of the issues and all of the concerns that all members raise with regard to this legislation.

Tomorrow morning at 9 o'clock the committee has a scheduled meeting, and I think we've made available most of the day to address this. Although clause-by-clause is part of that, since it was the whole committee that approved this schedule of addressing Bill C-22, we'll have an opportunity tomorrow morning to raise this issue with the committee. If it's the view of the committee that more work, additional witnesses, more time, etc., is necessary, we'll be able to address that as a full committee tomorrow morning.

Mr. Jim Abbott: Thank you very much, I appreciate that.

The Acting Chair (Mr. Paul Szabo): Now come again.

Mr. Jim Abbott: Thank you.

As I indicated, the Canadian Alliance is definitely in favour of this legislation and principle. Clearly, the tools required by our enforcement agencies in some places are deficient. This is such an important area in Canada, where organized crime is making further and further inroads... and bringing our legislation up to world standards.

Having said that, I was very interested in the H&R Block presentation. On page 3 of the presentation, under the title of "No Undue Paper Burden", and in light of the presentation of Mr. Griffin, in particular, I'm trying to reconcile those things. In other words, I'm really asking H&R Block, in light of his presentation, where he's saying by creating exemptions we create more loopholes, we create holes in the sieve... then, as a business person, I have a tremendous amount of sympathy for H&R Block.

What suggestions could H&R Block offer to us on their behalf and perhaps on behalf of the CBA and others who are involved in the paperwork?

What constructive suggestions, I wonder, could you offer that would be able to satisfy the concerns of the police and what this legislation is about and yet ease your burden so that it becomes more workable?

Mr. Bonar Irving: Mr. Chairman, we have no information from the government that says what amounts of money laundering occur at what financial levels or at what dollar levels. Acting from a lack of information, we certainly have no problem with the $10,000 level. We would have no problem with the burden or the duty to see that our staff was properly trained, but we think we're not asking for any exemption. We're just saying establish a more reasonable level. We don't think $1,000 is a reasonable level. We think $4,500 to $5,000 will avoid the gathering of information from people that just relates to their everyday living activities.

Mr. Jim Abbott: In light of that, we have Mr. Griffin here from the Canadian Police Association, and also the RCMP. I wonder, could you as enforcement officers... in your judgment, is that a workable number, or if not, why not?

I'm not trying to broker a deal here; I'm trying to get something that's going to work.

A/Commr Tim Killam: This is an amendment to the Proceeds of Crime (Money Laundering) Act, Bill C-22. It's adding it, making the Proceeds of Crime (Money Laundering) Act something more than just a recording act; it's a reporting act now. In the previous Proceeds of Crime (Money Laundering) Act, the levels were $1,000 for money exchanges, so I imagine that's where it came from.

From a policing perspective, as mentioned by Mr. Griffin, smurfing is probably one of the most effective. It's time consuming, but money-laundering organizations or cells of criminal organizations will pay a certain percentage of that. Their full-time job is to go around to different institutions. They'll pay 10%, and up to 30% in some cases, to get into the system through these kinds of institutions. So your guess is as good as mine.

Other countries have $1,000. As Mr. Irving said, there are varying levels in different countries. That's probably where the $1,000 came from in this legislation. I'm only guessing.

Mr. Jim Abbott: I think your statement that “your guess is as good as mine”, which is a common one, probably isn't applicable in this case. I would suggest that you or Mr. Griffin would have a far better guess, a more qualified guess, than I would.

A/Commr Tim Killam: I would say to you that yes, you see money laundering at that level.

Mr. Jim Abbott: At $1,000?

A/Commr Tim Killam: Yes, you do, absolutely. That's an unequivocal answer to that.

Mr. David Griffin: Just to go one step further, aren't other institutions already bound by that requirement?

A/Commr Tim Killam: That's what I was trying to say. Other institutions are covered by the law today, presently. Currency exchanges have that same requirement. The requirement of this legislation is to record it only. This new legislation, if and when it comes through, would require them to report it as well.

Mr. Jim Abbott: But this is one extra piece of paper that H&R Block and other people who are in that kind of enterprise would have to handle on an ongoing basis and store for a five-year period.

A/Commr Tim Killam: It's a paper investigation, and once the paper is gone there's nothing you can prove. You cannot prove anything. All other countries in the world have a similar kind of requirement. What we're talking about is the difference between $1,000, as Mr. Irving is saying, and $4,500 to $5,000. I don't think there's any disagreement that there has to be some level. We've seen it go to $1,000 many times.

Mr. Jim Abbott: Didn't I read somewhere in the H&R Block... Where did I read that the U.K. has a significantly higher... Here we are. It's $2,000 and in the U.S. it's $3,000. Both of those are in the neighbourhood of $4,500. If we were to go along with your suggestion, the comparable legislation traps at a level of approximately $4,500, which I believe is what H&R Block is recommending.

I'm not an advocate for H&R Block. I'm simply trying to come up with something that is going to be workable. As a business person, we want to be responsible and ensure that this activity is trapped and that our streets are made safer as a result. Everybody in this room wants that, but at what level? It's a very good question on the part of the business. At what level does this actually start to happen in some substance? If $4,500 will trap it and it does away with 90% of their paper, it's probably worth looking at.

A/Commr Tim Killam: In answer to what you're saying, Mr. Abbott, this would be something that would be addressed in the regulations. The level can be adjusted in the regulations, and that's why the majority, the meat of the act, is in the regulations. Certainly $1,000 would catch all of them.

Of course, we in law enforcement can't do all of the investigations and everything that comes through our door, because we have limited resources too, but we do have major cases that go to that level. There is the regulation process or the discussion process. We'll be looking at an appropriate level there. You have to have a balance.

We in law enforcement—I can speak for the RCMP—don't want to burden every citizen, particularly when the majority of citizens and businesses are law abiding. The appropriate thing to remember is that from our view, we've seen legitimate businesses, such as H&R Block and the banks, all have good intentions to make sure they don't do this. They're involved in it, but they're unwittingly involved.

So the appropriate level is open to discussion, obviously.

Mr. Bonar Irving: I would only say that as long as the regulations would be used to set the limits or to adjust the limits, I think it would be fairer, it would probably serve the purpose, and it would certainly remove a large burden from business if we were to say it's $4,500 but they can be adjusted down to $1,000. My concern is that we would start at $1,000, and that while law enforcement only uses transactions over $4,500, we are still caught recording and maintaining records.

• 1630

Mr. David Griffin: I certainly would rely on the expertise of the gentleman to my left, but I think the question as lawmakers is how impervious you want us to be to organized crime. What thresholds do you want to place for this type of activity? Certainly the $1,000 may prove to be cumbersome, but it's a question of how big a net you want to provide. How much information can the police subsequently access to trace that money back to its roots? Certainly our association believes quite strongly that, yes, there are going to be some obligations put back on financial institutions, and we recognize that ultimately that will be reflected back on the consumer.

We do live in a technological era where record-keeping can be accommodated. If the experience bears out that this is not a manageable amount of information for the agency, the regulations can be adjusted down the road. Certainly the commentary we've heard from all the parties is that we want to send a strong message to the organized criminals.

The Acting Chair (Mr. Paul Szabo): Mr. Abbott, since we're talking about the threshold, maybe we ought to make sure everybody's had their input here.

There seems to be some evidence that the $1,000 threshold does occur at a level where money laundering does take place. It's a fact. If the thresholds were to change, even if you made them lower, chances are that money laundering would occur at a lower level and try to disperse itself even further simply to carry on the activity. It will try, but obviously as you get into lower denominations, the incidence or the frequency of these transactions starts to go up and it creates patterns.

No matter how you do it, if you get sufficient patterns at other levels, maybe that's okay, but I suspect the experiences... Mr. Killam, maybe our inspectors...

I was interested in the examples H&R Block was giving with regard to the kinds of transactions... Maybe it would be of interest or appropriate to suggest what kinds of activities are going on with regard to items that would be in the range of $1,000.

Officer Goulet.

Staff Sergeant Lou Goulet (Royal Canadian Mounted Police): Thank you, Mr. Chairman.

If I could make reference to a common analogy, there are four factors that are common to all laundering operations: the true ownership and the real source of the money must be concealed; the form is, for the most part, changed—in other words, you reduce the bulk; the trail left must be obscured; and there's a constant control amongst these individuals, i.e. theft.

Under the old regulations, under section 11, where this number started years ago, it had to do with foreign exchange dealing where there was a requirement for a verification of identity for any transaction in excess of $1,000. Shortly thereafter, we decided to test the water. In the mid-1990s, we went through approximately 85 exchanges. That was held in the provinces of Quebec, Ontario, Alberta, and British Columbia. Of those 85 exchanges, to make a long story short, we found non-compliance in anywhere from 40% to 70%, in that there was not a request for that simple identification at the $1,000 mark.

In the second step of the process, we introduced moneys over $10,000. The third step of our intelligence phase was to go to the next step: we'll give you $25,000 and we'll tell you it's drug money. There was non-compliance in there.

All that is to say that there are also distinct stages in the money-laundering process. They're called placement, levering, integration, and repatriation. The placement stage is the weakest link. As you're well aware, once it's in the system and the wire transfers go across the globe, what they can do in two hours requires two years of reactive police work, more often than not.

I don't know if that answers your question directly, but on those thresholds, I agree with Assistant Commissioner Killam. As a police agency, we are open to furthering this discussion in terms of what's best for everyone and making it work. It's a complex issue, and I think, with the discussions and the fact that it is covered off in regulations, we can probably come to a reasonable threshold after hearing all the arguments related to it, if there are new things we are not aware of. I say that because our colleagues in intelligence units—I believe you heard from NCIS yesterday—had to go through the learning curve at the outset as well, and the listening on both sides could achieve this.

• 1635

The Acting Chair (Mr. Paul Szabo): Are there further comments on the $1,000 issue? Have we added that to everybody's satisfaction?

Thank you.

[Translation]

Mr. Marceau.

Mr. Richard Marceau: Mr. Chairman, first of all, four people want to leave. You do not have to stay. You can leave if you want to.

[English]

All your friends are gone, so if you want to go, go now.

[Translation]

First of all, I am happy to welcome our witnesses. When I asked to be transferred from the Justice Committee to the Finance Committee it was to avoid seeing some of you again. Unfortunately, we are meeting again. So welcome. Jokes aside, I'm pleased to see you again. I am going to start with a question for Mr. Law.

Are you receiving the translation?

[English]

Mr. Warren Law: Yes, but barely—I'm fine.

[Translation]

Mr. Richard Marceau: Mr. Law, I would like to know, in your opinion, how many transactions over $10,000 per day or per year the banks will have to report to the Centre.

[English]

Mr. Warren Law: I think it would be useful to get the industry experience from Mr. McLean.

Mr. Gene McLean: Certainly, if we talk wire transfers alone, you would have in excess of maybe 100,000 a day or more over $25,000.

The Acting Chair (Mr. Paul Szabo): That's for the banking industry?

Mr. Gene McLean: That's for the banking industry.

[Translation]

Mr. Richard Marceau: I'm going to play a little bit of ping- pong. Mr. Killam or Mr. Goulet, do you think that a centre would be able to manage 100,000 transactions per day and analyze them?

[English]

A/Commr Tom Killam: I would say yes. I'll defer to my colleagues, but I would say other countries have the same problem dealing with that many transactions a day. There are three diagrams on the wall; they're not just for target practice. It gives you an indication of how technology is used to try to connect all these transactions together.

The veil that money launderers use is that they try to have their transactions spread over a lot of different areas at different times. The idea, of course, with the centre is that while they come in at a very low level of suspicion, because they're just over a certain figure, if you put them into a large database, you try to collate it together and you get trends. And maybe there's a good side to Canada being one of the last countries to have a centre. We've learned what the others have done. There are many databases out there that do exactly that. They collate it, get the information together, and they say...

I was trying to explain this earlier on. Before, if we got one little transaction, say a suspicious $25,000 transaction from a bank... If anybody has done a 1,000-piece puzzle, you'll know you get one little piece of that puzzle—that's the suspicious transaction from the bank. That alone can't tell you what the picture looks like. That piece of the puzzle now will go to a centre, and hopefully with other pieces of transactions coming from other banks... put together you'll get a larger piece of that picture so that you can then do the investigation.

I want to try to educate the committee as well that this tells you only that there's been money laundering or there appears to be money laundering, and it's at a very low level. Then, as an investigative agency, we have to prove the substantive offence that it was money from criminal activity, one of the criminal activities listed in the Criminal Code—a designated drug offence or an economic crime offence.

So there's a lot that has to be done, but at least it gives you a better picture. And yes, you're right. It seems that it's very difficult to do, but perhaps Mr. Goulet can explain how that works at other financial intelligence units.

S/Sgt Lou Goulet: Well, if I could add, sir, what this is right here is what they call a wagon wheel, and it's from our colleagues, FinCEN. Each one of those yellow lines there is a transaction. The green lines stand for location, the brown lines stand for accounts, the yellow lines are transactions, the pink are business names, and the blue are people. All that is to give you a pictorial view. It is all sorted and collated by artificial intelligence. So if I pick this spot right here, this is probably what it looks like over here. After it's massaged and worked upon, you have an actual link and trend of the organization.

Now, I bring this forth to demonstrate that in fact there is a capability by organizations to do this. This is an actual case from FinCEN in the United States, but it's sanitized for presentation purposes. Now, are there 100,000 transactions there? I don't know. There certainly looks to be a lot. So the short answer is yes, it can be done. Would every one of these transactions that are spoken about be all reported in any event, of the 100,000 per day?

But the technology, artificial intelligence, will bring you from here to here. Hopefully, the centre, as we see it at the end of the day, would have that capability to not only... it should not merely be seen as a system of informing the police. This whole bill represents the commitment of the financial sector of Canada against the development of organized crime. As A/Commr Killam has stated, this is not the panacea. It's another tool in the box for law enforcement.

[Translation]

Mr. Richard Marceau: Thank you for explaining the pictures. They look like some of the drawings my two-year-old twins have done for me, which I've put in my office. So that makes sense. Thank you.

Mr. Law, I have a question for you. On page 3 of your document, you say that the legislation should not be overly prescriptive. In the following paragraph, based on my reading of it, and I might be mistaken, you seem to be saying that you deplore the absence of a definition for "reasonable grounds to suspect".

That seems a bit contradictory to me. Would you like there to be a definition for reasonable grounds or, at least, a partial definition? And if that is what you want, do you have a definition to suggest?

[English]

Mr. Warren Law: Well, what we're aiming for is a workable system. To the extent that you have uncertainty in the regime you're creating, that detracts from the workability of the system. When you look at certain sections of Bill C-22, I think there's some work to be done. The expression is “the devil is in the details”.

For example, clause 7 deals with suspicious transactions. What is a suspicious transaction? When do you have reasonable grounds for believing that the transaction should be reported? The consultation paper that the Department of Finance came out with said guidelines would be developed to assist us in knowing when we have reasonable grounds. All we're saying is we urge the government to develop these guidelines to help us, so that we know when we have to report under clause 7.

[Translation]

Mr. Richard Marceau: I have one last question for you and then I will have some questions for the others. A cost will be associated with these new obligations. Normally, where there are new obligations, there are costs. As you are aware—and I am speaking on my own behalf, but also on behalf of the witnesses, who, I believe, think the same thing—bank charges are already very high.

Can you guarantee that the costs of these new obligations will not be passed on to bank clients, because to some extent it is your responsibility, as a corporate citizen and a citizen of society in general?

• 1645

[English]

Mr. Warren Law: As an association we represent many members, and of course it would be a business decision on how they would handle the costs associated with the new legislation themselves. But it's also worth noting that to the extent you have certainty in the legislation, it creates efficiencies and will have an impact on lowering costs. From that standpoint as well, I urge the government to make sure the legislation as passed, including the regulations and guidelines, is as certain and as clear as possible.

[Translation]

Mr. Richard Marceau: Do I have time for another question?

I have one last question. Mr. Griffin, I could not forget about you.

On page 7 of your notes you say:

“The $10,000 mandatory reporting level is appropriate and should not be softened.”

[Translation]

I am asking the question because I want an answer, and not because I want to play the devil's advocate. Isn't the requirement to report any suspicious transaction sufficient? Do we really need this cut-off point? Can't we trust the banks, H&R Block or others to say: whether it is more or less than $10,000, when it is suspicious, we will declare it? Is it really necessary to declare all $10,000-transactions?

[English]

Mr. David Griffin: As I understand the legislation and the proposed regulatory scheme, there will be exemptions for the types of transactions the bankers raised with respect to inter-institutional exchange of funds and government-type transactions, where paper trails exists. But we certainly believe, on the cash transactions, the type of mandatory reporting, and the wiring on behalf of individuals, that there has to be sufficient information reported to the FTRAC agency to ensure that information forms part of their analysis to determine whether or not there is reasonable suspicion of money laundering.

So from our perspective, throw the net out as wide as you can, and as the agency comes together and begins to look at this information, if there are things that are not relevant to this purpose, then start separating them, as opposed to confining the type of information that can be collected by legislation and then having to go through a similar process in the future with respect to changing those limits to where they should be.

The other point I'd like to respond to is the suggestion made yesterday that some types of institutions, such as churches, should be exempt from reporting. There are traditional types of institutions, such as churches, and there are other organizations that may try to fall under the umbrella of being churches, but you have to be very careful when you start throwing those exemptions out there.

[Translation]

Mr. Richard Marceau: Thank you.

[English]

The Acting Chair (Mr. Paul Szabo): Thank you, Mr. Marceau.

[Translation]

Mr. Gallaway, please.

[English]

Mr. Roger Gallaway: I'm speechless at the moment, but I'll get over it.

A voice: That's unusual.

Mr. Roger Gallaway: It is.

I want to ask Mr. Irving a question first. We've heard the question posed by Mr. Marceau regarding costs. Has your organization carried out any study or some sort of plan on what you foresee the cost to your company will be in terms of complying with this legislation?

Mr. Bonar Irving: No, we haven't. We only received an invitation to give input about a week ago. We have not done any study that says at a certain volume the cost will be a given amount of dollars. All we know is that with this our costs will have to go up.

Mr. Roger Gallaway: In your brief you referred to a $1,000 threshold at one point where you have to keep records—or was it $3,000? Where did you get that number? You referred to part IV of the bill. I looked at part IV and maybe I missed it, but I couldn't find it anywhere. Maybe one of our researchers can tell us where it appears. I'm just wondering where you got that number.

• 1650

A/Commr Tim Killam: It's from your regulations, I would assume.

Mr. Roger Gallaway: It's from the regulations. All right.

That leads to the next question I would pose to the Bankers Association and our friends from H&R. This is a very open-ended act, and I think it's very disturbing from a parliamentarian's point of view that we are passing off great authority to a stand-alone agency, which will be created by this act if it passes as is, that will create a lot of rules that no one in Parliament will ever see. In fact, this agency won't even report to Parliament. For a business person such as you who represents a corporation, that must be a concern. That's why I asked you the question about costs.

I would ask the Canadian Bankers Association, have you done any studies on costs, as you know them? You and I know that any regulations at this point are simply a mirage.

Mr. Gene McLean: No. I guess we could say that the additional costs would certainly include electronics, a new reporting system, and the training of staff.

Mr. Roger Gallaway: So you and your members have in no way quantified what this will all mean.

Mr. Gene McLean: No.

Mr. Roger Gallaway: Mr. Marceau has asked you to give an undertaking, as I understand it, about cost to customers—of course, that's of a sensitive nature—trying to balance that with the reason to combat criminal activity, and we are all in favour of combating criminal activity.

You point out in your brief that there's no definition of reasonable grounds to report a transaction. I think it's a valid point.

I'd like to ask you, Mr. Killam, if you think this is a reasonable way of going about it. Let me put it another way. Is there an alternative whereby institutions and groups... We don't even know who's included in the required reporting provisions of this bill, because that's going to be prescribed by regulation if this bill proceeds as is. This great net of people, businesses, and institutions that are going to be caught, if we follow what Mr. Griffin has said, will even include churches. Under this great umbrella, a bunch of people are going to have to report, if they have reasonable grounds, but we don't know what that means.

At the same time, we have a defence system in this country called Canada Customs. Canada Customs does not require everybody who comes into the country to fill out a form. Section 110 of the American Immigration Act, coming into effect April 1, 2001, says that everybody must fill out a form. The Government of Canada is fighting against that law in the United States because they say it's unreasonable.

Perhaps it's not a fair analogy, but do you think this regime—we don't know what the regime is going to be today; it's going to be laid down by regulation—is being laid down in a reasonable way, or is there an alternative? That alternative would be to rely upon those people who deal in the marketplace to recognize that some transactions are usual—maybe exceptional at times but nonetheless usual—as opposed to laying down this hailstorm of what won't be ice, but will be paper.

A/Commr Tim Killam: That's a lot of information you've given me, but I guess at the end of it I think—and please correct me if I'm going the wrong way—

Mr. Roger Gallaway: All right.

A/Commr Tim Killam: —obviously the voluntary way of doing business is what we had. We had a reporting scheme, people reported it... Pardon me, they recorded it; they didn't have to report it. But I can honestly say we had a very good relationship with the CBA and the chartered banks. The difficulty was there was no way of collating it the way you have here.

• 1655

Yes, unusual is the way. These transactions come into this centre—and Mr. Griffin wasn't trying to say the church would have to report; it would be the bank or the financial institution that would see it and it would report it. That information would come into this centre and then it would be collated. Because it came in at such a low level, a low threshold of suspicion or unusualness, if there's such a word, then it would be built up by the centre and then passed off to the police once it got to a certain level of reasonableness. After that, of course, for the police, if that's not enough to lay charges or do a whole lot of things, then there has to be an investigation to see if there are reasonable grounds to go get court orders and to do their thing.

So it doesn't ever get to the police out of the centre until it's been built up by the centre. We would never see it. When we do see it, the first thing we see from the centre is very much like tombstone data. It's very basic data saying “Mr. Gallaway did such and such at such and such a place". The reason they sent it to the police was it was built from a very unusual level up to another threshold—not at a criminal level, but approaching that, in-between that.

So that's the framework, which is based upon what's happened in all the other countries of the Financial Action Task Force as well. In my former position I was very much involved in the discussions around it with departments.

Mr. Roger Gallaway: This is your primary task, I assume, this file, in the sense of money laundering. That's one of your primary preoccupations.

A/Commr Tim Killam: It was, yes.

Mr. Roger Gallaway: Could you tell me of another country that has an agency that is designed along the lines of this one?

A/Commr Tim Killam: Yes, there's the Netherlands, Belgium. FinCEN is very similar.

Mr. Roger Gallaway: Let's pick one, then. How does the Netherlands differ from the Canadian model proposed here?

A/Commr Tim Killam: My colleague here is more familiar, but each country has differences depending on their charter and their domestic laws. But the basic premise is exactly the same.

Mr. Roger Gallaway: I understand the premise is the same. You've read the bill. You see how the centre is going to be designed and how the director will be appointed. Is there another jurisdiction, another country, that we have copied? I'm talking now about specifics, as opposed to general principles.

A/Commr Tim Killam: Yes, we have the acts for all the different countries.

Mr. Roger Gallaway: What I'm asking is whether there is one that we're taking as a template. Or is this a made-in-Canada solution?

A/Commr Tim Killam: No, it's not a made-in-Canada solution. It's a made-in-Canada solution considering our laws and our charter.

Mr. Roger Gallaway: All right.

A/Commr Tim Killam: As a matter of fact, in Canada, because of our charter and our privacy protections, it's much more difficult. It's much harder. We have to be very careful with it.

The question was asked, I think it was yesterday, by Mr. Abbott about why it wasn't in the police... The reason why it's not going to the police is because anything that comes in unusual to the police would be contrary to the charter, period. We can't use it. It would make it a lot easier if we had our own intelligence, and we'd put it all together and do something. Of course, that would be much easier. That's not the way it is in Canada. That's because of the framework we have with our charter and our privacy protections, which, obviously, is what we all want in this country. But this is a made-in-Canada solution because of that framework, but basically using the same principles.

As a matter of fact, when it comes to the regulations and the things that the bankers and H&R Block were talking about, we'll be looking at those to say there's a place to start on discussions.

Mr. Roger Gallaway: That's an idea, but our job here is to satisfy ourselves that the legal framework is not left to people who are not accountable to the public. When you set up a framework that is premised on regulation—and I'm accountable to the public and perhaps somebody working at the centre isn't, in the same sense. So we have a set of rules laid down by regulation that are going to govern such things as laid out in clause 6, amongst other clauses of this bill.

Having regard to that, can you tell me another jurisdiction, then, you having studied this, where the rules are laid down by regulation as opposed to defined in the legislative framework setting up the operations?

• 1700

A/Commr Tim Killam: I don't have other laws in front of me.

Mr. Roger Gallaway: Thank you.

The Acting Chair (Mr. Paul Szabo): Thank you.

On one of your points, Mr. Gallaway, clause 72 of the bill does call for the five-year review by Parliament or by a committee.

Mr. Roger Gallaway: I understand that, but it's still a five-year hiatus where it's—

The Acting Chair (Mr. Paul Szabo): A five-year hiatus is your concern, not that there isn't a parliamentary review. It's a one-time review, not an ongoing five-year review, which has been a subject of discussion with other bills, such as the revenue collection agency and others. That's important.

I think members probably have exhausted their list. Maybe the witnesses would like to comment on the concept of what constitutes a suspicious transaction. We've had others suggest to us that it's not a defined concept and that we should define it. Interestingly enough, we've had some difficulty having someone come forward with a definition. I think the frustration is that suspicion is in the eyes of the beholder in that setting and in that environment. Is there a consensus among the group that although it would be desirable to have some way to get out of this, it may not be pragmatic to try to define such a concept?

Mr. Warren Law: I think there are certain patterns of conduct that law enforcement agencies have identified, which would certainly lead you to suspicions about a transaction.

A/Commr Tim Killam: Yes, that's exactly it, and my colleague here has mentioned that what's suspicious in one part of the country, for instance, what's suspicious in Metcalfe, is not the same as what's suspicious in Ottawa versus Montreal. Not to trivialize it, but as well a number of the other financial intelligence units, in cooperation with the banks, have developed software that spits out things that are unusual. There are little blips that are pulled out. Those are the kinds of things...

S/Sgt Lou Goulet: Mr. Szabo, if I could add something, clearly it requires constant examination, as ways of doing business, record-keeping, retrieval systems, and methods of fraudulent transfers actually evolve.

One of the areas we looked at, for example, was the Netherlands, where they use objective and subjective indicators to come to a conclusion. By way of example, for cash transactions below a threshold amount, they will look at a series of identifiers, which include—and they are not in isolation, but say someone comes in below the threshold, along with identification problems, unusual conditions offered, it's an atypical transaction for the client, the transaction has unusual packaging, there are frequent deposits by other account holders, no explicable legal objective, outstanding turnovers, etc. Then they have a series of indicators that are collectively used to view that particular transaction.

This is, again, a work-in-progress, but there are examples out there that are in fact being utilized today by other units, in this case the Netherlands.

Mr. Jim Abbott: I have a quick point. It's unfortunate, but I think Mr. Gallaway has left. I'm looking through the bill as drafted, and clause 71 states:

71. The Director shall, on or before September 30 of each year following the Centre's first full year of operations, submit an annual report on the operations of the Centre for the preceding year to the Minister, and the Minister shall table a copy of the report in each House of Parliament on any of the first 30 days on which that House is sitting after the Minister receives the report.
It's unfortunate that Mr. Gallaway isn't here, but I find myself a little confused. I think this clause covers his concern.

The Acting Chair (Mr. Paul Szabo): Yes. The subtlety is that there's no undertaking on behalf of the minister to refer to the committee for study. It's there for their information, but whether clause 72 actually requires Parliament to conduct a review of the administration of the agency... In any event, I have a feeling that this will be discussed again tomorrow.

• 1705

Gentlemen, thank you very much for your input. It was helpful to the committee. I think you've touched on some important issues. There was a suggestion, a recommendation, about the word “all” in the due diligence, and in fact I'm advised that this amendment is going to be put forward. So thank you for picking it up, and we are certainly going to be responding to that.

I appreciate all of your input on this important act, and thank you for your time.

The meeting is adjourned.

April 13, 2000 [House of Commons Standing Committee on Finance]

The Chair (Mr. Maurizio Bevilacqua (Vaughan—King—Aurora, Lib.)): I'd like to call the meeting to order. As you know, the order of the day is the clause-by-clause of Bill C-22.

Before we begin, there were some concerns raised by Mr. Abbott and, I believe, by Mr. Marceau as well. We'll give them some time to express their points of view on whatever issue it is.

Mr. Abbott.

Mr. Jim Abbott (Kootenay—Columbia, Canadian Alliance): Thank you, Mr. Chairman.

We raised the issue in the committee yesterday afternoon and I raise it again today: the issue of process. Understand that the Canadian Alliance...and I state this for, what, the fifteenth time? Understand that the Canadian Alliance is fully in favour of this legislation in principle. That is an unqualified statement. As always, the devil is in the details.

I have a tremendous amount of respect for the parliamentary process, and part of the parliamentary process is what we're doing here right now in committee. In committee, an opportunity is given not only for witnesses but for the minister and for the department officials to be able to explain legislation to the legislators who are responsible for it, to inform us of their perspectives. We have heard some very interesting perspectives from people.

You can appreciate that unlike the government, which has literally hundreds of lawyers in at least three departments, I have one lawyer who is responsible for helping me with this legislation along with legislation on other issues that come from at least three other departments. This is, like, 500 to 1, quite literally.

To take the process whereby, as the official opposition, we concluded hearing witnesses at 5:30 p.m. yesterday and at 9 a.m. this morning we're supposed to be starting on clause-by-clause.... I suggest it is not a good process. It is not a fair process in terms of the official opposition being able to do its job. I have a responsibility on behalf of 62% of the people of Canada.

I don't want to get into the political rhetoric here, but there is the whole issue of balance in the parliamentary process. I have difficulty with the process—again, to be precise—in that we have reached a point, as I understand it in private discussion between myself and Mr. Cullen, the parliamentary secretary, where this committee has a lot of work that it has to get through.

We are all in agreement, and I am in full agreement, that we want this legislation through as quickly as possible, but within this process we are involved in, it is impossible for me to do my job properly or adequately. It is an impossible process.

So I have decided, as an accommodation in good faith to the committee, that what I would prefer to do is to monitor this session, as opposed to participating in this session.

Let me just make one more explanation. We all know that legislation, when we're going through clause-by-clause.... We all know that each clause does not live and die by itself. In fact, each clause either supplements other clauses or refines the thought in other clauses. In other words, it is a seamless document—or should be a seamless document.

Therefore, for me to be involved in the process of commenting on clause 22 when in fact my counsel has an opportunity to take a look at it and says, well, clause 22 didn't do whatever needed to happen, and clause 17...and so on and so forth. I am unarmed at this particular point. I require expertise, and I have not had the opportunity, because of the process, to get that expertise.

So as an accommodation—because we do want to see this through—and in good faith, what I'm proposing is for me, as the official opposition, to monitor the proceedings today. I would hope that the government would then provide me with the legislation as amended and with any other pertinent data. I will submit that to my counsel. Over the two-week break of Parliament, my counsel will have an opportunity to look at it. Then I will reinsert the official opposition at report stage.

The only accommodation I would ask for, of course.... I have no idea whether we will be recommending amendments or not; that is absolutely impossible to forecast. Also, will our amendments, if they do come forward, be acceptable to the government or not? Again, who's to know?

In the same good faith that I am exhibiting to the government and within this process, I'm simply asking that very serious consideration be given to any amendments that we do bring forward and that the amendments not be seen as political and certainly not as hostile, that they be seen as amendments that, in our judgment, would enhance the legislation.

I think this is probably the best way. It's unfortunate, I do have to say—politically now for just a second—that the government has taken two years. We've been after the government throughout this entire process in our debate and in committee. It's unfortunate that the government has taken two years to bring this forward. It's doubly unfortunate that, having had it brought forward finally at the end of two years, we're now in a fire drill to see the end of it.

I don't think this process is a good way to do important legislation like this, legislation that has the far-reaching impact this legislation has. So I chastise the government for that. I think the process is just a bad process.

Thank you, Mr. Chairman.

The Chair: Thank you, Mr. Abbott. Just so we understand, for the record here, Bill C-22 was first introduced March 31, 1999. These clauses have existed for quite a while, and it also received first reading in the House of Commons on December 15, 1999. So in reference to the content of the bill, we've had ample opportunity to at least review it. That's my point of view on that. I do take your point of view, and I think it's an important statement you make.

Just so everybody here understands what happened, we agreed to a work schedule. Unfortunately, I don't think you were the member who agreed to that work schedule, and I gather the other person didn't speak to you, hence there is that kind of challenge you are now facing. But the points you've made are good points.

Mr. Jim Abbott: If I may, I just want to point out that your statement is correct, and indeed the official opposition has some responsibility for what you just mentioned. I'm fully aware of that and I accept that responsibility, on behalf of the official opposition. We have been aware of these clauses, but we have not been aware of the testimony that has been brought forward, and that is my concern. I want to take a look at the legislation, in light of the testimony, and receive counsel.

[Translation]

The Chair: Mr. Marceau.

Mr. Richard Marceau (Charlesbourg, BQ): Mr. Chairman, continuing somewhat in the same vein as my colleague Mr. Abbott, I would have to say that you have raised a very valid argument. However, I find it somewhat simplistic. If, after reviewing Bill C- 22, formerly known as Bill C-81, we had already formed a clear, definitive opinion before even hearing from all of the witnesses who appeared before us, why then would we have bothered to hear from witnesses in the first place? Do we not invite witnesses to give testimony - and some of this testimony is rather remarkable - precisely because we want to form some opinions?

Before arriving here, we the members of the Bloc Québécois had some idea of what we expected to find in the bill. It was part of our 1997 election platform. Therefore, we support the bill in principle.

Having said this, some of the testimony we have heard has raised a number of questions. As my colleague Mr. Abbott pointed out, after adjourning yesterday at 5 p.m., here we are resuming our proceedings at 9 a.m. this morning. This doesn't leave us much time to thoroughly analyse all of the testimony presented. I also understand that the committee feels somewhat pressed for time. We are running a little behind schedule and we don't need anything more on our plate.

I have a question, or rather more of a suggestion to make. Since we are going to break for two weeks, would it be possible, instead of holding a regular Finance Committee meeting, to convene at 4 p.m. on a Monday or Tuesday and to take the time we need to consider this matter? Today, we're sitting from 9 a.m. to 1 p.m., or a total of four hours. We could sit from 4 p.m. to 8 p.m. one evening, or from 4 p.m. to midnight, to consider this bill, without taking up time set aside for another issue.

We could accomplish quite a bit during these two weeks. Several privacy issues have been raised. Is the protection afforded by the Privacy Act sufficient to alleviate the concerns that have been raised? During these two weeks, the committee could perhaps ask the Privacy Commissioner to share his views on the proposed legislation with us, because frankly we don't know where he stands on this bill. Furthermore, all of the witnesses, whether they support the bill or not, spoke of the balance that needs to be maintained between preventing crime and protecting privacy.

Perhaps we could take advantage of this two-week period to sound out the Privacy Commissioner, seek his opinion, get down to work, roll up our sleeves and stay a little later. We could order in sandwiches or a pizza and get the job done.

The Bloc supports the principle underlying this bill, but in light of the testimony presented, I don't think we would be doing our job if we didn't take the time to review this testimony properly.

• 0920

Once again, I don't think it's a question of not being willing to act in good faith. It's simply that my opinion of the bill has been influenced by the testimony of certain witnesses. If there was no chance whatsoever of being influenced by the testimony heard, then why would we even bother to call in witnesses at all? Thank you.

[English]

The Chair: Mr. Cullen.

Mr. Roy Cullen (Etobicoke North, Lib.): Thank you, Mr. Chairman.

First of all, when this bill went to the House it was sent to the committee on division. For the opposition parties and all members who were there, the government appreciated that. This is a bill Canadians want. As the opposition parties have pointed out, sometimes at length, it's been long in coming. It was in the last session and it's now back again.

I understand the anxiety about the pace of what we're looking at here, but I can tell you there are three other pieces of legislation: the Budget Implementation Act, 1999, the Budget

Implementation Act, 2000, and another bill dealing with the excise tax and the harmonized sales tax that are in the House, or will be in the House this week. This committee, in its wisdom, has decided to look at a number of projects that have been proposed by the opposition parties.

So I suppose the government side would express some empathy about the pace. The fact is there is a lot of legislation in the pipeline.

Canadians want this bill. The police agencies in Canada, as we heard yesterday, want the bill and want us to get on with it. Having said that, I've undertaken with the official opposition that once Mr. Abbott has had a chance to review it, if he has some issues of substance, I'll certainly review those conjointly with the department. We'll make every effort to satisfy him, one way or the other, about his concerns. I would certainly offer the same thing to the other opposition parties.

With that, Mr. Chairman, I think the problem we have is we will lose two weeks, when the department is developing regulations and will have to essentially put things on hold, and that will cause another delay. I respectfully ask the committee to deal with this today. If any amendments are proposed later that come out of the in-depth review by the opposition parties, I will certainly undertake to review them very carefully with the parties to see if there's anything that should or could be done.

The Chair: Thank you, Mr. Cullen. As always, I'm in the hands of the members of the committee when it comes to the workings of this committee. What I'm really bound to right now is the work schedule everybody has approved. It was unanimously approved by all members of the Canadian Alliance, the Bloc, the NDP, the Conservatives, and the Liberals, so I will have to operate on that premise.

However, Mr. Marceau and Mr. Abbott, you raise very good points that will be duly noted. Mr. Cullen, I think you have provided us with a compromise position that will suit the committee—that is, until Mr. Gallaway speaks.

Mr. Gallaway, you have the floor. I understand you have some amendments as well.

Mr. Roger Gallaway (Sarnia—Lambton, Lib.): I've already tabled them.

I think we should have some consideration for what the opposition has said. It's fine to talk about the convenience of the department and say the department is developing regulations, but I think the process works the other way. The laws have to be made and the regulations flow from that, so I find that somewhat of a specious argument.

It's also a question of fairness. Just because a work schedule has been adopted and other events intervene, if we wait to do this immediately after the break, I can't imagine why that isn't fair. I'm not concerned about the department creating regulations in a two-week period. If indeed this bill has been languishing or has been talked about since 1997, I think it was said, another two weeks won't mean anything.

I want to suggest we adjourn consideration of this bill until the Tuesday when we return. I don't know the date.

An hon. member: May 2.

Mr. Roger Gallaway: May 2.

• 0925

The Chair: Mr. Gallaway, I must point out that the fact that you came here today prepared with these amendments would lead me to believe you were probably ready to deal with clause-by-clause today.

Mr. Roger Gallaway: No, I wasn't.

The Chair: So you just forwarded these for...?

Mr. Roger Gallaway: Well, there are more yet.

The Chair: So at report stage, I guess.

Mr. Roger Gallaway: You will know that in terms of the resources of the House, there's very little one can do. These were cobbled together yesterday, but these are very rudimentary little changes. If one were going to do anything of any substance, it's impossible.

You would know, Mr. Chairman, that there are only five legislative counsel in the employ of the House, three of whom have just begun, and it's a learning curve for them, so you're really dealing with two people with experience. This is not a criticism of the other three, but they're new on the scene and they're learning the operations here. So it's fine to talk about taking into consideration the viewpoints of the opposition, but that's to ignore the process that is laid down in this place.

The process is that members of all parties, regardless of political stripe, be given the opportunity to propose amendments at committee stage. Moving this to some other stage is being patently unfair. It's not a question of one party versus another; it's a question of members' rights.

The Chair: Thank you, Mr. Gallaway. I do want to note the point you made about counsel, which is a bigger issue vis-à-vis resources of committees. We'll note that one as well.

Are we ready to proceed to clause-by-clause?

[Translation]

Mr. Richard Marceau: Can we put this to a vote?

[English]

The Chair: This is the order of reference. The order of the day is that we're doing clause-by-clause. That's the reason we're here.

Mr. Roger Gallaway: Then I'll make a motion that we adjourn until May 2 consideration of Bill C-22.

The Chair: Okay.

Apparently if you add a date, it becomes a debatable motion, but if it's without a date, we simply vote on it.

Mr. Roger Gallaway: Well, I think you have to put a date on it. I'm not moving that we just adjourn. I'm moving that clause-by-clause consideration of Bill C-22 be adjourned until May 2.

The Chair: That's fair enough. Is there any debate on this issue?

Mr. Marceau.

[Translation]

Mr. Richard Marceau: Mr. Chairman, if I really wanted to be a pain in the neck, I would say that we're going to debate the issues and that I'm prepared to speak for three hours. As a lawyer, I know that a person can say just about anything, or nothing at all, and go on for quite a long time. I could do that, but I don't intend to. We can set a date and I'll not debate the issue. However, if we agree to vote...

I'd like to be able to count on the members opposite acting in good faith. I don't want to turn this into a political debate, because we do support the bill. Could we possibly agree among ourselves that we don't really have the time for this and that it's preferable to adjourn for two weeks? We've been waiting two years for this bill. Two weeks more won't make any difference. It won't keep anyone awake at night.

Mr. Gallaway's motion has opened the door to a possible min- filibuster. We could undertake a clause by clause study of the bill and not get through everything, but we would be no further ahead for it. This would be of no benefit to anyone seated here at this table or to the department. I think we should recognize this fact and agree not to wage a procedural battle over this.

[English]

The Chair: Is there any further comment?

Mr. Abbott.

Mr. Jim Abbott: Well, I will not be entering into anything to do with the filibuster.

I agree with my colleague from the Bloc. I have had prior conversation with Mr. Cullen, and I've outlined the position of the Canadian Alliance. However, the suggestion of Mr. Marceau of doing this even on the Monday that we come back, from 4 to 8 o'clock or from 4 to 12 o'clock or whatever the case may be, would accommodate the concerns that have been raised about the process.

• 0930

The only possible argument I can think of or that I've heard to this point, from Mr. Cullen or anyone else, relates to the production of regulations within the department. It seems to me that is probably not a gigantic problem.

Again, maybe Mr. Cullen can convince us that the two-week delay in the department being able to go ahead with the regulations, particularly in light of the fact that we do have word processing equipment on which they could be producing the regulations in view of what they think the legislation is going to be.... I can't see that really is a problem with the delay.

I'm inclined to agree with this motion. As I say, it seems to me it works us out of this procedural problem without any undue delay.

The Chair: Okay.

Mr. Cullen.

Mr. Roy Cullen: I think we probably want to get on with this, but I just want to clarify something.

I take extreme exception to the suggestion from the member from Sarnia—Lambton that moving this forward now has anything to do with the departmental schedule or priorities. It has to do with moving forward with a piece of legislation that Canadians want, that law enforcement agencies want, and that we want to get on with.

The Chair: Is the debate exhausted at this point? Have all the points been made?

Some hon. members: Yes.

The Chair: Okay. We'll move to the vote. Do you want a recorded vote?

Mr. Jim Abbott: Sure.

(Motion negatived: nays 7; yeas 3)

The Chair: Thank you.

We're now moving to clause-by-clause. We have some government amendments, and we also have some amendments filed with us, I believe this morning, by Mr. Gallaway; we'll be dealing with those as well. Does everybody have the amendments tabled by the government and Mr. Gallaway?

Mr. Roy Cullen: I don't have Mr. Gallaway's.

The Chair: We will wait for everybody to get Mr. Gallaway's amendments before we proceed.

The Chair: Order.

Mr. Cullen.

(On clause 2—Definitions]

Mr. Roy Cullen: Mr. Chairman, what the member from Sarnia—Lambton has proposed would put the centre on the same basis as the Auditor General or the Privacy Commissioner, and the centre is an agency, an arm of the government, fulfilling a mandate of the government. The centre reports to the minister annually. The minister tables the report to Parliament. There's also a five-year review.

So on that basis, I think in concept what the member is proposing is not really appropriate, and I was wondering, given that all his amendments deal with that main theme, whether it would be possible to vote on all his amendments in a group.

The Chair: Yes. They're consequential, so we can.

Mr. Roy Cullen: Okay.

The Chair: So that's where we're moving—to the vote on the first amendment.

Mr. Roger Gallaway: Let's vote on them now then.

The Chair: Okay. Mr. Gallaway, would you like a recorded vote on this?

Mr. Roger Gallaway: No, I think it's quite fine.

The Chair: Okay.

(Amendment negatived)

The Chair: So all the other amendments...and I have here L1 to L13. They're all defeated.

(Clauses 2 to 4 inclusive agreed to)

(On clause 5—Application of Part)

The Chair: We have two amendments on clause 5.

Mr. Roy Cullen: Yes, Mr. Chairman. I propose that clause 5 be amended by replacing line 19 on page 3 with the following:

(b) cooperative credit societies, savings and credit
Mr. Chairman, this amendment is to make the description of credit unions in this paragraph consistent with that in Quebec legislation. I think the members have the explanatory note, but if they don't...the amendment would include the term “savings union” in English and “caisses d'épargne” in French. So it's more a housekeeping amendment.

The Chair: Thank you.

(Amendment agreed to)

The Chair: Now we have amendment 2.

Mr. Roy Cullen: Yes, Mr. Chairman. I'd propose that clause 5 be amended by replacing, in the French version, line 22 on page 4 with the following:

Is that correct?

It's a potential ambiguity in the French version of the paragraph, Mr. Chairman, and that's a housekeeping amendment.

The Chair: Thank you very much, Mr. Cullen.

What this does, Mr. Chairman, is it allows the director of the centre to fix the remuneration of centre employees with the approval of Treasury Board.

The amendment would specify that once a mandate has been approved by the Treasury Board, the director would fix remuneration of employees in accordance with the mandate, without having to obtain further Treasury Board approval as required by section 56 of the Public Service Staff Relations Act.

(On clause 70—Audit)

The Chair: There's an amendment by the government.

Mr. Cullen.

Mr. Roy Cullen: Thank you, Mr. Chairman.

I propose that we amend clause 70 by replacing lines 29 to 31 on page 37 with the following:

70.(1) All receipts and expenditures of the Centre are subject to examination and audit by the Auditor General of Canada.
Then under “Use and disclosure”:

(2) The Auditor General of Canada and every person acting on behalf of or under the direction of the Auditor General of Canada shall not use or disclose any information referred to in subsection 55(1) that they have obtained, or to which they have had access, in the course of exercising powers or performing duties and functions under this Act or the Auditor General

Act, except for the purposes of exercising those powers or performing those duties and functions.
Mr. Chairman, colleagues, this has the okay of the Auditor General. Basically, it means that if there's a staff person or a contractor of the Auditor General doing an audit of the centre and they come across, for example, someone they know who has been investigated for a suspicious transaction, they would be obliged never to reveal that information and would suffer the consequences if they did.

The Chair: Thank you.

Yes, Mr. Szabo.

Mr. Paul Szabo (Mississauga South, Lib.): I wonder if the officials could advise us whether or not the rules of the Canadian Institute of Chartered Accountants would cause some difficulty with regard to chartered accountants who are in the employ of the Auditor General's office to the extent that they have professional rules of conduct that may require them to make reports to their association in the event that they become directly aware of information.

Mr. Roy Cullen: Could I just comment on that?

The Chair: Sure, Mr. Cullen.

Mr. Roy Cullen: Colleague, the comments that we heard from...this clause deals with something more specific than that, and I'll ask the officials to comment after I make a brief intervention.

With respect to the representation made by the CICA and the CGAs, the bill calls for...the types of activity will be defined by regulation. I will guarantee to you that the regulations will stipulate, with respect to accountants and lawyers, that in the normal course of their duty, let's say it's an audit, a test function, or preparing financial statements, they would be exempted. The only time they would be obliged to report would be if they were engaged as a financial intermediary in a transaction. And you have my undertaking; that is the way it will be expressed in the regulation.

(e.1) specifying the information to be contained in a report under section 7 or subsection 9(1)
Mr. Chairman, this is amended to provide explicit regulation-making authority to prescribe the information to be contained in a report under section 7 and subsection 9(1). Right now the act talks about the form and the manner, so conceivably we could have a situation where someone has a nice form and they're reporting it every month, or whatever is prescribed, but they include their favourite recipes in the form. (On clause 97—Bill C-6)

The Chair: Now we have government amendment G-10 on clause 97. Mr. Cullen.

Mr. Roy Cullen: This amendment responds to a representation by the Public Interest Advocacy Centre, who appeared yesterday. They followed up with the facts to the chair.

Basically what this amendment does is bring Bill C-22 in line with Bill C-6. In a nutshell, any non-disclosures by the centre or by a financial intermediary—in other words, anything that would be prejudicial to the detection of money laundering activities in Canada.... So for any information that was withheld for that purpose, as defined in the act, there would be a report to the Privacy Commissioner saying this information had been withheld. It responds to the Public Interest Advocacy Group.

Have the officials had a chance to talk to the privacy office on that point? Would you like to expand on that?

Mr. Charles Seeto (Director, Financial Sector Division, Department of Finance): We have called the privacy office. We called early this morning. We left a message with them and we hadn't gotten a response back from them.

Mr. Roy Cullen: Essentially, in a nutshell, Mr. Chairman, this gives a heightened level of comfort to the Privacy Commissioner. As the act reads now, the non-disclosure report would not be forthcoming to the Privacy Commissioner. This allows that so that the Privacy Commissioner has an understanding of the volume and the extent of non-disclosures. It actually adds to his or her mandate. We don't expect any difficulty there.

The Chair: Thank you, Mr. Cullen.

Before you leave, first of all, I want to thank all those of you who are here to vote and exercise your democratic right as responsible members of Parliament to be present at these hearings.

Secondly, I'd like to express to the officials my sincerest gratitude for all the work you have done, not only on this bill but on many bills that come to this committee. Your work is absolutely excellent and exceptional. From time to time we will come up with amendments to make improvements, but that's our duty and obligation to the people we represent. You can rest assured that this committee and the members of the House certainly appreciate the excellent quality of work and consultation that does take place throughout our country. You make a very serious contribution. I can sincerely tell you these comments are heartfelt.

Mr. Cullen.

Mr. Roy Cullen: Mr. Chairman, if I might, I'd just like to thank the members and the department as well. I'd also like to note for the record that we placed a call to Mr. Jim Abbott of the official opposition to see if he'd come back, because we were lacking quorum. He indicated he was prepared to do that. I'd like to thank him for that gesture of goodwill.

I'll certainly be working with the members of the opposition over the next couple of weeks. If there's anything substantive, we'll certainly be looking at it very carefully.

The Chair: Of course, to all the staff of the members of Parliament and also to our staff, clerk, researchers, and everybody involved in any way with the workings of the committee, as always, your work is greatly appreciated.

Thank you very much. The meeting is adjourned.

April 14, 2000 [House of Commons]

Mr. Maurizio Bevilacqua (Vaughan—King—Aurora, Lib.):

Mr. Speaker, I have the honour to present, in both official languages, the second report of the Standing Committee on Finance regarding its order of reference of Thursday, April 6, 2000 in relation to Bill C-22, an act to facilitate combatting the laundering of the proceeds of crime, to establish a financial transactions or reports analysis centre of Canada and to amend and repeal certain acts in consequence.

The Committee has considered Bill C-22 and reports the bill with amendment.

I want to quickly take the opportunity to thank the clerk, the researchers, the members of the committee, the witnesses and departmental officials for their excellent work.

May 3, 2000 [House of Commons]

The Acting Speaker (Mr. McClelland): There are 11 motions in amendment on the notice paper for the report stage of Bill C-22.

The motions will be grouped for debate as follows:

Group No. 1: Motion No. 1.

Group No. 2: Motions Nos. 2 to 7.

Group No. 3, Motions Nos. 8 to 11.

The voting pattern is available at the table. The Chair will inform the House of the details with each vote.

I will now put Motion No. 1 to the House.

Mr. Richard Marceau (Charlesbourg, BQ):

Motion No. 1

That Bill C-22 be amended by adding after line 10 on page 3 the following new clause:

"3.1 The persons and entities to which this Act applies shall not transfer to their clients, either directly or indirectly, any costs incurred by them in carrying out their obligations under this Act."

Mr. Speaker, I am pleased to speak to Bill C-22 which seeks to deter money laundering.

Most people agree with the objective of this bill. Indeed, who could support regulations and laws that are too lax in the area of money laundering?

That being said, we think some amendments are required not to change the bill's thrust but rather to improve the bill. It is in that spirit of co-operation and with a view to improving the legislation that we participated in all the various stages.

I want to mention that the time allocated to us between the end of the testimonies at the Standing Committee on Finance and the beginning of the review, particularly the clause by clause review, was much too short.

I ask that this House and all its committees ensure that, next time, more time be provided between the end of the testimonies and the beginning of the clause by clause review of a bill. Otherwise, what is the use of these testimonies, of all the efforts, money and time expended by witnesses to come and express their views, if we do not have time afterwards to digest this new information?

I want to explain what Motion No. 1 is all about. Bill C-22 imposes new obligations to various organizations and entities, such as banks, casinos and caisses populaires. We know that bank charges for most Quebec and Canadian consumers are already very high.

The bill imposes new obligations to these entities to help fight money laundering. The purpose of Motion No. 1 is to ensure that the costs resulting from the new obligations imposed by Bill C-22 on these various institutions are not passed on to clients.

In the fight against money laundering, this amendment obliges these institutions to be good corporate citizens. In the battle that all elements of society must wage against money laundering, we want to ensure that financial institutions become good corporate citizens and do not transfer to their clients the costs incurred in carrying out these new obligations. Finally, they must do their part so that everyone helps carry the load in the fight against money laundering; these institutions will have to absorb these costs, which are minor for them.

We know that the banks make profits in the billions. The idea is to prevent them from passing on the costs of these obligations to their clients. In my view, this would be a big improvement to the bill.

People say “Another obligation for the banks. They will pass on the bill to us. Our fees will go up again. This is crazy, we are already paying plenty”. The purpose of this amendment is to avoid all this and ensure that clients do not suffer because of these obligations.

Mr. Jim Abbott (Kootenay—Columbia, Canadian Alliance):

Mr. Speaker, I will be the third speaker to mention the whole issue of the compression of time. As I pointed out at second reading, the bill is long overdue. The government has been dragging its feet on it, and all of a sudden we are going at warp speed to try to get it through the procedure of the House of Commons.

I resent that very deeply on behalf of Canadian people because it is a vitally important bill. It has the potential to impact many hundreds of thousands if not millions of people in their financial transactions not only with respect to costs but also with respect to privacy issues and with respect to enforcement issues.

For that reason I have to concur with the hon. member from the Bloc Quebecois, although I do acknowledge on the part of the Liberal speaker before me that there had been an all party agreement to a work schedule When the work schedule became unworkable it was incumbent in my judgment on the government to revisit that work schedule.

I will be raising this issue in some depth when we get to third reading. Even as we speak there are ongoing negotiations on a bill and on clauses to a bill that have international ramifications, if not individual and national ramifications. I find the process to be completely unacceptable. It is a bill that is vital. Because of the urgency to get the bill through, in part because of the delay of the Liberals in bringing it to the House of Commons, we will support it. However I want the people of Canada to know that this is a seriously flawed process.

With respect to Motion No. 1, as has been noted by the government there is a problem which very simply is how in the world would we ever get institutions, individuals, professionals or casinos to comply with the particular bill. I believe it is in Never-Never Land. It is kind of a fairy tale, something like the tooth fairy, that the costs to institutions or individuals providing services to people will not somehow find their way into the service charges. Of course they will.

To try to regulate something that is totally unregulatable is pie in the sky. As a consequence, although I have the greatest respect for the mover of the motion, I could never recommend to my colleagues that we support it.

Mrs. Pierrette Venne (Saint-Bruno—Saint-Hubert, BQ):

Mr. Speaker, as we mentioned earlier and as the other members have said, money laundering is a worldwide problem and, because of its nature, is difficult to quantify.

According to the federal government, some $7 billion to $10 billion is laundered in Canada. John Walker, an Australian criminologist and mathematician, has developed a global model at the request of the Australian government to determine the scope of money laundering worldwide. The United States and the UN are interested in his model.

This Australian estimates the money laundering worldwide to be worth about $3 trillion annually. He does not paint a glowing picture of Canada. According to his model, Canada ranks ninth worldwide as a country generating illicit money and eighth worldwide as a favoured destination for money laundering. According to this study, $64 billion in illicit funds from outside the country are laundered in Canada and $21 billion in criminal profits are generated.

Canada is a clearing house for the laundering of money and this news is not good. Canada is the only G-7 country that does not have legislation to fight money laundering. This is why Bill C-22 is welcomed favourably by the Bloc Quebecois. It is another step in the fight against organized crime. The fight against this international scourge must begin at home first. For this reason, the Bloc Quebecois supports this bill.

There are in Canada measures against money laundering. For example, there are provisions in the criminal code that make it a criminal offence to launder money and provide for the confiscation—

The Acting Speaker (Mr. McClelland): I am sorry to interrupt the hon. member.

Mr. John Cummins: Mr. Speaker, I rise on a point of order. I ask for unanimous consent to concur in private member's Motion No. 308.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. McClelland): Is there unanimous consent?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

An hon. Member: No.

Mrs. Pierrette Venne:

Mr. Speaker, since I was interrupted right in the middle of a sentence, I will repeat it so that all those who are listening to us can understand it.

As I was saying, there are in Canada measures against money laundering. For example, there are provisions in the criminal code that make it a criminal offence to launder money and provide for the confiscation of the proceeds and property derived from various organized crime drug trafficking activities. Under these provisions, the burden of proof is heavy for crown attorneys. They must prove beyond any reasonable doubt that a crime was committed and then that the seized goods were bought with dirty money. These investigations are extremely lengthy and few lead to prosecution.

In 1991 Canada passed the Proceeds of Crime (Monetary Laundering) Act, which requires several institutions to keep records. Indeed, financial institutions, foreign exchange offices, stockbrokers, life insurance companies and casinos are required to keep a record of transactions over $10,000. However, there is no accountability requirement. This reduces the possibility of investigating and laying charges, since the information collected is not in the hands of the police. If it is passed, Bill C-22 will replace the Proceeds of Crime (Money Laundering) Act.

These measures are clearly inadequate and do not seem to be effective enough. That is why the Bloc Quebecois views Bill C-22 as an improvement on the existing money laundering legislation. However, Bill C-22 provides for the gathering of information about the movement of money. This will now be obligatory. A number of institutions and individuals will be required to make certain reports on the movement of money, as we mentioned. In addition, this information will be collected and analyzed in order to determine whether investigations or charges are warranted.

Financial institutions, exchange offices, casinos, life insurance companies and stockbrokers, among others, will now be required to report financial transactions that they suspect may be linked to an offence having to do with the laundering of the proceeds of crime. In addition, these institutions will be required to report certain categories of financial transactions described in the regulations and valued at more than C$10,000.

Persons importing or exporting cash or goods valued at more than $10,000 and those crossing the Canadian border with such items will be required to report these amounts to a Canada Customs official.

That concludes my remarks on Bill C-22 for now. We will certainly have an opportunity to continue the debate with the amendments that will be introduced in the course of the afternoon.

Mr. Jim Pankiw: Mr. Speaker, I believe we do not have a quorum.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. McClelland): The hon. member for Saskatoon—Humboldt has called for a quorum count. Call in the members.

And the bells having rung:

The Acting Speaker (Mr. McClelland): We now have a quorum.

Mr. Peter MacKay (Pictou—Antigonish—Guysborough, PC):

Mr. Speaker, I want to congratulate my colleague, the member for Saint-Bruno—Saint-Hubert, on her speech.

I also want to congratulate my colleague, the member for Charlesbourg. He worked very hard during consideration of this bill. I am very proud to have worked with him.

It is with great pleasure that I rise to speak to Bill C-22, the proceeds of crime bill. This legislation will, for all intents and purposes, create a new agency that will oversee and very much attach itself to the effort to prevent money laundering, a very serious problem in our country.

Again, I congratulate my colleague from Charlesbourg who has worked very hard on this bill and is very conscientious as a member, a previous member of the Standing Committee on

Justice and Human Rights, and in his current capacity as he works equally hard for his constituents.

This amendment would add to a new clause to the bill. It would read:

3.1 The persons and entities to which this Act applies shall not transfer to their clients, either directly or indirectly, any costs incurred by them in carrying out their obligations under this Act.

This is a very positive, common sense amendment and one that the Progressive Conservative Party of Canada will be supporting wholeheartedly. The main purpose of the amendment is obvious. It would protect the average citizen from the various organizations concerned effectively passing the buck on to them, that is, using citizens very much as a dupe for some organized crime unit.

For example, in the banking sector consumers are already faced with relatively high service charges and further increases would not be desirable. As we all know, money laundering is a process by which revenues derived from criminal activity are converted into assets that cannot easily be traced back to their origins. It is something that is happening at an alarming rate in Canada.

Bill C-22 would bring Canada up to date with the standards of our G-7 trading partners. It does not take us beyond the minimum standard, but it does take us at least to the standard that G-7 countries have set.

In the United States I had the pleasure recently of visiting with an organized crime unit in the state of Massachusetts where they are doing a great deal to address this problem, and they are putting resources into it. That is the number one problem facing this government and this country. We are not arming our policing agencies, our internal security agencies, with sufficient resources to combat what is a very sophisticated and very well armed organized crime syndicate operating in Canada.

The saying that crime does not pay could not be further from the truth with regard to money laundering. It is estimated that between $5 billion and $17 billion in criminal proceeds are laundered in Canada each year. It has become a very lucrative and profitable business.

Canada has long had a reputation of being one of the easiest jurisdictions in which to legitimize the proceeds of illegal pursuits.

The latest report of the Crime Intelligence Service of Canada indicates that money laundering has allowed, for example, the Sicilian mafia to continue to infiltrate legitimate business. Asian based groups are heavily involved in Canadian heroin and drug trafficking. We also know that the Russian mafia has become very prevalent inside Canada.

There has been discussion in the Chamber recently about the situation, particularly on the west coast, of the smuggling of humans. We know that the sidewinder project has received a great deal of attention in the media of late. This again demonstrates, sadly, our lack of resources when it comes to law enforcement, our internal security services, and their ability to combat organized crime.

Money laundering is but one aspect of this growing concern we have about protecting the integrity of our citizens and our money system. Money laundering poses to law enforcement personnel one of their greatest challenges in the battle against organized crime. To fight organized crime effectively, law enforcement agencies and we, as legislators, must address the challenges posed by current trends in money laundering and adopt a strategy to respond to those challenges. This bill moves in that direction.

For example, several months ago United States officials uncovered the biggest money laundering operation ever inside their country. Federal investigators believe that Russian gangsters had channelled up to $10 billion through the Bank of New York, the 15th largest bank in the United States. This news sent shock waves throughout the entire financial services sector and proved that money laundering can affect even the biggest banks, those big commercial banks who would have us believe they are impenetrable.

The United States has moved ahead very quickly with its own tough, new money laundering legislation. It is very concerned, and we have seen it time and again, because the American economy and law enforcement agencies are very much tied, and therefore vulnerable, to our weaker internal security services. The U.S. has expressed concern repeatedly about the situation.

Since the Liberals took power in 1993 our internal security has diminished and has continued to be weakened. The Liberal government has given the United States much evidence to validate its concerns. In December 1999 U.S. customs officers discovered an Algerian Canadian, with Algerian terrorist connections, attempting to enter the United States through Seattle with a carload of explosives. This touched off a very serious concern within the United States and it continues to this day.

On February 25, 2000 the U.S. government suspended firearm and ammunition sales to Canada, which was done at the request of the Canadian government, and legal import licences were being used to import large quantities of handguns, rifles and ammunition. Firearms were then smuggled back into other countries. Many of them went back to the United States. This was very much an embarrassment for Canada. The soft approach on crime is highlighted by these inadequacies. It was another blow to our good relationship with the United States, because of our open, undefended border.

Since 1993 the Liberals have talked repeatedly about increasing penalties for money laundering in a manner that would be consistent with public safety, yet the RCMP still lacks the proper budget to deal with today's very sophisticated crime. For example, we saw that only $810 million had been set aside over the next three years. Much of that has been earmarked to fight organized crime.

Unfortunately, the usual sleight of hand has to be uncovered, and that is that 62% of this new money will not be available until the year 2001-02. This will be added to the RCMP base budget of about $2.1 million. That is still not enough, given the level of the problem and the years that the RCMP, CSIS and other services have been underfunded.

The mounties have already had to curtail their activities with respect to undercover operations which targeted organized crime. Reduction in training and the inability to conduct fraud investigations in British Columbia and undercover operations seriously jeopardizes the RCMP's ability to effectively do its job.

To correct these problems it is proposed that 5,000 new RCMP officers would be needed. Also lacking is staff at the forensic laboratory, the need for DNA databanks and the need to update the CPIC system. Police forces need this type of technology, and yet the government cannot even afford and will not commit the money that is needed to deal with these very serious inadequacies.

The government gave $115 million to the CPIC program when it was stated quite clearly that what was needed was $283 million. Once again, a pittance. It is an insult to our brave men and women who are in the mounties and in the secret service to have to work under these conditions.

British Columbia mounties alone may shift away from organized crime to deal with more pressing needs of fulfilling police vacancies and paying their officers. Basic policing needs have to be attended to and, therefore, organized crime needs are being neglected. In rural areas there is a very serious problem of losing RCMP documents and losing municipal police forces in small communities.

The riding of Shefford, represented by the Progressive Conservative member from Granby, is dealing with the very serious threat of losing its detachment. Biker gangs are terrorizing farmers and forcing them to grow marijuana in their fields.

There is a Bloc member who is currently being threatened by members of biker gangs and organized crime.

The Progressive Conservative Party of Canada supports the broad purpose and principles of this bill, that is, to remedy the shortcomings in Canada's anti-money laundering legislation as identified by the G-7 financial action task force on money laundering. We support this amendment and we will be very supportive of this bill as it proceeds through the House and the various committee stages.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. McClelland): Is the House ready for the question?

Some hon. Members: Question.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. McClelland): Is it the pleasure of the House to adopt the motion?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Some hon. Members: No.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. McClelland): All those in favour of the motion will please say yea.

Some hon. Members: Yea.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. McClelland): All those opposed will please say nay.

Some hon. Members: Nay.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. McClelland): In my opinion the nays have it.

And more than five members having risen:

The Acting Speaker (Mr. McClelland): The recorded division on the proposed motion stands deferred.

The motions in Group No. 2, at the request of the hon. member for Charlesbourg, the mover of the motions, will be withdrawn.

Mr. Richard Marceau: Mr. Speaker, following ongoing negotiations with the Parliamentary Secretary to the Minister of Finance, I have decided not to withdraw these amendments. I will ask to speak in order to introduce them.

Some will be amended by the parliamentary secretary. As they are my motions, I cannot amend them myself, if I am not mistaken.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. McClelland): I understand that the motions in Group No. 2, standing in the name of the hon. member for Charlesbourg, will be introduced at this time.

Mr. Richard Marceau (Charlesbourg, BQ) moved:

Motion No. 2

That Bill C-22 be amended by adding after line 47 on page 10 the following new clause:

"19.1 If an officer decides, on grounds that the officer believes to be reasonable, to exercise any of the powers or perform any of the duties or functions under subsections 15(1) and (3), 16(1) and (2), 17(1) and 18(1), the officer shall record in writing the reasons for the decision."

Motion No. 3

That Bill C-22, in Clause 36, be amended by adding after line 22 on page 17 the following:

"(3.1) If an officer decides, on grounds that the officer believes to be reasonable, to disclose information under subsection (2) or (3), the officer shall record in writing the reasons for the decision."

Motion No. 4

That Bill C-22, in Clause 55, be amended by adding after line 5 on page 26 the following:

"(5.1) The Centre shall record in writing the reasons for all decisions to disclose information made under subsection (3) or paragraph (4)(a) or (5)(a)."

Motion No. 5

That Bill C-22, in Clause 56, be amended by adding after line 18 on page 27 the following:

"(4) In every agreement or arrangement entered into under subsection (1) or (2), there shall be inserted an express condition that each party shall comply with the provisions of this Act dealing with the confidentiality and the collection and use of information."

Motion No. 6

That Bill C-22, in Clause 62, be amended by adding after line 3 on page 33 the following:

"(1.1) If an authorized person decides, on grounds that the person believes to be reasonable, to enter premises under paragraph (1)(a), the person shall record in writing the reasons for the decision."

Motion No. 7

That Bill C-22, in Clause 63, be amended by replacing line 41 on page 33 with the following:

"business, profession or activity, and shall record in writing the reasons for the person's belief."

Mr. Speaker, before I go any further, I seek unanimous consent to withdraw Motion No. 5.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. McClelland): The hon. member for Charlesbourg has asked for the unanimous consent of the House to remove Motion No. 5 standing in his name. Is there unanimous consent?

Some hon. Members: Agreed. (Motion No. 5 withdrawn)

Mr. Richard Marceau: Mr. Speaker, again, I am pleased to address this bill, even though I am a little out of breath.

The purpose of Motions Nos. 2, 3 and 4 is very simple. If we want the privacy commissioner and the information access commissioner to be able to get all the information they need, the reasons for which the officer of the centre wanted to investigate further must be recorded in writing, otherwise it will be difficult to know what happened and why the decision to investigate further and to disclose the information was made.

This is the reason why I proposed these motions. I know that these provisions will be amended by the parliamentary secretary and I will be waiting for his amendments.

In that same spirit of continued co-operation to speed up the process, I ask that Motions Nos. 6 and 7 also be withdrawn, with the unanimous consent of the House.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. McClelland): Just to be clear, is it the intention of the member for Charlesbourg to ask that Motions Nos. 6 and 7 standing in his name be withdrawn?

Mr. Richard Marceau: Yes, Mr. Speaker.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. McClelland): Does the House give unanimous consent to withdraw Motions Nos. 6 and 7 standing in the name of the hon. member for Charlesbourg?

Some hon. Members: Agreed. (Motions Nos. 6 and 7 withdrawn)

Mr. Roy Cullen (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Finance, Lib.):

Mr. Speaker, I thank the various members for their co-operation in trying to reach some conclusion to these amendments.

Motion No. 2 would impose a legal requirement on customs officers to do what in certain circumstances is done as a matter of good administrative practice. My concern with the motion is that it would create a procedural burden for routine actions, such as a request of a customs officer to look inside the trunk of a car which is crossing the border.

The procedures proposed in Bill C-22 to deal with cross-border movements of large amounts of currency and monetary instruments are intended to dovetail with similar procedures dealing with the movement of goods. Introducing a requirement to create a written record for routine actions by customs officers at the border would add bureaucracy and cause unnecessary delays for the travelling public.

I therefore would like to propose the suggestion that officers be required to record in writing their reasons for decisions under this bill not apply to routine actions but be limited instead to the exercise of the powers under subsection 18(1) which deal with the seizure of currency or monetary instruments. Therefore the amended motion would read as follows:

That Bill C-22 be amended by adding after line 47 on page 10 the following new clause:

"19.1 If an officer decides to exercise powers under subsection 18(1), the officer shall record in writing reasons for the decision".

The Acting Speaker (Mr. McClelland): The debate is on the amendment.

Mr. Roy Cullen: Mr. Speaker, could I now proceed to Motion No. 3?

The Acting Speaker (Mr. McClelland): We are on Group No. 2. We have to stay on Group No. 2 but you can speak to any of the motions in that group.

Mr. Roy Cullen: Mr. Speaker, with respect to Motion No. 3, we have no objection to the intent of the motion but we would suggest that it be redrafted to make it clear that the decision would be made by the officer on the basis of the criteria set out in the appropriate subsections rather than "on grounds that the officer believes to be reasonable". The amended motion would read:

That Bill C-22, in clause 36, be amended by adding after line 22 on page 17 the following new clause:

"(3.1) If an officer decides to disclose information under subsection (2) or (3), the officer shall record in writing the reasons for the decision."

The Acting Speaker (Mr. McClelland): The debate is on the amendment. The hon. Parliamentary Secretary to the Minister of Finance.

Mr. Roy Cullen: Mr. Speaker, moving now to Motion No. 4, the centre's decision to disclose information in accordance with section 55 of the bill is an extremely important one. It will be necessary for the centre to fully document the reasons for doing so in each and every case. It was always intended that the centre would do this and therefore I am prepared to support the amendment proposed by my colleague.

Mr. Darrel Stinson: Mr. Speaker, I rise on a point of order. Normally in a speech an amendment is moved just once. There were several amendments created during the speech. I would like to know what the protocol is.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. McClelland):

The protocol is when it is a report stage motion it is the responsibility of the Chair, where there is a recognition between parties that they are working toward resolving a bill, not to stand in the way of that. The Chair's responsibility is to make sure that what is being done is being done in a parliamentary sound fashion. That is why we are taking the time now to make sure that what is being done is being done appropriately.

I think behind the hon. member's question is the fact that generally if an amendment to a motion is moved, it is done at the end of an intervention and that terminates the intervention. In this case I recognized the hon. parliamentary secretary on a different motion within the context of that group recognizing that there had been negotiations between opposition and government members on this particular bill.

Again it was not my intention to involve the Chair in the debate, but it is the responsibility of the Chair to ensure that if opposition and government are working toward resolution of differences on a bill, to facilitate the ability of members to work together in common cause.

As members know, they cannot through amendment change a bill. All they can do is amend something that is already there; they cannot change the format or the intent. This is what is being considered by the clerks.

As this is the first time this has come before me, I will need the attention of all members present to make sure that it is done correctly.

The amendments as presented by the hon. parliamentary secretary are not in order because they are amendments to change the bill. What is before the House now are the amendments. For an amendment to be in order it must amend a motion. Therefore, the amendments as presented by the parliamentary secretary are not in order. This leaves the Chair in the position of saying that if there is the will for the motion to be amended it is not up to the Chair to negotiate this. It must be done by the parties.

The way we could do this is to continue with the debate on the motions that are before the House. If there is no further debate on motions before the House, with the indulgence and with the unanimous consent of the House, we could move to Group No. 3 and then come back again to Group No. 2. However, that would require the unanimous consent of the House. Other than that, we will stay on the motions in Group No. 2 as they are presented.

Mr. Richard Marceau (Charlesbourg, BQ):

Mr. Speaker, I would like to begin by saying that if the government had listened to the Canadian Alliance member who was sitting on the parliamentary committee at the time, if it had agreed to allow more time between the end of evidence and the beginning of the clause by clause review in committee, we would not find ourselves in this situation.

I can only deplore it. I think the Canadian Alliance member will agree with me. This is deplorable, because normally this exercise should be done in committee.

That being said, I want to make sure I clearly understood what you said. I proposed Motions Nos. 2 and 3, which were amended by the Parliamentary Secretary to the Minister of Finance. These are amendments to my motions with which I can live. I wonder if we could go the unanimous consent route.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. McClelland): The third option would be to ask for the unanimous consent of the House to receive the amendments as presented by the parliamentary secretary.

If a member would like to make that motion, we will get on with it. That is a good way to do it.

Mr. Jim Abbott (Kootenay—Columbia, Canadian Alliance):

Mr. Speaker, the process that we are currently involved in is egregiously flawed. We are talking about a bill that will interdict hundreds of millions, if not billions, of dollars of currency. It is an international agreement with vast ranging, international implications for not only G-7 nations but indeed nations throughout the entire world.

As has been pointed out by my colleague from the Progressive Conservative Party and also my colleague from the Bloc Quebecois in debate this afternoon, we are talking about the core of international crime and the way in which we can track it. The member for Charlevoix, another member and myself have all pointed out that the haste with which this is going through the House is to treat the House with disrespect and as a rubber stamp.

The debacle we are currently involved in was as a result of discussion in good faith between the Liberals and the Bloc Quebecois. As the representative of Her Majesty's Official Opposition, I was not involved in any of the discussion about the motions that you, Mr. Speaker, have ruled out of order. I find it completely unacceptable that Her Majesty's Official Opposition would not have been involved in the discussion.

Therefore, I move:

That the debate be now adjourned.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. McClelland): The House has heard the terms of the motion. Is it the pleasure of the House to adopt the motion?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Some hon. Members: No.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. McClelland): In my opinion the nays have it.

And more than five members have risen:

The Acting Speaker (Mr. McClelland):

Call in the members.

(The House divided on the motion, which was negatived on the following division:)

Speaker: I declare the motion lost.

It is my duty pursuant to Standing Order 38 to inform the House that the questions to be raised tonight at the time of adjournment are as follows: the hon. for Bras d'Or—Cape Breton, Human Resources Development; the hon. member for Halifax West, National Defence; the hon. member for Kamouraska—Rivière-du-Loup—Témiscouata—Les Basques, Human Resources Development.

Mr. Joe McGuire (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Agriculture and Agri-Food, Lib.):
Madam Speaker, I move:

That Motion No. 2 be amended by deleting all of the words after the words "19.1 If an officer decides," with the following:

"to exercise powers under subsection 18(1), the officer shall record in writing reasons for the decision".

I also move:

That Motion No. 3 be amended by deleting the following words:

", on grounds that the officer believes to be reasonable,"

The Acting Speaker (Ms. Thibeault): The amendments are in order.

Mr. Peter MacKay (Pictou—Antigonish—Guysborough, PC):

Madam Speaker, I am pleased to take part in this debate. I thank again and recognize the efforts of the hon. member for Charlesbourg who moved Motions Nos. 2 to 7. These motions highlight a concern which I think we all have. Certainly we in the Progressive Conservative Party of Canada share the concerns with respect to this new agency passing on unrelated information that it might have about Revenue Canada.

For example, if the agency had reasonable grounds to pursue an individual case of money laundering, that much is fine, but money laundering has become a very serious issue and one that should be considered a threat to national security.

Globally experts estimate that between $300 billion and $500 billion in United States currency is criminally derived from international capital markets or funds that are derived from outside our borders. In Canada the federal government estimates that between $5 billion and $17 billion in criminal proceeds are laundered in this country each year. If this new agency does not have enough power and enough evidence to pursue the case of money laundering, it could determine that there is not enough evidence to get the person on tax evasion and could conceivably release information to Revenue Canada. It is crucial that we ensure on behalf of Canadian taxpayers that this new agency is not swallowed up by the Godzilla tax collector out there, also known as the department of revenue.

What we saw happen in the House just a short time ago epitomizes how the government is flying by the seat of its pants. We saw a member on the government side try to amend an amendment. What was intended was to amend the act itself, which the Chair quite properly ruled out of order. The member rose and we had to delay the debate because of the fact that the government did not know what it was doing.

This shows there is no plan. The Liberals have lost the plot again with respect to a very important piece of legislation on which they should have taken the time to do their homework and prepare what they wanted to do instead of simply trying to hoodwink everybody that was in the House.

The Progressive Conservative Party supports the broad principles of the bill before us on debate. It is one of the most important efforts that we can all make with respect to law enforcement, with respect to the integrity of our country and with respect to the efforts of our law enforcement agencies to curtail and control a growing money laundering problem and criminal activity within our borders. The Conservative Party supports the broad principles.

When members of the RCMP call this legislation long overdue and say that it will make a significant difference, we have to take them at their word. The Canadian Bankers Association has spoken very favourably about the legislation. It similarly says that the legislation is long overdue and that organized crime will be much deterred by it.

International money capital markets annually are very much affected. We know that the bill is aimed at addressing fiscal problems that occur when money is funnelled through legitimate organizations like banks. We know as well that the amendments which have been introduced very much ameliorate and prop up some of the intended passages.

We feel the legislation will be an improvement upon the current situation in the country, but we have to hearken back to where some of the real problems lie. Where do the real problems stem from in terms of the ability of our law enforcement agencies to somehow control the situation?

We see a bill that is aimed at tightening up some of the legislative framework, but what we really need to do to improve the situation is to prop up the RCMP and CSIS by giving these law enforcement agencies the backup and resources they need to combat a very sophisticated organized crime syndicate in this country.

We know the government has a reputation for being laid back and very non-supportive of our law enforcement agencies when it comes to their ongoing uphill battle with existing crime syndicates, not only motorcycle gangs but the increasing presence of Asian gangs, Russian gangs and the traditional Mafia within Canada.

Compared to countries like the United States we pale in comparison in terms of the support that we give law enforcement agencies. The other message that should be coming out in this debate is that it is not enough simply to put a legislative framework in place. We have to pony up to the bar and put dollars on the table so that the men and women who are very much dedicated to our law enforcement services are not only seen to be given support but are given actual support. We need to do this right away.

The Progressive Party of Canada has always been very much supportive of agencies in the country that are tasked with this very important task. They are the thin blue line between the Canadian public and those who choose a life of crime.

The bill is one of which our party is supportive. The amendments as well are supported by our party. The reaction from the community, from the banking community and from agencies across the land, seems to be one that has embraced the intention of the bill. One would hope that there will be rapid passage of the legislation when it reaches the committee and when it comes back to the House.

Money laundering is but one part of the equation when it comes to organized crime. We know that drug enforcement has been a huge problem from our law enforcement perspective. We know that guns and other contraband material are coming across our undefended borders.

We know as well that child pornography and people smuggling are very much a problem. We do not have impenetrable borders, and that will never happen. The dismantling of the ports police which the government orchestrated by having weak border patrols was highlighted recently by the fact that we had an international terrorist cross into Seattle from Canada. This alarmed American law enforcement officials. They have called upon Canada to tighten up, to try to pick up the slack, because they are feeling very vulnerable as a result of Canada letting down the side.

All the indicators are there. All the signs are speaking out to Canada to do something about it. The legislation at least indicates that we are moving in the right direction, but sadly as we have come to expect from the government it is a baby step as opposed to a giant step or even a significant step in doing the right thing by propping up the men and women who are tasked with protecting the country's integrity, not only with respect to illegal funds but with respect to the whole gamut of illegal activity that is taking place.

We know that gangs are very much rearing their ugly heads not only in cities like Montreal, Toronto and Calgary. They are now making their presence known in rural communities across the country.

Because of the huge boundaries of water we have and because of the lack of resources that we have for the coast guard and the lack of resources that we have for the RCMP to actually partake in patrols on docks and in major ports, once again we are being very much left open to contraband materials entering the country. Money laundering is very much the focus of the bill, but we know that there are other very significant tasks, other very significant problems that are faced by law enforcement agents.

The government is letting down the side. It has not lived up to the billing. It has not responded to requests from the RCMP. It has not responded to requests to renew and bring back the ports police in this country. It is not listening, and we know it is not listening.

More and more we are getting the indicators that this is a tired, arrogant government. When the Prime Minister goes abroad and sticks his foot firmly in his mouth, it proves that time and time again. We knew that long before he went to the Middle East. He was doing the same thing in this country, but now he has demonstrated it to the whole world.

What we want to hear is that the government is listening. Canadians want to hear that the government is actually listening to them. This is an opportunity for the government to do so, but I do not think it is listening.

I hear hon. members opposite becoming a little alarmed by the fact that we are pointing this out, but Canadians know what is happening and those members can say what they want. The indicators are there. The ears are closed. The message is going out but they are not listening.

We will see a byelection in Newfoundland which will indicate that Canadians have had it with the Liberal government. When that happens, maybe that message will start to penetrate those ears. The Liberals have big earmuffs on when it comes to listening to what Canadians have to say.

With money laundering legislation that is aimed at a specific problem perhaps finally we will be able to get the attention of the government. We hear about things like this happening in the country. Unfortunately the national media are not always the most responsible in reporting exactly how it is, but we know that the particular problem has been broadcast across the country. It has been broadcast clearly as an issue that has to be addressed and addressed now.

We hope that side of the House will continue to support initiatives like this one. Unfortunately more and more the initiatives that matter most to Canadians, whether it be tax reduction, health care, something to do with student debt or initiatives to help our law enforcement agents, are coming from the opposition side because the Liberals are bankrupt on ideas. We know that when it comes to principle there is another party in here that can be very bankrupt.

