M. Mosley: Cette disposition est identique à un paragraphe de l'article 446 du Code criminel dont les dispositions visent à assurer que lorsqu'il y a ordonnance de restitution d'un bien qui a valeur de preuve, ce bien ne sera pas perdu. C'est une disposition acceptée par la Commission de réforme du droit dans son document sur l'aliénation de biens saisis. La disposition concernant la restitution que l'on trouve dans le présent projet de loi ainsi qu'au Code criminel, à l'article 446, vise à encourager la restitution lorsque c'est possible et aussi à accorder aux tribunaux l'autorité de le faire. Toutefois, la disposition visée par l'amendement a pour but de garantir que, si les biens ont valeur de preuve, le tribunal ne s'en trouvera pas privé.

La motion est rejetée.

M. Grisé: Je propose que l'article 2 du projet de loi C-61 soit modifié par substitution, à la ligne 39, page 19, de ce qui suit:

The Chairman: Would you like to make any further comment to assist those who did not have it before them at the time?

Mr. Grisé: I am going to make these comments en français.

1. La modification veut assurer que le règlement divulgué dans la Loi de l'impôt sur le revenu soit gardé intact.

2. Les représentants de Revenu Canada doivent se conformer à l'article 241 de la Loi de l'impôt sur le revenu.

3. Le Projet de loi C-61 modifie l'article 241 de la Loi de l'impôt sur le revenu pour ajouter une acception. Pour que le projet de loi soit consistant, la partie sur l'exemption doit refléter la balance du projet de loi.

4. Que les représentants de Revenu Canada n'aient pas l'impression qu'ils ont «carte blanche». Les amendements maintiennent la balance du projet de loi.

Je voudrais présenter mes excuses, monsieur le président. La raison du retard est que le représentant de Revenu Canada ne réalisait que récemment l'omission technique. Ils ont alors demandé au ministère de la Justice que cet amendement soit présenté.

Mr. Robinson: I take it that this would mean that an individual who works for Revenue Canada would not be given this immunity if he suspected that information he saw in a return, for example, might disclose the proceeds of crime if reported to the Attorney General. The normal provisions and sanctions contained in the Income Tax would apply. Is that the essence of the amendment?

Mr. Mosley: Yes.

Amendment agreed to.

Mr. Robinson: I move that Bill C-61 be amended by striking out lines 39 to 44 on page 19 and lines 1 and 2 on page 20. The effect of this is to delete proposed section 420.27. It is not clear what purpose there is for this section. There is already coverage under Canadian tort law to protect bona fide disclosure by an informant to a person in authority. If that is the case, then this section is not necessary. In other instances we have been told that case law applies and we do not have to amend legislation to deal with what is already covered by case law. If that is not the case, if this is a greater disclosure provision, some sort of a sweeping sanction, sweeping immunity from any form of suit, then it applies both civilly and criminally, and I suggest it goes way too far. I would like to ask what protection this is supposed to be providing that is not already provided by decisions of the courts.

Mr. Nicholson: Mr. Mosley, this is just a codification of the common law.

Mr. Mosley: It is a codification and clarification of the common law. The problem, which is not one that would be apparent to most criminal lawyers, is the common law

[Translation]

Le président: Voulez-vous faire d'autres commentaires pour venir en aide à ceux qui ne l'auraient pas reçu à temps?

M. Grisé: Je vais faire ces commentaires in French.

1. The amendment aims to ensure that the rule found in the Income Tax Act remains intact.

2. Representatives of Revenue Canada must abide by section 241 of the Income Tax Act.

3. Bill C-61 amends section 241 of the Income Tax Act to add a new meaning. To make the bill consistent, the part dealing with the exemption must reflect the balance of the bill.

4. So that representatives from Revenue Canada do not have the impression that they have "carte blanche". The amendments maintain the balance of the bill.

I would like to apologize, Mr. Chairman. The reason for the delay is that the representative from Revenue Canada realized only recently that there was a technical omission. He then requested the Department of Justice to submit this amendment.

M. Robinson: J'en conclus que l'employé de Revenu Canada ne se verra pas accorder cette immunité s'il soupçonnait que les renseignements dont il a pris connaissance dans une déclaration de revenu, par exemple, pourraient révéler des produits de la criminalité s'ils étaient communiqués au procureur général. Les dispositions et les sanctions normales de la Loi de l'impôt sur le revenu s'appliqueraient. C'est bien le sens de cet amendement?

M. Mosley: Oui.

L'amendement est adopté.

M. Robinson: Je propose que le projet de loi C-61 soit modifié par suppression des lignes 38 à 43, page 19, et des lignes 1 à 6, page 20. L'amendement a pour effet de supprimer l'article 420.27. L'objet de cet article n'est pas clair. Le droit canadien en matière de responsabilité délictuelle protège déjà les révélations faites en bonne foi par un dénonciateur. Ce passage n'est donc pas nécessaire. Dans d'autres cas, on nous a dit que le droit jurisprudentiel s'appliquait et qu'il n'était pas nécessaire de modifier la loi pour s'occuper de ce qui est déjà prévu par le droit jurisprudentiel. Si cela n'est pas le cas, si cette restriction du droit d'action est plus sévère, si elle est à toute épreuve, elle s'applique donc alors au civil comme au criminel, et à mon avis, cela, c'est aller trop loin. J'aimerais savoir en quoi la protection offerte ici se distinguerait de celle garantie par le droit jurisprudentiel.

M. Nicholson: Monsieur Mosley, il s'agit uniquement d'une codification du common law.

M. Mosley: Il s'agit d'une codification et d'une clarification du common law. La difficulté, qui n'est pas évidente pour un grand nombre de criminalistes, c'est le principle of confidentiality that governs relations between bankers, clients, and others in that type of a relationship. It is quite true that there is a public interest exception to that common law rule, but the parameters of that exception have not been set by the courts.

• 1710

There has been virtually no jurisprudence on the nature of that exception and what it means in a particular case.

The object of this is to put a statutory provision forward which would set the parameters in the context of the public interest exception and would raise in effect the comfort level of those who are in that type of relationship and who tend to take a very restrictive interpretation of the scope of the exception that would protect them in the circumstances in which they would make such a disclosure.

The Chairman: Any further comment?

Mr. Robinson: Mr. Chairman, this is an extraordinary provision; it elevates the big brother mentality to new heights. Any form of disclosure, as it is put euphemistically, in the section—not just that it is suspected that property is proceeds of crime, not just that it is suspected that a person has committed an enterprise crime offence or designated drug offence, but even that they are about to commit an offence—all of that is subject to totally immunity under the provisions of this statute.

I would suggest that it is a dangerous provision. It is an excessive provision and if Mr. Mosley suggests that the public interest exceptions in the case law are not adequate, have not been clearly flushed out, certainly they will be flushed out in the course of litigation.

By adopting this provision, we are codifying a total immunity for any form of disclosure by informants, as it suggested. The possibilities of abuse of this kind of provision are very real—very real—because what it could mean is that a person who, for example, maliciously discloses, rats on a neighbour or spies on somebody else and says that property is proceeds of crime or gee, they are just about to commit an offence—a prostitution offence, for example, old Mrs. Grady down the street is running a whore-house—that can lead to all sorts of consequences which are very serious indeed, and we are just saying total immunity in those circumstances.

The Chairman: Could I have Mr. Nicholson next.

Mr. Grisé: I have a comment, if I may, Mr. Chairman. Mr. Robinson, it says clearly "of which that person reasonably suspects", so it does not apply in every case.

Mr. Robinson: Mr. Chairman, it is still very, very broad.

Mr. Grisé: I am sorry, Mr. Nicholson.

principe de la confidentialité en common law qui regit les relations entre les banquiers, leurs clients et autres relations de ce genre. Certes, ce principe souffre une exception dans le cas de l'intérêt public, mais cette exception n'a pas été clairement délimitée par les tribunaux.

Il n'y a presque aucune jurisprudence sur la nature de cette exception et ce qu'elle signifie dans une affaire donnée.

Cet article a pour but de légiférer les paramètres de l'exception dans le cas de l'intérêt public et d'atténuer les craintes de ceux qui ont ce genre de relations et qui interprètent souvent de façon très restrictive l'exception qui les protégerait s'ils faisaient des révélations de ce genre.

Le président: D'autres commentaires?

M. Robinson: Monsieur le président, voilà une disposition extraordinaire. C'est un nouveau sommet de l'État policier. Toute forme de révélation, pour reprendre l'euphémisme employé—non seulement lorsque l'on soupçonne qu'un bien est un produit de la criminalité, qu'une personne a commis une infraction de criminalité organisée ou en matière de drogue, mais même lorsque l'on soupçonne qu'elle s'apprête à le faire—tout cela est protégé par l'immunité.

Pour moi, c'est une disposition dangereuse. Elle est excessive, et si M. Mosley trouve que les exceptions prévues pour l'intérêt public dans le droit jurisprudentiel ne sont pas suffisantes, n'ont pas été énoncées avec clarté, je suis d'avis que ce sont les tribunaux qui s'en chargeront.

Si nous adoptons cette disposition, nous allons créer dans la loi une immunité totale pour toute forme de dénonciation. Les risques d'abus sautent aux yeux. Par exemple, quelqu'un pourrait moucharder un voisin ou affirmer que les biens de quelqu'un d'autre sont des produits de la criminalité ou même que quelqu'un s'apprête à commettre une infraction—se livrer à la prostitution, par exemple, la voisine d'à côté tient un bordel, par exemple. Cela peut avoir des conséquences très graves et nous sommes en train d'envisager une immunité totale dans ces cas-là.

Le président: Je donnerai ensuite la parole à M. Nicholson.

M. Grisé: J'ai un commentaire à faire, si vous me le permettez, monsieur le président. Monsieur Robinson, on parle clairement «de motifs raisonnables de croire», c'est donc dire que cela ne s'applique pas dans tous les cas.

M. Robinson: Monsieur le président, c'est quand même encore très vaste.

M. Grisé: Je suis désolé, monsieur Nicholson.

Mr. Nicholson: Just that point, as I say, I do not see that this gives a person anything he does not already have under the common law, which is my next question.

Might this not just standardize the test for the purpose of the federal jurisdiction rather than using the provincial test inasmuch as one province, at least, does not have the common law as it relates to something in this particular area?

I do not know if there would be any difference, and I am not quite sure what relationship the Civil Code of Quebec would have with this, but certainly this would have the effect of standardizing the same test for all 10 jurisdictions and territories.

Mr. Mosley: Mr. Chairman, I am not knowledgeable in the area of civil law at all, but I have been advised by a lawyer who is that in effect the civil law has adopted a principle which is virtually the same as that reflected in the common law, and that common law principle applies virtually throughout all of the common law jurisdictions of the western world.

It is based on an English decision from the 1920s, the basic idea being that those in a relationship such as banker-customer are entitled to confidentiality from the banker. This provision would define the exception which the courts have spelled out.

They have said there is a public interest exception, but the problem is they have not told us just what this means. How it is arrived at? Does it apply to the individual who has no reasonable basis for his suspicion and makes a disclosure in the circumstances such as Mr. Robinson has suggested to provide total anonymity?

This provides a threshold that it is not any disclosure in any circumstance, it is only that disclosure based on reasonable suspicion, and the reasonableness of that of course would be tested by the courts in a subsequent civil action that might be brought.

• 1715

Mr. Nicholson: With respect to the comments you made, Mr. Robinson, this would encourage a person... Let us take the example of the banker who reasonably suspects that laundering of money is taking place. If I remember your comments earlier, I thought you were in favour of mandatory reporting by the banks.

Mr. Robinson: I remain in favour of that, Mr. Chairman. This goes far beyond bankers, though; this applies to any person.

Mr. Nicholson: I think it is a good principle that where there is a common law principle in the federal jurisdiction it should be codified. If we are going to use it, it should be codified so that it is standard throughout, and so if there are any differences between the civil or the common law, that is resolved by one standard for the

[Translation]

M. Nicholson: Sur le même point, je ne vois pas en quoi cette disposition accorde quoi que ce soit qui ne se retrouve déjà dans le common law. Ce sera ma question.

Est-ce que cela ne revient pas à uniformiser le critère pour les autorités fédérales au lieu de retenir le critère provincial dans la mesure où une province, en tout cas, ne dispose pas du common law dans ce domaine particulier?

Je ne sais pas si cela fait une différence. Et je ne sais pas ce que le Code civil du Québec a à dire là-dessus, mais il est certain que cela vient uniformiser le critère dans les 10 provinces et dans les territoires.

M. Mosley: Monsieur le président, je ne connais pas du tout le droit civil, mais un civiliste m'a indiqué que le droit civil avait adopté un principe qui est virtuellement le même que celui du common law et ce principe du common law s'applique virtuellement dans presque tous les pays d'Occident sous le régime du common law.

Il se fonde sur un arrêt anglais des années 1920, en fonction duquel les rapports semblables à ceux d'un banquier avec son client doivent être placés sous le sceau de la confidentialité par le banquier. Cette disposition viendrait définir l'exception établie par les tribunaux.

Ils ont dit qu'il existe une exception dans le cas de l'intérêt public; l'ennui, c'est qu'ils ne nous ont pas dit exactement ce que cela signifiait. Comment la détermine-t-on? S'applique-t-elle à celui dont les soupçons ne sont pas fondés sur des motifs raisonnables et qui fait une dénonciation semblable à celle que M. Robinson a évoquée et accorde-t-elle l'anonymat le plus total?

Cette disposition établit une ligne de démarcation, il ne s'agit pas de n'importe quelle révélation dans n'importe quelle circonstance, il ne s'agit que de révélations fondées sur des motifs raisonnables et ce sont évidemment les tribunaux qui détermineront le caractère raisonnable des motifs lors d'une éventuelle poursuite civile.

M. Nicholson: Pour ce qui est de vos remarques, monsieur Robinson, elles encourageraient quelqu'un à... Prenons l'exemple d'un banquier qui a d'assez bonnes raisons de soupçonner le blanchissage de l'argent. Si je me rappelle vos observations antérieures, je croyais que vous étiez favorable à des déclarations obligatoires de la part des banques.

M. Robinson: Je demeure favorable à cela, monsieur le président. Cependant, il ne faut pas se limiter aux banquiers, cela devrait être exigé de toutes les personnes.