I thank the House for its indulgence and for the time to speak to the legislation. I look forward to seeing it passed through the various stages and becoming law.

The Acting Speaker (Ms. Thibeault): It being 5.30 p.m., the House will now proceed to the consideration of Private Members' Business as listed on today's order paper.

May 4, 2000 [House of Commons]

The House resumed from May 3 consideration of Bill C-22, an act to facilitate combatting the laundering of proceeds of crime, to establish the Financial Transactions and Reports Analysis Centre of Canada and to amend and repeal certain acts in consequence, as reported (with amendment) from the committee, and of the motions in Group No. 2.

The Acting Speaker (Ms. Thibeault): The question is on the amendment to Motion No. 2. Is it the pleasure of the House to adopt the amendment?

The Acting Speaker (Ms. Thibeault): In my opinion the yeas have it.

An hon. Member: On division.

(Amendment agreed to)

The Acting Speaker (Ms. Thibeault): The next question is on Motion No. 2 as amended. Is it the pleasure of the House to adopt the motion?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

The Acting Speaker (Ms. Thibeault): I declare Motion No. 2, as amended, carried.

(Motion No.2, as amended, agreed to)

The Acting Speaker (Ms. Thibeault): The next question is on the amendment to Motion No. 3. Is it the pleasure of the House to adopt the amendment?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

The Acting Speaker (Ms. Thibeault): I declare the amendment carried.

(Amendment agreed to)

The Acting Speaker (Ms. Thibeault): The next question is on Motion No. 3 as amended. Is it the pleasure of the House to adopt the motion?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

The Acting Speaker (Ms. Thibeault): I declare Motion No. 3, as amended, carried.

(Motion No. 3, as amended, agreed to)

Mr. Jim Abbott: Madam Speaker, I rise on a point of order. If I am not mistaken, the vote on Motion No. 3 will apply to Motion No. 4. I need clarification of that.

The Acting Speaker (Ms. Thibeault): The vote was on Motion No. 3, as amended, and therefore Motion No. 4 is adopted.

I will now put the motions in Group No. 3 to the House.

Mr. Richard Marceau (Charlesbourg, BQ) moved:

Motion No. 8

That Bill C-22, in Clause 71, be amended a) by replacing line 32 on page 37 with the following:

"71. (1) The Director shall, on or before Septem-" b) by adding after line 40 on page 37 the following:

"(2) The report referred to in subsection (1) shall include a copy of the instructions and regulations governing the exercise of powers and the performance of duties and functions under this Act which could affect human rights and freedoms."

Mr. Bob Kilger: Madam Speaker, I rise on a point of order. I think you would find, if you recognized the Parliamentary Secretary to the Minister of Finance, that we are ready to move an amendment to the motion put forward by the member from the Bloc Quebecois.

The Acting Speaker (Ms. Thibeault): I propose that I read all the motions in this group and then I will recognize the parliamentary secretary.

Mr. Roger Gallaway (Sarnia—Lambton, Lib.) moved:

Motion No. 9

That Bill C-22, in Clause 71, be amended a) by replacing line 32 on page 37 with the following:

"71. (1) The Director shall, on or before Septem-" b) by adding after line 40 on page 37 the following:

"(2) The annual report stands referred to the committee of Parliament that is designated or established for that purpose. The committee shall review the report and the operations of the Centre and report to Parliament within 90 days after the tabling of the annual report by the Minister or any further time that Parliament may authorize."

Mr. Richard Marceau (Charlesbourg, BQ) moved:

Motion No. 10

That Bill C-22 be amended by adding after line 40 on page 37 the following new clause:

"71.1 (1) The Director shall, on or before September 30 of each year following the Centre's first full year of operations, submit a report to the Privacy Commissioner on the measures taken by the Centre to ensure the confidentiality of any personal information obtained in the course of its operations.

(2) The Commissioner shall, within three months after receiving the report, submit to Parliament the Commissioner's opinion on the report."

Mr. Roger Gallaway (Sarnia—Lambton, Lib.) moved:

Motion No. 11

That Bill C-22, in Clause 72, be amended by replacing lines 1 to 9 on page 38 with the following:

"72. (1) This Act and the regulations made thereunder shall cease to have effect five years after the day on which section 98 comes into force.

(2) Within four years after the day on which section 98 comes into force, this Act and the regulations made thereunder shall stand referred to the committee of Parliament that may be designated or established for that purpose. The committee shall, within one year, undertake a comprehensive review of the Act, the regulations and their administration and submit a report to Parliament including any recommendations pertaining to the continuation of, or changes to, the Act, the regulations or their administration that the committee wishes to make."

Mr. Roy Cullen (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Finance, Lib.) moved:

That Motion No. 8 be amended by replacing all of the words after the words "(2) The report referred to in subsection (1) shall include" with the following: "a description of the management guidelines and policies of the Centre for the protection of human rights and freedoms".

The Acting Speaker (Ms. Thibeault): The amendment is receivable.

Mr. Richard Marceau (Charlesbourg, BQ): Madam Speaker, the purpose of the amendment that was moved, which was then amended by the Parliamentary Secretary to the Minister of Finance, is to ensure that parliament has a good idea of the rules and policies adopted by the centre so that it can better play its role as guardian of human rights and freedoms.

The Acting Speaker (Ms. Thibeault): If we were to vote now, we would be voting on Motions Nos. 8 to 11 inclusive, without the possibility of a new motion.

Mr. Richard Marceau:

Madam Speaker, I rise on a point of order. I am perhaps mistaken but I thought we were debating only Motion No. 8. If that is not the case, I wish to move amendments to Motions Nos. 9 and 11 moved by the Liberal Party member. If the question is not just on Motion No. 8, I wish to continue to avail myself of my right to speak.

The Acting Speaker (Ms. Thibeault): Yes, I think that is an entirely understandable error. We are now debating Group No. 3. It includes Motions Nos. 8 to 11 inclusive. If the hon. member wishes to continue speaking, he has seven minutes and 48 seconds left.

Mr. Richard Marceau: Madam Speaker, we agree with the spirit of Motions Nos. 9 and 11 moved by the member for Sarnia—Lambton, but we wish to make a slight amendment so that it is not parliament as a whole but the House of Commons which has authority over such matters.

I therefore move:

That Motion No. 9, in paragraph b), be amended by replacing the word “Parliament” with the following:

“the House of Commons”

In addition, I move:

That Motion No. 11, in paragraph b), be amended by replacing the word “Parliament” with the following:

“the House of Commons”

I believe these amendments improve the bill by stipulating that elected representatives, members of the House of Commons—we all know the esteem in which the member for Sarnia—Lambton holds the other House, and I am sure he will agree—oversee the process and not people appointed to the Senate.

The Acting Speaker (Ms. Thibeault): The amendments moved by the hon. member are in order.

Mr. Roger Gallaway (Sarnia—Lambton, Lib.):

Madam Speaker, I am rising today to speak to the third grouping of amendments to Bill C-22, in particular Motions Nos. 9 and 11.

I want to say first that I support the bill. We all know there is a need that has been agreed upon both nationally and internationally to combat money laundering. It is a global phenomenon.

Enabling and co-ordinating the efforts of different law enforcement agencies through a centralized body such as would be established by this bill certainly is not in question.

I should also say that the amendments I have proposed do alter the bill. I would ask my friends opposite who have proposed a subamendment to think about what my amendments in fact say because I do not believe that we are saying anything differently. I would ask them to consider the following points.

The reason I have proposed these amendments is that I have very specific concerns about the lack of a role for parliament, in particular the House of Commons, in the oversight of the centre established pursuant to the bill, and the limited accountability to parliament, in particular the House of Commons, on the part of the Minister of Finance for the centre's practices. However that certainly is not a criticism of the minister.

My amendments attempt to redress what I would characterize as an undermining of what some would call backbenchers' rights by a bill that allows for too little accounting of actions undertaken in the name of Canadian citizens by the centre. My amendments do not attempt to micromanage or second guess the daily activities of the centre. They attempt to provide a role for members of parliament to monitor the means used by the centre to fulfil its mandate and also to enable members to scrutinize periodically the effectiveness of the policy that underlies Bill C-22.

My first amendment modifies the reporting obligations of the centre's director. As it now stands the director must submit an annual report to the Minister of Finance on the centre's operations for the preceding year. The minister would then table the report to both houses of parliament within 30 days.

Merely tabling the report in parliament does not provide members the opportunity to seriously consider the effectiveness of the centre's activities. It does not enable them to question officials from the centre. It does not permit members to monitor the centre for potentially abusive practices. This is particularly troubling to me, given that some of the witnesses before the committee described the bill's breadth as excessive and the powers reserved for it as potentially sweeping. Legal experts testified that the danger of abuse of power is real and that the safeguards they foresaw in the bill might not be adequate to forestall such abuses.

My amendment proposes an additional step to the formal report made under the current legislation to the Minister of Finance, that it be reviewed by an appropriate parliamentary committee. I understand the desire of my friends opposite to have the bill say it is the House of Commons, but if we look at this, the amendment in fact says that it be reviewed by an appropriate parliamentary committee. It could be designated as a committee of the House of Common. It is very rare that a committee of the Senate would take upon itself such an activity. It could be referred to a committee of parliament that has been established for that purpose.

I would also point out to my friends opposite that the traditional role is for the finance committee to carry out those sorts of things. In some respects I can understand the fear they have that the Senate will come into this but our tradition shows that will not happen.

Requiring a committee to make a report of its own would obligate, I would suggest to my friends opposite, members of parliament to study the effectiveness of the centre. It also would permit concerns to be addressed to the director of the centre and his officials as well as raise any problems that may not have been seen when the bill was created. That is not a very radical idea. I am not in any way suggesting that members could ask who they are investigating, how they are investigating or anything of that nature. It would simply be about where the money is going, how it is being spent and whether it is working.

I have also proposed changes that would add a sunset clause to the provisions that would give effect to the bill limiting those provisions to a period of five years, just like the Bank Act. To quote from the proposed amendment, the sunset clause would require a parliamentary committee to "undertake a comprehensive review of the act, the regulations and their administration and submit a report to parliament including any recommendations pertaining to the continuation of, or changes to, the act, the regulations or their administration that the committee wishes to make". This process already exists in the Bank Act. It would have to be completed so that new re-enabling legislation could be introduced to parliament. It is very simple. It would have to be considered, voted and acted upon within five calendar years of the time that this act is given royal assent.

Such a provision would allow members of this place to further scrutinize all the aspects of the money laundering act. The sunset provision would also allow changes to be made as new law enforcement techniques are discovered and more important, as different ways of money laundering emerge. There will certainly be techniques and ways we cannot even foresee or imagine today especially with the emergence of electronic technology. In short, I would call it a guard against statutory rust-out. It is a Ziebart provision, if I can call it that.

I said at the beginning of my remarks that this bill undermines backbenchers' rights because we are creating it, giving it regulatory powers, and there is a reporting provision. We know this is not the only piece of legislation that has short-circuited the rights of members in this place. Over the past number of decades, we the backbenchers have witnessed a decline in means of participation in and influence on the great public policy debates. We have little ability to influence new legislation as it is being drafted in the faraway reaches of this place. Nor do we have a parliamentary committee structure that enables members to adequately influence the course of action taken or even to hold ministers to account.

It has become a common practice here to time allocate legislation so that it does not get bogged down in the House. While it is important to ensure against parliamentary gridlock, not having adequate time to debate legislation in some ways invalidates our roles as legislators.

These impediments do not only have implications for our jobs as lawmakers or legislators. Most important, it dangerously weakens the link between those who govern and those who are governed. Important questions about the true nature of democracy arise. In a parliamentary democracy like ours, we as well as our leaders must be aware that the elected members of the House of Commons are the repositories of democracy in this country. We must at all times be aware of the fact that our obligations must remain to our constituents, to national objectives and the ability for us to ask the kinds of questions that are expected.

In recent times these obligations have become misplaced. Increasingly as a body we are giving up our ability to question, to debate and to propose changes to legislation. By having the sunset clause we will bring that back to this place. The idea of depositing a report with the minister is fine and that minister's depositing it in this place is fine, but we need that other connection for us. That is the ability to bring the person responsible before a committee of parliament and allow us from this place to ask those questions. A committee report on the table here does not allow debate, does not allow questions.

I am simply saying that these amendments are not revolutionary. They just allow for the centre and its operations to be subject to the scrutiny of us in this place. The way it stands, that is not the case. For the department to resist such an amendment is not the correct thing to do. It enables us, the backbench members and those who will come here in the future to have some scrutiny of that operation.

Mr. Scott Brison (Kings—Hants, PC):

Madam Speaker, it is a pleasure to speak to Bill C-22, the money laundering act.

The report stage amendments have been very constructive and helpful in addressing some of the issues I raised when speaking to this legislation earlier. The legislation without these types of constructive amendments would provide a carte blanche, a blank cheque to the new agency which has the ability to effectively pursue activities without any checks and balances and potentially persecute innocent Canadians in the course of its activities.

It is in the interests of accountability and ensuring that the rights of all Canadians are respected and protected against all powerful institutions, particularly these new agencies, whether it is the Revenue Canada agency or this new money laundering agency. We need to ensure that we in the House are vigilant in protecting the rights of each and every Canadian.

My greatest concern, and I raised this when speaking to this legislation earlier, is that ultimately the money laundering agency would have the power to refer information on questionable cases to Revenue Canada. If that is done only in cases where there are reasonable grounds to suspect money laundering is one thing. However, if in a case where there may not be enough evidence to suggest money laundering activities but some evidence of tax evasion exists and the money laundering agency refers the matter to the Revenue Canada agency, that is a very different matter. We need to ensure that with the combination of these two agencies we are not creating a turbocharged Revenue Canada agency that has a greater level of power to pursue and persecute Canadians.

My concern on the Revenue Canada agency as brought forth earlier was that it has the capacity to become an IRS style agency, Godzilla the tax collector. The new money laundering agency could augment the powers of an unaccountable agency and make it even more frightening to the average Canadian taxpayer.

The accountability and transparency that would result from the amendments would go a long way to help address a fundamental flaw with the original legislation. I would hope that members in the House will support these amendments and will continue to monitor the activities of these agencies on an ongoing basis.

We do not want to create a system of fear in Canada for the average taxpaying citizen that at the other end of the tax enforcement side we are actually creating a turbocharged Revenue Canada agency. We do not want to tilt the balance against the average Canadian taxpayer who in the past has had to deal with Revenue Canada, now the new Revenue Canada agency, without a lot of defences.

Again, with the new money laundering agency, anything we can do to ensure that its activities are held accountable by some means, in this case by reporting and by some independent analysis and parliamentary reporting and so on, that will all help take the necessary steps in the right direction.

The Progressive Conservative Party would be supportive of the direction of these amendments and hope that other members of parliament would see these amendments as being constructive.

Mr. Roy Cullen (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Finance, Lib.):

Madam Speaker, when I made the amendment on Motion No. 8 I did not realize we were speaking on all the motions. With the indulgence of the House, I wonder if I could speak to Motion No. 8, the motion by the member for Charlesbourg. With some compromise on the government side, we were able to accommodate his amendment which has been dealt with.

The Acting Speaker (Ms. Thibeault): The parliamentary secretary has already spoken to this group, I believe. We can seek the consent of the House for you to proceed. Does the hon. member have the unanimous consent of the House to speak at this point?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.
Mr. Roy Cullen:

Madam Speaker, the bill already requires that the director of the anti-money laundering centre submit an annual report to the minister and that the minister table a copy of the report in each House of parliament. This is a fundamentally important accountability measure in the bill.

In our view there was no need to add a provision that would require the centre's annual report to be reviewed by a committee of parliament. Parliamentary committees have the right to conduct such a review as they see fit. The motion would merely create a rigid procedure and timetable for parliamentary review without doing anything to strengthen the accountability of the centre.

With respect to Motion No. 9, we were prepared to accommodate the member for Sarnia—Lambton with an amendment that would strike out the words “and the operations of the centre". Unfortunately we cannot support the subamendment by the member for Charlesbourg to replace the word "parliament" with "House of Commons". Unfortunately, we also cannot support the motion by the member for Sarnia—Lambton because we cannot support the subamendment.

With respect to Motion No. 10, the Privacy Act authorizes the privacy commissioner to investigate the centre to ensure that the confidentiality of personal information is being properly protected. The proposed amendment would not therefore provide any additional safeguards. For this reason, I do not support the proposed amendments.

However, we do believe there is merit in having the director report in some fashion on the very important matter of confidentiality. That is why we accepted some revised language to Motion No. 8 which would call for the centre to describe its policies and practices as it relates to the privacy of information of Canadians.

Finally, with respect to Motion No. 11, I believe that the bill as currently drafted strikes the right balance by requiring that within five years of coming into force a committee of parliament review "the administration and operation of this act" and report to parliament. Clause 72 also explicitly requires that the committee's report to parliament include a statement of any changes to the act or its administration that the committee recommends.

The existing provision in the bill will ensure that parliament will re-examine this legislation carefully within five years with a view to considering possible changes to improve Canada's anti-money laundering regime. This is appropriate given the importance of this legislation.

I do not believe that anything would be gained by the amendment proposed by the member for Sarnia—Lambton to the five year review clause in this bill because the bill is already going to be reviewed by parliament within five years. I also cannot support the subamendment by the member for Charlesbourg to strike out the word "parliament".

Mr. Jim Abbott (Kootenay—Columbia, Canadian Alliance):

Madam Speaker, we continue with the saga of pulling the bill together with amendments, subamendments, everything happening at the last minute and negotiations happening even at 11 hours and 59 minutes.

I continue to feel a sense of distress over this bill. We all want the bill to go through so I am begrudgingly recommending to my colleagues that we support these motions. However, there has been so much chewing gum, baling wire and paper clips put to this bill at this particular point I do not have a lot of confidence that we will not see a big problem in three or four years after this bill comes into effect. I am very concerned about that.

I will speak to Group No. 3 specifically. I will also comment on Motion No. 9 by my esteemed colleague from Sarnia, and I say that in all seriousness. I take him to be a very serious and competent gentleman. He has certainly put some very legitimate concerns in front of the House and has a deep concern about this bill. He is a very serious and worthy member of parliament but the problem with his motion is the phrase “and the operations of the centre” contained in that motion.

Why I prefaced my remarks yet again with this business of negotiating at the last second is that if in the procedure the government had seen fit to remove that or to propose an amendment to move that, then my colleague from the Bloc Quebecois could then have entered the motion that he has before the Chamber. The point is that we have to deal with his motion and we could have dealt with the motion against this wording and the operations of the centre. It could have happened and we could have had a clause in this bill that would have in its own small way gone to strengthening the bill. Unfortunately that did not happen. As a consequence, because the member's motion includes those six words “and the operations of the centre”, I will have to recommend to my colleagues that we turn down an otherwise worthy amendment.

With respect to the member for Charlesbourg, for whom I also have a great deal of respect, I understand what he is trying to do in terms of talking about parliament as opposed to the government and the whole attitude that there is vis-à-vis the Senate. The Canadian Alliance is certainly in favour of a total revision of the Senate before we afford it perhaps the kind of respect that a chamber like that should have. However, because we want to get this bill through quickly and come up to speed, in spite of the three year delay on the part of the government, I would have to vote against revising the Senate for the very simple reason that we will not have any constitutional change. We will certainly not have this Prime Minister do anything about the Senate. This would have to be included in the motion which we will have to defeat. This is terribly confusing.

On Motion No. 11 the Canadian Alliance generally would be in favour of sunset clauses. As a matter of fact, we have proposed them for bills like Bill C-68 and other very contentious bills that have no proven value. Just to parenthesize that particular bill is completely off track. It is costing hundreds of millions of dollars and going nowhere. There is no sunset clause. Under normal circumstances our party would be in favour of a sunset clause.

However, the fact that this bill, as written by the government, does call for a review in five years, and the fact that money laundering will not go away in the next five years, I do not think this particular motion would be at all helpful.

Those are the comments of the official opposition. I hope we can get through this without more chewing gum and baling wire because we are getting a little bit low. The confectionery is getting concerned.

The Acting Speaker (Ms. Thibeault): Is the House ready for the question?

Mr. Bob Kilger: Madam Speaker, I rise on a point of order. I believe earlier in the debate on this important subject matter there was a recorded division requested on Group No. 1. I think you would find unanimous consent to deal with the matter at this time.

The Acting Speaker (Ms. Thibeault): Does the hon. government whip have the unanimous consent of the House to proceed in such a fashion?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

The Acting Speaker (Ms. Thibeault): The House will now proceed to the taking of the deferred recorded division at the report stage of the bill.

Hon. Allan Rock (for the Minister of Finance, Lib.): moved that the bill be concurred in.

The Acting Speaker (Ms. Thibeault): Is it the pleasure of the House to adopt the motion?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

(Motion agreed to)

Mr. Bob Kilger: Madam Speaker, if you would seek unanimous consent, I believe the House would agree to proceed to third reading of this bill.

Mr. Ken Epp: Madam Speaker, I rise on a point of order, which is one of clarification. It seems to me that the request for a recorded division was made yesterday. Therefore, we should now be ringing the bells to proceed with the vote, unless the whip would specifically ask for the vote to be further deferred.

Mr. Bob Kilger:

Madam Speaker, if it would help the House, particularly in addressing the issue raised by my colleague from Elk Island, earlier I asked for the unanimous consent of the House to dispose of the deferred vote that was requested on Group No. 1. I want to assure the member that we dealt with the matter in the best traditions of the House.

The Acting Speaker (Ms. Thibeault):

The hon. government whip asked for consent and the Chair did not hear any disagreement to the request, so we proceeded as if consent had been given.

The hon. government whip has asked for consent to proceed immediately to third reading. Does the House give unanimous consent to proceed in such a fashion?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Hon. Stéphane Dion (for the Minister of Finance, Lib.) moved that the bill be read the third time and passed.

Mr. Roy Cullen (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Finance, Lib.): Madam Speaker, I am pleased to rise at the third reading of Bill C-22.

I would like to thank members for their co-operation and their indulgence. We have dealt with a number of amendments that were presented just days ago, or in some cases hours, and I think we have accommodated a number of the concerns of the members who proposed amendments.

In fairness to Canadians who are watching this debate, the substance of the bill is sound and the amendments will add further clarity to the reporting mechanisms. The amendments will certainly add value to the bill.

In my view it is important that the bill be sent to the Senate and promulgated so that law enforcement agencies and financial institutions can finalize the development of the regulations and the guidelines that will set this initiative into motion as quickly as possible. We know that money laundering will not go away. What we are trying to do with this legislation is curtail the growth and decrease the levels of activity that are prevalent in Canada and internationally.

There have been extensive consultations, not only at committee, but with a number of stakeholder groups. Bill C-22 provides a statutory minimum 90 day pre-publication requirement for any regulation proposed under the legislation and a minimum 30 day notice period if further changes are to be made. This goes well beyond what is provided in many federal statutes and reflects the importance that the government attaches to public consultations in this area.

In the same vein, the House should know about the guidelines that will be given the institutions and the people, who, in order to meet the reporting requirements of this bill, must establish the existence of reasonable grounds to suspect that the transaction is related to the commission of a money laundering offence.

As we explained at committee, the guidelines will be issued by the proposed anti-money laundering agency to assist with that determination.

Flexibility will be the key word in developing the guidelines and regulations. The money launderers of this world are constantly changing their modus operandi. They are constantly moving into new areas of activity. Therefore, we need to have some flexibility within the regulations and guidelines.

As an example, there will need to be some clear rules around the professions. If an accountant or an auditor is doing a regular attest audit and he or she comes across what might be a suspicious transaction, the legislation does not put the burden on that person to report it. That would create an unnecessary burden. However, if that person becomes party to a financial transaction which involves a suspicious activity or an amount of money defined by regulation, that person is obliged to comply with the legislation. In the normal conduct of professional activities that would not be required. This will be spelled out in the regulations.

Our other G-7 partners are devoting considerable resources and energies to combatting money laundering activities. With this law we will do the same.

At committee we heard very strong representations from lawyers in terms of solicitor-client privilege. The bill specifically calls for respecting solicitor-client privilege. However, we cannot allow the opportunity for lawyers who might be involved in transactions involving money laundering operations to be exempt on the grounds of solicitor-client privilege. That aspect of this law will be very similar to the law in other jurisdictions.

Bill C-22 targets the financial rewards of criminal activity by creating a balanced and effective reporting regime. It protects the integrity of our financial systems and enables Canada to meet its international obligations while protecting individual privacy. We will have an effective money laundering system in place to ensure that Canada fulfils its responsibility both as the founding member of the financial action task force on money laundering and as a member of the G-8 to co-operate in the international fight against money laundering.

Not only are we joining with other members of the financial action task force on money laundering in order to make the reporting of dubious operations mandatory, but our system of reporting will now be equal to that of most of the industrialized countries, including the other members of the G-7, most European countries and many of our Commonwealth partners, such as Australia and New Zealand.

Let us waste no time in passing this legislation. I urge all hon. members to accord this bill speedy passage, as we have done to date. Let us pass this legislation so that Canadians can be protected from money laundering activities.

Mr. Richard Marceau (Charlesbourg, BQ):

Madam Speaker, it is with great pleasure that I rise today to take part in this debate on the third reading of Bill C-22. I can see that all my colleagues and the pages are eager to hear my remarks and are deeply interested in this debate, which has a major impact on Canadians and Quebecers.

First of all, I cannot help but deplore, once again, the fact that the committee had to rush its examination of the bill.

We heard the last witnesses on Wednesday night at 5 p.m. or 5.30 p.m., and we had to sit the next morning at 9 a.m. to begin the clause by clause review of the bill. It is easy to understand that, after hearing interesting evidence, very intelligent and well documented evidence, members should have been given a little time to weigh this evidence and come up with amendments.

Unfortunately, this was just before our two week recess. We had some time to digest all of this, and we came up with amendments that passed. I hope this will serve us a lesson to ensure that, if we really want to give witnesses who appeared the credit, I would say, that they deserve, the least the hon. members could do is take the time to assimilate and to re-read their testimonies. The quality of witnesses who appeared before the Standing Committee on Finance concerning Bill C-22 was particularly impressive.

I would be remiss if I did not tell members of the House that the Bloc Quebecois has probably the most intelligent, balanced, concrete and imaginative anti-crime agenda of all political parties represented in the House. It is an anti-crime agenda that does not fall into populism, into demagogy, and I think we can see the result with Bill C-22.

I would remind hon. members that the 1997 election platform of the Bloc Quebecois—I know this is almost bedtime reading to you, Madam Speaker—provided for and clearly asked for such a measure to fight money laundering.

Indeed, as early as 1997, even before the federal government introduced Bill C-22 and its doomed predecessor, Bill C-81, the Bloc Quebecois was already working on this issue, holding numerous intensive meetings with different crime fighting agencies. This is only one example. We could give others.

For instance, I introduced a bill to take $1,000 bills out of circulation. The federal government decided to listen to the Bloc Quebecois and to take them out of circulation to fight money laundering.

We spent a full opposition day trying to get all the parliamentarians in this House to agree to have the Standing Committee on Justice look into the problem of organized crime in Canada. It is a third victory for the Bloc Quebecois.

These three victories are quite impressive. I would be remiss—and I am pretty sure that all the members would hold it against me—if I overlooked the relentless campaign against organized crime that the member for Bagot is engaged in, despite all the risks involved, particularly in his region where farmers live in fear, terrorized by criminal groups who grow marijuana in their corn fields and other fields. It deserves the support of all members of the House.

Those were four specific actions taken by the Bloc, and we claimed victory on three of them. Of course, when we hear the clever and convincing arguments brought forward by the Bloc Quebecois, it is hard to imagine that the House would decide not to follow the lead of the Bloc on this matter.

Coming back to Bill C-22 per se, and I repeat that it was an original idea of the Bloc, it is important to mention that it is indeed an obligation, as the parliamentary secretary for the minister of Finance said, an international obligation for Canada to fight this worldwide phenomenon known as money laundering. Canada meets its obligations in this regard.

On the whole, this is a good bill. The amendments proposed, again, by the Bloc Quebecois bring some pretty major improvements to the bill. I see a number of people agreeing with that. The regulative jurisdiction is one of the main problems of this bill. It was extremely broad, and one can understand the logic of all that.

The centre that will be created under this bill will have to be flexible. Indeed, considering the ever changing new technology, it will have to be able to adjust very quickly. This is why the regulatory power is very broad.

We wanted to ensure that not only would the Access to Information Act and the Privacy Act apply, but also that parliamentarians would be properly informed about the centre's operations. This is why I moved Motion No. 8, which was carried with an amendment, but which still ensures that the policies and benchmarks set by the centre are known by members of the House, who are ultimately accountable to the public.

This bill deals, among other things, with the issue of privacy. Given today's technology, that issue can raise some concerns and this is understandable. It is therefore important to give elected members of the House, who are the only ones accountable to the public, at least an opportunity to understand and the authority to ask what is going on in a centre that could potentially have excessive powers.

I congratulate the House, and particularly the Bloc Quebecois, which promoted the idea of fighting money laundering and of reporting suspicious transactions over $10,000. This great victory for the Bloc Quebecois is made even sweeter by the fact that several of our amendments were accepted by the House, and for good reason.

Again, the House showed great wisdom in supporting the amendments proposed by the Bloc Quebecois. I congratulate the House, and particularly the Bloc Quebecois for its excellent work in the fight against crime.

Mr. Jim Abbott (Kootenay—Columbia, Canadian Alliance): Madam Speaker, this is possibly the strangest bill I have ever had anything to do with in the eight years I have had the privilege of serving the people of Kootenay—Columbia.

As the solicitor general critic I am fully aware of the consequences of the bill. It will be used basically as a highly sophisticated sieve to be able to look at countless billions of dollars of transactions literally on a daily basis. The bill is a highly sophisticated response to a highly sophisticated problem.

In one presentation during the course of our committee work the law enforcement people showed us a graph with three different pictures. When we first looked at it, it appeared as though there was a yellow sun approximately 30 inches in diameter and there were some notations around its perimeter.

When we looked very closely at it, we realized they were all simply lines. It was much like taking the wrapping off a golf ball and looking at how the elastic band was wound on it. Another section showed a bit closer that indeed they were lines, but they were so complex that it was difficult to perceive any kind of pattern.

A smaller section was blown up to the same size as the original sun and we could see the number of transactions by organized crime they had traced in this one instance to take a look at the money coming in from illegal activities that are dragging down society such as drugs, prostitution and so on. Those activities were detailed in the study by this law enforcement organization. Of everything I saw, the graph was the most graphic illustration of what we are discussing today.

We now have the ability because of the power of computers to enact all sorts of transactions and exceptionally sophisticated transactions on the part of organized crime.

I have been exceptionally critical, and I think rightfully so, of the solicitor general, the finance minister, the Prime Minister and the government for the fact that they have strangled the ability of law enforcement agencies in Canada to come even close to the level of sophistication of which even the most rudimentary organized crime units are capable.

It is not only organized crime. We are also talking about the laundering of money, much of which ends up sticking to the fingers of people involved in terrorism. The new immigrants to Canada, the people who come here to help us build our great nation, the people who see the opportunity and seize it, are most disadvantaged by the fact that the Liberal government consistently strangles the ability of law enforcement to get to the bottom of terrible terrorist organizations that not only plague the world but indeed individuals in Canada.

The speed by which the legislation is going through the House today and over the last couple of days is well warranted. It is something we desperately need to do, but we put that against the fact that over the last three years the government has dillied and dallied. It has dragged its feet and has not got around to giving us the necessary legislation. In just a second I will describe the process that led up to the point where the government finally brought the legislation to the House of Commons.

Unfortunately the legislation has been subjected to crass opportunism on the part of the Liberal government which sees this Chamber and the work of the people here as being worthy of nothing more than being treated as though it were a rubber stamp, as though we do not have a function in the process.

I was elected in my constituency not just to represent the people there. Along with the other 300 members in the House of Commons, we were collectively elected to come here to work on behalf of the people of Canada. I find it absolutely appalling that the government continuously treats the opposition and this Chamber as though it was a matter of yet another rubber stamp.

I can give an example. I am deeply concerned that the bill will be so egregiously flawed that we will run into the problems in two, three or four years after the bill is enacted and the centre gets going. We will find all sorts of flaws because of the terribly bad process it has gone through.

We have spoken during report stage about the number of things that were going on in the background. First, we ended up with negotiations between all parties on a work schedule. The government will say that the work schedule for the committee was on the basis that we would be hearing witnesses up to a particular point. The hearing of witnesses was to close at 5.30 p.m. one day and at 9 a.m. the next day we would start clause by clause consideration.

For those who are not familiar with how bills go through the House of Commons, clause by clause is exactly that. Every law is made up of any number of clauses to a bill. The number of clauses can be as few as two or three. In most instances there are 100 or more clauses to a bill. Those describe in great detail so that judges, law enforcement officials and interested Canadians can see what the intent was of the people in this Chamber with respect to any kind of legislation.

When we go through clause by clause on any bill there is the government side and, depending on how contentious the bill may be, there is the opposition that will then debate each word, each parse, each phrase and each piece of punctuation to make sure that it is indeed the way the government wants it. Of course at the end of the day the government will prevail. That is the parliamentary process.

What happened in this instance was we had a number of very interesting witnesses who gave all of us pause for concern. They made us stop and realize that we have to make sure that our Canadian legislation reflects the values within the Canadian Charter of Rights and Freedoms.

A witness, a law enforcement official from the U.K., gave us illustrations. I asked him some questions about his illustrations on what was being done in the U.K. We very clearly discovered that if we are going to have the Canadian Charter of Rights and Freedoms, every piece of legislation has to match it. Therefore the bill was working around the restrictions of the Canadian Charter of Rights and Freedoms that many of our ancestors or relatives of our ancestors currently living in the U.K. do not have to work around. We realize in every jurisdiction in all of the G-7 countries and any of the signatories to any of the agreements with respect to money laundering that there will be different platforms that legislation will be working from.

We listened to different professional agencies. We listened to businesses that were going to be affected by the legislation. We had some very thoughtful presentations from most of the presenters. One or two of the presenters we collectively found were a bit over the top but that is fine. That is their right and their privilege to come before us in committee.

Against the 2,000 or 3,000 lawyers the government has in the justice department, the solicitor general's department, the finance department, every government department, against the 2,000 lawyers the government has on its side who could be taking apart this testimony, the official opposition has one lawyer. Count him. There is one lawyer who is basically responsible for three different ministries, that is 2,000 to one in terms of strength.

I acknowledge that the work schedule was agreed to by all parties, my party included, but when we came to the conclusion of this process it was very evident that the work schedule was no longer workable. That we were going to be hearing witnesses at 5.30 p.m. on Wednesday and at nine o'clock in the morning on Thursday we were supposed to be prepared to do clause by clause study was clearly and specifically unworkable. I drew that to the attention of the parliamentary secretary.

In good faith I went to that committee session. My colleague from Charlesbourg went to that meeting. We both basically said that we needed more time. The member from Sarnia who was at the meeting actually put forward a motion that we needed to have time over the two week parliamentary break when members are at home working with their constituents. That period of time would give our lawyer an opportunity to take a look at the testimony and to parse it to see how it related to all of the clauses.

The government saw fit to vote down the motion put forward by the member from Sarnia over the objections of three members of the opposition. Therefore we did not take part in the clause by clause study. The reason I did not take part in the clause by clause study was that quite candidly I was not prepared. I have not received counsel. This is an exceptionally complex bill. I say again it is going to screen countless billions and billions of currency in and out of Canada. I wanted to be prepared. There was no way I could be prepared.

Let us fast forward to bringing this matter to the Chamber yesterday. What a disgraceful display that was. This was brought into the Chamber yesterday while we were still in the process of discussions. As a matter of fact I recall the clerk at the table stood to introduce Group No. 1 and the Speaker at the time began to read the motions. We were all running back to our seats halfway through negotiations as to how we were going to be handling the various amendments.

We got into the process and then the Liberals ended up discussing things with the Bloc Quebecois, which is entirely their privilege. I do not think much of that myself but I do think very much of the fact that I represent Her Majesty's Official Opposition. We were left out of any discussions of that type. All of a sudden the government was presenting motions to the Chair which the Chair could not receive.

I say for the third or fourth time this bill is basically responsible for acting like a highly sophisticated sieve involving countless billions of dollars on a daily basis and we are running around giving motions from the Government of Canada that the Chair cannot receive. It is no wonder I asked that the debate be adjourned. It was only logical. It gave the government an opportunity to get a breather.

What a disgraceful display for a government of a G-7 nation to come forward with this kind of vital legislation and to do it in such a slipshod way. It has been the height of folly. It has been absolutely frustrating to try to perform my duties on behalf of Her Majesty's Official Opposition when we have seen this type of chewing gum and baling wire.

As I pointed out on Group No. 3 that was just passed, again the government member from Sarnia presented a motion to amend the bill as written. That is what can happen at report stage, just so the people who are not familiar with the parliamentary process understand. That motion actually had some merit. I think it would have strengthened the bill not in a large way but certainly in a small way, and for something as sophisticated as this bill every little small part helps.

What happened? The member included a phrase that unfortunately was unworkable. The phrase would have caused a situation where the centre that will be doing the work would have to reveal far too much detail in public, and I understand that. My understanding in conversation with the member from Sarnia is that there had been agreement that he would agree to the removal of that phrase.

My colleague from Charlesbourg for his own very good reasons brought forward an amendment. He wanted to remove the word “government” and insert the word “parliament” thereby freezing the Senate out of the ability of being involved in the five year review of this. This is important.

Had the government been on the ball, and I drew it to the attention of certain government members at the time, and had it inserted the amendment to the motion by the member from Sarnia and then my colleague had put his subamendment, we could have had that improvement to the legislation in the bill. This just happened within the last hour.

Instead the government was remiss and did not do that. As a consequence, as we voted down the amendment by the member for Charlesbourg, we closed off the ability to make the necessary amendment for that improvement to the bill. I just despair for this process.

I have not been involved in a lot of the legislation that has gone through the House in terms of shepherding it through the House for Her Majesty's Official Opposition. I have not been as involved in the detail. Heaven forbid that the the process on every piece of legislation is as messed up as the process that was involved in this piece of legislation has been.

I recognize we are reaching the time when the Speaker will tell us it is time for members' statements. I will want to complete my speech following question period. I will conclude this portion without talking about the substance of the bill, which I will happily do following question period.

I state again that I have the greatest feeling of despair for this piece of legislation because of the fatally flawed process through which it has rumbled through this Chamber. This is where the Senate does come in. God bless their souls over there. They do have the ability to take a look at this legislation. Hopefully they will not go through as badly flawed a process.

The government now wants to get this bill through like greased lightning and wants to get this bill enacted finally after three years. I would hope that if the Senate comes forward with meaningful amendments the government will not take those as hostile and that we will not be involved in another seriously flawed process in the event that the bill ends up coming back from the Senate.

The Speaker: My colleague, of course you are absolutely correct that you still have close to 22 minutes. I am sure it will fit in with your plan to give us the second half of your talk today.

As it is almost two o'clock, we will go to Statements by Members.

May 9, 2000 [Senate]

The Hon. the Speaker informed the Senate that a message had been received from the House of Commons with Bill C-22, to facilitate combatting the laundering of proceeds of crime, to establish the Financial Transactions and Reports Analysis Centre of Canada and to amend and repeal certain Acts in consequence.

Bill read first time.

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, when shall this bill be read the second time? On motion of Senator Hays, bill be placed on the Orders of the Day for second reading, Thursday next, May 11, 2000.

May 11, 2000 [Senate]

On the Order:

Second reading of Bill C-22, to facilitate combatting the laundering of proceeds of crime, to establish the Financial Transactions and Reports Analysis Centre of Canada and to amend and repeal certain Acts in consequence.

Hon. Dan Hays (Deputy Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, with leave of the Senate and notwithstanding rule 58(1)(i), I move:

That, notwithstanding rule 63(1), the proceedings on Bill C-22, which took place on Tuesday, May 9, 2000, be declared null and void.

We have before us an unprecedented situation, on my inquiry, which is that the text of Bill C-22 that was sent to this place by the other place does not in fact reflect a series of amendments that were made to Bill C-22 in the other place. My information is that they are the amendments that were set out in the second report of the Standing Committee of Finance of the other place. There are several of them. Accordingly, what we have referred to in Item No. 4 is not correct. The error appears to be of a clerical nature, but it is a substantial error. It must be remedied because we are not talking about the same piece of paper in the two Houses in terms of what is described therein, namely, the parchment.

The House of Commons has responded to this by sending to us what I believe is the correct parchment. However, we must dispose of this matter here, in the absence of any other way of dealing with this unprecedented problem.

Honourable senators, this is a matter that I have had an opportunity to discuss with the Deputy Leader of the Opposition. I would propose that we deal with this through unanimous consent. Senator Prud'homme is not listening; nevertheless, we will deal with it by passing the motion that I have put.

The Hon. the Speaker: Is it your pleasure, honourable senators, to adopt the motion?

Hon. Marcel Prud'homme: Honourable senators, as a word of explanation, what does this imply? I will cooperate on this issue.

Senator Hays: I appreciate your agreement to cooperate, Senator Prud'homme.

Senator Prud'homme: The difficulty, senator, is that you must realize that senators talk to each other. Some say that I am shy. I do not know exactly what is going on, so I do not like to get up. Sometimes I do know; however, I am concerned about the new senators. When I became a senator seven years ago, I did not dare get up for fear of embarrassing myself.

Will the Deputy Leader of the Government please tell us what this implies so that we are all on an equal footing in understanding the mistake that took place?

Senator Hays: Thank you, Senator Prud'homme. Before I say anything, though, I wish to point out to honourable senators that I did try to be as precise and as clear as I could in explaining. Nevertheless, let me explain again.

On Monday of this week, we received Bill C-22, which is Order No. 4 on the Orders of the Day. It was given first reading on Monday.

The parchment did not contain amendments that were made in the Standing Committee on Finance of the other place. They are referred to in the second report of that committee. There are several of them, and they are substantive. The error — and it is a clerical error but it is a substantive clerical error — was discovered. We have now received from the other place another parchment, which is the same bill, Bill C-22, with the corrections made in it.

Honourable senators, we cannot have two Bill C-22s, so after discussion with the Deputy Leader of the Opposition and the Table, we have proposed a solution to this unprecedented situation. The solution is that we give unanimous consent to the motion that I read and that His Honour put. Perhaps His Honour could put it again to ensure that everyone has heard it and understands exactly what we propose.

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, since that order has not yet been called, I do not think as Speaker that I should deal with it. We are still on the previous order, which is the second reading of Bill C-20. I will deal with Bill C-22 when that item is called.

Motion agree to and order withdrawn.

Hon. Dan Hays (Deputy Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, under Government Business, I should like to call Bill C-22, next.

The Hon. the Speaker informed the Senate that a message had been received from the House of Commons with the reprinted Bill C-22, to facilitate combatting the laundering of proceeds of crime, to establish the Financial Transactions and Reports Analysis Centre of Canada and to amend and repeal certain Acts in consequence.

Bill read first time.

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, when shall this bill be read the second time?

On motion of Senator Hays, bill placed on the Orders of the Day for second reading Monday next, May 15, 2000.

May 16, 2000 [Senate]

Hon. Richard H. Kroft moved the second reading of Bill C-22, to facilitate combating the laundering of proceeds of crime, to establish the Financial Transactions and Reports Analysis Centre of Canada and to amend and repeal certain Acts in consequence.

He said: Honourable senators, it is my privilege to speak to you today at second reading of Bill C-22, the proceeds of crime, or money laundering, bill.

Money laundering is the process whereby the proceeds from criminal activities are converted into assets that cannot easily be traced back to their illegal origins. The process typically begins with the placement of cash into financial channels. It may also involve a series of complex financial transactions in which the dirty money is layered to further disguise its origins and then integrated or invested in seemingly bona fide assets.

Open borders and globalized financial markets provide today's criminals with the opportunity to launder millions of dollars every day in illegal profits. No country, including Canada, is immune from these activities.

Given the clandestine nature of money laundering and of the crimes that generate the funds that need to be laundered, it is difficult to put a precise figure on the size of the problem. However, studies have estimated that between $5 billion and $17 billion in criminal proceeds are laundered in and through Canada each year. These sums, which are very large by any standard, are linked primarily to proceeds from drug trafficking.

What has Canada been doing to address this problem? In 1989, the government took important steps to address money laundering through amendments to the Criminal Code, the Food and Drugs Act, and the Narcotics Act. Thus, the building blocks of anti-money laundering have been in place for some time. That legislation made money laundering a criminal offence and established procedures for seizing, restraining and forfeiting proceeds of crime.

The current Proceeds of Crime (money laundering) Act came into force in June 1991. It provides Canada with its current system of record keeping and client identification for financial transactions conducted through financial institutions, as well as professionals that act as financial intermediaries.

In addition, certain deposit-taking institutions entered into cooperative arrangements with the RCMP in 1993 to provide for the voluntary reporting of suspected money laundering activities to the police.

Further, in partnership with the provinces, territories and law enforcement agencies, the federal government has taken several steps against organized crime, including initiatives to fight smuggling and seize proceeds of crime.

In spite of having taken these actions, it is clear that Canada now needs to do more.

As money laundering techniques become more sophisticated, detection and deterrence have become increasingly difficult. Traditional methods used by law enforcement, such as storefront sting operations, have generally only been effective in dealing with money launderers who use smaller money service businesses, such as street level foreign exchange houses. At the same time, the current anti-money laundering measures of record keeping and limited voluntary reporting by deposit-taking institutions tends to focus only on the initial placement of cash into financial channels.

The effectiveness of the current reporting scheme is limited by its voluntary nature and by the fact that illicit funds can enter the system other than through deposit-taking institutions. This is borne out by international anti-money laundering organizations. They have noted the tendency for illicit funds to enter the financial system through such diverse points as insurance companies, security dealers, casinos, currency exchange businesses and professionals, including lawyers and accountants.

The call for stronger legislation in Canada has come from various sources. Law enforcement agencies in Canada and abroad need help to deal with the new realities of international organized crime. They have made the case to the federal government for legislation that requires the reporting of suspicious and prescribed transactions such as large cash transactions above a certain amount and of cross-border movements of currency.

At the international level, Canada has come under increasing scrutiny for gaps in our anti-money laundering arrangements. A 1997 review by the Financial Action Task Force on Money Laundering found Canada's arrangements to be lacking in certain key areas. The FATF strongly encouraged Canada to meet international standards that required the mandatory reporting of suspicious transactions.

In recent years, the other 25 members of the task force have made great strides in strengthening their anti-money laundering laws. Except for Canada, all other FATF members currently have suspicious transaction reporting requirements in place similar to those contained in this bill. The measures taken in these other countries have facilitated international cooperation among them, in fighting money laundering.

Honourable senators, the bill we are debating today is the government's response to the need for stronger legislation. It updates and strengthens the existing act and will improve the detection, prevention and deterrence of money laundering in Canada. I must emphasize, however, that this legislation was designed with the goals of giving law enforcement agencies the tools they need while at the same time protecting individual privacy. This bill meets both goals.

I should also point out that the bill was developed in consultation with many other stakeholders, including the provinces and territories, the financial community, consumer groups and organizations concerned about privacy issues.

Honourable senators, I should now like to discuss briefly the measures in the bill. Bill C-22 continues the record keeping and client identification features of the existing Proceeds of Crime Act. In addition, it provides for the mandatory reporting of suspicious transactions and prescribed transactions, the reporting of large cross-border movements of currency and the establishment of the new Financial Transactions and Reform Analysis Centre.

I should like to take a moment to describe these new measures because each is important in its own right. Taken together, they constitute a coherent package that will strengthen Canada's anti-money laundering capabilities. These measures will also bring Canada into line with accepted international standards in the fight against money laundering.

I shall begin by discussing the mandatory reporting provisions of suspicious transactions. One of the cornerstones of anti-money laundering systems around the world is the legal obligation to report transactions where money laundering is suspected. By implementing this measure, Canada now joins the other member countries of the Financial Action Task Force on Money Laundering that already have some form of mandatory, suspicious transaction reporting in place.

Regulated financial institutions, casinos, currency exchange businesses and certain other financial intermediaries, such as lawyers and accountants who act in this capacity, will now be required to report any financial transaction in respect of which there are reasonable grounds to suspect that it is related to the commission of a money laundering offence. In addition, specific types of transactions, like the receipt of cash above a prescribed amount, such as $10,000, and large electronic transfers, will be outlined in regulations and must also be reported.

Honourable senators, Bill C-22 also requires that the movement of large amounts of cash money or monetary instruments like travellers' cheques across the Canadian border be declared to Canada Customs. This measure complements the other reporting requirements of the bill by discouraging a shift in money laundering activity across the border.

If individuals or businesses fail to comply, a customs officer can seize the currency. However, any cash or monetary instruments that are seized will be returned once the fine has been paid unless Customs has reasonable grounds to suspect that the money represents proceeds of crime, in which case the money may be forfeited to Her Majesty. Naturally, there will be mechanisms in place for the review and appeal of cross-border seizures and penalties.

The third major element of Bill C-22 involves the establishment of the new Financial Transactions and Reports Analysis Centre of Canada which will be tasked with receiving and analysing all of the reports mandated by this bill and determining whether limited information should be passed on to the relevant authorities. The centre does not have investigative powers.

Honourable senators, it is important to emphasize that there will be safeguards in place to ensure that the collection, use and disclosure of information by the centre will be strictly controlled. The centre will be an independent body acting at arm's length from law enforcement agencies and other agencies entitled to receive information from the centre.

In addition, where the centre has reasonable grounds to suspect that information would be relevant to the investigation or prosecution of a money-laundering offence, the centre will only pass on a specified limited amount of information to the police and other designated agencies.

The information that the centre can disclose will be limited to key identifying information relating to reported transactions such as the name of the client, the numbering of the account involved, the amount of the transaction and other similar information.

Given the limited nature of this information, law enforcement authorities will be required to build a case for prosecution purposes and obtain a court order for disclosure to obtain further information from the centre. The centre will not be subject to subpoenas except in respect to money-laundering investigations and prosecutions. I should note, too, that these safeguards are backed by criminal penalties for any unauthorized use or disclosure of personal information under the centre's control.

Further, the centre will be subject to the Privacy Act and its protections. In addition, each House of Parliament will receive an annual report on the operations of the centre. There will also be a parliamentary review following five years of the committee's operation.

Honourable senators, it is clear from this description, and certainly from a close reading of Bill C-22, that careful consideration has been given to ensuring that this legislation will create a balanced and effective anti-money laundering scheme while protecting individual privacy.

Before closing, I wish to touch on the bill's regulation-making authority concerning the coverage of entities, client information, record keeping and reporting requirements. This authority will provide much needed flexibility to respond quickly to the ever-changing nature of money laundering and to adapt the regime to changes in the way financial intermediaries conduct their business.

This bill also allows greater flexibility to respond to issues raised by stakeholders in complying with the legislation. Extensive consultations have already started on regulations and these will continue in the next few months to further refine the current proposals and develop additional ones regarding the form and manner of reporting. The government's aim is to develop regulations that are consistent with the principles underlying the bill. This means striking an appropriate balance among the objectives of law enforcement, protection of personal information, minimum compliance cost and support for Canada's contribution to international efforts to combat money laundering.

This bill requires a 90-day pre-publication period for regulations and a 30-day notice period for further changes. These requirements go well beyond what is provided in many federal statutes and reflects the importance the government attaches to public consultations in this area.

I have noted institutions and professions covered by this legislation will be required to report suspicious transactions to a new anti-money laundering agency. The government recognizes that guidance will be needed in determining whether there are reasonable grounds to suspect that a particular transaction is related to the commission of a money-laundering offence.

This guidance will be in the form of official guidelines issued by the new agency. This is the approach that is being taken in many other member countries of the Financial Action Task Force, including Australia, the United Kingdom and the United States. The proposed guidelines will be developed in full consultation with stakeholder groups and will reflect the circumstances of the businesses and professions that have a reporting obligation under the bill.

Anti-money laundering guidelines that can serve as models for this purpose already exist. For example, the Superintendent of Financial Institutions issued his guidelines for deterring and detecting money laundering in 1996. In addition, the guidelines and experience of other countries that require suspicious transactions to be reported can be drawn upon in the development of appropriate guidelines for our legislation.

Honourable senators, Bill C-22 is specifically aimed at helping to defeat the vicious cycle of crime by going after criminals where it hurts most, in their wallets. This legislation achieves several things. First, it targets the financial rewards of criminal activity and protects the integrity of our financial system in Canada. Second, it creates a balanced and effective reporting scheme to uncover criminal activity while protecting individual privacy. Third, it complements other federal initiatives against organized crime by helping Canada to meet its international commitments in this area.

It is essential, as we all know, that Canada fulfils its responsibilities, both as a founding member of the Financial Action Task Force on Money Laundering and as a member of the G-8, to cooperate in the international fight against money laundering. Bill C-22 ensures that Canada meets these responsibilities. I urge all senators to move this bill forward to committee and to final stage without undue delay. It is a matter of serious importance to Canadians and to our international obligations.

On motion of Senator Kinsella, for Senator Kelleher, debate adjourned.

May 17, 2000 [Senate]

Senator Hays: I wonder, honourable senators, if I might ask and hopefully receive leave to not see the clock for approximately five minutes on the following basis.

First, I propose that we not proceed with the order of the Senate so that Senator Murray can complete his answer and deal with any other questions in the balance of his half-hour time frame. Second, I propose that we then call Order No. 4 under Government Business, namely, resuming second reading debate on Bill C-22, so that we might hear a speech by Senator Kelleher, which is very short and which may be the last speech at the second reading stage of this bill.

The Hon. the Speaker: Is leave granted, honourable senators, that I do not proceed with the order of the Senate and that we resume debate on Bill C-22?

Hon. Noël A. Kinsella (Deputy Leader of the Opposition): Honourable senators, it is understood that committees will hold in abeyance the commencement of their meetings until the Senate rises.

Debate suspended.

Proceeds of Crime (Money Laundering) Bill, Second Reading

On the Order:

Resuming debate on the motion of the Honourable Senator Kroft, seconded by the Honourable Senator Bacon, for the second reading of Bill C-22, to facilitate combatting the laundering of proceeds of crime, to establish the Financial Transactions and Reports Analysis Centre of Canada and to amend and repeal certain Acts in consequence.

Hon. James F. Kelleher: Honourable senators, I am pleased to rise today to speak on second reading of Bill C-22, a bill which, when passed, will create a new Proceeds of Crime Act.

As Senator Kroft mentioned yesterday, money laundering is a serious issue in Canada and has been for some time. It is estimated that between $5 and $17 billion pass in and through this country illegally every year.

Bill C-22 builds upon the existing Proceeds of Crime Act and attempts to address recommendations made by the Financial Action Task Force on Money Laundering, a task force created by G-7 leaders in 1989. Unfortunately, Canada is one of the last countries in the industrialized world to take the necessary steps to meet the minimum standards set by the Financial Action Task Force.

Bill C-22 proposes to bolster Canada's anti-money laundering efforts by requiring banks, trust companies and a host of other financial intermediaries to report information about the financial transactions of their clients and customers. Bill C-22 will also establish, in association with the Canada Customs and Review Agency, a system of reporting large cross-border transactions.

The details about these financial transactions are to be collected by a new central data gathering and analysis body known as the Financial Transactions and Reports Analysis Centre of Canada. This new centre will analyze and assess reports, together with other information available to it, and provide leads to law enforcement agencies.

As a former solicitor general of Canada, I find it odd that the new centre will report to the Minister of Finance. It seems more appropriate that an agency that will be involved with law enforcement would report to a minister with some expertise in the area such as the Office of the Solicitor General. Nonetheless, I am pleased to report that the Progressive Conservative Party of Canada supports the broad purposes and aims of this bill; that is, the prevention and reduction of money laundering in Canada.

I must also tell honourable senators, however, that several aspects of this proposed legislation give us cause for concern. We note, for example, that, at a time when there is an ongoing need for government to show fiscal restraint, this government is proposing to create yet another new agency. Moreover, the government has not made clear exactly what its new centre will cost. We understand that our colleagues in the other place were told that the centre would cost approximately $10 million to operate annually. We in this chamber are hearing that the real cost is, in fact, closer to $15 million. Quite frankly, this is unacceptable. We cannot, as parliamentarians, give our stamp of approval to this or to any other piece of legislation without knowing exactly how much taxpayers' money the government proposes to spend.

We are also concerned that the bill does not clearly define the types of financial transactions it will require banks and other financial intermediaries to report. The definitions provided are unclear and much of the necessary clarification is being left to the regulations. Without clear definitions, the dangers exist that financial intermediaries may neglect to report transactions that should be reported. Conversely — and I am not sure which is worse — they will over-report and thereby provide the new centre with an overflow of data about the financial transactions of innocent Canadians. This leads me to our next concern.

Perhaps the most troubling aspect of this bill is whether it adequately protects the privacy rights of Canadians. Canadians are legitimately concerned by the government's continuous collection and sharing of their personal information. Just yesterday, the Privacy Commissioner released his annual report and indicated that the government now has a file on almost every single Canadian, with files containing as many as 2,000 pieces of information. The power this new centre will have to collect and disseminate personal information, information it can store for up to eight years, will only exacerbate Canadians' concerns.

The Privacy Commissioner's report also states that the new centre could, in addition to information pertaining to an individual's criminal history, amass information relating to an individual's employment, financial transactions and travel history, as well as information relating to an individual's income status, business or professional relations, and possibly even personal relations.

While Bill C-22 stipulates that information collected by the centre can only be disclosed under limited circumstances, in reality we may never be certain if the information gathered about our financial transactions is being improperly disclosed. We do know that the new centre will be monitoring our transactions. What we do not know is who will be monitoring the monitor. The Office of the Privacy Commissioner simply does not have the necessary resources to conduct an annual audit of this and every other government department and agency.

Our party wishes to ensure that the provisions of this bill do not result in the personal information of Canadians being indiscriminately disclosed. Given our concerns, we will also be giving careful consideration to the need for a strict review of the new legislation every five years.

Finally, honourable senators, let me repeat that we support the government's attempts, albeit tardy, to bring Canada's money-laundering legislation into line with the rest of the industrialized world. However, we also look forward to an opportunity to conduct a detailed examination of this bill when it is referred to committee.

Hon. Dan Hays (Deputy Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, I believe that, to complete Order No. 4, we should deal with the question.

The Hon. the Speaker: Are there other honourable senators who wish to speak to Bill C-22?
The Hon. the Speaker: If no other honourable senator wishes to speak, I will proceed with the question.

It was moved by the Honourable Senator Kroft, seconded by the Honourable Senator Bacon, that Bill C-22 be read the second time.

Is it your pleasure, honourable senators, to adopt the motion?

Hon. Senators: Agreed.

Motion agreed to and bill read second time.

Referred to Committee

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, when shall this bill be read the third time?

On motion of Senator Hays, bill referred to the Standing Senate Committee on Legal and Constitutional Affairs.

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, the item for which leave was granted has now been completed.

The Senate adjourned until Thursday, May 18, 2000, at 1:30 p.m.

May 18, 2000 [Senate]

Hon. Dan Hays (Deputy Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, with leave of the Senate, notwithstanding rule 58(1)(f), I move:

That Bill C-22, An Act to facilitate combatting the laundering of proceeds of crime, to establish the Financial Transactions and Reports Analysis Centre of Canada and to amend and repeal certain Acts in consequence, which was referred to the Standing Senate Committee on Legal and Constitutional Affairs, be withdrawn from the said Committee and referred to the Standing Senate Committee on Banking, Trade and Commerce.

The Hon. the Speaker: Is leave granted, honourable senators?

Hon. Senators: Agreed.

Motion agreed to.

June 1, 2000 [Standing Senate Committee on Banking, Trade and Commerce]

Senator E. Leo Kolber (Chairman) in the Chair.

[English]

The Chairman: Good morning, honourable senators. This morning we are meeting to discuss Bill C-22.

We have from the Department of Finance, Mr. Charlie Seeto, who will make an opening statement to fully brief us on all aspects of the bill.

Welcome, Mr. Seeto.

Mr. Charlie Seeto, Director, Financial Sector Policy Branch, Department of Finance: Mr. Chairman, we appreciate the opportunity to speak to your committee today on Bill C-22, the proceeds of crime, or money laundering, act.

Honourable senators, no country, Canada included, is immune to organized crime or money laundering activities. Money laundering is the process whereby the proceeds from criminal activities are converted into assets that cannot be easily traced back to their illegal origins.

The process typically begins with the placement of cash into financial channels. It may also involve a series of complex financial transactions in which the "dirty money" is "layered" to further disguise its origins and then "integrated" or "invested" in seemingly bona fide assets.

Estimating the magnitude of any illicit activity, including money laundering, is always difficult. However, studies using methodologies that have been adopted by recognized international organizations have estimated that between $5 billion and $17 billion in criminal proceeds are laundered in and through Canada every year. Consistent with the experience in other countries, most of the funds laundered in Canada are linked to drug trafficking.

The social costs of money laundering take many forms. Once laundered, the proceeds of crime can be used to finance further criminal activity, perpetuating a vicious cycle of crime.

In this same vein, because criminals must generally launder the proceeds of crime in order to enjoy their illicit profits, money laundering helps provide the financial incentive for criminal activity.

In addition, the large profits available to those involved in the money laundering process can be used to corrupt otherwise law-abiding citizens. This can result in the distortion of business and financial activity by the criminal element. Honest businesses can face unfair competition from those that derive part of their income from money laundering. When money is laundered through financial institutions, the reputations, and even the integrity, of the individual institutions can potentially be undermined.

Canada has had the building blocks of an anti-money- laundering program in place since 1989, when amendments to the Criminal Code, the Food and Drugs Act, and the Narcotics Control Act made money laundering a criminal offence and put in place procedures for seizing, restraining, and forfeiting proceeds of crime.

The 1991 Proceeds of Crime (money laundering) Act established our current system of record keeping and client identification for transactions conducted through financial institutions, as well as for professions acting as financial intermediaries, including lawyers and accountants.

Complementing these measures, certain deposit-taking institutions entered into cooperative arrangements with the RCMP in 1993 that provide for the voluntary reporting of suspected money laundering activities to police.

These and other measures taken to date have produced some positive results. The problem is that money laundering techniques are becoming more sophisticated and detection and deterrence increasingly difficult. It is clear that Canada now needs stronger and more effective legislation than that currently on our books. The effectiveness of our current suspicious transaction reporting scheme is limited by its voluntary nature and its very uneven coverage of the different points at which illicit funds can enter the system.

While the scheme is supported by voluntary agreements between the RCMP and certain deposit-taking institutions, no such agreements cover other points at which the placement of illicit funds can occur, such as insurance companies, securities dealers, casinos, currency exchange businesses, and professionals, including lawyers and accountants.

Extending existing arrangements for the voluntary reporting of suspicious transactions to other institutions and professions is not the answer. Unfortunately, even where such agreements exist, reporting has been extremely uneven. Experience shows that institutions have information about suspicious transactions that would be useful to the investigation of a money laundering offence, but that is not being reported. Given these limitations, law enforcement agencies have also relied on traditional methods such as conducting "sting" operations through storefront money exchange businesses. However, these methods are only effective in uncovering relatively small-scale money laundering activity and can only ever address a fraction of the money laundering that is occurring.

In addition, the current measures have tended to focus only on the initial placement of cash into financial channels. Though this will continue to be an important part of anti-money-laundering efforts, broader coverage and mandatory reporting would also provide police with valuable information to address the "layering" stage of money laundering, where complex financial transactions are used to further disguise the proceeds of crime.

Law enforcement agencies both here and abroad, and the Financial Action Task Force on Money Laundering, or FATF, to which Canada belongs, have called on Canada to make the reporting of suspicious transactions mandatory.

As the honourable members of this committee may know, the FATF was created in 1989 by G-7 leaders to set standards for combating money laundering at the national and international levels. To this end, the FATF established 40 recommendations that all of its 28 members, including Canada, have agreed to follow.

I am pleased to table with this committee three FATF documents that provide background on the problem of money laundering, the international efforts to combat it, and the importance of the kind of measures contained in Bill C-22. These documents are: the most recent annual report of the FATF, its reports on money laundering typologies for 1999-2000, and the 40 recommendations. I understand that we have provided a copy to the Clerk.

One recommendation is that each country require its financial institutions to report to competent authorities when they suspect that funds stem from a criminal activity. Canada is the only country in the FATF that has not yet implemented some form of mandatory reporting of suspicious transactions. The experience of other countries has demonstrated the benefits of financial transaction reporting to law enforcement efforts. It has also provided a variety of models that the government was able to consider in preparing this bill and in designing Canada's anti-money-laundering centre.

With respect to the benefits, the effectiveness of reporting schemes in other countries can be illustrated by the latest annual report of Australia's anti-money-laundering agency. The report includes brief notes on a sample of some 200 cases in which information provided in financial transaction reports either initiated or contributed to criminal investigations. As well, the U.K. has estimated that, over the last four years, an average of about one-third of all suspicious transaction reports provided added criminal intelligence value. On a smaller scale, statistics from Belgium reveal that, of the approximately 24,000 suspicious transaction reports received by Belgium's anti-money-laundering agency between December 1993 and 1998, approximately 1,400 were sent to judicial authorities, and 117 resulted in convictions against more than 200 people.

In addition to reports of suspicious and "prescribed" transactions, law enforcement agencies have also called for the reporting of cross-border movements of currency. Again, this type of reporting requirement is consistent with the FATF's recommendations to all its members. This measure is important in ensuring that the introduction of tougher anti-money-laundering measures here in Canada does not simply shift the problem across our borders.

Mr. Chairman, Bill C-22 is the government's response to this need for stronger legislation. While it continues the record-keeping and client identification features of the existing Proceeds of Crime Act, this bill will provide for the mandatory reporting of suspicious and other prescribed transactions, the reporting of large cross-border movement of currency, and the establishment of the new Financial Transactions and Reports Analysis Centre of Canada.

Before describing these elements, I would like to emphasize that each, as well as the proposed scheme as a whole, has been designed not only to meet the needs of law enforcement, but also to protect the privacy of Canadians to the greatest extent possible. I will outline some of the key protections contained in the bill in a moment when I describe the features of the proposed centre.

With respect to mandatory reporting, regulated financial institutions, casinos, currency exchange businesses, and other financial intermediaries will be required to report any financial transaction where there are reasonable grounds to suspect that it is related to the commission of a money laundering offence. Specific types of transactions such as the receipt of cash above a prescribed amount, for example, must also be reported.

The bill's second provision requires that persons or entities that import or export large amounts of cash or monetary instruments like travellers' cheques across the Canadian border must report that to Canada Customs. Canada Customs will then forward the reports to the anti-money-laundering centre.

Currency can be seized if it is not declared and will be returned upon payment of a fine, unless Canada Customs has reasonable grounds to suspect that it represents proceeds of crime. There will be mechanisms in place for the review and appeal of cross-border seizures and penalties.

The third element in the bill involves the establishment of the new Financial Transactions and Reports Analysis Centre of Canada. The centre's primary function will be to receive and analyze the reports mandated by this bill. The centre's analysis will determine whether limited information from the reports will be passed on to the appropriate authorities. Great care has been taken to ensure that the centre's design and the legislative framework under which it operates serve to protect the privacy of Canadians.

I would like to review some of the safeguards in the bill that ensure that the collection, use, and disclosure of information by the centre will be strictly controlled.

A key feature of the proposed regime is that the reports mandated by the bill will not be provided directly to law enforcement agencies. Rather, as I have mentioned, the reports will be sent to the anti-money-laundering centre. The centre will be an independent body, acting at arm's-length from law enforcement and other agencies that are entitled to receive information from the centre. This means that information reported to the centre about suspicious and prescribed transactions, as well as cross-border movements of currency, will be subject to independent review and analysis.

The information received by the centre will be subject to strict confidentiality provisions to prevent its unauthorized disclosure. Any unauthorized use or disclosure of personal information under the centre's control will be subject to criminal penalties, including fines of up to $500,000 or imprisonment for up to five years.

In addition, the situations under which the centre will be authorized to disclose information will be limited and clearly set out in the act. Only if the centre, on the basis of its analysis, determines that designated information would be relevant to investigating or prosecuting a money laundering offence, will it be disclosed to the police.

"Designated information" is defined in the bill and is limited to key identifying information about the transaction or the cross-border currency movement concerned. For example, in the case of a reported transaction, the information that can be passed on to the police would be limited to such facts as the name of the client, the name and address of the business where the transaction occurred, the account number, and the value of the transaction.

The centre will only be able to release additional information if law enforcement authorities build a case for prosecution purposes and obtain a court order for disclosure of information related to a money laundering offence. The centre will not be subject to search warrants.

The centre will also be authorized to disclose designated information to certain other domestic government agencies, but only under specific conditions. For example, the centre will disclose designated information to CSIS if it has reasonable grounds to believe that the information would be relevant to a money laundering offence and also that it would be relevant to a threat to national security.

The suspected link to money laundering is a test that must be met for any disclosure by the centre. The centre's independence from law enforcement is an important element of this bill's protection of privacy. Privacy considerations contributed to the choice of this model over those of a number of other countries, where similar anti-money-laundering agencies are located within law enforcement agencies or financial regulators.

The centre's independence and autonomy in determining what information shall be disclosed to the police is balanced by its overall accountability to Parliament.

The Minister of Finance will be responsible for the centre. The centre shall report annually to the minister, and the minister shall table a copy of the report in each House of Parliament.

While the day-to-day operation of the centre is clearly the responsibility of its director, the minister will have the authority to direct the centre on matters of public policy and strategic direction. As well, the centre will be subject to the protections of the Privacy Act. For example, the Privacy Commissioner will have the authority to obtain information from the centre in order to investigate a complaint under that act. As is the case with other government institutions, the Privacy Commissioner's office can use its authority to investigate complaints by individuals against the centre, or to both initiate and investigate a complaint. As well, the individual will have recourse under the Privacy Act to the Federal Court.

I would now like to discuss the bill's regulation-making authority with respect to entities, client identification, record keeping, and reporting requirements. It is important that the government be able to respond quickly to the ever-changing nature of money laundering and adopt changes to how financial intermediaries conduct their business. This authority provides that flexibility. The aim is to develop regulations that are consistent with the principles underlying the bill. This means striking an appropriate balance among the objectives of law enforcement, protection of personal information, minimum compliance costs, and support for Canada's contribution to international efforts to combat money laundering. Extensive consultations have already begun on developing these regulations with these goals in mind.

In addition, this bill requires a 90-day pre-publication period for proposed regulations, as well as an additional 30-day notice period for any further changes to proposed regulations before they become effective. These requirements go well beyond what is set out in many federal statutes and give ample opportunity for parties to provide input.

The Chairman: Where are the regulations published?

Mr. Seeto: In The Canada Gazette.

The Chairman: There is no oversight there. What can you do about that?

Mr. Seeto: We would invite comments.

The Chairman: The only reason I bring it up is we are having this problem with every bill that is coming to us. We receive the bill and then the bureaucracy has the right to put in any regulations it likes with virtually no oversight. When there is oversight, it is by a parliamentary committee that knows nothing about the bill.

I am having trouble with the whole notion of unchallenged regulatory authority. Maybe someone will ask a question on that and perhaps you will respond. I did not mean to interrupt, but I want you to know that it is a sore point.

Mr. Seeto: A closely related matter concerns the guidance that will be provided to institutions and persons who, in fulfilling the reporting requirements under this bill, must determine whether there are reasonable grounds to suspect that a particular transaction is related to the commission of a money laundering offence. Guidelines will be issued by the proposed anti-money-laundering agency to assist with this determination. This approach has been taken in many other member countries of the FATF, including Australia, the U.K., and the U.S.

These proposed guidelines will be developed in full consultation with stakeholder groups, and will reflect the circumstances of the businesses and professions that have a reporting obligation under Bill C-22. It should also be noted that there are existing anti-money-laundering guidelines that could serve as useful models. For example, the Superintendent of Financial Institutions issued guidelines for deterring and detecting money laundering in 1996. In addition, the experience of other countries that require suspicious transactions to be reported will be drawn upon in the development of appropriate guidelines for the purposes of our proposed legislation.

In closing, honourable senators, I want to point out that Bill C-22 was developed in consultation with many key stakeholders, including the provinces, the territories, the financial community, consumer groups, and organizations concerned about privacy issues. This bill updates and strengthens the existing act and improves the detection, prevention, and deterrence of money laundering in Canada. In addition, it gives law enforcement agencies the tools they need, and at the same time protects individual privacy. Further, these measures will also bring Canada into line with accepted international standards in the fight against money laundering.

Mr. Chairman, we will be pleased to answer any questions.

The Chairman: Clause 72 of the bill provides for a five-year review of the act by:

...the committee of Parliament that may be designated or established by Parliament for that purpose...

This form of wording leaves open the idea that a Senate committee may be excluded from such a review. Could you elaborate on that, please?

Senator Furey: The previous clause on the annual report clearly spells out reporting to both houses.

The Chairman: Clause 72 does not.

Mr. Seeto: Clause 72 states that within five years of the coming into force of this clause, the administration and operation of the act is to be reviewed by committee of Parliament. That clause leaves it to Parliament to establish the committee that will undertake the review. Parliament, that is to say, both the House of Commons and the Senate, will decide on its own procedure for establishing the committee.

We also looked at other statutes and found that there was no standard wording for this type of clause. The wording of the provision in Bill C-22 does leave it up to Parliament to determine the make-up of the committee. The effect is the same as provisions in other legislation, such as the Privacy Act, that refer to a committee of the House of Commons, of the Senate, or committees of both houses, as may be designated or established by Parliament.

The Chairman: One of the problems in saying "Parliament" is that it really means the upper chamber and the lower chamber.

Mr. Seeto: Right. That is the intent.

The Chairman: I think it lacks a certain amount of -- excuse the expression -- clarity. Is there any way we can get a letter from the minister saying that "Parliament" is intended to mean both houses?

Mr. Seeto: Mr. Chairman, we will raise your suggestion with the minister.

Senator Furey: If you look at the previous clause, which requires an annual report, it clearly spells out both houses. Why would it not be that clear in the following clause?

Mr. Seeto: The intent is to allow both houses to decide.

Senator Furey: You spell it out in clause 71 but not in clause 72.

The Chairman: If that is your intent, send us a letter that says so.

Mr. Seeto: We will recommend that to the minister.

Senator Tkachuk: Could we have an answer to the question that Senator Furey posed?

Mr. Seeto: I believe it was a drafting issue. It was meant to refer to the procedure by Parliament, and "Parliament" means both Houses. That is the interpretation we have from the Department of Justice on this issue.

Senator Kroft: I do not feel that because I am the sponsor and have already spoken on this bill, that gives me the right to be over on your side of the table. Every Canadian must begin by being troubled by this bill, and then we must see if we can find a level of comfort.

Conceptually, any bill that turns Canadians individually, and institutions, into whistleblowers, or words less flattering, is troubling by its very nature. We must look at whether or not the problem is sufficiently large and difficult that it needs an extraordinary response, and then whether or not that response is balanced and appropriate. It is important to go through this exercise because I do not think any of us like the fundamental concept.

I want to try to find my comfort level in a number of areas, so that we can be satisfied that it is an appropriate response to a serious challenge. I have three specific issues to raise. There could be many more, but I have three tests, or questions to ask.

First, can you give me some comparison of this bill with what is being done elsewhere? You say that we are the last guys at the party in terms of bringing in some legislation. Can you give us some sense of whether we are being less stringent than other jurisdictions, or more zealous? Have there been particularly contentious issues? It is fine to say that we are developing legislation, but how does ours fit with Charter-related concerns? How do we compare with others in that regard?

Second, what level of agreement has been reached with other recognized guardians of our civil liberties? I am not sure who will be speaking to that point, but I understand from my briefing that there have been consultations with the Canadian Bar Association and so on. I should like to know the status of those consultations. Have comfort levels been reached? That would apply equally to the accountants. In particular, as a lawyer, I wish to know about your discussions with lawyers, because it is an incredibly sensitive area. I see in the wording that "privilege" is protected, but you are talking about lawyers in a different role. It is a particularly interesting issue.

Third, what has been the nature of your discussion, and to what extent have you reached a comfort level, with the Privacy Commissioner?

Mr. Seeto: I will ask Mr. Richard Lalonde to respond to your first two questions.

Mr. Richard Lalonde, Chief, Financial Crimes Section, Financial Sector Policy Branch, Department of Finance: Regarding comparable regimes in other jurisdictions, we were privy to how other countries had attempted to do this when we were developing the proposal. Our guiding light has been the international standards of the Financial Action Task Force on anti-money-laundering measures. Our proposal is based on those international standards. It just so happens that, over the last decade, other countries have also put in place similar regimes that apply the same standards, recognizing that there will be some differences from one country to another, depending upon their privacy legislation, constitutions, charters, and internal government organizations. In some countries, the proposed agencies are adjuncts of their law enforcement agencies. In others they are completely separate and independent, which is the case with the proposal before you today. It is difficult to say whether our regime is more or less stringent than those of other countries. However, we have benefited from their experience in designing the proposed regime. It has all of the positive features of other regimes. It certainly respects our Canadian Constitution, our Charter, and builds in features appropriate to that context.

Senator Meighen: Is it possible to develop some sort of table indicating which of the 28 members have a mandatory reporting regime, and which ones require reporting to an independent agency as opposed to a law enforcement agency?

Mr. Lalonde: We can certainly come up with such a table, but everyone except Canada has mandatory reporting at this point. Your focus, senator, would be on which jurisdictions have which kind of models?

Senator Meighen: Yes. I had not realized we were the last of the 28 members.

Mr. Lalonde: We can provide the committee with that information.

Senator Kroft: Have your discussions with the Canadian Bar Association and the Privacy Commissioner reached a peaceful conclusion?

Mr. Lalonde: We have had a number of discussions in the past few months with representatives of the Canadian Bar Association. While they will support the objectives of the bill, they have expressed a number of concerns about the role that it would have lawyers play in terms of reporting, in particular in the reporting of suspicious transactions. We have indicated to them that the bill states clearly that nothing in the bill requires them to breach privilege, or to report anything that falls within the category of that privilege. I gather you will be speaking with them soon. Their concerns remain, nevertheless.

We have indicated to them, and would indicate to you as well, that our interest in providing that lawyers are covered by this bill is to ensure that there are no gaps in the financial sector. We know that lawyers perform many roles, one of which is as financial intermediaries. In that role, they are not very different from other players within the financial sector who are covered by the scope of this bill.

We are prepared to make it clear that the scope and application of this proposed legislation applies to lawyers insofar as they are acting as financial intermediaries. We will have to find the appropriate wording, but that is the concept, and certainly one that we intend to carry out.

Senator Kroft: And the Privacy Commissioner?

Mr. Lalonde: Again, we have had discussions with the Privacy Commissioner's office over the past few months. Notwithstanding those discussions, they do not have specific issues on the way the bill was drafted. Their fundamental concern remains that the proposed regime is a choice for Parliament to make, in that it does impose a requirement for individuals to report on their clients, and therefore raises significant privacy issues.

I do not know whether the provisions of the bill that protect individual privacy would raise any particular concerns with the Privacy Commissioner.

Mr. Seeto: I want to add that we had a number of discussions with the Privacy Commissioner as we went through the bill. These were the words of his staff: "Given the objective, it looks like the `plumbing' is in a good state." We have tried to address their concerns, given the objectives of the bill.

Senator Kelleher: Some of my questions have already been partially addressed. Given that we were the last to come forward with a proposal, we have had an opportunity to observe and examine what other countries have done. I am concerned about whether we really needed an independent government agency for this purpose, with its inherent costs and added layer of bureaucracy.

Perhaps, Mr. Chairman, it would be wise to wait and review what other countries have done, in light of Senator Meighen's sensible request for some sort of chart. We can leave that discussion for now, but it is certainly an open question in my mind as to whether we should be adding another layer of bureaucracy by creating a new agency. I gather that not all countries are doing it this way?

Mr. Lalonde: Not all, but many countries have done it in the same way that we are proposing. The United States, Australia, and France are three examples. Germany may be the exception. Japan has a separate agency as well. I could go on.

The fundamental difference here is that, in the context of our Canadian Charter and our Constitution, the independence of law enforcement from government is necessary in order to balance both the rights of individuals and the needs of law enforcement overall. To house the proposed agency within law enforcement would tilt that balance. That is why we so carefully structured the provisions in Part 3 of the bill.

Senator Kroft: We have now another expert here in the person of Senator Kelleher, who has raised the economic issue. I am curious to know, in light of his past ministerial responsibilities for other agencies that may well have been possible alternatives, whether Senator Kelleher has any thoughts on whether any of those might serve well in this context?

Senator Kelleher: Perhaps that can be a joint question from you and me, Senator Kroft. Ancillary to this is not only the added layer of another agency and the inherent costs, but second, I am wondering why -- and I guess I am showing my former partiality for the Solicitor General's office -- the reporting is to the Minister of Finance rather than to the Solicitor General. I do not disagree with the principle of keeping it as arm's-length, but since this is primarily a law enforcement measure, why not have the agency report through Parliament to the Solicitor General rather than to the Minister of Finance?

With the greatest of respect, the Ministry of Finance is doing quite a lot of work here in Ottawa, and it would not hurt to share some duties with other ministries. How is that for being diplomatic?

Mr. Seeto: The existing Proceeds of Crime Act is the responsibility of the Minister of Finance because it deals with financial intermediaries.

Much of the discussion on the development of this bill and its framework centred on how to set up the centre to meet the Charter issues. How do we deal with a successful Charter challenge on invasion of privacy? We had long and difficult discussions on that issue.

We looked at having the agency report to the Solicitor General. At the end of the day, the experts advised that the agency should report to someone who is not responsible for law enforcement. It was decided that the agency would report to the Minister of Finance. It was not something that the Department of Finance advocated.

Senator Kelleher: Perhaps, Mr. Chairman, it would be useful to have a separate witness from the Ministry of the Solicitor General to discuss this issue, because with the greatest respect, I am not totally convinced by Mr. Seeto's answer. People who report to Parliament on basically a law enforcement issue should have experience and knowledge in the law enforcement area. With the greatest respect, that is the Solicitor General's office, and not the Ministry of Finance.

I know there is someone here this morning from the Solicitor General's office, but that does not really satisfy me. That puts this official between a rock and a hard place.

Mr. Seeto: I would like to ask Stan Cohen from the Department of Justice to answer this question.

Senator Kelleher: I was just saying that I do not think he is the appropriate witness. I would like to have the opinion of a senior official from the Solicitor General's office.

The Chairman: Senator, we will arrange to do that. In the meantime, let's hear from this gentleman. Perhaps he can shed some light on the subject.

Mr. Stanley Cohen, Senior Legal Counsel, Human Rights Law Section, Department of Justice: Perhaps I can explain some of the thinking that went into this caution. My job is to give advice on the Charter issues affecting the criminal justice system, and in this case, issues affecting the phenomenon of money laundering.

As to the caution of placing this agency under the aegis of the Minister of Finance as opposed to some other minister, it is true that in terms of pure efficiency, it might have been preferable to have placed it within the realm of law enforcement. However, the dynamic at work in this context is pretty well new to Canada, and certainly precedent-setting in terms of the Charter.

This agency essentially receives personal information without benefit of a warrant, the obtaining of judicial authorization, or oversight before information is collected. That information is collected at a standard in the bill of "reasonable suspicion," which is not the "reasonable and probable grounds" that affects the appropriation of information pursuant to a search warrant.