M. Nicholson: Il est bien établi que lorsqu'un principe de common law intervient au niveau fédéral, ce dernier devrait être codifié. Si nous allons y recourir, il devrait être codifié afin d'être normalisé, par conséquent s'il y a des différences entre le droit civil et le common law, que ces difficultés soient aplanies par l'existence d'une même whole country. I do not think this goes any farther than the common law standard, and as such, codification is good idea and should be kept.

Mr. Robinson: Mr. Chairman, could I ask what the constitutional basis is for suggesting that we can in fact absolve informants of civil liability as well?

Mr. Mosley: Now, that is an issue that has arisen in the context of section 25 of the Criminal Code, which also addresses civil liability, and has been held to be a necessary incident of the federal criminal law power.

Mr. Robinson: So this provision as well would likely be upheld under that decision.

Mr. Mosley: Yes, we examined that very question out of the same concern that Mr. Robinson has raised and are satisfied that it would pass muster on the basis of that necessarily incidental test.

The Chairman: The question is on amendment N-40 by Mr. Robinson.

norme pour l'ensemble du pays. Je ne crois cependant pas que cela va plus loin que cette question d'une norme qui découle du common law, et en conséquence, la codification est une bonne chose et l'on devrait s'en tenir à cela.

M. Robinson: Monsieur le président, peut-on me dire sur quel principe constitutionnel l'on s'appuie pour affirmer que tous ceux qui renseignent sur un tel état de choses sont aussi exemptés de poursuites au civil?

M. Mosley: Cette question a peut-être été soulevée au sujet de l'article 25 du Code criminel, où il est aussi question de la responsabilité civile et où il est dit qu'une telle responsabilité doit accompagner la responsabilité criminelle au fédéral.

M. Robinson: En vertu de cette décision, la disposition en question sera donc probablement maintenue.

M. Mosley: Oui, nous avons examiné cette même question à la lumière des préoccupations de M. Robinson, et sommes convaincus que cette immunité serait jugée recevable, sur la foi de ce précédent.

The Chairman: Gentlemen, I see a quorum, and I will call this meeting to order, it now being past 9.30 a.m. I will again refer to a letter addressed to the clerk of the legislative committee on Bill C-61, Mr. Bill Farrell:

> This is to advise that Joe Reid, MP, will be replacing me at the committee on the following date, Thursday, June 2, 1988.

If that meets with the accord of the committee, we shall proceed. This legislative committee on Bill C-61 is dealing with clause-by-clause consideration of the bill. We made great progress yesterday, and we expect to conclude today, in accordance with our commitment of last week.

• 0935

Yesterday we deferred consideration of all Liberal proposed amendments. Today, Mr. Kaplan, we are in your good hands. I suppose Liberal amendment L-7D is the one before us.

Mr. Kaplan: I would like to begin by congratulating you on assuming the chair. I know from your eminent record that you will exercise that office with distinction and fairness. I want to pay a tribute to your predecessor, particularly in the terms that he allowed my amendments to stand. I appreciate that very much. When I agreed last week to any number of meetings at any time I knew I might not be able to attend. I figured that the amendments I would have moved would have been lost, but I return to find them at least still on our Order Paper. I am very grateful for that.

As far as I am concerned, we ought to be able to get through them very quickly. I will explain what I had in mind in each of them and why I hope the committee will support them, but I do not intend to have a prolonged debate. I hope the other meetings of the day can be cancelled and that this morning's first session can be a short one.

The Chairman: Thank you, Mr. Kaplan. I trust you will take into consideration what we did yesterday. When motions were identical, as proposed by both yourself and Mr. Robinson, we disposed of the Robinson amendment, which had in its process the disposition of your amendment as well. I am referring to 7D particularly.

Mr. Nicholson: Something similar to your first amendment was actually passed. We are going to hold an

Le président: Messieurs, nous avons le quorum, il est 9h30 passé, je déclare donc la séance ouverte. Je vous renvoie de nouveau à une lettre adressée au greffier du Comité législatif sur le projet de loi C-61, M. Bill Farrell:

> Cette lettre a pour but de vous informer que Joe Reid, député, me remplacera au comité à la date suivante, le jeudi 2 juin 1988.

Si les membres du comité sont d'accord, allons-y. Ce comité législatif procède à l'étude article par article du projet de loi C-61. Nous avons beaucoup progressé hier, et nous espérons conclure aujourd'hui, conformément à l'entente de la semaine dernière.

Hier, nous avons reporté l'étude de toutes les propositions d'amendements des Libéraux. Aujourd'hui, monsieur Kaplan, nous nous en remettons à vos bons offices. Je suppose que nous commencerons par l'amendement L-7D.

M. Kaplan: Pour commencer, j'aimerais vous féliciter d'avoir accepté de présider la réunion. Je sais d'expérience que vous exercerez cet office avec distinction et équité. Je tiens à rendre hommage à votre prédécesseur, tout particulièrement à la manière dont il a permis à mes amendements d'être réservés. Je lui en suis infiniment reconnaissant. Lorsque j'ai accepté la semaine dernière le calendrier de réunions, je savais qu'il me serait peut-être impossible d'assister à toutes. J'étais convaincu que mes amendements avaient été mis aux voix et rejetés, et c'est avec grand plaisir que je constate qu'ils sont encore à l'ordre du jour.

En ce qui me concerne, nous devrions pouvoir les expédier très rapidement. Je vais vous présenter mes arguments pour chacun d'entre eux et les raisons pour lesquelles j'espère que le comité les approuvera, mais mon intention n'est pas de prolonger indûment le débat. J'espère que les autres réunions d'aujourd'hui peuvent être annulées et que cette première séance de ce matin sera courte.

Le président: Merci, monsieur Kaplan. Je pense que vous comprendrez ce que nous avons fait hier. Lorsque les motions proposées par vous-même et par M. Robinson étaient identiques, nous avons mis aux voix l'amendement Robinson, réglant en même temps le sort de votre amendement analogue. Je me réfère tout particulièrement au 7D.

M. Nicholson: Une motion analogue à votre premier amendement a été en fait adoptée. Lors d'une réunion à in-camera meeting to determine the reasonableness of the amendments and of the legal expenses.

Mr. Kaplan: It was discussed yesterday, but I can wait and read it in Maclean's magazine.

Mr. Robinson: Mr. Chairman, I wonder if I might propose the amendment to clause 2 that was stood yesterday at this point. It was the only amendment that remained.

The Chairman: Would that be N-34?

Mr. Robinson: Yes. I would move that Bill C-61 be amended by striking out lines 7 to 10 on page 15 and substituting the following:

> of that offence and the court is satisfied that the income of that person from sources unrelated to enterprise crime offences by that person cannot reasonably account for such an increase in value.

I had a brief discussion with Mr. Grisé and his officials, and they have advised me that this wording does meet with their—

Mr. Richard G. Mosley (Senior General Counsel, Criminal and Family Law Policy Directorate, Department of Justice): Mr. Chairman, there is a point that I overlooked in speaking with Mr. Robinson. Deleting the reference to "or designated drug offence" is not picked up by the roll-over provisions in the two drug statutes. It was raised by the researcher yesterday. If we could leave those words in, it would be preferable.