There is a massing of information within a central agency that essentially has not yet reached the standard of reasonable and probable grounds for believing that an offence of any kind has been committed. Thus there is a need -- and I think I could point you in the direction of case law -- to protect privacy, which is evident just from the very design and the very orientation of the entire system.

One starts with the view that before this information, which is gathered at a low level of suspicion, a low standard, is passed on to law enforcement, there must be some vetting and some assessment.

Essentially, there was a need for some independence from law enforcement; otherwise, you might just as well have a straight flow-through to law enforcement, which would make it purely a surveillance and information-gathering device of really quite substantial proportions.

Once you accept that there should be some body interposed between the initial gathering and the furnishing of the information to law enforcement, it becomes necessary to address the kind of model.

You could set up a model within law enforcement, but you would have to create substantial bureaucratic means of separating the initial intake from the final disposition of the information to police investigators if you really wanted to protect privacy. You must remember that other models, like CSIS, have quite an extensive, sophisticated, and costly bureaucratic structure as well. There you have an Inspector General and the agency itself, and then you have the minister, in some sense removed from CSIS, and also elaborate reporting requirements.

Placing this body outside of law enforcement is seen as a means of ensuring that the whole enterprise can "lift off"; that you will not have expended a huge amount of public funds, only to see it flounder in the first substantial constitutional challenge that there has been a warrantless appropriation of private information belonging to Canadians.

The thinking was that the proposed structure better protects privacy and still accomplishes the law enforcement need in an efficient manner.

Senator Kelleher: With the greatest respect, I do not think you have totally answered my concerns.

Assume for the moment that we agree with you that the best way to do this is through an independent agency at arm's-length. I am suggesting that the reporting minister be the Solicitor General as opposed to the Minister of Finance, who frankly is not as learned in the areas of law enforcement as the Solicitor General, for example.

Mr. Cohen: If you placed the reporting relationship under the Solicitor General, you would have a minister who is responsible for policing -- in other words, the oversight of the RCMP -- and for national security surveillance through CSIS, also running an agency that is supposed to be operating at arm's-length from law enforcement. Given the public impression that that might give rise to, it would be a difficult sell. It is possible to do it, but you would create an impression that there is a much closer relationship than the public or the courts might like.

Senator Kelleher: We can leave that for another day.

Senator Furey: It seems to me that the bigger concern is not so much the public perception, but whether or not it would survive a Charter argument. Is that correct?

Mr. Cohen: That is correct.

Senator Furey: That is really more where you are coming from.

Mr. Cohen: We certainly start with that, but it takes you back to the whole notion of what is involved here and the initial appropriation of the information. The Charter argument will centre around invasion of privacy. How do we protect privacy? That takes you then into the architecture of the entire enterprise.

Senator Furey: I hope nobody is talking about notwithstanding clauses.

Senator Kelleher: Following along, if I may, with the potential impact of the Charter of Rights -- and I think we have the appropriate witness "in the stand," if you will -- are you confident that the search and seizure provisions in the bill and the mandatory reporting provisions would survive a challenge under section 8 of the Charter, which is, as you know better than I, a protection against unreasonable search and seizure?

Mr. Cohen: The best way to answer that question is to say that the scheme has been designed with a number of substantial safeguards that would affect the way any court would assess the constitutional validity of the enterprise.

You have an independent agency at arm's-length from law enforcement as one of the guarantors of privacy, privacy lying at the heart of section 8.

Secondly, you have an impartial agency that stands between the initial intake of information and its disclosure to law enforcement. That is the FTRAC, the Financial Transactions and Reports Analysis Centre. That is a safeguard for a limited initial disclosure of information. Rather than just turning over the whole file or everything that this agency has gathered, you have a limited disclosure of information -- "tombstone data" is the way it is described -- to law enforcement. Law enforcement still has to build a case before it can get access to further information.

There is also the safeguard of what I can call the "unamenability" of the agency itself to compulsory disclosure beyond money laundering investigations. A sort of wall has been erected, in the sense that information can pass to law enforcement, to police agencies, but it does not automatically flow to Revenue Canada, Citizenship and Immigration, or CSIS, unless there is a link from the money laundering to the specific mandates of those particular agencies.

Before any additional information can be disclosed by the agency, a special warrant or order has to be obtained. Again, this is a safeguard built into the scheme.

Other safeguards include the annual report that has already been referred to, a five-year review, and criminal sanctions for unlawful disclosure.

We think that we are striking a balance that can be seen as protective of individual privacy rights while not frustrating the aims of law enforcement efficiency.

Senator Kelleher: There appears to be a certain lack of definition in the proposed legislation, if I can put it that way, of the types of transactions that must be reported to the centre. I think this could lead to Charter problems, as well as the reporting of a lot of extraneous information. Perhaps, looking at it from the other side, not enough of the kind of information for which they are really looking will be reported. Do you feel that there is some way we can tighten up or particularize the definition of the types of transactions that must be reported?

Mr. Cohen: I think the difficulty on which you have put your finger, senator, is how you define a "suspicious transaction." Of course, the regulations themselves will have to partly address that.

Senator Kelleher: That is the kind of thing that concerns not only the chairman but many members of the committee. Too much will be left to regulation.

Mr. Cohen: Part of the answer to that, I think, comes back to the review. Five years may be a long period of time, but we will certainly have experience with how the system is operating and how well it is serving the Canadian public. I think another part of the answer may lie in how both Houses of Parliament choose to oversee those regulations.

The annual report could conceivably be a device for further enlightening the public as to what exactly has occurred in regulations. Reasonable suspicion, or what constitutes a suspicious transaction, is always going to elude precise definition to a certain extent. Certainly Charter case law on just this standard of reasonable ground to suspect, or reasonable suspicion, is itself constantly in need of clarification. The best definition of reasonable suspicion -- and this comes from a case endorsed by the Supreme Court of Canada -- is that it is "a constellation of objectively discernible facts which give the detaining officer reasonable cause to suspect that the detainee is criminally implicated in the activity under investigation." A hunch based entirely on intuition gained by experience cannot suffice, no matter how accurate that hunch might prove to be.

That does not give us a great deal of precision, but the courts actually deal with that standard and apply it to particular factual situations in the criminal context to determine whether officers did or did not have reasonable grounds to suspect that a crime was being committed.

To a certain extent, it will have to emerge from experience and from the refinement of guidelines. Guidelines themselves can contain examples or hypothetical situations that might be more precise than just the standard itself. That may serve to clarify the way in which information is initially gathered.

Senator Tkachuk: In this case, however, it is not people at the centre but people doing the reporting who are deciding what is suspicious. This could be a bank, an institution, a casino. It is these people who will be making a decision regarding "suspicious nature." These are not law enforcement officers, but civilians in the business community. How will amateurs make that decision?

Mr. Seeto: The bill provides for two classes of suspicious transactions. We will prescribe that certain transactions be reported to the centre. For example, we would want the bank to report if someone comes in with $10,000 in cash, which is unusual. They would have to report that to the centre.

Senator Tkachuk: What about $9,999?

Mr. Seeto: They would not have to report that.

The second class is, they would report a transaction that they believe to be suspicious. If someone came in with $9,999 and asked at what level does the bank report a transaction to the centre, you might consider reporting it. However, you would have to be certain of the grounds on which you think it is a suspicious transaction. There are two classes provided for in the bill.

Senator Tkachuk: It is the use of the cash that leads to the suspicion, so whether it is $10,000 or $9,999 or $7,950, you are still asking an amateur to make a decision. At $10,000 and up, bells automatically ring, but with anything under that, there is a subjective decision to be made here.

Mr. Seeto: To assist these institutions, we propose to have the centre develop guidelines to help determine whether a transaction is suspicious or not. As I pointed out, the Superintendent of Financial Institutions has a set of guidelines for federally regulated institutions to help them decide whether a transaction is suspicious or not. Other countries have similar regimes, and have developed guidelines on suspicious transactions based on experience. We will review those, and the centre will come up with a set of guidelines to help the different types of financial intermediaries decide what is a suspicious transaction.

Senator Oliver: My concern is that this will perpetuate ethnic stereotyping. If I were to walk into one of the institutions after arriving from Nigeria or Jamaica or places in India, as a visible minority person, certainly I will be more suspect than if I were a white person coming in with $9,000 in cash from Bay Street. It seems to me that you are really setting up yet another instance where bureaucrats and lawyers can perpetuate negative stereotypes of minorities, and I think it is totally wrong. I think that it is just perpetuating systemic racism. That is how bad it is.

Mr. Cohen: I do not know quite how to answer the suggestion that bank tellers and others will participate in a way that fosters systemic racism. There are two levels of intake for the information before it gets anywhere where any significant damage can be caused. There has to be an intake level. If a person comes into a bank, the teller will prepare a report, depending on whether it falls into the prescribed or suspicious transaction category. It is true that that information goes to the Financial Transactions and Reports Analysis Centre, but it does not go further until it has been assessed in a more detached and expert fashion, having regard to a lot more information than simply the one report itself. Thus there is a second, professional vetting of the information before it can make its way over to law enforcement.

That is another safeguard and another reason for the interposing of this agency between the institution and law enforcement.

I think that that at least is something that addresses the issue of whether significant consequences will flow to individuals as a result of the initial gathering of information. There is no disclosure to law enforcement until a second set of eyes has appraised the information and decided to pass it along.

Senator Oliver: Can you give us the citation for the Supreme Court of Canada case from which you quoted the definition of "reasonable suspicion"?

Mr. Cohen: That case initially was a decision of the Ontario Court of Appeal. However, it was endorsed in a Supreme Court decision by the name of Regina v. Jacques. The citation I have is 1996, 110 Canadian Criminal Cases, 3rd, page 11.

Senator Angus: This is a very interesting piece of proposed legislation. Obviously, it is complicated, and I am delighted that you could come to brief us on it this morning.

Some of my questions might appear to be a bit naive. However, please realize that they are sincerely directed. The words "money laundering" have taken on a "folkloric" kind of definition, if you will. A few of us were discussing just what is money laundering the other night. You talk about money that is derived from an illegal act. We started to ask ourselves, to what kinds of illegal acts is this really directed? Some believe that it is tax evasion, for example, and that this bill is a concentrated effort among the majority of those 28 countries you mentioned to crack down on tax evasion and this flow of money that is outside the system. Others say that it is drugs and other things.

Could you give me a short primer on the kinds of crimes that you are talking about, and perhaps a couple of examples of how the money gets laundered and becomes the fruit of crime? We all watch TV programs that bandy these words about; but we are now at the legislative stage and we are trying to be as precise as we can. We need to understand it.

Mr. Lalonde: Mr. Chairman, I can give a brief explanation of what laundering is all about. However, we also have here witnesses from the RCMP who are prepared to provide you with more detailed examples than I can.

In its simplest form, money laundering concerns the proceeds of a criminal activity. Our Criminal Code defines the predicate offences for which you can be convicted of money laundering. It is taking those proceeds of criminal activity and putting them into the financial system by trying to disguise their illicit origins through a series of transactions. That is in its simplest form.

Senator Angus: Can you give me a simple example, other than a drug dealer?

Mr. Lalonde: For example, a securities dealer attempting to defraud some of his clients will perhaps take some of his monies, in cash form or otherwise, and try to enter that into the banking system. Not having elicited any particular suspicions, he will continue with a succession of other transactions to further blur the trail from the original criminal activity.

Senator Angus: I did not quite understand that. Are you talking about a securities dealer getting money from a client?

The Chairman: Might I make a suggestion, senator? Dave Beer, who is Superintendent, Proceeds of Crime Branch, RCMP, is here today. Perhaps he could give us an example.

What you are talking about, with respect, senator, is a totally different kind of problem. You are talking about straight fraud, that is, stealing, as opposed to drug activities, which is all in cash. You are giving us an example of something that would rarely happen in the securities business, I assume.

Senator Angus: Apparently, it happens a lot.

The Chairman: Could someone from the RCMP try to elucidate?

Mr. Dave Beer, Superintendent, Proceeds of Crime Branch, Royal Canadian Mounted Police: Mr. Chairman, in order to perhaps put this into perspective, I will call in a moment on my colleague, Inspector Garry Clement, the officer in charge of the Proceeds of Crime Branch office, which is the operational unit here in Ottawa.

Money laundering is the movement of ill-gotten gains by criminal organizations and the failure of law enforcement to dismantle or disrupt organized criminal activity by conventional means. Essentially, it is taking the lid off organized criminal groups. We have struggled for years with the middle or lower levels of criminal groups through substantive investigations. Money laundering investigations allow us to reach the top levels of organized criminal groups, which is ultimately where the assets travel. That being said, it is a very complex and, now, a transnational problem of the movement of the money and the manner in which it is layered and distributed once it is obtained through an illegal activity, in order to launder it and move it into the "legitimate business world," if you will.

I will now call on Inspector Clement to give you a couple of examples, other than drugs, of the sort of criminal activity about which we are talking. Essentially, any criminal activity where there is cash to be made has a potential for that money to be laundered and moved to legitimate areas in order to hide it.

Senator Angus: I welcome this additional information. However, inherent in my question was the issue of the underlying reason for this and the companion legislation in the other 27 countries, which is to get at organized crime and its international network, as opposed to tax evasion in Canada. Is that right?

Mr. Beer: Organized crime is the objective.

Senator Angus: I realize that the proceeds of crime are taxable, so it involves evasion too. However, it is not civilian tax evasion that you are particularly after here, although it will get swept in I suppose?

Mr. Lalonde: Let us be clear. In Canada, you can be convicted of laundering the proceeds from a number of different crimes. These could be anything from prostitution or a designated drug offence to child pornography -- a number of crimes are listed in the Criminal Code. Tax evasion is not listed as a predicate offence for laundering in Canada. In other jurisdictions, for example, the U.K., tax evasion is a predicate offence for money laundering. In this sense, while our and their main objective is to combat organized crime, this bill is clearly designed to go after the laundering of the proceeds of a number of predicate offences.

Mr. Beer: I will ask Inspector Clement to describe a couple of issues that do not deal specifically with drugs.

Mr. Garry Clement, Inspector, Officer in Charge, Integrated Proceeds of Crime Section, "A" Division, Royal Canadian Mounted Police: Mr. Chairman, let's take as an example something that we read about all the time. Let's consider the motorcycle gangs that are very prevalent. We read about it and we know what is going on in Quebec with some of the biker wars. I have been involved in enforcement in this area since the early 1970s, and we have watched them grow from what I like to describe as "street thugs" to multinational corporations as far as criminal activity is concerned. The reason for that is we have targeted groups for narcotics. We targeted one cell and watched them grow. We were successful in seizing some narcotics, but we were never able to seize the proceeds. Organized crime moves to wherever it can make money. If that happens to shift to some other offence tomorrow, and most of them fall into the enterprise crime offences that are prescribed in the Criminal Code, then there are a number of offences that can be deal with. One is prostitution. Today, the "female slave trade," as I refer to it, is very large throughout the world. These gangs are making large amounts of money from that. Today we are able to go after that using the proceeds of crime legislation.

We all thought that we were doing a good job in law enforcement. However, we took a look at two ingredients, that is, whatever the criminal activity was and what the individuals were doing. We then tried to take the individuals out, but we missed one of the most fundamental things -- the profit. All these criminal activities generate a high degree of profit. Arms smuggling is another area that is growing and generates a lot of profit. The issue of immigration smuggling is before the House now, but it is not an enterprise crime offence. However, it is something that will have to be looked at.

Those types of activities are generating large amounts of money. The only way that we can target organized crime is to treat it as a continuing enterprise crime conglomerate and attack them at their financial thresholds, because that is where the money is and the power is held. We will never be successful as long as we continue looking only at that criminal offence.

Senator Angus: That is helpful. In terms of the predicate crimes, folklore generates comments such as, "See that restaurant? -- it is owned by the Hell's Angels." You kind of shrug it off as somebody who has a vivid imagination and has watched too much T.V. However, could you give us a couple of examples of how this laundering takes place in that context?

Could that be the type of thing -- that a legitimate business is founded with money from the Hell's Angels?

Inspector Clement: The whole idea behind money laundering is that individuals are trying to make themselves appear legitimate; thus they use the financial infrastructure that the world has to offer. A very successful organization, something like an outlaw motorcycle gang, is using offshore countries for their banking secrecy and setting up trusts, holding companies, and numbered companies. They get into schemes where they will buy the "mom and pop" restaurant down the street with money borrowed from a corporation out of Liechtenstein, which happens to be their corporation. It is called a "loan-back" technique. When the bill before you today finally becomes law, we will be able to capture some of that movement of funds. The information will go to the centre once the suspicion is raised. They have criteria to analyze and determine that that has all the hallmarks of money laundering. As a result, that will be given to us with "tombstone data."

With our intelligence banks, we will be able to factor into that very nicely. We have been receiving notice of suspicious transactions from banks on an ad hoc basis for the last six years, and that has proved very beneficial to us. However, they are not always consistent, and that is exactly what I think everybody is grappling with. It is very sporadic and there really is no mechanism to ensure that that takes place.

I think that will shore up what is lacking in Canada and will help us in this money laundering area. We will be able to get behind the companies in these offshore havens. We will find out more about our organized crime groups. This is not a panacea by any stretch of the imagination, but it will definitely help.

Senator Angus: Mr. Seeto, I have just one other question. It still troubles me, especially in a society like Canada where we take these privacy issues seriously, that we are the last of 28 countries to be "coming to the party." Why is that? It seems embarrassing for Canada to be the last of 28 nations to do so.

Mr. Seeto: As I understand it as a latecomer to this file, one of the biggest concerns was designing a structure that could be defended from the Constitutional perspective. It took a lot of time to review the different possible structures before we came up with an appropriate one that we think is defensible -- a structure that will provide more tools to law enforcement, and a balance, while still protecting privacy as much as possible. I think that is the reason. We were presented with a uniquely Canadian situation with regard to the Constitution and laws.

Mr. Lalonde: I would like to add something and correct one perception. Canada has had a regime in place with its record-keeping, the identification of clients, and other legislation. It is not as if we are starting from base zero. We have many of the pieces of the architecture in place. The voluntary reporting system, albeit with some shortcomings, has yielded some positive results as well. That is probably the reason why, given all these circumstances, it has taken Canada a little longer to put into place the additional "plumbing" that other countries now have.

Senator Angus: Am I correct that Bill C-22 will consolidate these earlier provisions of legislation into one bill?

Mr. Lalonde: That is correct.

Senator Angus: I guess then that it flows for the law enforcement side of the panel. Are you comfortable with the architecture that has been arrived at? Is it adequate, and will our bill, if passed as drafted, have the teeth to work in co-operation with our partner nations in trying to address this problem?

Mr. Beer: I think that Mr. Lalonde adequately addressed this subject. We had the opportunity to examine systems within the G-7 and we are satisfied that we will uphold Canadian democratic principles at the same time as we will meet some of the goals of law enforcement that we really feel are necessary in terms of mandatory reporting.

Senator Angus: Do you mean "some" of the goals?

Mr. Beer: Yes. Clearly we will not meet them all. The arguments and concerns about privacy in a democratic system must be and have been addressed. I believe we found an adequate balance.

Senator Furey: My question is related to the establishment of this new agency, and most of the questions that I had pertaining to it have been covered. However, there are a couple of questions remaining. What is the estimated cost? Has any cost analysis been done, bearing in mind some of Mr. Cohen's comments about separation within that agency?

Mr. Horst Intscher, Executive Director, Transition Team -- Financial Transactions and Reports Analysis Centre of Canada, Department of Finance: Mr. Chairman, the Department of Finance has set up a small transition team to make some preparations for the establishment of such an agency once the bill is passed. We have given careful thought to how other agencies of this type have been set up in other jurisdictions. We have looked at the mandate that is prescribed in Bill C-22 and we have come up with some, albeit still rough, estimates as to the probable ongoing cost of such an agency. We estimate that it would be approximately $15 million per year and that it would employ approximately 90 persons. This would include the technical support for the receipt of such reports; the analysis of the reports; the verification of compliance by reporting entities; and the management of disclosures to the law enforcement agencies.

This is roughly comparable to a similar agency established in Australia. The amount is considerably less than what we believe the United States is expending for this purpose. We are still grappling with the magnitude of the start-up costs to put the information technology systems in place that will process this kind of information.

Those would be one-time costs spread out over a year or two of the operation of the centre. We think that on an ongoing basis, it will be somewhere in the neighbourhood of $15 million per year.

Senator Furey: Do you have any idea at all how that would compare to setting up a system within an existing agency, bearing in mind Mr. Cohen's comments?

Mr. Intscher: Given the requirement to be arms-length from law enforcement agencies, I think the costs would be very similar. There might be some small savings in administrative support, but the systems requirement, which is probably the major component of this type of agency, would still have to be separate from the other systems. Therefore, I do not think there would be major savings if it were located within an existing agency.

Senator Furey: Is your estimate $15 million annually?

Mr. Intscher: Yes, although I would emphasize that is a fairly rough estimate at this time.

The Chairman: I will ask one question of the RCMP, and if you can, answer yes or no, please. Would you have been happier if this had been given to you?

Mr. Beer: With my policeman's hat on or as a citizen of a democratic country? No, senator, I think that it is properly placed where it is. I truly believe that, in the interests of privacy and the democratic principles that we uphold, that it is not a bad idea to have it once-removed from policing.

The Chairman: We are the diplomats here, not you.

Mr. Beer: To be absolutely frank, if the information were coming directly into the hands of the police, the operation would clearly be more efficient and more effective. At the same time, it would be open to all sorts of abuse. That is one of the reasons that it will go, we hope, where it is proposed it go.

The Chairman: Questions have been asked about tax evasion. Is this not the opposite of tax evasion? When you legitimize money, you start paying taxes on it, do you not?

Mr. Seeto: In that case, yes.

The Chairman: It should pay for itself. We will go on to the next questioner.

Senator Tkachuk: I have a number of questions, some resulting from the comments that Senator Kroft made earlier, that the plumbing of the bill was fine. I am not sure what that means. In the Privacy Commissioner's annual report for 1999-2000, they express a number of concerns. One is around notification, collection and disclosure of clients' information. In other words, Senator Kroft, Senator Kelleher, or I have gone to a bank, where they decide that there is a suspicious nature to the transaction and it is reported. Are we told, even though in the end people say, "Well, you know, that is okay"? Is Senator Kroft notified that his information is being sent to the agency?

Mr. Seeto: The obligation of the financial institution to report to the centre can be communicated to the client. The institution could, for example, post signs, or make brochures available to clients describing what the reporting requirements are. In addition, the institute could choose to notify a client that it is reporting a prescribed transaction to the centre. Such a transaction could involve, for example, cash of the amount prescribed in regulations. However, the bill does prohibit anyone who makes a suspicious transaction report from disclosing that, or the contents of that report, with the intent to prejudice a criminal investigation.

Senator Tkachuk: Therefore the bank, or any financial institution, can simply say, "This is suspicious." Remember, there is a clause that gives more leeway than just a dollar amount, because maybe it looks funny or "smells" funny. In any case, the transaction looks suspicious and is reported. However, the agency decides that this is a straight shooter and there is no problem with this transaction because they have investigated the individual's life -- sex life, banking records, employment history and everything else -- and have found nothing suspicious. What happens then? Is that person notified that he has been under this investigation, even though it has not been reported to the police?

Mr. Lalonde: Let us clarify for a moment.

This proposed agency has no investigative powers. Indeed, that was one of the criteria in developing the proposal.

Senator Tkachuk: We will get to that later, but answer the question first, please.

Is the citizen notified?

Mr. Lalonde: No. The citizen has all of his rights protected under the Privacy Act. Our bill does recognize that, but we should not expect, in the case of a suspicious transaction report made under clause 7, that the fact that a report has been made will be disclosed to the individual or to the client. The reasons are twofold. First, the effectiveness or the enforcement of the proposed legislation might be compromised were the fact of the report having been made divulged to the client. If the client happened to be involved in organized crime and had easy access to the fact that a report had been made, he would be able to determine under what circumstances future reports might be made. That would frustrate and undermine the enforcement of this proposed legislation.

Second, suspicious transaction reports are obviously made at the discretion, or "at the call," if you want, of a financial institution, a teller, or a compliance officer.

If an individual on whom a report is made had access to the fact that a teller, a compliance officer, or other particular individual had made that report, that might also undermine, frustrate, or compromise the enforcement of the bill. One might ask whether a compliance officer in a bank would feel comfortable making a report if he knew that knowledge of the fact could go back to the individual. He may fear for his personal safety in those situations.

When we are talking about other transactions that are reported under the bill, for example, the prescribed transactions, everyone knows that it is set out in the regulations that banks shall report these kinds of transactions. There is no secret to that and the individual will know that.

Similarly, when someone makes a declaration that he is crossing the border with $10,000 or more in cash or monetary instruments, he knows that a report will go to the centre. We are talking about reports on suspicious transactions made pursuant to clause 7. As I tried to explain, it would compromise the effectiveness of the legislation and undermine its purpose, were the fact of a report having been made disclosed to that individual.

Senator Tkachuk: There are two issues. If a citizen deposits $11,000 in a bank account, for example, he or she knows full well that that will be reported, even though the circumstance of the deposit is that the person owns a restaurant and has had a good day.

The person making the deposit knows that the transaction will be reported. However, he does not realize that it is being reported as suspicious. My question was not whether the person would gain some legitimacy from the fact that he is notified.

I imagine when the centre receives the report, they would do a criminal record check. According to this document, the Privacy Commissioner seems to believe that the centre could, in addition to the information pertaining to the individual's criminal history, amass information relating to employment, financial transactions, travel history, income status, and possibly even personal relations. Can the centre do that before it even reports to the police?

Mr. Lalonde: There are several issues here.

Senator Tkachuk: I would say so.

Mr. Lalonde: Aside from the reports, does the centre have access to other information? The legislation spells out that the centre could only enter into agreements in order to obtain access to police databases if it is relevant to money laundering. In other words, the information obtained from police databases must be relevant to the purpose of the bill, which is to deter and detect money laundering.

I think that the bill is clear as to whether or not the centre would have access to databases with completely extraneous information. The information must be relevant to the deterrence and detection of money laundering.

Senator Tkachuk: The fact that it is reported is automatic, right?

Mr. Lalonde: The report, yes.

Senator Tkachuk: The institution reports, the agency then investigates, right?

Mr. Lalonde: Yes.

Senator Tkachuk: Will it collect this kind of information? Are you giving me assurances that it will not collect this information, or are you saying it will?

Mr. Lalonde: It will collect reports.

Senator Tkachuk: From whom?

Mr. Seeto: The centre will be a passive recipient of these reports that are made in compliance with the proposed legislation. It cannot go back. For example, if a suspicious report comes from a bank and the centre believes that it is interesting, it cannot get more information about the particular client from the institution. That would be exceeding its mandate under the proposed legislation.

Senator Tkachuk: What does it do?

The Chairman: If I may jump in for one second. You are getting me really confused.

Senator Tkachuk: Yes, I am confused.

The Chairman: Either you, or someone before you, said that the centre has no investigative powers. Now you are telling us that it does.

Mr. Seeto: They do not have investigative powers.

The Chairman: If you are amassing information, what are you doing?

Mr. Seeto: It could be to do data analysis. Perhaps it is terminology.

Mr. Beer: I think the word you are looking for is "analysis" as opposed to "investigation."

The Chairman: Come on.

Senator Tkachuk: How do you determine whether the police should investigate that transaction? Do you just get the piece of paper from the bank? Do you just decide you do not like his name, or do you do some investigation on that file of the kind the Privacy Commissioner is concerned about -- employment, financial transactions, travel history, income status, business or professional relations, and even personal relations?

The Chairman: Maybe you ought to do an investigation. I do not know.

Senator Tkachuk: I do not know that either.

The Chairman: Otherwise, what is the purpose of the centre? Are you just a numbers-gathering group? I hope that you are not, because to be efficacious you must do something.

Are you saying that the enforcement of your investigation, which you say you do not do, should be left to police agencies?

Mr. Beer: Could we jump in here?

Mr. Clement: Mr. Chairman, I think I can possibly help you out. I have probably read in the last five years, as has my colleague in the back, somewhere in the neighbourhood of several thousand suspicious transaction reports that were given to us.

I think that there is a misunderstanding of the term "suspicious transactions." They are suspicious because there is a bank manager in a small town who knows his clientele. Bank managers are no different from us. We know our constituents very well. If an individual walks into that bank and does something totally out of the ordinary, after being a client for years, that raises suspicions. Therefore, they report a suspicious transaction.

I have dealt with many managers over the years at the local level, and in larger banks. They put these reports in because something is out of the ordinary. Most of the time it can be explained. It is not of a criminal nature. We are getting those kinds of reports today.

The other side of the coin is that there are quite a few cases of money laundering. For example, it was stated in the House of Commons in about 1992 that over $800 million flowed through one of the big six banks here in Ottawa that came from the contraband smuggling trade. Had it been a requirement to go through the reporting centre, those types of transactions would have been identified far sooner. We would have been able to take enforcement actions.

The Chairman: I do not want to interrupt Senator Tkachuk; nobody is taking issue with that part. All we want is some clarification. First we were told there was no investigation. Now you are saying there is a difference between analysis and investigation. Actually, I thought investigation was analysis.

Perhaps the centre should be able to investigate. I am simply saying that the bill is not very clear.

Mr. Intscher: Perhaps I could try to offer some explanation of what the centre will do with the information that it receives.

First, it will receive information from a wide range of reporting entities -- banks, trust companies, credit unions, cheque cashiers, currency exchange places, casinos, and so on. The centre will examine all of the data it has received from all of these different reporting entities to see whether there has been a similar report from another entity. The centre will determine if the individual about whom this report has been made is also the client of several other institutions where he or she may also be making transactions that are somewhat out of the ordinary. We would then also check the data with respect to reports on cross-border currency movement. For example, Mr. Blodgins, who is the subject of a suspicious transaction report at the bank, has also been the subject of a recent report on moving large amounts of currency across the border. In that case, we would look at all the data that we have received to see whether there is a pattern that suggests that there may be laundering activity going on, or whether the pattern is simply that of normal business activity.

In addition, the centre will be able to negotiate arrangements for access to certain databases maintained for law enforcement purposes. Thus, if we have received these reports and a number of them relate to an individual about whose transactions we are not clear, we may try to find out whether the CPIC database has information about this. If it turns out that this individual has been convicted of smuggling in the recent past, for example, that might raise our suspicions.

If we also have information from a foreign financial intelligence unit that this individual, or his bank account, has been associated with some activities that have come to their attention, we would add that to the picture. We would then make an assessment. Is it reasonable to suspect that there may be money laundering going on here? In which case, we would disclose the minimal amount of information, the "tombstone" information, to the appropriate law enforcement agency. We would inform them that Mr. Blodgins made this transaction at such and such an institution on such a date, and we suspect that it may involve money laundering. At that point, the analyzed information that we have collected would be filed, and the police would conduct the investigation. If the police develop a case that gives them reasonable grounds to believe that money laundering is occurring, or has occurred, they can then seek a court order to obtain the rest of our analysis.

Senator Tkachuk: On page 25 of the bill, paragraph 55(3)(b) is spelling out the relevance to investigating or prosecuting a money laundering offence by referring it to the appropriate police force, which is good, or:

(b) the Canada Customs and Revenue Agency, if the Centre also determines that the information is relevant to an offence of evading or attempting to evade paying taxes or duties imposed under an Act of Parliament administered by the Minister of National Revenue.

Returning to the concern that Senator Angus raised on this matter, you have definitely a tax role to play here, as well as a money laundering role.

Mr. Intscher: The trigger for any disclosure to Revenue, CSIS, or Immigration would be the determination that a particular transaction or series of transactions gives rise to a suspicion of money laundering. If, in addition to a suspicion of money laundering, we also suspect that there may be tax evasion, then we could make a disclosure to the Revenue agency.

However, if we have information about Mr. Smith and we think that he is not paying his taxes, but there is no indication of money laundering, we would not be able to disclose that information.

Senator Tkachuk: Maybe a lawyer could help me with this, but it states in subclause 55(3):

...has reasonable grounds to suspect that the designated information would be relevant to investigating or prosecuting a money laundering offence...

It seems to mean even if money laundering was not found to be a problem, you could say, "Maybe we should report this to the taxman." You can do that without money laundering being the problem.

The Chairman: Is it a fact that when you launder money, or try to launder money, it starts as illegitimate money? Otherwise, you would not be laundering it. If you have illegitimate money, does it not follow that you are evading taxes? Unless I have something wrong here.

Mr. Seeto: The two are often associated.

The Chairman: What do you mean "often"? Should they not always be associated?

Mr. Lalonde: I cannot say for sure. I would leave that to law enforcement to answer. Perhaps criminals want to maintain some air of legitimacy, and paying taxes may be part of that.

The Chairman: Are you telling me that drug runners who are paid in cash tell the government that they will pay tax on it?

Mr. Yvon Carrière, Senior Counsel, General Legal Services, Department of Finance: If you do not mind, I will start with the chairman's question and then come back to yours. You mentioned illegitimate money. The bill defines where illegitimate money comes from, and it talks about proceeds of crime. That is defined in the Criminal Code.

Proceeds of crime is defined as proceeds of drug trafficking, but also proceeds from other infractions, such as weapons trafficking, making an automatic firearm, and child pornography. However, tax evasion is not one of those infractions.

If your bank suspects you of depositing money from tax evasion, they do not have to report you under the bill. That is not laundering the proceeds of crime. However, if the centre, having received and analyzed the report, suspects you of money laundering, they will report you to the police. If they also suspect you of tax evasion, they can report you to CCRA. However, there must be both circumstances.

The bill is clear that there must be both reasonable grounds to suspect that the information would be relevant to the investigation or prosecution of money laundering, and an additional determination that it is relevant to tax evasion. Thus, tax evasion alone is not sufficient grounds for the centre to report it to the CCRA.

Senator Tkachuk: For the centre to report it to the income tax agency?

Mr. Carrière: That is right.

Senator Tkachuk: That is not what it says in the proposed legislation, so I may be interpreting it wrongly. It says "or prosecuting a money laundering offence."

It seems to me that once you receive the information from a financial institution and you decide that there is no money laundering problem, but possibly an income tax opportunity, you can refer it to Revenue.

Mr. Carrière: When the bill says "would be relevant to investigating or prosecuting a money laundering offence," it must be "prosecuting a money laundering offence." Tax evasion is not a money laundering offence. It must be a money laundering offence, which I described as a drug offence, child pornography, arms trafficking, slavery, or along those lines. Tax evasion would definitely not be one of them.

The key subclause is 55(3)b), the provision from which you were reading, "if the centre also determines." "Also" means that there must be both money laundering and tax evasion.

Senator Tkachuk: You mentioned in your address that unauthorized use of personal information under the centre's control will be subject to penalties, including fines up to $50,000 and imprisonment of up to five years. To whom does that apply?

Mr. Carrière: That applies to centre employees, to people who have contracts for goods and services with the centre. In other words, it applies to everyone who has access to the information that the centre possesses.

Senator Tkachuk: They will be personally responsible for the $50,000 fine, and the government will not be paying for it?

Mr. Carrière: That is correct, yes.

Senator Tkachuk: Once the information goes to the police, does the same thing apply to them?

Mr. Carrière: No, the police are subject to confidentiality under their own legislation.

Senator Tkachuk: To get it out in the paper as soon as possible.

Mr. Carrière: They are also subject to the Privacy Act. Therefore, they could not reveal personal information about someone whom they are investigating unless, of course, it comes to a charge. That is dealt with in the act that governs the police.

Senator Tkachuk: Mr. Chairman, I still have many concerns about the bill. I have one more question, and then I will continue this line of questioning with other witnesses.

Does the government anticipate that social insurance numbers will be used to analyse and link data that you are pursuing in the centre?

Mr. Intscher: The short answer is no.

Senator Tkachuk: You can give an assurance of that. Thank you.

The Chairman: We will wind up with a short question from Senator Kroft, but I would just like to hear from you, Mr. Seeto, about this regulation item that was brought up previously. I want a letter telling me how it will be handled, because our committee is beginning to feel inundated by the entire question of regulations.

Frankly, we are not sure how to handle it, short of asking for an amendment that once a year your regulations must be tabled with this committee. I am not suggesting that that is what will happen. However, the only way around it that I can see is that regulations from the various bills we get are tabled once a year. We do not have to have hearings on them, but if something sticks out like a sore thumb, we would certainly like to know about it.

Senator Angus: We would have the right to have hearings.

The Chairman: Yes, of course.

I would like to know what your department thinks about that idea. How would you handle it? Are we going to have a fight or find a compromise?

Senator Kroft: My question is very brief. Can you give us any estimates of the number of reports that you think would come to the centre in the course of a year? Would it be a hundred, or would it be 100,000, or would it be 10 million? Provide me with some sort of order of magnitude.

Mr. Intscher: That is an issue with which we have been grappling for some time. It has important implications for the kind of systems that we need to receive and analyse this information, and it is difficult to estimate.

We have looked at the experience of other jurisdictions, notably the Australians, the Americans, and the British. Those agencies report that initially there is a spike of suspicious transaction reports until the financial institutions get some indication of what the receiving centre would regard as suspicious. They then drop off and becomes a fairly stable number.

In the case of Australia, I think that in their first year of operation, they received 15,000 suspicious transaction reports. That then dropped to about 8,000 reports per year, and it has been pretty steady at that level. Those are suspicious transaction reports.

We have been trying to estimate, through consultation with the financial industry, what volume of cash transaction reports we would receive if we had a threshold of $10,000. Our guesstimate is that it would be in the neighbourhood of 2 million to 3 million per year. However, we are looking at ways of focusing that reporting requirement in order to get the number down a little.

We really can only guess with respect to cross-border currency reports. My intuitive feeling is that initially, we will get a large number of reports. People will then become aware of a reporting threshold for cross-border currency movements, perhaps $15,000. Many travellers will simply arrange their affairs in such a way that they are carrying that amount or less.

That has certainly been the experience in the United States, which has had a US $10,000 reporting requirement for quite some time. Most Americans travelling abroad will be carrying cash, money orders, or traveller's cheques under that amount. U.S. officials receive relatively few cross-border currency reports. I think it is quite modest for the United States. I think it is in the neighbourhood of several thousand reports per year.

Senator Meighen: I have a question of clarification for Mr. Lalonde. When you provide us with this chart that you kindly agreed to put together, could you indicate to whom an independent agency reports?

I have another question that I do not think has been answered. Is there a geographical preference as to where the centre should be located? Is it important that it be in Ottawa, for example?

Mr. Beer: I do not think it is important, given today's communications capability. Emerging trends will have an impact on where we deploy our resources to respond to information that comes to our attention. It is likely that we will focus, in the initial stages, on the major financial centres of Toronto, Montreal, and Vancouver. We will have to take a reading on the trends as they emerge.

The committee adjourned.

June 7, 2000 [Standing Senate Committee on Banking, Trade and Commerce]

Senator E. Leo Kolber (Chairman) in the Chair.

[English]

The Chairman: Ladies and gentlemen, we are here to continue hearings on Bill C-22. We are privileged today to have as our first witness Mr. Jean Spreutels, who is the president of the Belgian Money Laundering Centre.

Please bear in mind that one of the objectives of this bill -- I say only one of the objectives -- is to harmonize with the rest of the world, which apparently we have not yet done.

Welcome to Canada, sir. I understand that you have some remarks to make and that you will make them in French. Please proceed.

[Translation]

Mr. Jean Spreutels, Chair of the Belgium Centre on Money Laundering: It is a great honour for me to appear before your committee. I prepared the written text of my brief, but since I was unable to prepare an English version, because of a lack of time, the Canadian Department of Finance has very kindly proposed to provide the English version.

I am Deputy Attorney General of the Supreme Court of Belgium, but it is mostly in my position as Chair of the Financial Information Group that I appear before you today. This Group is the equivalent of the Centre for Analysis which the bill you are studying would like to create.

I was the president of the FATF (Financial Action Task Force) in 1997-98. Currently I chair an ad hoc group of the FATF dealing with countries and territories which are non co-operative and our responsibility is to put together a list of these non-co-operative countries in our continuing struggle against money laundering. This list must be created within the next two weeks.

I would like to deal with several points. First of all, I would like to speak of the scope of the phenomenon of money laundering and the need to combat it. Then, I will tell you about how the anti-money-laundering system in Belgium succeeded and the international context in which this system fits. I will perhaps spend more time, within the international context, on the importance of creating the obligation to declare suspect transactions and that such declarations should be made to a central independent unit. And I would also perhaps add a few words regarding the organizations and professions who have preventive mechanisms in place. And lastly, I would like to give you a brief description of the Belgian system which meets these two essential conditions, namely a system where a statement is compulsory where there is suspicion and the creation of an independent central authority or central service.

As to the size of the phenomenon and the need to combat it, all I can do is quote Mr. Michel Camdessus, then Director General of the IMF. In February 1998, he stated:

Money laundering has a negative impact on how markets work and therefore is a detriment to economic growth.

While of course keeping in mind:

... the social and political consequences of organized crime and of money laundering which result, the suffering of the victims and the general weakening of the social fabric and the collective ethic. It is therefore important to combat money laundering, by attacking criminal activities where they are the most vulnerable, in other words where these illegally obtained funds come into the financial circuit.

This illegally acquired money represents a vast amount which is difficult to evaluate with any precision, but which various experts set at between 500 and 1000 billion dollars U.S. per year. There has also been made mention of 2.5 per cent of the global gross domestic product.

The main sources for this money come from organized crime in all its forms, and not only drug trafficking, but also, since of course crime has diversified over time, from economic and financial crimes which have a tie to more traditional forms of organized crime. It is therefore an enormous mass which may well destabilize the world economy, have a negative effect on the redistribution of the money supply, infiltrate legitimate economic structures, and even -- because these sums are also source of corruption -- put certain political systems at risk.

Therefore, the dangers of this phenomenon of course attracted the attention of the international community, who intervened by adopting legislation which on the one hand, deals with the repressive aspect of incrimination, of the criminal offence of money laundering, of seizures, confiscations and, on the other hand, develops what we call a preventative aspect, because the repressive side does encounter certain limits given the sophisticated nature of the money-laundering operations and their naturally clandestine aspects. Therefore, the preventative system quickly appeared to be the best way to preserve financial structures and to put an end to the exponential multiplication of money-laundering operations by early detection, at the outset, of these operations where they are principally using the financial sector and currently also other professions. We are seeing a movement of the money-laundering activities from the financial system towards non-financial professions.

My second point deals with the very real results of a system which has put in place the compulsory declaration of suspicion of money laundering, and created a central administrative unit which has an independent status and full autonomy, which would receive and then analyze the suspicious operations.

This is the Belgian system. Of course, one has to realize that we are dealing with a system in a small country whose means are limited. The system was implemented in 1993. It has been around for about seven years. Over this time, we have received 38,000 statements of suspicions from financial organizations and other people specified under the Act. These are not automatic declarations, but only statements of suspicion. A preliminary analysis must be carried out by authorities within the financial institutions or other professions concerned.

These 38,000 statements allowed us to open within our office, a little over 7,000 separate files. After analysis and discovery of serious indications of money laundering, the Group transferred 2,200 of these files to the prosecuting attorney, namely 31 per cent of all the files created. In terms of statements of suspicion, that represents some 62 per cent of all the statements. This demonstrates that there is good co-operation from the financial sector first, and now with the other professions concerned, and that these professionals and organizations are quite intelligent since 62 per cent of the statements which were sent to us were then tied to serious crimes as set forth in our legislation. The amounts involved in these cases which were then forwarded to legal authorities totalled 214 billion BF, which is a little over $7 billion Canadian.

The underlying forms of criminal activity in these files which were then conveyed to the authorities include 60 per cent of drug trafficking, which would appear to confirm the estimates made by other countries. It is not only a matter of drug trafficking; there are also other forms of organized crime, such as a variety of illicit traffic of goods or merchandise.

Of course, the legal system must then absorb this new caseload. I have the numbers for June 30 of last year. The courts and the tribunals, based on the files which were sent over by the Group to the prosecutor, brought down guilty verdicts in 184 cases. Therefore prison sentences were handed down, fines were handed down, and an amount equivalent to over 8 billion BF, approximately $240 million Canadian has been confiscated.

I can safely say that without this compulsory declaration mechanism to a central and independent authority, the vast majority of these crimes would have gone unpunished. Police statistics show that 90 per cent of money-laundering files in Belgium, which are dealt with by police services, come from statements of suspicion which financial institutions and other people concerned by the legislation forward to us.

This system has not led to any useless supplementary costs or any disproportionate costs for financial organizations. On the contrary, it has allowed them to reenforce their internal audit system and thus to improve the detection and prevention of fraud, both internally as well as externally, of which they may be victims. No sector is currently complaining about any costs which would have stemmed from the implementation of the money-laundering system in Belgium, to the contrary.

From an international perspective, I must indicate that the first initiatives were carried out back in the 1980s when, for the first time, we requested active cooperation amongst financial organizations with authorities in charge of enforcing the law. The first text along these lines stem from the Committee in Basle, the committee dealing with the rules and practices of banking operations of which Canada is a member. And on this occasion, I would like to mention Canada's very active role in various international organizations which have led to a more systematic policing of the fight against money laundering. The main organization in the fight against money laundering, namely the FATF, as you know, stems from the G-7 which put together 40 recommendations. On the international scene I could also mention a European directive of 1991 which basically repeated for a European Union context the 40 recommendations of the FATF.

The FATF is actually comprised of 26 States and independent territories and two international organizations. Three new members will belong to it as of the end of the month: Argentina, Brazil and Mexico. Of course, all these countries have to subscribe to the principles of the FATF, but they are not the only ones. I can mention, without giving a complete list, the member States of the Commonwealth. I believe that there are 52 of them, even if there is an overlap at times. There are 10 States within the Extraterritorial Banking Authority Group, 11 member States of the Black Sea Economic Cooperative, 11 members of the Caribbean Financial Action Group, 22 members of the Council of Europe Select Committee on the Evaluation of Anti-Money-Laundering Measures, and 17 countries of the Asia-Pacific Group dealing with money laundering. The list is incomplete because we would also have to mention the initiatives adopted by the CICAD, the Inter-American Drug Abuse Control Commission, stemming from recommendations of the FATF, within the OAS which has 33 members.

Therefore it goes much further than simply the United Nations -- it has a truly global scope -- and we are preparing a convention against organized international crime which will contain a certain number of measures in the fight against money laundering which will be drawn directly from FATF recommendations and which include the obligation to identify clients and economic areas, the registration of financial operations, the creation of a central service for the collection, analysis and information dissemination, the compulsory declaration of suspect declarations to this service as well as co-operation and exchange of information between the various services working in this area in all member States of the UN. This convention is being negotiated in Vienna for the time being, and it seems to be moving along well and will soon apply throughout the world.

This all goes to show that there is currently a large number of countries who have subscribed to the rules considered to be a minimum when trying to fight money laundering. The FATF took the initiative with regard to the cooperative States, and that is the ad hoc group that I chair for the time being. Amongst the criteria that have been established whereby we considered a State as non-cooperative, and again it is not an exhaustive list, you have to take into account how all the systems work. Amongst these criteria, there is the lack of the compulsory nature of declaring suspect transactions and the lack of centralization of these statements within a central body. These criteria also apply if one wants to become a new member of the FATF and for the time being, three countries are being evaluated.

I would like to underline the crucial importance of a declaration of suspicion. It is at the very heart of the international instrument that I have just mentioned, not only for the FATF. I could also have added the United Nations Commission on Narcotic Drugs and Interpol, as those organizations also insist on that criteria. The FATF has evolved since 1996, because what was once an option has now become compulsory.

It is also the case in a new model of legislation on money laundering and the proceeds of crime established in 1998 by the United Nations Program to eradicate the international drug trade. Obviously, the system does bend the principles of discretion or of professional secrecy of financial organizations, or even where it exists, banking secrecy.

I think -- and I am not the only person who says so since I have given you a list of all the States and international organizations who have also made statements along the same lines -- that it is one of the principal models, if not one of the only ones currently available, which can expeditiously counteract these increasingly complex operations. You have to have as much of an overall view as possible of the phenomenon. The fact that this mechanism has now become compulsory is without a doubt the best way to ensure that there is equity among the clients of the organizations, who can no longer make arbitrary decisions as to whether such and such a file should be sent on.

Any suspicious operation must be reported, an obligation whose effectiveness is guaranteed through a sanction mechanism which, according to the country, can be either criminal or administrative. Finally, this mechanism for the mandatory reporting of suspicious operations requires the creation of a body to process the information. In order to be effective as well as legitimate, and by that I mean in order to offer the greatest protection for the privacy of the various organizations' clients as well as fundamental freedoms, this agency must be independent in its management and especially in the decision-making process.

These are the conditions that are required so that trust may be established among the organizations, the people operating under the law, and the body that collects and analyzes the declarations of suspicion which act as a filter, so that only the serious cases of money laundering arising out of serious criminal activities will be reported to police and the justice system.

I might add that the Canadian bill seems to offer the greatest protection in terms of freedoms and privacy, and is also quite strong in the autonomy and independence to be granted to the centre that will be created. The one example I will quote is the fact that it prohibits the search of the analysis centre and will allow police access to the information held by the centre, with a warrant, only under the conditions set out in the Act. The same applies to the guarantees of solicitor-client privilege for legal advisors and lawyers. This is also becoming more and more common among the related international instruments which affect not only financial institutions but also the non-financial professions, particularly the legal and accounting professions.

The FATF made a statement to this effect in 1996. The European guideline is being renegotiated at present. Its jurisdiction will be deliberately extended to professions such as securities brokers, real estate professionals, casinos, as well as those in the accounting and legal professions, including lawyers. Of course, we must not single out the lawyers, but they must be included when they act on behalf of clients in financial dealings. We have no intention of affecting the fundamental role of the lawyer in exercising the right to a defence. I am now ready for your questions.

[English]

Senator Kroft: We appreciate your coming so far to help us with this bill.

I have two or three unrelated questions. When you spoke of the amounts of money involved globally in these transactions that lead to the need for this response, I think you used figures of $500 billion to $1,000 billion U.S. per year. Forgetting whether or not we are internationally using the zeros in the same way, it is a lot of money.

You talk about the ability of that amount of money to destabilize economies or governments. It is a very frightening prospect. Would you have any comment on how coordinated or organized that money is? It is one thing if all that money is under the direction of one person, one board of directors or one family, but is there not some overstatement of the threat? Is it not a statistic that is drawn from such a vast, diverse number of transactions that the threat sounds worse than it is? In other words, how organized are the bad guys? I will leave it at that and go to another question when I have a response.

[Translation]

Mr. Spreutels: I fear that the criminal groups are well organized and perhaps the increase that we are detecting is only the tip of the iceberg. The figures that I gave you come from the International Monetary Fund, but they have been corroborated through other studies. For drug trafficking alone, the annual amount that is laundered is estimated at between 300 and 500 billion American dollars. According to a recent United Nations report on the offshore accounts, of the $5,000 billion deposited in tax havens, it is estimated that 500 to 800 billion dollars come from organized crime. This is from a recent 1999 United Nations report. That is what they call the black hole of the world economy.

[English]

Senator Kroft: Thank you. The other question I have is rooted in my overwhelming concern, a concern that I think most of us share, granted there is a problem, regarding the appropriateness of the response in terms of the question of civil rights and privacy, the collective issues of individual rights. You have pointed out that this seems to be a protected statute.

Take Belgium as an example for a sort of comparative law question. We have our Charter of Rights and Freedoms, which protects these rights. To the best of your knowledge -- and this is perhaps an unfair question -- would you say that the legal environment in which you work is more sensitive or less sensitive to these issues? I am trying to judge whether, if your experience is good and non-problematic, it is because your threshold of concern in Belgium may not be as high as ours is in this country on matters of individual rights. I appreciate that it is an awkward question and I hope you have been able to discern what I am getting at.

[Translation]

Mr. Spreutels: Yes, and I might also tell you that I am also, incidentally, a professor in comparative criminal law at the Université de Bruxelles. In that capacity I compare the various legal systems, whether they be common law or continental. I think I can say that if the legal mechanism is different, the practical result is quite similar. What I mean is that in Belgium, fundamental rights, including the respect for privacy, are part of our Constitution.

Moreover, we are signatories to the European Convention on Human Rights, the Convention of the Council of Europe, which, in clause 8, also provides for the protection of privacy. This protection is guaranteed through the remedies that can apply, not only with respect to domestic law, but also international law, involving courts and tribunals, in particular the Cour de cassation of which I am a member.

And that is not all, because we also have laws that are much more specific, for example, those that protect personal information. We also have wiretap legislation, but with respect to personal data, or data bases, we have a law which created a privacy commission which, I believe, is very close to your Privacy Commissioner here, and which also exercises control. It is a control which is indirect.

I believe the same thing applies here also. If the citizen does not have direct access to our data, he is entitled to file a complaint with the Privacy Commissioner who can determine whether or not our system complies with the protective legislation.

I will admit that the system we now have is born of compromise, but also of balance. Moreover, in Belgium, we have managed to strike such a balance by setting only two conditions for imposing the active co-operation of individuals or private undertakings such as banks and other professionals, which, consequently, affects the privacy of their clients.

First of all, we can only fight against serious criminal activities, and not simple tax fraud. The second guarantee is that we created the group for processing financial information, with its independent status. It acts as a filter that only releases those cases where a clear link with serious forms of crime covered by the law have been established. This information is sent only to the prosecuting authorities -- not administrative or taxation services. I think that is the only condition that will give us a well-balanced system.

[English]

Senator Kelleher: Thank you for coming this long distance. I am somewhat interested in money, other than money laundering. Could you tell us if you have any idea what it cost to set up this commission and what are the annual operating expenses of this commission?

[Translation]

Mr. Spreutels: Yes, it varies according to the country. However, in Belgium, the total administrative cost for the unit is 60 million BF. That is not very much.

[English]

Senator Kelleher: What type of transactions must be reported by the various financial institutions and financial intermediaries?

[Translation]

Mr. Spreutels: On the one hand, in cases where financial organizations or brokers are certain that the transactions involve money laundering, but that is very rare, and second, transactions that are suspected of involving money laundering.

The operation must be suspicious. It results from an analysis made by the designated money-laundering specialist in each financial organization. The analysis is based on whether or not the operation appears normal, as well as on the organization's client profile or on certain characteristics of the operation. We have managed to determine a profile of operations related to drug trafficking with the Netherlands or with Russian organized crime, for example, which is active to a certain extent in Belgium. We therefore have criteria allowing us to determine whether or not an operation is suspicious.

For the casinos, we have a system for automatic reporting. A list of indicators has been established -- which can evolve and be revised -- through which the casinos must report all operations that meet these criteria. Other organizations and individuals are themselves responsible for reporting.

[English]

Senator Kelleher: Does your legislation set out criteria and examples of what would constitute a transaction that should be reported?

[Translation]

Mr. Spreutels: For casinos, yes. For other financial institutions and financial intermediaries, no. Of course, we work closely with the professional associations involved and representatives of the various sectors to develop guidelines, lists of suspicious transactions and classification systems that vary from one sector to another, and are constantly changing, in keeping with the ever increasing knowledge that we are acquiring of the phenomenon.

We therefore take into account the classification work done by the FATF and by other international organizations. We have our own files, we conduct discussions with representatives from the sectors involved, and they are the ones who are responsible for communicating to their members the criteria that may be used to determine whether or not a transaction is suspicious.

[English]

Senator Kelleher: If I were a lawyer practising in Belgium and entered the role of a financial intermediary and felt it was necessary under your legislation for me to make a report, is my client informed, or do I have the right to inform my client, or does he remain uninformed about my making a report?

[Translation]

Mr. Spreutels: It is a very widely accepted rule, in all the international instruments developed to combat money laundering, including the FATF recommendations, that intermediaries may never inform their clients that they have reported a suspicious transaction. This is a rule that is found universally in all systems that suppress money laundering, and I think that it is an easy one to understand.

Currently, in Belgium, the system does not yet cover lawyers. We are waiting until completion of the amendments to the European directive that applies expressly to lawyers when they are acting as financial intermediaries. When this is the case, lawyers who discover a laundering transaction and are not retained to defend their client in court, will, like other financial intermediaries, have an obligation to report the transaction to the analysis centre and will not be able to inform the client that it has been reported.

[English]

Senator Kelleher: I have one further question. Under our proposed legislation here in Canada, once a report is made, let us say by a lawyer fulfilling the function of a financial intermediary, and the government agency or the commission or whatever you want to call it determines that they need more information and they want to pursue it, they would have the power here to enter, inspect and make copies of the records of the financial intermediaries without a warrant. Of course, that is causing a great deal of concern for lawyers because they feel it infringes upon the solicitor-client relationship. Have you any comments with respect to that? Are you going to produce similar legislation in Belgium?

[Translation]

Mr. Spreutels: In the current Belgian system, people who enjoy a legally approved professional privilege must report transactions to the centres spontaneously. This includes, for example, the public notaries mentioned in the Act or the "réviseurs d'entreprise," that is, the statutory auditors or external accountants, as well as other people to whom professional privilege applies. However, they have no obligation to answer complementary questions that are asked by the centre.

Those who are entitled to exercise professional privilege may remain silent when asked to testify in court if they believe that the information is legitimately covered by professional privilege. Therefore, they make a judgment. However, the law says that they are not infringing on professional privilege by conveying this information, by reporting to the analysis centre. Consequently, reporting is mandatory, but responding to a question put by the analysis centre is optional and left to their judgment. On the condition, of course, that professional privilege is not abused.

[English]

Senator Kelleher: Would that apply to records of the lawyers as well as talking to them? Would they have access to the lawyers' papers and records?

[Translation]

Mr. Spreutels: They have access only to the documents related to the transaction which they themselves spontaneously reported as suspicious.

[English]

The Chairman: I think there is a little confusion with regard to what the centre would have the right to do. We will try to get that clarified later. It does not appear that it would have the right to go in without a warrant. It would have the right to determine whether the institution was in compliance. I cannot explain the difference, but that is a question we should ask of someone else later on.

Senator Kelleher: It is my understanding that this would apply to a lawyer in the role of a financial intermediary.

The Chairman: I do not want to debate it now. We will get someone to elucidate that matter later.

Senator Furey: I also wish to thank you for being with us today. I want to return to the line of questioning begun by Senator Kelleher. Could you explain further the setup of the agency? Is it a stand-alone agency? Is it affiliated with existing enforcement organizations? How many people and of what type are employed there?

[Translation]

Mr. Spreutels: It is an independent administrative body that is under the external control of the Ministers of Justice and Finance, so that there is dual oversight. It is an external control in the sense that the ministers or departments cannot interfere with the agency's decision-making process. The agency's executive, which makes its decisions as a group, is made up of six people. Three members come from the judiciary -- these are public prosecutors who are seconded to the agency -- and the other three are financial specialists who usually come from organizations that oversee the financial sector, for example, the commission that oversees the banks or the agency that monitors the insurance sector. We have a staff of 20 officers, including nine analysts. We have three permanent liaison officers who are seconded from the major police forces, who are subject to professional privilege, and we have agency members and staff who work as contacts with police forces.

[English]

Senator Furey: My next question pertains to what you do with the information you receive. For example, when a bank reports suspicious activity to your agency, what do you do with that report? I am wondering whether it is analyzed internally or whether you use external people to assist in analyzing the information you receive.

[Translation]

Mr. Spreutels: No, it is all analyzed internally by our staff and by ourselves. We have powers that are not the investigative powers of a police force, but powers that allow us to obtain information. We have the authority to ask any financial organization composed of people mentioned in the law for any additional information in their possession. As far as professional privilege is concerned, there is the exception that I mentioned earlier.

We can also request any information we think would be useful from the Belgian police forces, from any government administration, including the Finance Department, and, therefore, tax authorities. However, we cannot provide any information to either police forces or tax authorities. We can also have access to certain information that is provided for the agencies that oversee the financial sector.

Finally, we have developed bilateral co-operation mechanisms with similar foreign agencies, including a whole series of guarantees. To date, I have signed 25 co-operation agreements with similar foreign bodies. From all of this financial, administrative and police information that we process ourselves, without conducting field investigations or questioning the people involved, we determine whether or not a connection exists between the financial transactions and the serious crimes covered by the legislation. If we have serious reasons to believe so, we must then transmit the file to the authorities responsible for prosecution.

[English]

Senator Furey: You initially do an internal investigation or analysis, but you have the legislative authority to go beyond that and speak to outside agencies.

I am not sure whether you said there were 38,000 declarations of suspicious transactions since 1993 or in 1993. In any event, I am more interested in the breakdown.I believe you said that 31 per cent of those files went nowhere and 62 per cent of those declarations determined criminal activity. Did I hear that correctly?

[Translation]

Mr. Spreutels: Yes, there have been 37,000 reports since the agency was created, in just under seven years. We do not have an automatic reporting system. These were there for all the transactions that were deemed to be suspicious by the financial organizations themselves. So 62 per cent of the reported transactions were handed over to the prosecuting authorities, and the others were filed away at the agency. This means that we closed our files. Of course, we can always reopen them if ever we receive additional elements. Among our sources, we now have a huge internal database that allows us to cross-check information within the agency, without having to use databases from other institutions.

[English]

Senator Furey: If you make within the agency a determination that 31 per cent of these files are going to be closed, are the clients notified they have been investigated?

[Translation]

Mr. Spreutels: No, but we do advise the financial organizations. We notify the people who reported the transaction that we have closed the file, but that this may only be temporary and they should therefore remain vigilant in case they ever discover more suspicious transactions connected to the same client. We do not clear the names of these clients ourselves, but we nevertheless provide some feedback to the people who reported them to us.

[English]

Senator Furey: Surely, you would find information that would indicate that at least some of them, let us say a very small number, were innocent transactions and had innocent explanations so that they would in fact be closed.

When you send it back to the reporting institution, it would be highly unlikely, I would suggest, that the reporting institution would notify the client. Therefore, an innocent client who has been investigated has no way of knowing that they have been investigated. Is that what you are saying?

[Translation]

Mr. Spreutels: I do not see what such a client would gain by knowing, because nothing has happened and everything stays within the agency, which is an intermediary. That is precisely one of the safeguards given to clients of financial institutions, thanks to the creation of a sealed-off agency that acts as a filter, because if the transaction was reported immediately to a conventional agency, similar to a police force, an innocent client would have a police file and traces would always remain. Whereas now, the information remains solely within this agency and does not go farther.

[English]

Senator Oliver: Are you familiar with Canada's Charter of Rights and Freedoms? If you are, are you aware that lawyers in Canada have a responsibility when a client comes in to see them, say on a commercial transaction or a securities transaction, to keep much of that information confidential so securities information does not leak out and offend securities rules, like the stock exchange?

Are you aware that, in addition to the obligation for confidential information, lawyers also have obligations regarding privileged communications? When a client tells the lawyer or the financial advisor certain information, he or she has a right to know that that information will remain confidential and privileged. Are you aware of that rule applying to the professions in Canada?

[Translation]

Mr. Spreutels: This rule is exactly the same in Belgium.

[English]

Senator Oliver: You have referred to the Canadian statute. Clause 11 of Bill C-22 says that nothing in Part 1 requires a legal counsel to disclose any communication -- the word is "communication" -- that is subject to solicitor-client privilege. Communication does not include an activity; it does not include a transaction, as in "every prescribed financial transaction" from clause 9; nor does it refer to confidentiality. That being the case, my question to you as an expert and as a lawyer is this: Do you think that the language in clause 11, dealing only with communication, is broad enough to protect accountants, lawyers and other financial intermediaries who are dealing with something like a securities transaction?

[Translation]

Mr. Spreutels: You are referring to clause 11, which says that "Nothing in this Part requires a legal counsel to disclose any communication that is subject to solicitor-client privilege"?

[English]

Senator Oliver: Yes. I am talking specifically about the word "communication."

[Translation]

Mr. Spreutels: I see that this word is not contained in the French version of the text.

[English]

The Chairman: Could someone tell us what the French version says? Senator Oliver, do you have that there?

Senator Oliver: Yes, I have. The French translation is on the right and it talks about a secret professional, a judicial counsellor.

My submission to you is that the language in the English version is not substantial or broad enough to protect lawyers, accountants and other financial intermediaries from the burden of confidentiality and privilege they have by virtue of their professions.

[Translation]

Mr. Spreutels: I greatly fear that I am not competent to undertake such a detailed analysis of the proposed system, which is very complex, very balanced also, and which contains a whole series of safeguards. However, when I first read the clause in French, I had the impression that this notion of solicitor-client privilege seemed sufficiently clear.

[English]

Senator Oliver: It does not refer at all to confidentiality.

To go to a separate area, a different kind of question, in the Canadian statute the threshold for accountability is $10,000. What are your comments as to the appropriateness of that threshold, whether it is high enough, too high, or too low?

[Translation]

Mr. Spreutels: I believe that this is the threshold over which a client must be reported, in the case of an occasional client. This figure is perfectly in keeping with the provisions of the laws of the European Union member states.

[English]

Senator Oliver: How much is it there?

[Translation]

Mr. Spreutels: It is 10,000 euros.

[English]

Senator Oliver: When you made your opening remarks, and before Senator Kelleher asked you questions, you said that lawyers should not be covered comprehensively. Then when Senator Kelleher started asking you questions about the client-solicitor privilege, you did indicate that when they function as financial intermediaries, lawyers should be covered comprehensively. I find that a contradiction. Perhaps you can assist me by explaining what you meant.

[Translation]

Mr. Spreutels: The profession of a lawyer and the social role of the lawyer are very complex things. I think that everyone realizes that it will not always be a simple matter to distinguish between the lawyer who is acting as a financial intermediary and the lawyer acting as counsel in defending the client before the law.

In this regard, a key role must be played by the disciplinary authorities for lawyers, and therefore the lawyers' associations that should participate in them. This will be the case in Belgium, where they will cooperate very closely in formulating this legislation and, above all, in applying it, so as to ensure that such a provision does not lead to breaches. The solicitor-client relationship is one of the pillars of our democratic system; on the other hand, however, a democratic society cannot permit a profession that acts as a financial intermediary to be the missing link in a system to protect against laundering the proceeds of crime. It is not easy. We have to achieve a balance and I believe that the good will of all the parties will be essential.

[English]

Senator Kroft: My supplementary is directly on this point. I would ask your opinion in summing up Senator Oliver's and Senator Kelleher's inquiries. Since your centre was established, have you generally satisfied the public and the profession that a line has been drawn successfully between lawyers as financial intermediaries and lawyers as counsel, lawyers as lawyers? Is that a contentious matter? Would you say it is an ongoing problem? How would you characterize your success in this area?

[Translation]

Mr. Spreutels: I believe that this balance has been achieved with respect to the professions that are currently covered by the law, the professions which exercise professional privilege like public notaries or some accounting professions, which in the beginning had also set out some obligations in principle with regard to their inclusion in the system. In fact, it was thanks to the cooperation of the professional associations and the close contacts that we maintained with them that we achieved a balance. Now I no longer hear any complaints about the system. As for lawyers, I cannot tell you anything because they are not yet part of the system in Belgium.

[English]

Senator Wiebe: This question could be a supplementary to the questions of Senator Kroft and Senator Oliver. It could be based in part on my understanding of the translation. In your opening remarks, you mentioned that Bill C-22 is the most highly protective of privacy and civil rights. Did you mean that in comparison to legislation that you are aware of in other countries?

[Translation]

Mr. Spreutels: Yes, absolutely. I was very impressed in particular by the provision that states that no search warrant may be issued for the centre, thereby providing special protection for the confidentiality of the very sensitive data that the centre must maintain. Moreover, as part of an upcoming review of the Belgian law, as a result of the amendment of the directive, I will be urging my government to introduce a provision of this type into our system, so as to strengthen the protection and the privacy of the information available to the centre. Actually, it was after a comparative study of the other laws.

[English]

Senator Wiebe: From your experience, do you feel that the bill's highly protective nature regarding privacy and civil rights will hinder or complement the effectiveness of the legislation?

[Translation]

Mr. Spreutels: No, I think that this would rather contribute to its effectiveness inasmuch as, thanks to this enhanced protection, there will be a relationship of trust between the financial institutions, the other people covered by the legislation and the analysis centre. In my view, it is a way of ensuring its effectiveness.

[English]

Senator Tkachuk: You mentioned earlier the budget of 60 million Belgian francs to operate the centre. You also talked about the number of employees who were seconded. When an employee is seconded from the police or from other departments is their salary paid by the department from which they were seconded or is it included in the 60 million Belgian francs?

[Translation]

Mr. Spreutels: Yes, I believe that each national system has its own institutional arrangements. It is hard to transpose one system to another with regard to such practical considerations. Since we are highly autonomous, we recruit our staff members ourselves and we pay them ourselves, out of our budget. However, the salaries of the agency's board members, including myself, a member of the judiciary, are paid by the government and do not come out of the agency's budget. Similarly, the police officers who are seconded to the agency remain on the payroll of their original police force.

[English]

Senator Tkachuk: So the police officers and the people who work directly for the board are paid from outside of that budget. What is that expense? If all were paid out of the same budget, would the budget need to be twice as big or three times as big or 50 per cent bigger?

[Translation]

Mr. Spreutels: No, it is quite insignificant because, apart from the three prosecutors who are seconded to the agency and work full time -- although I personally do not work full time, although my colleagues do -- the other staff members are part-time employees and only attend meetings. There is one meeting per week, during which we make decisions as to closing files, transmitting files or collecting additional information. It would be unreasonable to charge the total salaries of these people to the agency's budget because they also have other duties. As for the three police officers, I believe that it is very insignificant in relation to the total budget.

[English]

Senator Tkachuk: You have been in operation for seven years. You said that 38,000 of those pieces of paper have rolled into your office. What percentage would have been referred to the police? What percentage of that amount would have been prosecuted successfully?

[Translation]

Mr. Spreutels: The 38,000 reports of transactions were grouped together in 7,000 files because many reports may deal with the same person, the same company, the same case. We therefore processed 7,000 files. Of this number, 1,800 were referred for possible prosecution. I do not yet have the most recent figures for the past year, which will not be available until the end of the month, but the judicial outcome was 180 convictions. However, there are still at least 100 cases that were sent to court but have not yet been tried.

Occasionally legal proceedings are dropped. But, in the majority of cases, the investigations are still under way because they are generally of a complex nature. As you are well aware, these are never very simple cases, justice is slow and investigations are slow too. There are often international connections in these investigations, which also slows them down. For the time being, I am pressing the government to take more effective legal action on the files transmitted by the agency. This is also part of the new security plan that the government adopted only last week.

[English]

Senator Tkachuk: I believe that that would amount to about 26 successful prosecutions per year, on average, from your department alone. That does not take into account people that police outside of your agency may have caught using the banking system to launder money. How many would have been caught without your agency?I am wondering whether the agency is necessary. The agency is catching only 26 per year and only looking at 1,800 files. Surely many of those files would have exceeded 10,000 euros, which means that they would have been sent to the police in any event and the police would have investigated them without your agency. I am wondering how many could have been handled otherwise.

[Translation]

Mr. Spreutels: No. I would like to remind you that we do not have an automatic reporting system for suspicious transactions. A transaction does not have to be reported to the agency just because it exceeds 10,000 euros. The 10,000-euro threshold applies only to identifying clients. What we receive are only the transactions that financial organizations, after conducting their own analysis, consider as suspicious, regardless of the amount. There are a number of systems existing in the world. We have one which is not an automatic reporting system.

The figures that I cited refer only to files that were opened by the agency in response to a report of a suspicious transaction. Of course, the police opens other money-laundering files, because the police may have knowledge of offences from other sources. The police unit that specializes in fighting money laundering indicated in its last annual report that 90 per cent of the investigations carried out by the specialized police unit were initiated by files transmitted by the agency.

Let me also add that the advantage of a central agency is that it is able to specialize in one particularly difficult area and thus acquire expertise that a regular police force would not necessarily be able to acquire. When we send a matter to prosecution, all of the financial information in the file has already been analyzed. That greatly facilitates the work of the police.

[English]

Senator Tkachuk: How many successful prosecutions for money laundering did you have per year before your agency was set up?

[Translation]

Mr. Spreutels: Money laundering became a criminal offence in Belgium in 1990. The preventive system of reporting suspicious transactions was put in place in 1993. I think it would be fair to say that over this period, no one was found guilty of money laundering in Belgium.

[English]

The Chairman: Thank you, Mr. Spreutels, it was very kind of you to be with us.

Our next witnesses are from the Certified General Accountants Association of Canada.

Mr. Everett Colby, Colby & Associates and North American Forensic Accountants, Certified General Accountants Association of Canada: I am a certified fraud examiner as well as a certified general accountant. I own both Colby & Associates and North American Forensic Accountants. With me today is Dawn McGeachy, GCA, who is the manager of the public sector with CGA-Canada. I should like to thank you for having us appear before the committee today.

The Certified General Accountants Association of Canada is a prominent, respected, self-regulating professional body responsible for the education, certification and professional development of over 60,000 certified general accountants and CGA students in every constituency in our country. Many of our members provide accounting, taxation and related services to individuals and businesses of all sizes, especially small and medium-sized businesses. Others occupy financial, administrative and policy positions in governments, financial institutions and not-for-profit organizations.

CGA-Canada is charged with ensuring that our members adhere to the highest standards of professional conduct. As you know, we also regularly appear before parliamentary committees to address public policy issues of concern to our membership and to provide our expertise to policy-makers such as yourselves whenever appropriate.

We are pleased to advise that, in principle, CGA-Canada supports the initiatives contained within the proceeds of crime bill, Bill C-22. We recognize that money laundering and the cross-border movement of proceeds of crime are becoming increasingly difficult to deter and detect and that traditional means of investigating those activities are proving less effective. The proposals in the bill will provide Canada's law enforcement agencies with the tools they need and access to valuable data that they may not otherwise be able to obtain. However, our association has four specific concerns with this bill.

First, we suggest that some of the ambiguous wording contained in Part 1 of the bill could lead to broad interpretation beyond what is intended. For example, clause 5 of the bill states that the legislation will apply to 12 different kinds of organizations as well as their employees. It also provides that it will apply to persons engaged in a business or profession described in the regulations. While we understand that this is meant to include accountants, it does not specifically state so, as the regulations are also ambiguous and do not specify what professions are included.

Further, clause 7 addresses the requirement to report suspicious transactions. We would like to suggest, as we have in other committees, that the clause be revised to more properly reflect the true intent: namely, its application to a professional who is involved in the business of transacting monies or acting as a financial intermediary.

Our analysis of the backgrounder to the legislation and of the consultation paper has identified the potential misunderstanding that entities and individuals acting as financial intermediaries, such as lawyers and accountants, will be required to report any financial transactions that they have reasonable grounds to suspect are related to a money laundering offence merely by becoming associated with the information and not necessarily being involved in the transaction. The consultation paper says that clause 7 requires every person or entity subject to Part 1 to report to the centre every financial transaction where there are reasonable grounds to suspect that the transaction is related to money laundering. We understand the intent. That has been brought to our intention before. However, this wording is broad enough that it could apply to those situations where we are merely associated with the information and not necessarily involved in the transaction.

The Chairman: Please explain to us what "associated with the information" means.

Mr. Colby: For example, if I prepare financial statements for a company, I am associated with that information even though I may not have acted as a financial intermediary in any way with that company on a financial transaction. Accountants in general are typically viewed as being associated with the information if they audit it or prepare tax returns.

A more precise presentation would ensure that the wording limits the reporting requirement to professional accountants like CGAs who are directly involved in the actual transaction, which is what we understand the intent of that section to be.

Second, we are concerned with the receipt and management of information being provided to the centre. The bill does not provide for the establishment of regulations regarding criteria for determining what are reasonable grounds to suspect money laundering. Rather, the consultative paper states that the centre will develop guidelines to assist reporting entities to identify characteristics and circumstances that might lead to a determination of reasonable suspicion. The paper further states that the information to be contained in these reports and the means by which the reports are to be transmitted to the centre will also be prescribed by regulation.

As this leaves much to the unknown, we are left with the impression that something will now be designed and then imposed, and we will just have to trust that the reporting system will be an efficient and cost-effective process. The bill implies that it is the responsibility of the professional to determine whether a particular transaction is suspicious. Accountants will be called upon to exercise considerable judgment in recognizing whether a transaction is in fact a money laundering transaction as contemplated by the bill.

We recommend that the legislation include actual regulations rather than simply provide guidelines regarding specific criteria for determining those characteristics and circumstances that might lead a professional to conclude that there is a reasonable suspicion. In circumstances where we are leaving it up to the judgment of hundreds of thousands of individuals, how can the provisions for failing to report be enforced against someone who has exercised their judgment if their judgment differs from that of the centre?

Part 5 of the bill addresses defences and protections available under the legislation.

The Chairman: As a forensic accountant, what would your criteria be for a suspicious transaction?

Mr. Colby: Due to my expertise and work experience, I have worked on cases involving money laundering. I also have a banking and investigation background in the United States. Therefore, I am quite familiar with those situations. The average accountant who typically prepares financial statements, tax returns and the like will not have the specific training and background to enable them to recognize suspicious activities such as repeated transactions or multiple people presenting cheques payable to one company that is unknown to them. Those of us who are familiar with what constitutes suspicious activity would not have a problem with that.

Our organization alone has a membership of 60,000. There are, in addition, the Institute of Chartered Accountants and the Certified Management Accountants Association. All those professionals will not have the same level of expertise. Therefore, there will be several hundred thousand people exercising different judgments than would you or I. This bill leaves matters to their judgment. It seems to me that it would be difficult to enforce the provisions against failing to report if it is left up to their judgment and the judgment of the centre is different from theirs. It becomes a difference of opinion. If the criteria were specifically regulated, that would provide to the professionals untrained in that area a measuring stick by which to judge whether those transactions constitute suspicious activity.

Senator Kolber: Are you willing to suggest some measuring stick?

Mr. Colby: I would suggest that the Certified General Accountants Association of Canada is more than happy to assist the Department of Finance, the Department of Justice and whoever else may be involved in establishing those regulations. We would absolutely want to be part of that as we are one of the main professions affected by this legislation.

I will continue in regards to the defences and protections available under the legislation. While we recognize that clause 10 provides a general immunity provision, we are apprehensive that this may prove ineffective within the context of a civil or professional disciplinary proceeding. The Certified General Accountants Association has already had to propose amendments to our own code of ethics and rules of professional conduct to allow us to comply with this act.

There are various elements of the required reporting. We believe there needs to be a "safe harbour" provision for those professionals who, in good faith, do submit a report, as required by the act, regarding a conclusion of a suspicious activity that later proves to be unfounded. Although we are obligated not to report to the client that we have reported, and the centre theoretically would never say to them that a report has been made, we have all seen many examples of information leaking from various agencies and departments. The likelihood of something getting out at some point is highly probable. In other words, we would like assurances that this legislation will include protection, legal and otherwise, for employees in this situation: A report is made in good faith but later turns out to be unfounded. For whatever reason, the client finds out about it and tries to bring action against us as professionals under our own codes of ethics and rules of professional conduct.

Further, it is our belief that the bill should address incidents where an employee makes a report to the centre and subsequently loses employment as a result. As well, it should address the possibility of legitimate circumstances under which no report should be made. That should be covered by the proviso of a "reasonable excuse" defence.

Third, we would like to see the role of the centre more clearly defined. Comprehensive information must be provided to the Canadian public regarding the accountability of the centre. Although clause 55 addresses prohibited disclosures by the centre, we do not believe the centre should be immune from prosecution in the event that information it provides to law enforcement agencies or others proves to be in error or slanderous. There is literally no accountability.

While we agree that the centre should be authorized to provide information to law enforcement agencies, we are alarmed that they are also permitted to disclose this information to the Canada Customs and Revenue Agency, CSIS and the Department of Citizenship and Immigration.

Although this is not specifically worded in the backgrounder papers, the same people who will staff the centre and be taught to recognize and analyze the criminal offence of money laundering will now also be expected to look for tax evasion. Those are two widely divergent criteria to judge.

The Chairman: Why should we ignore tax evasion? I do not want to get into it now but I am having trouble with your point of view. That is all.

Mr. Colby: Subclause 55(3) states that the centre must first determine whether it has reasonable grounds to suspect that the information would be relevant to investigating or prosecuting a money-laundering offence before disclosure can be made to those other authorities. However, the bill does not state what constitutes reasonable grounds to suspect that the information would be relevant.

What springs to mind in all of this is data mining. The safeguards proposed for the release of information appear at this point to be weak. There are no provisions for third-party reviews of decisions prior to the release of information. Again, we are in a position of trusting that, once the regulations are developed, they will be palatable to the public.

The most distressing aspect of the proposed legislation to our association is contained in clauses 62 to 65, which provide the power for representatives of the centre to enter a professional's office and copy documents from the office without the need for due process. We find this to be highly intrusive. It also raises the question of whether the legislation is contrary to the provisions of section 8 of the Charter of Rights and Freedoms, which provides that everyone has the right to be secure against unreasonable search and seizure.

While the creation of the centre seems to have gone to certain lengths to maintain the perception of protection of individual privacy, a warrantless search of a professional's office seems to violate the same principle of privacy. There is an expectation by the public that an accountant enjoys privilege much as there exists in a lawyer-client relationship. While such is not the case, it is reasonable to expect that a client's files should not be freely available, thus making receipt of a warrant prior to entry a mandatory part of the process a natural conclusion.

We also wish to recommend that the legislation be clarified to restrict the powers of access to only those records that relate to financial intermediation activities.

To come back to an earlier point, clause 11 relates only to legal counsel, meaning a barrister and solicitor or lawyer. It does not extend to accountants or other professionals who may have a pseudo-client relationship that is intended to be kept confidential.

In addition, in clause 64(2), under the enforcement and compliance procedures, when staff go in supposedly to search for these documents and to copy them, if they are in the possession of legal counsel, then that privilege may be claimed. I am an accountant, not legal counsel, but in my activities as a forensic accountant or perhaps on certain tax consulting engagements, I may be in the possession of privileged documents. I may be performing the engagement on behalf of legal counsel. These clauses do not extend to me or to those privileged documents in that capacity. We would like to see that wording modified in the sense that any documents to which solicitor-client privilege may be maintained, not just those in the possession of the legal counsel, should be afforded the same rights under the legislation.

Mr. Chairman, for further details on our association's viewpoint, please refer to our written submissions.

Senator Furey: My question is brief. I do not understand why you feel you need a "safe harbour" when the only requirement for you to have immunity, in clause 10, is that you act in good faith. Then it gives you immunity from all criminal or civil proceedings. What more do you want?

Mr. Colby: The codes of ethics and rules of professional conduct that various professions fall under would not be covered under the civil or criminal proceedings. They would be administrative tribunals governed by the associations themselves since we are self-regulating bodies.

Senator Furey: Are you saying that there are clauses in this bill that would require you to violate your various codes of ethics?

Mr. Colby: Potentially, yes. We have already seen some modification. We adjusted our code just to allow us to comply with the reporting on the suspicious activity section. We still have not been able to resolve, for example, the reporting of a monetary transaction in excess of $10,000. Our code says we are not allowed to disclose that. This act requires me to disclose it. I am in a quandary. Do I do what the act says --

The Chairman: This is the law.

Senator Furey: It is not a quandary. The legislation takes priority over your code.

Mr. Colby: We would like to know that when we act in good faith --

The Chairman: You cannot supersede the government.

Mr. Colby: That is not our intent, but we would like to know that we have protection for ourselves in our professional capacities, because a client can bring action against us under our own regulations.

Senator Tkachuk: The government is supposed to protect the people. That is the job of the government.

The Chairman: If they are doing something illegal, you do not protect crooks.

Senator Tkachuk: You do not know. That is his point.