Mr. Robinson: Mr. Chairman, I will leave those words in: "enterprise crime offences or designated drug offences by that person".

The Chairman: Has either Mr. Mosley or Mr. Robinson a copy of the amendment as finally agreed upon?

Mr. Robinson: It is exactly the same form as N-34 without the words "beyond a reasonable doubt". Those words are deleted.

Mr. Richard Grisé (Parliamentary Secretary to Deputy Prime Minister and President of the Privy Council): The government has no problem with this amendment as amended, Mr. Chairman.

The Chairman: Mr. Horner, do all members of the committee have before them N-34 with the deletion of the words "beyond a reasonable doubt" in the first and second lines of that proposed amendment?

Amendment agreed to.

Mr. Robinson: That concludes my amendments, Mr. Chairman.

huis clos, nous déterminerons si ces amendements sont raisonnables et quels frais juridiques ils entraînent.

M. Kaplan: Vous en avez discuté hier mais je peux attendre et lire le compte rendu dans Maclean's.

M. Robinson: Monsieur le président, pourrais-je proposer l'amendement à l'article 2 qui a été réservé hier? C'était le seul amendement qui restait.

Le président: S'agirait-il du N-34?

M. Robinson: Oui. Je propose de retrancher les lignes 6 à 8, à la page 15, et de les remplacer par ce qui suit:

> avant cette perpétration, et que le tribunal est convaincu que son revenu de sources non reliées à des infractions de criminalité organisée ne peut raisonnablement justifier cette augmentation de valeur.

J'en ai brièvement discuté avec M. Grisé et ses collaborateurs, et ils m'ont informé que ce libellé concordait . . .

M. Richard G. Mosley (avocat général principal, sous-direction de la politique en matière de droit pénal et familial, ministère de la Justice): Monsieur le présdient, il y a un point de détail que j'ai oublié de signaler à M. Robinson. La référence à «des infractions graves en matière de drogue» ne figure pas dans les dispositions originales des deux lois sur les drogues et stupéfiants. La documentaliste nous l'a signalé hier. Il serait donc préférable de conserver cette référence.

M. Robinson: Monsieur le président, je suis tout à fait disposé à ce que figure: «infractions de criminalité organisée ou à des infractions graves en matière de drogue».

Le président: M. Mosley ou M. Robinson ont-ils une copie de cet amendement sous sa forme définitive?

M. Robinson: C'est exactement le même que le N-34 sans «hors de tout doute raisonnable». Ces mots sont supprimés.

M. Richard Grisé (secrétaire parlementaire du Vice-premier ministre et du Président du Conseil Privé): Sous sa forme modifiée, cet amendement ne pose pas de problème au gouvernement, monsieur le président.

Le président: Monsieur Horner, est-ce que tous les membres du comité ont ce N-34 sans les mots «hors de tout doute raisonnable» à la première et à la deuxième ligne de cette proposition d'amendement?

L'amendement est adopté.

M. Robinson: C'était mon dernier amendement, monsieur le président.

Mr. Kaplan: Mr. Chairman, I move that we strike out lines 39 to 42 on page 10 and substitute the following therefor:

(b) that the applicant is the lawful owner of or lawfully entitled to possession of the property unless the court is satisfied beyond a reasonable doubt of the complicity of the applicant in an

The arguments in favour of this wording were presented by the witness for the Canadian Bar Association. It was to raise the standard above the standard in the government bill, which is that the accused simply appear innocent of complicity. I will not make further arguments about it; I am content to. . .

Mr. John McIsaac (Counsel, Criminal Law Policy Section, Department of Justice): Mr. Chairman, as outlined yesterday, the wording that is proposed is not novel in Canadian criminal law. The wording is very similar to subsection 11.(4) of the Narcotic Control Act, which provides for an applicant obtaining relief from forfeiture for the seizure of a conveyance that has been used in the criminal conduct related to narcotic offences. Secondly, Mr. Chairman, the wording is also used in other federal statutes, such as the Customs Act and the Fisheries Act.

The British Columbia Court of Appeal very recently, in 1987, in the Milton case had occasion to examine the possible constitutional infirmity of this wording in relation to an applicant. The British Columbia Court of Appeal did indicate that an applicant in this situation does not stand in the same situation as an accused person. Therefore, the presumption of innocence principles do not apply to that individual.

The court confirmed that it was satisfactory to place the onus on that individual in those special circumstances because he would have particular knowledge whether or not there was collusion or complicity in relation to the commission of another person's offence. Therefore they found no problem with this type of wording, which is almost identical to the proposed wording in this section, in relation to the Bill of Rights and the Charter of Rights. Thank you very much, Mr. Chairman.

Amendment negatived.

The Chairman: Amendments L-8 and L-8a have been withdrawn.

Mr. Kaplan: Yes. I assume that if three months was unacceptable, the change in time will not make a difference. And as I say, I do not want to go over the arguments.

The Chairman: Thank you, Mr. Kaplan. We will move on to L-9. I have a note here that L-9 was dealt with yesterday when we dealt with the Robinson amendment

M. Kaplan: Monsieur le président, je propose que nous retranchions les lignes 37 à 41, à la page 10, et que nous les remplacions par ce qui suit:

b) que le demandeur est le propriétaire légitime de ces biens ou a droit à leur possession légitime, sauf si le tribunal est convaincu hors de tout doute raisonnable de la complicité ou de la collusion du demandeur à

Les arguments en faveur de ce libellé ont été présentés par le témoin représentant l'Association du barreau. L'objet est de mettre la barre un peu plus haut que le gouvernement qui demande simplement dans son projet de loi que l'accusé semble innocent de toute complicité. Je n'en dirai pas plus, je me contenterai. . .

M. John McIsaac (conseiller juridique, Section de la politique en matière de droit pénal, ministère de la Justice): Monsieur le président, comme nous l'avons dit hier, le libellé proposé n'est pas une nouveauté dans le droit pénal canadien. Ce libellé est très analogue à celui du paragraphe 11.(4) de la Loi sur les stupéfiants qui prévoit un recours contre la confiscation d'un moyen de transport utilisé dans la perpétration d'un acte criminel relevant de la Loi sur les stupéfiants. Deuxièmement, monsieur le président, ce libellé est également utilisé dans d'autres lois fédérales comme la Loi sur les douanes et la Loi sur les pêches.

La Cour d'appel de Colombie-Britannique tout dernièrement en 1987, dans l'affaire Milton a eu l'occasion d'examiner les arguments d'invalidité constitutionnelle de ce libellé. La Cour d'appel de Colombie-Britannique a déclaré qu'un demandeur dans ces circonstances ne se trouve pas dans la même situation qu'un accusé. En conséquence, les principes de présomption d'innocence ne s'appliquent pas à cette personne.

La cour a confirmé que le fait de demander à la personne dans ces circonstances spéciales de faire la preuve de son innocence était justifiée, car c'est elle qui sait si elle est innocente de toute collusion ou de toute complicité relativement à l'infraction commise par une autre personne. En conséquence ils ont décrété que ce type de libellé qui est pratiquement identique à celui proposé dans cet article, ne posait pas de problème par rapport à la Déclaration des droits et à la Charte des droits. Merci beaucoup, monsieur le président.