Mr. Colby: My understanding is that the government in general has tried to stay away from dictating policy to the various professions and has allowed them to become self-regulating. Most of our associations, whether the bar association or the accountants' association, have adopted fairly similar codes. They express the underlying principles and values that we all hold. However, we are having to modify and change our codes to be in compliance with the law. We will have to do whatever it takes to allow us to comply.

Senator Furey: That is what happens, it is not? When new legislation is passed, if a professional body finds that it is operating with a code of conduct that is not in compliance with that legislation, then it is the code of conduct that will have to change.

Mr. Colby: Yes.

Senator Furey: There is no need to change the immunity section in this act. It gives incredible immunity, and the only requirement for anyone asking for it is that they act in good faith.

Mr. Colby: Okay.

Senator Tkachuk: On page 7 of your brief, you talk about a safe harbour and the difficulty of amateurs, really, submitting information to the centre. Would you be of the view that because they are amateurs, to err on the side of safety, they would be making a whole bunch reports that were not necessary? In other words, if I do not know for sure, I will err on the side of safety and send it in, because I do not want to get into trouble.

Mr. Colby: That is a possibility. There are many different people whose judgment will be put to the test in that regard.

Senator Tkachuk: As an association, would you not ask your people to do that?

Mr. Colby: We would undertake as an association to try to inform them of what the actual criteria might be, but we do not necessarily think that it should be our job to do it if that might conflict with the intent of the legislation. Other than in guidelines that are proposed, why not set down in regulations what those criteria are? Then you would have the measuring stick by which anyone in the various professions could judge.

Senator Tkachuk: You mentioned that the distressing aspect of the proposed legislation is the power that allows representatives of the centre to enter a professional's office and copy documents without the need of due process or warrant. Why would they be doing that?

Mr. Colby: It comes under the section for compliance with the act. I guess the theoretical approach here is that in order to ensure that there is compliance with the act, they will have the ability to enter my office and copy, and presently it says there is no limit on what they can look at. They can just review and copy documents at my expense to ensure that I am in compliance with Part 1 of the act.

Senator Tkachuk: Do you think that perhaps the person from the centre would in reality be doing an investigation?

Mr. Colby: That would be the logical conclusion.

Senator Tkachuk: That would be the only reason they would come down.

Mr. Colby: I would hope so, other than a fishing expedition.

Senator Tkachuk: That is interesting. I will have to check back as to what they said they would do, exactly. Somehow I thought they would not be doing investigations at the centre but simply reviewing the information they had.

Right now, the way the act reads, if they walk into your office and ask for a document, is it a document that you would have filed or that someone else would have filed? In other words, would it be something about someone that had been filed by a third party? Could it be?

Mr. Colby: Subclause 62(1) states:

An authorized person may, from time to time, examine the records and inquire into the business and affairs of any person or entity referred to in section 5 for the purpose of ensuring compliance with Part 1...

I am not a lawyer, so this may be a matter of interpretation, but this tells me that, at any given time, without prior knowledge of them coming, and for whatever reason it may be, they can come and knock on my door, examine all of my files, without limit, and ask me questions about my own business and affairs to see if I am in compliance with this act. I find that intrusive.

Senator Tkachuk: I do too.

Senator Fitzpatrick: I want to go back to your comment on client confidentiality. You said that legal counsel is protected but that you would not be if you were performing on behalf of legal counsel. I thought the arrangement would be that you would be engaged by legal counsel to do whatever work it is. Under that situation, the protection that is extended to legal counsel would follow you as engaged by legal counsel. You are protected because it is an engagement that legal counsel has arranged. Are you trying to tell me that, if you are engaged by legal counsel and the legal counsel is protected, you think that you are exposed as an accountant?

Mr. Colby: Subclause 64(2) is the compliance and search and seizure section. It says:

If an authorized person acting under section 62 or 63 is about to examine or copy a document in the possession of a legal counsel who claims that a named client or former client of the legal counsel has a solicitor-client privilege in respect of the document, the authorized person shall not examine or make copies of the document.

Again, I am not a lawyer, but I relate this back to the exclusion in clause 11, which says that, if it is a document over which a lawyer claims privilege, it is not to be examined. This says "in his possession." Not being a lawyer, I am concerned. If I have a lawyer's document but it is not in his possession, can I claim that? The way the bill is presently worded, I do not think so, but, again, I could be wrong in my interpretation.

Senator Fitzpatrick: You are saying that the client-lawyer privilege arrangement would be subverted.

Mr. Colby: I think it is highly probable that it would, and perhaps there should be a change to the wording to allow for any document that may have solicitor-client privilege attached to it to be covered by that exclusionary provision, regardless of whose possession the document is in.

Senator Kroft: I presume that in the course of your work you are familiar with the similar provisions that would apply under the Income Tax Act?

Mr. Colby: I am aware that under the Income Tax Act, section 231, they have the power to come in and examine my books and records, but when it involves client books and records, if they were my working papers, those are not covered by that supposed search and seizure section. They would have to get a search warrant to take my records. Case law, as far as I understand it, shows that the papers that an accountant prepares are his property and not the client's property. To come to my office to search my files, they need a search warrant. If I have the actual client's books, they have access under the act to examine those books and records.

Senator Kroft: Going back to the general provisions, are you saying that there is no symmetry between the provisions of the Income Tax Act on the rights of the agency to obtain evidence and the provisions of this bill?

Mr. Colby: I understand what you are trying to say.

Senator Kroft: I am wondering what the differences are between what you are saying and what is proposed here.

Mr. Colby: The Income Tax Act applies directly to the individual who is required to report, regardless of what third parties may have assisted that person to report. This act applies to third parties rather than to the specific individual who is conducting the suspicious activity or the financial transaction.

Under the Income Tax Act, the books and records of the taxpayer can be examined, but there is no right to examine my books and records simply because I was associated with or assisted the taxpayer.

Senator Kroft: There is a different purpose. We should not expect it to be exactly the same because the purpose of the legislation is different.

Mr. Colby: Let us say that the bill provided for examining the records of Joe's Money Order Shop, because reports were received about Joe. The centre wants to inspect Joe's books and records. I understand that is different than inspecting Joe's files found in the office of Joe's lawyer or accountant or whatever other professional.

The provisions in this bill that allow for that access are so broad, as written, that the staff are not limited only to looking at the files or documents relating to the subject of the report. They can look at anything they want. There is no limit.

Senator Kroft: That seems to be the idea.

The Chairman: What about subclause 64(2)? You wanted to be included. Legal counsel can have a solicitor-client privilege in respect of a document. The authorized person from the agency shall not examine or make copies of the document.

Mr. Colby: I understand the reason for the clause. I should like it to be modified.

The Chairman: You want accountants included in that general description?

Mr. Colby: I should like to see any professionals or others covered regarding any document that can have solicitor-client privilege attached. That document could be held by a doctor, a lawyer, an accountant or a government official.

Senator Furey: Presumably, if you were engaged by a solicitor to review such a document, that document is deemed to be in the possession of the solicitor and solicitor-client privilege would apply, would it not?

Mr. Colby: I do not know the legal interpretation of that, nor the intent behind the wording in this clause. What does it mean, to be in the possession of legal counsel?

In a fraud examination, for example, I may be retained by counsel to actually conduct the investigation. I am conducting an engagement. I am retained by that counsel and all my work is subject to their solicitor-client privilege. I may be accumulating documents and evidence that the lawyer does not even have a copy of yet because I have not yet submitted my report. We would need a legal interpretation of whether those documents are deemed to be in the lawyer's possession.

Senator Furey: I think it is clear.

Senator Fitzpatrick: You are concerned because you do not want the chain of solicitor-client privilege broken when it comes to you or any other professional?

Mr. Colby: That is correct.

Senator Fitzpatrick: My colleague says he thinks it is clear that it would not be, but, Mr. Chairman, that is something we should examine.

The Chairman: Thank you, witnesses.

The next group of witnesses will be from the Royal Canadian Mounted Police. Please proceed.

Mr. Tim Killam, Assistant Commissioner, Technical Operations Directorate, Royal Canadian Mounted Police: Honourable senators, we welcome this opportunity to raise awareness of the need to identify strong and effective measures to combat criminal organizations predisposed to the laundering of criminal assets. We also welcome the opportunity to appear before the committee today in support of Bill C-22 as it pertains to money laundering and to discuss the effects of money laundering on the legitimate economy and what we see as a way ahead in an attempt to stem the tide against organized crime money laundering.

I have made available a short document prepared April 3 entitled "Royal Canadian Mounted Police -- Proceeds of Crime Enforcement in Canada." This document outlines the evolution of our proceeds of crime program, the legislative changes and the structure of the program for reference purposes only. I will summarize that reference material so you can better understand the context.

Money laundering is defined as a process by which one conceals the existence of an illegal source or an illegal application of income and then disguises or converts that income to make it appear legitimate. In other words, money laundering is a conversion of illegal proceeds from a cash-based system into the business-based system.

The objectives of criminal organizations are to place illegally obtained proceeds beyond the reach of law enforcement by moving the bulk cash through the financial system, thereby cycling it into the economy. The attempt is to make it as difficult as possible to identify and trace. Once the funds are moved through the money-laundering stages, the income appears legitimate, which makes it more difficult to detect and prosecute. The profits can then be used to provide working capital for future activities. It allows these organizations to expand and open new markets, thereby becoming more powerful. Criminal organizations derive earnings not only from illegal activities but also from investments in legitimate enterprises. Proceeds allow them to penetrate into legal economic areas.

The RCMP Proceeds of Crime Program is directed at restraining and forfeiting illicit and/or unreported wealth accumulated through criminal activities. Presently, 22 Proceeds of Crime units are scattered throughout Canada and they vigorously pursue criminal organizations both nationally and internationally by attacking their illegally obtained assets.

The objectives of the Proceeds of Crime Program may be described as follows: identifying, assessing, restraining and forfeiting illicit and unreported wealth accumulated through criminal activities; prosecuting offenders; restraining and seizing assets pending judicial forfeiture; and identifying to the courts assets that could not be seized to justify judicial penalties. The program's primary focus is to remove the incentive for committing crime.

Our objectives are met by performing the following tasks: We conduct investigations relative to the laundering of proceeds derived from designated substance offences, designated customs and excise offences and enterprise crime offences. As well, we respond to requests for investigative assistance from foreign and domestic police agencies, and we foster international cooperation in the area of money laundering investigations.

The second focus of the Proceeds of Crime Program is prevention. Our field units carry out community policing and crime prevention initiatives by making presentations to the financial and business communities, government departments and agencies and the general public; by distributing pamphlets and related material; by promoting strategies developed locally or by the Proceeds of Crime Branch; and by liaising with other police departments and agencies to identify criminal trends and activities relating to the Proceeds of Crime Program.

The third focus is on training. Investigators coming into the Proceeds of Crime Program receive appropriate training, and we actively provide international training as well.

The fourth focus of the Proceeds of Crime Program is policy development and implementation. We identify areas of legislative weakness and seek statute amendments through the Department of Justice. We develop and publish RCMP policy, and we do program evaluation of each unit.

As the former officer in charge of the Proceeds of Crime Program for Canada, I diligently worked with my colleagues in attempting to ensure that Canada was protected by a broad range of measures aimed at strengthening organized crime enforcement by preventing the laundering of profits of illegal activity. Early on, it became clear to me that Canada's financial systems were being exploited by criminal organizations to conceal, legitimize and transport their illicit profits, thereby financing their future activities. It was felt that Canada required a systematic, coordinated and cooperative approach to ensure that our financial systems were sound as well as free of criminal taint.

Money laundering is the economic engine that runs all criminal organizations around the world. Preventing dirty money from entering Canada's financial system would mean not allowing those predisposed to this activity from ultimately strengthening criminal organization. The Canadian government has taken the fight against organized crime very seriously; by extension, the RCMP, as the federal police force, is on the front line of this fight.

We heard from Mr. Spreutels that estimates of the amount of illicit drug money laundered annually worldwide range between $300 billion and $500 billion U.S. The UN estimates that in excess of U.S. $1 trillion in illegal profits is generated by organized crime annually. The inclusion of laundered illicit funds from economic and other non-drug crime could potentially double those figures. The magnitude is staggering. The flight of capital and the chaos spilling over the borders of the former Soviet Union and into jurisdictions in Europe, the U.S. and elsewhere are examples of just how complicated these matters can be. A portion of these funds ends up in Canada, which is seen internationally as a haven. The RCMP is unable to quantify the exact amount of money laundering in Canada annually but has empirical data to show that it is in fact happening at an alarming rate.

Money launderers are attracted to Canada and consider it a haven for a number of reasons. First, Canada has a stable economy with a relatively strong currency and a banking system whose efficiency, stability and security is second to none. Second, there is a long, undefended border between Canada and the United States with a huge volume of commercial and financial trade occurring. Third, Canada is located next to one of the world's largest illicit drug markets, the United States. Last, and likely most important, is the lack of controls in Canada over cross-border movements of currency and the lack of a mandatory unusual transaction reporting system.

What this means for Canada essentially is that there exists an ever more challenging regulatory and law enforcement environment, particularly in a time of reduced barriers to trade and finance. It is the opinion of the RCMP that, in order to effectively combat organized crime, Canada must institute a legally defensible mandatory unusual reporting system to assist in the investigation of the laundering of proceeds of crime.

As far back as 1993, during the Commission on Crime Prevention and Criminal Justice held in Vienna, the Secretary General of the United Nations put forward an unsettling portrait of the control organized crime has on a worldwide scale. He said:

As revenues generated by organized crime increase, the necessity to control banks becomes a priority for criminals...businesses controlled by organized crime generate a seventy (70) percent profit margin on their investments. This is achieved at the detriment of law abiding competitors who must worry about profit margins, overhead, repayment of bank loans. All in all the infiltration by organized crime tends to introduce distortions in the interplay of market forces. In the long run it is the taxpayer and consumer who are affected. The profits of organized crime are so huge that no economy is immune to the impact of this underground economy...we must improve investigative techniques and limit secrecy to appropriate dimensions.

The situation described by the U.N. Secretary General seven years ago is identical to the situation being observed in Canada today.

All financial institutions such as banks, trust companies, "near banks, insurance companies and intermediaries, such as solicitors and accountants, as well as casinos, who deal with client funds on a daily basis, have a front line role to play in reporting unusual and suspicious transactions. Under voluntary disclosure, as we have today in Canada, there is no systematic and reliable way of detecting money laundering activity. A permissive system grants wide discretion to individual financial institutions to determine their commitment to the battle against money laundering and ultimately organized crime. The anecdotal evidence that the RCMP has seen underscores the varying commitments in Canada.

At this time, there is no overall coordination or control of reports, which is fragmented at best, and thus there is no way of ensuring that the available information is being used to its full potential via a central agency as proposed under Bill C-22.

It is accepted that it is a struggle to reach an appropriate balance between privacy and enforcement considerations, and it seems clear that the balance can never be struck once and for all time. Rather, the balance requires constant examination as ways of doing business, record keeping and retrieval systems and methods of fraudulent transfers all evolve.

From the enforcement viewpoint, the benefits of the creation of a financial transaction and report analysis centre of Canada as envisioned in Bill C-22 are many. The centre, according to us, would, among other things, provide a deterrent by making it more difficult to use traditional financial institutions to hide the profits from illegal activities, therefore reducing Canada's reputation as a haven for money laundering. The centre would fulfil our international obligations. It would provide a mechanism for enlisting the support and cooperation of banks and other financial institutions in identifying possible currency violations. The centre would identify investigatory targets for possible laundering of proceeds of crime, and the centre would provide corroborating evidence against individuals identified through other sources such as informants and other agency referrals.

At the end of the day, senators, countries are only as strong as their weakest link. Of the 26 member countries of the Financial Action Task Force, only Canada, Singapore and Germany have not yet implemented mandatory systems of reporting suspicious or unusual transactions. In addition, Canada does not meet the standard required for the Egmont Group, a collection of financial intelligence units of which there are 53 member countries around the world, who set the standards and share financial intelligence data in order to combat money laundering.

The bottom line is that money laundering ultimately entails the use of the lawful commercial system for unlawful means. The addition of a mandatory suspicious transaction and cross-border reporting regime will serve notice to Canada's criminal organizations, and indeed the world's criminals, that Canada has an effective transaction reporting system and that their money is not welcome here.

The problems caused by organized crime are not the sole responsibility of the police. Bill C-22 allows for a partnership with police, government and the private sector, and it will discourage the continued use of Canadian financial institutions for depositing large amounts of illicit cash and concealing it in accounts around the world. In reality, money laundering is a national and international cross-border phenomenon. In order for law enforcement to reach over the fence and join hands, it seems logical that we should be obligated to cooperate amongst our national institutions and across international borders with at least the same effectiveness as those who launder the proceeds of crime.

Whether it is a known motorcycle gang that specializes in violence or intimidation or the Mafia who use corruption, we are faced with organizations that are structured to maximize their profit at the expense of the state and its citizens. I humbly submit, honourable senators, that it is therefore the state's responsibility to contribute and place an additional tool into the law enforcement toolbox to assist in impacting on the perverse reflection of society predisposed to laundering the proceeds of crime. Individually, these problems are formidable. Collectively, they may seem overwhelming. A mandatory reporting regime should not be viewed as a panacea. Rather, it is an integral part of a broad range of measures aimed at strengthening organized crime enforcement.

Senator Tkachuk: We are all in favour of your efforts. In a democratic society it is a difficult thing, as you said earlier, to balance the need to capture this illegal cash with the need to protect the rights of innocent citizens who may be caught in the crossfire of an investigation. While this may not be as violent as being caught in the crossfire of bullets, which often happens in a shootout between bad guys and the police, we have here the possibility of people being caught in the crossfire by this huge organization being set up throughout the country using lawyers and accountants -- all major professionals, it would seem, who handle a dollar -- as part of this solution.

We have estimates for the amount of money laundered annually worldwide, but what do you estimate as being laundered annually here in Canada?

Mr. Killam: Because of the nature of this kind of activity, we cannot estimate it. As a matter of fact, the Financial Action Task Force has been trying for the last number of years to figure out what it is internationally. Those figures are just guestimates at best. They are extrapolations of the kinds of crimes that go on and the kinds of money involved. Because money laundering is trying to make the money legitimate, it is very difficult to quantify.

The best way to understand it is that there are many organizations -- and we see them in the paper -- prosecuted for regular traditional offences and they do not have to go through processes to get their money. They use criminal activity to get their money. They are huge organizations and have lots of profits. We can see that. That is the empirical evidence. Through the cases we now investigate, we know that there is a lot of money in those organizations, but all we can see is one part of the picture. We see one piece of the puzzle. Right now, when we start an investigation, we see one piece of the puzzle. If you have ever done a puzzle, you can understand what I am saying. We see one little piece. Perhaps we get that piece from a bank on a voluntary basis right now.

The Chairman: Senator Tkachuk, the Library of Parliament has an answer for you. It says the federal government estimates that between $5 billion and $17 billion in criminal proceeds are laundered in this country each year.

Senator Tkachuk: Between $5 billion and $17 billion?

Mr. Killam: It is so wide that it is very difficult, but it is a huge figure.

Senator Tkachuk: You successfully prosecute money laundering activities now under the present legislation?

Mr. Killam: Yes.

Senator Tkachuk: How many successful prosecutions would we have reported in a year in Canada?

Mr. Killam: I do not know.

Senator Tkachuk: Maybe you could use one province, such as Ontario or Quebec.

Mr. Killam: I cannot tell you exactly what the figures are.

Senator Tkachuk: Hundreds?

Mr. L. R. J. (Lou) Goulet, Staff Sergeant, Proceeds of Crime Branch, Federal Services Directorate, Royal Canadian Mounted Police: In terms of the number of people actually charged or convicted, I do not have that figure here with me. The best I can give you is in terms of recoveries, revenue, fines and referrals over the past four years, by one method of measuring. I will round out the figures from 1996 to 1999. The recovery rate was $142 million, of which the revenue amounted to $50 million that accrued in actual forfeitures. Referrals to other agencies, we identified $90 million. In terms of fines, it came out to about $7 million. Those are the actual dollar figures.

Senator Tkachuk: To be sure I understand the first number, the $50 million is the amount of illegal cash you actually captured; is that correct?

Mr. Goulet: That is correct; the $150 million is the amount that was restrained.

Senator Tkachuk: Is that per year?

Mr. Goulet: No, that is for the last three years, 1996 to 1999, based on our limited resources of the 22 units, which is approximately 287 regular members of the RCMP who are predisposed to investigations in this area. Our integrated units are made up of a team concept that includes forensic accountants, lawyers from the Department of Justice, and police. Those are the end results of our unit to this point in time.

Senator Tkachuk: I assume there will be a lot more investigations going on once this agency gets up and running.

Mr. Goulet: We are expecting quality leads, of course. The information that will be received will be acted upon as best we can. We may already have investigations ongoing where the information will complement, or it may be something brand spanking new that we were not familiar with regarding that particular individual and the details provided with that disclosure.

Yes, we expect an increased workload. By way of example, over the same time frame, in the Netherlands there were approximately 16,000 disclosures and there appeared to be a trend where approximately 20 per cent to 24 per cent of those filtered down to their police agencies after being raised from the unusual to the suspicious level in the methodologies that they use there.

Regardless of the total number of suspicious transactions that the agency receives eventually, we could expect 20 per cent of the volume. That is law enforcement, not just the RCMP.

Senator Tkachuk: Will you have money in your budget to increase the number of people you will need from 297?

Mr. Killam: There will not be any more money for the investigation itself. There is a provision for some money to augment the investigation once we receive a report from the agency. The report or information will come to us at way below any kind of level of legal threshold where we can go back. It will just be tombstone data. That is what will come to the police from the agency. It could say my colleague here and his name and the fact that he did some kind of activity at certain banks. There is much more that was done at the agency, but we will not get that. It comes to us at a certain legal threshold, then we have to conduct a preliminary investigation to allow us to get the production order from the agency in order to get the rest of the file. There is much work we have to do after we get a report. Some money will come to help us with the investigation at each unit so that we are able to do that part of the investigation, which is new. We did not get these leads from there before.

The Chairman: To follow up on that, are you telling me that when the agency does its analysis, whatever else it does, they will not give that to you?

Mr. Killam: They will not give us the analysis.

The Chairman: Does that not seem to be a very cost-inefficient way of carrying on? We are going to have two government agencies doing the same thing twice.

Mr. Killam: It is coming that way for the privacy considerations and the Charter considerations. You have heard Mr. Spreutels' comment that this legislation is very protective, and it is for exactly those reasons.

The Royal Canadian Mounted Police was involved in the discussions with regard to the buildup of this piece of legislation. I was at the table for most of those discussions in my prior job.

For those reasons, we feel it is a legally defensible system that protects the privacy of people. It requires a lot of us, yes, but that is the society we live in.

Senator Fitzpatrick: Commissioner, I know this is a difficult question to answer, too, but do you have any idea what business activities or companies this laundering process takes advantage of? For example, how much goes into publicly traded companies through the stock exchange? In turn, where does that lead with respect to regulatory requirements and policing stock exchange activities?

Mr. Killam: This goes back to the answer I began earlier. By the very nature of this activity, you do not know it. By the very fact that we do not have this centre in operation, we will never know it. The centre will be able to get some kind of information from the leads that may come in later on.

At the end of the day, the centre may be doing those kinds of investigations. There is no requirement right now. We have heard our colleagues from the CGAA. There are concerns about being part of the solution. It is not a police problem. It is society's problem. I happen to be paid full time to do this, but we all should be looking out for this.

This bill would provide a standard expectation that people put that information into the centre. That information will come in. In the report to Parliament that is required, you will see more information, probably in a closed setting.

Senator Fitzpatrick: My next question is unrelated. What is your opinion with respect to phasing out $1,000 bills? Will that have a real impact on money laundering activity?

Mr. Killam: That would have an impact. Very few countries have denominations of that size. I am in favour of stopping that production. Such bills can be concealed more easily and be carried internationally. The largest denomination in the United States is $100. Even though our dollar is worth less, we still experience many smuggling cases where $1,000 bills are used.

Senator Fitzpatrick: These $1,000 bills can be smuggled out of the country. Then they come back into publicly traded companies through the stock exchange and can penetrate industry in that way?

Mr. Killam: Absolutely.

Senator Kroft: I will ask a general question that, I warn you in advance, calls for an opinion. We all understand that, to achieve a sound piece of legislation, a balancing act is required between solving the problem and protecting citizens' rights. Let me put this on a scale of "toughness." I am asking your opinion as amongst yourselves and I would be surprised if you do not have a sense of this from your own conversations. As an overall observation, would you say that the drafters of this legislation, in terms of toughness, have it too tough, too easy or just about right?

Mr. Killam: I was involved in the drafting and I happen to be a legally trained police officer. I can understand the legal issues and I think this is a good balance.

In Canada we do have requirements that are tough. We do have stringent privacy requirements. We have a charter to protect citizens, rightfully so. I think this bill works. It makes our work harder but that is the price of living in Canada and I am proud to be here. I do not mind being required to be involved in these activities. Sure, it will be tough and it would be easier if no agency were involved, but this is the way things should be.

Senator Kelleher: I see this as essentially criminal legislation. The object of the bill is to deal with criminal matters and the proceeds of crime. Therefore, I am a little surprised that the reporting mechanism is through the Minister of Finance. I am somewhat prejudiced, of course. I would have thought a better reporting mechanism would have been through the Solicitor General. What is your feeling on the reporting mechanism?

Mr. Killam: This was the subject of many discussions. It boiled down to the fact that the centre should not be in the police, even though its administration would be much easier.

Senator Kelleher: I am not asking that.

Mr. Killam: I know, but by the same reason, the RCMP reports to the Solicitor General and has a close relationship with that ministry. In our view, the same charter concerns that arise with the police would arise with the Solicitor General. Quite frankly, it is an amendment to the old Proceeds of Crime (money laundering) Act, which was the responsibility of the Department of Finance. This is just an extension of or an amendment to that act. It stays with the same department. We did have that discussion.

Senator Tkachuk: I have a question on a clause that has bothered us a lot and it deals with your relationship with the actual agency. If a file comes in and an investigation is begun, would you be involved from the beginning? Not at all? The centre will speak to no police officer until the file is actually referred to the police?

Mr. Killam: The act prohibits the agency from such disclosure to anyone. That is because of the charter protection. Eventually, if a case comes to the threshold where it should be reported, we will deal with that, but it will have been sifted and filtered by then.

To better understand it, we have put these charts on the wall to show what this agency will do for us.

Mr. Goulet: Under the existing act, provisions are made to allow access to government databases. Depending on how that works out, we could have access to the actual CPIC system, the Canadian Police Information Centre system.

Senator Tkachuk: Does that show criminal records?

Mr. Goulet: That is right. We would not be involved in the actual investigation.

We have a chart that shows a "wagon circle." This concept was borrowed from my friends at the Financial Crimes Center in the United States. A sanitized case is shown with colour coding. Yellow is used for actual transactions. Pink denotes business names. Brown denotes account numbers.

The data would be considered and a link analysis would be done. Based on the disclosure, we would investigate and build up our evidence, hoping for sufficient grounds to obtain a court order, a production order, and then we would attend to the agency. In our view of the world, the agency can produce this kind of report at the end of the day.

As you can see, if you look at the number of transactions, it is an onerous task. We have been asked in the past whether there is an ability to handle this volume of information. Our answer to that is yes. There is artificial intelligence, which is what produced these particular charts for the sake of demonstration.

Mr. Killam: That is what we expect to come out of this agency. In other words, now we make it a piece of information that goes all across the country. It comes in on a voluntary basis, with no real standard, just what may come through our relationships with the financial industry. As some of the earlier witnesses said, there are varying degrees of commitment to that and varying degrees of understanding and ethics and so on.

There is a picture out there, and we just get that one little piece of the puzzle. That is what I was trying to talk about before. This agency should be able to pull those pieces of the puzzle together to get a better picture. You might not get the whole puzzle, but when that piece comes to us, it may be a good part, and we may be able to do something with it. The best way I can visualize it is that they are bringing a lot of the pieces of the puzzle together at that agency.

Senator Tkachuk: It would not normally be the practice of the police, of course, to release names of people who are simply being investigated but who have not been accused of anything.

Mr. Killam: No.

Senator Tkachuk: Yet it happens.

Mr. Killam: It has happened in the past. It is not normal practice.

Senator Tkachuk: It does happen quite a bit, actually.

Mr. Killam: We attempt not to. It is certainly not our policy to do that.

Senator Tkachuk: I understand that, but it does happen.

Mr. Killam: Absolutely.

Senator Tkachuk: It happens on a fairly regular basis that people are being investigated and somehow it gets in the paper. Some reporter finds out. Why do you think that will not happen at the agency? Are they better people?

Mr. Killam: I just do not believe the same kinds of investigation will take place. My understanding of the way the agency will work is that it will be in an office; it will be done in more of a closed way, with privacy protections.

Senator Tkachuk: We live in Ottawa, where reporters and bureaucrats hang around together at cocktail parties, go out for dinner, talk. Let us say a nice, juicy name comes across the desk; the reporter might be interested in that, right? Some teller at a bank sends to the agency a piece of information with a name attached and it happens to be the name of a prominent person -- someone people are interested in reading about -- and even though that person has not been doing anything, it is possible that it would just happen to leak to a reporter. That could happen, and it will happen.

Mr. Killam: Absolutely, it is possible.

The Chairman: It is a pleasure to welcome, from the Office of the Privacy Commissioner of Canada, Mr. Bruce Phillips, the Privacy Commissioner. Mr. Phillips informs me that he does have an opening statement, and then senators may ask questions.

Mr. Bruce Phillips, Privacy Commissioner, Office of the Privacy Commissioner of Canada: Senators, attending with me today are Julien Delisle, who is the executive director in my office, and two of our legal staff, Stuart Bloomfield and Martine Nantel.

The first thing I want to say is that this is quite a piece of legislation. It does seem to me to be breaking new ground in the sense of the amount of personal information that the state is prepared to demand of its citizens.

The Chairman: When you say it is "quite a piece of legislation," do you mean it quite good or quite bad?

Mr. Phillips: That is a judgment for you to make, although I do have some observations about specific problems with it.

The Chairman: I am just kidding.

Mr. Phillips: You might catch me a little bit later on.

It has the potential and the likelihood of placing a very substantial proportion of the population under what amounts to a more or less constant form of surveillance. Given the possibilities, and owing to the very broad information-gathering authorities of having essentially detailed life profiles constructed of a great many Canadian citizens, I think it is worthwhile to bring to this committee's attention the very obvious concern that Canadians at large have with this kind of activity, especially given our recent experience with a comprehensive database at the Department of Human Resources, which, so far, has generated no fewer than 50,000 demands by Canadians for access to those records. It is a matter of some public concern, as well as having importance as a piece of legislation.

It is for this committee to decide whether the problem defined by the sponsors of this bill is sufficiently severe to warrant the kind of information gathering that is made possible by the bill. I appreciate that money laundering is an important issue, but I must be concerned about the impact on the privacy of Canadians.

We have here a proposal to collect information on uncountable numbers of Canadians, largely without their consent when you get beyond the prescribed reporting requirements, largely without their knowledge and, so far as we are concerned after examining the bill in its present state, with no real right of access to those records. Essentially, therefore, it vitiates the rights that are contained in the existing Privacy Act.

I will sum up our first objections regarding what we consider to be vagueness, ambiguity and lack of precision. Banks, trust companies, insurance companies, credit unions, investment counsellors, other organizations providing financial services and even casinos are being required to report "every financial transaction" where there are, according to the bill, "reasonable grounds to suspect that the transaction is related to the commission of a money laundering offence." What are these reasonable grounds? We do not know. They are not part of the proposed legislation. The bill requires businesses and individuals to make subjective and possibly speculative assessments of the character and activities of their clients without providing the statutory or regulatory guidance about what constitutes reasonable grounds.

In fact, you could argue that this legislation encourages excessive reporting of personal information. Given that organizations and individuals required to report suspicious transactions can be fined as much as $500,000 and imprisoned for up to six months, it seems to me that reporting organizations will be very likely to err on the side of submitting too much rather than too little. Further, the lack of clear definitions of "reasonable grounds" and "suspicious transactions" invites excessive reporting and increases the likelihood that innocent citizens will have their privacy invaded. The point must to be made again and again that the vast majority of persons who will be captured in this immense collection of information will be innocent people.

The observations of Mr. Seeto of the Department of Finance were very interesting. In trying to weigh the value of the information from an investigative or evidentiary point of view with the amount being collected, he tells us that, in Belgium, which apparently is one of the few places where there are any comprehensive statistics, 24,000 suspicious transactions were reported in the six-year period from 1993 to 1999. Of those 24,000 reports, 1,400 went to judicial authorities and 117 convictions were registered. I think the argument that must be posed and that the Senate must consider is whether the cure here is not a little worse than the disease.

Where the objective criteria do exist that trigger mandatory reporting, such as two or more transactions on the same day totalling $10,000 or more in cash, although I am no expert, I would respectfully suggest that this will result in the collection of information about a very large number of people. There are discussions about the thresholds here, and although that gets a bit beyond my brief, it does seem to me they are very low.

The organizations required to collect and report this information will send it to the Financial Transactions and Reports Analysis Centre without the client's knowledge or consent on the basis of these yet undefined suspicions. In some cases, this information will never be used for criminal purposes. It is our belief that without convincing evidence that notification of purpose -- that is, telling the client why the information is being collected -- would seriously undermine the criminal investigation process, people's rights to be informed should not be abrogated in this way.

Paragraph 54(b) of the bill provides that the centre may collect personal information "relevant to money laundering activities." Again, as in the case of "reasonable grounds," the legislation does not attempt to define "relevant." Given that they have access to almost any database in the possession of the federal government, no matter where it is located, and access to databases of provincial governments and other sources as well, it would seem that the centre could amass information relating to such things as employment history, income, professional relationships and travel patterns, all of which could be considered relevant, in addition to the information provided by financial institutions and other organizations covered by the legislation.

This seems to me to be giving a licence to the centre to collect information for the compilation of comprehensive profiles of individual life and behaviour. Because of the lack of definitions and guidance in the legislation, we do not know whether the centre will collect this information. We think we need to specify the type of information that can be collected, as well as the possible sources of information, with a good deal more precision. We object to the breadth of the information the centre is mandated to collect and use. We believe that the types of information considered relevant to the proper assessment of whether a given transaction is suspicious, as well as the sources of those data elements, should be specified, preferably in the statute.

One of the fundamental principles underlying both the Privacy Act and the new Personal Information Protection and Electronic Documents Act is that organizations should collect only as much information as they need. The legislation needs limits placed around it.

The establishment of the centre as an agency at arm's length from the police, subject to the Privacy Act, or so we are told, is, I suppose, preferable to having the reporting organizations disclosing information directly to the police. However, the protection afforded by the Privacy Act, in my opinion, is largely illusory. The public's ability to lodge complaints and the commissioner's power to investigate complaints will be meaningless given the secrecy surrounding the collection of information by the centre. As a result of this secrecy, members of the public will not know what information is being collected about them, short of what is prescribed in the bill or that they may be being investigated. Citizens will not be able to use the Privacy Act or the Personal Information Protection and Electronic Documents Act to determine if information has been collected about them. Although in one part of the bill the centre is said to be expressly subject to the federal Privacy Act, we have been informed by officials connected with this operation that the centre will routinely deny access requests pursuant to section 16 or paragraph 22(1)(b) of the Privacy Act.

Bill C-22 also amends the Personal Information Protection and Electronic Documents Act to include reporting organizations as organizations that can disclose information to the centre without consent and authorizes the centre to inform an organization that it cannot disclose the fact that it has sent information to the centre.

Without evidence of harm, access to personal information should not be denied to an individual as a matter of routine or a matter of course. At a minimum, individuals should have access to the information collected by the centre as a matter of statutory right if they have not been subject to a criminal investigation as a result of that collection.

Clause 55 of this bill authorizes the centre to disclose designated information to law enforcement organizations, the Canada Customs and Revenue Agency and other bodies without warrant. However, subclause 55(7) of the same bill gives the minister the authority to add to this any other similar information that may be prescribed. That poses the risk that the centre could simply become a conduit through which other information could be channelled to law enforcement bodies, circumventing the controls normally applied to the collection of evidence in criminal investigations.

In summary, therefore, our problems boil down to four. There is the lack of statutory or regulatory guidance about what constitutes reasonable grounds and suspicious transactions. These terms should be defined in the legislation or regulations, not in guidelines developed on an ad hoc basis between the centre and interested parties. If these terms are defined in regulations, the committee should have an opportunity to review them.

There is the scope and the quantity of the information the centre is authorized to collect and the potentially very large number of citizens that will be under surveillance. Terms such as "relevant information" and "law enforcement" must be defined in the legislation or in regulations, and the number of individuals about whom information is collected should be kept to a bare minimum.

Above all, citizens should be able to use their access rights under the Privacy Act or under the Personal Information Protection and Electronic Documents Act, unless it can be clearly demonstrated that informing them that information may be sent to the centre or that giving them a right of access would jeopardize the intent of the legislation.

Finally, we are concerned about the possibility that the information provided to law enforcement bodies will be expanded. That must be kept to a minimum.

In a Supreme Court majority decision respecting privacy and law enforcement, Mr. Justice La Forest stated:

The restraints imposed on government to pry into the lives of the citizen go to the essence of a democratic state....where privacy is outweighed by other societal claims, there must be clear rules setting forth the conditions in which it can be violated. This is especially true of law enforcement, which involves the freedom of the subject.

I am asking you today to take this under advisement to ensure that Bill C-22 does contain clear rules. If you feel that this legislation is needed, then I urge you to ensure that it contains definitions and rules that will minimize the intrusiveness of the legislation.

I should like to add one footnote to that. One of the basic principles under the Privacy Act is that we have, as individual Canadians, the right of access to information the government holds about us. The Office of the Privacy Commissioner of Canada is established to investigate complaints in cases of denial of access. The normal process for us is to look at the documents concerned, make a judgment and offer recommendation to the relevant department. If the recommendation is not accepted, if it happens to be a failure of disclosure, we do have the right to go to court on behalf of the complainant. As we see this bill, we do not have that right. We can look at the information, but the bill, as nearly as we have observed, stipulates that there will be no disclosure by a court of any document contained in the centre unless it meets certain conditions that are contained in the bill. They certainly do not include a recommendation from the Privacy Act. We get a sense from this bill that the judge would be required to say, "I am sorry, because this bill overrides the Privacy Act I cannot entertain an application to the court for disclosure of the document."

The Chairman: This committee obviously has a dilemma, because we are informed that there is a great deal of criminal activity going on and something should be done about that. On the other hand, do you give law officers licence to do whatever they want? I do not pretend to know the answer. I do know, however, that the trend seems to be changing a little. Do you remember the famous Miranda rules, where even if a guy had a smoking gun you would not touch him until you had read him his rights? Apparently that procedure is now under fire and it looks like it will be changed. You pose a difficult dilemma, I think.

Senator Kelleher: Prior to your presentation to us, would the Department of Finance and the drafters of this bill have been aware of the views that you just recited to us?

Mr. Phillips: Indeed they are, yes. We have conveyed these views to the department.

Senator Kelleher: Obviously it has not had too much effect upon them.

Mr. Phillips: I would not say it has had no effect, but it has had very little. Originally, this bill would have denied the Privacy Commissioner the right even to see any of these documents. They have amended it to that extent. However, the ability of the commissioner to function as an ombudsperson and to make recommendations to the centre is really vitiated by our inability to bring any relief to a complainant we feel has a just complaint.

Senator Kelleher: Were you made an interested party to the drafting process? Were you asked for your views on this legislation?

Mr. Phillips: Yes, senator. A consultation document issued early on in this process was sent to us, among many interested parties, and we conveyed our views back to the department in response to that consultation document. We have had meetings with the Department of Finance. We have put our views on record.

Senator Kelleher: Have you offered any specific drafting to alleviate some of your concerns?

Mr. Phillips: No, not specific. I do not feel it is the proper business of my office to be writing regulations or writing statute law. We are not qualified to do that. However, we think we know what it should not be doing.

Senator Kelleher: If this committee wanted further and more detailed assistance from you with respect to possible amendments, would you be able to provide that for us?

Mr. Phillips: We would certainly try to help, yes. You are far better equipped in that respect. You have legislative counsel and experts of that nature available to you. We would certainly be happy to look at any amendment proposed and give you our opinion of its effect on the totality of the legislation.

Senator Furey: Most of my concerns were addressed in your presentation, but I want to recap two of those. Commissioner, you indicated that in the first instance you would prefer to see clients notified that they were being investigated at the investigative stage, unless there was compelling evidence to show that it would interfere with the investigation. Is that correct?

Mr. Phillips: That is correct.

Senator Furey: The second part of my question is that once an investigation has been conducted and a client is deemed to be innocent, that party should be notified. Is that correct?

Mr. Phillips: I did not specifically say that, but it is not a bad idea. What I am arguing for here is a bit more transparency in this process. If it is deemed necessary for them to collect all this information, you know as well as I do that the vast majority of transactions will be found completely innocent and lawful. One analogy is the police R.I.D.E. program. It operates on a statistical assumption that, if you stop 100 cars on Christmas Eve, a certain percentage of those people will be found to be violating the law. This, equally, is law enforcement by statistics. You assume that in 1 million transactions a certain percentage will raise suspicion.

I think we all have views about that approach, because it involves fishing expeditions and collecting information about many people without probable cause. Those concepts are not consistent with our general view of the proper role of law enforcement in a society such as this.

You are being asked, in the first place, to set aside the normal considerations here because of what the law enforcement authorities say is such an urgent problem and of such enormity that normal rights must be set aside. My argument is that, if that is so -- and it is for other people to make that argument and to convince this body that it is so -- I do not think they need to go as far as they are going here with respect to the great majority of the people whose information will be collected here, in terms of violating their existing rights under the federal Privacy Act and under the Personal Information Protection and Electronic Documents Act applicable to the private sector.

If you, senator, make a couple of $5,000 deposits in the bank that get reported to the centre, it is difficult for me to see any reason why the information should remain in a file for five years -- or longer, if you do it again a year later, because they essentially are in a position of maintaining a rolling, perpetual file about you, with no reason whatsoever to keep it based on the information at hand. I do not think that is right. Furthermore, there is no reason why you should not know it is there. Second, if they are keeping information for the statutory five-year term, there is no reason, if it has not generated a suspicion -- and on what terms a suspicion is generated I do not know -- why you should not have access to that information, unless it can be demonstrated by the holders of the information that to disclose it to you, the individual concerned, would somehow or other impair a criminal investigation.

That is the principle now embodied in the Privacy Act. In most cases, investigative bodies working under the Privacy Act must demonstrate an injury if they deny access to the information. That this group should be exempted from that or that they should routinely deny any access requests to this, as they have told us they intend to do, strikes me as an arbitrary and unjustified position. They may say, as Mr. Seeto of the Finance Department has said, that the Privacy Act covers this. However, if you look carefully at this bill, you see that the coverage is a bit of a chimera because they have written in clauses that essentially make the ability of the Privacy Commissioner to act on behalf of any complaint meaningless.

Senator Furey: I agree with an earlier comment you made that reporting agencies no doubt will err on the side of protecting their own interests. As a result, I can see a whole host of transactions being reported that end up being purely innocent transactions. If the individuals or clients who are reported are not told about this, they have no opportunity to go back the next time to ensure that the transaction is more transparent so that it does not get caught in this web. One of my concerns is that the failure to notify people will mean that they do not have the opportunity to ensure that they do not continuously get snagged up or caught up in it.

Mr. Phillips: Senator, I could not put it better myself.

Senator Oliver: Mr. Phillips, every time you appear before one of our committees you leave us with a big challenge and you have done it again today, with comments on clause 55 of this bill and section 16 and subsection 22(1). Clause 55 is the one that authorizes the centre to disclose designated information about a Canadian citizen to law enforcement organizations and the Canada Customs and Revenue Agency.

From reading the bill, I have the impression that this bill gives a lot more powers than are necessary to do the job of combatting money laundering in Canada. Some of the powers given are intrusive. I think you would agree with that.

Because section 55 gives this extraordinary power to give information to other agencies, such as the Canada Customs and Revenue Agency, I also have the impression that this is a backdoor way for the federal government to say, under the guise of controlling money laundering, "Let's go a couple of steps farther and try to find out if we cannot combat the whole underground economy." If they find someone has given $5,000 cash to someone and then another $5,000 cash, they have the power under clause 55 to give that information to the Canada Customs and Revenue Agency. In my opinion, that could be used for purposes of trying to combat the underground economy. I should like to hear your comments on that.

Mr. Phillips: We did look at that section. The purpose for the reverse direction of the information flow, if you want to put it that way, did seem a little obscure to us. I do not think we ever did question any of the officials about that particular section. In the end, we came to somewhat the same view, that this certainly would permit the use of information given by a financial institution, for example, to the centre for purposes of money laundering investigations also to be transmitted to the revenue authorities for the disclosure of unreported income. Whether that is right or wrong is something you might want to consider, but it did seem to me to be getting a bit beyond the stated purposes of this bill, which they repeatedly say in various places is only for the purpose of money laundering investigation.

There is a broader issue there, senator, which is the question of whether, when people have at hand what they think may be evidence of criminal activity, they should disclose it to another authority. What does merely reporting a sum prove to the financial centre about a person's relationship with the Canada Customs and Revenue Agency? It is well worth looking at, absolutely.

Senator Oliver: You also make the amazing revelation that your department has gone to the Department of Finance and said, "Tell us about the Privacy Act and its position vis-à-vis this act," and you have said that you have been reliably informed that the centre will routinely deny access requests by you. In other words, in Canada, we have a right of privacy. One of the powers you have now to enforce that right of privacy is to go to agencies and seek to get information. Now you have been told, before this act gets Royal Assent, "There is no point in your coming because we are routinely going to turn you down."

Mr. Phillips: Yes.

Senator Oliver: Do you think that language such as "such consent shall not be arbitrarily or unreasonably withheld" might strengthen your position under the Privacy Act?

Mr. Phillips: I suggested some language in my brief opening remarks, to the effect that, where the information collected about financial transactions has not precipitated and is unlikely to lead to a criminal investigation, the person concerned with that information should have a right of access to it. The only conceivable explanation for refusing such a request for access would be if that access were injurious to a lawful investigation of money laundering.

Senator Oliver: What reasons did they give for telling you that they were routinely going to refuse to give you this information?

Mr. Phillips: I will refer you to Mr. Delisle, who attended the meeting at which those statements were made.

Mr. Julien Delisle, Executive Director, Office of the Privacy Commissioner of Canada: I should like to clarify a point, senator. Section 16 and paragraph 22(1)(b) are Privacy Act sections that deal with an individual's right of access. What the Department of Finance is saying is that individual Canadians making an access request under the Privacy Act may be routinely denied under section 16 and paragraph 22(1)(b) of the Privacy Act. That has nothing to do with the authority of the commissioner to investigate complaints on their behalf. He will be permitted to do that.

Mr. Phillips: The point I am making is that even though we can go and investigate the complaint and come to a conclusion about the merits of the complaint, pro or con, if we should in the case of a denial of access decide that the complaint is justified, we cannot force the centre to grant access. As you know, as ombudsmen we do not issue orders, we issue recommendations to the departments holding the information. If they do not accept our recommendation, we then have the option of applying to the Federal Court for a hearing of the complaint and our recommendation.

The way this bill is structured, I can make a recommendation, and they can look at it. However, since they have decided in advance, as evidenced by their statements to us, to deny access, what is the point of the investigation? They have already told us in advance, "We do not care what you recommend."

Senator Oliver: You can still go to the Federal Court.

Mr. Phillips: No, we cannot. Clause 60 is worthy of your attention. We can go to the Federal Court, but this bill says that this information can be disclosed only under the circumstances that are set forth in clause 60. That does not include the Privacy Act, which is overridden specifically by clause 60. That clause states that, despite any other act of Parliament, the information may be disclosed only under these very narrowly defined circumstances.

In other words, we are shut out of the court process unless a Federal Court judge is prepared to say that, in his view, this is a denial of natural justice or that it offends administrative law in some other way. On the face of it, though, as we see it, the commissioner is effectively blocked from ever providing relief, even when he may feel that the complainant has a fully justified complaint.

Senator Oliver: Has your department looked at the charter and at this particular statute to see whether provisions of the charter have likewise been infringed?

Mr. Phillips: I do not think we have come to any conclusion about the charter argument. It has been raised elsewhere. The Canadian Bar Association made some comments that struck us as reasonable observations.

Mr. Stuart Bloomfield, Policy Branch, Office of the Privacy Commissioner: The Canadian Bar Association is concerned about section 8 of the Charter but also about the vagueness of several provisions within the bill, such as the uncertainty surrounding what may constitute a "suspicious transaction."

One rationale for establishing the reporting centre at arm's length from the law enforcement body is to insulate the authority from a Charter challenge. This is because the centre is not an investigative body, even though it ostensibly performs an investigative kind of function.

Yes, we did consider the charter issues. There may still be some outstanding concerns in that regard that need to be resolved.

Mr. Phillips: Senators, you have just heard a very good lawyer being very careful. I will tell you what the commissioner thinks.

True, the centre is not an investigative body as defined in the regulations, but, when it talks like a duck -- et cetera. The sole purpose of the centre is to facilitate law enforcement investigations into money laundering. You have just heard a good deal of evidence from police witnesses about how useful and essential this centre will be. Law enforcement is its raison d'être. It is difficult for me to accept the notion that it is not involved in investigations.

Senator Kroft: I do not think Canadians like this legislation in the sense that we do not like the kind of society that calls up this kind of legislation. It is part of a bigger feeling. I did not like putting in my first burglar alarm system because it said something about the community where I lived.

Our job is to find the best way of doing things, often amongst alternatives. Today, in the absence of this legislation, where are we? Investigations are certainly going on now for money laundering. In your official office, do you have any access to police investigation reports? If this bill is not passed, obviously police activity will fill the gap. Is that system not even more protected, even more impenetrable, by any kind of process?

Mr. Phillips: The Office of the Privacy Commissioner does have access to police investigation records if a complaint on an investigation is filed with our office. We also have authority under section 27 of our act to audit the manner in which government agencies and departments are managing the personal information that they collect.

Yes, we do have an insight. If you are asking my view on how they do their work, I hesitate to go very far along that track. We are not there to tell people how to do their jobs, only to look at the way they manage personal information.

Senator Kroft: I am just trying to confine the question to accessibility. For example, do people who were investigated ever know that they were investigated? My colleague raised that question.

Mr. Phillips: Sometimes yes and sometimes no. For example, the Privacy Act does provide a process by which a government department can refuse to confirm or deny the existence of personal information if it qualifies for exemption under some of the exempting clauses of the bill. For example, the Canadian Security Intelligence Service routinely refuses to confirm or deny the existence of personal information when people write in to ask for any personal file that involves them. CSIS's justification for doing that has been tested in the courts and upheld. CSIS argues that, if they confirm or deny the existence of personal information, it could be a very valuable tool for terrorists, for example. A terrorist would want to know if Canada was not watching. It is the so-called mosaic effect.

Senator Kroft: Judging from the reactions you have heard, do you think that this proposal is roughly equivalent to the way CSIS operates?

Mr. Phillips: There was an attitudinal view demonstrated to us by their statements about refusing to grant access to any information.

We are dealing with a somewhat different issue here. This is not capturing information on people who are suspected of anything. It is capturing the information on thousands of people on the statistical assumptions that people have made. If you collect enough information, you will find a crook. If you go through enough houses in the city of Ottawa without warrant and without telling people, doing it while they are away on vacation, you eventually will find some stolen property.

Those are the analogies. CSIS is an entirely different matter. It is conceded, and the statistics so far prove, that the vast majority of this information will concern the innocent, entirely lawful business of Canadians. Some limited proportion will be helpful to law enforcement authorities.

The normal reasons police collect information, which lead to probable cause to feel that someone is committing an offence, are set aside here. This is essentially based upon the proposition that, if you get enough information about enough people, somewhere in that enormous body of information you will find reasons to suspect a criminal act. That sets aside the normal rights of people dealing with probable cause as a principle of law.

The Chairman: You are defining "probable cause" in your way. Their "probable cause" may be different. A bank customer who makes deposits at a bank three times a week may be totally innocent, but that may be probable cause for a police officer.

Mr. Phillips: Granted.

The Chairman: It is hard for us to discern what is suspicious and what is not. I do not think you can define it. I am not arguing with you, but I am saying that I do not know how to deal with it.

Mr. Phillips: I would be the last person to argue that this is an easy question. This is one of the many cases where we must strike some kind of a reasonable balance in the face of a national problem.

It is my contention that the centre will collect all this information but that most of the information will clearly not involve criminal activity. I see no compelling argument why those innocent people whose information is in that database should not have access to it, or, for that matter, that they should not be notified that the information has been collected and that no fault has been found with it. Why can they not put that in the bill and make that a statutory requirement?

It is very disturbing, senator, to have officials of a department in this country telling us, before the thing is even law, "Well, they can ask for it if they want to, and even though the Privacy Act says that an injury has to be demonstrated, we are going to deny access automatically and routinely."

The Chairman: It sounds stupid.

Mr. Phillips: It is offensive to me. At any rate, it constitutes a very strong argument for putting right in the legislation that, if no criminal investigation has resulted from the accumulation of this information, people should have access to it, at least.

The Chairman: Which means they have to be informed.

Senator Furey: Did you not also say, Commissioner, that you did not have standing before the court to take it that further step?

Mr. Phillips: We do in normal cases, yes.

Senator Furey: Not here?

Mr. Phillips: Clause 60 of this bill seems to override the normal process of our right to apply to the court.

Mr. Delisle: I wish to apologize, senator. I misled you and, I think, the commissioner. He was, in fact, referring to section 37 of the Privacy Act, which deals with audit, not section 27.

The Chairman: The commissioner's omission.

Senator Tkachuk: This bill troubles me greatly because of its enlisting of the Canadian citizenry to send paper to the government on their friends and neighbours and the people they do business with, which is much like stopping crime in a neighbourhood by putting cameras in everyone's house. The term "suspicious transaction" bothers me because, just a while ago, a black man in New York who was thought to be suspicious had 42 bullets put in him by well-trained people. Of course, he was an innocent bystander. Here, we are going to have amateurs doing this, bank tellers, who do not know the law itself.

I asked the bureaucrats when they were here why people could not get information on their own file, and they did not really have any answer except "No." In all this discussion, did they give you the reason they would not release a file on a person who just happened to have his paper cross the desk of the commission? Were you told why they want to keep it?

Mr. Delisle: Sorry, I missed the last part of your question.

Senator Tkachuk: Why do they want to keep the file? A person's file comes in, they investigate, there is nothing there. Why do they want to keep the file for five years and why would they not allow a person access to his file if he wanted it?

Mr. Delisle: They want to have the information for a set period of time in order to decide if there is some kind of pattern or if there is any information that should be passed on to the police for criminal investigation purposes. I think there is also a requirement in the bill that the information be purged after five years, if nothing has happened.

From our perspective, in order to bring more transparency to the process it is important to develop the statutory right of access so that individuals could see what is in their files, if that information is not subject to a criminal investigation. If it is subject to a criminal investigation, then one could understand why they should not get access to it. It seems to us to be the quid pro quo for denying a person his fundamental right of privacy.

The Chairman: Thank you very much, gentlemen. I do not know that we got any further, but we know more.

The committee adjourned.

June 8, 2000 [Standing Senate Committee on Banking, Trade and Commerce]

The Chairman: Honourable senators, I call the meeting to order. We are here to continue our hearings on Bill C-22.

This morning, I am pleased to welcome the Information Commissioner of Canada, the Honourable John Reid.

Hon. John Reid, P.C., Information Commissioner of Canada: Mr. Chairman, I want to say at the beginning that I appreciate the opportunity to come before you to talk about this bill. This is also not the first time that a commissioner has come before this Senate committee to ask that legislation be changed. My predecessor, John Grace, came here a number of years ago to ask for amendments to a labour bill that also had the effect of removing information available to Canadians from a piece of legislation.

Senator Angus: Mr. Chairman, I have a point of order. We have had no documentation on this presentation.

The Chairman: We received it last night.

Senator Angus: It was not circulated to the senators, and everything Mr. Reid is about to say seems to have been available on the Internet this morning, while we did not have it yet. Do you think that is a good thing?

The Chairman: No.

Senator Angus: I think you should register your disapproval and ensure it does not happen again.

The Chairman: You have done so.

Mr. Reid: On that point, Mr. Chairman, I gave similar testimony earlier this week to the Justice Committee of the other place. Any information that came out of that testimony is, of course, in the public domain.

The point I want to make, however, is that Bill C-22, which seeks to create a new government institution, is a direct attack on the access to information legislation and the principles behind it.

Clause 85 of Bill C-22 provides that all required reports of financial transactions in respect of which there are reasonable grounds to suspect that the transaction is related to the commission of a money laundering offence, all voluntary reports about suspicions of money laundering, and any information prepared by the centre from information received concerning suspicious transactions or transactions involving sums of money of a value equal to or greater than a specified amount to be set by regulation, will be exempt from the Access to Information Act.

The Department of Finance was kind enough to invite us over for a brief discussion of these matters. We asked them what, if any, of these aspects of the activities of the new agency would not be protected under the existing provisions of the Access to Information Act and whether they could give us examples. They could not give us any examples and they could not be specific.

I have been unable to find any justification for this provision. If this provision goes through the House of Commons and the Senate and becomes law, how can we justify having CSIS, the RCMP, the Department of National Defence, or a number of other departments that hold information that, in many ways, is far more important, far more confidential, and far more dangerous to the health of the country than this, included in the act and this minor piece of information outside? If this is allowed to take place, it will create a "black hole" in the governmental system. Black holes, as you know, have a tendency to draw in a whole range of other information.

This is not an unusual attack on the Access to Information Act. In doing some research for this meeting, we discovered that the number of exemptions to the act has been growing very rapidly. When the act was passed, there were 33 statutes listed in Schedule II, which is where exemption from the operations of the act are found. Three years later, there were 38. In 2000, some 50 statutes are listed in Schedule II. Therefore, this is a continuing process by government and the bureaucracy to ensure that more and more information is kept away from Parliament and the citizens of Canada. This means a lessening of accountability. It means that, in effect, we must put more trust in the bureaucracy and the government to ensure that proper scrutiny of these activities takes place.

When the act was reviewed by the parliamentary committee in 1986, it recommended that, as a result of three years experience, Schedule II be done away with because it was not possible to justify intellectually the exemptions already in place under the Access to Information Act.

Senator Kelleher: Mr. Reid, did you have discussions with the Department of Finance regarding your concerns prior to the bill being tabled and passed by the House of Commons?

Mr. Reid: Yes.

Senator Kelleher: Did you have any success as a result of voicing your concerns to Finance?

Mr. Reid: I will ask Mr. Leadbeater, who organized the discussions, to reply to that.

Mr. Alan Leadbeater, Deputy Information Commissioner: Senator, it is fair to say that the department gave us a very fair hearing. We had a full opportunity to discuss our concerns with the experts in the department.

As to whether we had success in changing their minds, the answer is no. We agreed to disagree. We were of the view that all of the sensitive information that deserves protection could be protected under existing provisions of the legislation. The department felt they needed an "abundance of caution" approach. Although they could not come up with specific examples, they believed that this information was so sensitive that they would like the assurance of a "blanket of secrecy." That is where we agreed to disagree.

Senator Kelleher: Specifically dealing with clause 85, to which you have just objected, did they give any specific raison d'être for wanting this exemption?

Mr. Leadbeater: As you know, senator, the act requires all individuals to report suspicious transactions. That is fairly sensitive information. The centre is independent of the law enforcement agencies and it will examine it carefully and decide what to pass on. In that circumstance, they felt that for the public to have confidence in their integrity and independence, they wanted to be able to assure them there was absolutely no chance this information would ever get into the public domain.

I think that was the rationale for taking the "abundance of caution" approach.

Senator Kelleher: Did you have specific discussions with them about the lack of a definition of "suspicious transaction"?

Mr. Leadbeater: No. We felt that however "suspicious" was defined -- and that certainly becomes a privacy issue with regard to how intrusive this legislation should be -- the existing provisions in the Access to Information Act protected what was sensitive but also permitted the public to have access to accountability information. This organization will, after all, have a fairly intrusive role in Canadian society and Canadians will want access, for example, to any internal audits that may be done on its administration and effectiveness. This provision could prevent them from having access to that type of information.

Senator Kelleher: Did you raise any concerns with them over the fact that the citizen would never know he was being investigated, and if it was decided that there was nothing wrong with the transaction, he would not even then be notified that there had been an investigation and that he had been cleared?

Mr. Leadbeater: We did express concern about that in the sense that if the institution were to be covered by the existing provisions, section 19, which protects the privacy of individuals, would be available to them. However, there is a public interest override to that section. In certain cases, the public interest in disclosure might outweigh the privacy rights of individuals. That weighing, which we think should go on, and Parliament says should go on, under the Access to Information Act, would no longer be possible because of the changes to Schedule II.

Mr. Reid: As you see, senator, it becomes a black hole into which a great deal of normal information about a department can fall and be protected.

Senator Kroft: Good morning, Mr. Reid. My question goes to the root of the bill. I think we would all agree that it would be preferable if we did not need such legislation. However, the governments of the world, in the face of modern realities, have concluded that we need to protect ourselves in this area. The question then becomes, what is the least socially damaging thing we can do while still achieving the purpose? That is the way I approach it.

Is there a distinction between information that the analysis centre would have, which is collected by agencies of the state, be it police, CSIS, or others, and information that a broad range of Canadian citizens and institutions have the obligation to provide to try to capture illicit funds?

Does the fact that that information comes from ordinary citizens, rather than as a result of professional state agency work, change the nature or quality of the material? It seems to me you have some obligation to the people on whom the duty to provide the information is being imposed. It is of a fundamentally different quality when it comes from you, me, or someone else who has to make this report. Does the source of the information change anything about the situation?

Mr. Reid: No. If you look at the activities of the RCMP, CSIS, as well as other regulatory agencies that have powers similar to this projected agency, you will find that information that needs to be protected is well protected under the Access to Information Act. There are exceptions that provide for the protection of that information.

I should say that about one-third of our work -- perhaps more -- goes into the enforcement of various provisions of the Privacy Act to ensure that information that ought not to come out does not become public. If you were to take a look at the kinds of information that will be gathered by this new agency, and examine the exemptions as listed in the Access to Information Act, you would be hard pressed to find any piece of information considered secret that would come out. That is because the provisions of the act would protect it for the necessary period of time.

We have no problems at all working with CSIS. We have no problems at all working with the RCMP, who after all, in their day-to-day activities have information that is much broader, much deeper, and much more significant in a whole range of other areas than what this agency will be collecting and collating.

Mr. Leadbeater: The question you asked, senator, has another aspect to it that is worth mentioning. By placing this provision in Schedule II, Canadians will get the idea that they can come anonymously to this centre and say whatever they want and give whatever information. However, Canadians should remember that once the centre analyzes this information, if they feel there is a reasonable basis for the involvement of law enforcement, it will be passed on. There are no guarantees of anonymity once things gets into the criminal investigation and subsequent prosecution system.

I do not think it is fair to Canadians to give the impression at the very outset that this is an anonymous "snitch line," if you will, that they can phone in tips and never be involved subsequently. They may become involved, and they may as well know that right at the outset.

Senator Furey: Are you saying then that you would want access to the information for which they used the euphemism "for investigation analysis" at the analysis stage?

Mr. Leadbeater: We are saying that there would be an adequate exemption for the information at the analysis stage, subject to a public interest override, if the protection were to be for personal information under section 19 of the act. The information that is not related to the actual suspicion of money laundering, such as the administrative and personnel information of the institution, would also be accessible, subject to the ordinary exemptions to which all government institutions are subject.

Senator Oliver: Mr. Reid, because something is inconvenient, that should not be a justification for the denial of a fundamental right, such as the right of access to information or privacy. The document that we saw on the Internet contains remarks that you made earlier. I will quote two paragraphs and ask you to comment on them and explain them to this committee. It states the following:

We already know the Chrétien government does everything possible to block improvements to Canada's freedom of information laws. Now it wants to exclude even more government-held material from public scrutiny. The federal Information Commissioner, rightly, wants it to stop.

Farther down in the story it states that 17 years ago, some 33 agencies and departments were exempted. Now with Bill C-22 there will be 51. The article goes on to state:

Even worse, it seems the main reason for wanting the centre excluded is not to protect confidential financial records -- sufficient safeguards already exist in the access act and its corollary, the Privacy Act -- but because it would be "inconvenient" for the centre to have to respond to requests for documentation.

What do you say to that?

Mr. Reid: I say that the government has attempted to take other legislation out of the ambit of the Access to Information Act a number of times. An example I gave in my presentation was the labour legislation. My predecessor, John Grace, came to the Senate to seek to have that removed.

I also gave the example of the way in which the number of exemptions in Schedule II of the act has increased steadily at a very rapid rate. There has been an increase of almost 100 per cent in the 17 years since the act came into effect. The parliamentary committee that reviewed this said section 24 is not necessary because the exclusions in the act protect all of this information. Not only is there the abundance-of-caution argument, which Mr. Leadbeater mentioned, there is also the desire to hamstring the act in a variety of ways by removing a significant amount of information from the purview of the Information Commissioner. This is a continuing, and normal, I suppose, bureaucratic battle. I feel that it should stop. I feel that section 24 should be removed from the act and that clause 85 should be removed from this bill.

The Department of Finance has advanced no substantive argument as to why it is required. It can be "macho" reasons in saying, "I'm out and you're in." It can be an abundance-of-caution reason. It can be because I do not want to have to go through the agony that the access legislation provides for. There is no substantive reason, which is to say that there is no information that this agency will receive that is not already protected where necessary.

Senator Oliver: Your main submission, which is succinct, brief and clear, is that you would like to have clause 85 removed from Bill C-22. Do you have a proposed draft amendment or wording? Second, have you and your staff looked at any other ways in which the problem could be solved other than by complete removal?

Mr. Reid: In the first case, I have not been convinced that there is a problem. The Department of Finance has been unable to advance any substantive argument that this information and this agency will have a status higher than that of other secret and police agencies like the RCMP and CSIS. They have been unable to do that. Therefore, a simple amendment such as, "I move that clause 85 of the bill be deleted," would be satisfactory; and to report back to the other place that this clause has been deleted and to ask for their concurrence. That was the process used the last time an information commissioner came before a Senate committee.

Senator Poulin: Since the implementation of the Access to Information Act, there have been major changes in the communication field in Canada. What we consider as being private is far from being really private. This is what we see more and more of in every area. Have the new communication technologies influenced your legislation?

[English]

Mr. Reid: The new forms of communication, such as the World Wide Web, e-mail, and other forms of electronic communication are covered under our act -- not as clearly as we would like them to be, but they are covered. We take into account e-mails, for example. We take into account electronic documents created by government. Voice messages are also covered under the act, but no one has yet found a way of recording them. Decisions are often communicated using voice mail and no record of them is kept. We find a considerable amount of useful information on the Web, and that departments are increasingly using it as a means of information publication.

We have a problem with that because our act clearly refers to publications being in the Gazette or in the library depository system. However, publication on the Web is a greater source of information than the other more traditional means in many cases.

We are very conscious of the problems with electronic documentation. You know that I have complained vociferously about the collapse of the government's filing system, and we still do not have an electronic filing system in place. It is no wonder that records within the Government of Canada tend to be in a chaotic state. It makes it difficult for people to get the information that they want. It makes it difficult for departments to find that information.

[Translation]

Senator Poulin: Considering that explosion of communication technologies, is it not a real challenge for our government to balance ensuring access to information and accountability on the one hand, and the management and follow-up of information on the other hand?

Do you not think that in the spirit of Bill C-22, as Senator Kroft so well said, this balance is particularly important during the transition period? Sometimes it may be better to be overly cautious than to have a system overly accessible and open.

[English]

Mr. Reid: I agree that the question of balance is very important. However, Parliament has decided that the balance shall be met through the Privacy Act and the Access to Information Act. To further ensure that that balance is available to members of Parliament, there are two commissioners with separate mandates. In my case, I spend about 30 per cent to 35 per cent of my time enforcing the Privacy Act. Thus there is considerable balance.

Second, in terms of the activities of CSIS, the RCMP, and other enforcement and regulatory agencies, that balance has been demonstrated beyond a doubt after 17 years of experience with these two acts. I do not believe that there has ever been a case on either the privacy side or the access to information side, where the rights and needs of Canadians to have that balance has been found to be invalid. It is a wonderful record that I think goes back to the designers of the original legislation.

[Translation]

Senator Poulin: What is the main source of requests made under the Access to Information Act, to public agencies that comes under that legislation? Are those requests coming from the general public, Members of Parliament or journalists? What is the proportion of each source?

[English]

Mr. Reid: The greatest source of requests is from the business community. They make up about 40 per cent of the volume. Increasingly, however, we see requests from members of Parliament and senators climbing very rapidly. I have been told there is a study going on into where members of Parliament get their information. After the first six interviews with back-bench Liberal MPs from the House of Commons, the people conducting the study were amazed to find that they all said that the Access to Information Act was their number one method of obtaining information about government activities. Therefore, the Access to Information Act has now superseded the techniques for which I had some responsibility when I was in the House of Commons. They are seldom used now because the Access to Information Act gives citizens rights against the government. The government has an obligation to provide that information within 30 days. If they are dissatisfied with the information they have requested, and they are dissatisfied with the exclusions that the department has made, they can appeal to the Information Commissioner, who will conduct a thorough investigation. The Information Commissioner has very adequate powers to do that. It is a very good balance, in my judgment.

Senator Angus: We were told by the officials who came to brief us about the reasons for this bill, et cetera, that the principal underlying one was the need to combat organized crime. We were told it was to do our bit as a member of a group of 28 nations working together to deal with so-called "money laundering," which I refer to as sort of a folkloric term that television has created. These television definitions far exceed the definition set out in the bill.

At any rate, do you agree that the main and only purpose of this bill is to help combat organized crime on an international scale?

Mr. Reid: Yes.

Senator Angus: I was told before this briefing that there were other reasons, such as the fact that they are after tax dodgers, tax evaders, and not necessarily organized crime.

Senator Oliver: As well as the underground economy.

Mr. Reid: I am not capable of making that kind of judgment. We focused on how the act impacts on the Access to Information Act. That is my mandate. I dare not go beyond it.

Senator Angus: From what I can see, sir, you do your job very assiduously. I am happy as a citizen that you are doing it with the zeal and competence that you and your colleagues bring to it. Let us say it is a given that the principal and underlying reason for this somewhat Draconian bill is to help Canada do its bit in combating organized crime on a large scale. Do you know of other legislation or other databases that result from legislation designed to combat crime on this scale where that information would be available to the public?

Mr. Leadbeater: All the policing agencies of the federal government -- the security service, the RCMP, the policing agencies associated with the Correctional Service of Canada, the Immigration service, the Customs agencies and so forth -- all play a very vital role in the security of the nation. They all came before Parliament at the time the Access to Information Act was being proposed to say, "Don't, whatever you do, make us subject to this act because it will be the end of law enforcement." Parliament said, "No, sorry. We think we have given sufficient exemptions." They were all made subject to the act. Three years later, Parliament reviewed the act and not one law enforcement agency came before it to say that it had been crippled.

I think the experience in the law enforcement and related fields has been clear -- and this is not strictly law enforcement, it is a related field -- that this legislation does not interfere with them accomplishing their programs. At the same time, it gives the public a window into what they do.

Senator Angus: It is but an opaque window.

Mr. Reid: Yes, because the information that is important to the ongoing business of a regulatory department, the police, or CSIS is protected under the act. That is why we find it very difficult to understand why this agency is superior to all of the other agencies of government that handle confidential and important information such that it should have a special exemption.

Senator Angus: That was going to be my next question. It seems to flow from your written material and from your statement that you believe that the powers that be could carry out their intentions under this bill without clause 85.

Mr. Reid: Yes. As I say, they have been unable to advance a substantive argument as to why clause 85 is vital to the functioning of this agency.

Senator Angus: Is there any other element in this bill that offends you in terms of your mandate?

Mr. Reid: No, this is the only clause. I look upon this as part of a continuing attack.

Senator Angus: That is what worries me. I would rather hear you say that this specific bill is highly offensive. As my colleague, Senator Oliver, indicated, it appears that the present government is running roughshod over these main precepts of the privacy laws of the country. I think, therefore, that my staff and I will look more deeply into that.

However, I refer specifically to this bill, which is receiving a fair amount of international attention. We are told that it is urgent, that Canada is the last of 28 countries to do it, and that we had better hurry up and get this on the books. Now we find that that it is not quite accurate, that Canada already has quite good teeth in its criminals laws, et cetera. If we enact this bill, not only will we be one of 28 countries that have done something, but we will probably have gone beyond what those other countries have done. We are waiting for a chart from officials that will set out a comparison of all these elements, to see whether our government is asking us to go way beyond what the other 27 countries have done.

Mr. Reid: I can assure you that I believe that all the other information that is collected under other acts of Parliament is subject to the Access to Information Act.

Senator Angus: You have made that clear, and I was not fully aware of that. That includes the CSIS legislation and our main criminal statutes, but conditionally, of course.

Mr. Reid: Yes, because there are exemptions.

Senator Angus: Yes, and you folks bring the balance to it.

In preparing for today and examining Bill C-22, have you had occasion to look at laws of this nature in other countries to see whether they go beyond what you think is reasonable?

Mr. Reid: No, we have not.

Senator Angus: You cannot tell us that Canada will be more Draconian than other countries if we enact this bill?

Mr. Reid: We cannot make that judgment.

Senator Kroft: Perhaps Mr. Reid's answer obviates the need for my question. However, I am also interested in how we are doing compared with other countries.

Yesterday, we heard from a senior official from Belgium who had broad experience in the organization of this kind of legislation internationally. He also said that he was a professor of comparative law and would speak wearing that hat too.

When we asked him how this bill compared with laws internationally, he said that it was more "protective," I believe was the word he used, and that it went further than other legislation he had seen toward protecting the interests of citizens.

Senator Oliver: He did not say that. That is not accurate.

Senator Kroft: I think that if you check the transcript, you will find that he did.

Senator Oliver: He did not say that.

Senator Tkachuk: That is a nice spin.

The Chairman: I think he did say that, but I will have to check the transcript.

Senator Kroft: I invite you to look at the transcript and see what your reaction is to see what he said.

Senator Tkachuk: Belgium has always been a great example for us to follow and we should get right on it.

Since it was our government that passed both the Privacy Act and the Access to Information Act, we on our side feel a strong responsibility to protect that legislation. A number of issues were raised by the Privacy Commissioner yesterday that caused us great concern. Of course, you raise others today.

On page 3 of your brief you mention the black hole of secrecy that will be created if clause 85 is allowed to stand. You said that it could, for example, be a basis for refusal to disclose audits of the effectiveness of the centre's operation.

Could you expand on that? To what audits do you refer?

Mr. Reid: Generally speaking, one of the management tools we have seen develop over the last few years is an audit of programs to ensure that delivery is proper, that you have the right resources, and that the administration is up to scratch. These audits are, according Treasury Board, to be posted on a Web site, and the draft audits have been accessible for some time under Access to Information legislation. With the kind of exemption contained in this bill, it could be legitimately argued that those audits will no longer available, only a report on the administration of the program.

Senator Tkachuk: I believe this bill provides for one parliamentary review in five years, and then Parliament never reviews it again unless the government passes another bill or amends the act. Are you saying that audits will not necessarily be done, or that they will not be revealed?

Mr. Reid: I cannot say whether they would be done, but if they were, they would not have to be revealed according to this clause.

Senator Tkachuk: If someone asks for information about an issue in a department that is being dealt with in this centre, can that be used as an excuse not to give access to the information? They will be getting information from tens of thousands of people across Canada.

Mr. Reid: If the department controls the information, under this bill, it cannot come out. Also, if that information is in the hands of someone else because it is owned by this department, it will not come out. It would probably also be protected under the Access to Information Act, but in this case, because it is taken out of the act, it is an absolute prohibition.

Senator Poulin: Do you not believe, Mr. Reid, that there is a fundamental difference between this centre, CSIS, and the RCMP in terms of the fragility of information that could be accessed through the bill?

Mr. Reid: In a hierarchy, I would say that CSIS has by far the most sensitive and wide-ranging information, with the RCMP ranking second and this agency third. It does have significant privacy implications. However, the Privacy Act protects much of that information.

I do not see a particular conflict between the Access to Information Act and this agency, because we have had plenty of opportunity over the last 17 years to work out these differences, difficulties, and problems with the agencies that have sensitive and important information. This is the new boy on the block, and it would fit into the already existing practices.

Senator Angus: Did you say that CSIS was first on the spectrum of sensitivity?

Mr. Reid: Yes.

The Chairman: Thank you very much, gentlemen. We appreciate your being here.

I call the next group of witnesses from the Canadian Bar Association. I would like to welcome Ms Tamra L. Thomson and Mr. Greg DelBigio.

Ms Tamra L. Thomson, Director, Legislation and Law Reform, Canadian Bar Association: Mr. Chairman, the Canadian Bar Association is pleased to be able to present its commentary on Bill C-22 today. The Canadian Bar Association is a national association, representing over 36,000 lawyers in all aspects of practice in all areas of the country.

Amongst our primary objectives are improvement in the law, and improvement in the administration of justice. It is from that optic that we make our views known today.

You have received a copy of our submission, as well as a covering letter that addresses some amendments that were made in the other place after we had made our submissions to that committee.

I will ask Mr. DelBigio to address the substance of our concerns with this bill. Mr. DelBigio is a member of the criminal justice section and past Chair of the Vancouver group in that section of the CBA.

Mr. Greg DelBigio, Canadian Bar Association: The Canadian Bar Association expresses two general concerns in its final submission on this bill.

We are concerned about the way in which this bill might interfere with legitimate business activity. I will not dwell upon that today, as it is set out in our submission.

More important, the CBA is concerned about the way in which this bill will interfere with the lawyer-client relationship, in particular, with respect to privilege and confidentiality, which are both essential to that relationship.

As some of you may know, privilege and confidentiality are related but distinct concepts. Both protect information that lawyers receive from clients.

Confidentiality is of course an ethical duty. It is a duty that prohibits lawyers from disclosing information received in their professional capacity to others.

Privilege is a narrower concept. Privilege belongs to the client. Once again, however, the lawyer is prohibited from disclosing that kind of information.

It is the position of the Canadian Bar Association that this bill undermines and erodes the lawyer-client relationship, which is different from any other existing professional relationship. That difference is recognized in law. It is a difference that must be maintained, and that is threatened by this bill.

It is the position of the CBA that there is little doubt that the objectives of this bill are the deterrence of crime and the enforcement of criminal law, and perhaps in particular, the deterrence of organized crime as it relates to money laundering. When considering the bill, it is important to bear in mind existing law, in particular, Part XII.2 of the Criminal Code. That is the existing money laundering legislation, which provides a very comprehensive scheme, including offence-, search-, and forfeiture-related provisions. There are also special provisions within the Criminal Code dealing with organized crime -- for example, the wire tap and penalty provisions.

I say this to illustrate that the topics that are covered by the bill already exist within the Criminal Code in many respects. Is Bill C-20 as it pertains specifically to lawyers necessary? Is there a current void within the Criminal Code that needs to be filled? It is the position of the Canadian Bar Association that the answer to those questions is a simply stated no.

The existing laws deal effectively with money laundering and organized crime. Even if it is necessary for the bill to become law, it is not necessary for lawyers to be included as they now are.

The bill will require that lawyers fundamentally alter their relationship with their clients. In some instances, it will require that information be passed from the lawyer to the agency, and that that passage of information be kept secret from the client.

Uncertainty about the meaning of the term "suspicious" might lead to over-reporting. In other words, in the face of that uncertainty, it might well be that lawyers will err on the side of reporting rather than not reporting. More information may be collected than is absolutely necessary.

I am fully aware of the privilege protection contained in the bill, but again, it is different from confidentiality. That does not protect confidentiality in any way.

We have very specific concerns about the compliance measures and the ability to enter to law offices to search for and collect information. There is a similar provision in section 488.1 of the Criminal Code, which deals with the search of law offices. That has come under constitutional attack in Alberta, British Columbia, and Ontario. In all but one case, section 488.1 has been found to be unconstitutional.

That is because it does not adequately protect the privilege, which belongs to the client. In many respects, the provisions within the bill match, or mirror, section 488.1. The Canadian Bar Association is concerned that, for reasons very similar those already found by the courts, privilege is not protected. Privilege can be lost through inaction on the part of a lawyer and that then destroys the client's interest.

Senator Kelleher: I am not sure that I have everything completely straight and I want to confirm a few things with you. As I understand it, after the initial information has been given to the centre and they decide that further research is required, the centre can, under clause 62 of this bill, go to the lawyer's office and demand to see records and information that are stored on computers, et cetera. Then, as I understand it, under clause 64(2), the lawyer has the right to claim solicitor-client privilege with respect to those documents. That does not help much because it gives that lawyer the right to have the documents sealed. Then, under clause 64(4), the lawyer has the right, within 14 days I believe, to go to court at his client's expense to try to prove solicitor-client privilege. In other words, I sense that the onus has been shifted. If I want to claim solicitor-client privilege, then I have to go to court and bear the expense of proving it. Is that correct?

Mr. DelBigio: That is correct, and that is the precise concern -- inaction on the part of the lawyer will result in the loss of privilege. Once again, the privilege belongs to the client, not the lawyer. Inaction, either by failing to claim privilege at the outset, or through failure to act within the 14 days, will result in the loss of privilege. That is precisely why the courts found section 488 of the Criminal Code, in relation to the search of law offices, to be a failure.

Senator Kelleher: What have common law jurisdictions similar to Canada's, such as Britain and the United States, done about this problem? Have their lawyers, under similar legislation -- and we are the last to enact such legislation -- had the same problem of losing solicitor-client privilege?

Mr. DelBigio: I am afraid I cannot give you a comprehensive answer to that question, senator. I can only give you a partial one. First, it is important to keep in mind the demands of Canada's Constitution. That distinguishes Canada from Britain and from the United States. My understanding, and I stand to be corrected, is that in the United States, different states have different protections against the search of law offices.

Senator Kelleher: I think it is fair to say, from what I understand, that the government is somewhat anxious to have this legislation passed before we adjourn for the summer, if at all possible. The senate regularly encounters that at this time of year.

Would it be possible for the Canadian Bar Association to do a little research on this and get back to us around the first of next week? Let us know how Britain and the United States have handled this question. Obviously, their legislation has been in effect for a number of years. Why should we "reinvent the wheel," so to speak? This must have been a problem for them, and somehow they have dealt with it. They are quite law-abiding countries and it might be helpful to see what they have done.

Mr. DelBigio: We will attempt to put together some information for you, although a comprehensive legal brief of comparative law might not be possible within a week.

Senator Kroft: This is a direct follow-up to Senator Kelleher's question on the issue of where the burden of responsibility to establish the privilege lies. Can you tell us how the current proposal compares with what exists now under our Income Tax Act?

Mr. DelBigio: I am afraid that I cannot give you an immediate answer on that.

Senator Kroft: I should tell you that my understanding is that the proposal is the same as what is currently the practice under the Income Tax Act. I would like to know if I am correct.

Senator Kelleher: From my knowledge, you are probably correct. However, I think the difference, if I may suggest, is that under the Income Tax Act, a person supplies the information himself when filing his tax return. Therefore, he must bear some responsibility for his own acts. In this particular case, we have third parties.

Senator Kroft: I am talking about the narrow issue of privilege.

Senator Kelleher: I think you are correct, Senator Kroft.

Mr. DelBigio: It is important to recognize that there is a distinction drawn within the Income Tax Act between audits and special investigations. Special investigations are more akin to a criminal prosecution. The objectives of the bill are very much criminal rather than regulatory. The special investigation is to deter and detect criminal activity, in particular, organized crime. In considering the safeguards that are necessary, it is important to have regard for that background and those objectives.

Senator Furey: My question concerns the mass of information that will be gathered on private citizens who will ultimately be found innocent of any criminal behaviour. The way that the bill is set up now, there is no mechanism for notifying any of those people that they were ever under investigation. Has the Canadian Bar Association taken a position on this?

Mr. DelBigio: We have not addressed that specifically. There is a concern about the collection of information and about its subsequent use. There is a concern about information that is collected in private, although the Canadian Bar Association has not specifically addressed that in the submission.

Senator Furey: Do you feel that ordinary Canadian citizens who have done no wrong, and have been investigated, have a right to know that?

Mr. DelBigio: We are sensitive to the needs of the police to sometimes conduct investigations without the target of the investigation being aware of it. However, the greater concern of the Canadian Bar Association is, again, the risk of reporting much too much information to the agency because lawyers are protecting themselves in the face of uncertainty. The lawyer could potentially wash his or her hands by saying, "I have done my job, now let the agency treat the information as they see fit."

Senator Furey: At what point do you think that the poor citizens who do not know that they are under investigation should be informed in order that they can seek legal counsel?

No matter what this called, whatever euphemisms are used, a criminal investigation is being conducted.

Mr. DelBigio: Yes, as it now exists, and certainly with the section on exception of obstructing a criminal investigation. Currently, if a lawyer becomes aware that a client is the target of a criminal investigation, there is nothing that would prohibit that information regarding obstruction of justice laws from being disclosed.

Senator Furey: We are hearing a lot on that topic these days. T

Senator Oliver: Is it the position of the Canadian Bar Association that some provisions of this bill are ultra vires? To refresh your memory, you state in your brief:

Bill C-22 imposes significantly intrusive regulation upon businesses, financial institutions and professionals, including the legal profession, to the extent that we believe it may be ultra vires of Parliament.

Is that your position today?

Mr. DelBigio: Yes, it is.

Senator Oliver: What, if anything, are you recommending be done about the ultra vires nature of this bill?

Mr. DelBigio: It is our position that a bill like this inextricably combines business interests with criminal investigations. That separation needs to be made. The bill cannot purport to both regulate business and business interests and conduct criminal investigations at the same time.

Senator Oliver: You referred to clause 11 of the bill. I have asked a number of witnesses about the language of that clause regarding solicitor-client privilege. It states:

Nothing in this Part requires a legal counsel to disclose any communication that is subject to solicitor-client privilege.

The word "communication" is key. To me that word does not mean activity; it does not mean transaction, such as in subclause 9(1), nor does it mean confidentiality, as you have stated.

What could we do to strengthen clause 11 to afford the protections that the Canadian Bar Association feels need to be extended? I am thinking about what language we could use to strengthen clause 11 of this bill to overcome the weaknesses of the word "communication".

Mr. DelBigio: We would prefer not to have such a limited remedy. Our first position is that lawyers should be exempt from the bill. Second, if that is not done, privileged information should extend beyond mere communication and should include transactions. Third, recognition should be given to the importance of the ethical duty of confidentiality. Fourth, intrusion into law offices should take place only with a warrant, and only in a way that properly protects privilege and confidentiality. That might be done through mandatory provisions that give notice to third parties, the clients.

Part XII.2 of the Criminal Code provides for third-party notice. That concept is not foreign to existing criminal law.

Senator Oliver: Do you have wording or draft amendments to give effect to the suggestions that you have just made to assist us in our deliberations?

Mr. DelBigio: We do not have them now, but we would be happy to provide them.

Senator Oliver: My final question relates to what some people have referred to as the low thresholds for disclosure, the $10,000 figure. You are a criminal lawyer. There is certainly much confidentiality involved in routine commercial transactions conducted by corporate lawyers, for example, in a new public issue. Many things have to be kept confidential for a time before they become public.

Are you concerned about the low threshold in this bill? Do you think that that will inhibit activities that come to lawyers' offices on a routine and regular basis?

Mr. DelBigio: We are very much concerned with the low threshold. The threshold could best be determined through consultation with people who are engaged in commercial transactions. Ten thousand dollars would seem to capture far too many transactions.

Senator Angus: On the issue of constitutionality, Mr. DelBigio, you indicated that section 488.1 of the Criminal Code is essentially identical to the provisions in this draft legislation?

Mr. DelBigio: It is not identical, but it is very similar.

Senator Angus: I believe you quoted some jurisprudence to the effect that section 488.1 has already been held by certain courts in Canada to be ultra vires, as breaching the fundamental rights of solicitor-client privilege and the ethical standards of confidentiality. Is that correct?

Mr. DelBigio: That is correct.

Senator Angus: In your knowledge as a practitioner, have there been any further attempts by enforcement agencies to rely on section 488.1 since those decisions were rendered by the courts?

Mr. DelBigio: I cannot answer that question with certainty, senator. To my knowledge, limited as it might be, no law office searches have been conducted since it was struck down.

Senator Angus: Since some courts have effectively struck it down, it is a very fine precedent upon which to rely. Despite your excellent testimony, if the government decides to go forward with this bill as drafted, in your view, one could raise the court decision as a defence. A lawyer who was searched, or was asked to comply with the provisions of this proposed legislation, could say, "Sorry, it is unconstitutional and to heck with you," right? Is that your position?

Mr. DelBigio: Yes, that is our position. This would fail for the same reasons that section 488.1 of the Criminal Code failed. It is my understanding that in the Alberta case, which is called Lavallee, leave is being sought to go to the Supreme Court of Canada. Leave applications have been filed.

Senator Angus: When you supply us with this other information for which we asked, in particular the proposed amendments that you feel would do the trick, can you give us these citations? The citation on the case where they are seeking leave to go to the Supreme Court would be helpful.

I understand that whereas there may be other elements of the bill that would be of interest, and maybe not pleasing elements, to the Canadian Bar Association, you are here today only on the point of privilege?

Mr. DelBigio: Our main concern is that of privilege.

Senator Oliver: Does that include confidentiality?

Mr. DelBigio: That is correct.

Senator Angus: Do they go together?

Mr. DelBigio: We have broader concerns. We are very much concerned with the easy flow of information to the agency and then to law enforcement. Although there is a provision that states that the agency operates at arm's-length from law enforcement agencies, in fact the wording permits a very large and easy flow of information. As it applies to lawyers, it means that it is potentially very quickly out of the law office into the agency, and into the hands of the RCMP or other appropriate law enforcement.

Senator Angus: Perhaps the information would reach law enforcement agencies in Switzerland, or somewhere else?

Mr. DelBigio: Yes, that is exactly it.

Senator Angus: In any event, I think that you have made your point well, and certainly the Canadian Bar Association does an excellent job of monitoring the bill and bringing these potentially unconstitutional provisions to the attention of Parliament before they become law. I think that is great, and I am sure we will take what you have said into account.

May I ask you another question? I detected a sensitivity in your evidence to the need of the "state" to have certain special powers to combat the evils of organized crime, both domestically and internationally. From that, I gathered that perhaps the general spirit of the bill is not anathema to the CBA. Is that right?

Mr. DelBigio: There is no doubt that money laundering and organized crime exist. There is also no doubt that law enforcement would be more effective with a police officer on every corner, with powers that would permit every police officer to search every person's automobile without warrant or reasonable grounds. That is going to make for more effective law enforcement. Additionally, compelling law offices to disclose information will make for potentially more effective law enforcement.

The first question is, is it necessary? The second question is, is it constitutionally acceptable? The Canadian Bar Association says that the intent and objectives of the bill will not be undermined if lawyers are exempt, and in any event, it is not permissible to include lawyers.

Senator Angus: You have presaged the second question. The first question was, is it legal and is it constitutional? You say no. I was going to ask you if it is it necessary to have this illegal provision to make the bill effective. You said no to that as well.

Mr. DelBigio: Yes.

Senator Angus: That seems to cover the waterfront. Thank you very much.

Mr. DelBigio: In the litigation that has occurred, the law societies of Alberta, British Columbia, and Ontario in a Court of Appeal case that will be proceeding, have intervened and have agreed that section 488.1 is unconstitutional.

Ms Thomson: Just to note, please, that the citations for all of the cases that we have mentioned in our oral presentation today are found in our submission. For the Lavallee decision, in particular, the citation is at page 5 of the English brief and page 6 of the French brief.

Senator Tkachuk: When the department officials came before us, they left the impression that we were far behind the rest of the world in attending to the problems of money laundering, but in reality we have had laws to that effect for quite some time, actually even before Belgium had them. I was shocked. They said yesterday that laws against money laundering were passed in 1990, and before that there were none, but in reality we have had quite effective laws, as you stated.

To help me understand the philosophy behind this bill, I will be more specific. Presently, if a lawyer has a client who is participating in an illegal act, he has the responsibility to report that, does he not?

Mr. DelBigio: There is certainly a responsibility to not participate in that act. I would say there is disagreement as to when it becomes mandatory to report an illegal act. Some say that the mandatory reporting of an illegal act occurs when there is an imminent threat of bodily harm. Smith v. Jones in the Supreme Court of Canada discussed these issues. It might not be necessary to report the theft of a chocolate bar, but it would certainly be necessary to report a contemplated murder.

Senator Tkachuk: If a financial institution believes that someone is acting illegally, do they not presently have an obligation to report it? In other words, I believe the law now provides that if someone brings in over $10,000 in cash, financial institutions must report that for government records, but I am not sure to whom it should be reported.

Mr. DelBigio: Yes. There is a record-keeping scheme now in place. Indeed, I understand financial institutions are vigilant in knowing their customers and not participating in financial transactions that they regard as not in keeping with the standards of their institution.

The Chairman: Could you clarify that, please? Is that not a voluntary reporting system?

Mr. DelBigio: Is it voluntary?

The Chairman: Yes.

Mr. DelBigio: There is a scheme in place such that transactions in excess of $10,000 must be reported. That is my understanding.

The Chairman: I do not think so, but please proceed.

Senator Tkachuk: If a bank, financial institution, law office, or accounting office is caught participating in money laundering, they are also liable to prosecution under the present legislation?

Mr. DelBigio: Absolutely. The current definition of money laundering in the Criminal Code is very broad and will capture all kinds of transactions in which lawyers, accountants and banks might engage. There is already a scheme under which certain persons engaged in certain financial transactions can be prosecuted.

Senator Tkachuk: Therefore, this bill is not so much to make laws for the prosecution of criminals who are taking part in money laundering, because we already have laws that encompass everyone -- if you get involved in such an activity, you run the risk of being arrested and charged. Actually, the bill is for the purpose of allowing them to know all of your business so that they can make a decision, rather than you making the decision. Is that not really what they seem to be doing in this bill?

Mr. DelBigio: It is a much easier means of collecting a great deal of data upon which a prosecution might follow.

The Chairman: Our last witnesses today are from the Canadian Institute of Chartered Accountants. Welcome, gentlemen.

Mr. Ian Murray, Chairman, Advisory Group on Anti-Money Laundering Legislation, Canadian Institute of Chartered Accountants: Mr. Chairman, on behalf of the Canadian Institute of Chartered Accountants, we would like to thank you for allowing us to be here today to provide comments on the government's bill to combat money laundering.

I am a partner in the firm of KPMG and I chair the advisory group established by the CICA to examine this bill. With me today is Simon Chester, who is legal counsel to the CICA.

The CICA submitted a brief to the Department of Finance in February that commented on the government's consultation paper that preceded Bill C-22. As the basis for that submission, the CICA drew on the work of an advisory group that reviewed the consultation paper along with the draft legislation and regulations. Our brief broadly supported the bill, but we believed, and still believe, that it would benefit from some changes.

Our submission dealt with five areas that we want to focus on today -- narrowing the scope of the bill; defining "suspicious transaction"; avoiding the duplication of reporting requirements; restricting powers of access to records; and broadening available defences and safeguards.

I will speak first to the scope of bill. I would like to repeat at the outset that the CICA supports the government's bill and its focus on financial intermediaries. We recognize the importance of having an effective international regime to outlaw money laundering. We believe that financial intermediaries who have direct involvement in financial transactions should take primary responsibility for reporting suspicious transactions.

We accept that when a chartered accountant acts as a financial intermediary, he or she should have the same reporting responsibilities as other financial intermediaries. We understand that the bill is only intended to apply to professionals such as CAs when they are directly involved in a financial transaction -- for example, CAs who handle cash for clients or are in a general management position in a company.

That focus is appropriate. Such CAs should know where they stand. However, focus also means clarity, and clarity implies limits.

We understand that the reporting requirements of the bill are not intended to apply to those who are not directly involved in financial transactions within their companies -- for example, internal auditors, strategic planners, tax accountants, and assistant managers. The reporting requirements are not intended to apply to CAs acting in an advisory capacity -- essentially those who act in a third party role providing services to clients -- such as auditors, forensic accountants, management consultants, business evaluators, and tax advisers.

Notwithstanding this intention, we are concerned that the wording of the bill and the government's agreed-upon regulations could be interpreted to suggest that the profession as a whole could be subject to these provisions. Paragraph 5(i) provides for Part 1 of the bill to apply to persons engaged in a business profession or activity described in the regulations.

An existing regulation, which we understand will be retained, indicates that the act applies to "every person who is engaged in a business, profession or activity in the course of which cash is received for payment or transfer to a third party." We are concerned that this wording is too broad. It is not clear that the bill would apply just to those individuals who are directly involved in such transactions. It could be interpreted to apply also to all individuals who belong to a business or profession in which some individuals may engage in such transactions.

Our concern is exacerbated by wording contained in clause 7 of the bill that requires the reporting by persons or entities of suspicious transactions that occur in the course of their activities. We believe that this wording is so open-ended that it does not limit the reporting requirement to professional accountants who are directly involved in financial transactions.

The net would extend far beyond that.

We are concerned that the broad wording of the existing regulation, taken together with clause 7, could be interpreted as applying the reporting requirements much more broadly to the accounting profession as a whole.

Let me give a simple example. A forensic accountant is asked to assist a client in investigating their involvement in potentially suspicious circumstances. Any forensic accountant would be placed in a position of conflict between assisting the client and reporting to the centre, and may have to decline the engagement. The client would be deprived of needed assistance. There are many other situations where, in the absence of clarification, CAs could be drawn into the web of reporting requirements.

We think that the needed clarification should fall within the bill itself. However, we recognize the realities of the legislative timetable. If amendments are not possible, clarification should be made by regulation.

In that regard, we note that the bill includes a provision under paragraph 5(j) allowing for regulations to be made that limit the application of Part 1 to defined activities of businesses and professions. We think that a regulation under that clause should contain the following wording:

Part 1 of the Act applies to every professional accountant, who, in the course of engaging in a business or profession, receives cash for payment or transfer to a third party.

We believe that the focus, the intended subjects of the bill, should be determined by activity, not status, and not by the nature or title of our profession, but by the activities in which we are involved.

This change would make it clear that the bill will apply only to those directly involved in financial transactions. In this regard, we note the assurance provided by senior officials of the Department of Finance during the Finance Committee hearings on Bill C-22. Officials clarified that it is the government's intention to ensure that the bill only applies to professionals acting as financial intermediaries.

Officials also confirmed during those hearings that, "The regulations will indicate very clearly that the reporting obligations will not apply to the auditing function of the accounting profession."

We understand that officials are working on amendments in response to commitments made during the hearings, and that further consultation with stakeholders is planned. However, we do not know whether clarifications to the bill will be made.

We have not seen the amendments to date. We strongly reiterate the need to make changes that clarify how our profession will fit within the requirements of this bill.

The definition of "suspicious transaction" is my next topic. Of significant concern is that neither the bill nor the regulations contains a definition. The success of the mandatory reporting regime will depend on the extent to which clear and unambiguous criteria can be developed.

In the absence of this criteria, there will be overreaching and inconsistent reporting, because all professionals will have to make an important judgment call on what they believe to be suspicious. Although the reporting centre will develop guidelines to help identify appropriate characteristics and circumstances, they will not have the force of law. We think clarity belongs in the law, not in guidelines.

We recommend that the regulations contain a prescribed definition of suspicious transaction, one that sets out clear criteria. As a clear, unambiguous definition of a suspicious transaction is a tall order, it should be supported by examples and case studies to illustrate when reporting something required and when it is not.

The Chairman: Excuse me, have you taken a crack at the definition?

Mr. Murray: We have not attempted to do that. However, we have indicated our willingness to work with members of the department to assist in that process.

The Chairman: I think all of us probably have some trouble with actually zeroing in on a clear definition. I have tried to do it, but it is a little bit like beauty -- it is in the eye of the beholder, which is, I guess, what "suspicious" means. Please let us know if you come up with some bright ideas.

Mr. Murray: We will certainly be pleased to do that.

The Chairman: Thank you.

Mr. Murray: Should interim guidelines be put in place for any reason, they should ultimately be included in the regulations so that they are subject to public scrutiny and input and have the force of law.

Furthermore, we recommend that the effective date for commencement of reporting of suspicious transactions be deferred until criteria have been established and examples developed.

The third issue is duplication of reporting requirements. We are also concerned that the bill is unclear about professionals such as CAs who may be working for entities specifically covered under clause 5, and who are directly involved in financial transactions. On the one hand, such CAs have a reporting role as an employee working in an entity covered by the proposed legislation. On the other hand, they have a responsibility as professional accountants to report suspicious transactions.

This is confusing, and would appear to be a duplication of the reporting requirement that applies only to individuals who happen to be both employees of such entities and professional accountants.

Should such an individual report to their supervisor, they are protected by subclause 75(2) from punishment as an employee. However, they could still be open to punishment for failing to report to the centre as a professional accountant. We believe that the protections afforded the employee should clearly apply to protect the CA -- the same person -- in such situations.

The fourth issue is restricting the powers of access. The compliance measures in clauses 62 to 65 allow an authorized official from the reporting centre to examine the records and inquire into the business and affairs of any person or entity referred to in clause 5 for the purpose of ensuring compliance. We are concerned that even if Part 1 is amended to restrict its scope to financial intermediaries, these provisions appear to be very broad powers allowing access to all records -- not just those relating to financial intermediation activities -- without a warrant.

We therefore recommend that the bill be clarified to restrict the powers of access to only those records that relate to financial intermediation activities. We also think that such access should be allowed only under authorization of a warrant.

Our last point is on defences and safeguards. We would like to make some comments about the defences and protections available under Part 5 of the bill.

Other jurisdictions include a defence for "reasonable excuse," for example, where the fear of physical violence or other menaces make it unreasonable for someone to report or to refuse to act for a client. There may be circumstances where third parties may be able to deduce the source that gave rise to an investigation. While there may be certain defences under common law similar to reasonable excuse, this defence is not available under the bill.

We are also concerned that the bill does not provide protection or remedies to those who lose their jobs as a result of making a report in good faith. Furthermore, the bill is not clear as to how to deal with situations where the bill conflicts with other legislation requiring confidentiality, such as the Quebec Charter of Rights and Freedoms.

We recommend that a reasonable excuse defence be included in the bill, along with additional protections for those who report.

Last, we recommend that the bill be amended to deal with situations where the bill conflicts with other statutes requiring confidentiality.

In closing, let me stress again that we support the intent of this bill when applied to those who are directly involved in financial intermediary transactions. However, we believe that the wording of the bill lacks clarity in prescribing who within the CA profession must report. We believe this is a significant problem, and strongly encourage you to clarify the activities to which the bill would apply for the CA profession.

We also strongly urge to you include a clear, unambiguous definition of suspicious transaction in the bill so that those with the obligation to report apply consistent criteria.

We would be pleased to answer any questions.

Senator Fitzpatrick: I want to follow up on the chairman's remarks regarding the definition of suspicious transaction. The CICA indicated that they would be happy to advise or consult with the department. If I may, Mr. Chairman, it might be helpful if you could provide a list of guidelines. Presumably, with your experience, you would have some idea of cases or situations that would be of a suspicious nature.

I believe, Mr. Chairman, that prior to the drafting of the regulations, it would be helpful to have a submission, should they be prepared to do that.

Mr. Murray: We are pleased to try to do that. I think the department has clearly gathered some examples of what other jurisdictions are doing and so have developed some best practices, which is not easy to do. Nevertheless, they have started that process. The best process, I suggest, would be to collaborate with them in that regard so as not to duplicate efforts.

Senator Fitzpatrick: Well, we are a bit like you, I guess. We have not seen any of that so far. We either get a list from you or a list from the department. In that way, we know what we are looking at.

Mr. Murray: If we could get something from the department to start the ball rolling, we would be happy to look at that and provide guidance on it.

Senator Angus: The words, "We are sensitive to the legislative timetable" seem to me to have no place in your submission. I would rather that you tell us what, in your opinion, is the best thing to do to fix this bill. In other words, are you saying, "Could you do some regulations, " for the lack of anything better?

At the beginning of these hearings, our chairman was heard to say that there are too many regulations and it is very difficult to supervise them. These regulations arrive and then they are a fait accompli. There is almost a lack of accountability in the process. I wonder how much of a compromise that is. Do you feel strongly enough about the excellent points that you have made that you would like to see this bill amended in substance?

Mr. Murray: I think that we would like to see -- and I will let Mr. Chester comment as well -- the narrowness of the scope addressed. We understand that it is being addressed, although we have not seen the wording. The definition of "suspicious transaction" is the other major issue, and we would have a concern if the proposed legislation and regulations went forward without attempting to provide some clarity on that issue. That could result in widespread confusion. If the bill is to be successful, it must come up with some clarity on the definition of suspicious transaction. We acknowledge that it is very difficult, but we think there should be some guidance on this issue in the proposed legislation or regulations.

Mr. Simon Chester, Legal Counsel, Canadian Institute of Chartered Accountants: Could we have participated willingly and openly with the department in discussing these matters over some months? It was a couple of months ago that we were testifying before the House of Commons Finance Committee, and there seemed to be agreement from the officials who were testifying at that time that it was not their intention that the bill be applied so broadly and that there would be amendments. When we stated that we were sensitive to the realities of the legislative timetable, we were simply reflecting statements made by ministerial officials and others that Canada has an obligation, under the international regime, to come forward. Essentially, we would redefine the policy, and if that was not possible within the bill itself, then it would necessarily be done in the regulations. We would have been comforted if we had seen some wording at this point.

Obviously, we have the commitments made in testimony before the House Finance Committee and we are comfortable in relying on those. At the end of the day, could this bill be improved? Yes, we believe it could. Could it be clearer? Yes. If we are given a choice between clarification, and regulations with no clarification at all, we will go for that, but our preference would clearly be for the bill itself to be clarified.

Senator Angus: Mr. Murray, we understand you to be with KPMG, which is a large, international accounting firm. My question is in the context of Mr. Chester's interpretation of what the officials said, that Canada has a commitment to 27 other countries, with which it is working cooperatively to fight organized crime, to do something along the lines of this bill. As a professional CA at KPMG, have you checked back through your network to see which other countries in fact have brought in such provisions that would so impact on your profession?

Mr. Murray: Yes, we helped on that. For example, the U.K. does have similar legislation, although it is our understanding that it is not quite as broad as what is proposed here. That legislation has been in place for a couple of years now. One of the challenges in the U.K. is the definition of suspicious transaction. It is an evolving situation and they are trying to come up with a better definition as they go along, based on experience. That is one example of a jurisdiction with similar legislation in place.

Senator Angus: However, it is not as far-reaching.

Mr. Murray: I do not think that it is. I am not sure that I can quote specifically, but it is more restricted to certain illegal activities such as drug trafficking, et cetera. It is not quite as broad, but it does have a similar reporting requirement.

Senator Angus: What about in the U.S.?

Mr. Murray: My understanding is that they do not have similar legislation in place at this time.

Mr. Chester: They have other comprehensive legislation dealing with money laundering that gives their federal authorities some of the tools that this agency would have under this bill. However, there is nothing exactly comparable.

Senator Angus: We have all been coming at it from different angles to try to find out just how far behind Canada really is -- how late we are coming to the party -- in a cooperative effort to combat this kind of organized crime, particularly drug dealing. You are here today as representatives of the CICA, so I would like you to take my question in the context of how the bill impacts your profession. Based on your own knowledge and research, to what extent does this seem to represent the most onerous provisions that you have seen, or does it?

Mr. Chester: We have not done an exhaustive comparative review. I can say that the circumstances under which chartered accountants act as financial intermediaries is relatively small. There will be situations, for example, when an accountant is acting as a trustee in bankruptcy or in a management capacity within a corporation, when they would be actively involved in financial transactions -- I am not qualifying them as suspicious or otherwise. The vast majority of the activities of the CA profession, whether that be auditing, providing tax or strategic advice, forensic accounting, or consulting, are nowhere near suspicious circumstances involving reportable transactions. We felt that it was important to clarify that this bill properly impacts upon the CA profession when people are acting as financial intermediaries.

Senator Angus: Those are financial intermediaries who actually handle the money?

Mr. Chester: If those people are playing an active role, absolutely they should be reporting.

Senator Angus: Could you give me examples of some circumstances where they would be handling the cash?

Mr. Murray: Yes. Our insolvency practitioners, for example, would be handling trust funds. They would be authorizing the release of funds, receiving and disbursing funds. That is one example within the profession.

Senator Angus: I believe I saw you at the back of the room when the people from the Canadian Bar Association were here. They were commenting earlier. One of the concerns that they expressed was about a sizeable law firm. You folks are now getting into this multi-disciplinary world, I am told. I read that in The Globe and Mail.

Mr. Chester: I am a partner in the firm of McMillan Binch. I am in that situation.

Senator Angus: You know what I am talking about then.

Mr. Chester: Yes.

Senator Angus: Let us take the example of Ernst & Young, which is a major member of the CICA. They have some 2,900 lawyers worldwide at the present time. I think some of the things that our friends from the Canadian Bar Association said would apply to an accounting firm involved in multi-disciplinary activities.

You could be wearing the two hats. Do you folks feel the same way as the lawyers? If the authorities knocked on the door and demanded all the documents, would you feel constrained at that point to say that it is unconstitutional and buzz off?

Mr. Chester: Let me make two comments. If a lawyer is practising within the framework of a multi-disciplinary partnership, that lawyer will be subject to the professional and legal obligations attached to that profession. There will be other people working within the organization who have other professional and legal obligations. I think it is clear that the Canadian Bar Association represents those lawyers and would have some of the same concerns.

From an accounting perspective, it is clear that the accounting rules, generally accepted accounting principles, our code of professional conduct, and the laws involving accountants would apply to those accountants within the firms.

Senator Angus: It becomes known as "the firm." All of these firms have administrative staff, a switchboard operator, and a reception area. Those people are not equipped to know which section should be involved. If one were faced with the men in the black hats with the bag, coming for the papers, it would be hard to direct them.

Mr. Chester: One of the points that we made in our belief was that when the men or women in the black hats arrive, they should be looking through the records related to those particular suspicious transactions. They do not have carte blanche to look through the entire records of a particular KPMG office, or even broader than that.

Senator Tkachuk: Are you saying that they will have that power under this bill?

Mr. Chester: They could have that power. The bill does not define what the records are. Clause 60 talks about records. It does not talk about appropriate or relevant records. It simply talks about records of the firm. We think that sort of clarity would be important to bring to the bill, so that if the people in black hats arrive, they do not have a warrant to conduct a fishing expedition.

Indeed, one of the problems we have is that they do have a warrant. They should be looking specifically for the information that is relevant to their particular inquiry and respecting the professional confidentiality that attaches to all other records within the organization or entity.

Senator Angus: The lawyers said, "Here is our shopping list. The bill is unconstitutional, so take out these provisions, and furthermore, just to have clarity, exempt lawyers from its application." I heard you say at some point that the accountants are properly included. You are not seeking the same exemption as the lawyers. That is why I have this impression that with both accountants and lawyers in the same firm, it could be confusing when deciding who must report.

You can see my point. It serves to highlight the very difficult elements and almost frightening aspects of this bill. It points to the complex position that professionals -- lawyers, accountants, or other professionals -- could be in.

Mr. Murray: There is a difference between the lawyers and us in the sense that their rules of professional conduct do emphasize confidentiality of information with their clients. However, in the event that there is a legal requirement to do something, then that requirement prevails.

We have that embodied in our rules of professional conduct already. We do not have any choice. The lawyers do have a different issue, of course.

Senator Poulin: I believe I heard you say that you are definitely supporting this bill because it is important that Canada not only be perceived as not facilitating money laundering, but also have the tools to prevent any such activities.

I am coming at it from the point of view of a non-lawyer and a non-accountant. I am coming at it from the viewpoint of a former deputy minister who had the responsibility at one time to implement a new agency. I am looking at this bill as enabling a new agency.

I find that I am looking for, and seeing, opportunities for review, and also for ensuring that the proper regulations are developed as the new agency is set up.

Legislative drafters in this country have a tradition of using language that is more open than closed. Therefore, time is taken after the agency is set up to define different terms, powers and responsibilities through regulation.

Mr. Chester, you said changes could be made either through amendments or through regulation, and you made suggestions. Am I correct in saying that your concerns could be met through appropriate regulation?

Mr. Chester: We have said that we regard the regulations as very important because they provide the context within which the agency will work. They also provide guidance to all professionals, and all those who are subject to the bill, to give them a sense of what falls within the rules and what does not.

We think that it is important that that guidance should be embodied not merely in regulations, but in handbooks and examples. All those things should be presented in an unambiguous way.

One problem that I have with the open texture of this bill is that I am not sure how I am supposed to interpret it. As prudent professionals, we would give it the benefit of the doubt. However, I refer you to clause 7, which states: "reasonable grounds to suspect that the transaction is related to the commission of a money laundering offence." Those are almost words that would be addressed to a peace officer, not to a working accountant or a working lawyer, or any other sort of working professional who is going to have to make very tough judgment calls, if that is all they have to go by.

We believe that those professionals will do their jobs better, and that the regime will be better, if we are all working from a common understanding of what is inside and what is outside the bill.

The CICA would be happy to work with the department at any time in the development of such an exercise, because we believe that it does require that sort of collaboration between the policymakers and the people who are facing the problems on a day-to-day basis.

Senator Poulin: In other words, you are recommending that once the agency is set up, enabled by this bill, the agency and the department make sure that they include your association, as well as the bar association, in ensuring that the regulations cover all of these concerns.

Mr. Chester: Any other relevant bodies should be included also.

Senator Tkachuk: Not being a lawyer, an accountant, or a bureaucrat, but a parliamentarian, my job is to protect people from the intrusions of government and to ensure that their civil liberties are not trampled on. I need clarification with respect to the scope on page 3. The second paragraph states:

An existing regulation -- which we understand will be retained in the new legislation -- indicates the Act applies to...every person who is engaged in a business, profession or activity in the course of which cash is received for payment or transfer to a third party.

To what act does that regulation apply now?

Mr. Murray: I believe that is the existing legislation relating to money laundering.

Senator Tkachuk: What is this regulation referring to exactly, a reporting mechanism?

Mr. Murray: There is a reporting mechanism and voluntary reporting of suspicious transactions under the existing legislation. I assume it relates to both of those.

Senator Tkachuk: Presently, the suspicious part applies to every person who is engaged in business. It is voluntary now, but this bill would make it mandatory to recognize and report the suspicious transaction -- in other words, you would be legislating a person who knows of a suspicious transaction?

Mr. Murray: Yes, you are mandating the reporting of a suspicious transaction.

Senator Tkachuk: Whereas before it was voluntary.

Mr. Murray: Right.

Mr. Chester: I am reading from Finance Canada's, "Proceeds of Crime Money Laundering Regulations" consultation paper. On page 3, it indicates that that wording was taken from the existing PCMLA and PCML regulations, so it is the current act and the regulations.

Senator Tkachuk: Obviously then, you have been involved in this previously. Is that right?

Mr. Chester: Yes.

Senator Tkachuk: Does "third party" refer to a company? Is a company a third party?

Mr. Chester: I think that a third party is any entity outside the express relationship between the professional and the client.

Senator Tkachuk: It says, "engaged in a business, profession or activity." If a person gets cash and deposits it in a company, is that considered a third party transaction? For example, if I receive cash and I deposit it in a company, is that company a third party?

Mr. Murray: No. However, if a person is an employee of the company and deposits it in the account of the company, that would also not be a third party transaction.

Mr. Chester: If you give the money to your legal adviser or to your accountant for deposit with another entity, then that would be a third party transaction.

Senator Furey: I was not certain of your comments on defences and safeguards. Are you saying that clause 10 is not broad enough?

Mr. Murray: No.

Senator Furey: Is there something else you were getting at?

Mr. Murray: Simply that there is no defence for "reasonable excuse." If a person believes that they might be physically threatened, there is no protection in the bill for such circumstances.

Senator Furey: There is no out for not reporting. Is that what you mean?

Mr. Murray: Yes.

Mr. Chester: The United Kingdom has such a reasonable excuse defence in its legislation.

Senator Kroft: I was interested when Senator Angus was taking you through a reference to comparative legislation. I am not looking to you as experts in legislation, but I am curious about your response when it came to the U.S. Do I understand that there is no comparable American legislation? I may have misunderstood.

Mr. Murray: My understanding is that there is no comparable reporting mechanism in the U.S.

Mr. Chester: I think I said that there are, scattered throughout the United States, code specific obligations that relate to money laundering and reporting on money laundering, but there is nothing that looks like this Canadian bill. There are individual elements for banks that are parallel. Law enforcement authorities have individual tools, but there is nothing identical to this. Therefore, it would not be possible to do a clause-by-clause comparison between U.S. law and this bill, because the U.S. law comes from so many different places to the same destination.

Senator Kroft: This is perhaps an unfair question. Can you comment on whether or not the collective impact of those various pieces of legislation would have the same, greater, or less affect than the proposed bill?

Mr. Chester: I think we would be happy to take that under advisement and get back to you. One concern that I have is that I regard this as a work in progress -- legislation in embryo. There will clearly have to be further developments to see how the agency will work, what sort of guidelines are developed, and how the relationships between this entity and the existing law enforcement authorities will work. At the end of the day, I believe it would be possible to do such a comparison. However, at the present, there is an awful lot of open texture in this bill and many elements that require further development. We understand that the Finance Department is working on those and that there will be further announcements as the agency comes fully into being.

Senator Kroft: To your knowledge, is there an agency in the American system where this collection is carried out?

Mr. Chester: I have no such knowledge, but I will be happy to look into that.

Senator Kroft: We can look into that. I was wondering what information you have at hand as you approach this. If you are comparing it to something, I was wondering what that something is.

Mr. Murray: For example, there is no requirement for colleagues in my firm in the U.S. to report suspicious transactions. There is no such comparable reporting requirement for colleagues in my firm in the U.S. as what is being proposed here.

Senator Kroft: Do you have any comment, Mr. Chester, from the legal profession? Is there a comparable reporting obligation?

Mr. Chester: I do not believe so, but I would be happy to make inquiries. I have not, in my travels in the United States, heard about lawyers having to make reports to the FBI or to any other federal agency. In the United States, the attorney-client privilege is taken extremely seriously, as it should be.

Senator Tkachuk: Do we have any departmental officials here who may be able to help us on this question?

Senator Kroft: They would have to volunteer themselves if they had any such information.

Senator Tkachuk: They would not be hiding, would they?

Mr. Yvon Carriere, Senior Counsel, Transition Team, Financial Transactions and Reports Analysis Centre of Canada, Department of Finance: I am senior counsel with the transition team. I understand that there is an organization in the U.S. that is comparable in many ways to the new agency that will be set up here. I understand that there is a requirement to report a suspicious transaction in the U.S. This requirement applies to financial institutions, banks, trust companies, and such. This requirement does not yet apply to lawyers in the U.S.

Senator Tkachuk: Does it apply to accountants and accounting firms?

Mr Carriere: I believe it does apply to accounting firms, but I am not absolutely certain of that.

Senator Tkachuk: We were told at the beginning that we were so far behind the rest of the world that we must catch up. Some information has questioned that.

Senators, correct me if I am wrong, but were we not supposed to receive some kind of a chart from the department explaining the process in other countries? Were we not told that we are going to get that tomorrow? Good.

The Chairman: Thank you, gentlemen.

The committee adjourned.

June 14, 2000 [Standing Senate Committee on Banking, Trade and Commerce]

Senator E. Leo Kolber (Chairman) in the Chair.

[English]

The Chairman: Honourable senators, we are here to continue our hearings on Bill C-22. Appearing before us today is Mr. Roy Cullen, Parliamentary Secretary to the Minister of Finance, and a host of witnesses from the Department of Finance, the Canada Customs and Revenue Agency, the Department of Justice, and the Office of the Solicitor General of Canada.

Welcome, please proceed.

Mr. Roy Cullen, Parliamentary Secretary to the Minister of Finance: Mr. Chairman, I appreciate the opportunity to speak to your committee today on Bill C-22, the proceeds of crime or money laundering bill. I should like to use this opportunity, if I may, to highlight why this bill is needed, the safeguards that are built into the bill to protect individual privacy, and the importance of early passage of the bill. I should also like to respond to a number of concerns that have been raised by witnesses before this committee and by members of this committee.

Honourable senators, while there are different ways of estimating the magnitude of money laundering, and it is difficult to do so with great precision, there is no doubt that it constitutes a problem of staggering proportions. In Canada alone, it is estimated that between $5 billion and $17 billion in criminal proceeds are laundered in and through Canada each and every year. The IMF has estimated that it represents some 2 per cent to 5 per cent of global GDP.

Money laundering imposes significant social costs, fuelling further activity and perpetuating a vicious cycle of crime. It can lead to the corruption of otherwise law-abiding citizens. It can result in the distortion of business and financial activity by criminals.

When money is laundered through financial institutions, the reputation and even the integrity of individual institutions can potentially be undermined. The current tools at our disposal no longer suffice to detect and deter money laundering. It is clear that Canada now needs stronger and more effective legislation than what we currently have on our books. This committee was informed of the limitations of the current voluntary reporting arrangements, the existing statutes, and the traditional law enforcement methods of uncovering money laundering activity.

Law enforcement agencies here and abroad and the Financial Action Task Force on Money Laundering, the international body to which Canada belongs that sets standards for combating money laundering and that monitors compliance, have called on Canada to make the reporting of suspicious transactions and large cross-border movements of currency mandatory. Those organizations have also called on Canada to establish a central anti-money laundering agency. Our own law enforcement agencies here in Canada need and want this legislation to combat money laundering.

While the details of various regimes differ, Canada is the only country in the Financial Action Task Force that has not yet implemented some form of mandatory reporting of suspicious transactions. The experience of other countries has demonstrated the benefits of financial transaction reports to law enforcement efforts. It has also provided a variety of models that the government was able to consider in preparing this legislation and in designing Canada's anti-money laundering centre.

[Translation]

As committee members have requested, I am pleased to present a table comparing the models put in place by the G-7 and other countries. It shows that the model proposed in Bill C-22 contains several characteristics that are similar to models in other countries.

[English]

With respect to the benefits, officials and other witnesses have cited statistics demonstrating the effectiveness of reporting schemes in other countries. Money laundering is a global problem. International cooperation is essential to combat increasingly complex forms of laundering. The prerequisite for cooperation is the implementation of common and effective anti-money laundering controls. Failure to do so allows criminals to exploit the weak links in the chain.

Honourable senators, Bill C-22 is the government's response to this need for stronger legislation, but it does so while ensuring the protection of individual privacy. It is significant, in my view, that the expert witness, Mr. Jean Spreutels from Belgium, noted before this committee that, compared with legislation in other jurisdictions, Bill C-22 is most protective of individual privacy.

[Translation]

We have been careful to ensure that the centre's structure as well as the legal framework in which it operates will protect Canadians' privacy. Allow me to point out the following protection measures.

[English]

First, the reports required by this bill will be sent to an independent agency and not directly to the police. Second, only if the centre has reasonable grounds to suspect that the information would be relevant to an investigation or prosecution of a money laundering offence will certain information be disclosed to the police. Third, the centre cannot disclose all its information to the police, only designated information. Only key identifying information as defined in the bill and regulations can be disclosed by the centre. Fourth, if the police want additional information from the centre, they must request that the Attorney General obtain a court order for disclosure, specifying the type of information or documents sought from the centre. Fifth, there are severe penalties for unauthorized disclosure of information by the centre's employees. Sixth, the centre is subject to the Privacy Act. That means that its operations will, in effect, be subject to the oversight of the Privacy Commissioner. It also means that individuals have rights under the Privacy Act in relation to the information that the centre has about them.

With respect to the importance of early passage of the bill, police across Canada and provincial and territorial governments have been asking for this legislation for several years. Police see this initiative as a litmus test of the government's commitment to fighting organized crime.

Promoting the implementation of international anti-money laundering standards and cooperation is a high priority for G-7 countries and the Financial Action Task Force. The Financial Action Task Force will be deciding next week whether to publish a list of countries that failed to implement key anti-money laundering controls. Without this legislation before you here today, senators, Canada clearly does not meet the standards that these countries are being measured against. This is the single most important initiative undertaken by the Financial Action Task Force of the G-7 in recent memory. Canada must shoulder its international responsibilities and lend as much credibility to this initiative as it can.

I should also like to remind the honourable senators that Canada remains a non-compliant member of the FATF, the Financial Action Task Force, having been publicly criticized in 1998. Canada will be reporting to the FATF next week on its progress in correcting the deficiencies in its system. For these reasons, Mr. Chairman, there is a pressing need to have this legislation passed before the Senate rises for the summer.

A number of witnesses and committee members have raised some legitimate concerns. We do not believe that these concerns strike at the foundation of the bill, but we believe that they must be addressed. Therefore, I should like to make a commitment to this committee that, following passage of Bill C-22, legislation will be introduced, as soon as possible after Parliament returns in the fall, to amend the bill to deal with the following four issues. These issues and the government's commitment to address them by bringing forward amendments are described in detail in a letter from the Secretary of State for International Financial Institutions to the Chair of the committee, dated today. It is my understanding that that letter may be tabled later. I will not go into the details of what is proposed in the letter. It is my understanding that one of the senators will describe that in more detail later. I will describe the headings or the subject matters that the letter addresses: first, the ability of non-lawyers to ensure that solicitor-client privilege is protected; second, the Privacy Commissioner's recourse to the Federal Court; third, the scope of the designated information that can be released by the centre; and fourth, the destruction of records by the centre.

Mr. Chairman, this committee has asked us to respond to three other issues, one of which is the five-year review. Clause 72 of the bill states:

Within five years after this section comes into force, the administration and operation of this Act shall be reviewed by the committee of Parliament...

I wish to confirm to you that the section leaves it to the Parliament, that is both the Senate and the House of Commons, to establish the committee that will undertake the review of the administration and operation of the act. Moreover, the clause further requires that:

...the committee shall submit a report to Parliament that includes a statement of any changes to this Act...

With respect to regulations, the committee expressed concerns regarding the regulation-making authority in this bill. I should like to remind honourable senators that clause 73 of the bill requires a 90-day pre-publication period for regulations and an additional 30-day notice period for any further changes to proposed regulations. These requirements go well beyond what is set out in many federal statutes and they provide interested persons with ample opportunity to be informed of the proposed regulations and to provide comments and critique to the government on their content.

The committee believes that there would be added value in establishing a further mechanism by which the committee would be informed on a yearly basis of regulations made pursuant to the proposed legislation. We have given this matter careful consideration and believe that the most effective means of providing this information to the committee would be to include it in the annual report of the Financial Transactions and Reports Analysis Centre of Canada, which is to be tabled by the Minister of Finance in each House of Parliament. That would ensure that updates of the regulations would be available to Parliament on a yearly basis, coinciding with the tabling of the centre's annual report. It would also mean that a regulation report would be communicated not only to the committee, but also to all interested parties.

Therefore, I undertake to this committee that we shall ensure that the Financial Transactions and Reports Analysis Centre of Canada will include, in each of its annual reports, a report on the regulations made pursuant to the proceeds of crime (money laundering) bill during the period covered by the report.

Before we move on to questions, Mr. Chairman, allow me to address the issue of the independence and accountability of the centre. The table on international comparisons that you have before you shows that, more often than not, the central repositories of financial information are independent agencies set up at arm's length from the police and accountable to ministers of finance or other ministers.

It demonstrates a preference for separating the financial intelligence gathering function from the police investigative function. The model proposed under Bill C-22 is justified, not just for purposes of structural efficiency but, more important, as a means of safeguarding individual privacy. The safeguards required for protecting individual privacy are such that merging the financial intelligence gathering function with an existing agency would provide minimal savings overall.

[Translation]

In conclusion, Mr. Chairman, I would like to clarify that Bill C-22 was developed in cooperation with several interested stakeholders including the provinces and territories, the financial sector, consumers' groups and privacy organizations.

[English]

This bill will update and strengthen the existing act and improve the prevention, detection and occurrence of money laundering in Canada. Together with the undertakings that we are providing to the committee, Bill C-22 will give law enforcement agencies the tools they need, but in a way that maximizes the protection of individual privacy. Furthermore, these measures will also bring Canada into line with accepted international standards in the fight against money laundering and allow Canada to fulfil its responsibilities in the international fight against money laundering.

Senator Tkachuk: Mr. Chairman, we have the letter that was sent. Is there a French copy?

Senator Meighen: No, there is not.

The Chairman: I was told that it was faxed to your offices about two hours ago.

Senator Tkachuk: It was, but there was no French.

Senator Hervieux-Payette: I was not there, so I do not know if I received one.

The Chairman: Is there a French copy?

Senator Tkachuk: I thought you might be concerned.

Senator Hervieux-Payette: I was in Montreal this morning.

Senator Tkachuk: I am certain that your office has a French copy.

The Chairman: I do not think there is a French copy, because it is being translated.

Mr. Cullen: It is on its way, as we speak. We may have it in the next few minutes.

The Chairman: Continuing, there are two parts to the meeting.

Senator Tkachuk: Should we address the issue of the letter?

The Chairman: After we have questions we will do a clause-by-clause review, on which we will have to agree or not agree. The purpose now is to ask any questions of the minister and all of the other experts.

Senator Tkachuk: On the question of regulation, you mentioned the parliamentary review at the end of the fifth year. The concerns were not the fact that it was being reviewed but whether it would be reviewed on a regular basis, because it seems that that is sunsetted -- that is, the review is after a five-year period and then it never happens again.

Mr. Cullen: I will have a first stab at that question and then perhaps Mr. Lalonde could respond as well. The reality is that the Parliament of Canada is able to review any piece of legislation or matter, at its discretion.

Mr. Richard Lalonde, Chief, Financial Crimes Section, Financial Sector Policy Branch, Department of Finance: Honourable senators, I would add that, as part of the five-year review, it is open to parliamentarians to propose extending that five-year review for a further period. It could be proposed to amend the legislation.

Senator Tkachuk: It would require amendments to the legislation to have that happen?

Mr. Lalonde: That is correct.

Senator Tkachuk: On the subject of the regulations, I do not know if I understood what you were saying. I know you are having them posted. However, this has been a concern from both sides in committee. Were you saying that the bill will be laid before Parliament and that the regulations would be sent to the appropriate members of the committee, which is what most parliamentarians would be seeking?

Mr. Cullen: I will address the general question of why so much is left to regulation. "So much" is a subjective term, I suppose. In this legislative package, with the new centre we are starting something relatively new. As we all know, money launderers, like any criminal, will look for loopholes the whole time. As we proceed with this, the intent is to be as flexible as we can so that if money launderers begin to change their patterns of operation, the centre will have the flexibility to alter its approach. The centre is basically leading with this for the first time in this particular context.

With respect to the actual tabling of regulations, they will be under this statute. There is a minimum 90-day pre-publication requirement for any regulation proposed under the bill, and I presume that would be gazetted in the normal way. There is a minimum 30-day notice if further changes are made to the proposed regulation.

We are sensitive to the fact that there is some volume left in terms of regulation for this bill. This gives any stakeholder groups, including parliamentarians, a full opportunity to comment, critique and provide input into those regulations or changes in regulations. The 90-day requirement exceeds by far what is available in any other statute.

Senator Tkachuk: We understand that there seems to be more and more regulations because the executive and the bureaucracy want to have more flexibility to change, rather than having to deal with that nuisance called Parliament where it would be necessary to make amendments for certain things. Our concern is that, as the regulatory framework builds, there is no parliamentary responsibility.

I understand that it is posted. Let us say that I object. So what? What can I do about it? Nothing really. I can write you a letter. I can complain, but in the end there are no witnesses, no discussion with the people affected, no anything. Unless it is formalized, it is difficult for parliamentarians to deal with this. You could post it on July 1, when Parliament is not in session. Things like that.

Mr. Cullen: I understand what you are saying. This bill and the regulations that will follow the bill have already been developing the guidelines, for example, that are already used for the voluntary reporting. Other regulatory matters will be completed while consulting broadly with comprehensive stakeholder groups.

Money launderers will change their shape and form. If we had to go back to Parliament every time to change what would more optimally be a regulatory issue, we would lose as Canadians.

Senator Tkachuk: I want to get back to the letter. By the way, Chair, we did receive the letter before, and some of us were actually in our offices when it arrived. It was very much appreciated as well, Mr. Cullen. I think you addressed many of the issues that we have. We have other issues that I am sure other senators will discuss with you. I want to point out that we appreciated this.

Senator Kelleher: There is an issue that I should like to discuss that we raised in great detail the other day. It is not dealt with at all in your letter. The issue is that of the diminishment of the solicitor-client privilege. That concept is fundamental to people's privacy. It is not dealt with at all. I should like to go through it with you and get your comments, please, if I may.

As I understand the bill, under clause 62, someone from the new commission could deem it necessary to continue. In other words, someone has looked at the report that came in from a financial institution and that person says, "I think this bears further investigation." Then, under clause 62, they could, without a warrant, come into my office as a lawyer, and demand to see the various and assorted documents relating to the matter of the investigation. Under clause 64(2), if I say to that person, "Hold on here, I want to claim a solicitor-client privilege," the person who wandered into my office could determine to put everything under lock and seal. That person could tell me that my client and I could go to court within 14 days, at our expense, to try to prove to the court that there is a solicitor-client privilege.

Not even the tax department today can wander into my office on a tax matter, except under a warrant. You people are giving yourselves this rather, to say the least, extraordinary privilege of wandering in without a warrant. To the best of our knowledge, the existing U.S. legislation does not even deal with the solicitor- client privilege. There is no authority under the U.S. legislation to do this.

It is our understanding that no other country permits the authority that has been established to wander into a lawyer's office without a warrant. I should like to know why you are asking for this extraordinary privilege. I would love to hear your explanation. We feel that if you want someone to wander into the lawyer's office, they at the very least should have a warrant.

Mr. Cullen: Let us assume that the centre has information. Only if the centre had other corroborative evidence that would lead the centre to believe that there was adequate suspicion would the centre then report some tombstone information, if you like, to the RCMP. In other words, information arriving at the centre on its own does not start anything. It is only if that information is corroborated with other information that the centre would then report to the RCMP. If the RCMP corroborated that with other information or data that they had, they would then go to the Attorney General to request more information if they wanted it.

In terms of someone from the centre arriving at a lawyer's office, there must be some confusion regarding when that might happen. The only time the centre would do that would be to do with a compliance issue with respect to reporting. In other words, if the centre had reason to believe that a financial intermediary should be reporting, they would make contact with that financial intermediary and begin a dialogue to ascertain whether or not that financial intermediary realized what the responsibilities were. The centre would attempt to determine if there was any notion of any transactions that they were involved in.

In any case, if at some point the centre felt that there was still a suspicion that the reports should have been provided to the centre but were not, then they could go to the office of the lawyer or the accountant or any financial intermediary and do a very targeted review of information. The issue of solicitor-client privilege may crop up in such a situation.

I wanted to make it clear that the centre itself will not send someone to the office of a financial intermediary to investigate further potentially suspicious transactions. That only happens through reporting to the police. If there are other reasonable grounds, and the police themselves then feel there are additional reasonable grounds, they could ask for a warrant. We could come back to that in a moment.

As I understand it, in the United States, accountants and lawyers are required to report certain defined transactions to the IRS. The U.S. money laundering centre can in fact obtain that information from the IRS.

In our legislation, we are sensitive to the issue of tax evasion. Our objective through this bill is to attack money laundering and, only as an incidental, perhaps an important incidental, tax evasion. Our procedure goes the other way. Clearly, one could be laundering money with a high probability of evading tax. However, the first priority is money laundering. There would be coordinated efforts by law enforcement agencies.

I am a chartered accountant myself, and I do not mean to disparage lawyers. If you weave a hole in the system, there is a potential for the launderers to go to that hole. We are trying to ensure that this bill covers the major financial intermediaries.

I should like Mr. Carrière to expand on the topic of solicitor-client privilege.

Senator Kelleher: Before we go to Mr. Carrière, I wish to point out that our concern is not about you trying to plug the loophole of the accountants and lawyers. When I was solicitor general, I was the one responsible for the money laundering legislation that is presently in place. I know a bit about this area. I am concerned only about the issue of solicitor-client privilege and access to my office or the office of any lawyer you suspect is a financial intermediary, and access without a warrant. It really is as simple as that.

Senator Oliver: You have not dealt with the warrant part of it as yet. That is the essence of our concerns.

Mr. Yvon Carrière, Legislative Senior Counsel, General Legal Services, Department of Finance: An official of the centre could not enter into a lawyer's office. He is authorized only to enter to determine if the lawyer filed the reports that he is required to file.

Senator Kelleher: Where does it say that?

Mr. Carrière: Subclause 62(1) says:

An authorized person may, from time to time, examine the records and inquire into the business and affairs of any person or entity referred to in section 5 for the purpose of ensuring compliance with Part I...

Part I does not talk about detecting money laundering or not being involved in money laundering. It says that one shall file a report when required to file a report. Therefore, when the centre is doing a compliance check, it is verifying that the lawyer has reported the large cash transaction in which they were involved. It is not checking whether the lawyer's clients were involved in money laundering. We would not be authorized to do so. That is a fundamental point I want to bring to you.

Senator Kelleher: I do not understand that explanation. As far as I am concerned, under the bill you may come to my office and under paragraphs 62(1)(a), (b), (c), and (d), you could request all kinds of access to my records. I am saying that if you want access to my records, you should have a warrant.

Under the Income Tax Act, as I am sure you are probably aware, you used to be able to go into offices without a warrant. The lawyers in question challenged that. As a legal person, you would know that there are numerous cases that hold that you cannot do it. It is unconstitutional, and you need a warrant. I do not understand why, for this bill, we are suddenly going against the grain. No other country permits this kind of access without a warrant. I do not understand why you feel you are entitled to get this under this bill. It is quite a departure.

Mr. Stanley Cohen, Senior Legal Counsel, Human Rights Law Section, Department of Justice: I believe that what is perhaps engendering some difficulty is the distinction that exists between a search and seizure and a regulatory inspection. In terms of the constitutional law, that distinction carries a great amount of significance. As has been explained by Mr. Carrière up to this point, these inspectors -- not police officers -- who carry out searches are looking for compliance with the statute. The case law tends to hold that a lower standard applies with respect to regulatory inspections. This is an administrative matter and there is Supreme Court of Canada jurisprudence. I can give you two cases, although not the citations: one is Comité paritaire, and the other is Potash or Tabah. Both of those cases uphold the rights of inspectors to inspect on a lower standard than would otherwise be the case in a criminal investigative setting.

I believe that, if one were to examine the nature of the statute that is under consideration and the powers that are being exercised in this instance, those cases would basically support the ability of the inspectors carrying out a regulatory purpose to ensure compliance with the legislative scheme. If one examines the types of powers that were accorded in the particular statutes that were involved in those cases, one would find very wide-ranging powers to enter in order to inspect books and records and to copy documents and take away files, et cetera. Those cases would tend to support the approach that has been advanced in this context.

Senator Kelleher: My concern is that an inspector might say that they are only wandering in to see if there is regulatory compliance. In order to look around to see whether or not there has been regulatory compliance, the inspector might go through all of the individual's client records and documents. Therefore, you do through the back door that which I do not think you should do through the front door. I do not know how a confirmation of regulatory compliance could be done without going through all of the client documents and records.

Mr. Cohen: In response to that, the Supreme Court of Canada is leery about anything that constitutes a pretext search. There is abundant case law on this subject. There are cases that demonstrate that when police officers carry out functions under the Highway Traffic Act -- stopping vehicles, et cetera -- where they try to transform that particular kind of activity into a wider ranging search for criminal wrongdoing, they have lost the fruits of their investigation and the evidence has been inadmissible. The leading case on that, for example, is R. v. Mellenthin.

I would suggest that any inspector who enters a lawyer's office with the intention of trying to gain access to files in a holus-bolus manner and who is not focused in terms of what they request to see or into what areas they might enter would be running the grave risk of compromising their ability to carry out that type of investigation. You cannot look for a television in a desk drawer.

Senator Kelleher: They are getting pretty small these days.

Mr. Cohen: They cannot do that which is inappropriate to the function that they are entrusted with under the legislation.

Senator Kelleher: I am not disagreeing with that fundamental principle that you have just enunciated. However, the clause, as presently worded, leaves it open to abuse. If I think that the gentleman who has come into my office is abusing his position, I am the one who has to go to court, at my client's expense, to prove the solicitor-client privilege. Under any normal circumstance, you would have had to go through a preliminary procedure to obtain a search warrant. I am concerned about the lack of that preliminary safeguard. Under this clause, you have shifted the onus to the lawyer and the client, at their expense, to go to court on such an issue. I do not see why it should be that way.

I think that it is commendable to talk about privacy and trying to shield the person, but I am very concerned that inspectors would be able to skip the necessary procedure of having first obtained a warrant. What other legislation do we have that permits someone from government to wander into my law office and demand to see my client records without the assistance of a warrant? Is there any other legislation that exists?

Mr. Cohen: I have an initial observation relative to the question that you asked. Basically, any lawyer who is involved in any type of activity that would bring the lawyer within a field of regulation would be subject to the rules and regulations that apply. Hence, a lawyer would be subject to having his or her trust accounts examined by the Law Society. Lawyers are regulated by the Law Society of the province in which they practice. Similarly, I am certain that there are other statutes under which lawyers become subject to inspection, depending upon the nature of their involvement. However, I cannot give you rhyme and verse on that.

Senator Kelleher: I do not think there are. How do you respond to the fact that our examination of the other countries that have this legislation presently on their books shows that they do not authorize this type of entry without a warrant?

Mr. Cohen: Again, I would not want to present myself as an expert in comparative law, but I understand that in the United States there is a much broader umbrella that is cast over the area of organized crime, in terms of their RICO statutes, the federal and state racketeer-influenced and corrupt organization legislation. Lawyers are certainly highly implicated in the nature of that scheme and are subject to a great deal of potentially invasive investigation under those statutes.

Senator Kelleher: In the U.S, at present, there is no invasion of the solicitor-client privilege. Our examination of the other countries showed that they do not have this on their books. Everyone suggests that Canada has been late on this, but we have taken the opportunity to review other countries' legislation. Why are we proceeding with giving something to this commission that no other country has given to theirs?

Mr. Cohen: I am here to offer advice as to whether the kinds of questions that you are raising enter the field of constitutional prohibition or are illegal in a constitutional sense. I can advise, without offering legal advice on the matter, per se, that we have had regard to constitutional norms and standards as well as to the kinds of considerations that the Supreme Court has said are applicable in the context of inspections, searches and regulation. Basically, we have attempted to provide advice to policy-makers who have constructed this particular legislation in that regard.

Senator Kelleher: Mr. Cullen, I should like you to reconsider, if you would, this particular clause with respect to the fact that this might perhaps be done after obtaining a warrant, as it is for all other types of government investigations. It is not that big a thing to obtain a warrant. I am not arguing, nor are we arguing about the necessity for stronger money laundering legislation. I would be the last person to argue against that. I simply wish to ensure that there are sufficient safeguards in place.

Mr. Cullen: I will certainly take that under advisement. The graph that you have in front of you does not deal specifically with the point you raise in terms of how other jurisdictions deal with this particular question. It deals with whether accountants and lawyers are covered, and you are not debating that. In terms of the privilege aspects, we will certainly take your comments under advisement.

Senator Kelleher: I am relying on research done by the researcher that Senator Meighen and I have. This is the report that we received saying that no one else has that privilege at this time.

Senator Oliver: Before coming here, Mr. Cullen, did you read the testimony given before this committee by the Canadian Bar?

Mr. Cullen: I have not read their testimony before this committee, but they did appear before the House of Commons Standing Committee on Finance.

Senator Oliver: Senator Kelleher has asked you a series of questions regarding the concept of solicitor-client privilege. The Canadian Bar dealt with that here and in the other place. They also dealt with the concept of confidentiality. You have not addressed that.

Senator Kelleher asked you about a hypothetical circumstance of someone coming in the office, looking for papers, finding papers and, therefore, breaching the confidentiality that is so important to the client-solicitor relationship. In its brief, the Canadian Bar said that it is a fundamental protection of both privilege and confidentiality. They said:

The importance of privilege and confidentiality has long been recognized in the law and it is central to the rules of professional conduct governing lawyers. Clients must be able to seek the assistance of a lawyer knowing that the information they communicate will remain with the lawyer and go no further.

What can you say about that longstanding, several- hundred-year-old concept of client-solicitor confidentiality that now seems to be breached in this bill?

Mr. Cullen: Bill C-22 does recognize solicitor-client privilege.

Senator Oliver: In Clause 11. I asked them about that, and it is way too narrow in its definition.

Mr. Cullen: The issue of confidentiality, as I understand it, is a much broader issue. Mr. Carrière, could you expand on that?

Mr. Carrière: I am not an expert on confidentiality, but I understand that confidentiality is of a different nature than solicitor-client privilege.

Senator Oliver: Exactly.

Mr. Carrière: Because of the necessity to ensure that everyone is filing the reports that they have to file, the protection guaranteed by clause 11 deals only with solicitor-client privilege.

Senator Oliver: What does that say about confidentiality?

Mr. Carrière: All I can say is that it is not covered by clause 11.

Senator Oliver: That traditional right is being blown away by this legislation.

Mr. Cohen: I wonder if I could ask a question back.

Senator Oliver: No.

Mr. Cohen: I am trying to understand the nature of the question as it relates to the legislation. If there is a situation in which an inspector comes into a lawyer's office and asks to see books or records in order to determine compliance, the issue would simply be about whether or not anything that is being asked for is shielded by solicitor-client privilege. The issue of confidentiality does not arise in that particular context and the procedures that are created under the legislation offer full protection.

Senator Oliver: No, they do not.

Mr. Cohen: One must consider a lawyer confronting an inspector and saying, "I am not going to answer that question because it involves a matter of solicitor-client privilege and I will have these documents sealed up." He is then asked a further question about whether or not there is anything further of a confidential nature that can actually be disclosed in that context. A lawyer should certainly be adept enough to protect his client's interests in that kind of a setting.

Senator Oliver: Not if they are being taken away by language like this. Since Mr. Cohen is back again, I should like to ask a question I asked the Canadian Bar about clause 11. Clause 11 states: "Nothing in this Part requires a legal counsel to disclose any communication..." -- the key words here are "any communication" -- "...that is subject to solicitor-client privilege." Does the word "communication," to you, include things like any activity, any transaction?

Mr. Cohen: Under the case law, including the case law to which you were referred at the last meeting when the Canadian Bar was present, the understanding of the term "communication" is that it is a broad notion that can embrace, depending upon circumstance and context, transaction, the name of a client or a great range of information. One could, even on as basic a matter as a name, assert solicitor-client privilege. Thus, confidentiality as regards that kind of information is safeguarded through the assertion of privilege. Communication should not be read as a narrow thing in terms of the case law.

Honourable senators, you have been concerned with these issues with respect to how this legislation might fare in the courts and how it might be affected by some of the challenges going on in the courts with respect to section 488.1 of the Criminal Code. That is the Lavallee case out of Alberta. That case has gone to the highest level. You will find support for what I am suggesting in that particular case. The notion of what is embraced by privilege and what is embraced by the notion of a communication is broad enough to capture a transaction or a name in a given circumstance.

Senator Oliver: An activity, perhaps, as well.

Mr. Cohen: Potentially; it would depend on context.

Mr. Lalonde: Mr. Carrière is quite right that Bill C-22 does not address confidentiality, which is a much broader issue than privilege. Many professionals, including accountants and other businesses such as financial institutions, banks, owe a duty of confidentiality to their clients. The bill provides other provisions to ensure that the information that is provided to the centre is protected. That is the way the bill deals with the broader issue of confidentiality between the client and the professional.

Senator Angus: Mr. Cohen, I noted that you were present last week when the Canadian Bar witnesses were telling us some of their concerns. In particular, I was struck as a lawyer by their bald statement that they consider it very likely that this bill is ultra vires of Parliament. I have been ruminating on that since, and I saw you scratching your head when the evidence was given. I am asking myself why the legislators and you people behind this act would take the chance of having it struck down when it is so easily remedied, or at least so I believe. I refer to page 3 of the CBA brief where they say:

...we believe it may be ultra vires of Parliament. We recognize that the Federal Government may rely on the Criminal Law power... However, we believe the Bill could be interpreted as intruding upon the legislative jurisdiction of the provinces as to "property and civil rights" and "administration of justice within the province."..

Are you very comfortable that the bill is intra vires?

Mr. Cohen: That particular issue is an issue of division of powers, not a Charter issue.

Senator Angus: They talk about the Charter as well -- section 8.

Mr. Cohen: Under section 8, I do not think the Canadian Bar Association necessarily has as much support as the statements that were made would tend to indicate. Even on a challenge to section 488.1 of the Criminal Code, the case law is divided. There are decisions in Ontario that uphold the constitutionality of that provision. It is not this provision, but it is similar to it.

On the question of whether this falls within the scope of the criminal law power -- and I hesitate to use words of advice here -- it is difficult to see how a bill that addresses money laundering as its subject matter does not fall within the federal criminal law power. I would say that at the very least there must be a strong and persuasive case to be made for the vires of this legislation and the constitutionality of the legislation.

Senator Angus: That is an elegant way of telling me that you totally disagree with what the lawyer from the bar has said. I have a great deal of respect for you and your colleagues, and I know you have put a lot of time into this. Candidly, do you see a risk that this could be held by the courts to be ultra vires? If there is a risk, is it not quite easily remedied by an amendment that would render it clearer?

Mr. Cohen: If the concern is with ultra vires, that it falls within provincial jurisdiction rather than federal jurisdiction, I have not personally seen case law that supports that point of view. With respect to the Charter, the jurisprudence is mixed on this subject at the lower courts in relation to a similar statute, not this particular statute. The undertaking that has been given with regard to solicitor-client privilege and subsequent amendment probably fortifies this particular measure.

Senator Angus: You are comfortable with the bill as drafted.

Mr. Cohen: You would be justified in drawing that conclusion.

Senator Angus: My colleagues and I were discussing this unilingual letter before the session began. We were wondering, from a legal point of view, whether it is worth more than the paper it is written on in terms of enforceability. Can we bind Parliament to come back here in September and introduce all these amendments? I want it on the record, if that is your legal opinion.

Mr. Cohen: I am not here to offer a legal opinion on a subject of that nature. That is a political question.

Senator Oliver: No, it is not. It is a legal question.

Mr. Cohen: I can tell you that I was involved in the recent passage of Bill S-10, which originated here. It was a follow-up to Bill C-3 on DNA data banking and involved a similar process of undertakings and then the introduction of subsequent legislation.

Senator Angus: There is no question that there are precedents. I think you are perhaps using one of your lifelines here. The precedents have been based on the goodwill of the committee and the willingness of senators to not unnecessarily retard the process.

We have concerns about fundamental matters such as the ones that Senator Kelleher has raised and those that other professions, such as the accountants, have raised about the intrusive elements. I believe it could be remedied and would not take anything away from what we are trying to do. As I said the other day, I heartily support the initiative, and I think Canada should be doing its piece within the group of the task force. I am troubled that we would say, "Well, we will satisfy you in these various ways, and we will come with an amending piece of legislation in the fall." We are also informed that we might be in the middle of an election and this parliament will have been dissolved. Mr. Peterson, who uses the first person singular in introducing a bill, might not even be a member of Parliament at that time.

I am not asking you to give me a legal opinion, but I think it is fairly reasonable for me to ask one of Her Majesty's law officers whether or not he feels this has legal weight.

Mr. Cullen: Not dealing at the moment with the question of legality, I can tell you that this letter is a firm undertaking of our government. In the meantime, it helps to clarify the intention of the bill. I know that the intent in terms of the government is absolutely cast in stone that we will deal with these issues.

Senator Angus: The problem that I have is that it is then rather than now. These amendments make sense to the government, without taking this other risk to which I alluded and which I believe is real. Notwithstanding good faith and everything else on the part of the minister, he just might not be here. I feel there are ways to amend this bill and to address them.

Senator Meighen: Senator Angus has been exploring the area that interested me. As Senator Kelleher pointed out, Canada was in the forefront of anti-money laundering legislation in the early 1990s, thanks in major part to his personal efforts. All of a sudden we seem to have woken up. Now there is an incredible rush to produce legislation, which is clearly challenging to draft so that it protects individuals as well as deals efficiently with the admitted problem of money laundering. We rush into it, and by Minister Peterson's own admission, he is prepared to propose, and I do not doubt his good faith and his good intentions, four or five amendments in the fall.

I find it difficult to convince myself that the difference between the middle-to-end of June and the middle-to-end of September is crucial to Canada's standing in the world with respect to anti-money laundering legislation. I can easily convince myself that, by rushing, we can make a serious mistake that it is not necessary to make with respect to people's fundamental liberties and the basic question of solicitor-client privilege that Senator Kelleher explored. What concerns me even more is that, similar to an act such as the EDC, we are suggesting that we should not review this. Yes, we will review it, but only after five years.

With great respect, Mr. Cullen, I do not think this is good enough. If you are going to make these amendments in the fall, I should like to see it reviewed by the end of the year. If that is not acceptable to you, and I would be surprised if it were, at the very least there should be a three-year period, as opposed to a five-year period, to see how it is working.

The minister cannot control the Order Paper of Parliament. He cannot control whether Parliament is sitting or not sitting. What he can control is to work with us in the Senate to get the amendments through in an expeditious fashion so that when the bill is passed in a short period of time, it does not run the risk of offending basic civil liberties. Why can we not, as Senator Angus and others have suggested, work on these amendments, get them in, and then change the review period from five down to three years? Why do we have to rush to pass what may be a very imperfect and dangerous bill by the end of June?

Mr. Cullen: I understand there are some concerns. In the view of the government, with what has been proposed and the response of the government, we do not believe the bill is fatally flawed at this point.

The longer we wait, the easier it will be for money laundering activity to expand and grow. We have a unique opportunity here to put in place some legislation that will give some teeth to the law enforcement agencies.

Senator Meighen: Agreed. Let us do it in September.

Mr. Cullen: It will not be any easier in September.

Senator Meighen: Explain the danger of waiting until September. Are you telling me, Mr. Cullen, that three months will imperil Canada's ability to deal fundamentally with the problem of money laundering?

Mr. Cullen: As I said in my remarks, this must be dealt with on a coordinated international basis. Right now we are in danger of falling behind. There are initiatives moving now that need a coordinated response. Any further delay will simply mean that the money launderers will be able to advance their activities and we will still be the open link for money laundering activities to expand.

I am sure you, as a senator and a citizen of Canada, are not happy with the idea that Canada would be labelled as a safe haven for money laundering activities. This is something I find offensive and I am sure you do.

Senator Meighen: You know that is not what I said. What I said was that I am having trouble convincing myself that three months makes a fundamental difference. You are suggesting that it will place us in the category of a safe haven for money launderers. I do not accept that and that is not what I said.

Mr. Cullen: I did not mean to imply that you were saying that there was that kind of tradeoff. What I am saying is that, in our view, we have responded to some of the critique and we believe we have improved the bill. At this point we do not think the bill is fatally flawed. We should get on with setting up the centre, putting things in motion, and being a responsible part of the international community.

The police law enforcement agencies are waiting for this. You may find this hard to believe, but one of the reasons for the delay has been the fact that we have been paying a lot of attention to privacy issues, maybe not in as comprehensive a way as some senators would like, but privacy is one of the areas we have focused much attention on. In fact, the expert from Belgium confirmed that our structure, framework and legislative package pays more attention to privacy issues than does any other jurisdiction in the world.

Senator Oliver: Yet two of the amendments you want to bring in the fall deal with that very issue.

Mr. Cullen: Perhaps, senator, perfection is something that you can claim. I would not sit here and say that this bill is perfect. What I am saying is that, in our view, the bill is in darn good shape, particularly with the comments that we have received and the changes that we are prepared to deal with. To delay these very important initiatives to counteract money laundering would, in our view, not be in Canada's best interests.

I should just like to comment, because it may be germane in terms of the comments made earlier by Senator Kelleher and Senator Oliver with respect to other jurisdictions or acts that provide for access without warrants, I am advised that the Ontario Securities Act, section 11(4), provides for warrantless search powers similar to those contained in this bill. With respect, I do not think that what is being proposed here is setting new precedents in that context. I just wanted to put that on the record.

Senator Meighen: Is that with respect to third parties or with respect to individuals with their own records?

Mr. Cullen: I believe this just deals with the issue of warrantless search powers, which Senator Oliver raised.

Senator Meighen: I make a distinction between the Securities Commission coming in and looking at my personal records, and coming into my office and looking at Senator Tkachuk's records that I have by reason of the fact that I am his lawyer.

Mr. Cullen: This particular provision relates to registrants under the Ontario Securities Act.

Senator Meighen: That is very different. With respect, I do not think it is an apple-to-apple comparison, but I could well be wrong.

In any event, I must weigh the decision as to whether a warrantless breach of solicitor-client privilege is necessary in order to have this legislation in place before the summer recess rather than in the fall, and knowing that, with the best goodwill in the world, there is no guarantee that Minister Peterson can introduce much less see to the passage of these amendments.

Mr. Cullen: I know that Minister Peterson is committed and the government is committed at the highest levels to make these changes. Beyond that, I cannot give you the shirt off my back at this particular meeting.

Senator Angus: I should like to address this document that has been placed before us today. I believe I can refer to it as the chart or the table that some senators asked for in earlier sessions on Bill C-22.

Mr. Cullen: Excuse me, this is the comparative chart.

Senator Angus: First of all, I should like it to be formally in the record. Who prepared it, sir?

Mr. Cullen: The Department of Finance.

Senator Angus: Are you familiar with it?

Mr. Cullen: Yes, I am.

Senator Angus: You have said this document was prepared by the Department of Finance and that you are familiar with it, and you have colleagues with you who, I am sure, are equally familiar. It is entitled "International Comparisons of Anti-Money Laundering Regimes." We have page 2 of 2, but I understand that page 1 was simply a fax cover sheet. Is there a page 1?

Mr. Cullen: I just have this.

Senator Angus: Does yours say page 2 of 2?

Mr. Cullen: Apparently the footnotes were previously on page 2. Did we not need the footnotes?

Senator Angus: I think it is reasonable: it does say page 2 of 2. Page 1 was the main table, and the footnotes were at page 2.

Mr. Cullen: The footnotes have been incorporated onto page 1.

Senator Angus: I should like to have this document formally in the record. People under your supervision dispatched that to the committee?

Mr. Cullen: That is correct.

Senator Angus: Could we let it form part of the formal record?

This document refers across the top to anti-money laundering authority. It lists Canada, Australia, the U.S., the U.K., Belgium, the Netherlands, France and Japan. In the footnotes, I notice Italy got a mention. That is nine countries, including Canada. What happened to the others that are in the group?

Let me elaborate by saying that, at the first hearing, when you gentlemen briefed us on this bill, we were told that Canada was one of 28 nations involved in this cooperative effort. We were further told that the bill was important because Canada was the last of 28 countries to get up to speed and introduce legislation. It became apparent during the hearings that, in fact, Canada might well be ahead of many of the other countries, having already passed the money laundering legislation of the Senator Kelleher regime. Indeed, we heard that we were covering the topic through provisions in the Criminal Code and so forth.

We asked for the comparative table so that we could see where we are at and where we are not at vis-à-vis the other countries. I am having trouble understanding this document for a number of reasons. I have mentioned one: Where are the other 19 countries mentioned? Furthermore, one footnote says that this is to be done in regulation.

Without me asking questions and confusing the issue, could you address this document? Tell us what it means and how it came to pass. Fill in some of my blanks for me.

Mr. Cullen: Perhaps, it would be helpful if Mr. Lalonde took the group through the chart. I should preface that by saying that we are the last G-7 country to implement mandatory reporting of suspicious financial transactions.

Mr. Lalonde: Just to amplify that, not only are we the last G-7 country, according to the 1998-99 annual report of the Financial Action Task Force, but that report also states quite clearly that the reporting of suspicious transactions by banks is mandatory in all members except Canada. We know that Canada is the only country within the 26 member FATF that does not have some form of mandatory suspicious transaction reporting. We were trying to be as comprehensive as possible in the table. Certainly, if we were to put all 26 countries down in terms of whether or not they have suspicious activity reporting, the answer would be yes for all 25 members of the Financial Action Task Force, with a blank for Canada.

In terms of our ability to obtain additional information, which may or may not have been requested by this committee, we did our best to obtain as comprehensive a picture as we could, in the time allotted, for the countries that are presented in this chart.

Senator Angus: In the time allowed by whom?

Mr. Lalonde: Well, since the time that we appeared before the committee on June 1, and the present.

Senator Angus: Are those your comments?

Mr. Lalonde: I am happy to respond to any additional questions.

Mr. Cullen: Would it be helpful to take the senators through the various categories?

Senator Angus: It would be.

Mr. Lalonde: I would be glad to. If we could take a look at the first line, "Accountability Structure," we see that in most cases the financial information agencies are structured as independent agencies and are for the most part at arm's length from the police. We notice, as well, that in some cases the centres -- agencies -- are accountable to, or they report to, ministers of finance, attorneys general or other ministers, as the case may be. There is no particular pattern, but they are accountable to ministers of finance in a number of cases, notably in France, Belgium and the United States.

I would just mention that in the United States, FINCEN is a branch of the Treasury Department, much like the Bureau of Alcohol, Firearms and Tobacco or the IRS. They are separate entities -- branches -- but they are within the Treasury Department.

As for the scope of legislation of entities that are covered, we notice that there is a fair bit of uniformity in terms of the regulated financial institutions.

Senator Angus: Excuse me. To make it clear and for the record, this chart, insofar as Canada is concerned, reflects what will be the case if this legislation passes. Is that correct?

Mr. Lalonde: That is correct.

Senator Angus: It does not show us where Canada is already, at least up to speed. Do you realize what we are getting at here? We are saying, "Okay, this is good stuff, and we basically support the initiative, but what is the big rush? We are not that far out of step with other countries, and you are infringing on some rights. So let's get it right and go ahead in September or whenever."

Mr. Lalonde: To clarify, it is perspective if we are talking about reporting requirements in analysis and disclosure since Canada does not have mandatory reporting and these are the criteria that we have. Certainly, if we are talking about record keeping or client identification requirements, those are embodied within the current Proceeds of Crime (money laundering) Act.

These businesses are covered presently by the record keeping and client identification requirements. In that sense, we are acceptable in terms of record keeping.

As I indicated earlier, the scope and coverage looks pretty uniform when we are talking about regulated financial institutions. It looks less so when we are talking about unregulated institutions or financial businesses, such as credit card companies, for example. In the area of lawyers and accountants, not in every country, but certainly four, in particular, address accountants and lawyers directly. And in Belgium and France, notaries are covered by the reporting scheme.

As indicated by Mr. Cullen earlier, the IRS requires accountants and lawyers to report the receipt of cash transactions of $10,000 or more to the IRS. The information contained in these records is accessible to FINCEN for purposes of enforcing its acts.

The next category indicates the range of different kinds of reporting requirements, be they cash transaction reporting requirements that are suspicious or cross-border reporting requirements.

Finally, the last box is for information about some of our concerns, which involves the performance of the amount of disclosures that are made to the police or reports received, whether or not reporting entities can report electronically or otherwise.

Senator Angus: Mr. Lalonde, your comments and they are very helpful. May I ask you whether, in your view, those boxes -- the mandatory reporting, the accountability, and so forth -- cover the main elements of either Bill C-22's money laundering provisions or those that are already in our law, or are there other key things that are needed and are in Bill C-22 that are not referred to there?

Mr. Lalonde: Certainly, if we wanted to put down all of the safeguards to protect personal privacy, we could have listed all the ones that we have and researched whether or not every other jurisdiction has those protections as well. That would have required exhaustive research. Perhaps that would have been helpful, but we were told by Mr. Spreutels in his testimony that in his opinion our regime was fairly comprehensive. I do not know whether that would have added too much to the chart itself.

We could certainly have found other criteria within the bill to add. We were trying to address the main issues. The main issue raised with us when this chart was requested was essentially what is addressed in the first line. There were some issues relating to accountants and lawyers, so we thought that it might be useful as well to include a line on that. Also, we thought it would be useful to include the different kinds of reporting requirements in the different jurisdictions.

Senator Angus: It is very useful. I believe you mentioned the individual who came from Belgium. My sense from him was that he thought that this bill was terrific. It goes beyond anything they have seen in Belgium and they wish they had something like it there. Again, that made me feel this is going beyond what other countries have, and it may end up serving as a model in terms of being a terrific tool for combatting organized crime and money laundering. It is just the urgency aspect, as I say, that bothers me.

Mr. Lalonde: Mr. Spreutels was referring to the safeguards to protect privacy, not so much whether or not the regime that we have in place would be far and above anyone else's regime in terms of combatting money laundering. Certainly, in the European context the protection of privacy is a high priority and there is stringent legislation in member countries, so I do not think that Mr. Spreutels would want to say that the basic protections that are afforded under Canadian statutes to personal privacy are far and above those that are available in Europe as well.

Senator Angus: You may have covered this on the earlier occasion but let me just ensure that I understand your position. There has been an issue raised as to why this special agency should be set up to receive all this data, this suspicious information, as opposed to the RCMP. The RCMP has a great amount of information, as we have found out over the years, and there are exceptions, but, by and large, the citizenry tends to feel not so nervous about all this sensitive information being in the hands of the RCMP, whereas there is more concern and fear that these fundamental rights will be violated and breached in the hands of this new agency.

I should like to know once and for all what your position is. I know you do not want to change it and I know you feel it is the right position, and that is fine. I just wish to hear the reasons.

The Chairman: We have gone over this ground at least five times, senator. Representatives of the RCMP were here when you were here and said they did not want to take the responsibility because it would end up being abused.

Senator Angus: Is that going to be the official answer, senator? I have always liked your answers, we think alike on so many things, but it would not take long. It is my last question.

Mr. Cullen: I will start off by saying that there are tradeoffs in everything we do, but one of the clear advantages of having the centre is that it acts as somewhat of a filter. It really addresses some concerns that have been raised by you and others that information by itself that is reported should not necessarily trigger a ground for suspicion. It triggers recording of the information, against which other corroborative information is matched, and only in the case where there are further grounds for suspicion would that information be forwarded to the RCMP.

In a sense, I believe it protects citizens from having information go directly to the RCMP. Even though I have confidence in the RCMP, I personally would feel that if frivolous information were being reported to the centre and there was no other corroborative information, then that is where it would end. It would not go further. In any regime, there are pluses and minuses. I feel that is a pretty compelling advantage.