Le président: Les amendemens L-8 et L-8a ont été retirés.

M. Kaplan: Oui. Je suppose que si trois mois étaient inacceptables, le changement de temps ne fait pas de différence. Comme je l'ai dit, je ne veux pas revenir sur ces arguments.

Le président: Merci, monsieur Kaplan. Nous passons au L-9. J'ai une note ici me disant que la question du L-9 a été réglée hier en même temps que l'amendement

[Text]

Mr. Mosley: I think it is used very rarely, most likely because provinces have established funding mechanisms in their relationships with the municipalities, and police budgets are normally met, in the normal course of events, through municipal taxation and any grants the province may make to the municipalities for that purpose, and provincial policing costs of course are paid by the provincial governments.

There are a number of concerns about the fiscal propriety of making direct grants to police agencies from forfeited proceeds of crime. Some concerns have been expressed with... Perhaps I could refer to the American example of the local sheriff ending up driving the Mercedes-Benz that has been seized and forfeited from the drug trafficker. That lacks a certain appearance of propriety, and it also does not lead in every case to the most appropriate use of the resources concerned.

For that reason subsection 651.(3) to my knowledge is used very infrequently. It is there, however, and in a case where it was deemed appropriate either at the federal or the provincial level, the authority exists for making such a transfer.

Mr. Horner: Mr. Chairman, while I can understand why the Canadian Association of Chiefs of Police would recommend this amendment, and I have some sympathy for directing these funds to crime-prevention forces, I believe the explanation given by Mr. Mosley is perfectly satisfactory and the funding will come from other directions. Therefore I would not support the amendment.

Mr. Kaplan: In general I feel also it is better to fund government programs out of the Consolidated Revenue Fund, and when you dedicate funds such as the highway trust fund in the United States or lottery proceeds in Canada, governments may tend to take a less responsible attitude to funds that are not part of the Consolidated Revenue Fund, that directly come from taxpayers.

But I do not think in this case we are talking about large sums of money. I mean relatively large sums of money. Even the case of the Mercedes-Benz... There is something to be said for giving the public the sense that the law enforcement agencies are working and that they are taking property from the criminal element in the society under the mechanisms provided for by law. I do not approve of sheriffs using fancy cars to do their jobs. But I would not be surprised if there are some positive impacts in jurisdictions where things like that happen, and the public, which can be very disillusioned about the war on drugs or the failure of the war on drugs, might get some sense that the law is working from watching that type of allocation of proceeds.

So I would like to insist on the amendment. I hope it has the effect of seeing some property transferred,

M. Mosley: Je crois qu'il est très rarement utilisé, fort vraisemblablement parce que les provinces ont des mécanismes de financement des municipalités, et les budgets de la police sont, dans des circonstances normales, financés par les impôts municipaux et les subventions que la province peut accorder aux municipalités à cette fin, et, bien entendu, les coûts de police provinciale sont assumés par les gouvernements provinciaux.

La probité fiscale de la subvention des forces de police par le produit de la vente de biens confisqués à la suite d'activités criminelles soulève un certain nombre de questions. D'aucuns craignent... il y a l'exemple américain du shérif qui se retrouve au volant de la Mercedes qu'il a confisquée aux trafiquants de drogue. Il y a un manque de probité apparente, et, dans tous les cas, cela ne correspond pas également à la meilleure utilisation de ces ressources.

Pour cette raison, le paragraphe 651.(3), à ma connaissance, est utilisé très rarement. Néanmoins, il est là, et dans un cas où cela serait jugé opportun soit au niveau fédéral soit au niveau provincial, le pouvoir de procéder à ce genre de transfert existe.

M. Horner: Monsieur le président, bien que je puisse comprendre pourquoi l'Association canadienne des chefs de police recommande cet amendement, et que cette idée de verser ces fonds aux forces de lutte contre le crime me plaise, je crois que l'explication de M. Mosley est parfaitement satisfaisante et que ce financement doit venir d'ailleurs. En conséquence, je n'appuierai pas cet amendement.

M. Kaplan: D'une manière générale j'estime également préférable de financer les programmes du gouvernement à partir du fonds du revenu consolidé, et quand des gouvernements financent des programmes avec un fonds de fiducie pour la voirie comme aux États-Unis où les loteries comme au Canada, ils ont tendance à adopter une attitude moins responsable envers ces fonds qui ne font pas partie du fonds du revenu consolidé, qui viennent directement des contribuables.

Il reste dans ce cas, il ne s'agit pas à mon avis de sommes d'argent importantes, relativement parlant. Même dans le cas de cette Mercedes... Montrez au public que les agences d'application de la loi travaillent et qu'elles confisquent les biens des éléments criminels de la société conformément aux mesures prévues par la loi est peut-être aussi une bonne chose. Je n'approuve pas les shérifs qui roulent au volant dans une voiture de rêve pour faire leur travail. Cependant je ne serais pas surpris que de telles méthodes aient des conséquences positives dans certaines juricitions et que le public souvent sans illusion quand on lui parle de guerre contre la drogue, puisse penser en voyant cette utilisation des biens confisqués qu'après tout il y a quand même injustice.

J'aimerais donc insister sur la valeur de cet amendement. J'aimerais qu'il permette le transfert de although, as I say, I would have a different view if it resulted in large amounts of money that gave the police a luxurious lifestyle on the job.

Mr. Horner: Since Mr. Kaplan has stated that there may not be large sums of money involved, and I guess in the big scheme of things they are not considered large sums of money, I think there might be a larger bureaucracy set up to handle these so-called small sums of money, and therefore none of it would get to the crime prevention forces anyhow. So I would vote against the amendment.

Amendment negatived.

The Chairman: We will proceed with L-11, Mr. Kaplan.

Mr. Kaplan: Amendment L-11 is to add a paragraph, proposed paragraph 420.17(4)(c). I move that we add immediately after line 45 on page 13 the following:

> (c) in order to effect subsections (3) and (4), determine beyond reasonable doubt that the accused is not able to forfeit the property, unless through willful default of the accused not to comply with an order of forfeiture.

This is an amendment inspired by the Canadian Bar Association. It attempts to ensure that the court does not just order a fine and a term of imprisonment in default of that fine. It would have to be determined whether the property or money could not be provided to the court, whether the reason for that was a willful attempt on behalf of the accused. I will not say more about it than that.

The Chairman: This has the effect of adding a new paragraph (c) to that particular proposed section.

Mr. Grisé: Mr. Chairman, this amendment is fairly similar to N-22 that was defeated yesterday. I am going to ask Mr. Mosley to comment on it.

Mr. Mosley: The concerns expressed yesterday in relation to Mr. Robinson's motion of similar effect were that the amendment would require the Crown to prove in every case, beyond a reasonable doubt, (a) that the accused was not able to forfeit the property—and that may be difficult to do in situations in which efforts have been made to conceal or transfer the property out of the country; the Crown may not have access to the evidence that would establish that—and (b) that the accused was unable to comply with an order of forfeiture through willful default.

One of the objects of the legislative package as a whole is to strip offenders of the assets obtained through enterprise or designated drug offence activity. The fine in lieu of forfeiture provision and the imprisonment in certains biens, bien que, comme je l'ai déjà dit, mon point de vue serait différent si la police se retrouvait avec des sommes d'argent importantes ayant des conséquences néfastes sur ces méthodes de travail.