Mr. Lalonde: Mr. Cohen has given a very good explanation as to why it was advantageous to have this function set up in a separate agency and at arm's length from law enforcement. I will not go over that territory but will say simply that there are very good Charter reasons why that is so.

We have also indicated to the committee that, even if you set aside Charter concerns and personal privacy concerns, the cost savings of merging that activity within another agency would be minimal.

Senator Tkachuk: The letter was sent to the chairman from Mr. Peterson; do you know whether he would be willing to make changes in the letter?

We have some additional concerns. We appreciate the fact that he is willing to make amendments so quickly. I, along with those on this side, do not understand why the changes cannot be made now, but let us put that aside for a moment.

Senator Kelleher has concerns under clauses 63 and 64 on client-solicitor privilege, under clause 85 under access to information, and also about the review process of the bill. We have tried to raise these points with the witnesses during our meetings. Do you know if Mr. Peterson would be willing to add that as part of the process, or is this it?

Mr. Cullen: Minister Peterson has attempted to respond in a positive, concrete and constructive way to the concerns raised by senators and other witnesses who came to this body. At this point, I do not think he would be in a position to expand further on this letter.

Senator Tkachuk: Did this letter come about because the minister and his officials were listening to the witnesses and they said, "Oh, these are the items"? Or was there a whole list of items from which he decided?

These were not the only concerns raised. Many concerns were raised, some of which I have indicated and some of which we explored previously during these meetings. Those were larger matters than the ones addressed here by the minister.

The Chairman: I hear where you are going and obviously you are free to go wherever you like, but my understanding was that you folks would not accept a letter of any kind. That is why we worked out a letter that was acceptable to us to show to you. You had told me that nothing less than regular amendments would do and that letters were not acceptable. You are catching me unaware here.

Senator Tkachuk: There are two issues here. You had asked whether we would accept a letter. Of course, over the last seven years while I have been here, there have been many letters and nothing has ever happened.

The Chairman: I am not disagreeing with you. I am not suggesting you should accept it.

Senator Tkachuk: I am just saying that this letter caught us by surprise because it is unique. This letter promised, at the earliest possible time, to entertain and pass amendments in the other place. We do not get those kinds of letters. That is the letter I was talking about.

The Chairman: Would you reconsider your position? Would you accept a letter?

Senator Tkachuk: We would like to caucus for a minute, but our view would likely be that we would entertain the acceptance of this letter. That is why I am asking whether it is possible to have a couple of extra items included to cover the concerns that arose on this side. Some of the concerns on your side have been addressed here.

The Chairman: I wish you had told me that a couple of days ago, because we could have tried to work things out.

Senator Oliver: This is not the minister's letter? It is your letter that you wrote up?

The Chairman: Senator Oliver, I find that a very inappropriate and silly remark. It is not the letter that we wrote. It is the letter we ended up accepting.

Senator Oliver: That is not what you said earlier. The transcript will show what you said, senator, with all due respect. You do not have to shout at me.

Senator Tkachuk: While they talk, may we speak, Mr. Cullen?

Mr. Cullen: I should like to say that Minister Peterson is aware. He has been following, through staff and personally, the deliberations of this committee and the House of Commons committee. He is aware of the range of issues and concerns. At this point in time, these are the four issues that he is prepared to address in a letter. That is basically his position. He is aware of other concerns but, at this point, this is the extent to which he is prepared to respond.

Senator Tkachuk: I want to make it clear and it is on record that when I was asked about a letter, what came to mind immediately was the usual letter received from a minister saying that certain things will be done, but nothing ever gets done. I have an example here regarding Bill C-78. Meetings were supposed to take place. A new minister came in and refused to hold the meetings. Nothing ever happened.

When this letter hit our desks, it was quite interesting because of the undertaking here to introduce amendments. We were quite pleasantly surprised. We want to know whether there is any chance that Minister Peterson could appear so that we could request the inclusion of a couple of items also.

We support the substance and the principle of the bill. We have some serious concerns that we want to see addressed, but we will be cooperative in dealing with this matter.

The Chairman: We should excuse the witness and discuss it. As far as I know, we must deal with it today.

Senator Tkachuk: We can do what we want, Chair.

The Chairman: Of course, you can.

Senator Tkachuk: You can, too.

The Chairman: I understand.

Senator Oliver: Some of the proposed amendments in the letter that was sent to Chairman Kolber are fundamental in nature. My question is this: If this bill were passed, is the minister prepared to hold up proclamation until such time as these amendments can be made?

Mr. Cullen: Honourable senators, I can say that we certainly could discuss delaying proclamation of certain clauses over the next little while.

Senator Tkachuk: Is that up to and including the time of the amendments, say December 31 of this year? That would give you time, if the amendments were done. Does that seem reasonable?

Mr. Cullen: Yes.

Senator Tkachuk: Which particular clauses?

Mr. Cullen: It depends. This is something new for me and I do not have the mandate to commit the minister to any particular clauses.

The Chairman: You cannot make that kind of an undertaking?

Mr. Cullen: No.

Senator Tkachuk: He just did.

The Chairman: Frankly, I do not know how he could do that.

Senator Meighen: He is a member of Parliament.

Mr. Cullen: Just for the record, Mr. Chairman, we would be prepared to consider delaying proclamation of certain clauses. That is all I can say. I am not the minister.

Senator Tkachuk: Could we have that answer by, say, Wednesday of next week?

Senator Meighen: That would be quite a good compromise when you think of it. We have done that with the bankruptcy bill and with some other money bills.

Senator Tkachuk: Mr. Cullen seems to be open to that discussion. It is good that we knew this before our discussion took place.

Mr. Cullen: To elaborate, it is something that could be discussed.

Senator Tkachuk: We understand.

Mr. Cullen: We would like to see the legislation.

Senator Tkachuk: We understand that, too.

The Chairman: I thank the witnesses for their time today.

Senator Tkachuk: Mr. Chairman, could we have five minutes to caucus by ourselves on this letter?

The Chairman: We can take a recess, of course. However, we will proceed to clause-by-clause consideration when we return.

Senator Tkachuk: If we do that, then there is no use talking about anything -- no letter, no nothing.

The Chairman: The letter will be appended to the report.

Senator Tkachuk: With no possibility that some of our concerns would be included in the letter?

Mr. Cullen: Mr. Chairman, I think I said clearly that Minister Peterson is not prepared to go beyond the letter at this point.

Senator Tkachuk: You made that commitment for him. At the same time you said other things.

Mr. Cullen: I happen to know, because I have discussed that particular matter with him.

Senator Tkachuk: Would you be willing to take up the matter with him about holding up particular clauses?

Mr. Cullen: If the bill is passed, we could consider delaying proclamation of certain clauses. We could have a look at it. That is what I committed to.

Senator Tkachuk: Would it be possible that you could have that decision to us by next Tuesday or Wednesday and then we could do clause-by-clause consideration knowing that that was going to happen?

Mr. Cullen: I do not think that is possible. It is a matter that could be considered in discussions over the summer, but not before then.

Senator Tkachuk: It seems very strange that concerns of the government members were met, but when our concerns come up, short shrift is given.

Senator Kroft: That is not fair at all.

Senator Tkachuk: Senator Kroft, tell me what is fair.

Senator Kroft: That is not accurate.

Senator Tkachuk: Tell me what is accurate, then.

Senator Kroft: The amendment about the Privacy Commissioner was an amendment expressed from all sides of this table. Those issues were expressed as concerns generally around the table. They are not identified one way or the other.

Senator Tkachuk: We have a number of amendments.

Senator Kroft: Was that issue not a concern of yours?

Senator Tkachuk: Of course.

Senator Kroft: How can you say your interests are not expressed in the letter?

Senator Meighen: Other concerns are not.

Senator Tkachuk: I said concerns that we had, Senator Kroft.

Is it possible to have a recess?

Senator Grafstein: Mr. Chairman, could I have one or two minutes to comment on this? I did not mean to speak, but Mr. Cullen is gone and one of the reasons I am interested in this bill is that I am vice-chairman of the economic committee of the OSCE. To deal with international money laundering was a major initiative by the OSCE, which Canada supported. Mr. Cullen led in making sure that that was an issue. Quite frankly, the evidence we heard at the international meetings is that this is an epidemic issue and the sooner we can close whatever doors we can, the better.

I have come here to satisfy myself on the privacy questions and I received good satisfaction. The key is to get things going as quickly as possible, not to delay. The fastest it can be proclaimed, even the three quarters of bill that is satisfactory, the better it is for the interests of Canada. We have an international reputation that can be enhanced by this bill. I say that not as a member of the committee but as a representative of the OSCE and a vice- chairman of the economic committee, which puts this at a key international priority.

The Chairman: We will recess for five minutes.

The committee recessed.

Upon resuming.

The Chairman: Honourable senators, we appear to have reached a compromise. We will report the bill as drawn with the letter attached. We will also put wording in the report indicating that both sides are suggesting that three more amendments are necessary. We are suggesting them. We cannot bind anyone. The amendments are things that you guys have drawn up. We will go along with them, and they will be in the report.

Senator Kroft: We will say "generally as expressed." We are not trying to tie it down to specific wording.

Senator Meighen: The three areas are solicitor-client privilege, regulations, and the review in three years instead of five.

The Chairman: Now that it is on the record, does everyone agree?

Senator Tkachuk: I have copies of those. You will have to draw them in the proper form.

The Chairman: We are making the request that these be considered seriously.

Senator Kroft: We want to make it clear that the committee collectively recommends those items.

The Chairman: We recommend that these changes be added.

Senator Meighen: Generally as expressed.

Senator Tkachuk: We have our amendments, and you can draw the wording.

The Chairman: Do the witnesses have a problem with this?

Senator Tkachuk: We understand it is not exactly the wording of the amendment, but all we have is the amendment, so those observations must be drawn.

The Chairman: Would you make the motion?

Senator Kroft: I move that the committee complete clause-by-clause consideration of Bill C-22. Must the reference to the letter be included? I would include in the motion that the bill stands unamended but accompanied by the letter from the minister, together with observations agreed upon by the committee.

The Chairman: By the entire committee.

Senator Kroft: By the entire committee on an additional three subjects.

Senator Meighen: As generally set forth.

Senator Kroft: As generally set forth. The report that we have agreed on is that the act goes unamended accompanied by the letter. The letter is a commitment by the government, so it is the bill plus the letter.

The Chairman: There are three recommendations.

Senator Meighen: The committee recommends, in addition to the minister's letter, three further recommended amendments to the act.

Senator Oliver: What about proclamation?

The Chairman: We cannot get into that.

Senator Kroft: The question has been raised, but with the letter plus these additional amendments, we know we are trying to strike a balance here. We could go through a great deal looking for perfection, but in fact we have a bill with which we are all comfortable.

Senator Meighen: He is committed to considering it. If he does not want to do it, he will not.

Senator Fitzpatrick: He said he would take the proclamation back for consideration and advice.

The Chairman: All those in favour of the motion?

Hon. Senators: Agreed.

The Chairman: Carried. Thank you, senators.

The committee adjourned.

Hon. E. Leo Kolber, Chair of the Standing Senate Committee on Banking, Trade and Commerce, presented the following report:
Thursday, June 15, 2000

The Standing Senate Committee on Banking, Trade and Commerce has the honour to present its

SIXTH REPORT

Your Committee, to which was referred the Bill C-22, An Act to facilitate combatting the laundering of proceeds of crime, to establish the Financial Transactions and Reports Analysis Centre of Canada and to amend and repeal certain Acts in consequence, has examined the said Bill in obedience to its Order of Reference dated Thursday, May 18, 2000, and now reports the same without amendment, but with a letter and observations, which are appended to this report.

Respectfully submitted,

E. LEO KOLBER, Chairman

(For text of documents, see today's Journals of the Senate, Appendix , p. 724.)

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, when shall this bill be read the third time?

On motion of Senator Hays, bill placed on the Orders of the Day for third reading at the next sitting of the Senate.

June 19, 2000 [Sentate]

Hon. Richard H. Kroft moved the third reading of Bill C-22, to facilitate combatting the laundering of proceeds of crime, to establish the Financial Transactions and Reports Analysis Centre of Canada and to amend and repeal certain Acts in consequence.
He said: Honourable senators, I spoke at some length on second reading of this bill and will, therefore, keep my remarks this evening as brief as possible.

This bill strengthens the existing Proceeds of Crime (money laundering) Act by adding new measures to improve the detection and deterrence of money laundering in Canada. Passage of this bill will not only assist Canadian law enforcement in its fight against organized crime and money laundering, but will allow Canada to be an equal participant in international efforts to combat these serious problems.

While Canada has had the building blocks of its anti-money laundering program in place for some time, the measures contained in Bill C-22 will bring Canada into line with international anti-money laundering standards around the world.

In summary, Bill C-22 provides for mandatory reporting of suspicious and prescribed transactions, reporting of large cross-border movements of currency, and the establishment of an independent anti-money laundering agency that will receive these reports and other information.

In implementing mandatory reporting of suspicious transactions, which I point out is a cornerstone of anti-money laundering systems around the world, Canada will, with the passage of this bill, join the other 26 members of the Financial Action Task Force that have put this measure into place. When international comparisons are made, however, the legislation being debated today is distinguished by the strength and extent of the privacy protections it contains.

I have referred briefly to the fact that this legislation will address the needs of law enforcement while at the same time providing considerable privacy protections. I am pleased to add that the committee devoted considerable time and energy during the course of its study of Bill C-22 to ensuring that a proper balance was struck in the legislation between these two important objectives. Honourable senators, I believe that such a balance has, indeed, been achieved.

I should like to take a moment to outline some of the privacy protections contained in Bill C-22. In the first place, reports mandated by the bill will be sent to the new centre for analysis and not directly to the police. The centre will be an independent body operating at arm's length from law enforcement and other agencies entitled to receive information under the bill. I wish to make it clear that the centre cannot disclose just any information to authorities. The centre can disclose only limited key identifying information, such as the name of the client, the account number, the amount involved and other details of the transaction. Information as to why a particular transaction is suspected of being linked to money laundering cannot be released. Only if the centre, on the basis of its own analysis, has reasonable grounds to suspect that certain information would be relevant to both a money laundering investigation or prosecution and a tax evasion offence can it disclose the information to revenue authorities.

If the police want additional information, they will have to obtain a court order specifying what information or documents they want. I should point out that the centre will not be subject to subpoenas except for money laundering investigations and prosecutions.

Honourable senators, it is important to understand that these safeguards are backed up by criminal penalties for any unauthorized use or disclosure of personal information under the centre's control. In addition, the centre will be subject to the federal Privacy Act and its protections, which means that its operations will come under the watchful eye of the Privacy Commissioner. It also means that individuals have rights under the Privacy Act with respect to the information the centre has about them.

Honourable senators, I have said that the committee devoted much attention and effort to assuring that a balance was struck in the bill between the necessary and legitimate law enforcement requirements of the bill and the need to protect the personal rights of Canadians. This was a preoccupation of every member of our committee, and I wish to thank all honourable senators for their cooperation.

As a result of our efforts, we gained the agreement of the Secretary of State for International Financial Institutions, the Honourable Jim Peterson, that certain changes should be made to enhance individual protection in some areas. We received from the minister a detailed letter dealing with four specific areas that set out the actual language for amendments the government agreed should be made. This letter, which contains an undertaking to introduce those amendments as soon as possible in the fall, forms part of our report.

In addition, the report contains three other amendments that the committee unanimously recommends the government consider while making the agreed-to changes.

With today's globalized financial markets and open borders, criminals have the opportunity to launder billions of dollars in illegal profits. The bill before us targets the financial rewards of this criminal activity by creating a balanced and effective reporting regime. It also protects the integrity of our financial system and enables Canada to meet its international obligations while at the same time protecting individual privacy.

With the passage of Bill C-22, we will now have an effective anti-money laundering scheme in place to help ensure that Canada is an equal participant in the international fight against money laundering.

Honourable senators, I strongly believe that the Senate, drawing on the commitment of all sides, has done excellent work on this bill and has served Canadians well. I urge you to join me in supporting it.

Hon. John Lynch-Staunton (Leader of the Opposition): Honourable senators, I should like to ask the honourable senator a question. I am intrigued by the report of the committee, as it recommends three specific amendments, which, I gather, were supported unanimously by the committee. The minister, in his letter, seems to concur. Why did the committee not attach the amendments to the bill in order that we might pass them here and have them ready for the House when it returns in September?

It is all very well for the minister to say, "I will do my best in the fall," but he is at the mercy of the House leader and this matter may not be the priority of his House leader when the House returns.

Senator Kroft: The unanimous acceptance and judgment of the committee was that the international urgency for the completion of this legislation was such that the procedure we followed was acceptable. That was the unanimous concurrence of the committee.

Senator Lynch-Staunton: My question is not whether the procedure was acceptable. Why were these amendments not included in your report to this chamber so that we could improve the bill ourselves and then send it to the House for them to ratify in the fall?

These improvements, from my reading, will take much longer to achieve, since the House will have to entertain them in the fall when they return, alongside other legislation, and I fear this may not be one of their priorities. The amendments will take much longer to become law than if you had included the amendments with the bill when you reported to this chamber.

Senator Kroft: As I pointed out, Canada was the last country to have joined into this legislation. The judgment of the government, with which the committee members concurred, was that any further delay would be unreasonable. Thus, the passage of the bill now, in view of completing our obligations and having them fall into place over the coming months was seen as, on balance, the appropriate way to deal with this. That was especially so when coupled with the commitment not to review the bill but to have the specifically worded commitments that have been included in the report.

Senator Lynch-Staunton: I will not prolong this, except to say that honourable senators are being asked to pass legislation that committee members know is incomplete.

On motion of Senator Kinsella, for Senator Tkachuk, debate adjourned.

June 22, 2000 [Senate]

On the Order:

Resuming debate on the motion of the Honourable Senator Kroft, seconded by the Honourable Senator Wiebe, for the third reading of Bill C-22, to facilitate combatting the laundering of proceeds of crime, to establish the Financial Transactions and Reports Analysis Centre of Canada and to amend and repeal certain Acts in consequence.

Hon. James F. Kelleher: Honourable senators, I should like to speak briefly to Bill C-22. As my honourable colleagues have mentioned, we on this side of the chamber support the intent of this bill. Money laundering is a serious problem, both here and around the world. Canada must take all reasonable steps to address this issue.

However, while we support the intent of this legislation, we are not as supportive of some of its provisions. My colleagues have already spoken about some of the issues that concern those of us on this side of the chamber and that concerned all members of the committee that studied the bill.

As my colleagues have already mentioned, we have received a written commitment by the minister to introduce amending legislation at the first available opportunity in the fall of this year. Rest assured that we have every intention of holding him to this commitment.

We trust that he and his officials at the Department of Finance will also give very serious consideration to the unanimous recommendations made by the committee. It is to these recommendations that I should now like to turn my attention.

Honourable senators, we on the committee are very concerned by the powers given in this bill to allow representatives of the new money laundering centre to enter into and search the files in a lawyer's office without first obtaining a warrant. I believe that all of us here in this chamber, lawyers and non-lawyers alike, recognize and appreciate the sanctity of the relationship between a lawyer and his client.

When clients retains a lawyer, they have an expectation that they can share all manner of personal and private information with their lawyer, without fear that strangers will have access to this information. We are not aware of any similar legislation in other countries, legislation that allows this type of intrusion, nor are we aware of other legislation in this country that permits access to the files of lawyers without a warrant. We can think of no good reason, nor were we provided with one, why an exception should be made in this case.

The second issue that I should like to address is the inadequacy of the review provisions in the bill. Senator Tkachuk will touch upon that issue in his remarks. Senator Meighen discussed it at length in the committee.

As written, the bill provides for a one-time review after five years. The committee has recommended to the minister that it would be much more appropriate to have an initial review after three years and subsequent reviews every five years thereafter. For example, this bill will create a new money laundering centre that will have sweeping powers to collect vast amounts of personal and private information about mostly innocent Canadians. In order to ensure that the new centre is operating efficiently and that the private information of Canadians is being managed effectively, it was the unanimous view of the committee that the legislation be subjected to a more rigorous review schedule than that which is required of less intrusive pieces of legislation.

This, by the government's own admission, is an imperfect piece of legislation. Rather than amend the bill now and wait a few short months to have it sent back to the other place, the government has made it clear that it will pass the bill now without amendment. We do not support this approach. We believe we should get this bill right the first time, especially since there is agreement on both sides of this chamber that the bill needs to be amended. We should not be leaving to chance and the vagaries of the fall schedule that which should be fixed now.

Therefore, on behalf of most of the senators on this side of the chamber, I repeat my earlier assertion: We will be vigilant in ensuring that the government keep its word and introduce legislation to amend the proposed legislation as soon as possible after the House of Commons and Senate resume sitting in the fall.

Hon. David Tkachuk: Honourable senators, it was a pleasure having Senator Kelleher on the committee during our study of Bill C-22. He was, of course, the minister in the government of Brian Mulroney responsible for introducing legislation to counter money laundering in this country.

As honourable senators may be aware, Bill C-22 received little attention in the other place. In fact, a mere two committee meetings were held, a number of minor amendments were raised and defeated, and the bill was speedily sent to our chamber. We gave it serious scrutiny. We held four quite lengthy meetings, hearing a number of witnesses, culminating with the testimony of Mr. Roy Cullen, the Parliamentary Secretary to the Minister of Finance.

Honourable senators, we on the Conservative side support the public intent of this legislation and have gone on record at second reading saying so. We do, however, have some concerns that could have been rectified with amendments to improve this legislation.

Immediately before our last committee meeting on June 14, we received a letter from Minister Peterson, Secretary of State for International Financial Institutions, that outlined the amendments he intended to bring to Bill C-22 this fall.

I reiterate that this bill passed the House in two committee meetings, with no amendments. The letter that we received is quite unprecedented. It actually outlines how specific clauses would be amended, and was in direct response to concerns expressed during our committee meetings. I might add that the amendments spoken of in the minister's letter were ones wanted by members on both sides. We were quite surprised that the minister sent this letter.

I understand my colleague across the way, Senator Kroft, had a response to why these amendments could not be passed now — he mentioned that in his speech — rather than waiting for the government to table an entirely new bill that would amend this bill.

We also had other concerns that we wished to bring forth to the minister. We figured that while he is making these amendments in the fall — which he has promised to do — that he might as well include a number of amendments that we wish to have included in the bill as well.

Our problem was initially, when we were asked about the letter, a general mistrust. We have received from ministers a number of letters attached to reports and, frankly, nothing happens. I remember a letter from Minister Massé on Bill C-78 last June where he promised to take whatever measures were necessary to ensure that discussions with employee and pensioner representatives were re-established. We remember that letter. Of course, the government shuffled ministers. Minister Robillard is there now and she says, "We shall not meet with anyone."

We do not have a lot of faith in these letters, but this was an interesting one because it outlined in specific terms the actual amendments that they wished to place in the bill. This is strange considering they have a new bill and they have amendments, but they do not want to make them right now.

We had tried to have amendments made during the committee. We asked and were told in explicit terms that there would be no amendments considered. Mr. Cullen told us that there would be no changes to the letter. We agreed to disagree, but we did, at least, unanimously agree to place three of our concerns into the report and recommend that they be placed together with the other amendments that the minister was promising in the fall. We expect to follow the minister's intent.

I will not read the letter of June 14, 2000, but I will place on the record that the minister wished to bring forth amendments. One would add a new subparagraph to subclause 64(9) in regard to some of the concerns we had and Senator Kelleher had, but it did not adequately address them. As well, there were a number of amendments to clause 61 and subclause 54(d). Senators should refer to the letter attached to the report so that we ensure that we keep the minister in place in the fall session.

We had a number of opportunities to do something important for the Senate. We had the minister of the Crown saying that we needed to make amendments to his bill. Concerns were expressed by both sides of the chamber with which the minister agreed. Concerns were expressed by us with which government members agreed.

What is the rush, honourable senators? Senator Kroft mentioned in his speech that this bill is necessary. How many times have we heard that comment about a bill?

I remember a bill in which I was involved, the CPP bill. It had to be passed by Christmas because the administration and the board of directors had to be set up. The people of Canada were waiting. As it happened, the board of directors was not appointed for two years.

I know what will happen with this particular bill. Nothing will be done in the summer. There will not be a bureaucrat working in Ottawa this summer. We all know that.

Senator Fairbairn: Nonsense!

Senator Robichaud (Saint-Louis-de-Kent): Senators will not be here either.

Senator Tkachuk: Senators will not be here; that is correct.

Senator Cools: That is not so. Some of us will be here.

Senator Finestone: Have a little respect for the people who work around here.

Senator Tkachuk: I do have respect for the people who work here. I am telling honourable senators that nothing will happen with this bill until September or October of this year. We all know that. There is no reason we could not have had these amendments made now, sent back to the House, reported back to Parliament in the fall, and dealt with in an appropriate manner.

We did work well together, despite the criticisms that I am making here today. We do have some frustration due to our numbers. I am expressing that frustration and I will continue to express that frustration until we believe that we have full agreement. The executive branch of government is telling us that we do not have the right to do this. This is something that we all wanted to do as a chamber and we all wanted to do as a Parliament.

Here we are complaining about the fact that in the financial services legislation, and in Bill C-20, the Senate is excluded. I wonder why. When we have an opportunity to make a difference, we do not.

Senator Oliver: Just like the clarity bill!

Senator Tkachuk: Why should we not be excluded? The clarity bill is here. We all want to make amendments to it. We will see how many senators on the other side get up to make them and then complain that they are excluded. We are either a chamber of Parliament or not a chamber of Parliament. If we continue to behave in a way unlike a full chamber of Parliament, then we have no one to blame but ourselves for what the other place is doing to us.

Honourable senators, Bill C-22 is a good example of a situation where we could have made a difference. We could have moved amendments. We could have sent it back to the House, but we did not make any amendments. We only got promises from the minister. We know what shall happen in the fall.

Senator Robichaud (Saint-Louis-de-Kent): You have a commitment from the minister that there will be amendments.

Senator Tkachuk: I have a letter here and others in my office indicating that nothing has happened. Honourable senators know that we will have to hold their feet to the fire. We had the opportunity and we did not act upon it.

Honourable senators, even though we have unanimous consent to some amendments, we shall probably report this bill on division.

Hon. Donald H. Oliver: Honourable senators, I wish to add a few remarks to those already made by Senators Kelleher and Tkachuk on Bill C-22.

I am concerned about the process that we have been forced to follow in relation to the exercise of our duties as a body of sober second thought. We studied a bill and it was found to be wanting. It urgently needed amendments, but we have been urged not to use our powers to do what is right.

I am reminded that when amendments to the Canada Elections Act were before us, on two occasions I rose in this chamber to express concern about the constitutionality of the third-party provisions of that bill. I stated it was my opinion that the provisions as listed would not withstand the constitutional challenge.

Less than two weeks after the Canada Elections Act received Royal Assent and was proclaimed, I read in the newspapers that a constitutional challenge had been launched in the courts. It is, regretfully, my opinion that the challenge will likely succeed.

Honourable senators, we rushed through a bill and we did not get it right. If the Chief Electoral Officer has to suspend provisions relating to third parties for the next election, as he has in the past, this will mean havoc for candidates and parties.

Honourable senators, I have exactly the same concerns with Bill C-22. As you have heard from Senators Tkachuk, Kroft and others, the Standing Senate Committee on Banking, Trade and Commerce conducted a detailed examination of this bill, heard several witnesses and, as a result of what they said and what we heard, we were moved to make several amendments. The government did not want any amendments but said in a letter that it will bring in amendments in the fall if we agree to pass the bill now.

Honourable senators, why do we not get it right now?

Throughout the hearings on Bill C-22, I raised several concerns with many of the witnesses, the chief of which was whether the money laundering bill as drafted was constitutional. I had substantial support for my concerns from the Canadian Bar submission, in which they said:

Bill C-22 imposes significantly intrusive regulations upon businesses, financial institutions and professionals, including the legal profession, to the extent that we believe it may be ultra vires of Parliament.

The Canadian Bar Association recognized that the federal government may rely on the criminal law power for constitutional jurisdiction for Bill C-22. However, they believe, and I concur, that the bill could be interpreted as intruding upon the legislative jurisdiction of the provinces as property and civil rights and administration of justice within the provisions of section 92 of the Constitution Act, 1867.

As Senator Kelleher has aptly pointed out, there may also be major faults that could give rise to a successful Charter challenge. For instance, the provisions in the bill would mandate record keeping by lawyers and other professionals, and then authorize what can easily be construed as unreasonable search and seizure, offending clients under section 8 of the Charter of Rights and Freedoms.

The final concern that I canvassed with the Canadian Bar Association and other witnesses, including senior bureaucrats, was that the bill eroded the basic rights of Canadian citizens not to provide private information to the state and the right to independent and confidential legal representation under the Canadian Bill of Rights and under sections 7 and 11(d) of the Charter of Rights and Freedoms.

As a practising lawyer, the entire issue about confidentiality of clients' information is, of course, a major concern. The requirement of Bill C-22 would fundamentally alter the foundation of the solicitor-client relationship, which is premised upon the protection of both privilege and confidentiality. Confidentiality is an ethical concern that lawyers must address. As the Canadian Bar Association said, the importance of privilege and confidentiality has long been recognized in law and is central to the rules of professional conduct governing lawyers. Clients must be able to seek the assistance of a lawyer knowing that the information they communicate will remain with the lawyer and go no further. Uncertainty in the integrity of the privilege or confidentiality will create uncertainty in and undermine the solicitor-client relationship.

Honourable senators, these principles are so fundamental that they should be corrected now before the bill receives Royal Assent and certainly before the bill is proclaimed. I am concerned that there should be no proclamation of the offending clauses of this bill until such time as the government can bring forward the amendments it has promised us in writing.

I raised this matter with Mr. Cullen, the Parliamentary Secretary to the minister, when I said:

...if this bill were passed, is the minister prepared to hold up proclamation until such time as these amendments can be made?

Mr. Cullen responded as follows:

Honourable senators, I can say that we certainly could discuss delaying proclamation of certain clauses over the next little while.

Honourable senators, I call upon the Leader of the Government in the Senate, the Honourable Bernard Boudreau, to ensure that Mr. Cullen's undertaking is met and that these offending sections be delayed until the amendments recommended in the Banking Committee report to this chamber have passed both Houses and receive Royal Assent.

A final comment I should like to make about Bill C-22 that causes me grave personal concern is the fact of the low threshold of $10,000 and the discretion given to bureaucrats in determining what is a suspicious circumstance. I raised with the departmental lawyer, Mr. Cohen, who appeared before the committee, the issue of whether this could be yet another way of perpetuating ethnic stereotyping. If, for instance, a person were to walk into a financial institution covered by Bill C-22 with, say, $9,000 in cash, having just come back from Nigeria, Jamaica or a place in India, being a person of a visible minority, certainly that to many bureaucrats would be a "suspicious circumstance." Mr. Cohen said in response to my question, inter alia:

I do not know how to answer the question about whether bank tellers or others will participate in a way that is fostering a system based on systemic racism. There are two levels of intake for the information before it gets anywhere where any significant damage can be caused...It goes...to the Financial Transactions and Reports Analysis Centre. Thus, there is a second, professional vetting of the information before it can make its way over to law enforcement.

I raise this issue, honourable senators, as something that we should all be watching for to ensure that there is no further denigration in the principle of diversity that is so important to us in Canada as a nation. This legislation as presently drafted opens the door to all kinds of potential abuse and damage to individuals. I make these remarks as a caution to all senators to be on the look out.

With these brief remarks, honourable senators, it is my hope that, at an appropriate time, we will have another look at our role as a body of sober second thought. If legislation is wanting and in need of amendments, why do we not have the courage to amend it and do the right thing? Is this not what is meant by the oath we took when we arrived here?

The Hon. the Speaker pro tempore: Honourable senators, is it your pleasure to adopt the motion?

Some Hon. Senators: Agreed.

Some Hon. Senators: On division.

Motion agreed to and bill read third time and passed, on division.

June 29, 2000 [House of Commons]

April 6, 2000 [House of Commons]
Hon. Lloyd Axworthy (Minister of Foreign Affairs, Lib.)

...The act will enable Canada to surrender persons sought by the International Criminal Court for genocide or war crimes. The person who is the subject of a request for surrender by the court would not be able to claim immunity from arrest or surrender.

The act will also ensure that those who possess or launder the proceeds from war crimes can be prosecuted. Money obtained from forfeited assets and the enforcement of fines will be paid into a crimes against humanity fund for the benefit of all victims of these serious war crimes.

I hope the bill we are debating today can very quickly be put into the standing committee so we can invite the full participation of all Canadians. Let us have a serious debate, because this is one of the historic steps forward this country is taking in implementing a new legal order. We must move forward so that we can affirm very clearly Canada's commitment to ensuring that the world's worst criminals do not escape justice.

April 14, 2000 [House of Commons]
Mr. Peter MacKay (Pictou—Antigonish—Guysborough, PC)

Madam Speaker, I am pleased today to be able to speak to Bill C-19, an act respecting genocide, crimes against humanity and war crimes and to implement the Rome Statute of the International Criminal Court, and to make consequential amendments to other acts.

The Progressive Conservative Party supports and applauds this excellent initiative by the Minister of Foreign Affairs. The purpose of Bill C-19 is to implement Canada's obligations under the Rome Statute, which was adopted on July 17, 1998 by the United Nations Diplomatic Conference of Plenipotentiaries on the Establishment of an International Criminal Court.

As has been previously mentioned, this piece of legislation forces us to examine some very disturbing matters throughout the world and oftentimes within our own borders.

Once the ICC has been set up it will be the first permanent international court empowered to investigate the most serious of crimes under international law. These include genocide, crimes against humanity and war crimes. We can all be assured that although Canada is showing great leadership by making sure that war criminals will be prosecuted and punished for their awful crimes against humanity during a war, there is more that we can and must do. The legislation lays the groundwork to empower those officials within our borders to do just that.

Too many lives have been taken. It is time for the international community to work together to ensure that something is done to provoke positive change in this area to bring about greater accountability and to bring to justice those individuals who have performed and partaken in these atrocities.

Canada's leadership throughout the century has been one for which we can all be proud. With Bill C-19 we have an opportunity to do more. Canada is one of many countries taking steps to implement statutes within a framework of national and international systems of law.

Although six states have already ratified the statute, Fiji, Italy, San Marino, Senegal, Trinidad and Tobago, in light of the legislative initiatives brought forward by the federal government last December 10, the Conservative Party is glad to say that Canada is one of the first countries to take overall comprehensive legislative steps to implement the Statute of Rome.

I again congratulate the minister for his efforts and his leadership in pursuit of justice for war criminals, and certainly on behalf of victims.

According to justice department statistics, there are presently 400 people living within the boundaries of Canada who have allegedly been involved in the commission of war crimes, crimes against humanity or genocide. It is simply unacceptable that many war criminals are able to live out their quiet lives here as if nothing had happened, as if nothing they had done was wrong and escape prosecution for terrible atrocities.

Most of these individuals in question hail from the Balkans, Africa and Central or South America. Canada must not ever become or be seen to be a safe haven for war criminals. In response to this problem, Bill C-19 is a great achievement.

Sadly Canadians and the world will have to wait until the international community gets together to implement a permanent institution that can have genuine and necessary judicial capacity to fulfill the mission to address the problem.

In the meantime we have witnessed the carnage in Kosovo, in Rwanda and in other countries around the world, which makes this legislation all the more important and all the more timely.

Basically Bill C-19 would implement the Rome Statute and replace the current provisions in the criminal code with respect to war crimes. It creates two kinds of offences: offences within Canada and offences outside our borders. Offences within Canada are encompassed in clause 4 of the bill. Pursuant to clause 4, every person is guilty of an indictable offence who commits, in Canada, genocide, a crime against humanity or war crimes.

These definitions provided for the three offences are based on those found in sections 6, 7 and 8 of the Rome Statute. This is in addition to the criminal code where a person, if convicted of one of these offences, shall be sentenced to life imprisonment if the crime was committed intentionally. Obviously there is the burden of proof on the crown. In any other case, a person is liable to life imprisonment, a very serious and appropriate response.

These provisions would apply to conduct committed in Canada and permit Canada to either prosecute these offences or extradite individuals to the country where the atrocities occurred and face prosecution in those lands.

This is a great addition since it was extremely difficult for the justice department in the past to prosecute war criminals who had taken refuge here as a result of the supreme court ruling, the now very infamous and famous ruling of R v Finta. In that decision, many will recall that Imre Finta, who was legally trained as a captain in the Royal Hungarian Gendarmerie was in command of an investigative unit at Szeged during the second world war.

It is documented that during that time over 8,000 Jewish people were detained in a brickyard, forcibly stripped of their valuables and deported to horrendous, dreadful conditions in a concentration camp as part of the Nazi final solution. This order for execution, the final solution, was on the gendarmerie and certain police forces to carry out.

After the war Mr. Finta fled to Canada. In the early 1990s the Canadian courts challenged the respondent under the Canadian Criminal Code war crime provisions with unlawful confinement, robbery, kidnapping and manslaughter of the victims at that horrible death camp.

In his client's defence, Mr. Finta's lawyer argued correctly that the defence of obedience to superior orders and the peace officer's defence were available under the criminal code, which was the case for members of the military or police forces in prosecutions for war crimes and crimes against humanity.

These defences are weighed by the courts, subject to the manifest illegality test. This test basically refers to defences that are not available when the orders in question are manifestly unlawful. The burden of proof here relies very much on the qualification of the unlawful act.

Mr. Daniel Turp (Beauharnois—Salaberry, BQ)

Mr. Speaker, I am pleased to rise on behalf of the Bloc Quebecois to speak to Bill C-19, an act respecting genocide, crimes against humanity and war crimes and to implement the Rome Statute of the International Criminal Court, and to make consequential amendments to other Acts.

This is a bill of vital importance, not just for this House, but also for the international community as a whole. The purpose of this bill is to implement the Rome statute of the international criminal court, adopted on July 17, 1998 in Rome, after decades of debate and deliberation on the appropriateness of creating an international criminal jurisdiction with the authority to bring to justice those who have committed international crime.

The efforts of the international community finally came together in Rome in the summer of 1998, after repeated attempts had been made to agree upon an instrument to fight international crime, be it war crimes, crimes against humanity or the crime of crimes, genocide.

As for Bill C-19, which I have examined closely, the short title is the Crimes Against Humanity Act, a title which could be made much more rigorous by including a reference to war crimes. This bill focuses on prosecuting war crimes, which are not included in the definition of crimes against humanity, unlike the crime of genocide, which these crimes can be considered to include…

...

The purpose of many of the bill's provisions is to ensure that certain obligations under the Rome Statute for an International Criminal Court be given effect in Canadian domestic law.

There is, for example, the part concerning the proceeds of crime, clauses 27 to 29 of the bill. There is also the part concerning the Crimes Against Humanity Fund. This fund, if my memory serves me right, was established under the Rome Statute for an International Criminal Court. It is designed to help the victims of crimes against humanity. It would give the Minister of Public Works and Government Services in particular a chance to pay into this fund the net proceeds from the disposition of any property and fines collected in relation to proceedings for an offence under the Criminal Code.

By and large, this bill is a clear reflection of the obligations that will flow from Canada's agreement to be bound to the Rome Statute and the Statute of the International Criminal Court.

June 13, 2000 [House of Commons]
Mr. Gurmant Grewal (Surrey Central, Canadian Alliance)

Mr. Speaker, I listened to the statement by the secretary of state with interest. Now I rise on behalf of the Canadian Alliance as the official opposition chief critic for foreign affairs to deliver our final answer to the government's proposed Bill C-19 that will fulfil Canada's obligations in the establishment of the international criminal court. In my 40 minute speech in early April I highlighted our position. This bill and the code will deal with cases of genocide, crimes against humanity and war crimes.

Canadians support this effort. We want the perpetrators of these heinous crimes to be brought to justice. We support the codification of the crimes that this legislation formally creates. We understand that no nation stands alone in the global arena. We must work with other countries in assisting and ensuring that criminals, those monsters who have blood on their hands, are held responsible and accountable for their crimes and that justice is served. This is a very important justice issue. Criminals must be brought to account.

This bill is full of holes and may threaten our national security. The United States of America is adopting strong legislation to deal with suspected war criminals and perpetrators of these crimes. This may cause suspected criminals to use Canada as their hideout.

We are concerned that these suspects will try to join with organized crime and people smuggler brethren already in Canada. Those undesirables are already here because of the Liberal government's lax money laundering and illicit drug laws, and its flawed and broken immigration and refugee system.

By the time the international community has completed work on the ICC, the Liberals will have long forgotten about it. The Liberals will think they have washed their hands of it.

The Canadian Alliance will hold the Liberals responsible by voting against Bill C-19. It is too bad. I hope there will be an election soon.

June 20, 2000 [Senate]
Hon. Peter A. Stollery

Honourable senators, I shall speak to second reading of Bill C-19, the Crimes Against Humanity and War Crimes Act. It is a great privilege for me to speak about the merits of this bill, for it is one that has import not only to Canadians but also to every individual of the global community.

Bill C-19 has two purposes. First, it will strengthen the legislative foundation for criminal prosecutions in Canada of genocide, crimes against humanity and war crimes; and, second, it will implement in Canada the Rome Statute of the International Criminal Court. This will allow Canada to join the other nations of the world that have already ratified the Rome Statute, which was adopted by delegates of the Rome Diplomatic Conference on July 17, 1998. Once 60 countries have ratified the Rome Statute, a permanent international criminal court will be created in the Hague that will hold individuals who commit the most offensive crimes accountable for their acts.

The ICC will, I trust, prosecute the individuals who not only commit atrocities but those who profit from the commission of these heinous acts as well. This will be accomplished through provisions in the article that provide that individuals who profit from or are in any way complicit in the commission of genocide, war crimes or crimes against humanity would also be subject to prosecution for their contribution to the commission of atrocities.

New offences would also be created to protect the administration of justice of the International Criminal Court as well as the safety of judges, officials and witnesses. New proceeds of crime offences and mechanisms to enforce the orders of the ICC for the restraint and forfeiture of assets are created. Money obtained would be paid into the Crimes Against Humanity Fund, established by the proposed legislation, and may be distributed to victims of offences under the proposed legislation or to the ICC.

Bill C-19 includes offences to protect the integrity of the processes of the court and to protect judges and officials of the ICC as well as witnesses. In particular, it includes offences of obstructing justice, obstructing officials, bribery of judges and officials, perjury, fabricating or giving contradictory evidence, and intimidation. Witnesses who have testified before the ICC would be protected under the Criminal Code from retaliation against them or their families.

Bill C-19 would also ensure that the possession and laundering of proceeds from these new offences would also be offences. This would ensure that proceeds for the worst criminal offences, like genocide, crimes against humanity or war crimes located in Canada could be restrained, seized or forfeited in much the same way as proceeds from other criminal offences in Canada. The proposed legislation and the creation of the ICC demonstrate that Canadians and human kind are hopefully progressing.

An Act to Amend the Proceeds of Crime (Money Laundering) Act (Bill S-16)

Citation 2001 c. 12

Royal Assent June 14, 2001

Provisions Amended 54, 55, 60, 64

Hansard

February 22, 2001 [Senate]

Hon. George J. Furey moved the second reading of Bill S-16, to amend the Proceeds of Crime (Money Laundering) Act.

He said: Honourable senators, I rise today to speak at second reading of Bill S-16. Honourable senators will recall that this proposed legislation was introduced in the last Parliament but died on the Order Paper when an election was called.

By way of background, this proposed legislation will be welcomed by honourable senators irrespective of party. Honourable senators will recall that Bill C-22, the Proceeds of Crime (Money Laundering) Act, received Royal Assent last June. Honourable senators will also recall that, when Bill C-22 was before the Standing Senate Committee on Banking, Trade and Commerce, the Secretary of State for International Financial Institutions made a commitment to clarify the legislation by including several amendments requested by the committee.

These amendments were introduced last fall as Bill S-20. The bill before us today has a new number, but its proposed legislation is the same as that of its predecessor, Bill S-20.

[Translation]

Before addressing the merits of this bill, I should like to take time to refresh our memories and to place these measures in their proper perspective.

[English]

Bill C-22 was necessary for several reasons. Money laundering, the process by which "dirty money" from criminal activities is converted into assets that cannot be easily traced back to their illegal origins, did not become a crime in Canada until 1988.

Canada has had many of the building blocks of an anti-money laundering program in place, within the Criminal Code and the previous Proceeds of Crime Act, since then, but much more was required to combat a growing problem.

Money laundering and the cross-border movement of proceeds of crime are worldwide problems and have become increasingly difficult to detect and deter. Open borders now provide criminals with a daily opportunity to launder millions of dollars in illegal profits, the intent always being to make the profits look legitimate. Without adequate measures in place to deter and detect money laundering, these activities can undermine the reputation and integrity of financial institutions and can distort the operation of financial markets.

Here at home, between $5 billion and $17 billion in criminal proceeds are laundered through Canada each year, a significant portion of which is linked to profits from drug trafficking and, to a lesser degree, other crimes such as burglaries and cigarette smuggling.

[Translation]

Standard methods of detecting these activities are gradually losing their effectiveness.

[English]

Canada has also been subject to scrutiny internationally because of perceived gaps in our anti-money laundering arrangements. In 1997, the 26-member financial action task force on money laundering, of which Canada is a founding member, indicated that Canada was lacking in certain key areas and strongly encouraged us to make improvements to our anti- money laundering regime, in line with international standards.

[Translation]

That is precisely why Bill C-22 was passed by Parliament.

[English]

That legislation strengthened the previous statute by adding measures to improve the detection, prevention and deterrence of money laundering in Canada. It promises to give law enforcement agencies much needed enforcement tools. It provided for mandatory reporting requirements for suspicious transactions and the cross-border movement of currency and it established a national financial information agency, all of which enables Canada to live up to its international commitments.

As required by law, the proposed regulations for reporting financial transactions, client identification, record keeping and compliance were published for public comments on February 17, 2001, in the Canada Gazette, bringing us one step closer to fully implementing the act.

Another measure requires the reporting to the Canada Customs and Revenue Agency of large cross-border movements of cash or monetary instruments such as travellers' cheques. Failure to comply may result in cash being seized if Customs suspects it represents the proceeds of crime.

Consultations are underway aimed at developing regulations to implement this additional reporting requirement.

[Translation]

The Financial Transactions and Reports Analysis Centre of Canada was created on July 5, 2000.

[English]

This centre is referred to by the English acronym FINTRAC. This new independent body receives and analyzes reports, and, where it determines that there are reasonable grounds to suspect that information would be relevant to a money laundering investigation or prosecution, it passes on information to the appropriate law enforcement agencies. However, FINTRAC is restricted to disclosing only key identifying information related to reported transactions, such as the name of the client, the number and location of the account involved and the actual amount of the transaction.

I can assure honourable senators that safeguards are in place to ensure that the collection, use and disclosure of information by FINTRAC are strictly controlled. These safeguards are supported by criminal penalties for any unauthorized use or disclosure of personal information under FINTRAC's control. In addition, FINTRAC is subject to the federal Privacy Act and the many protections therein.

I would also point out to honourable senators that the government is cognizant of the fact that the implementation of the act and regulations will impose additional responsibilities on financial institutions and financial intermediaries. As a result, FINTRAC is currently developing guidelines to help them comply with these new requirements.

The new legislation responds in a balanced manner to the need for more effective tools to combat money laundering and organized crime, the need to protect individual privacy and the need to minimize compliance costs for reporting entities.

This new act has been welcomed for several reasons. It responded to the domestic law enforcement communities' need for additional means of fighting organized crime by more effectively targeting the proceeds of crime.

[Translation]

It enables Canada to meet its international responsibilities relating to money laundering.

[English]

It did so while providing safeguards to protect individual privacy.

Honourable senators, I have provided some background to the bill before us today. This bill implements some technical measures that clarify the current act. I will now focus my remarks on these measures.

As stated earlier, Bill S-16 fulfills the commitment made by the Secretary of State for International Financial Institutions last spring on behalf of the government to the Standing Senate Committee on Banking, Trade and Commerce to introduce specific amendments to the Proceeds of Crime (Money Laundering) Act.

While senators on the committee supported Bill C-22, they indicated that the legislation would benefit from amendments to certain provisions and, indeed, the government agreed.

[Translation]

The proposed amendments relate to four specific points.

[English]

The first deals with the process of claiming solicitor-client privilege during a FINTRAC audit. FINTRAC is authorized to conduct audits to ensure compliance with the act. The legislation currently contains provisions that apply when FINTRAC conducts a compliance audit of a law office. FINTRAC must provide a reasonable opportunity for legal counsel to claim solicitor-client privilege on any document it possesses at the time of an audit.

(1510)

The amendment in Bill S-16 pertains to documents in the possession of someone other than a lawyer. It requires that person to be given a reasonable opportunity to contact his solicitor in order to make a claim of solicitor-client privilege. This amendment responds to a concern raised at committee during consideration of Bill C-22.

Another change ensures that there is nothing in the act that would prevent the Federal Court from ordering the director of FINTRAC to disclose certain information as required under the Access to Information or Privacy Acts.

[Translation]

This amendment specifies that an individual's recourse to the Federal Court will be respected. This measure has always been part of the spirit of the original law and the amendment will provide guarantees of this.

[English]

The third amendment more precisely defines the kinds of information that may be disclosed to the police and other authorities specified in the legislation. It clarifies that the regulations setting out this information may only cover similar identifying information regarding the client, the institution and the transactions involved.

Finally, the act is amended to ensure that all reports and information in FINTRAC's possession will be destroyed after a certain period. Information that has not been disclosed to police or other authorities must be destroyed by FINTRAC after five years; information that has been disclosed must be destroyed after eight years.

I am confident that all honourable senators will conclude that these new provisions serve to strengthen the existing act.

[Translation]

In the committee report, the senators also called upon the government to give thought to three additional recommendations.

[English]

After serious consideration, the government has decided not to proceed with these three additional recommendations.

First, the Senate committee report recommended that FINTRAC be required to obtain either consent or a warrant before entering a law office to verify compliance with the act, similar to what is required before entering a private home. The government believes that it would be inappropriate to require a warrant to conduct a compliance audit of any place of business, including a law office. The provisions in the current act parallel those in the Income Tax Act, which do not require a warrant except for access to a dwelling house. That remains the same.

Second, senators requested that a parliamentary committee review the administration and operation of the act within three years and every five years thereafter. At present, the act requires a review after five years. The government feels that a five-year review is better for a number of reasons. Most importantly, there will not be enough experience or data available in the three start- up years to provide an accurate assessment of the effectiveness of the legislation or the operations of FINTRAC.

As honourable senators know, parliamentary committees can undertake a review of legislation at any time and can opt to do so any time in this case.

[Translation]

Last, the senators recommended that the regulations should also be tabled before a committee in each House of Parliament, as required by law.

[English]

This act currently stipulates a 90-day public consultation period following pre-publication of the regulations in the Canada Gazette. This is already on the way with respect to the reporting requirements for financial institutions and transactions and an additional 30-day notice period if significant changes are made as a result of those consultations is provided for as well.

We believe that this provides ample opportunity for parliamentary committees — if they wish to do so — to review the regulations proposed by government.

Honourable senators, will know that in the normal course, regulations are posted for 30 days. In the case of this particular bill, posting is extended to 90 days.

Honourable senators, the benefits of the current act are numerous. The new reporting requirements will result in more reliable, timely and consistent reporting. Centralized reporting to FINTRAC will allow much-needed and much more sophisticated analysis. Successful prosecutions that benefit from analysis by FINTRAC can lead to court-ordered forfeiture of the proceeds of criminal activities. Above all, these benefits will be achieved in a way that respects the privacy of individuals.

Honourable senators, I am confident that the additional amendments contained in Bill S-16 will only serve to further strengthen and improve this important statute. The government is most appreciative of the members of the Standing Senate Committee on Banking, Trade and Commerce for their contribution to making the act an even better and stronger piece of legislation.

[Translation]

I invite all honourable senators to vote in favour of this bill.

[English]

Hon. Lowell Murray: Honourable senators, does my honourable friend know whether, in view of the pitiable and unprecedented low value to which our currency has sunk, a more favourable exchange rate is available for hot Canadian dollars?

Senator Furey: I think that is an important question, honourable senators. I will take it under advisement.

On motion of Senator Kinsella, debate adjourned.

March 1, 2001 [Senate]

Hon. Noël A. Kinsella (Deputy Leader of the Opposition): Honourable senators, I will speak at second reading, although this item was adjourned by Senator Kelleher. I am advising the house that he has yielded to me and that I shall speak as critic for the opposition on this bill.

The act to amend the Proceeds of Crime Act was known in the last Parliament and is currently known as the money laundering bill. Our colleague Senator Furey explained to the house that the amendments are based upon an undertaking by the government last June to our Standing Senate Committee on Banking, Trade and Commerce. At that time, the government was particularly anxious to have the money laundering bill passed into law. Rather than agreeing to make the necessary amendments to the bill before it passed, the Secretary of State for financial institutions instead undertook to make the changes at a later date.

Our Banking Committee also made three unanimous recommendations for the minister to consider and, it was hoped, to implement. We note with considerable dismay that the government has chosen to ignore these recommendations. We were particularly disappointed that the government chose not to require FinTRAC, the new agency charged with enforcing the money laundering act, to obtain a warrant before inspecting records and files held in lawyers' offices. Not only does the act force lawyers to breach their oath of confidentiality, but it also fails to afford the information sought the same protection it would have if it were held in a private dwelling.

Honourable senators, confidentiality is one of the basic tenets of our legal system. Lawyers have sworn to uphold this tenet, and clients depend upon it. A visit to a lawyer's office often involves the client divulging sensitive, perhaps valuable and often personal information. Canadians need to be assured that this information is provided all reasonable protection.

The release of this information should only happen after careful consideration and under highly prescribed circumstances. At the very least, the onus should rest clearly on the shoulders of the government to satisfy a judge and obtain a warrant before its release. If the government is required to obtain a warrant to enter and obtain documentation from a private citizen in a dwelling house, then, by logical extension, the government should also be required to obtain a warrant to enter and obtain information and documentation a private citizen has relayed to a lawyer.

Surely, citizens deserve the same legal protection regardless of where their personal or private information is stored. The money laundering act provides that a lawyer may claim solicitor-client privilege for information sought by FinTRAC. This is all well and good, but the burden is on the lawyer and the client to make application to the court to have this privilege upheld.

Honourable senators, I think it is unreasonable that lawyers and their clients are forced to pay the costs of a court application to enforce a basic right that has a long tradition in this country — the basic right of solicitor-client privilege. Surely, innocent taxpayers should not have to pay to protect against an invasion of their privacy.

Honourable senators, as I indicated, the minister has lived up to his undertaking to the Standing Senate Committee on Banking, Trade and Commerce to introduce amendments to the money laundering act. However, he must now be open to those other reasonable amendments that were unanimously recommended by our Banking Committee. Thus, I ask that the Banking Committee, to which this bill will be referred, revisit these issues once the bill is before it.

The Hon. the Speaker *pro tempore: Is it your pleasure, honourable senators, to adopt the motion?

Hon. Senators: Agreed.

Motion agreed to bill read second time.

Referred to Committee

The Hon. the Speaker pro tempore: Honourable senators, when shall this bill be read a third time?

On motion of Senator Robichaud, bill referred to Standing Senate Committee on Banking, Trade and Commerce.

March 21, 2001 [Standing Senate Committee on Banking, Trade and Commerce]

The Chairman: Thank you very much for being with us.

Before we proceed to clause-by-clause study on Bill S-16, to amend the proceeds of crime (money laundering), the sponsor of the bill, Senator Furey, wants to explain one matter to you, and then you can do what makes you happy.

Senator Furey: At the end of our last session, at which we heard from the archivist, there was a question about whether we would amend the clause where we asked for a notwithstanding clause pertaining to the destruction of records - notwithstanding his act. Steve Campbell, from Senator Kolber's office, and myself met with the officials who had discussed with the archivist what particular amendment he wanted. I did not meet with the archivist myself.

The clause pertaining to records now reads:

Notwithstanding the National Archives of Canada Act, shall destroy each report received and all information received or collected on the expiry of the applicable period referred to in paragraph (d).

That is, the fire-year and eight-year periods.

The archivist has asked that we amend that clause by stating:

shall destroy each report received, and all information received or collected, after the applicable period referred to in paragraph (d), in accordance with Records Disposition Authority No. 2001/003 issued on January 22, 2001 under section 5 of the National Archives of Canada Act, without taking into account any subsequent amendments to or repeal of that Authority.

My concern at the time was whether or not this particular directive, which was given by the archivist, would be repealable either by him or by his successors. When I discussed it with officials from the department, I was told that if we used harsher wording than "without taking into account any subsequent amendments to or repeal of that authority" and if we were to say, for example, "the archivist will issue the authority and that will be non-repealable," we would be dangerously close to attempting to amend the National Archives Act. Of course, we cannot do that with this particular bill.

My concern is that while the proposed amendment leaves the archivist free to do his job, that is, to make or to issue directives to destroy or to save, the officials are telling us that we can ignore that directive. That directive would be ineffectual.

My concern with that is, if that is the reality, if that is the practical effect of it, then we are just trying do through the back door what we cannot do through the front door, which is amend his act. I am saying, for greater certainty, even though it may not be what the national archivist wants, we should stay with the notwithstanding clause in the proposed amendment.

The Chairman: Is that clear, gentlemen?

Senator Tkachuk: I have no problem with that.

Senator Furey: The notwithstanding provision is certain. Even though officials are telling us that this one would stand the test, I have some concerns that it would not. My recommendation would be to go with certainty.

Senator Tkachuk: As it is now, we want them destroyed, right?

Senator Furey: Yes.

The Chairman: Yes. Is it agreed, gentlemen, that we consider the bill clause-by-clause? Is it the intention of any honourable senator to propose an amendment?

Senator Tkachuk: First, I wish to make a statement on the money laundering bill. It will become clear when I finish why it is important that I make a statement.

We studied Bill C-22 last June. At that time, our committee felt strongly about a number of issues. Since the House had already recessed for the summer break, the government asked that the bill be passed unamended. The minister promised that certain amendments of concern would be brought back in the form of a new bill at his earliest opportunity. The minister stated this is a letter, a copy of which you all have.

My understanding is that this letter was drafted and, due to a misunderstanding on the part of the Chair of our committee, which may have been caused my me, him, or both of us, he believed that the Conservatives refused to negotiate. As a result, our specific concerns were not relayed to the minister. Once that misunderstanding was cleared up in committee, we were still left in the predicament of passing the bill unamended until these concerns could be addressed at a later date, which was the next session of Parliament.

Liberal members felt generally that their concerns were met by the letter, but were willing to attach to the committee report a list of observations, which we all agreed to, which were really our observations on Bill C-22.

While we support being tough on crime and giving much- needed tools to government to track down money launderers in this country, we also believe strongly in providing a check on that same government.

That being said, with the establishment of a new agency, FINTRAC, or Financial Transactions and Reports Analysis Centre of Canada, we remain unsatisfied with the clause in Bill C-22 that instituted a five-year review.

I realize that this point could be considered out of order, which is why I asked, and the Chairman so kindly let me go ahead with this, as it does not fall within the scope of Bill S-16. However, I am asking honourable senators to hear me out. I believe our Chair and our members are reasonable people. In all my dealings with the Chairman he has been so.

Our discussion of the letter is reported in the transcripts of the committee hearing. I am quoting myself here when I say that the letter was sent to the Chairman from Mr. Peterson. I asked:

Do you know whether he would be willing to make changes in the letter? Does this letter come about because the minister and his officials were listening to the witnesses and they said, "Oh, these are the items," or was there a whole list of items from which he decided?

The Chairman: I hear where are you going and you are obviously free to go wherever you like, but my understand ing was that you folks would not accept a letter of any kind. That is why we worked out a letter which was acceptable to us to show to you. You told me that nothing less than regular amendments would do and that letters were not acceptable. You are catching me unaware here.

Which I did say. That did not mean that I did not want to negotiate. That is simply what I said. There are two issues here. You had asked whether we would accept the letter. Of course, over the last seven years that I have been here there have been many letters, but nothing has ever happened. That is why we had many concerns over the letter.

If it was not for that misunderstanding, I believe there would have been a very good chance that our review clause would have made this bill. In fact, I have reason to believe that the drafters of this bill in concept are in this room right now.

I am not sure, but I think so. That being said, I humbly ask all senators on this committee to consider unanimously supporting the adoption of my amendment to institute a period of review of three years rather than five years. We all agreed to this in our observations.

It will still be up to the Senate to decide ultimately whether this amendment shall pass. I will have to make my case again before a point of order is called in the Senate. I understand that, according to Beauchesne's and Montpetit and Marleau, scope is a convention of Parliament. In fairness, a committee can choose to overlook a potential point of order if the feeling is unanimous. If it is not unanimous, I understand.

I would like to change the review clause to three years because I think five years is too long to wait to see how well the new agency is operating and all our members feel that way. In fact, last week in committee there was testimony suggesting that a review would even take place within one year, and the chairman asked Minister Cullen whether he would come back in a year and he said that he would. I do not think anybody disagreed in principle with limiting it, and I have amendments here for one year or three years, whatever the wishes of senators are.

I think five years is too long and so I have my amendment.

The Chairman: Would you care to make it formal, please?

Senator Tkachuk: I would, or you could wait until we get to that part of the bill. I think I handed it to the Clerk.

Is it possible to have some discussion as to how members feel before the amendment is proposed?

Let us put it this way: If there is no consideration whatsoever by the government to passing any amendment, to giving any truck to one, we would prefer to have the amendment on division, so at least our point of view is stated in the record rather than through a point of order. That is what I am asking honourable senators to do here today.

The Chairman: My impression is that members on the Liberal side want to go ahead with it as is, which is five years.

Senator Tkachuk: Right.

The Chairman: Do honourable senators agree with that?

Senator Furey, you are the sponsor. Why do you not get into this?

Senator Furey: Just a comment on Senator Tkachuk's issue. I have really no problem with a three-year period, except in this instance, where it is the first three-year period. There is really nothing going on there yet. It is not staffed. Therefore, one of those three years will probably be wasted in terms of collecting information and being able to do a proper assessment. With respect to three rather five, I really have no problem with it at all. It is just that, for start-up reasons, I do not think three is long enough. That is probably the message we were getting from officials.

Senator Tkachuk: You mean one year is too short, three years is not long enough, and five years is about right?

Senator Furey: Yes, that is basically the assessment.

Senator Tkachuk: Are you saying five years, and three years thereafter, or every one year thereafter? Would you be agreeable to that?

Senator Furey: I certainly would be agreeable to five and then every three years. I have no problem with that. I am not speaking for everyone else, obviously.

The Chairman: The only reasonable thing to do would be to recess for three minutes and discuss it.

Senator Tkachuk: That would be fine.

The Chairman: Is that all right with you?

Senator Tkachuk: That would be great.

The Chairman: Is that your only amendment?

Senator Tkachuk: That is the only amendment we have.

The Chairman: Let us recess for three minutes and we will decide.

(The committee suspended)

(Upon resuming)

The Chairman: After much consultation and hearing advice, by Senator Tkachuk's own admission, the proposed amendment is out of order, and I so rule. Shall we continue?

Shall the title stand postponed? Shall clause 1 carry?

Some Hon. Senators: Agreed.

Senator Tkachuk: On division. All on division.

The Chairman: In other words, you are against each one of them.

Senator Tkachuk: You can do it anyway you like.

The Chairman: It is a question of how we report it.

Senator Di Nino: On division.

Senator Tkachuk: Report it all on division.

The Chairman: Shall clause 2 carry?

Some Hon. Senators: Agreed.

Senator Tkachuk: On division.

The Chairman: Shall clause 3 carry?

Some Hon. Senators: Agreed.

Senator Tkachuk: On division.

The Chairman: Shall clause 4 carry?

Some Hon. Senators: Agreed.

Senator Tkachuk: On division.

The Chairman: Shall the title carry?

Some Hon. Senators: Agreed.

Senator Tkachuk: On division.

The Chairman: Shall I report the bill?

Some Hon. Senators: Agreed.

Senator Di Nino: On division.

The Chairman: The Clerk tells me that when we report a bill, it cannot show on division, but the minutes can.

March 15, 2001 [Standng Senate Committee on Banking, Trade and Commerce]

Mr. Roy Cullen, Parliamentary Secretary to the Minister of Finance: I am pleased to be here to speak to Bill S-16. Last June, I appeared before this committee to discuss Bill C-22, the bill that put in place the legislation that we are now proposing to amend.

I would like to take this opportunity to thank the committee for its very careful study of Bill C-22 back then. The enactment of Bill C-22 was an important milestone in Canada's legislative framework for fighting organized crime and money laundering.

[Translation]

Its timely passage also brought Canada's anti-money laundering regime into line with international standards and allows Canada to participate fully in the international efforts against money laundering.

[English]

As a member of the G-7 and the Financial Action Task Force, Canada had committed to improving our anti-money laundering regime. It was important that Canada be seen by our international partners to be making progress on this front, particularly in that the Financial Action Task Force was engaged in a process of publicly listing countries as having deficient anti-money laundering controls about the time the legislation was passed.

At meetings of the OECD and OSCE in Europe that I attended last summer, I was pleased and proud to report that Canada had passed this important piece of legislation and, again, I thank you.

Honourable senators, you will recall that the Proceeds of Crime (Money Laundering) Act provides for a system of mandatory reporting of certain financial transactions and cross-border movements of large amounts of currency and monetary instruments. The legislation also established the Financial Transactions and Reports Analysis Centre of Canada, FinTRAC, which will analyze these reports in a prescribed way and provide information to police for prescribed reasons and in a prescribed way to assist them in the prosecution of money laundering offences.

The establishment of FinTRAC as an independent agency at arm's length from law enforcement is one of the many privacy safeguards contained in the act. FinTRAC was formally established on July 5, 2000. It is now building the technical and analytical capacity needed to perform its mandate. It will begin to receive financial transaction reports after the necessary regulations have been implemented.

The proposed regulations for record keeping and financial transaction reporting requirements were published on February 17, 2001, in the Canada Gazette for a 90-day public comment period. Consultations are now underway to develop regulations to implement the reporting requirements for large cross-border movements of currency and monetary instruments. In addition, FinTRAC has developed draft guidelines to help financial institutions and intermediaries comply with the act and has initiated consultations with stakeholders.

Now, I would like to turn to the bill before us today -- Bill S-16. The four amendments that make up this bill respond directly to issues raised by honourable senators when they studied Bill C-22 in this committee last June.

[English]

The proposed amendments will be familiar to the senators on this committee as they were outlined in a letter dated June 14, 2000, from Secretary of State Jim Peterson to the committee chairman. That letter was included in the committee's report on Bill C-22.

Briefly, the proposed amendments relate to four specific issues. The first deals with the process for claiming solicitor-client privilege during an audit conducted by FinTRAC. As you know, FinTRAC is authorized to conduct audits to ensure compliance with the requirements under Part I of the act, namely the requirements to keep records and to report certain types of financial transactions.

The legislation currently contains provisions that apply when FinTRAC conducts a compliance audit of a law office. FinTRAC must provide legal counsel with a reasonable opportunity to make a claim of solicitor-client privilege with respect to any document in their possession at the time of the audit. The proposed amendment contained in Bill S-16 deals with situations where documents are in the possession of a person who is not a legal counsel. It would require that such a person be given a reasonable opportunity to contact legal counsel in order to make a claim of solicitor-client privilege.

Honourable senators will recall that this issue was raised by representatives of the accounting profession when they appeared before this committee last June 2000.

Another change ensures that nothing in the Proceeds of Crime (Money Laundering) Act prevents the Federal Court from exercising its authority under the Access to Information Act or the Privacy Act to order the director of FinTRAC to disclose certain information by either of those acts. This proposed amendment makes it clear that the recourse of individuals to the Federal Court is fully protected. This was the intent of the original bill and the proposed amendment will ensure that this will be the result.

The third proposed amendment more precisely defines the kind of information that may be disclosed to the police and other authorities.

[Translation]

The amendment clarifies that the regulations setting out this information may only cover similar identifying information regarding the client, the institution and the transactions involved. This deals with a concern of the committee that the existing wording may have provided for greater latitude for using regulations to add to the list of information set out in the act itself.

[English]

Bill S-16 would amend the act to ensure that all reports and information in FinTRAC's possession will be destroyed after specific periods: information that has not been disclosed to police or other authorities must be destroyed after five years; information that has been disclosed must be destroyed after eight years. The archivist presented a proposal that, on the face of it, seems to meet our requirements. However, if there are any difficulties, we will talk to you before the clause-by-clause occurs. We believe that it meets our requirements and we are happy, in that case.

The Chairman: Could you clarify that, please? My understanding, after meeting with the officials this morning, is that if we are satisfied then you are satisfied. Is that correct?

Mr. Cullen: The officials are satisfied, and I am satisfied on the face of it. However, I want to make sure that the government is satisfied, as I am sure they will be. We will contact you immediately if there is any problem.

I hope that honourable senators will find that these four provisions respond in a meaningful and concise way to the concerns raised by this committee.

Before I conclude, I will mention that the government considered very carefully this committee's report on Bill C-22, including the suggestions for three additional amendments to the act.

In response, the government has moved quickly to introduce the amendments that the Secretary of State committed to make, and that I have just described. However, the government has decided not to proceed with any further amendments to the act at this time, and if I you will allow me, I will briefly explain why.

First, the committee report recommended that FinTRAC be required to obtain either consent or a warrant before entering a law office to verify compliance with the act, similar to what is required before entering a private home.

Such an amendment, in our view, would treat a law office like a private home, rather than like other places of business. The government believes that it would be inappropriate to require a warrant to conduct a compliance audit -- I repeat, a compliance audit -- of any place of business, including the law office. The provisions in the act parallel those in the Income Tax Act, which do not require a warrant except for access to a private house.

Second, Parliament requested that a parliamentary committee review the act within three years and every five years after that. At present, the act requires a review after five years.

With respect, senators, I submit that a five-year review is more appropriate, for a number of reasons. More important, there will not be enough experience or data available within three years to provide an accurate assessment of the effectiveness of the legislation or the operations of FinTRAC. In any event, committees of Parliament can undertake to review any legislation at any time and could opt to do so in this case.

[Translation]

Finally, the committee report recommended that the act require regulations to be tabled before a committee in each House of Parliament.

[English]

The act currently stipulates a 90-day public consultation period, following prepublication of the regulations in the Canada Gazette, and an additional 30-day notice period if significant changes are made as a result of those consultations. We believe that this process provides ample opportunity for parliamentary committees, if they wish to do so, to review the regulations proposed by the government.

The Secretary of State has sent to the chair of this committee a copy of the proposed regulations, which were prepublished in the Canada Gazette on February 17, 2001, and they are also available on the Finance Canada Web site.

[Translation]

In closing, honourable senators, I would like to thank you once again for your close study of Bill C-22 and for raising the issues that the government has addressed through the bill before us today -- Bill S-16.

[English]

The government has devoted considerable time and energy to crafting its anti-money laundering legislation in such a way as to meet the needs of law enforcement while protecting individual privacy. The amendments contained in the bill considered today result from this committee's invaluable input to this matter. The officials that are here today and I are pleased to answer any questions.

The Chairman: Could you clarify the difference between a "compliance" and a "search"? That information is integral to the whole question of the warrant.

Mr. Cullen: In general terms, if there is a reporting requirement under the act we are talking about a compliance issue.

Mr. Yvon Carrière, Senior Counsel, Tax Counsel Division, Law Branch, Department of Finance: When FinTRAC conducts a compliance audit, they verify whether, in fact, the required reports were prepared. They are not investigating to know whether money laundering has occurred, or some other criminal activity. In fact, they would not be authorized to gather such evidence to prove that a crime had occurred. In the case of a criminal search, a warrant is obtained, and the people who perform the search in a criminal matter will look for specific evidence related to that criminal infraction.

A compliance audit is simply performed to verify whether the reports and records required to be kept under the Proceeds of Crime (Money Laundering) Act have been kept and that the reports have been made.

Mr. Cullen: Any information obtained by FinTRAC during the course of a compliance examination cannot be disclosed to law enforcement under section 55 of this act for the purposes of a proceeds of crime (money laundering) investigation. If it were disclosed, it would render the information inadmissible in a court of law.

Senator Tkachuk: I have a question about the "dwelling house." It bothers me as it bothered Mr. Kelleher. Mr. Cullen, you implied that it was different from a business, but that would be news to me.

I received an article by Mr. Peter Hogg, Dean of Osgoode Law School, that states that the common law rule is that a police officer or government official has no authority to enter private property for the purpose of searching for evidence and no authority to seize private property for use as evidence, unless authorized by law. However, we do that from time to time, in that common law continues to apply and that we can sometimes, by statute, make an exemption to that. However, it was just the way in which you were talking about "house " that bothered me. The home is special, and my interpretation of it would be that which we have to protect. It is my right, as a citizen, not to have law enforcement officials come to my home or my place of business without a warrant, or anywhere else that I consider my property -- those places should be protected. This is an exemption that only applies to the Income Tax Act. As far as we could find, there is no other exemption like this.

Why do you need this special power? Frankly, it scares the hell out of me. Once you make this exemption, there will be others. If there is no evidence, why is it necessary to search a dwelling?

Mr. Peter Sankoff, Counsel, Human Rights Law Section, Public Law and Central Agencies Portfolio, Legal Operations Section, Department of Justice: You have raised a complicated question. I will try my best to deal with that and all other aspects.

My understanding of the case law generally, and especially in respect of the Charter of Rights and Freedoms, is that there is a fair distinction made between the dwelling house as the place most deserving of protection. In particular with relation to this act, I would draw a number of distinctions. This act is not normally designed to cover a dwelling house. It is not a place that would generally have activities that would generate suspicious transaction reports.

As a precaution, a section has been included to deal with dwelling houses in case there is activity that would generate these kinds of reports. Because it is unlikely that this will occur, a special warrant provision has been put in to deal with that. It is not uncommon for that to be the case. A number of pieces of legislation have distinctions about what can be done in a dwelling house and what can be done in any other type of place.

I do not disagree with your proposition, that, as a rule, we wish to have preauthorized judicial authority to go into any place.

Nonetheless, the case law once again has made a rather serious distinction between what we would call regulated activity and what we would call a search for criminal purposes. In this case, it is very clear that the particular matter that we are discussing relates to regulated activity. The centre is only allowed to go into these types of premises where they are regulating compliance.

As Mr. Cullen pointed out earlier, none of the information can be used. It is clear from the way the act is currently worded that any information obtained in the course of a compliance audit cannot be used in a criminal investigation and cannot be used by the centre to determine whether money laundering has taken place. The sole purpose is for compliance. The manner in which this has been drafted goes a long way to ensuring that the distinction between regulatory compliance and a search for criminal purposes that has been made so clear in the case law is upheld. Therefore, I would see those two distinctions as making this situation special.

Senator Tkachuk: You mentioned the Charter of Rights and Freedoms. First, you are telling me that the Charter of Rights and Freedoms gives less rights than common law, which talks about property, not just dwelling place. Second, it is not the fact that you may find evidence of other wrongdoing that concerns me; it is the very act of government officials coming into my property. It is not the fact that you may find something but the fact that you have no right to be there in the first place, unless you have a reason to be there, and the reason should be supported by enough evidence to obtain a search warrant. I do not like you walking in. It is not because I am a criminal but because I do not like you walking in. You can have all these other exemptions, but as governments and legislators we have to prevent governments and police from walking in. We have a responsibility to do that, and that is what I am trying to do here.

Mr. Sankoff: I understand that. All I can say in response is that the number of situations where the government has the right to intrude on a business -- I hate to use the word "intrude," but let us say to assess a business or a property without a warrant for regulatory purposes -- are beyond my ability to number at this time. There are a number of areas where there is a purpose that is pressing. As I understand it, the justifications put forth for this initiative are pressing. I do not think this would be an everyday thing or that they would be going in at any time. It would be something undertaken from time to time for the purpose of ensuring compliance only. That, in my opinion, is not uncommon. In countless industries, government officials have the ability to go in solely to monitor compliance or to ensure that the very important process that is underway is actually taking place in the manner in which it was designed.

I understand the concerns about privacy here; nonetheless, the courts have generally accepted that for these purposes only. That is why the distinction about what is going on is so critical. They have generally accepted that the government needs to monitor compliance with various regimes, and the purpose that is being put forward for this one is seen as very important. That is where the distinction comes from.

Senator Meighen: Could someone refresh my memory as to what triggers the audit compliance initiative. What makes FinTRAC decide that they are going to undertake an audit compliance?

Ms Patricia M. Smith, Deputy Director, Policy, Liaison and Compliance, Financial Transactions and Reports Analysis Centre of Canada: Senator, a number of factors determine that we come in.

First off, we will have liaison officers in the field. They will be in contact with the reporting entities, finding out if they are comfortable with the legislation and with the regulations. I should point out that, as part of the regulations, there is a requirement to put in place an anti-money laundering compliance regime. The liaison officers will be going out and seeing if more information is needed to put such regimes in place.

Part of the job that we are doing now in terms of trying to become operational is to assess the training needs of the reporting entries. Hence, another factor that comes into place is this: What will be the training requirements of all these reporting entries?

Eventually, when we do become fully operational and start to receive transaction reports, we will have some statistics on the general nature of reporting and compliance. If 95 per cent of all entries from a particular sector are reporting, then we will know that there are some anomalies, and we will go back to the reporting entries and see if they understand the regulations and the law. Is there something they are not doing? Is the problem something to do with timeliness? Is the problem we are looking at something to do with their inability to connect with our reporting mechanism? They will be reporting largely through the Web or through a secure socket network.

There will be a number of methods by which we will be able to determine lapses in compliance. If, after looking at this and talking to the reporting entry, we determine there may be something more serious, then we would inform them that we are coming in to do a compliance examination, and we will give them feedback on the results of that compliance examination.

Senator Meighen: The reporting entity is any body that is required to report under the act?

Ms Smith: Yes.

Senator Meighen: It could be a law office.

Ms Smith: It could be.

Mr. Cullen: As I understand it, there could be situations where information would indicate that some intermediary, on the face of it, should be reporting, or there are sufficient grounds to believe that they should be reporting and the reports are not coming in. That would be cause for someone to ask the question.

Mr. Richard Lalonde, Chief, Financial Crimes, Financial Sector Division, Financial Sector Policy Branch, Department of Finance: I can give an example just to clarify that it is not just any business that will be reporting. The bill sets out very clearly that we are dealing largely with regulated financial institutions, and those are spelled out in clause 5 of the bill.

The bill also provides the ability to prescribe under regulation additional reporting entities, which we have done in the regulations that were prepublished in the Canada Gazette just recently.

As Mr. Cullen and Ms Smith have indicated, there may be instances where there may be gaps in reporting from certain sectors. I can give an example of the currency exchange business. There may be instances where, in one part of the country, FinTRAC may be receiving lots of reports from currency exchange businesses. Perhaps in another region of Canada there are very few. That may trigger a question as to why that is occurring and therefore prompt FinTRAC to inquire with those reporting entries in that region.

Senator Kroft: I am curious about this idea of reports that should be coming in. That suggests to me that you would take classes of institutions or offices or businesses and develop almost a statistical base saying that, given a certain volume in a certain industry, you should be getting a certain number of reports a month. Perhaps you are not meeting your quota. Is it that kind of analysis, or does there need to be some sort of a more specific fact-based trigger to prompt it?

The example you gave kind of fell in the middle. It was not exactly clear to me. Do you need a specific situation in order to trigger this, or will it be done on a statistical basis?

Mr. Lalonde: FinTRAC has the authority to do compliance audits on all reporting entries. As a matter of practice, it will not necessarily have the resources to visit all reporting entries on a routine basis and as such will have to decide and prioritize which entities will be conducting compliance audits. In the example I gave would be perhaps one criterion that they might use.

The legislation also provides, and I mention this in passing, the authority for FinTRAC to enter into collaborative arrangements with other regulators and other self-regulatory organizations for the purpose of carrying out this particular function of compliance audit as well.

Senator Meighen: Although you have answered the question, I am still not clear how you get this wonderful status of reporting entity. What do you have to do to get that? Do you have to be RBC Dominion Securities? Do you have to be Senator Kelleher's law office? How do you get this exalted status?

Mr. Lalonde: We use the term "reporting entity" to describe all those businesses covered under section 5 of the Act. Under this section, we talk about banks under the Bank Act.

Senator Meighen: There must be a catch-all clause.

Mr. Lalonde: There is an additional clause that allows us to respond to situations where, for example, internationally there may be new industries or new ways that money is being laundered. It allows us to add to the list of entities covered by the requirements by regulation.

As I indicated earlier, in the draft regulations that were prepublished on February 17, we have included, for example, the wire transfer business -- the Western Unions of this world -- as a business that ought to be covered by the requirements of the act. They may not be specified in the act, but they are prescribed in the regulations. We will be receiving views from that particular industry concerning that issue.

Senator Meighen: Let me turn, if I may, to the specific example of a law firm. How does a law firm fall into that status?

Mr. Lalonde: It would be in precisely the same manner as the Western Union or the wire transfer business would be included, by regulation.

The Chairman: That does not make sense.

Senator Meighen: Is my law firm obliged under this legislation now, or do I wait for a letter from you?

Mr. Lalonde: We have had extensive consultations over the last year or two with the Canadian Bar Association, the Barreau du Québec and others concerning the Proceeds of Crime Act, as well as the proposed regulations. At the association level, certainly, they are well aware of the government's intent.

The government has also prepublished these regulations and has announced this fact publicly.

Senator Meighen: With respect, I do not understand your answer to my question.

The Chairman: Is every Canadian presumed to read all regulations? Senator Meighen has an interesting tact here. Is a letter going to go out from FinTRAC to every conceivable suspect? Of course, I am using that word in quotation marks. Really, how does it start?

Ms Smith: There are a number of things. It is an iterative process on which we are just embarking. There have been consultations on the regulations that were prepublished; we are also commencing consultations on the guidelines that enumerate some of the requirements of the act.

As Mr. Lalonde has said, the regulation that pertains to lawyers is very specific. There are certain actions that a lawyer has to take before he or she becomes a reporting entity. He or she must be engaged in financial transactions. A lawyer giving out legal or criminal advice is not covered. It is only when he or she is engaged in very specific financial transactions. The regulation states that every legal counsel is subject to Part 1 of the act when he or she engages in any of the following activities on behalf of a third party, including the giving of instructions on behalf of a third party in respect to those activities. Then it lists the receipt or payment of funds other than those received or paid in respect of professional fees.

Senator Meighen: Let me pose a hypothetical situation. I am a client. I am interested in investing in a property in Ottawa. I send $500,000 cash to my lawyer in Ottawa, or $20,000.

Ms Smith: Are you the lawyer or the client?

Senator Meighen: I am the client. I am interested in buying properties in Ottawa. I have not sent the funds for the purpose of paying a fee.

Ms Smith: Your lawyer would probably then be a reporting entity.

Senator Meighen: That is my point. You will have many lawyers who are reporting entities because often, heretofore, at least, clients have given money to lawyers to hold for a future specific purpose.

The Chairman: Is that cash or cheque?

Ms Smith: It is only if it is cash for large cash transaction reporting requirments.

Senator Meighen: My colleague Senator Tkachuk just asked, if it is an electronic transfer, is it cash or cheque?

Ms Smith: If it is cash, your lawyer, as a reporting entity, must report the large cash transaction, which is any amount over $10,000. However, if you come in with a suitcase and you make a number of smaller transactions, it might be considered suspicious and would also be covered as a reporting requirment.

Senator Meighen: What is the situation if it is an electronic transfer?

Ms Smith: I am not aware that lawyers have that capacity. It is covered, yes.

Senator Meighen: That qualifies as cash?

Ms Smith: It is a transaction that needs to be reported.

Going back to how to inform everybody, we have been dealing with the Canadian Bar Association.

The Chairman: Excuse me, but there is something really wrong here. Are you telling me every electronic transfer is subject to some kind of something-or-other? There must be thousands of these transfers every day.

Ms Smith: It is international.

The Chairman: Yes, international.

Ms Smith: The amount must be over $10,000.

The Chairman: That is nuts. That is how business is transacted every day. As an example, I just transferred money electronically to one of my children. Is that a suspicious transfer?

Ms Smith: No, sir.

The Chairman: Why not? It comes under your definition.

Ms Smith: It is under the definition of a prescribed transaction.

The Chairman: Someone has to report that?

Ms Smith: That will be reported.

The Chairman: It is idiotic.

Senator Tkachuk: That is what we were trying to say the first time.

Senator Meighen: To go to the other tack, the thrust of all this seems to be an assurance that the proper reporting procedure is being followed. Once we know that it is being followed, then everybody is happy.

Ms Smith: Yes.

Senator Meighen: I do not know where that takes us. I will now come at it from the other side. Now you are saying that anything that is discovered by action in the course of investigation cannot be used as evidence in a criminal prosecution. Therefore, we are going through all this sound and fury merely to ensure that we have a nice, tidy, complete reporting function that goes nowhere except to allow someone to tick off and say, "Yes, the report was received in due and proper form."

Mr. Cullen: The first step is to get the reporting on track. Once the reporting is on track, the normal provisions would apply, I would suspect.

Senator Meighen: Let us say in the course of a totally normal compliance audit that you do come across something that is suspicious. I understood you to say that you can do absolutely nothing with it, under any circumstances. Is that correct?

Mr. Sankoff: The way it is drafted right now, that is the way it is.

Senator Meighen: What is the point of doing it?

Mr. Sankoff: The idea is that the persons who do not go further with these will be subject to prosecution for non-compliance. The idea, as we understand it, is not that persons captured by the act are going to regularly disobey the law. There are penalties for non-compliance. There are obligations in this act, and non-compliance is a problem, so the idea is that, over time, people will comply.

Senator Meighen: If I were a big, nasty money launderer, first, I would not be worried about an administrative slap on the wrist for not filling in some form; and, second, I would be sure to fill it out very accurately because I would be certain that you would be on my tail immediately if it were not filled out accurately, even though you might have told me that you would not do so. This is confusing.

Mr. Sankoff: It will not actually be the money launderer filling out the forms. It will be the other entities.

Senator Meighen: The money launderer's lawyer?

Mr. Sankoff: Theoretically, money launderers could engage in massive fraud, but in each case they will be subject to other penalties. There are other ways of deterring these sorts of activities.

Non-compliance is designed solely to deal with non-compliance. It is a regulatory function. Senators have expressed difficulty with the procedures that allow us to go in without a warrant to check for non-compliance. There is good reason why you are only allowed to go in for the purpose of non-compliance. It is quite reasonable that, in these circumstances, you cannot use that information for a prosecution.

The only reason that the centre is allowed in without the protection that has been expressed by senators is that it is strictly for non-compliance. If you were allowed to use that information, we might have a problem.

Senator Furey: Senator Meighen basically reiterated what has been said already in terms of any documentation that is found to be suspicious during a compliance. You are satisfied that section 55 prevents the use of that, is that correct?

Mr. Sankoff: The way it is worded, that is correct.

Senator Furey: Would you also say that you would be satisfied that it would include the use of it to ground an application for a warrant?

Mr. Sankoff: First, the centre is caught by various non-disclosure provisions. It is more than section 55. There is also the proposed amendment to section 54, which precludes the centre from using it in their analysis. The centre has very broad non-disclosure provisions. They cannot give it to anyone to get a warrant. The centre has no ability to get warrants on its own.

Since they are precluded from disclosing it to the police -- or anyone else for that matter -- there is no way you could ground a warrant with that information. I would say you are correct.

Senator Furey: If that is case, you are back to the normal rules. If an investigating officer wanted to go into a business, he or she would have to satisfy a justice of the peace that there are reasonable grounds to believe, say, in this case, relevant records exist. That information would come outside of anything to do with a compliance audit. Is that correct?

Mr. Sankoff: That is correct, except what might be obtained during the prosecution for non-compliance, but it would not include the specifics of the records. Once there was a prosecution for non-compliance, it would be on public record.

Senator Furey: Presumably, that would follow an application for a warrant that was grounded in information not obtained through a compliance audit?

Mr. Sankoff: That is is not entirely correct. The person could be prosecuted for non-compliance. The centre has the ability to turn over material to the police strictly on non-compliance -- that is, where it is shown that there is non-compliance.

Senator Furey: A document that was found during compliance and could disclose criminal activity -- and I will not call non-compliance criminal activity; we will call it quasi criminal for now, just to differentiate -- could be used in a non-compliance prosecution. Is that what you are saying?

Mr. Sankoff: It would not be relevant to compliance, so it would not be used in that compliance prosecution.

Senator Furey: But it could be?

Mr. Sankoff: I have difficulty seeing how that could occur. If it did not relate to non-compliance, it could not be used in a non-compliance prosecution.

Senator Furey: But it could relate to non-compliance.

Mr. Sankoff: If it related strictly to non-compliance, it could be used in a non-compliance prosecution; that is correct.

The Chairman: Does anyone in your department have the vaguest idea how many wire transfers of over $10,000 are done in a year? It must be tens of thousands. Every time you buy stock in excess of $10,000, you wire the money to the stockbroker or to the person buying the stock for you. That must represent many tens of thousands of dollars.

Ms Smith: We are engaged in those discussions with the industry. We are in the consultation phase and are attempting to establish whether reporting entities will be able to use batch file transfers for reporting. That is one of the key elements we are working on, namely, estimating how many electronic transfers FinTRAC will receive.

The Chairman: You will need an credible army of people to police this.

Senator Meighen: That is another reason to review this after three years.

Mr. Cullen: This is new territory for Canada and for us. We want to make sure that the net is cast widely enough. Once you make exceptions, that is where the money launderers will go. We have also said at this committee that, given the regulatory regime we have, we can adapt and change and meet new requirements as they arise while being more flexible in terms of changing the guidelines regarding what comes into the net and what does not. At the first instance, we want to be sure that we do not create openings so that would be easy for people to come through.

We will grow and learn with our experience. I am not here to tell you that we have every single answer on every single type of transaction. We will be developing that through regulation and guidelines as this progresses.

Senator Setlakwe: In the case of compliance, you said there was a preclusion. If that occurs, what do you do? Do you not report it to the police? In the case of compliance, do you find something that is disturbing and that should be reported to the police but you are prohibited from doing so?

Mr. Sankoff: On material that is discovered, if you discover that the person has not complied, that means the regulator entity is subject to prosecution for non-compliance. The rest of the material -- that is, the material that may reveal other crime -- is not reported to the police unless it is for the purpose of the non-compliance prosecution solely.

Senator Tkachuk: If you find cocaine, there is no problem?

Mr. Sankoff: There is a general exception at common law, namely, the plain view exception. If, for example, you walked in on a murder, you are not precluded from calling the police and telling them that a murder is taking place.

Senator Tkachuk: If the cocaine is on top of a desk versus being locked up in a safe, is there a difference?

Mr. Sankoff: The limits of the doctrine have not been explored, so I cannot give a comprehensive answer. Generally, the courts hold that compliance inspections are designed to ensure compliance. If the centre went beyond its powers, I have no hesitation from saying the courts would stop them from doing so. While your situation may provide some border line examples of cocaine on a desk, the power here is toward compliance. If the centre abuses its powers, the court still retains control to censor that.

Senator Setlakwe: If you come upon an indictable offence, you would not report it?

Mr. Sankoff: If compliance is being done, it is not the centre's purpose to report on other activities. The centre is a non-investigative agency.

Senator Tkachuk: When we met last spring, we did not really get a good definition from you of "suspicious transaction." We had problems with that term, if you remember. Has there been anything further regarding that? What is a "suspicious transaction"?

Ms Smith: That is not an easy question to answer. We have written a draft guideline that is out for consultation now. A "suspicious transaction" will differ in the context in which it is found. There are few examples of an individual suspicious transaction but, rather, in a context where the transaction itself is suspicious. Let me try to simplify this.

If you are the Toronto-Dominion doing private banking, you will be looking for very different indicators of suspicion than if you are the credit union in Lower Stewiacke.

It will, in part, relate to how well you know your client and what is normal for that client's activity. If your client is a business and normally they have cash deposits of $10,000 four times a week, then that is normal. If a $10,000 deposit is made, there is no suspicion. If, on another day, $1 million is suddenly deposited, that may or may not be suspicious depending on what the bank or the entity knows about that client.

Senator Tkachuk: Last June we were under a tremendous rush to pass Bill C-22 because the government needed to get the centre up and running. How many employees do you have at the centre and what do you think its projected annual cost will be for the year?

Ms Smith: Right now, we have approximately 70 per cent of our total employment in the centre. We have approximately 70 employees. I believe our budget for this year is $20 million.

Senator Tkachuk: Last year, I believe you said it would be $15 million.

Ms Smith: I do not have the exact numbers.

Senator Tkachuk: Do you expect to have 100 employees?

Ms Smith: Right now we are resourced for around 100, yes, and we have approximately 70 in place.

Senator Tkachuk: Would you send me a letter with a more precise answer on that?

I am not sure if what I experienced was a mistake on the part of Nesbitt Burns, but I had what they call a locked-in retirement plan from a previous employment. At the age of 55, I wanted to convert that locked-in plan into what they call a RRIF. The broker requested that I produce a picture ID. I have known this broker for 15 years and therefore asked him why picture ID was necessary. He told me that it was to conform with either this act or the act passed previously, and that it had to do with money laundering. I refused to produce the ID and he informed me that I would then need to sign a waiver. I signed a waiver and sent it away. I do not recall what the waiver stated. It was small print.

I thought that odd, and that is why I worry about bills like this. Why would such a request be made? Would any of the department officials here today know the reason for that request? Why would a picture ID be required? What was the waiver all about?

Mr. Lalonde: The "know-your-customer" principle is one of the cornerstones of the international anti-money laundering standards. As well, being able to ascertain the identity of your client is key. In the current regulations, which have been in force since 1993, there is a requirement that those financial institutions covered by the previous act ascertain the identify of their clients by reference to a number of pieces of identity. For example, it could be a driver's licence or another similar document.

It is required of the security's broker or the financial institution, when opening up new business relations with a client, to ascertain the identity of the client by reference to a driver's licence, for example. There is also a requirement to record that fact and take note of the reference number. That is the current requirement.

Senator Tkachuk: In order to open an account an individual must basically put his or her whole life on paper, just to open the account, right? The paperwork to be filled out is quite thick. The situation I described referred to the RRIF account. I had already filled one in for the other account to get the locked-in plan.

What happens with the picture ID? Would it be put on a wall in the broker's office so that they can throw darts at it because I am a senator? If I had sent it in, what would have happened to my ID? Would it have been sent to the government or would it be kept in a file in the broker's office?

Mr. Lalonde: There are several ways in which securities brokers are allowed to ascertain the identity of their clients. If we are talking about picture ID, typically what must occur is that the institutions would need to ascertain your identity face to face. There is no requirement for them to maintain a photocopy of whatever picture ID you gave them' they simply must record the reference number. It is due diligence for them. It records the fact that they have actually done this.

Senator Tkachuk: I just thought it was odd.

Senator Furey: I should like to go back to this issue of documentation disclosed during a compliance audit.

It was my understanding that any information obtained during a compliance audit could not be disclosed, in accordance with section 55, among other sections, as you pointed out; that in fact if information were disclosed it would render the evidence inadmissible. I hear you saying today that if documentation were discovered it could be used in a non-compliance prosecution, which would put it in open court. Is that correct?

Mr. Sankoff: That is correct. It could be used solely for the purposes of non-compliance. It is highly arguable that material could not be subsequently used in a prosecution for a different purpose because of the manner by which it was obtained. The act makes clear, first, that the purpose in obtaining that information is for non-compliance. There are also constitutional guarantees that back up that basic premise.

Senator Meighen: I appreciate, understand and support the idea of the necessity of protecting privacy. On the other hand, Mr. Cullen, you have said that this put us right up there with our international allies in the fight against organized crime in money laundering, et cetera. If, as you say, the bill - which is entitled "An Act to Amend the Proceeds of Crime (Money Laundering) Act" -- is designed solely to ensure that people are complying with an administrative requirement and that any evidence gathered in that process can only be used for a non-compliance prosecution, how will we advance the war against money laundering?

Mr. Cullen: Senator, maybe we are not communicating well. First, if people are not complying with the act in terms of reporting then FinTRAC and the whole legislative package cannot click into operation, obviously. If people are not reporting when they should be, then how can we ever get at money laundering? Therefore, you must have a mechanism to get people who should be complying to comply with the reporting requirements of the act. Once people are reporting, then the normal provisions of the act and the legislative package click into place in FinTRAC.

The senator has raised an interesting point. If someone keeps non-complying, then that is probably a challenge and that is one of the balances that we needed to bring to the table -- balancing privacy with the need to deal with money laundering. If someone refuses to comply continually then that would be a challenge.

We are looking at a small percentage. Many organizations will want to comply, or they will comply. They may not know that they should be complying or they may not be complying in the appropriate way, and we want to ensure that they will be complying with the act and reporting.

For those players who do not comply because of the balance of privacy issue, we will be challenged. I am sure it will be challenging.

Senator Meighen: Presumably the proposed legislation applies only to people in Canada. I see a nod from behind. I would suspect that 99.99 per cent of those people are not money launderers. They may be used by money launderers unknowingly; is that correct?

Mr. Cullen: I think there may be more than you would think.

Senator Meighen: There might be. That is fine. I am still having trouble understanding how the reporting will do more than perhaps establish a pattern of carelessness or innocence, or a pattern of continuing non-compliance, which then leads you to say that there is something more here.

Mr. Cullen: Let me give you an example. If, under the Income Tax Act, someone is not filing an income tax return, in a sense they are participating in tax evasion. However, there are various forms of tax evasion. If they are not filling in a tax return, how will you ascertain whether they are evading tax? You must first of all have people reporting and complying with the reporting provisions of the legislation. Once they are doing that, then the provision kicks in. That means that transactions are analyzed. If there is other corroborating evidence that would suggest that the transactions are suspicious, that information would then be forwarded in a tombstone way to the RCMP, and so forth. Without any reports, there is nothing much that one can do with anything, I would suggest.

Senator Meighen: Fair enough.

Senator Furey: Let's go back to the question on the evidence. You are still satisfied, I presume, that there is the safeguard of the claim on solicitor-client privilege there, even during a compliance audit on any documentation.

Mr. Sankoff: Absolutely. No matter what, the solicitor-client privilege exists. To be honest, whether it in here or not, solicitor-client privilege is a claim at common law. The express protections are set out here. The solicitor-client privilege will always take precedence in this matter. If there is a valid claim of solicitor-client privilege, it will go before a judge to be tried.

Senator Furey: We all need diligent solicitors, Mr. Chairman.

Senator Wiebe: My question may be a little comical. I am not a lawyer, and I cannot always understand some of their concerns.

Let us assume that this proposed legislation is passed and that I am in the drug trade and have had a successful week. As such, I have a pile of money that I do not know what to do with it. I cannot process it through the regular system because it will be detected by your people, who are doing a great job. If I hire a backhoe operator and have him bury the money for me, will he be under the law of compliance?

The Chairman: The backhoe operator may not know what is in the container.

Mr. Lalonde: The short answer is "no."

[Translation]

Senator Poulin: I would like to thank Mr. Cullen and Mr. Peterson for their speedy reply to the questions we raised during our discussions on Bill C-22. The four changes that have been tabled deal directly with the centre framework legislation. I would like to ask a similar question to the one asked by Senator Tkachuk. If I understand correctly, the centre is developing. It has a staff of 70 and an annual budget of $20 million, approximately. Under Bill C-22, what is the status of the centre as a government agency?

[English]

Ms Smith: We are set up in the law as an independent agency at arm's length from law enforcement agencies.

Senator Poulin: What is your relationship with the RCMP?

Ms Smith: We are at arm's length. It is very clear in the legislation that we are at arm's length from all law enforcement agencies. I could give some specifics as to what that means.

Senator Poulin: No, I understand. What is the relationship, therefore, between the agency and the Department of Finance?

Ms Smith: That is a bit more complicated.

Mr. Lalonde: The agency reports to Parliament through the Minister of Finance. Hence, the Minister of Finance has oversight responsibilities. The legislation spells out the kind of oversight responsibilities the Minister of Finance has and the kinds of information the minister is entitled, to exercise that responsibility. It is very clear in the legislation that the minister does not have access to any personal identifying information.

[Translation]

Senator Poulin: Will the agency table an annual report to the House?

Mr. Lalonde: Yes.

Senator Poulin: On the issue of privacy, you said that any transaction of more than $10,000 must be reported, even if, for example, I am giving money to my daughter who lives abroad. Is that right?

Mr. Lalonde: The payment bill stipulates that all transactions must be reported. Any cash deposit of $10,000 or more must be automatically reported by the bank to the new agency.

Senator Poulin: If I ask my Canadian bank to transfer $15,000 to an American bank for my daughter who lives in a different city, is the Canadian bank required to report this transaction?

Mr. Lalonde: As things stand now, the payment bill requires any transfers of $10,000 to be reported.

[English]

Senator Tkachuk: To follow up on that, just so I understand this electronic transfer, because we are talking about cash here when talking about illegal transactions, right? You do not usually pay by credit card if you are doing something illegal; the transaction is usually done in cash. I could understand perhaps an international transfer of money, from here to Bermuda or the United States, or vice versa.

However, to clarify this, say that there is a transaction between two Canadian bank accounts. Let us say that Senator Kolber transfers $12,000 to my account in Saskatoon.

The Chairman: That is highly unlikely.

Senator Tkachuk: Would there be a requirement to report on that?

Ms Smith: No, there is no requirement in the regulations.

Senator Tkachuk: Therefore, domestically there is no requirement.

Ms Smith: No, internationally the requirement is over $10,000.

Senator Setlakwe: I wanted to ask if it were international or domestic.

The Chairman: My initial understanding was that it applied to any wire transfer, but Ms Smith has just said that it is only international.

Mr. Lalonde: The current draft regulations only concern international wire transfers.

The Chairman: That was not expressed clearly before.

The committee fully understands that we are out to get the "bad guys" and not out to abuse the "good guys" -- not to be simplistic about it. Almost all of the questions had to do with compliance. We have not heard much, if anything, about what should be done when we have those voluminous reports. We all appreciate that these are early times and that the waters are being tested as we proceed.

The challenge is huge and it is not patently clear how this is to be resolved. One of the suggestions that I would make to this committee is that we make a reference to the Senate to have a review one year from now. That way, the appropriate officials will be able to outline their experience on this issue to that date. I urge the committee to consider inviting the witnesses back in one year or so for an update. Perhaps by that time there will be some anecdotal evidence, if nothings else, about who has been abused in such cases and who has not. The witnesses could also tell us whether any "bad guys" have been caught and whether the system has worked.

With that in mind, I thank all the witnesses for their participation today. We, as a committee, will do our best to see this matter through.

March 28, 2001 [Senate]

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, on Thursday, March 22, 2001, Senator Wiebe, on behalf of Senator Kolber, presented the second report of the Standing Senate Committee on Banking, Trade and Commerce dealing with Bill S-16, to amend the Proceeds of Crime (Money Laundering) Act.

[Translation]

Since the bill was reported without amendment, the report stood adopted without motion under rule 97(4). When I, as Speaker, asked when the bill would be read the third time, the Deputy Leader of the Government in the Senate, Senator Robichaud, moved that it be placed on the Orders of the Day for consideration at the next sitting.

[English]

At the appropriate time, Senator Kinsella raised a point of order based on two principles. First, he questioned whether the bill was properly reported. Second, he sought clarification as to whether Senator Robichaud had acted correctly in moving the motion to set the date for third reading.

On the first point, Senator Kinsella expressed the view that the practice has been that when a chair is not available to perform his or her functions, it falls upon the deputy chair to do so. He asked whether the Banking Committee had authorized Senator Wiebe to present the report.

Senator Knisella's fundamental concern was whether any member of a committee may present a committee report.

[Translation]

Senator Kinsella's second concern was whether Senator Robichaud acted properly in moving the motion to set the date for third reading. He noted that rule 97(4) provides that it is the senator in charge of the bill who should move such a motion, and suggested that, since Senator Robichaud was not the sponsor, he should not have moved that motion.

[English]

A number of senators then spoke to the issue. Senator Robichaud quoted rule 97(1), which deals with the presentation of committee reports. That rule states:

A report from a select committee shall be presented by the chairman of the committee or by a Senator designated by the chairman.

Senator Robichaud felt that Senator Wiebe had acted properly, since Senator Kolber had asked him to act on his behalf. As to the second matter raised by Senator Kinsella, Senator Robichaud noted that the bill in question was government legislation. He suggested that, as Deputy Leader of the Government, he could move the motion to set the date for third reading.

Senator Wiebe then intervened to confirm that Senator Kolber had asked him to present the report. Subsequently, Senators Tkachuk, Carstairs, Lynch-Staunton and Taylor also participated in the debate, which can be found on pages 422 to 424 of the Debates of the Senate. I wish to thank all honourable senators for their contribution to the consideration of this issue.

Senator Kinsella's point of order touches directly on section 1 of rule 97, as quoted above, and section 4 of the same rule, which states:

[Translation]

When a committee reports a bill without amendment, such report shall stand adopted without any motion, and the Senator in charge of the bill shall move that it be read a third time on a future day.

[English]

With regard to the first element of the point of order, which relates to the propriety of Senator Wiebe presenting the report, similar issues have been raised in the past.

On February 24, 1998, Senator Callbeck presented reports of the Banking Committee on behalf of Senator Kirby, the committee's chair. Senator Kinsella asked why the chair or deputy chair had not presented the report. Senator Callbeck replied that she had been asked by Senator Kirby to present the report. Senator Kinsella accepted this response, although he indicated that he did not view it as a precedent.

On December 8, 1999, Speaker Molgat dealt with a point of order raised the previous day by Senator Kinsella. In his point of order, Senator Kinsella questioned, among other things, whether the Banking Committee had adopted a motion to report Bill S-3, an income tax convention bill, and whether the committee had authorized Senator Hervieux-Payette to report the bill.

At that time, Senator Kolber, the chair of the committee, noted that he had authorized Senator Hervieux-Payette to act on his behalf. Speaker Molgat made a point of noting that, as Speaker, he had no authority to question whether the senator presenting the report had been designated and that he must depend upon the committee chair to have done so. In light of rule 97(1), Speaker Molgat did not find that Senator Kinsella's point of order had been established.

As noted previously, in the present case, Senator Wiebe also confirmed to the house that Senator Kolber had asked him to present the report as rule 97(1) allows. I should like to confirm my support for Speaker Molgat's position. In my opinion, the statement by Senator Wiebe was not strictly necessary. If an honourable senator declares that he or she is doing something on behalf of another, this declaration should be taken in good faith and should only become an issue if the designator were to indicate that there had been a misunderstanding.

Pursuant to rule 97(1), I therefore find that the report to the Senate was properly presented.

I will now turn to the second element of the point of order, as to whether Senator Robichaud acted properly by moving the motion to set the date for third reading of Bill S-16. In relation to rule 97(4), I would note that our rules do not provide a clear definition of "the Senator in charge of the bill." In the case of a government bill such as S-16, the Leader of the Government in the Senate is ultimately responsible for it — indeed, that position appears on the cover of the bill. In keeping with rule 4(d), the deputy leaders on both sides often act on behalf of their respective leaders in this chamber.

[Translation]

In addition, the senator serving as sponsor of a bill — who begins debate at second reading — has a high degree of involvement throughout the process, often including moving the motion to set the date for third reading. Finally, in matters resulting directly from a committee's work, as in this case, the committee chair may also be involved.

[English]

Senate practice with respect to moving the motion to set the date for third reading reflects the variety of senators who may be involved in the process. For government bills, there have been many cases in which a senator other than the Leader of the Government has moved this motion. The Deputy Leader of the Government has often moved this motion.

To take a few examples, during the Second Session of the Thirty-sixth Parliament, the Deputy Leader of the Government moved this motion for Bills C-10, C-22 and C-26. During that same session, chairs of committees reporting government bills sometimes moved the motion in question. This was the case, for example, with Bills S-18, C-2 and C-7.

Therefore, while the rules do not define the phrase "Senator in charge of the bill," Senate practice would suggest that, at least for legislation, the Leader of the Government, the Deputy Leader of the Government, the sponsor of the bill or the designate can move the motion to set the date for third reading.

Honourable senators, in light of the Rules of the Senate and Senate practice, I find that the second element of this point of order has also not been established. Bill S-16 was properly reported and the motion to set the date for consideration at third reading was properly moved.

We will now proceed to the order.

Bill to Amend—Third Reading—Debate Adjourned

Hon. George J. Furey moved the third reading of Bill S-16, to amend the Proceeds of Crime (Money Laundering) Act.

He said: Honourable senators, I am delighted to have the opportunity to speak today at third reading of Bill S-16, to amend the Proceeds of Crime (Money Laundering) Act.

[English]

Honourable senators, the predecessor to Bill S-16 was Bill C-22, which became law last June. The enactment of that bill was an important milestone in Canada's legislative framework for fighting organized crime and money laundering. It strengthened the previous statute by adding measures to improve the detection, prevention and deterrence of money laundering in Canada.

As a member of both the G7 and the Financial Action Task Force, FATF, Canada had committed to improving its anti- money laundering regime. It was important, then, that we be seen by our international partners to be making progress on this front, particularly since the FATF was publicly listing countries with deficient anti-money laundering controls right around the time that our legislation was being passed.

The timely passage of Bill C-22 brought our anti-money laundering legislation into line with international standards. At the same time, our domestic law enforcement agencies were in need of better enforcement tools here at home, and Bill C-22 also responded to their needs. As a result, Canada now has a system that provides for the mandatory reporting of suspicious transactions and the reporting of large cross-border movements of cash or monetary instruments, such as travellers' cheques, to the Canada Customs and Revenue Agency.

Bill C-22 also established the new Financial Transactions and Reports Analysis Centre of Canada, FinTRAC, which officially came into being on July 5, 2000. FinTRAC will analyze reports and provide information to police to assist them in the investigation and prosecution of money laundering offences.

FinTRAC is subject to the many privacy safeguards contained in the act. These safeguards are supported by criminal penalties for any unauthorized use or disclosure of personal information under FinTRAC's control. In addition, FinTRAC is subject to the federal Privacy Act and the protections therein.

In summary, honourable senators, the new act responded to the domestic law enforcement community's need for additional means of fighting organized crime by more effectively targeting the proceeds of crime. It responded to Canada's need to meet its international responsibilities in the fight against money laundering, and it did so while providing safeguards to protect individuals' privacy.

When the Standing Senate Committee on Banking, Trade and Commerce considered Bill C-22, committee members believed that the act would be further strengthened and they suggested amendments to certain provisions. The Secretary of State for International Financial Institutions made a commitment to the committee to introduce legislation to address a number of these concerns. Bill S-30 was subsequently introduced, but it died on the Order Paper when the election was called last fall.

This is the same bill that we considered last fall, and because of this, I urge honourable senators to pass it quickly so that we may proceed to other business.

The amendments contained in Bill S-16 relate to four specific issues. The first deals with the process for claiming solicitor-client privilege during a FinTRAC audit. I should mention that FinTRAC is authorized to conduct audits to ensure compliance with the act. At present, when conducting a compliance audit of a law office, FinTRAC must provide legal counsel with reasonable opportunity to claim solicitor-client privilege on any document it possesses at the time of the audit.

The amendment in this bill pertains to documents in the possession of someone other than a lawyer, and it requires that this person be given a reasonable opportunity to consult a lawyer in order to make a claim of solicitor-client privilege.

The second amendment ensures that nothing in the act will prevent the Federal Court of Canada from ordering the Director of FinTRAC from disclosing certain information as required under the Access to Information Act or the Privacy Act. It was the intent of the original Bill C-22 that the recourse of individuals to the Federal Court of Canada be fully respected. This amendment ensures that this will be done.

The third amendment more precisely defines the kinds of information that may be disclosed to the police and other authorities specified in the act. It clarifies that the regulations setting out this information may only cover similar identifying information regarding the client, the institution and the transactions involved.

[Translation]

Finally, the last amendment guarantees that all reports and information in the possession of the Financial Transactions and Reports Analysis Centres of Canada will be destroyed after a prescribed period.

[English]

Information that has not been disclosed to the police or other authorities must be destroyed by FinTRAC after five years. Information that has been disclosed to the police or other authorities must be destroyed after eight years.

(1440)

In conclusion, honourable senators, these four amendments complement the existing legislation and, indeed, improve it. Bill C-22 addresses this need for more effective tools to combat money laundering and organized crime. Together with these four amendments it does so in a manner that protects individual privacy. The legislation will go a long way to help deter and detect money laundering and allow Canada to more effectively cooperate internationally in combating this global problem.

Honourable senators, I encourage you to give your support to this bill.

On motion of Senator Kelleher, debate adjourned.

April 4, 2001 [Senate]

Hon. James F. Kelleher: Honourable senators, I rise today to speak on third reading of Bill S-16, to amend the Proceeds of Crime Act or, as it is more widely known, the Money Laundering Act. The amendments contained in this bill are based upon an undertaking made by the government to the Senate Banking Committee last June.

As honourable senators will know, every June the Liberals are anxious to pass every bill that they can before the summer recess. Last June was no exception.

In the case of the money laundering bill, rather than agreeing to make the amendments that all agreed were necessary, the Secretary of State responsible for Financial Institutions instead undertook to make the changes at a later date. I suppose anything can be fixed later, but I question the point of conducting a thorough study of any bill when needed amendments are simply put off until a later date.

Honourable senators, in addition to the undertakings made by the minister last June, the Standing Senate Committee on Banking, Trade and Commerce also unanimously made three other recommendations for the minister to consider and, hopefully, implement. When this bill was introduced, we were dismayed to discover that the Liberal government had chosen to ignore our recommendations.

Nonetheless, the Progressive Conservative members of the committee were intent on again pursuing the proposed amendments when the bill was referred to the committee for its consideration. After hearing more testimony on the issues, we decided that we would reintroduce only one amendment, that of reducing the time periods for the ongoing review of the act itself and the new money laundering agency in particular.

I should note that this new agency is called the Financial Transactions and Reports Analysis Centre, or FINTRAC for short.

Our members of the committee believed that we had heard enough testimony from various witnesses, including FINTRAC, to justify our concerns about exactly what information was to be collected from whom, and what was to be done with it. We were surprised, therefore, when Liberal members of the committee questioned whether our amendment was in order. After some debate, the decision was made to rule it out of order. The end result is that the committee rejected an amendment that was almost identical to the one that was supported by the committee just nine months ago.

Our colleagues in the House will now have an opportunity to study this bill further. We hope that they will get somewhat more consideration for their efforts than we received.

The Hon. the Speaker: Is it your pleasure, honourable senators, to adopt the motion?

Hon. Senators: Agreed.

An Hon. Senator: On division.

Motion agreed to and bill read third time and passed, on division.

May 10, 2001 [House of Commons][Entire Exchange]

Hon. David Collenette (for the Minister of Finance) moved that Bill S-16, an act to amend the Proceeds of Crime (Money Laundering) Act, be read the second time and referred to a committee.

Mr. Roy Cullen (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Finance, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, I welcome the opportunity to speak today at second reading of Bill S-16, an act to amend the Proceeds of Crime (Money Laundering) Act. This bill would improve upon its predecessor, Bill C-22, which received royal assent last June. That bill was needed for several reasons.

Allow me to take a moment to review some of the background to that bill.

[Translation]

As hon. members know, money laundering in recent years has become more and more of a problem in Canada. By definition, money laundering is the process by which dirty money from criminal activities is converted into assets that cannot be easily traced back to their illegal origins.

[English]

Today's open borders provide criminals with a daily opportunity to launder millions of dollars in illegal profits with the intention of making the profits look legitimate. These activities can undermine the reputation and integrity of financial institutions and distort the operation of financial markets if adequate measures are not in place to deter money laundering.

To illustrate the magnitude of the problem, it is estimated that between $5 billion and $17 billion in criminal proceeds are laundered through Canada each year. A significant portion of this laundered money is linked to profits from drug trafficking.

Money laundering became a crime in Canada back in 1989. Prior to Bill C-22 Canada had many of the building blocks of an anti money laundering program in place within the criminal code and the previous Proceeds of Crime (money laundering) Act. However the government realized that much more needed to be done to combat the problem.

[Translation]

On one hand, the government was being pressured by law enforcement agencies for better enforcement tools. At the same time, on the international front, Canada was subject to scrutiny because of perceived gaps in our anti money laundering arrangements.

[English]

In 1997 the 26 member financial action task force on money laundering, the FATF of which Canada is a founding member, found Canada to be lacking in certain key areas and strongly encouraged us to bring our anti money laundering regime in line with international standards.

As a result of pressure here and internationally, the government brought in Bill C-22 in the last parliament. That legislation strengthened the previous statute by adding measures to improve the detection, prevention and deterrence of money laundering in Canada. Bill C-22 contained three distinct components which enabled Canada to live up to its international commitments.

First, the bill provided for the mandatory reporting of suspicious financial transactions.

Second, the legislation required that large cross-border movements of cash or monetary instruments like travellers' cheques be reported to the Canada Customs and Revenue Agency.

Third, Bill C-22 provided for the establishment of the Financial Transactions and Reports Analysis Centre of Canada, FINTRAC, which came into being on July 5, 2000. An independent agency, FINTRAC is set out to receive and analyze reports and to pass on information to law enforcement authorities if it has reasonable grounds to suspect that information would be relevant to a money laundering investigation or prosecution.

[Translation]

I should also mention that there are safeguards in place to ensure that the collection, use and disclosure of information by FINTRAC are strictly controlled. These safeguards are supported by criminal penalties for any unauthorized use or disclosure of personal information under FINTRAC's control.

[English]

FINTRAC is also subject to the federal Privacy Act and its protections.

Bill C-22 was welcomed last year by members on all sides of the House for several reasons.

First, it responded to domestic law enforcement communities needs for additional means of fighting organized crime by more effectively targeting the proceeds of crime.

Second, it responded to Canada's need to meet its international responsibilities in the fight against money laundering. It did so while providing safeguards to protect individual privacy.

In spite of these accomplishments, several of our hon. colleagues in the other place believed the act could be strengthened even further and could benefit from additional amendments. The government agreed and the result is Bill S-16, the legislation before us today.

Let me take a moment and provide some background.

[Translation]

When Bill C-22 was studied by the standing Senate committee on banking, trade and commerce last spring, members of the committee indicated that while they supported the bill the legislation would benefit from amendments to certain provisions.

[English]

The Secretary of State for International Financial Institutions made a commitment at that time to clarify the act by including several of the changes requested by the committee. The result was Bill S-30 which was introduced last fall and subsequently died on the order paper when the election was called. It was reintroduced in this parliament as Bill S-16.

The amendments in this bill relate to four specific issues. The first deals with the process for claiming solicitor-client privilege during an audit by FINTRAC. The agency is authorized to conduct audits to ensure compliance with the act.

The current legislation contains provisions that apply when FINTRAC conducts a compliance audit of a law office. FINTRAC must provide a reasonable opportunity for a legal counsel to claim solicitor-client privilege on any document it possesses at the time of the audit.

[Translation]

The proposed measure in Bill S-16 pertains to documents in the possession of someone other than a lawyer. It requires that that person be given a reasonable opportunity to contact a lawyer so that the lawyer could make a claim of solicitor-client privilege.

[English]

Another measure would ensure that nothing in the act would prevent the federal court from ordering the director of FINTRAC to disclose certain information as required under the Access to Information Act or the Privacy Act.

The amendment would ensure that the recourse of individuals to the federal court would be fully respected. Indeed this was the intent of the original bill, Bill C-22.

The third amendment more precisely would define the kinds of information that could be disclosed to police and other authorities specified in the legislation. It would clarify that the regulations setting out this information could only cover similar identifying information regarding the client, the institution and the transactions involved.

Finally, Bill S-16 would ensure that all reports and information in FINTRAC's possession would be destroyed after specific periods. Information that has not been disclosed to police or other authorities must be destroyed by FINTRAC after five years. Information that has been disclosed must be destroyed after eight years.

Bill C-22 introduced sweeping changes to Canada's anti money laundering regime. First, it introduced new reporting requirements which would result in more reliable, timely and consistent reporting. Second, it introduced centralized reporting through FINTRAC which allowed much needed and much more sophisticated analysis.

[Translation]

Third, successful prosecutions that benefit from analysis by FINTRAC can lead to court ordered forfeiture of the proceeds of criminal activities.

[English]

Above all, these benefits would be achieved in a way that respects the privacy of individuals. The additional amendments contained in Bill S-16 would only serve to further strengthen and improve this statute.

Irrespective of party affiliation, I am confident that all hon. members will fully support the bill. I urge members to give the legislation quick and speedy passage so that we may proceed to other items on the government's legislative agenda.

Mr. Maurizio Bevilacqua: Mr. Speaker, I rise on a point of order to seek unanimous consent to revert to routine proceedings for the purpose of tabling a committee report.

The Speaker: Is there unanimous consent of the House to revert to tabling of reports by committees?

Some hon. members: Agreed.

Some hon. members: No.

Mr. Keith Martin (Esquimalt—Juan de Fuca, Canadian Alliance): Mr. Speaker, it is a pleasure to speak to Bill S-16. It is long overdue, and deals with one of the most important aspects of crime in the country today.

It is estimated that a majority of crime today relates to organized crime. Bill S-16, an act to amend the Proceeds of Crime (Money Laundering) Act is one we support.

For a long time the Canadian Alliance has worked hard to influence the government to address in a very reasonable way the large problem that affects every single riding in our country. The extent and depth of the problem of organized crime is extensive.

Organized criminals not only take advantage of the existing laws and working above the law, but also working beneath society and below the law. They hide behind the law when it is advantageous and flaunt it when it serves their benefit.

Historically many people may consider organized crime as the biker on a Harley Davidson, engaging in prostitution, drug abuse and in the buying and selling of drugs. Organized crime is much more than that. It is a national and transnational problem which will require a co-ordinated effort not only within our country but also among nations. Organized crime gangs have formed transnational groups that are capitalizing on the globalized markets in our country.

Organized crime gangs deal not only with the traditional forms of money laundering, drugs, prostitution and the violence that goes with that, they also deal with a considerable amount of white collar crime. That white collar crime involves setting up businesses and engaging in illegal activities.

Organized crime groups set up shell companies that profess to deal with the cleanup of environmentally toxic areas. They offer their services to businesses. They tell them that they will take their waste products and dispose of them sensibly. What they do is take those waste products, charge the company and then dump them illegally, polluting our land, our air and our water.

They also take the moneys from things like prostitution, drugs and weapons. They also take money from trafficking endangered species, which is second in the entire world in the trafficking of illegal products. That money is put it into illegal businesses.

The problem is how do we deal with these organized crime groups? Police officers have told us that we have to go after the money. If we can take away the money underpinnings of international groups then we will crush them.

Here is a case in point. In the United States a crime gang took those moneys and bought a casino. That was followed up and the casino was apprehended. The moneys from the sale of that property went into fighting crime.

The same thing happens in countries like Ireland, South Africa and south of the border. However, to understand why this is so important, we have to look at the impact of organized crime in our society today.

In Canada it is estimated that it costs us $5 billion to $9 billion a year, which includes insurance, cellular phone, credit card and telemarketing fraud, and much more. Between $5 billion and $17 billion a year is laundered in Canada. That is why we are known as a haven for organized crime.

Imagine $5 billion to $17 billion being laundered in our country. That is a huge amount of money. It impacts our civil society in ways of which we are unaware. The cost of this impacts upon all of us. It impacts our insurance costs, because of motor theft. There is also securities fraud. This is not to mention the violence generating effects of the illicit drug trade which has had such a profound and negative impact upon our society. That is why we support this bill.

I came back from Colombia in February. There are enormous effects as a direct result of the illicit drug trade in that part of South America.

Canada is poised for a flood of pure, cheap heroin that will undercut the price of cocaine. This will mean that on the streets there will be a higher number of addicts, a greater number of overdoses and deaths, not to mention the increasing incidence of the transmission of hepatitis B, C and HIV among the drug users. That is why many of us have asked the government to deal with drug use in a more pragmatic and less punitive way by looking at models in Europe which can be employed here. In fact I had put forth a private member's bill to that effect.

Another thing the government could do is employ RICO-like amendments which have been in the United States since 1970. These amendments would allow the government better opportunities to go after and apprehend civil property, civil forfeiture, as well as criminal forfeiture upon conviction of the properties that are used or acquired through illegal uses.

I also want to take a moment to look at the international aspects of organized crime. In many of the hot spots around the world, from Nigeria to Somalia, Central Africa, Sierra Leone, Colombia, Brazil, Paraguay, Bolivia and Venezuela, we can see the impact and the integration of organized crime in society, particularly in societies that are in a very tenuous place.

When the price of oil went down in Nigeria, organized crime insinuated itself into the country. It has become a haven for the trafficking of cocaine, heroin and diamonds.

I have had a chance to visit South Africa some 12 times since 1986. That country made some good changes, but unfortunately has suffered from a breakdown in law and order. Organized crime gangs saw an opportunity to insinuate themselves into a country which was trying to get on its feet. As a result, South Africa has become a haven for organized crime and for the trafficking of contraband, particularly drugs.

This is a very serious problem because it destabilizes these countries. Look in the heart of darkness of Africa where the blood of tens and hundreds of thousands of people has been spilled. We can see how mercenary groups, in conjunction with organized crime groups functioning in a transnational way, have used diamonds to further their ends of making money. However it has also contributed to the deaths of hundreds of thousands of innocent people and the furthering of conflict in these areas.

The point I am making is that while the actions of organized crime are known, they are not only a domestic problem, they are a transnational and international problem. These actions also contribute to the furthering of conflicts in some of the worst parts of the world. Hundreds of thousands of innocent people are killed in areas where democratic rules and the rule of law with respect to human rights are simply absent.

Organized crime groups have no compunction whatsoever in insinuating themselves into conflict that occurs in these areas. They grasp and capitalize on these problems. In many cases we think some of these battles are mostly over religion. We see the issue of Sudan being one of them. However it has more to do with money.

In Somalia it was looked at as a fight between rival clans. In effect, a larger part of it had to do with the trafficking of something called khat, which is a drug. The trafficking, the influence and involvement of organized crime gangs has a profound impact upon these conflicts.

This is a great opportunity for the Minister of Finance, who is the head of G-20 at this point, to try to work with the Bretton Woods institutions and use them as a lever to address the issue of organized crime. The IMF should have built in opportunities to analyze where moneys are going to make sure that organized crime is not benefiting from it. Similarly, the World Bank and the other IFIs need to look at where the money is spent to make sure it is not being channelled into illegal operations.

Russia is a prime case. Billions of dollars of western money has gone into Russia in good faith to try to stabilize the economic situation. Unfortunately, a lot of that money has fallen into the hands of the oligarchs that have ruled a large chunk of that country for far too long. I know Mr. Putin is working hard to deal with that.

I can only encourage the Minister of Finance to work with the international community to implement levers which will ensure that moneys being spent are used for proper monetary and fiscal stability in these countries and are not being siphoned away by individuals who are thugs in business suits.

In closing, I again emphasize that organized crime takes a big bite out of our economy and has many seen and unseen negative effects upon Canada. We support the bill and encourage the government to strengthen it as time goes on, by implementing methods to have criminal and civil forfeiture for individuals who are engaging in crime and by implementing RICO-like amendments in this country. We should work with the international community to ensure that similar laws are implemented so we can have a transnational, multifactorial approach to this scourge among us.

Mr. Ken Epp: Mr. Speaker, I rise on a point of order. We have our communications straightened out now between the parties and if you would seek it, I think you would now find unanimous consent to revert to daily routine of business, presenting reports from committees, so that the finance committee report could be presented by the member for Vaughan—King—Aurora.

The Speaker: Is there unanimous consent to revert to presentation of committee reports?

Some hon. members: Agreed.

Mr. Paul Crête (Kamouraska—Rivière-du-Loup—Témiscouata—Les Basques, BQ): Mr. Speaker, it is a pleasure to rise today to speak to Bill S-16, an act to amend the Proceeds of Crime (Money Laundering) Act.

First, let me remind the House that proceeds of crime covers anything seized that was, in the court's opinion, used to commit an offence or gained as a result of the offence.

This is just one piece of legislation among many others that were passed. Our society is now facing a major problem that has grown in scope in the last few years, with organized crime becoming a complex, international and ever changing industry that goes beyond traditional crime.

We now have technology based crime and international crime. For instance, drug traffic is run just like any other business, except for the fact that what is being traded is illegal, and of course new technologies are also used to commit crime.

As citizens, we often feel helpless. On the news, we hear about events, about people who are accused and about crimes, and we are not quite sure about the cause. The whole community wants governments to address this problem.

We in the Bloc Quebecois can be proud of the courage shown by our leader and our team, particularly during the last election campaign. We have made proposals and prodded the government into finally taking action. I think the leader of the Bloc Quebecois deserves credit for that, as well as those members who work on justice issues, including the member for Berthier—Montcalm, the member for Saint-Bruno—Saint-Hubert and the member for Hochelaga—Maisonneuve. They lead initiatives aimed at fighting organized crime, directly or indirectly, and its consequences.

Organized crime has an impact on poverty. People who are most vulnerable make easier targets. They are more easily used. We must be aware of the fact that the related social and economic costs for our society are considerable.

The bill before us amends the Proceeds of Crime (Money Laundering) Act. The act it is based on needs certain adjustments, which are contained in this bill. We hope they will enable us to fight organized crime more effectively.

Clause 1 of the bill says that reports and all information will be retained for five years, which is what the current act says, but then it sets out the circumstances under which three years will be added to that period.

The retention period will thus be eight years, when the Financial Transactions and Reports Analysis Centre of Canada passes information either to law enforcement authorities or to the Canada Customs and Revenue Agency, the Canadian Security and Intelligence Service, the Department of Citizenship and Immigration, an agency in a foreign state or an international organization with a mandate similar to the centre's.

In other words, adding three more years will make documents available for a longer period of time. They will be retained longer.

In the case of crimes requiring time consuming investigations or the retrieval of evidence that might have been seized in the course of a previous investigation, this gives an added opportunity to do so.

Moreover, the addition to section 54(1) of the Proceeds of Crime (Money Laundering) Act provides that each report received and all information received or collected shall be destroyed on the expiry of the applicable period.

This clause clarifies certain provisions regarding the retention and destruction of information. This does not raise any particular issue, but it is important to note that such is the intent of the lawmakers that we are, and that this type of amendment was necessary to make the act more efficient in the fight against organized crime.

Clause 3 came about as the result of the realization that under the current act the federal court had no jurisdiction in this matter. With this amendment, no provision of the act will prevent the federal court from ordering the head of the centre to disclose information in accordance with the Access to Information Act and the Privacy Act, thus making the act easier to enforce.

This clause is yet another one to make enforcement of the act easier and more effective. We are also told that the spirit of the act already allowed the federal court to play its role in that regard.

Now, by amending the text, we are making sure that not only the spirit but also the letter of the act allows that. This may prove very useful when dealing with organized crime, since those who are charged often have very good defence lawyers. Of course, it is the role of these lawyers to make sure that their clients are properly defended, but we must make sure that it is not possible, through some flaw, to miss the main issue when taking someone to court or preparing evidence. This is also the purpose of that clause.

Then there is a clause dealing with the whole issue of solicitor-client privilege. We have a problem with that clause because any interpretation of the said clause, in its current wording, would be pure speculation. This provision is very vague. It does not specify its objective. We were told that it was included because of the concerns expressed by accountants, who wanted a privilege similar to the solicitor-client privilege granted to lawyers.

This clause will have to be reworded to make it easier to understand. Some work will have to be done in that regard, probably in committee, to come up with useful amendments.

In conclusion, the first three clauses of the bill include amendments designed to clarify the intent of the provisions they amend, and these amendments do not change the substance of the Proceeds of Crime (Money Laundering) Act.

However, as I just mentioned, there is a problem with clause 4. We simply cannot figure out this provision. It is very vague. I think we would be better off with no provision than one that is worded like this one.

Still, the best option might be to rewrite the clause so that we can see if it is an amendment that can be used in the fight against money laundering.

Obviously, we in the Bloc Quebecois were in favour of the Proceeds of Crime (Money Laundering) Act, and in particular we were behind the elimination of the $1,000 bill. This was called for, supported, debated and in the end successfully defended by the hon. member for Charlesbourg—Jacques-Cartier. The government finally moved on this.

In my opinion, the Bloc Quebecois record is impeccable. We have proposed several concrete measures to improve the situation, to ensure that the state is properly equipped to fight organized crime. We hope there are still other tools to be laid on the table in order to ensure that we end up with everything required to do away with this scourge, to eliminate this situation, and to ensure that within this society there is less and less of a parallel universe and a parallel economy, which penalizes our entire society by the way it operates.

For all these reasons, we are going to vote in favour of Bill S-16, on condition that clause 4 is clarified for the reasons I have already given.

I therefore invite the House to support this bill which will, as soon as possible, enable the departmental staff concerned to do their job more diligently and with more appropriate tools, so that results can be attained. This is but one of the tools necessary to fight organized crime, but it is a useful one.

[English]

Ms. Libby Davies (Vancouver East, NDP): Mr. Speaker, I am pleased to rise today to contribute to the debate on Bill S-16. The New Democratic Party supported Bill C-22 in the previous parliament, which was approved and received royal assent. We voiced a number of concerns as it went through committee stage and amendments. We are glad to see that some of those concerns are being addressed in Bill S-16.

Members of the NDP like other members of the House are extremely concerned about the impact of organized crime on our local communities and across the country. There is no question that it is something that is very sophisticated. It is very pervasive and has a huge impact on many people's lives.

Personally, as well as in terms of financial institutions and various businesses, we are all very familiar with cases that do come to public light. They give us a glimpse of the kind of operation that exists outside the law in terms of money laundering, the profits from organized crime and how they are dealt with.

For most people it is a fairly frightening glimpse when we look at a system that is so complex. As in previous legislation the attempts in this legislation to deal with that sophistication and to find the appropriate mechanisms to track where money is flowing, where the proceeds of organized crime are coming from, is very important.

The NDP put forward some concerns about the original bill. In any legislation there has to be a balance between a reasonable right and invasion of privacy. There must be an understanding that the power of the state is not absolute. When a new agency is created with far reaching powers we have to be very careful about how it is set up.

For example, before Bill C-22 was approved we and a number of witnesses who came forward to debate the bill expressed concerns about whether or not there was potential for charter of rights violations, that the guarantees of reasonable search and seizure appeared to be at risk.

We were also very concerned about the possible pressures there would be on consumers. Needless to say, there would probably be a significant cost in setting up any sort of regime to track and communicate suspicious transactions. I do not know if that has been spelled out, but it seems to me that it would be enormous in terms of what the responsibilities would be for financial institutions and how that would get passed on to law abiding consumers.

Members of the NDP were also very concerned about the fact that the bill did not address what is often referred to as white collar crimes or technology based crimes. Unfortunately this is a huge area that is booming. We are all very familiar that the growth of the Internet and computers in general, credit card fraud, telephone fraud, stock market manipulation and computer break-ins are all things that can be characterized as technology based crimes or white collar crimes. There is no question that there is a very serious element within that which is perpetrated by organized crime. It seems to us that the original bill did not and the legislation before us today does not adequately address the concerns that surely must be addressed in terms of technology based crimes.

In the debate today I heard a number of members talk about different elements of organized crime and the impact they have. The member for Esquimalt—Juan de Fuca spoke about the drug trade and its human impact. I will spend a couple of minutes speaking about that as well because it strikes me that there is a contradiction.

On the one hand, as we should, we go to great lengths to deal with a legal apparatus and the setting up of a new agency, FINTRAC, the Financial Transactions and Reports Analysis Centre of Canada, as it is called, and what a mouthful that is. We go to great lengths to set up a very elaborate system for tracking suspicious transactions, trying to trace what has happened and making sure that there is adequate reporting.

On the other side of that coin in terms of organized crime and the billions of dollars that are generated illegally through drug trafficking and drug use and the profits that are made, we do not pay enough attention to the human costs that are very clearly evident on our streets, in urban centres and even in smaller communities across Canada. I have only to look at my own riding of Vancouver East to see the devastation that happens in an environment where illegal drug activity is a huge underground economy.

I believe, and I certainly would echo the comments from the member for Esquimalt—Juan de Fuca, that we have to pay attention to that human side. We have to recognize that in some respects it is the illegality of those substances, heroin or crack cocaine or other substances, that drives this underground market and in effect criminalizes addicts when they are on the street with very few resources. We end up with a community where people are literally dying on the streets from overdoses.

It strikes me as a horrible irony that while on the one hand we can somehow relate to this issue from a legislative point of view by setting up this centre, on the other we cannot relate to this issue from a human point of view and take the actions that are necessary to actually reduce the harm of what is happening on our streets because of these illegal substances.

I would also add that we need a saner, more humane approach to drug use in Canada and we need to be seriously willing to reform Canada's drug laws, which have not been reformed for decades. We have had Senate hearings. We have had debates in the past where some of these issues have been debated very seriously, but not in recent times. If we took the time to do that I believe we would go a long way toward dealing with some of the causes of the devastation we see on our streets. We could in fact look at the issue of how organized crime is being driven by this very lucrative business of drug use.

We could look to the experience of what is happening in Europe, where the approach has been to medicalize drug use and addiction instead of criminalizing people. The approach has been to try to remove the harm from buying drugs on the street. Not only has there been a huge financial saving in health care costs and judicial costs, but lives have been saved as well.

I wanted to make that point because it seems to me that we are missing the boat unless we look at the total picture. We cannot just say that all this money is coming from organized crime and a lot of it is coming from drugs unless we are willing to examine Canada's drug policies and recognize that they need to be seriously reformed.

For example, even with marijuana we see the stories about grow operations in the papers all the time. In east Vancouver there are media reports of various grow busts taking place. We are talking about multimillion dollar operations. It seems to me that if we had the courage to examine our drug policy laws and to seriously look at reform of those laws we would be going a long way in terms of removing the incentive and the huge opening that exists for organized crime to become a part of the underground economy. That is a very important aspect of the debate.

In regard to the bill before us today, I did want to say that the NDP certainly supports the amendments that are contained in the bill as a result of the previous bill, Bill C-22. We support them in principle. Important questions were raised as a result of Bill C-22. It is notable that there has been a sort of second look based on the issues raised previously, for example, knowing how long this new centre would be able to retain the information it collects and whether there are issues in terms of the balance between the right to retain information or dispose of it.

Another question was about when and how that information would be disposed of. If an agency is created, for how long does it have a right to have that information and in which manner can it be disposed of? If information is to be disclosed to law enforcement authorities, how should that be done? Those issues needed to be more clearly spelled out and we certainly feel that the present legislation goes some distance to addressing those concerns put forward by witnesses and by different parties in the House.

In conclusion, at this time we in the NDP are pleased to continue our support in principle. We think it is an important bill. It has obviously had strong support within the House. It is always good to have a second look based on evidence from witnesses to make sure that the bill is fine tuned to address concerns put forward.

I hope as the debate continues that the government will pay attention to the concerns that are still being expressed. It seems to me that there is strong general support but some areas still need to be looked at.

Mr. Peter MacKay (Pictou—Antigonish—Guysborough, PC): Mr. Speaker, I appreciate the opportunity to speak to the bill. This is a very important piece of legislation and I commend the previous speakers, including my colleague from the New Democratic Party. It is interesting to note that many members have picked up on the fact that those in the other place have served a very useful purpose in reviewing the legislation and improving upon the legislation, as is often their wont.

I should indicate at the outset that I will be splitting my time with the hon. member for Kings—Hants.

Bill S-16 essentially deals with a response to concerns that were raised by the Senate banking committee. Bill S-16 amends the Proceeds of Crime (Money Laundering) Act and particularly focuses on areas of solicitor-client privilege, the disclosure of information and records retention. This is, of course, information that is critical in tracing the origins and whereabouts of potential assets linked to criminal activity. The money laundering that takes place in Canada is of great concern to our citizenry and certainly to our law enforcement community.

Money laundering, as the Speaker would know, is a process by which criminals attempt to conceal profits earned from crime so that the money appears as if it comes from legitimate sources. When all traces of the money's criminal origins are erased, the money can safely be used to buy goods and services.

It is shocking to think that between $5 billion and $17 billion is laundered in Canada. Of course it is difficult to accurately assess just how much because the proper authorities are not able to determine this amount, but it is estimated to be in that range.

There were shortcomings in the original legislation which Bill S-16 attempts to correct. Money that is laundered is often shifted among countries, financial institutions and investments without a paper trail so that it cannot be traced back to its origins. With the advancing sophistication of technology, competent and sophisticated criminals are able to access and utilize these now boundless abilities to transfer money through cyberspace, leaving no tangible evidence as to its origins.

Obviously much of this money is obtained by very nefarious means such as fraud or intimidation. This is the type of money that is very often directly linked to criminal organizations in Canada and has been the focus of a number of pieces of legislation and the focus of considerable debate in recent months and years. Canada has come under heavy criticism in recent years for being a nation where criminal organizations are able quite easily to launder their proceeds of crime. For that reason and that reason alone, it is incumbent upon us as elected officials and as part of the federal legislative branch to respond. That is what this legislation is intended to do, to enhance the existing proceeds of crime legislation.

The response last spring came in the form of government Bill C-22, the Proceeds of Crime (Money Laundering) Act, which was passed. Bill C-22 imposed new reporting and record keeping requirements and created the Financial Transactions and Reports Analysis Centre of Canada to receive and analyze information so there would be a focal point, a centre in Canada where those working in this location would be specifically tasked to assist law enforcement communities in locating and tracing proceeds of crime.

Concerns were expressed at that time about the bill by the privacy commissioner, the Canadian Bar Association and other groups that appeared before a parliamentary committee. The Senate banking committee looked into the bill in June 2000 and, to be quite blunt, was not impressed. The committee felt that the legislation was considerably flawed and had a number of shortcomings which it had hoped to remedy. The government indicated at that time that it was unwilling to entertain amendments to the legislation because it was too late in June and the House of Commons had to deal with other bills and indicated that therefore the Senate might make changes in the future.

Coming forward from that point in June 2000, we know that the Secretary of State for International Financial Institutions did give a written undertaking to the committee that certain changes would be contemplated and would occur in a new bill to be introduced in the fall. Those changes formed the substance of Bill S-30 which was introduced in October. Bill S-30 is identical to Bill S-16 which is currently before us.

As the Speaker and Canadians well know, the entire process in October was pre-empted by the legacy lust of the Prime Minister in his decision to put this piece of legislation and other very useful pieces of legislation aside and toss them in the dustbin in order to seize his political advantage and call an election.

Beyond the changes that were agreed to in the letter from the secretary of state to the Senate banking committee, the bill was then reported with the observation that the government should consider other amendments. Those amendments would include, first, further insurance that solicitor-client privilege would be protected by adding the phrase law office in any place in clause 63 where the term dwelling house appears. This simply expanded the physical premises that would attach under the legislation.

Second, the government would hold the first review of the act after three years, not five years, with a five year review to be held after that. This is essentially an opportunity in the first instance to look at the fallout from this legislation at an earlier date and assess the implications after three years.

Finally, the government would require regulations under the act to be tabled before the committee in the House each year. The Progressive Conservative Party is very supportive of all attempts to bring about transparency, both for the public and for parliament, and to access information that is rightfully to be placed before Canadians.

This is important in the broader context of trying to rebuild lost confidence in the process and in this institution. It is clear that the bill does not include all the changes recommended by the committee, but it goes a long way to improving the legislation.

The bill will focus on the following legal issues. The first is solicitor-client privilege, which is an attempt by individuals to prevent private information they share with a solicitor from being made public or in any way disclosed. Bill C-22 only dealt with instances of solicitor-client privilege involving legal counsel.

Bill S-16 clarifies that officials of the Financial Transactions and Reports Analysis Centre of Canada may not examine or copy documents subject to solicitor-client privilege where the documents are, and this is the important part, in the hands of someone else until a reasonable opportunity has been made for the person to contact legal counsel. The bill would put in place a safeguard to allow an individual to speak to a lawyer before documents are seized.

This responds to concerns raised by the Certified General Accountants Association of Canada. Privacy is something we can never take lightly. We must always strive to ensure individuals are protected in their privacy rights and in their business transactions. However all that must be balanced with the recognition that there are those who rely upon nefarious means and complicated schemes to steal from others, rip people off and engage in blatant activities to take away a person's wealth.

To that end a balance is struck in the legislation. It contains safeguards and methods for review that allow for a weighing of evidence to determine whose interests are best being served.

Bill S-16 would allow individuals or the privacy commissioner to take the Financial Transactions and Reports Analysis Centre of Canada to court if they are denied access to their files. There is therefore a chance for judicial review if there is denial of access.

Next is disclosure of information. Bill S-16 narrows the range of information that may be disclosed by the Financial Transactions and Reports Analysis Centre of Canada to the Canada Customs and Revenue Agency, the police, and citizenship and immigration officials.

After listing the types of documents that could be disclosed Bill C-22 gave the centre broad power to disclose any information so designated. The amendment would replace that power with the power to disclose similar information relating to identification.

Finally, there is record retention. Records not disclosed by the centre are to be destroyed five years after they are received or collected. Those which have been disclosed are to be destroyed eight years after they are received or collected. These are further safeguards. It may be called fine tuning but it is important fine tuning nonetheless. The sober second thought of the Senate has been usefully exercised here.

Mr. Scott Brison (Kings—Hants, PC): Mr. Speaker, I credit my colleague from Pictou—Antigonish—Guysborough for the comprehensive nature of his discourse. There simply could be no questions after such a detailed and articulate speech.

It is with pleasure today that I rise to speak to Bill S-16. The money laundering issue is of huge importance to Canada. Earlier today I spoke in the House on corporate governance issues. It is extraordinarily important to put in place procedures, agencies and structures to deal with corporate governance and money laundering issues, issues which are increasingly global and are forcing governments to be vigilant if they wish to maintain international credibility.

The estimates of money laundering are difficult to get a handle on. In Canada some estimates are as low as $5 billion per year and some are as high as $20 billion per year. That variance alone speaks to the nature of the problem. We do not know the full depth and breadth of the issue in Canada but we know we had better get a handle on it soon. We hope this initiative will help us do that.

I have spoken of previous incarnations of the legislation and of my concerns with them. I still have not seen a commitment by the government to provide the resources to enable the agency to do its work. I am very concerned about that.

The member for Pictou—Antigonish—Guysborough, our justice critic, has spoken about the urgent situation of underfunding and the resource starved RCMP. With the money laundering agency we could see the same types of issues.

Organized crime networks today use sophisticated technologies and have almost unlimited global resources. We must provide the new agency the resources to be successful in the fight against money laundering. I have significant concerns in that regard, particularly given the sophistication of financial instruments today. There was a time when derivatives were considered sophisticated financial instruments but we have gone far beyond that.

The House resumed consideration of the motion that Bill S-16, an act to amend the Proceeds of Crime (Money Laundering) Act, be read the second time and referred to a committee.

Mr. Scott Brison (Kings—Hants, PC): Mr. Speaker, I have caused a stir with a couple of my remarks but I have never had that level of dramatic response. It has been another great day for democracy and a moment in which I take great pleasure in having participated. My time in the Senate was all too brief, I may add.

The issues in Bill S-16 of critical importance to me and to our party pertain to whether the new agency has the resources necessary to deal with the increasing challenges and the great level of complexity in the nature of money laundering, the sophistication of financial instruments, and the almost unlimited resources of international organized crime. We have to ensure that we do not simply create an agency with a tremendous level of responsibility but with very little resources to do what has to be done.

A bad job is one with lots of responsibility and no authority. I would suggest that to ask the agency to take on such a mammoth task and not provide it with the appropriate level of resources would be typical of what the government has done in a number of areas, but it would not be an appropriate way to proceed.

A concern that I have had in the past and still have is the accountability of the agency, particularly in terms of the criteria required to meet the conditions that the agency share information with other agencies, for example, the Canada Customs and Revenue Agency.

It would be appropriate that any information attained by the Canada Customs and Revenue Agency indicating money laundering activity would be shared with the money laundering agency.

That type of sharing of information back and forth could be constructive. However I would be very concerned if, for instance, the individuals involved in the new money laundering agency were to identify no evidence of money laundering but some evidence of potential money laundering which could indicate some tax evasion or something similar. I would be concerned if the agency were to share that information with Revenue Canada.

While I agree that we need a much stronger approach to money laundering, Canadians would not feel comfortable with a resulting beefed up Revenue Canada agency. We have to be careful there are clear criteria and conditions that have to be met before it is deemed appropriate for the money laundering agency to share information with Canada Customs and Revenue Agency.

I have another concern that the arm's length nature of these agencies tends in an institutional way to reduce the amount of accountability to parliament. I understand some of the arguments, particularly from the government, in favour of achieving greater levels of flexibility for compensatory arrangements with the workers and offering a more flexible approach to provide these public services to arm's length agencies.

However much of this could be achieved within the context of more direct departmental agencies as opposed to these arm's length agencies. I have a significant concern about what seems to be a secular decline in the level of accountability to parliament that the government seems to be very comfortable with. Again, these arm's length agencies are all part of that greater reduction in accountability to parliament.

The Progressive Conservative Party supports the legislation and the amendment which would improve accountability of the new agency. The agency in the legislation is a step in the right direction. Canada needs to do less following of what is happening in other countries and what our trading partners in the G-8 and OECD are doing. We should try to be more proactive in leading on some of these issues whether it be on money laundering or in corporate governance issues.

It always seems that we are just a step slower than a lot of our international partners. I would hope the government of a country like Canada, which in the past under the previous government was an international leader in many ways, would try to copy some of the initiatives of that previous government. It has on other issues. The government should provide some level of international leadership on some of these issues as opposed to being followers. That is my wish in closing my remarks today.

The Deputy Speaker: Before I call for the resumption of debate I address myself to the member for Kings—Hants who probably thinks that all this activity took place to assist him in marking his very special day, his birthday.

I would never make mention of a member's age, but I understand the member was what we might commonly refer to as a centennial year baby.

March 15, 2001 [Standing Senate Committee on Banking, Trade and Commerce]

The Chairman: Honourable senators, we are hearing evidence today on Bill S-16. Our first witnesses are from the National Archives of Canada.

Mr. Ian E. Wilson, National Archivist, National Archives of Canada: Honourable senators, I appreciate this opportunity to speak to the committee. The issue to which I wish to speak is clause 54(e) of Bill S-16. The intent of this clause is to require the destruction of records prepared or gathered under the investigative powers of this bill. This runs directly against the Archives Act which requires, under section 5, my consent to the destruction of records.

Originally, the amendment in clause 54(e) was to read "despite the Archives Act." We have now had time to review the legislation and to try to come up with a legislative solution that meets the requirements of the committee and Canadians in terms of requiring the destruction of records that are gathered under investigation while at the same time respecting the requirements and the review processes established in the Archives Act to ensure that records to be destroyed do not have permanent historical significance to the country.

My staff and I have had an opportunity to review the records that have been created or will be created under these forms of investigation. We have determined that those records are not of permanent significance for the historical record of Canada. I have therefore, under section 5 of the Archives Act, issued records disposition authority 2001/003, which authorizes the destruction of those records pursuant to section 5 of the Archives Act after the applicable periods built into Bill S-16.

We are therefore proposing alternate wording, which I think, and our advisers suggest, meets the requirements that require the destruction of the record at the same time. Rather than overruling the Archives Act, as the original amendment would have, we are proposing the following alternate wording: "in accordance with the Archives Act under a records disposition authority that we have now issued."

That is our proposed amendment. I believe it has been distributed to you in both languages. It is a cleaner, simpler way of doing this, rather than saying "despite" or "not withstanding the requirements of the Archives Act."

Mr. Chairman, I will be pleased to respond to any questions.

Senator Furey: Mr. Wilson, is the directive you issued with respect to the destruction of records revocable?

Mr. Wilson: The wording in that last clause makes it clear that it is not revocable. The archives very seldom revokes; we do so only in certain specific instances, but it is discretionary. With that last phrase, discounting any subsequent amendments or repeal of that authority, we are trying to ensure that it is embedded in the legislation and cannot be revoked by my successors or me. That is the intent and our legal advisers say that that will cover it.

The Chairman: As we are seeing this proposed amendment for the first time, I do not know that anyone here can say whether it deals with our original objections. Perhaps it does; perhaps it does not.

However, this session of the committee is only to hear testimony and ask questions. We will conduct clause-by-clause study on Wednesday. I suggest that our legal advisers, under the guidance of Senator Furey who is sponsoring the bill, study this in order to satisfy us prior to clause-by-clause study that it deals with our objections. I do not know whether it does.

If that is agreeable to the committee, I suggest that Senator Furey advise us as to whether it deals with our objections, and that, if it does not, we authorize him to act on our behalf, subject to our final approval of course, to work with Mr. Wilson to produce wording that does deal with our objections.

Senator Meighen: What is the objection?

Senator Furey: It is simply that we wanted the records expunged and destroyed after a period of time. Mr. Wilson is saying this encroaches on his authority as the archivist.

The Chairman: Someone cited as an example this morning a person winning $10,001 at bingo and a file being established on that particular subject. Why should that file exist forever? Put in a purely simplistic form, that is the kind of thing we want to avoid. Some of us believe that the era of "big brotherism" in government may have gone a little too far. I think it is up to this committee to put some kind of a stopper on it.

Senator Meighen: I agree with what you have said, Mr. Chairman, and I think that is the consensus of the committee.

Mr. Wilson, you said that your blanket consent cannot be revoked. Did I understand you to say that that is premised on the supposition that the material collected pursuant to this legislation would not be of material importance to Canada?

Mr. Wilson: I said that it would not be of permanent historical value to Canada.

Senator Meighen: What if it were determined at one point that something was of permanent historical value?

Mr. Wilson: Our review would suggest that these investigations could affect many individual Canadians because the threshold is set very low. We suspect that, if things are important or if there is an issue, records will then appear in prosecution files or in court records that will become part of the permanent record. This would simply authorize the disposal of a file created on an individual who won at bingo, once privacy and other concerns are satisfied.

This is a routine action of the archives. Given the volume of modern government records, we only keep 1 to 2 per cent of the administrative record created by government day by day. Under the authority of section 5 of the Archives Act, we have the authority to review and identify which administrative records we want transferred to the archives for permanent retention and which will be disposed of routinely after the their legal, financial or audit purposes are fulfilled.

We are trying to find a way that meets the requirements and objectives of the committee while at the same time respecting the Archives Act and avoiding legislation that says "notwithstanding" or "despite the Archives Act." However, we do it in accordance with the Archives Act and to meet your intent, as I understand it, which is the disposal of the record.

The Chairman: You are worried that if you do this everyone else will do it, that it may be the thin edge of the wedge.

Mr. Wilson: We are worried about the precedent. Given the nature of the record, we concur with you that it should be disposed. It is a tidier approach to legislation to have it done, rather than suggesting that some other legislation may be in some way deficient, that we do it in conjunction with other legislation. We are trying to find the right wording. Whether we have it or not, we are open to discussion.

The Chairman: We appreciate your cooperation. We hope you will work with Senator Furey.

Mr. Wilson: Absolutely.

The Chairman: He will advise us whether he agrees, and then we will decide whether we agree.

Senator Finestone: I was listening with great interest to something I do not know anything about but I do know something about privacy and the National Archives of Canada Act. I do not know where this fits in.

Under the Privacy Act, no personal information can be collected by any institution, and you are a government institution, unless it relates directly to the operating program of the institution. I do not know where it fits into the right of your institution to have this information. If I win $10,000, it is bad enough that everybody who wants money, charitable or otherwise, will know that I have won. Why should you keep that information in your records?

Under the Privacy Act and the National Archives of Canada Act, why would you have that material in the first place, or want it?

Mr. Wilson: We are saying that we do not want it. It has no place in our records. We would not have enough room to preserve everything.

The Chairman: You will meet, or not meet, with Senator Furey, as he determines;, okay?

Mr. Wilson: Yes.

The Chairman: We will now hear from Mr. Cullen.

Mr. Roy Cullen, Parliamentary Secretary to the Minister of Finance: I am pleased to be here to speak to Bill S-16. Last June, I appeared before this committee to discuss Bill C-22, the bill that put in place the legislation that we are now proposing to amend.

I would like to take this opportunity to thank the committee for its very careful study of Bill C-22 back then. The enactment of Bill C-22 was an important milestone in Canada's legislative framework for fighting organized crime and money laundering.

[Translation]

Its timely passage also brought Canada's anti-money laundering regime into line with international standards and allows Canada to participate fully in the international efforts against money laundering.

[English]

As a member of the G-7 and the Financial Action Task Force, Canada had committed to improving our anti-money laundering regime. It was important that Canada be seen by our international partners to be making progress on this front, particularly in that the Financial Action Task Force was engaged in a process of publicly listing countries as having deficient anti-money laundering controls about the time the legislation was passed.

At meetings of the OECD and OSCE in Europe that I attended last summer, I was pleased and proud to report that Canada had passed this important piece of legislation and, again, I thank you.

Honourable senators, you will recall that the Proceeds of Crime (Money Laundering) Act provides for a system of mandatory reporting of certain financial transactions and cross-border movements of large amounts of currency and monetary instruments. The legislation also established the Financial Transactions and Reports Analysis Centre of Canada, FinTRAC, which will analyze these reports in a prescribed way and provide information to police for prescribed reasons and in a prescribed way to assist them in the prosecution of money laundering offences.

The establishment of FinTRAC as an independent agency at arm's length from law enforcement is one of the many privacy safeguards contained in the act. FinTRAC was formally established on July 5, 2000. It is now building the technical and analytical capacity needed to perform its mandate. It will begin to receive financial transaction reports after the necessary regulations have been implemented.

The proposed regulations for record keeping and financial transaction reporting requirements were published on February 17, 2001, in the Canada Gazette for a 90-day public comment period. Consultations are now underway to develop regulations to implement the reporting requirements for large cross-border movements of currency and monetary instruments. In addition, FinTRAC has developed draft guidelines to help financial institutions and intermediaries comply with the act and has initiated consultations with stakeholders.

[Translation]

Now, I would like to turn to the bill before us today -- Bill S-16. The four amendments that make up this bill respond directly to issues raised by honourable senators when they studied Bill C-22 in this committee last June.

[English]

The proposed amendments will be familiar to the senators on this committee as they were outlined in a letter dated June 14, 2000, from Secretary of State Jim Peterson to the committee chairman. That letter was included in the committee's report on Bill C-22.

Briefly, the proposed amendments relate to four specific issues. The first deals with the process for claiming solicitor-client privilege during an audit conducted by FinTRAC. As you know, FinTRAC is authorized to conduct audits to ensure compliance with the requirements under Part I of the act, namely the requirements to keep records and to report certain types of financial transactions.

The legislation currently contains provisions that apply when FinTRAC conducts a compliance audit of a law office. FinTRAC must provide legal counsel with a reasonable opportunity to make a claim of solicitor-client privilege with respect to any document in their possession at the time of the audit. The proposed amendment contained in Bill S-16 deals with situations where documents are in the possession of a person who is not a legal counsel. It would require that such a person be given a reasonable opportunity to contact legal counsel in order to make a claim of solicitor-client privilege.

Honourable senators will recall that this issue was raised by representatives of the accounting profession when they appeared before this committee last June 2000.

Another change ensures that nothing in the Proceeds of Crime (Money Laundering) Act prevents the Federal Court from exercising its authority under the Access to Information Act or the Privacy Act to order the director of FinTRAC to disclose certain information by either of those acts. This proposed amendment makes it clear that the recourse of individuals to the Federal Court is fully protected. This was the intent of the original bill and the proposed amendment will ensure that this will be the result.

The third proposed amendment more precisely defines the kind of information that may be disclosed to the police and other authorities.

[Translation]

The amendment clarifies that the regulations setting out this information may only cover similar identifying information regarding the client, the institution and the transactions involved. This deals with a concern of the committee that the existing wording may have provided for greater latitude for using regulations to add to the list of information set out in the act itself.

[English]

Bill S-16 would amend the act to ensure that all reports and information in FinTRAC's possession will be destroyed after specific periods: information that has not been disclosed to police or other authorities must be destroyed after five years; information that has been disclosed must be destroyed after eight years. The archivist presented a proposal that, on the face of it, seems to meet our requirements. However, if there are any difficulties, we will talk to you before the clause-by-clause occurs. We believe that it meets our requirements and we are happy, in that case.

The Chairman: Could you clarify that, please? My understanding, after meeting with the officials this morning, is that if we are satisfied then you are satisfied. Is that correct?

Mr. Cullen: The officials are satisfied, and I am satisfied on the face of it. However, I want to make sure that the government is satisfied, as I am sure they will be. We will contact you immediately if there is any problem.

I hope that honourable senators will find that these four provisions respond in a meaningful and concise way to the concerns raised by this committee.

Before I conclude, I will mention that the government considered very carefully this committee's report on Bill C-22, including the suggestions for three additional amendments to the act.

In response, the government has moved quickly to introduce the amendments that the Secretary of State committed to make, and that I have just described. However, the government has decided not to proceed with any further amendments to the act at this time, and if I you will allow me, I will briefly explain why.

First, the committee report recommended that FinTRAC be required to obtain either consent or a warrant before entering a law office to verify compliance with the act, similar to what is required before entering a private home.

Such an amendment, in our view, would treat a law office like a private home, rather than like other places of business. The government believes that it would be inappropriate to require a warrant to conduct a compliance audit -- I repeat, a compliance audit -- of any place of business, including the law office. The provisions in the act parallel those in the Income Tax Act, which do not require a warrant except for access to a private house.

Second, Parliament requested that a parliamentary committee review the act within three years and every five years after that. At present, the act requires a review after five years.

With respect, senators, I submit that a five-year review is more appropriate, for a number of reasons. More important, there will not be enough experience or data available within three years to provide an accurate assessment of the effectiveness of the legislation or the operations of FinTRAC. In any event, committees of Parliament can undertake to review any legislation at any time and could opt to do so in this case.

[Translation]

Finally, the committee report recommended that the act require regulations to be tabled before a committee in each House of Parliament.

[English]

The act currently stipulates a 90-day public consultation period, following prepublication of the regulations in the Canada Gazette, and an additional 30-day notice period if significant changes are made as a result of those consultations. We believe that this process provides ample opportunity for parliamentary committees, if they wish to do so, to review the regulations proposed by the government.

The Secretary of State has sent to the chair of this committee a copy of the proposed regulations, which were prepublished in the Canada Gazette on February 17, 2001, and they are also available on the Finance Canada Web site.

[Translation]

In closing, honourable senators, I would like to thank you once again for your close study of Bill C-22 and for raising the issues that the government has addressed through the bill before us today -- Bill S-16.

[English]

The government has devoted considerable time and energy to crafting its anti-money laundering legislation in such a way as to meet the needs of law enforcement while protecting individual privacy. The amendments contained in the bill considered today result from this committee's invaluable input to this matter. The officials that are here today and I are pleased to answer any questions.

The Chairman: Could you clarify the difference between a "compliance" and a "search"? That information is integral to the whole question of the warrant.

Mr. Cullen: In general terms, if there is a reporting requirement under the act we are talking about a compliance issue.

Mr. Yvon Carrière, Senior Counsel, Tax Counsel Division, Law Branch, Department of Finance: When FinTRAC conducts a compliance audit, they verify whether, in fact, the required reports were prepared. They are not investigating to know whether money laundering has occurred, or some other criminal activity. In fact, they would not be authorized to gather such evidence to prove that a crime had occurred. In the case of a criminal search, a warrant is obtained, and the people who perform the search in a criminal matter will look for specific evidence related to that criminal infraction.

A compliance audit is simply performed to verify whether the reports and records required to be kept under the Proceeds of Crime (Money Laundering) Act have been kept and that the reports have been made.

Mr. Cullen: Any information obtained by FinTRAC during the course of a compliance examination cannot be disclosed to law enforcement under section 55 of this act for the purposes of a proceeds of crime (money laundering) investigation. If it were disclosed, it would render the information inadmissible in a court of law.

Senator Tkachuk: I have a question about the "dwelling house." It bothers me as it bothered Mr. Kelleher. Mr. Cullen, you implied that it was different from a business, but that would be news to me.

I received an article by Mr. Peter Hogg, Dean of Osgoode Law School, that states that the common law rule is that a police officer or government official has no authority to enter private property for the purpose of searching for evidence and no authority to seize private property for use as evidence, unless authorized by law. However, we do that from time to time, in that common law continues to apply and that we can sometimes, by statute, make an exemption to that. However, it was just the way in which you were talking about "house " that bothered me. The home is special, and my interpretation of it would be that which we have to protect. It is my right, as a citizen, not to have law enforcement officials come to my home or my place of business without a warrant, or anywhere else that I consider my property -- those places should be protected. This is an exemption that only applies to the Income Tax Act. As far as we could find, there is no other exemption like this.

Why do you need this special power? Frankly, it scares the hell out of me. Once you make this exemption, there will be others. If there is no evidence, why is it necessary to search a dwelling?

Mr. Peter Sankoff, Counsel, Human Rights Law Section, Public Law and Central Agencies Portfolio, Legal Operations Section, Department of Justice: You have raised a complicated question. I will try my best to deal with that and all other aspects.

My understanding of the case law generally, and especially in respect of the Charter of Rights and Freedoms, is that there is a fair distinction made between the dwelling house as the place most deserving of protection. In particular with relation to this act, I would draw a number of distinctions. This act is not normally designed to cover a dwelling house. It is not a place that would generally have activities that would generate suspicious transaction reports.

As a precaution, a section has been included to deal with dwelling houses in case there is activity that would generate these kinds of reports. Because it is unlikely that this will occur, a special warrant provision has been put in to deal with that. It is not uncommon for that to be the case. A number of pieces of legislation have distinctions about what can be done in a dwelling house and what can be done in any other type of place.

I do not disagree with your proposition, that, as a rule, we wish to have preauthorized judicial authority to go into any place.

Nonetheless, the case law once again has made a rather serious distinction between what we would call regulated activity and what we would call a search for criminal purposes. In this case, it is very clear that the particular matter that we are discussing relates to regulated activity. The centre is only allowed to go into these types of premises where they are regulating compliance.

As Mr. Cullen pointed out earlier, none of the information can be used. It is clear from the way the act is currently worded that any information obtained in the course of a compliance audit cannot be used in a criminal investigation and cannot be used by the centre to determine whether money laundering has taken place. The sole purpose is for compliance. The manner in which this has been drafted goes a long way to ensuring that the distinction between regulatory compliance and a search for criminal purposes that has been made so clear in the case law is upheld. Therefore, I would see those two distinctions as making this situation special.

Senator Tkachuk: You mentioned the Charter of Rights and Freedoms. First, you are telling me that the Charter of Rights and Freedoms gives less rights than common law, which talks about property, not just dwelling place. Second, it is not the fact that you may find evidence of other wrongdoing that concerns me; it is the very act of government officials coming into my property. It is not the fact that you may find something but the fact that you have no right to be there in the first place, unless you have a reason to be there, and the reason should be supported by enough evidence to obtain a search warrant. I do not like you walking in. It is not because I am a criminal but because I do not like you walking in. You can have all these other exemptions, but as governments and legislators we have to prevent governments and police from walking in. We have a responsibility to do that, and that is what I am trying to do here.