M. Horner: Étant donné que d'après M. Kaplan il est possible qu'il ne s'agisse pas de grosses sommes d'argent, et je suppose que dans ce milieu ces sommes ne sont pas considérées comme de grosses sommes, il est possible qu'il faille créer une véritable bureaucratie pour administrer ces petites sommes d'argent, et en conséquence les forces de répression du crime n'en verraient n'importe comment jamais la couleur. Je me vois donc obligé de voter contre cet amendement.

L'amendement est rejeté.

Le président: Nous passons au L-11. Monsieur Kaplan.

M. Kaplan: L'amendement L-11 ajoute un alinéa, l'alinéa 420.17(4)c). Je propose d'ajouter immédiatement après la ligne 35, à la page 13, ce qui suit:

> c) pour donner effet au paragraphe (3) et au présent paragraphe, de déterminer hors de tout doute raisonnable que l'accusé n'est pas en mesure de subir la confiscation des biens en cause, sauf si cela résulte du fait que l'accusé a délibérément fait défaut de se conformer à une ordonnance de confiscation.

C'est un amendement inspiré par l'Association du barreau. C'est pour s'assurer que le tribunal n'ordonne pas simplement une amende et une peine de prison pour manquement à une ordonnance. Il faudrait déterminer si les biens ou l'argent en cause n'ont pu être fournis au tribunal et si c'est le résultat d'une tentative délibérée de l'accusé. Je n'en dirai pas plus.

Le président: C'est un nouvel alinéa c) qui est ajouté à cette proposition d'article.

M. Grisé: Monsieur le président, cet amendement est très analogue au N-22 qui a été rejeté hier. Je vais demander à M. Mosley de nous donner quelques explications.

M. Mosley: Nous avons dit hier au sujet de la motion analogue de M. Robinson que cet amendement aurait pour conséquence de requérir de la Couronne qu'elle prouve dans tous les cas, hors de tout doute raisonnable, a) que l'accusé n'était pas en mesure de subir la confiscation des biens en cause—et la démonstration peut en être difficile quand des efforts ont été faits pour cacher ou transférer les biens hors du pays; la Couronne peut ne pas avoir accès aux preuves l'établissant—et b) que l'accusé a délibérément fait défaut de se conformer à une ordonnance de confiscation.

Un des objets de ces nouvelles dispositions législatives est de confisquer aux contrevenants les revenus liés à des infractions de criminalité organisée ou à des infractions graves en matière de drogue. L'amende pour remplacer la default is complementary to the basic forfeiture power the bill would provide for.

If forfeiture cannot be accomplished, the fine is meant to serve as an alternative; if the fine cannot be paid, incarceration in default is intended to serve as a powerful incentive to the offender not to transfer the property out of the country or to dissipate it. There will be circumstances when the offender will have dissipated the funds through activities such as gambling or whatever, but will not have wilfully defaulted in order to avoid compliance with an order of forfeiture. Line 42 on page 1 says that when the offender comes before the court with clean hands, the court has a residual discretion not to impose the fine in lieu of forfeiture when it would, if imposed, eventually lead to the term of imprisonment in default if the fine is not paid. The offender therefore has an opportunity to present his case to the court. If the motion to amend is adopted, the burden of establishing those two further elements would be cast on the Crown on the beyond a reasonable doubt standard.

Amendment negatived.

The Chairman: Next is L-12.

Mr. Kaplan: This refers to lines 22 and 23 on page 14. The argument is similar to that I made earlier about the proceeds of crime being directed to crime prevention forces. I suspect its fate will be the same, but I would like to put it on the record.

I move that we strike out lines 22 and 23 on page 14 and substitute the following therefor:

General directs and such proceeds of the disposition be directed to crime prevention forces, upon regulations made by the Attorney General governing the direction of the property.

Mr. Chairman, I will not say more about it.

Mr. Grisé: Mr. Chairman, it is exactly the same amendment as L-10, which was defeated a few minutes ago.

The Chairman: Your position is the same as before.

Mr. Horner: Yes.

Amendment negatived.

The Chairman: N-34 was disposed of, so we will move on with L-13.

Mr. Kaplan: I move that we strike out lines 15 to 18 on page 16 and substitute the following therefor:

confiscation et l'emprisonnement pour défaut de conformité sont les compléments du pouvoir de confiscation fondamentale prévue par le projet de loi.

S'il ne peut y avoir confiscation, c'est l'amende, à la place; si l'amende ne peut être payée, l'incarcération pour défaut doit puissamment inciter le contrevenant à ne pas transférer le bien hors du pays ou à le dissiper. Il peut arriver que le contrevenant ait dissipé ses fonds au jeu, par exemple, mais qu'il n'ait pas délibérément refusé de se conformer à une ordonnance de confiscation. La ligne 42 de la page 1 dit que le contrevenant vient devant le tribunal les mains propres, que le tribunal a le pouvoir discrétionnaire de ne pas imposer d'amende en remplacement d'une confiscation si le défaut de son paiement risque d'entraîner une peine d'emprisonnement. Le contrevenant a par conséquent la possibilité de plaider son cas devant le tribunal. Si cet amendement est adopté, la Couronne, hors de tout doute raisonnable, aura la charge de démontrer ces deux éléments supplémentaires.

Le président: Le suivant est le L-12.

M. Kaplan: Il s'agit des lignes 25 et 26 à la page 14. L'argument est similaire à celui que j'ai présenté tout à l'heure au sujet du produit de la vente des biens versés aux organisations chargées de lutter contre la criminalité. Je suppose que son sort sera le même, mais j'aimerais quand même le proposer.

Je propose de retrancher les lignes 25 et 26, à la page 14, et de les remplacer par ce qui suit:

Procureur général et que le produit de la vente des biens est destiné aux forces de lutte contre la criminalité, conformément aux règlements pris par le procureur général pour régler l'affectation de ces biens.

Monsieur le président, je n'en dirai pas plus.

M. Grisé: Monsieur le président, c'est exactement le même amendement que le L-10 qui a été rejeté il y a quelques minutes.

Le président: Votre position est la même que tout à l'heure.

M. Horner: Oui.

L'amendement est rejeté.

Le président: Le sort du N-34 a été réglé, nous passons donc au L-13.

M. Kaplan: Je propose de retrancher les lignes 15 à 18, à la page 16, et de les remplacer par ce qui suit.

A condition qu'il soit convaincu hors de tout doute raisonnable que celle-ci est innocente de toute complicité dans la perpétration de l'infraction.

I think all I have to do is remind members of the argument I made earlier about having a higher standard than appearance, and I noted the argument made on behalf of the government against the amendment. I would like to move it nonetheless.

Mr. Grisé: Once again, this amendment is quite similar to N-18 and L-7, both of which were defeated.

The Chairman: The issue is one of degree.

Amendment negatived.

• 1000

The Chairman: On L-14, Mr. Kaplan.

Mr. Kaplan: I move that we add immediately after line 20 on page 16 the following:

(4) Upon acquittal, that the property be returned automatically to the person referred to in paragraphs 420.21(3)(a) and (b) without application for restoration and without costs for storage and recovery of the property.