Mr. Sankoff: I understand that. All I can say in response is that the number of situations where the government has the right to intrude on a business -- I hate to use the word "intrude," but let us say to assess a business or a property without a warrant for regulatory purposes -- are beyond my ability to number at this time. There are a number of areas where there is a purpose that is pressing. As I understand it, the justifications put forth for this initiative are pressing. I do not think this would be an everyday thing or that they would be going in at any time. It would be something undertaken from time to time for the purpose of ensuring compliance only. That, in my opinion, is not uncommon. In countless industries, government officials have the ability to go in solely to monitor compliance or to ensure that the very important process that is underway is actually taking place in the manner in which it was designed.

I understand the concerns about privacy here; nonetheless, the courts have generally accepted that for these purposes only. That is why the distinction about what is going on is so critical. They have generally accepted that the government needs to monitor compliance with various regimes, and the purpose that is being put forward for this one is seen as very important. That is where the distinction comes from.

Senator Meighen: Could someone refresh my memory as to what triggers the audit compliance initiative. What makes FinTRAC decide that they are going to undertake an audit compliance?

Ms Patricia M. Smith, Deputy Director, Policy, Liaison and Compliance, Financial Transactions and Reports Analysis Centre of Canada: Senator, a number of factors determine that we come in.

First off, we will have liaison officers in the field. They will be in contact with the reporting entities, finding out if they are comfortable with the legislation and with the regulations. I should point out that, as part of the regulations, there is a requirement to put in place an anti-money laundering compliance regime. The liaison officers will be going out and seeing if more information is needed to put such regimes in place.

Part of the job that we are doing now in terms of trying to become operational is to assess the training needs of the reporting entries. Hence, another factor that comes into place is this: What will be the training requirements of all these reporting entries?

Eventually, when we do become fully operational and start to receive transaction reports, we will have some statistics on the general nature of reporting and compliance. If 95 per cent of all entries from a particular sector are reporting, then we will know that there are some anomalies, and we will go back to the reporting entries and see if they understand the regulations and the law. Is there something they are not doing? Is the problem something to do with timeliness? Is the problem we are looking at something to do with their inability to connect with our reporting mechanism? They will be reporting largely through the Web or through a secure socket network.

There will be a number of methods by which we will be able to determine lapses in compliance. If, after looking at this and talking to the reporting entry, we determine there may be something more serious, then we would inform them that we are coming in to do a compliance examination, and we will give them feedback on the results of that compliance examination.

Senator Meighen: The reporting entity is any body that is required to report under the act?

Ms Smith: Yes.

Senator Meighen: It could be a law office.

Ms Smith: It could be.

Mr. Cullen: As I understand it, there could be situations where information would indicate that some intermediary, on the face of it, should be reporting, or there are sufficient grounds to believe that they should be reporting and the reports are not coming in. That would be cause for someone to ask the question.

Mr. Richard Lalonde, Chief, Financial Crimes, Financial Sector Division, Financial Sector Policy Branch, Department of Finance: I can give an example just to clarify that it is not just any business that will be reporting. The bill sets out very clearly that we are dealing largely with regulated financial institutions, and those are spelled out in clause 5 of the bill.

The bill also provides the ability to prescribe under regulation additional reporting entities, which we have done in the regulations that were prepublished in the Canada Gazette just recently.

As Mr. Cullen and Ms Smith have indicated, there may be instances where there may be gaps in reporting from certain sectors. I can give an example of the currency exchange business. There may be instances where, in one part of the country, FinTRAC may be receiving lots of reports from currency exchange businesses. Perhaps in another region of Canada there are very few. That may trigger a question as to why that is occurring and therefore prompt FinTRAC to inquire with those reporting entries in that region.

Senator Kroft: I am curious about this idea of reports that should be coming in. That suggests to me that you would take classes of institutions or offices or businesses and develop almost a statistical base saying that, given a certain volume in a certain industry, you should be getting a certain number of reports a month. Perhaps you are not meeting your quota. Is it that kind of analysis, or does there need to be some sort of a more specific fact-based trigger to prompt it?

The example you gave kind of fell in the middle. It was not exactly clear to me. Do you need a specific situation in order to trigger this, or will it be done on a statistical basis?

Mr. Lalonde: FinTRAC has the authority to do compliance audits on all reporting entries. As a matter of practice, it will not necessarily have the resources to visit all reporting entries on a routine basis and as such will have to decide and prioritize which entities will be conducting compliance audits. In the example I gave would be perhaps one criterion that they might use.

The legislation also provides, and I mention this in passing, the authority for FinTRAC to enter into collaborative arrangements with other regulators and other self-regulatory organizations for the purpose of carrying out this particular function of compliance audit as well.

Senator Meighen: Although you have answered the question, I am still not clear how you get this wonderful status of reporting entity. What do you have to do to get that? Do you have to be RBC Dominion Securities? Do you have to be Senator Kelleher's law office? How do you get this exalted status?

Mr. Lalonde: We use the term "reporting entity" to describe all those businesses covered under section 5 of the Act. Under this section, we talk about banks under the Bank Act.

Senator Meighen: There must be a catch-all clause.

Mr. Lalonde: There is an additional clause that allows us to respond to situations where, for example, internationally there may be new industries or new ways that money is being laundered. It allows us to add to the list of entities covered by the requirements by regulation.

As I indicated earlier, in the draft regulations that were prepublished on February 17, we have included, for example, the wire transfer business -- the Western Unions of this world -- as a business that ought to be covered by the requirements of the act. They may not be specified in the act, but they are prescribed in the regulations. We will be receiving views from that particular industry concerning that issue.

Senator Meighen: Let me turn, if I may, to the specific example of a law firm. How does a law firm fall into that status?

Mr. Lalonde: It would be in precisely the same manner as the Western Union or the wire transfer business would be included, by regulation.

The Chairman: That does not make sense.

Senator Meighen: Is my law firm obliged under this legislation now, or do I wait for a letter from you?

Mr. Lalonde: We have had extensive consultations over the last year or two with the Canadian Bar Association, the Barreau du Québec and others concerning the Proceeds of Crime Act, as well as the proposed regulations. At the association level, certainly, they are well aware of the government's intent.

The government has also prepublished these regulations and has announced this fact publicly.

Senator Meighen: With respect, I do not understand your answer to my question.

The Chairman: Is every Canadian presumed to read all regulations? Senator Meighen has an interesting tact here. Is a letter going to go out from FinTRAC to every conceivable suspect? Of course, I am using that word in quotation marks. Really, how does it start?

Ms Smith: There are a number of things. It is an iterative process on which we are just embarking. There have been consultations on the regulations that were prepublished; we are also commencing consultations on the guidelines that enumerate some of the requirements of the act.

As Mr. Lalonde has said, the regulation that pertains to lawyers is very specific. There are certain actions that a lawyer has to take before he or she becomes a reporting entity. He or she must be engaged in financial transactions. A lawyer giving out legal or criminal advice is not covered. It is only when he or she is engaged in very specific financial transactions. The regulation states that every legal counsel is subject to Part 1 of the act when he or she engages in any of the following activities on behalf of a third party, including the giving of instructions on behalf of a third party in respect to those activities. Then it lists the receipt or payment of funds other than those received or paid in respect of professional fees.

Senator Meighen: Let me pose a hypothetical situation. I am a client. I am interested in investing in a property in Ottawa. I send $500,000 cash to my lawyer in Ottawa, or $20,000.

Ms Smith: Are you the lawyer or the client?

Senator Meighen: I am the client. I am interested in buying properties in Ottawa. I have not sent the funds for the purpose of paying a fee.

Ms Smith: Your lawyer would probably then be a reporting entity.

Senator Meighen: That is my point. You will have many lawyers who are reporting entities because often, heretofore, at least, clients have given money to lawyers to hold for a future specific purpose.

The Chairman: Is that cash or cheque?

Ms Smith: It is only if it is cash for large cash transaction reporting requirments.

Senator Meighen: My colleague Senator Tkachuk just asked, if it is an electronic transfer, is it cash or cheque?

Ms Smith: If it is cash, your lawyer, as a reporting entity, must report the large cash transaction, which is any amount over $10,000. However, if you come in with a suitcase and you make a number of smaller transactions, it might be considered suspicious and would also be covered as a reporting requirment.

Senator Meighen: What is the situation if it is an electronic transfer?

Ms Smith: I am not aware that lawyers have that capacity. It is covered, yes.

Senator Meighen: That qualifies as cash?

Ms Smith: It is a transaction that needs to be reported.

Going back to how to inform everybody, we have been dealing with the Canadian Bar Association.

The Chairman: Excuse me, but there is something really wrong here. Are you telling me every electronic transfer is subject to some kind of something-or-other? There must be thousands of these transfers every day.

Ms Smith: It is international.

The Chairman: Yes, international.

Ms Smith: The amount must be over $10,000.

The Chairman: That is nuts. That is how business is transacted every day. As an example, I just transferred money electronically to one of my children. Is that a suspicious transfer?

Ms Smith: No, sir.

The Chairman: Why not? It comes under your definition.

Ms Smith: It is under the definition of a prescribed transaction.

The Chairman: Someone has to report that?

Ms Smith: That will be reported.

The Chairman: It is idiotic.

Senator Tkachuk: That is what we were trying to say the first time.

Senator Meighen: To go to the other tack, the thrust of all this seems to be an assurance that the proper reporting procedure is being followed. Once we know that it is being followed, then everybody is happy.

Ms Smith: Yes.

Senator Meighen: I do not know where that takes us. I will now come at it from the other side. Now you are saying that anything that is discovered by action in the course of investigation cannot be used as evidence in a criminal prosecution. Therefore, we are going through all this sound and fury merely to ensure that we have a nice, tidy, complete reporting function that goes nowhere except to allow someone to tick off and say, "Yes, the report was received in due and proper form."

Mr. Cullen: The first step is to get the reporting on track. Once the reporting is on track, the normal provisions would apply, I would suspect.

Senator Meighen: Let us say in the course of a totally normal compliance audit that you do come across something that is suspicious. I understood you to say that you can do absolutely nothing with it, under any circumstances. Is that correct?

Mr. Sankoff: The way it is drafted right now, that is the way it is.

Senator Meighen: What is the point of doing it?

Mr. Sankoff: The idea is that the persons who do not go further with these will be subject to prosecution for non-compliance. The idea, as we understand it, is not that persons captured by the act are going to regularly disobey the law. There are penalties for non-compliance. There are obligations in this act, and non-compliance is a problem, so the idea is that, over time, people will comply.

Senator Meighen: If I were a big, nasty money launderer, first, I would not be worried about an administrative slap on the wrist for not filling in some form; and, second, I would be sure to fill it out very accurately because I would be certain that you would be on my tail immediately if it were not filled out accurately, even though you might have told me that you would not do so. This is confusing.

Mr. Sankoff: It will not actually be the money launderer filling out the forms. It will be the other entities.

Senator Meighen: The money launderer's lawyer?

Mr. Sankoff: Theoretically, money launderers could engage in massive fraud, but in each case they will be subject to other penalties. There are other ways of deterring these sorts of activities.

Non-compliance is designed solely to deal with non-compliance. It is a regulatory function. Senators have expressed difficulty with the procedures that allow us to go in without a warrant to check for non-compliance. There is good reason why you are only allowed to go in for the purpose of non-compliance. It is quite reasonable that, in these circumstances, you cannot use that information for a prosecution.

The only reason that the centre is allowed in without the protection that has been expressed by senators is that it is strictly for non-compliance. If you were allowed to use that information, we might have a problem.

Senator Furey: Senator Meighen basically reiterated what has been said already in terms of any documentation that is found to be suspicious during a compliance. You are satisfied that section 55 prevents the use of that, is that correct?

Mr. Sankoff: The way it is worded, that is correct.

Senator Furey: Would you also say that you would be satisfied that it would include the use of it to ground an application for a warrant?

Mr. Sankoff: First, the centre is caught by various non-disclosure provisions. It is more than section 55. There is also the proposed amendment to section 54, which precludes the centre from using it in their analysis. The centre has very broad non-disclosure provisions. They cannot give it to anyone to get a warrant. The centre has no ability to get warrants on its own. Since they are precluded from disclosing it to the police -- or anyone else for that matter -- there is no way you could ground a warrant with that information. I would say you are correct.

Senator Furey: If that is case, you are back to the normal rules. If an investigating officer wanted to go into a business, he or she would have to satisfy a justice of the peace that there are reasonable grounds to believe, say, in this case, relevant records exist. That information would come outside of anything to do with a compliance audit. Is that correct?

Mr. Sankoff: That is correct, except what might be obtained during the prosecution for non-compliance, but it would not include the specifics of the records. Once there was a prosecution for non-compliance, it would be on public record.

Senator Furey: Presumably, that would follow an application for a warrant that was grounded in information not obtained through a compliance audit?

Mr. Sankoff: That is is not entirely correct. The person could be prosecuted for non-compliance. The centre has the ability to turn over material to the police strictly on non-compliance -- that is, where it is shown that there is non-compliance.

Senator Furey: A document that was found during compliance and could disclose criminal activity -- and I will not call non-compliance criminal activity; we will call it quasi criminal for now, just to differentiate -- could be used in a non-compliance prosecution. Is that what you are saying?

Mr. Sankoff: It would not be relevant to compliance, so it would not be used in that compliance prosecution.

Senator Furey: But it could be?

Mr. Sankoff: I have difficulty seeing how that could occur. If it did not relate to non-compliance, it could not be used in a non-compliance prosecution.

Senator Furey: But it could relate to non-compliance.

Mr. Sankoff: If it related strictly to non-compliance, it could be used in a non-compliance prosecution; that is correct.

The Chairman: Does anyone in your department have the vaguest idea how many wire transfers of over $10,000 are done in a year? It must be tens of thousands. Every time you buy stock in excess of $10,000, you wire the money to the stockbroker or to the person buying the stock for you. That must represent many tens of thousands of dollars.

Ms Smith: We are engaged in those discussions with the industry. We are in the consultation phase and are attempting to establish whether reporting entities will be able to use batch file transfers for reporting. That is one of the key elements we are working on, namely, estimating how many electronic transfers FinTRAC will receive.

The Chairman: You will need an credible army of people to police this.

Senator Meighen: That is another reason to review this after three years.

Mr. Cullen: This is new territory for Canada and for us. We want to make sure that the net is cast widely enough. Once you make exceptions, that is where the money launderers will go. We have also said at this committee that, given the regulatory regime we have, we can adapt and change and meet new requirements as they arise while being more flexible in terms of changing the guidelines regarding what comes into the net and what does not. At the first instance, we want to be sure that we do not create openings so that would be easy for people to come through.

We will grow and learn with our experience. I am not here to tell you that we have every single answer on every single type of transaction. We will be developing that through regulation and guidelines as this progresses.

Senator Setlakwe: In the case of compliance, you said there was a preclusion. If that occurs, what do you do? Do you not report it to the police? In the case of compliance, do you find something that is disturbing and that should be reported to the police but you are prohibited from doing so?

Mr. Sankoff: On material that is discovered, if you discover that the person has not complied, that means the regulator entity is subject to prosecution for non-compliance. The rest of the material -- that is, the material that may reveal other crime -- is not reported to the police unless it is for the purpose of the non-compliance prosecution solely.

Senator Tkachuk: If you find cocaine, there is no problem?

Mr. Sankoff: There is a general exception at common law, namely, the plain view exception. If, for example, you walked in on a murder, you are not precluded from calling the police and telling them that a murder is taking place.

Senator Tkachuk: If the cocaine is on top of a desk versus being locked up in a safe, is there a difference?

Mr. Sankoff: The limits of the doctrine have not been explored, so I cannot give a comprehensive answer. Generally, the courts hold that compliance inspections are designed to ensure compliance. If the centre went beyond its powers, I have no hesitation from saying the courts would stop them from doing so. While your situation may provide some border line examples of cocaine on a desk, the power here is toward compliance. If the centre abuses its powers, the court still retains control to censor that.

Senator Setlakwe: If you come upon an indictable offence, you would not report it?

Mr. Sankoff: If compliance is being done, it is not the centre's purpose to report on other activities. The centre is a non-investigative agency.

Senator Tkachuk: When we met last spring, we did not really get a good definition from you of "suspicious transaction." We had problems with that term, if you remember. Has there been anything further regarding that? What is a "suspicious transaction"?

Ms Smith: That is not an easy question to answer. We have written a draft guideline that is out for consultation now. A "suspicious transaction" will differ in the context in which it is found. There are few examples of an individual suspicious transaction but, rather, in a context where the transaction itself is suspicious. Let me try to simplify this.

If you are the Toronto-Dominion doing private banking, you will be looking for very different indicators of suspicion than if you are the credit union in Lower Stewiacke.

It will, in part, relate to how well you know your client and what is normal for that client's activity. If your client is a business and normally they have cash deposits of $10,000 four times a week, then that is normal. If a $10,000 deposit is made, there is no suspicion. If, on another day, $1 million is suddenly deposited, that may or may not be suspicious depending on what the bank or the entity knows about that client.

Senator Tkachuk: Last June we were under a tremendous rush to pass Bill C-22 because the government needed to get the centre up and running. How many employees do you have at the centre and what do you think its projected annual cost will be for the year?

Ms Smith: Right now, we have approximately 70 per cent of our total employment in the centre. We have approximately 70 employees. I believe our budget for this year is $20 million.

Senator Tkachuk: Last year, I believe you said it would be $15 million.

Ms Smith: I do not have the exact numbers.

Senator Tkachuk: Do you expect to have 100 employees?

Ms Smith: Right now we are resourced for around 100, yes, and we have approximately 70 in place.

Senator Tkachuk: Would you send me a letter with a more precise answer on that?

I am not sure if what I experienced was a mistake on the part of Nesbitt Burns, but I had what they call a locked-in retirement plan from a previous employment. At the age of 55, I wanted to convert that locked-in plan into what they call a RRIF. The broker requested that I produce a picture ID. I have known this broker for 15 years and therefore asked him why picture ID was necessary. He told me that it was to conform with either this act or the act passed previously, and that it had to do with money laundering. I refused to produce the ID and he informed me that I would then need to sign a waiver. I signed a waiver and sent it away. I do not recall what the waiver stated. It was small print.

I thought that odd, and that is why I worry about bills like this. Why would such a request be made? Would any of the department officials here today know the reason for that request? Why would a picture ID be required? What was the waiver all about?

Mr. Lalonde: The "know-your-customer" principle is one of the cornerstones of the international anti-money laundering standards. As well, being able to ascertain the identity of your client is key. In the current regulations, which have been in force since 1993, there is a requirement that those financial institutions covered by the previous act ascertain the identify of their clients by reference to a number of pieces of identity. For example, it could be a driver's licence or another similar document.

It is required of the security's broker or the financial institution, when opening up new business relations with a client, to ascertain the identity of the client by reference to a driver's licence, for example. There is also a requirement to record that fact and take note of the reference number. That is the current requirement.

Senator Tkachuk: In order to open an account an individual must basically put his or her whole life on paper, just to open the account, right? The paperwork to be filled out is quite thick. The situation I described referred to the RRIF account. I had already filled one in for the other account to get the locked-in plan.

What happens with the picture ID? Would it be put on a wall in the broker's office so that they can throw darts at it because I am a senator? If I had sent it in, what would have happened to my ID? Would it have been sent to the government or would it be kept in a file in the broker's office?

Mr. Lalonde: There are several ways in which securities brokers are allowed to ascertain the identity of their clients. If we are talking about picture ID, typically what must occur is that the institutions would need to ascertain your identity face to face. There is no requirement for them to maintain a photocopy of whatever picture ID you gave them' they simply must record the reference number. It is due diligence for them. It records the fact that they have actually done this.

Senator Tkachuk: I just thought it was odd.

Senator Furey: I should like to go back to this issue of documentation disclosed during a compliance audit.

It was my understanding that any information obtained during a compliance audit could not be disclosed, in accordance with section 55, among other sections, as you pointed out; that in fact if information were disclosed it would render the evidence inadmissible. I hear you saying today that if documentation were discovered it could be used in a non-compliance prosecution, which would put it in open court. Is that correct?

Mr. Sankoff: That is correct. It could be used solely for the purposes of non-compliance. It is highly arguable that material could not be subsequently used in a prosecution for a different purpose because of the manner by which it was obtained. The act makes clear, first, that the purpose in obtaining that information is for non-compliance. There are also constitutional guarantees that back up that basic premise.

Senator Meighen: I appreciate, understand and support the idea of the necessity of protecting privacy. On the other hand, Mr. Cullen, you have said that this put us right up there with our international allies in the fight against organized crime in money laundering, et cetera. If, as you say, the bill - which is entitled "An Act to Amend the Proceeds of Crime (Money Laundering) Act" -- is designed solely to ensure that people are complying with an administrative requirement and that any evidence gathered in that process can only be used for a non-compliance prosecution, how will we advance the war against money laundering?

Mr. Cullen: Senator, maybe we are not communicating well. First, if people are not complying with the act in terms of reporting then FinTRAC and the whole legislative package cannot click into operation, obviously. If people are not reporting when they should be, then how can we ever get at money laundering? Therefore, you must have a mechanism to get people who should be complying to comply with the reporting requirements of the act. Once people are reporting, then the normal provisions of the act and the legislative package click into place in FinTRAC.

The senator has raised an interesting point. If someone keeps non-complying, then that is probably a challenge and that is one of the balances that we needed to bring to the table -- balancing privacy with the need to deal with money laundering. If someone refuses to comply continually then that would be a challenge.

We are looking at a small percentage. Many organizations will want to comply, or they will comply. They may not know that they should be complying or they may not be complying in the appropriate way, and we want to ensure that they will be complying with the act and reporting.

For those players who do not comply because of the balance of privacy issue, we will be challenged. I am sure it will be challenging.

Senator Meighen: Presumably the proposed legislation applies only to people in Canada. I see a nod from behind. I would suspect that 99.99 per cent of those people are not money launderers. They may be used by money launderers unknowingly; is that correct?

Mr. Cullen: I think there may be more than you would think.

Senator Meighen: There might be. That is fine. I am still having trouble understanding how the reporting will do more than perhaps establish a pattern of carelessness or innocence, or a pattern of continuing non-compliance, which then leads you to say that there is something more here.

Mr. Cullen: Let me give you an example. If, under the Income Tax Act, someone is not filing an income tax return, in a sense they are participating in tax evasion. However, there are various forms of tax evasion. If they are not filling in a tax return, how will you ascertain whether they are evading tax? You must first of all have people reporting and complying with the reporting provisions of the legislation. Once they are doing that, then the provision kicks in. That means that transactions are analyzed. If there is other corroborating evidence that would suggest that the transactions are suspicious, that information would then be forwarded in a tombstone way to the RCMP, and so forth. Without any reports, there is nothing much that one can do with anything, I would suggest.

Senator Meighen: Fair enough.

Senator Furey: Let's go back to the question on the evidence. You are still satisfied, I presume, that there is the safeguard of the claim on solicitor-client privilege there, even during a compliance audit on any documentation.

Mr. Sankoff: Absolutely. No matter what, the solicitor-client privilege exists. To be honest, whether it in here or not, solicitor-client privilege is a claim at common law. The express protections are set out here. The solicitor-client privilege will always take precedence in this matter. If there is a valid claim of solicitor-client privilege, it will go before a judge to be tried.

Senator Furey: We all need diligent solicitors, Mr. Chairman.

Senator Wiebe: My question may be a little comical. I am not a lawyer, and I cannot always understand some of their concerns.

Let us assume that this proposed legislation is passed and that I am in the drug trade and have had a successful week. As such, I have a pile of money that I do not know what to do with it. I cannot process it through the regular system because it will be detected by your people, who are doing a great job. If I hire a backhoe operator and have him bury the money for me, will he be under the law of compliance?

The Chairman: The backhoe operator may not know what is in the container.

Mr. Lalonde: The short answer is "no."

[Translation]

Senator Poulin: I would like to thank Mr. Cullen and Mr. Peterson for their speedy reply to the questions we raised during our discussions on Bill C-22. The four changes that have been tabled deal directly with the centre framework legislation. I would like to ask a similar question to the one asked by Senator Tkachuk. If I understand correctly, the centre is developing. It has a staff of 70 and an annual budget of $20 million, approximately. Under Bill C-22, what is the status of the centre as a government agency?

[English]

Ms Smith: We are set up in the law as an independent agency at arm's length from law enforcement agencies.

Senator Poulin: What is your relationship with the RCMP?

Ms Smith: We are at arm's length. It is very clear in the legislation that we are at arm's length from all law enforcement agencies. I could give some specifics as to what that means.

Senator Poulin: No, I understand. What is the relationship, therefore, between the agency and the Department of Finance?

Ms Smith: That is a bit more complicated.

Mr. Lalonde: The agency reports to Parliament through the Minister of Finance. Hence, the Minister of Finance has oversight responsibilities. The legislation spells out the kind of oversight responsibilities the Minister of Finance has and the kinds of information the minister is entitled, to exercise that responsibility. It is very clear in the legislation that the minister does not have access to any personal identifying information.

[Translation]

Senator Poulin: Will the agency table an annual report to the House?

Mr. Lalonde: Yes.

Senator Poulin: On the issue of privacy, you said that any transaction of more than $10,000 must be reported, even if, for example, I am giving money to my daughter who lives abroad. Is that right?

Mr. Lalonde: The payment bill stipulates that all transactions must be reported. Any cash deposit of $10,000 or more must be automatically reported by the bank to the new agency.

Senator Poulin: If I ask my Canadian bank to transfer $15,000 to an American bank for my daughter who lives in a different city, is the Canadian bank required to report this transaction?

Mr. Lalonde: As things stand now, the payment bill requires any transfers of $10,000 to be reported.

[English]

Senator Tkachuk: To follow up on that, just so I understand this electronic transfer, because we are talking about cash here when talking about illegal transactions, right? You do not usually pay by credit card if you are doing something illegal; the transaction is usually done in cash. I could understand perhaps an international transfer of money, from here to Bermuda or the United States, or vice versa.

However, to clarify this, say that there is a transaction between two Canadian bank accounts. Let us say that Senator Kolber transfers $12,000 to my account in Saskatoon.

The Chairman: That is highly unlikely.

Senator Tkachuk: Would there be a requirement to report on that?

Ms Smith: No, there is no requirement in the regulations.

Senator Tkachuk: Therefore, domestically there is no requirement.

Ms Smith: No, internationally the requirement is over $10,000.

Senator Setlakwe: I wanted to ask if it were international or domestic.

The Chairman: My initial understanding was that it applied to any wire transfer, but Ms Smith has just said that it is only international.

Mr. Lalonde: The current draft regulations only concern international wire transfers.

The Chairman: That was not expressed clearly before.

The committee fully understands that we are out to get the "bad guys" and not out to abuse the "good guys" -- not to be simplistic about it. Almost all of the questions had to do with compliance. We have not heard much, if anything, about what should be done when we have those voluminous reports. We all appreciate that these are early times and that the waters are being tested as we proceed.

The challenge is huge and it is not patently clear how this is to be resolved. One of the suggestions that I would make to this committee is that we make a reference to the Senate to have a review one year from now. That way, the appropriate officials will be able to outline their experience on this issue to that date. I urge the committee to consider inviting the witnesses back in one year or so for an update. Perhaps by that time there will be some anecdotal evidence, if nothings else, about who has been abused in such cases and who has not. The witnesses could also tell us whether any "bad guys" have been caught and whether the system has worked.

With that in mind, I thank all the witnesses for their participation today. We, as a committee, will do our best to see this matter through.

March 21, 2001 [Standing Senate Committee on Banking, Trade and Commerce]

Senator Furey: At the end of our last session, at which we heard from the archivist, there was a question about whether we would amend the clause where we asked for a notwithstanding clause pertaining to the destruction of records - notwithstanding his act. Steve Campbell, from Senator Kolber's office, and myself met with the officials who had discussed with the archivist what particular amendment he wanted. I did not meet with the archivist myself.

The clause pertaining to records now reads:

Notwithstanding the National Archives of Canada Act, shall destroy each report received and all information received or collected on the expiry of the applicable period referred to in paragraph (d).

That is, the fire-year and eight-year periods.

The archivist has asked that we amend that clause by stating:

shall destroy each report received, and all information received or collected, after the applicable period referred to in paragraph (d), in accordance with Records Disposition Authority No. 2001/003 issued on January 22, 2001 under section 5 of the National Archives of Canada Act, without taking into account any subsequent amendments to or repeal of that Authority.

My concern at the time was whether or not this particular directive, which was given by the archivist, would be repealable either by him or by his successors. When I discussed it with officials from the department, I was told that if we used harsher wording than "without taking into account any subsequent amendments to or repeal of that authority" and if we were to say, for example, "the archivist will issue the authority and that will be non-repealable," we would be dangerously close to attempting to amend the National Archives Act. Of course, we cannot do that with this particular bill.

My concern is that while the proposed amendment leaves the archivist free to do his job, that is, to make or to issue directives to destroy or to save, the officials are telling us that we can ignore that directive. That directive would be ineffectual.

My concern with that is, if that is the reality, if that is the practical effect of it, then we are just trying do through the back door what we cannot do through the front door, which is amend his act. I am saying, for greater certainty, even though it may not be what the national archivist wants, we should stay with the notwithstanding clause in the proposed amendment.

The Chairman: Is that clear, gentlemen?

Senator Tkachuk: I have no problem with that.

Senator Furey: The notwithstanding provision is certain. Even though officials are telling us that this one would stand the test, I have some concerns that it would not. My recommendation would be to go with certainty.

Senator Tkachuk: As it is now, we want them destroyed, right?

Senator Furey: Yes.

The Chairman: Yes. Is it agreed, gentlemen, that we consider the bill clause-by-clause? Is it the intention of any honourable senator to propose an amendment?

Senator Tkachuk: First, I wish to make a statement on the money laundering bill. It will become clear when I finish why it is important that I make a statement.

We studied Bill C-22 last June. At that time, our committee felt strongly about a number of issues. Since the House had already recessed for the summer break, the government asked that the bill be passed unamended. The minister promised that certain amendments of concern would be brought back in the form of a new bill at his earliest opportunity. The minister stated this is a letter, a copy of which you all have.

My understanding is that this letter was drafted and, due to a misunderstanding on the part of the Chair of our committee, which may have been caused my me, him, or both of us, he believed that the Conservatives refused to negotiate. As a result, our specific concerns were not relayed to the minister. Once that misunderstanding was cleared up in committee, we were still left in the predicament of passing the bill unamended until these concerns could be addressed at a later date, which was the next session of Parliament.

Liberal members felt generally that their concerns were met by the letter, but were willing to attach to the committee report a list of observations, which we all agreed to, which were really our observations on Bill C-22.

While we support being tough on crime and giving much- needed tools to government to track down money launderers in this country, we also believe strongly in providing a check on that same government.

That being said, with the establishment of a new agency, FINTRAC, or Financial Transactions and Reports Analysis Centre of Canada, we remain unsatisfied with the clause in Bill C-22 that instituted a five-year review.

I realize that this point could be considered out of order, which is why I asked, and the Chairman so kindly let me go ahead with this, as it does not fall within the scope of Bill S-16. However, I am asking honourable senators to hear me out. I believe our Chair and our members are reasonable people. In all my dealings with the Chairman he has been so.

Our discussion of the letter is reported in the transcripts of the committee hearing. I am quoting myself here when I say that the letter was sent to the Chairman from Mr. Peterson. I asked:

Do you know whether he would be willing to make changes in the letter? Does this letter come about because the minister and his officials were listening to the witnesses and they said, "Oh, these are the items," or was there a whole list of items from which he decided?

The Chairman: I hear where are you going and you are obviously free to go wherever you like, but my understand ing was that you folks would not accept a letter of any kind. That is why we worked out a letter which was acceptable to us to show to you. You told me that nothing less than regular amendments would do and that letters were not acceptable. You are catching me unaware here.

Which I did say. That did not mean that I did not want to negotiate. That is simply what I said. There are two issues here. You had asked whether we would accept the letter. Of course, over the last seven years that I have been here there have been many letters, but nothing has ever happened. That is why we had many concerns over the letter.

If it was not for that misunderstanding, I believe there would have been a very good chance that our review clause would have made this bill. In fact, I have reason to believe that the drafters of this bill in concept are in this room right now.

I am not sure, but I think so. That being said, I humbly ask all senators on this committee to consider unanimously supporting the adoption of my amendment to institute a period of review of three years rather than five years. We all agreed to this in our observations.

It will still be up to the Senate to decide ultimately whether this amendment shall pass. I will have to make my case again before a point of order is called in the Senate. I understand that, according to Beauchesne's and Montpetit and Marleau, scope is a convention of Parliament. In fairness, a committee can choose to overlook a potential point of order if the feeling is unanimous. If it is not unanimous, I understand.

I would like to change the review clause to three years because I think five years is too long to wait to see how well the new agency is operating and all our members feel that way. In fact, last week in committee there was testimony suggesting that a review would even take place within one year, and the chairman asked Minister Cullen whether he would come back in a year and he said that he would. I do not think anybody disagreed in principle with limiting it, and I have amendments here for one year or three years, whatever the wishes of senators are.

I think five years is too long and so I have my amendment.

The Chairman: Would you care to make it formal, please?

Senator Tkachuk: I would, or you could wait until we get to that part of the bill. I think I handed it to the Clerk.

Is it possible to have some discussion as to how members feel before the amendment is proposed?

Let us put it this way: If there is no consideration whatsoever by the government to passing any amendment, to giving any truck to one, we would prefer to have the amendment on division, so at least our point of view is stated in the record rather than through a point of order. That is what I am asking honourable senators to do here today.

The Chairman: My impression is that members on the Liberal side want to go ahead with it as is, which is five years.

Senator Tkachuk: Right.

The Chairman: Do honourable senators agree with that?

Senator Furey, you are the sponsor. Why do you not get into this?

Senator Furey: Just a comment on Senator Tkachuk's issue. I have really no problem with a three-year period, except in this instance, where it is the first three-year period. There is really nothing going on there yet. It is not staffed. Therefore, one of those three years will probably be wasted in terms of collecting information and being able to do a proper assessment. With respect to three rather five, I really have no problem with it at all. It is just that, for start-up reasons, I do not think three is long enough. That is probably the message we were getting from officials.

Senator Tkachuk: You mean one year is too short, three years is not long enough, and five years is about right?

Senator Furey: Yes, that is basically the assessment.

Senator Tkachuk: Are you saying five years, and three years thereafter, or every one year thereafter? Would you be agreeable to that?

Senator Furey: I certainly would be agreeable to five and then every three years. I have no problem with that. I am not speaking for everyone else, obviously.

The Chairman: The only reasonable thing to do would be to recess for three minutes and discuss it.

Senator Tkachuk: That would be fine.

The Chairman: Is that all right with you?

Senator Tkachuk: That would be great.

The Chairman: Is that your only amendment?

Senator Tkachuk: That is the only amendment we have.

The Chairman: Let us recess for three minutes and we will decide.

(The committee suspended)

(Upon resuming)

The Chairman: After much consultation and hearing advice, by Senator Tkachuk's own admission, the proposed amendment is out of order, and I so rule. Shall we continue?

Shall the title stand postponed? Shall clause 1 carry?

Some Hon. Senators: Agreed.

Senator Tkachuk: On division. All on division.

The Chairman: In other words, you are against each one of them.

Senator Tkachuk: You can do it anyway you like.

The Chairman: It is a question of how we report it.

Senator Di Nino: On division.

Senator Tkachuk: Report it all on division.

The Chairman: Shall clause 2 carry?

Some Hon. Senators: Agreed.

Senator Tkachuk: On division.

The Chairman: Shall clause 3 carry?

Some Hon. Senators: Agreed.

Senator Tkachuk: On division.

The Chairman: Shall clause 4 carry?

Some Hon. Senators: Agreed.

Senator Tkachuk: On division.

The Chairman: Shall the title carry?

Some Hon. Senators: Agreed.

Senator Tkachuk: On division.

The Chairman: Shall I report the bill?

Some Hon. Senators: Agreed.

Senator Di Nino: On division.

The Chairman: The Clerk tells me that when we report a bill, it cannot show on division, but the minutes can.

June 11, 2001 [House of Commons]

Hon. Jim Peterson (for the Minister of Finance) moved that Bill S-16, an act to amend the Proceeds of Crime (Money Laundering) Act, be read the third time and passed.

He said: Mr. Speaker, what we are dealing with here is an amendment to the anti-money laundering legislation that was passed by the House a year ago. These amendments spring from a review of the legislation in great detail by the Senate.

I would like to commend hon. senators for the way in which they gave the bill a great deal of scrutiny but did not hold up the passage. They said they would come back and revisit it but would allow the bill to pass in its original form. I would like to thank them for the scrutiny they have given it and for the way that they have expedited the passage, at the same time achieving a bill that fulfils the purposes and needs.

Money laundering in Canada is anywhere between $5 billion and $17 billion a year. The bill would fight organized crime and the proceeds of crime through a mandatory reporting of suspicious transactions and the reporting of large transfers of money across borders, which would be carried out by the Financial Transactions and Reports Analysis Centre. The institutions would report to it and it will be able to analyze the data. What I think we have achieved, which may be unique in the world, is that we are respecting the privacy of individuals and at the same time fighting crime. That is the balance we have struck and I believe it is a very good balance.

I would like to thank all members of the House for their consideration of the bill and for its speedy passage in the same manner that they gave speedy passage to the main bill itself one year ago.

Mr. Ken Epp (Elk Island, Canadian Alliance): Mr. Speaker, I know that the Liberals are always delighted when I rise in debate as one of the first three speakers who, according to the rules, has 40 minutes available.

I did that in debate on Bill S-3, the transportation bill. I hope that my intervention there will actually result in a ball starting to roll that will change the laws of the country. I am hoping for changes to the laws right across the North American continent so that there will be uniformity, so that there will be understanding on what the rules are and so that in obeying them we will save lives. That is the objective.

Now we are speaking about money laundering and the role government has to play in order to prevent criminal activity on the part of members of our society who choose to engage in crime.

The motivation of criminal activity is almost always that of earning money in an illicit fashion, so this money somehow has to be brought into the system without it being identifiable.

I know that a lot of people in the country have some concerns about the potential for some day having a cashless society. Actually I am one of them. It has one interesting feature if we stop to think about it. If instead of actually having cash in our wallets, all of us had computer cards that represented cash, it would of course be easy for people to transact business. It would really be equivalent. Instead of withdrawing four $20 bills from a bank machine in order to have $80 in cash, I could simply put my cash card into the machine and ask the machine to transfer $80 from my chequing account or whatever it is to the card. When I wanted to purchase something, instead of tendering $12.38 and then getting change I could simply give my card. The machine would subtract that from the balance on the card and I would walk away.

That could be done anonymously. It would be great. However, it could also be tracked and that in fact is one of the great objections that many Canadians have to that kind of scheme. There is genuine concern that if we ever get to that then the term big brother is watching would take on real meaning. It would mean that even if we stopped to buy a pop and chocolate bar there would be evidence that could be hauled out later. Most Canadians reject that kind of monitoring of our activities, so there are some problems with it. However, it could be legislated that such data could be used only in an investigation of criminal activity.

If we had such a scheme, just look at how difficult it would make it for people who engage in crime. They would somehow, either through a bank account or through a cash card, have to force other people to put money into their account in one form or another. It would be traceable and therefore it would be a lot easier to put a brake on a lot of criminal activity. I sometimes think it would be quite hilarious if someone walked into a bank with a gun, pointed it at the teller and demanded that $30,000 be transferred to an account. It would hardly be an anonymous transaction. A person would not get very far before officials were able to catch up with him and charge him with the appropriate crime.

That is not what we are talking about today. We are talking about some other means of tracking financial transactions that are related to the criminal industry. I have never heard of a criminal who demands payment by cheque when he or she does something illegal, because cheques are in fact traceable. It is called a paper trail.

About 10 years ago when the GST was brought in there was an awful lot of illegal activity, because in order to avoid the GST people said they would do renovations to houses or fix cars for a certain amount provided that they were paid cash and there was no paper trail. Then there was no GST and they did not have to declare it on their income tax. Basically, it was tax free money which meant they could do it for half the price.

I understand that sometimes they charged three-quarters of the price, so they basically split the earnings so to speak, but it was illegal. If Revenue Canada, as it was called at that time, found out about it, then appropriate actions were taken. However this was the lack of the paper trail.

How do we get a paper trail on criminal activity? Obviously these criminals will avoid the paper trail. Bill S-16 is actually the completion of Bill C-22, which was given assent in the previous parliament, if I am not mistaken. I do not know if hon. members will recall, but I believe that was the bill that eliminated the $1,000 bill. It is much more difficult for large amounts of money to be transacted if people literally have to have truckloads of $20 or at the most $100 bills to do the transaction.

That was also the bill that included some of the measures which we are talking about today. As the parliamentary secretary said now there are some refinements being made. I would like to say a few things about them.

First, how long can this information be retained? The bill is amending the new organization called the Financial Transactions and Reports Analysis Centre of Canada, commonly called FINTRAC. If financial organizations transact a large amount of money in cash they are required to report it. Those financial institutions, like banks or credit unions, will report their transactions to FINTRAC.

This raised a number of questions. As I said, how long can the centre retain this information? For example, if I went to my bank and deposit $50,000 in cash, and maybe $50,000 is not very much money to some members but it sure is to me and my friends, people might wonder how I got it. They might wonder if I got it through some illicit operation. However, that would never happen. In case someone else did something like that, the financial institution would report the cash deposit. If I reported it, FINTRAC would then have the obligation to look at it. If it was suspicious it would turn it over to the law enforcement agencies for investigation.

Let us say that I am investigated and there was nothing wrong. The institution would have his information. How long would the centre retain the information it collects? Bill S-16 deals with that. It says that the information reported to them cannot be kept more than five years. If it is transmitted onward to the law enforcement agencies, then the information can be keep for eight years but no longer, in which case that information must be deleted from all computer files and all paper files must be destroyed.

When and how will it dispose of that information? That is also in this particular bill, as I have just indicated. What information may the centre disclose to law enforcement authorities? That is another very important question because the original bill just said similar information and it was left undefined. Similar to what? One thing this bill does is to insert only one word in one of the clauses. It inserts the word identifying information. In other words, a certain amount of information such as name and address can be included. The information which it is entitled to keep and transmit must be identifying information in terms of the suspicion, or the details of the transaction itself or the identification of the individual. It cannot go on a wild goose chase.

Clause 3 of the bill deals with the jurisdiction of the courts. There is always a problem with this. If a government agency has the right to do something and I disagree with it, can I appeal? That was not clear in the original act. This clause in the bill will clarify this and allow courts to have jurisdiction over any disputes.

What happens if an agent from the centre feels that it is information which could lead to a criminal charge? Does he or she give it to the law enforcement agency without any accountability? The fact of the matter is we are dealing with people who may be innocent.

We want to do as much as we can to find evidence against those kinds of individuals, convict those who are guilty and bring them to justice. At the same time, however, we do know if many people are charged with certain activities of which they are not guilty. They should be able to defend themselves.

The issue of the courts is one thing. Another is that any information which is deemed eligible to be reported, cannot be reported without the person first being given the opportunity to contact a lawyer. One may wonder why, if it involves an accountant for example.

At the present time accountants do not have the solicitor-client privilege that pertains to the legal profession. That person could refuse to give information and decide to withhold it as being client privilege. The person now would not be required to give that information without first having the opportunity to contact a lawyer who could look at it, then on behalf of the client say it was client-professional privilege, and he could take it. This is a safeguard which should be included in order to protect those people who are innocent and, to a degree, protect the process so the person who is guilty cannot get off on the technicality that his or her rights were abused. That is a very important clause.

I thought it would be useful for members of the House and for anyone else who happens to be observing the debate today to know a little more detail about Bill S-16. It is a bill which strengthens the money laundering legislation in Canada so those people who are involved in criminal activity can be correctly identified and brought to justice. I support this bill.

[Translation]

Ms. Pierrette Venne (Saint-Bruno—Saint-Hubert, BQ): Mr. Speaker, I am pleased to have this opportunity to speak today on the third reading of Bill S-16, an act to amend the Proceeds of Crime (Money Laundering) Act.

On June 29, 2000, Bill C-22, or the Proceeds of Crime (Money Laundering) Act received royal assent. The purpose of this statute is to make it easier to prevent money laundering of the proceeds of crime by creating a financial transactions and reports analysis centre responsible for gathering, managing, analyzing and distributing reports of suspicious operations and any other pertinent information.

In fact, the inauguration of a mechanism for the reporting of suspicious transactions and major transborder capital transfers, as provided for in Bill C-22, was in response to the problems raised by the financial action group against money-laundering.

This would be a good opportunity to point out that the Bloc Quebecois had supported this government initiative, out of a concern to protect the Quebec population from the calamity represented by organized crime. Moreover, in order to make money laundering more inconvenient, the Bloc Quebecois were the ones behind the withdrawal of $1,000 bills and the requirement for banks and other financial institutions to report any suspicious financial transaction involving $10,000 or more in cash.

Before I go further, money laundering may be defined as follows. It is the process by which the proceeds of crime are converted into assets whose origins are difficult to trace. Despite all, we know that 70% of the money laundered in Canada is drug money. The remaining 30% comes from activities as varied as under the table gaming, tobacco and alcohol smuggling, fraud, counterfeiting and petty computer and telecommunications crime.

As we know, money is the sinews of war, and the one waged by the authorities against organized crime is no exception. Internationally, proceeds from crime entering the financial market represents hundreds of billions of dollars. So, considering that the prime motivator behind organized crime is lucre, and here I am speaking of huge sums quickly pocketed, the confiscation of such laundered proceeds hurts a lot more than the usual sanctions of fines and prison terms.

Legitimate or not, every business aims at making a net profit. By way of example, let us look at a business whose activities are on the up and up. Suppose that for some reason or other the business is taken to court and for purposes of discussion, let us imagine that at the end of the trial it is sentenced to pay a fine or to pay damages. Of course, the business will feel it but this comes with the territory.

The same holds true for organized crime. A jail sentence or a fine is among the inherent risks associated with criminal activities. However, by depriving an organization of its most profound motivation, we destroy the directly proportional relation that exists between the risks and the benefits. So, getting our hands on that organization's assets will weaken it from an economical and moral point of view. In other words, we must show that, indeed, crime does not pay.

Even though it does not at all change the substance of the Proceeds of Crime (Money Laundering) Act, Bill S-16 does address some issues raised during the hearings held on Bill C-22 by the Standing Senate Committee on Banking, Trade and Commerce. The four changes included in the bill should address the following issues.

How long will the Financial Transactions and Reports Analysis Centre of Canada keep the information that it collects? When and how will it dispose of the information that it will have gathered? What information can the centre transmit to law enforcement bodies? Will the federal court have the power to order the centre to transmit the file of an individual under the Privacy Act and the Access to Information Act? Finally, who is authorized to make a claim of solicitor-client privilege?

We must ask ourselves if Bill S-16 adequately addresses these concerns, and this is what we are going to do.

First, we can say that clause 1 responds satisfactorily to the first two questions raised before the standing Senate committee. This amendment sets out the circumstances justifying the maximum retention period of eight years for reports and all information.

This retention period shall be enforced when the centre forwards information either to law enforcement authorities or to the Canada Customs and Revenue Agency, the Canadian Security and Intelligence Service, the Department of Citizenship and Immigration, an agency in a foreign state or an international organization with a mandate similar to the centre's.

Moreover, the addition of paragraph (e) to section 54 of the Proceeds of Crime (Money Laundering) Act provides that each report received and all information received or collected shall be destroyed on the expiry of the applicable period. This paragraph therefore adds certain necessary clarifications regarding the duration of retention and the destruction of information.

Similarly, with the addition of the term identifying information in paragraph 55(7)(e), the purpose of which is to clarify to what the information is similar, the second clause of Bill S-16 thus responds to the third question. The purpose of this amendment is to clarify that the identifying information in question is that found in paragraphs (a) to (d).

In our view, this clarification was not needed since paragraph 2(e) is interrelated to the previous ones. But since this is a catch-all paragraph, I guess someone felt the need to make this clarification which does not change anything to the original provision. If this amendment can clarify things for some people, great.

With respect to the fourth question, clause 3 of Bill S-16 was drafted because initially the federal court was not allowed to make an order for disclosure. In fact, such an order could only be made pursuant to subsection 60(4) of the Proceeds of Crime (Money Laundering) Act.

The amendment ensures that no provision in this legislation can prevent the federal court from ordering the director of the centre to disclose information under the Access to Information Act and the Privacy Act. It seems that it was always intended for the federal court to enjoy this authority, which will now be clearly stipulated in clause 3 of Bill S-16.

With this amendment, the Proceeds of Crime (Money Laundering) Act will now give the federal court some judicial control over the disclosure of information.

As for the fourth clause, as we mentioned at second reading, it certainly would have been possible to word it to make it easier to understand. Unfortunately, it was not, and we have to live with it.

In addition, following the explanations we were provided with at the Standing Committee on Finance, we believe that, even if this amendment answers our fifth question about who could invoke the solicitor-client privilege, it seems that it does not deal with the concerns that led to its drafting.

Before the Senate committee, accountants maintained that they have very high standards of confidentiality to meet, just like any lawyer. Consequently, they say that they should also be allowed to claim solicitor-client privilege. However, clause 4 of the bill responds only partially to this demand. An accountant or any other person, other than a lawyer, cannot personally claim solicitor-client privilege.

Indeed, the protection of documents in the possession of a person who is not a lawyer depends on the involvement of such a legal counsel in the matter under investigation. Therefore, the possibility of claiming solicitor-client privilege remains restricted to the lawyer.

How does this work in practical terms? First, the client gives a legal mandate to a lawyer. I must insist on the fact that the nature of the mandate is crucial because a lawyer who would act as business adviser could not claim solicitor-client privilege.

In fulfilling his or her mandate, the lawyer may work jointly with other professionals, such as an accountant for example. Having doubts regarding the legality of the activities conducted by the client, the authorities decide to investigate. The person authorized to conduct the search will not be able to examine the documents handed over to the accountant by the lawyer. Therefore, it is through the lawyer, the only person who can claim solicitor-client privilege, that the documents in the possession of the accountant will remain confidential.

In this context, it would be fair to think that, in order to enjoy absolute protection, money launderers will systematically go to a lawyer first, who will hand the documents over to the appropriate professionals.

Yet the situation is not as simple as it may appear. Even if the solicitor-client confidentiality required of the lawyer at this time provides considerable guarantees of confidentiality, this is not an absolute concept but one subject to a number of conditions and restrictions, which I will not list in the context of today's debate.

When an individual or organization involved in money laundering requires the services of any professional with a view to facilitating the perpetration of a crime, regardless of whether or not a lawyer was involved, the seized documents cannot be protected by solicitor-client privilege.

In short, this amendment adds nothing new to the present situation, in that it merely codifies existing principles which have long been in place under common law. The concept of solicitor-client privilege therefore remains exclusive to the performance of the duties of a lawyer.

This notion can, moreover, be extended to other persons when their services have been retained by a lawyer, in order to enable him or her to meet the obligations of his or her mandate as a lawyer.

Under these circumstances, one might say that the solicitor-client privilege is not a right transmittable to a third party. It is instead a real right involving transmitted documents which, as the bottom line, are the purview of the lawyer.

We believe that the law will meet the objective of this provision, that is to ensure that specialized professionals such as lawyers and accountants cannot act as accomplices to the money laundering mechanism.

As we have already stated, Bill S-16 ought to respond to five very specific questions raised before the Senate committee. Despite the fact that accountants do not really enjoy the same privileges of client confidentiality as lawyers, we still consider that Bill S-16 effectively addresses all these issues.

Obviously, as we supported the Proceeds of Crime (Money Laundering) Act and as the four clauses the present debate addresses are intended simply to clarify the intent of the provisions they amend, we will also vote in favour of Bill S-16.

However, we wish to point out to this House that we are supporting the government today for the same reasons we became involved in the introduction of new coercive measures.

We are satisfied these measures will enable the authorities to more effectively fight organized crime and therefore to ensure the safety of Quebecers.

In addition, it is unfortunate that the people of Quebec must once again put their faith in the goodwill of a federal government, which, more often than not, does what it likes when it comes to resolving problems that, despite their application to Quebec society specifically, fall under the jurisdiction of the federal government because of the distribution of jurisdictions, which gives it exclusive jurisdiction in matters of criminal law.

It is therefore appropriate to mention that this dependency will be eliminated with a sovereign Quebec.

[English]

Mr. Peter MacKay (Pictou—Antigonish—Guysborough, PC): Mr. Speaker, I commend the hon. member on her remarks. She obviously grasps the importance and the relevance of this issue at this time in Canada.

In response to concerns raised by the Senate banking committee and the important efforts and work it did in that regard, we see Bill S-16, an act to amend the Proceeds of Crime Act, coming forward to legislate in the areas of solicitor-client privilege, the disclosure of information and records retention.

I should indicate at the outset that I had intended to split my time with the hon. member for Kings—Hants. Subject to his arrival I may just carry on.

Money laundering, as we all know and are very aware, is the process by which criminals attempt to conceal profits earned from crime so that the money looks as if it came from very legitimate sources. It is literally an attempt to clean dirty cash. It is also an attempt to hide or cover up the illegal means and sources from which the money originated. Typically it involves vices such as extortion, prostitution, illegal gambling, drugs and other contraband. The particular legislation is aimed at attempting to track the origins of the money and to get at the source itself.

The legislation speaks of abilities to trace the origins of money because the origins themselves are those which are most often concealed and erased. If the money is successfully covered up, it can then be used to buy goods and services the way any other type of cash or exchange takes place.

It is estimated that somewhere between $5 billion and $17 billion in money from nefarious sources is laundered in Canada each year. I do not mean to put too fine a point on it but that sort of vague estimate indicates the size of the black market out there. It is very disturbing. Exact figures are very difficult to come by in that regard.

Obviously the black market is thriving in Canada. It is straight profit that is hidden from Revenue Canada and from government generally. The money is very often shifted between countries, financial institutions and investment brokerages without a paper trace that would allow law enforcement to get to the source or to get to the origins. The more complex and convoluted the trail, the more difficult to trace, eventually prosecute and bring to justice those involved in money laundering.

It is fair to say it is a world problem against which even the world's most powerful nations struggle. For example, Vladimir Putin, the Russian president, just last week held a conference on money laundering in St. Petersburg. He outlined efforts to crack down on the global illegal industry and the expansion of this industry in Russia. Russia is currently a member of the FATF's blacklist of nations because of its money laundering legislation, or lack thereof, which does not meet international standards.

We do not want this to happen in our country. That is why it is encouraging to all that the legislation is before us now. We must ensure our global partners and neighbours, not to mention our citizenry, that we are doing everything in our power to address and confront this problem.

Corruption is a growing problem in Canada and most countries recognize this point. They recognize the fact that it is very diverse and takes many forms just like legitimate industries.

Any effort aimed at curtailing this type of underground economy and outsourcing of money from illegal means is where we should be focusing our attention. The magnitude and the reach of this problem are staggering.

Canada has come under heavy criticism in recent years as being an easy place for criminal organizations to launder their money. Our biggest ally, the United States, has sent signals which clearly indicate that we are leaving our neighbours to the south open and more vulnerable to criminal activity respecting money laundering because of a failing security system in our country. The lack of resources contributes to that. The lack of government support whether it be through funding or innovation indicates to members of our law enforcement community that in many instances their government is not behind them.

The response has been legislation such as Bill S-16, albeit late. Bill C-22 originally imposed new reporting and record keeping requirements and created financial transactions in the reports analysis centre of Canada to receive and analyse information. Bill C-22 was the predecessor for the legislation before us. It died on the order paper when the pre-emptive and very opportunistic election was called.

The banks would be required by law to adhere to a new reporting regime that would be put in place over the next year. It would help reorganize and report dubious transactions. It would present banks with the obligation to act upon information of which they might be in possession and report where there is a suspicion of organized crime activity. It is clearly there to try to unveil and unmask efforts by organized crime to use financial institutions such as our major banks and other financial institutions for illegal purposes. A failure to report would result in certain sanctions. Those sanctions include fines of up to $2 million and five years incarceration. Therefore, this reporting scheme does have some teeth.

Concerns have been expressed however about the privacy and the disclosure of certain information. Those were voiced by the privacy commissioner, the Canadian Bar Association and other groups.

The Senate banking committee looked at the bill in June of 2000 and felt that there were numerous flaws and areas where it could have been improved. The government at that time was unwilling to entertain amendments to the legislation because it was late in June and the House of Commons was going to recess. We know that at this time of year ironically we are facing a similar attitude on the part of government.

However, the Secretary of State for International Financial Institutions gave a written undertaking to the committee that certain changes would be made in a new bill to be introduced in the fall. Those changes formed the substance of Bill S-30, introduced in October of 2000. This bill was identical to the bill we see before us and it went beyond those changes agreed to in the letter from the secretary of state.

The Senate banking committee reported the bill with the observation that the government should have given consideration to other amendments that would further ensure that solicitor-client privilege was protected by adding the phrase law office in any clause where the term dwelling house appeared.

Second, the first annual review should be held after three years not after five years as was indicated in the original legislation. We find far too often that we are becoming very slack in our review process that was initially intended to ensure that the bill was living up to the breadth, width and intention.

Third and finally, it would require regulations under the act to be tabled before a committee of each House of parliament. Sadly, this bill does not include those further changes that were recommended by the committee.

The Law Society of Upper Canada has asked for the deference of the worst sections of this legislation. In many legal circles around the country court action against the federal government is not only being discussed but is being planned. This has happened time and time again. It is a given that with legislation such as this, and Bill C-24 is another bill, the lawyers are already writing the briefs, and the games will begin as soon as this law comes into being.

This bill will focus on the following legal aspects of this particular legislation. Solicitor-client privilege is one, which I mentioned previously. Where as Bill C-22 only dealt with instances where there was solicitor-client privilege involving legal counsel, Bill S-16 now clarifies that the officials of the Financial Transactions and Reports Analysis Centre may not examine or copy documents that might be subject to a claim of solicitor-client privilege where the document is in the hands of someone else until a reasonable opportunity has been made for that person to contact legal counsel. This responds to concerns raised by the Certified General Accountants Association of Canada.

It is very much akin to the situation we see with the information commissioner in Canada who would like to examine the Prime Minister's agenda books. He would hold that information in privacy and counsel and determine its relevance to the individuals who have requested disclosure. It follows a longstanding tradition that allows judges to determine relevance and admissibility of certain information. So we support that particular initiative.

Privacy under Bill S-16 will also allow individuals or the privacy commissioner to take the Financial Transactions and Reports Analysis Centre to court if they are denied access by the centre.

This legislation has come under some criticism in the banking committee because the bill creates onerous and very involved new responsibilities. In fact, Margaret Beare, one of Canada's leading experts on organized crime, recently stated that the new legislation requiring banks to report suspicious transactions was contradictory to some of the banks' principles, mainly that they would be making a profit and reacting to customers' wishes.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Bélair): I am sorry to interrupt the hon. member. It was understood that you would split your time with your colleague. Before going to your colleague, there are five minutes for questions or comments.

Mr. Ken Epp (Elk Island, Canadian Alliance): Mr. Speaker, I was listening to the hon. member speak and quite clearly he is not finished his notes. My question is very simple. What else does he have to say?

Mr. Peter MacKay: Mr. Speaker, I would like to thank my hon. colleague for his intervention. It does allow me to continue just momentarily with my remarks.

There were concerns with respect to the discrepancies over what would constitute a suspicious transaction, which again led to concerns that were expressed by Ms. Beare. There was also indication that certain levels of the banking sector had problems within their computer system or their system of reporting that would also leave them vulnerable by not being able to live up to the expectation of reporting. They would have an inability to monitor the type of monetary transactions that may be taking place on an ongoing basis, that was they could do so perhaps over a sustained period of time. However, as we all know, these transactions often occur in a very short time span.

Ms. Beare expressed a concern that lack of follow-up from police in some instances posed a considerable obstacle.

As is often the case with catching criminals, it is the slip-ups and lack of sophistication on their part that very often leads to the arrest. However the legislation I would suggest moves in the right direction in terms of arming those in the financial sector to combat the very sophisticated and often very complicated and nefarious means by which those who are trying to launder their money will engage. Otherwise those who play the game very well continue to thrive despite our best efforts. We have to obviously strive regardless.

On that note, I will turn over the floor to my colleague from Kings—Hants. I know that as a member of the finance committee he has made significant contributions to this and other bills. I know that all members will be riveted to their seats when the hon. member for Kings—Hants assumes the floor.

Mr. Scott Brison (Kings—Hants, PC): Mr. Speaker, I would like to thank my colleague from Pictou—Antigonish—Guysborough for his erudite comments.

The issue of money laundering is one that no Canadian should underestimate. The fact that the estimates range between a $5 billion problem to as high as a $20 billion problem speaks volumes about the degree to which we really do not have a very good handle on the scale of the problem. What we do realize is its impact on facilitating and enabling organized crime in any range of applications, whether it is in particular on the side of the narcotics trade, is significant.

We should also not underestimate the degree to which significant resources are needed to fighting money laundering. In recent years we have seen an exponential increase in the range and complexity of financial vehicles available to criminals.

When we talk about organized crime, we are not talking about underfunded agencies. We are talking about some of the most sophisticated, well funded groups in the world with international linkages and the economies of scale to attract and to invest in the very best technologies. That is why, whatever we do in terms of new agencies and new approaches to money laundering, we have to ensure that the funds are committed to our RCMP and our enforcement capabilities. Otherwise all that will occur is the government will take baby steps in the right direction but really not achieve the goals of reducing the incidents of organized crime and money laundering, which should of course be the goal of the legislation. The government has had a terrible record of underfunding, the RCMP for instance. Clearly while new agencies and new approaches might be helpful, if they are underfunded, it will not achieve the goals that the government has attached to this legislation.

We have some concerns relative to issues of privacy and the member for Pictou—Antigonish—Guysborough articulated some of those concerns. It is important as well to ensure that the new agency's mandate and efforts are separated assiduously from those of the Canada Customs and Revenue Canada Agency. If the customs and revenue agency sees evidence of money laundering, it may be appropriate to refer some cases to this new agency to deal with money laundering.

That being the case, what we want to avoid in those cases where this agency has not found sufficient evidence of money laundering but may find some evidence relative to inappropriate behaviours relative to one's taxes, is the agency to result in a souped-up Revenue Canada to sink its teeth a little deeper into the ankles of Canadian taxpayer.

The issues of enforcement, and particularly the onus being placed on financial institutions, will be one that will be very difficult from an enforcement perspective and from a privacy perspective. We have to be awfully careful in this regard that a significant level of education occurs at the outset and that our financial institutions are prepared on a consistent basis throughout various financial institutions and throughout a branch of networks to carry out the mandate of this legislation. I suggest to the government that this will be a significant challenge and that the government has to be prepared.

The government has to be prepared to invest significantly in technologically driven approaches to deal with money laundering. Again, we are not dealing with amateurs. These are not underfunded agencies and local yokels who are doing a bit of criminal activities and do not really have the resources to carry on their activities. The government is fighting some of the best funded organizations in the world.

I would argue that we need to engage other countries more actively than we are right now in a co-operative effort. Clearly, money laundering and electronic transfers of money do not recognize borders, particularly if one were to consider just for a moment the impact of even the Interac system and its impact on the ability to launder money, to hide transactions and to break really large transactions into a multitude of smaller ones.

I am sure many of us in the House use online banking sometimes and I would suggest all of us probably use our bank cards. However, consider in the wrong hands and with nefarious motives what extraordinarily powerful tools the Interac system and online banking are. These are the simplest consumer available technologies of which we are aware. We are not even considering some of the extraordinarily powerful technologies being used in the mysterious world of arbitrage and currency trading.

If we are not very careful to ensure the necessary resources are committed to this fight, then we are sending this new agency, our RCMP and others into battle with pellet guns which will not be in the long term interest of the effort to reduce the incidence of money laundering and organized crime.

Accountability is of real importance. There is concern about the growing trend toward agencies which the government has pushed in recent years. The Canada Customs and Revenue Agency and the new money laundering agencies are not very accountable.

We must ensure, particularly in areas of privacy, that we do not create agencies that are able to run roughshod over the rights of Canadians. At the same time, however, agencies must have the resources and ability to do their jobs. It is a balancing act. I hope the government has a good understanding of what it will be up against with the new agency.

We must invest properly and make sure the accountability is there to protect ordinary, law-abiding Canadians. However resources must also be committed to ensuring Canadians who do not take the law seriously, who participate in money laundering and globally powerful organized crime networks, are caught and dealt with.

Those are some of our concerns. The legislation, like so much of the government's legislation, represents a baby step in the right direction. However given the power of organized crime globally and the resources available to it, we are taking baby steps in the right direction while the forces we battle are taking gigantic leaps. We are not making the progress we should be making in this place to ensure that money laundering and organized crime are dealt with effectively in Canada.

Mr. Ken Epp (Elk Island, Canadian Alliance): Mr. Speaker, today is a special day in the House. We are debating three bills that were introduced in the Senate. Bill S-16 is the third of the Senate originated bills we are debating today. It is also a special debate in the sense that the government side seems not to be participating. It made a token one or two minute speech and said we should get on with it.

Issues like this should be dealt with by giving considerably more attention to detail. I commend the member who just spoke. He was talking, particularly toward the end of his speech, about the government taking timid steps in the right direction but perhaps not doing enough. Would he like to enlarge on some of his ideas with respect to money laundering and the curtailing of criminal activity in Canada?

As precisely as possible, what further and stronger measures would he propose to prevent Canada from becoming a haven for money laundering activities by criminal organizations?

Mr. Scott Brison: Mr. Speaker, I thank the hon. member for Elk Island, a colleague of mine on the House of Commons finance committee, for his intervention.

First, we should not underestimate the importance of resources. We must make an adequate commitment of resources to our law enforcement agencies in this regard. The task at hand has grown exponentially more complicated and difficult. Yet there has been no commensurate increase in resources to deal with it. In a general sense the resources must be committed. They have not been to date.

Second, in a more specific sense we must work with the very best technologies available to deal with the problem. Clearly these are technologically driven problems. The challenge is to ensure we have the tools to effectively deal with them.

Third, we need greater interaction and engagement with the private sector agencies that will ultimately be acting on the enforcement side. There should be engagement with the Canadian financial services sector. Such engagement should take place while the measures are being put together and not after the fact. It should ensure the sector's commitment is a realistic one, not one imposed by a government with little understanding of the logistics of enforcement at the grassroots financial services sector level.

Mr. Larry Bagnell (Yukon, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, I thank my colleague opposite for his comments but point out that this is the second time I have been up in less than half an hour. It is not true that we are not participating in the debate.

I thank him for raising the good point that three bills have started in the Senate. In a bicameral system every bill must go through both houses. If all bills started in the Senate the House of Commons would sit around for a week with nothing to do until something was passed, and vice versa if they all started here.

I thank the hon. member for congratulating those who brought forward the improvement of splitting bills so that both houses could work on them. If the Senate could remove some of the fine details in its extensive committee consultations we would not have to worry about them and would have an even better bill when we got it.

Mr. Scott Brison: Mr. Speaker, I have never heard a more eloquent plea from a member on the Liberal side for a seat in the Senate. I suggest he make that plea on an individual basis to the Prime Minister. I wish him luck in his quest for a senatorial appointment.

I agree with the member that a significant amount of valuable work is done in the other place on legislation like this one. This House, the lower House, benefits from the work of many of our senators, particularly at the committee level where there is a significant level of expertise and talent.

Mr. Jason Kenney (Calgary Southeast, Canadian Alliance): Mr. Speaker, I am especially grateful to have the full attention of the government House leader. The Canadian Alliance, as my colleague has indicated, will support Bill S-16 which comes to us essentially as legislative amendments the Senate has sought to Bill S-22. I echo the concern of my colleague from Elk Island about the growing practice under the current government of initiating legislation in the other place.

However I would also highlight that Senate committees, in particular the Senate banking committee in this instance, do good work. Frankly they pay more attention to the details of legislation of this nature than do some of our own committees.

The bill deals with the proceeds of crime, otherwise known as money laundering. I rise to make the point as finance critic for the opposition that Canada's laws with respect to proceeds of crime are unfortunately not as robust as they ought to be. Other jurisdictions have taken far more significant legislative steps to plug loopholes which allow those who benefit from proceeds of crime to secrete assets in Canada.

I also second the remarks of my colleague from Kings—Hants who pointed out that although we have a legislative framework to deal with the proceeds of crime, we do not provide nearly sufficient resources to law enforcement agencies to enforce the laws.

In particular, the proceeds of crimes division or white collar crime division of the Royal Canadian Mounted Police is constrained by quite finite resources. This means major fraudsters have pretty significant resources at their disposal.

These people benefit from tens, sometimes hundreds of millions of dollars of defrauded moneys and assets. They can afford the very best legal advice, lawyers, financial advice and accountants to hide their illegally gained assets and launder them so they become ostensibly legal funds. This is because police simply do not have sufficient resources to combat the problem on a large scale in Canada.

Consequently, victims of commercial crime increasingly are turning to lawyers to pursue civil remedies. That is a concern. I want to raise in the debate the need to consider giving, through our laws, greater latitude to victims of fraud to pursue civil remedies in court. In many Canadian jurisdictions it is difficult, if not impossible, for victims of fraud to collectively pursue so-called class action cases against fraudsters.

The legal framework in the United States allows for fairly robust civil remedies. For instance, when a telemarketing scam defrauds thousands of American seniors, they can put together a class action suit. They can find and hire skilled lawyers to investigate, track laundered assets, seek and in many instances obtain judgments against fraudsters, and restore defrauded moneys to the people to whom they rightfully belong.

In many Canadian jurisdictions similar remedies are not available. Individual victims of fraud are not able to collectively pool their resources and pursue legal remedies. In Canada police do not have the resources or advanced legal expertise to pursue money laundering cases, and affected individuals cannot collectively join together to finance the expensive investigatory and legal work required to pursue these cases. I raise this as an important point.

We need to join growing international efforts to stamp out money laundering. Literally billions of dollars are laundered in and through the Canadian economy every year. Multiple billions of dollars of assets in Canada belong to criminals indirectly and are controlled by criminals. Our police forces do not have the resources or expertise to fully trace the laundering process and restore justice to victims of fraudulent activity. Our legal framework limits the remedies available to those people.

I raise this as a matter of concern. I invite the government to revisit the issue in a broader perspective to find out how we can amend laws to be more clearly in compliance with the growing international intolerance of money laundering. I invite the government to find out how we can give more powerful civil remedies to victims of fraud. Finally, I invite the government to find out how we can better equip the RCMP and other police services across the country to plug loopholes, track down fraudulent and laundered assets and enforce the law to protect the tens of thousands of Canadians who are the unwitting victims of fraudulent scams.

I invite the government to consider all these things. However we in the Canadian Alliance Party will be supporting the bill.

An Act To Amend The Criminal Code (Organized Crime And Law Enforcement) And To Make Consequential Amendments To Other Acts (Bill C-24)

April 23, 2001[House of Commons]

Hon. Anne McLellan (Minister of Justice and Attorney General of Canada, Lib.)

Mr. Speaker, I am pleased today to lead off the debate on an issue of major concern to all Canadians: the problem of organized crime and the legislative tools available to our police, prosecutors and courts to address that problem.

[Translation]

In the Speech from the Throne, our government promised to take aggressive steps to combat organized crime, including the creation of stronger anti-gang laws.

[English]

Building upon the foundation that the government put in place over the past several years, including the 1997 anti-gang amendments to the criminal code, the proposed legislation would enable law enforcement to respond to the threat of organized crime in the country.

Bill C-24, an act to amend the criminal code regarding organized crime and law enforcement, responds to our commitment to law enforcement officials and to my provincial counterparts to provide additional legislative tools to assist them in the fight against the many manifestations of organized crime. The legislative measures set out in Bill C-24 seek to assist Canadian law enforcement officials in the fight against organized crime.

These proposals fall into four categories: first, measures to improve the protection of people who play a role in the justice system from intimidation; second, the creation of an accountable process to protect law enforcement officers from criminal liability for certain otherwise illegal acts committed in the course of an investigation; third, legislation to broaden the powers of law enforcement to forfeit the proceeds of crime, and in particular the profits of criminal organizations, and to seize property that was used in a crime; and, fourth, the creation of a number of new offences targeting involvement with criminal organizations.

These efforts resulted in the adoption last September of the national agenda to combat organized crime. In Iqaluit, the solicitor general and I agreed with our provincial and territorial colleagues on an action plan. That plan has several key elements, but expanded and strengthened legislative tools were at the forefront of this national response.

...

I turn my attention now to the aspect of Bill C-24 that seeks to protect law enforcement officers from criminal liability when for legitimate law enforcement purposes they commit acts that would otherwise be illegal.

The Supreme Court of Canada in its unanimous 1999 judgment in Regina v Campbell and Shirose stated that the police was not immune from criminal liability for criminal activities committed in the course of a bona fide criminal investigation. However, while observing that “everybody is subject to the ordinary law of the land”, the supreme court explicitly recognized that “if some form of public interest immunity is to be extended to the police..., it should be left to parliament to delineate the nature and scope of the immunity and the circumstances in which it is available”. Through Bill C-24 the government takes up the challenge offered to it by the Supreme Court of Canada and properly assumes its responsibility to provide guidance.

After issuing a consultation paper last year and engaging in much consultation the government has put the proposals before the House. The proposed scheme contemplates several means of ensuring accountability. These involve a combination of new legislative measures contained in Bill C-24, police training, as well as reliance on existing judicial and disciplinary means to ensure compliance with rules governing their use of powers given under the law.

The legislation does not propose the granting of blanket immunity to all law enforcement officers for unlawful acts committed in the course of carrying out lawful law enforcement responsibilities. However, the legislation does provide a form of very limited immunity. Colleagues need to understand that for many years law enforcement authorities were working on the basis that they had common law immunity. All the supreme court did was make it plain that there was not common law immunity but called upon parliament to put in place a legislative scheme if it saw fit.

Here is how the scheme would work. When a public officer is engaged in the enforcement of any act of the Parliament of Canada, doing that which would otherwise constitute an offence may be permissible if the following elements exist.

First, before the person can act he or she must be designated a competent authority. The individual must also believe on reasonable grounds that committing the act or failing to act is the reasonable course of action and proportional in the circumstances and including whether there is any other available means of carrying out their duty.

Nothing in the proposed scheme would provide immunity for the intentional or criminally negligent causing of death or bodily harm; the wilful attempt to obstruct, pervert or defeat the course of justice; or conduct that would violate the sexual integrity of an individual.

Another feature of the legislative package before us today is a new approach to addressing participation in the activities of criminal organizations. The bill contains a new definition of criminal organization and three new offences that effectively criminalize the full range of involvement with organized crime.

At its core, the danger of organized crime flows from the enhanced threat posed to society when people combine for the commission of serious crimes. Historically criminal law has responded to this elevated harm by punishing individuals for engaging in conspiracy and for aiding or abetting the commission of specific offences.

In 1997 in Bill C-95 parliament went further and directly targeted organizations of such individuals for the very first time by providing a definition of criminal organization, increased investigative powers and increased penalties for those committing crimes in conjunction with criminal organizations.

Law enforcement officials and provincial attorneys general have called for a simplified definition of criminal organization and for offences that respond to all harmful forms of involvement in criminal organizations. That is precisely what we have done in the legislation before the House today.

The current definition only covers criminal organizations that have at least five members, at least two of whom have committed serious offences within the preceding five years. As well, the organizations themselves must be shown to have been committing crimes punishable by a maximum sentence of five years or more in prison.

Canada is a signatory to the United Nations convention against organized crime which affirms that a group of three persons having the aim of committing serious crimes constitutes a sufficient threat to society to warrant special scrutiny from the criminal justice system.

I believe that Canadians want our law enforcement officials to be able to target criminal groups of three or more individuals, one of whose main purposes or activities is either committing serious crimes or making it easier for others to commit serious crimes. In conjunction with a more streamlined definition, the full range of involvement with criminal organizations is targeted in Bill C-24 by three new offences.

The first offence targets participation in or contribution to the activities of criminal organizations. Taking part in the activities of a criminal organization, even if such participation does not itself constitute an offence, will now be a crime where such actions are done for the purpose of enhancing the ability of the criminal organization to facilitate or commit indictable offences.

The bill also addresses the concern expressed by law enforcement officials and provincial attorneys general that the current requirement of proving beyond reasonable doubt that the accused was a party to a specific crime shields from prosecution those in the upper echelons of criminal organizations who isolate themselves from its day to day activities.

We know that successful recruitment enhances the threat posed to society by criminal organizations. It allows them to grow and to more effectively achieve their harmful criminal objectives. Those who act as recruiters for criminal organizations contribute to these ends both when they recruit for specific crimes and when they recruit simply to expand the organization's human capital. Thus the expressed provisions of the proposed participation offence make it clear that the crown does not in making its case need to link the impugned participation, in this case recruitment, to any particular offence.

Some have called for mere membership in a criminal organization to be an offence. In my view such a proposal would be extremely difficult to apply and would be vulnerable to charter challenges.

The second new offence retains the core of section 467.1 of the criminal code which is the criminal organization offence introduced in Bill C-95. The new offence targets those who aid, abet, counsel or commit any indictable offence in conjunction with a criminal organization.

Unlike the existing provision, it would not require the crown to prove both that the accused has participated in or substantially contributed to the activities of a criminal organization and that he or she has been a party to the commission of an indictable offence punishable by five or more years of imprisonment. The participation-contribution requirement has been removed entirely and the range of offences targeted has been broadened to include all indictable offences.

The third new offence deals specifically with leaders in criminal organizations. Like the participation offence, it does so not by criminalizing status but by proscribing the harmful behaviour itself.

Leaders of criminal organizations pose a unique threat to society. Operationally they threaten us through their enhanced experience and skills. Motivationally they threaten us through their constant encouragement of potential and existing criminal organization members. Accordingly in the bill we have moved aggressively to identify, target and punish those within criminal organizations, whether or not formally designated as leaders, who knowingly instruct others to commit any offence, indictable or otherwise, under any act of parliament for the benefit of, at the direction of, or in association with a criminal organization.

The penalty provisions for the three offences I have outlined confirm the government's resolve to provide a proportionate and graduated means of addressing all forms of involvement with criminal organizations and to ultimately break the back of organized crime in Canada. The participation offence I previously described is punishable by a maximum of five years of imprisonment, the party liability offence by a maximum of 14 years of imprisonment, and the leadership related offence is punishable by a maximum of life imprisonment.

Furthermore each of these punishments has been fortified by an appropriately aggressive sentencing regime. Its two critical components are mandatory imposition of consecutive sentences for the offences and a presumptive parole ineligibility period of one-half the imposed sentence. When these measures are combined with our newly expanded and improved criminal forfeiture scheme our message to organized crime is clear: crime does not, will not and must not pay in Canada, and we will take all necessary measures to ensure the continued safety of our homes, streets and communities.

Not all provisions of the bill specifically target organized crime groups. Several elements in the proposed legislation are meant to improve criminal law generally. These improvements to the law will nonetheless be extremely useful in combating organized crime.

The offences initially listed as enterprise crimes were those considered most likely to be committed by organized crime groups. Over the years, as organized crime evolved and moved into new areas of criminal activity, new offences were added to the list of enterprise crimes. Today the list of such crimes stands at over 40 with no indication that we will stop adding new offences to the list.

At the same time, by limiting the proceeds of crime provisions to certain listed offences, we have created two types of criminal: the criminal whose proceeds are subject to the proceeds of crime provisions of the code and whose illicit profits can be ordered forfeited by the courts, and the criminal whose profits fall outside the reach of the proceeds provisions of the code.

Furthermore, there is a proposal to eliminate the enterprise crime list approach and expand the application of the proceeds of crime provisions to designated offences, that is, to most indictable federal offences. In this manner the profits from the commission of most serious crimes would be subject to forfeiture. All existing protections, such as notice provisions, applications to revoke or vary orders, appeals and remedies, will of course continue to be available to the accused and to third parties.

Canada must be in a position to offer the necessary assistance to foreign countries that have successfully investigated and prosecuted members of organized crime groups and whose courts have ordered the confiscation of tainted property located in Canada. I would like to ensure that Canada is not singled out for its inability to provide the necessary assistance to help such jurisdictions obtain the confiscated property.

Accordingly, the bill proposes a number of amendments to the Mutual Legal Assistance in Criminal Matters Act that would allow Canada to enforce foreign confiscation orders. That is important. The provisions contained in the proposed legislation would allow Canada to respond on the basis of a treaty to requests from a foreign jurisdiction for assistance in enforcing a confiscation order issued by a court in that jurisdiction in relation to proceeds of crime derived from the commission of a criminal offence for which the accused was convicted. In anticipation of a confiscation request, Canada would also be able to provide assistance in respect of a request to seize or restrain the targeted proceeds located in Canada.

The proposed amendments would also facilitate requests from Canada regarding the enforcement of restraint or forfeiture orders for proceeds of crime located in foreign jurisdictions.

The last element that I want to stress deals with offence related property. The bill contains amendments to make the offence related property forfeiture regime in the code apply to all indictable offences. As well, the present exemption from forfeiture for most real property would be eliminated.

I believe the measures I have outlined today would ensure that we have the tools necessary to combat the increased threat of organized crime. Let there be no mistake that the proposals before us would provide more effective laws and aggressive prosecution strategies to target organized crime at all levels.

April 23, 2001 [House of Commons]

Mr. Vic Toews (Provencher, Canadian Alliance)

Mr. Speaker, I am pleased to participate in the debate on the new organized crime legislation, Bill C-24.

...

During the election they realized that organized crime was an issue. Suddenly the government said that it better do something because there was a danger to our country and to our institutions. It said that police officers were having a difficult time coping and the courts were overwhelmed by the issue of organized crime. I therefore note, with a bit of bewilderment, that the Liberals finally woke up.

...

I am relieved that the government is finally acknowledging that organized crime is a serious problem. The rest of the country has been saying this for many years. It is no secret, although to the Liberal caucus it was a bit of a secret, that the level of activity of criminal organizations has increased substantially in recent years, posing a severe risk to public safety and security. Not only has there been an increase in the level of activity. There has also been an increase in the intensity of violence including bombing, threats and intimidation.

The extent of collaboration within and among criminal groups has broadened greatly. The available technology has improved their ability to conduct organized crime by leaps and bounds. Over the years Canada has become a very attractive place for these types of criminals. According to the Criminal Intelligence Service of Canada, CISC, “virtually every major criminal group in the world is active in Canada”.

Antonio Nicaso, a well known organized crime specialist and author, has said that Canada has become one of the world's most important centres for global crime syndicates in part because of federal regulations and laws. He has stated that prior to Bill C-22 it was harder to import cheese into Canada due to the restriction of the minister of agriculture than it was to import a suitcase full of money.

The RCMP commissioner has said recently that for the first time there are signs of criminal organizations which are so sophisticated they are actually focusing on destabilizing certain aspects of our society.

Another equally disturbing fact about the bill is the serious lack of funding and resources that has plagued and continues to plague the administrators of our justice system. Frontline officers fighting to get these criminals prosecuted have been effectively handcuffed with a serious lack of resources.

Criminal organizations have the best possible tools. They have state of the art technology. They have access to millions of dollars derived from illegal activities to fund their activities. Meanwhile our frontline police officers struggle to maintain existing technology. They are unable to adapt to new and emerging technologies because of insufficient funding.