This amendment covers a concern of the Canadian Bar Association and would assure that if a person is acquitted then he would not be put to the financial trouble and costs of recovering property seized from him. The onus is put on the Crown to restore the property.

Mr. Grisé: I will ask Mr. McIsaac to respond.

Mr. McIsaac: I direct the committee's attention to proposed section 420.23, at the bottom of page 17, which creates the residual disposal power of a court which would apply in these circumstances and would not require a further application on the part of an acquitted person. At that time, immediately after the acquittal, upon his application or indeed on the judge's own motion, the return of the property can be effected.

There is one little release valve in that provision, or in relation to all of the return provisions, that there is an automatic 30-day period of grace in case the Attorney General wants to appeal the case. But subject to that, there is in effect an automatic return at the time of the acquittal.

Mr. Nicholson: Would property that is returned under the section you just read, Mr. McIsaac, in any circumstances attract costs for restoration or costs for storage?

Mr. McIsaac: No, there is no provision that would place an onus upon an acquitted person to pay any costs for the storage.

Mr. Nicholson: I see that there is nothing that places an onus on him, but in the real world would they try to charge? Do they charge people for storage costs if they have detained property here and the person is subsequently acquitted or found—

[Traduction]

Je crois que tout ce que j'ai à faire c'est de rappeler aux députés mon argument précédant concernant une norme supérieure à la simple apparence, et j'ai noté l'argument présenté au nom du gouvernement contre cet amendement. Quoi qu'il en soit, j'aimerais le proposer.

M. Grisé: Encore une fois, cet amendement est très analogue au N-18 ou au L-7, amendements tous deux rejetés.

Le président: C'est une question de degré.

L'amendement est rejeté.

Le président: Au sujet de l'amendement L-14, monsieur Kaplan.

M. Kaplan: Je propose d'ajouter immédiatement après la ligne 18, à la page 16, ce qui suit:

(4) En cas d'acquittement, les biens sont remis automatiquement à la personne visée au paragraphe 420.21(3)a) et b), sans demande de restitution et sans frais d'entreposage ou de recouvrement à leur égard.

Cet amendement répond à une préoccupation de l'Association du barreau canadien et fait en sorte qu'une personne qui a été acquittée n'a pas à assumer de frais pour couvrir les biens qui lui ont été pris. Il appartient à la Couronne de les lui rendre.

M. Grisé: Je vais demander à M. McIsaac d'en parler.

M. McIsaac: J'attire l'attention du Comité sur l'article 420.23, au bas de la page 17, qui accorde au juge le pouvoir de disposer des biens dans ces conditions sans que la personne acquittée ait nécessairement à en faire la demande. Donc, dès que la personne est acquittée, à la demande de la personne ou sur l'ordre du juge, les biens peuvent être rendus.

Il y a par ailleurs une petite soupape de sûreté dans cet article en ce sens qu'il est prévu une période de grâce automatique de 30 jours au cas où le procureur général veut parler de la décision en appel. Autrement, les biens sont rendus automatiquement tout de suite après l'acquittement.

M. Nicholson: Les biens qui sont rendus en vertu de cet article, monsieur McIsaac, peuvent-ils donner lieu à des frais d'entreposage ou de recouvrement?

M. McIsaac: Il n'y a pas de disposition qui force la personne acquittée à supporter des frais d'entreprosage quels qu'ils soient.

M. Nicholson: Il n'y a rien théoriquement qui force la personne à le faire, mais en pratique risque-t-elle de se voir exiger des frais? Si l'on a gardé des biens à un endroit en attendant l'acquittement ou une autre décision, peut-on essayer d'exiger des frais d'entreposage. . .

[Text]

Mr. McIsaac: Going back to the history of the search warrant provision, section 443, which has been around for many years, I am not aware of any situation where an individual has been charged for storage costs. Those have always been borne by the Crown as a part of the prosecution.

Mr. Horner: Can you show me where it states anything about the 30-day period in the case of the Crown wanting to appeal? Because I just do not see it right now.

Mr. McIsaac: Yes, proposed section 420.25, at the top of page 19. The closing words of that proposed section give the 30-day period of grace.

Mr. Nicholson: It seems to me it would only make sense to have that 30 days.

Mr. McIsaac: Yes. It is applicable presently in criminal statutes in relation to seizure of property.

(b) a designated enterprise crime offence, or

The purpose of the amendment is, following a suggestion made by the Royal Canadian Mounted Police, that this clause would thereby include enterprise crime offences which should be included for the sake of continuity.

Mr. Grisé: Mr. Chairman, I would like Mr. Mosley to make some comments on this amendment.

Mr. Mosley: I ask through you, Mr. Chairman, for some clarification from Mr. Kaplan. It is our understanding that the RCMP has not advocated this change. It may have been put forward by the Canadian Association of Chiefs of Police. This is a matter of some considerable concern to the federal government and the

M. McIsaac: Si je me fie à ce qui s'est passé pour les mandats de perquisition prévus à l'article 443, ces dispositions-là existent depuis des années, je constate qu'on n'a jamais exigé de frais d'entreposage dans ces circonstances. La Couronne a toujours assumé ces frais comme faisant partie de la poursuite.

M. Horner: Pouvez-vous me dire où se trouve le délai de 30 jours prévu dans le cas où la Couronne désire faire appel? Je ne le vois pas nulle part.

M. McIsaac: C'est à l'article 420.25, au haut de la page 19. À la toute fin, il est question des 30 jours.

M. Nicholson: Il me semble que c'est avisé dans les circonstances.

M. McIsaac: Oui. La même disposition vaut dans le cas des autres saisies.

L'amendement est rejeté.

M. Kaplan: L'amendement L-15 concerne la page 17. Je propose de retrancher la ligne 24, à la page 17, et de la remplacer par ce qui suit:

présent article où si l'accusé a été acquitté et lorsque les délais d'appel

Le but de l'amendement, qui s'inspire encore une fois du mémoire de l'Association du barreau canadien, est d'entrevoir la possibilité d'un acquittement.

M. Grisé: Monsieur le président, les mêmes considérations que dans le cas de l'amendement L-14 et des amendements précédents s'appliquent.

M. Kaplan: Très bien.

L'amendement est rejeté.

Le président: L'amendement L-16.

M. Kaplan: Il s'insère à la page 20. Je propose d'ajouter, immédiatement après la ligne 13, à la page 20, ce qui suit:

b) soit d'une infraction de criminalité organisée désignée;

Cet amendement fait suite à une suggestion de la Gendarmerie Royale du Canada voulant que les infractions de criminalité organisée désignées soient incluses dans un souci de continuité.

M. Grisé: Je demanderais à M. Mosley d'expliquer la situation en ce qui concerne cet amendement.

M. Mosley: J'aimerais préciser un point avec M. Kaplan, par votre intermédiaire, évidemment, monsieur le président. Nous avions l'impression que la GRC n'avait pas demandé ce changement. Nous pensions qu'il avait plutôt été proposé par l'Association canadienne des chefs de police. Quoi qu'il en soit, c'est une modification

RCMP has been involved in discussions from the beginning in relation to this change in the law.

I can give you some background: the Income Tax Act, since its inception during World War I has striven to protect the confidentiality of the personal information that is received by Revenue Canada in the course of administering the income tax system in this country. The basic rationale for that principle is to protect the integrity of the self-reporting system which is at the heart of our revenue collection efforts. Persons who make returns have to be assured that in doing so the information they supply about their sources of income will not be disclosed except in very limited circumstances.

The Income Tax Act does provide an exception. After charges have been laid in any criminal proceeding, a subpoena may issue and the evidence in relation to the information held by Revenue Canada may be presented to the court.

What proposed section 420.28 of this bill does is to expand in effect the exception which the Income Tax Act now allows to permit the disclosure through the court of information in relation to the tax returns of an individual prior to charges being laid for investigative purposes. It does so specifically with respect to designated drug offences only.

It is recognized that this is a significant departure from the confidentiality principle in relation to tax information, and the reason why it is felt necessary to make that departure at this point in time is, of course, the very grave problem with drugs in this country and internationally and the need to mount effective investigations into drug crimes.

It is felt the information that is held by Revenue Canada would be of particular assistance in the investigation of drug crimes. For that reason, the government proposed to expand the exception to the basic principle that information not be disclosed for the purpose of the investigation of designated drug offences.

To expand it further, as the motion provides, is a departure from the status quo, a very significant departure. It is felt to be justified in relation to drug crimes. To take it that step further, it is felt by the government, would not be justified at this time, Mr. Chairman.

The RCMP has a very sophisticated drug-profiteering investigative capacity. For some years now they have had personnel devoted to that task across the country as part of the drug enforcement branch. They have the skills and the knowledge required to conduct sophisticated financial investigations, which would be supported by this type of information. That is not to say that other forces do not have similar capacity, or the ability to develop such a législative qui préoccupe énormément le gouvernement fédéral, et la GRC participe aux discussions depuis le début.

Je vous explique un peu ce qu'il en est. La Loi de l'impôt sur le revenu, depuis son introduction au cours de la Première guerre mondiale, a essayé de protéger la confidentialité des renseignements personnels fournis à Revenu Canada dans le cadre de sa mise en application. L'objectif fondamental vise à protéger le concept de l'autodéclaration sur laquelle repose tout le régime de perception des impôts au Canada. Les personnes qui présentent leurs déclarations doivent être sûres que les renseignements qu'elles fournissent au sujet de leurs sources de revenu ne sont pas divulgués, sauf en de très rares circonstances.

La Loi de l'impôt sur le revenu prévoit quand même une exception. Lorsque des accusations criminelles ont été portées, une citation à comparaître peut être demandée et Revenu Canada peut être forcé à révéler au tribunal les renseignements qu'il détient.

L'article 420.28 étend la portée de l'exception qui est prévue actuellement en vertu de la Loi de l'impôt sur le revenu de façon à permettre la divulgation au tribunal des renseignements contenus dans la déclaration d'impôt de certaines personnes avant que des accusations soient portées contre elles pour fins d'enquête. Cependant, dans ces nouvelles circonstances, il doit s'agir d'infractions graves en matière de drogues.

Il est évident que c'est une autre exception importante au principe de la confidentialité des renseignements fiscaux. La mesure est cependant jugée nécessaire face aux graves problèmes de drogues qui sévissent actuellement au pays ainsi que dans le monde entier en vue de faciliter les enquêtes au sujet des infractions possibles.

On estime que Revenu Canada peut être d'un grand secours aux enquêteurs dans le cas des infractions en matière de drogues. C'est pour cette raison que le gouvernement a proposé d'étendre l'exception au principe de la confidentialité des renseignements aux enquêtes au sujet des infractions graves en matière de drogue.

Aller encore plus loin, comme le propose l'amendement, constituerait un changement d'orientation très marqué. Le gouvernement est bien d'accord pour ce qui est des infractions en matière de drogue. Cependant, il estime que d'étendre l'exception à d'autres infractions à ce moment-ci ne serait pas justifié.

La GRC a des moyens d'enquête très poussés en matière de trafic des drogues et du produit de ce trafic. Depuis des années, elle affecte du personnel à cette tâche dans tout le pays dans le cadre de sa direction de la police des drogues. Elle dispose des compétences nécessaires pour mener des enquêtes financières très approfondies et cette nouvelle disposition de la loi viendrait appuyer son effort. Ce qui ne veut pas dire que d'autres sections ne capacity, but at this point in time, if I may say, Mr. Chairman, the greatest value to be obtained from that information is in relation to the drug-trafficking problem in drug investigations.

There are other investigative avenues that may be pursued with relation to enterprise crimes. It is not at all clear this information would be of great benefit. I know the Canadian Association of Chiefs of Police called for this change, but I would respectfully submit, Mr. Chairman, there is a need for some experience with the administration of such a scheme before it is expanded beyond the area within which it is clearly needed at this time.

Mr. Kaplan: I agree very much with Mr. Mosley's observation that we are dealing here with an important issue, the question of how much confidentiality we will continue to provide to people who are relying on that and reporting income on criminal earnings. Fundamentally we are asking the question of which is more important, getting people to pay their taxes, or using information the government has in its hands to bring criminals to justice.

We looked at this issue, and I tell you I have given it a lot of thought, because I was a member of the legislative committee that looked at using tax information to help in the enforcement of maintenance orders. For the first time in our Canadian tradition, we provided that tax information, and a lot of other confidential information, would be open to assist spouses who are supporting children to get contributions from their defaulting spouses to help maintain their children. We were looking at a situation where welfare was being used in cases where spouses who were capable of making a contribution were able to avoid it until now, and we made a decision there.

The government has come along so far as to say in designated drug offences it is more important to get the drug dealers and to bring them to justice than to get them to pay their taxes. To me it is not a very much further step, although I concede it is a further step, to say that enterprise crime is worthy also of this special treatment and of opening of the books to assist in collecting.

It would assist me if there were some way of knowing how effective is the confidentiality we offer to criminals in getting them to pay their taxes. That is something that has perhaps never been explored, in a public way anyway, but I suppose we would need income tax officials to tell us about that.

Mr. Mosley: If I may assist, Mr. Chairman, income tax officials have indicated, without disclosing any particulars about any individuals, that there are cases where people do report their income from criminal activity, prostitution as an example.

pourraient pas profiter du renforcement de ces mêmes pouvoirs, mais le gouvernement estime qu'à ce moment-ci, là où ces renseignements peuvent être les plus utiles, c'est dans le domaine du trafic des drogues et des enquêtes s'y rattachant.

En ce qui concerne les enquêtes sur les infractions de criminalité organisée, il y a d'autres possibilités. Et dans ces cas, il n'est pas sûr que ces renseignements pourraient avoir une utilité quelconque. Je sais que l'Association canadienne des chefs de police a réclamé la modification à cet égard, mais il me semble, monsieur le président, qu'on doit examiner de près l'application de cette disposition dans la pratique avant de songer à l'étendre dans un autre domaine.

M. Kaplan: Je suis tout à fait d'accord avec M. Mosley en ce qui concerne l'importance de la question, à savoir jusqu'où doit aller la confidentialité dont bénéficient ceux qui s'y fient pour déclarer des revenus provenant d'activités criminelles. Justement, la question fondamentale est de savoir ce qui est le plus important, amener les gens à payer leurs impôts ou utiliser l'information dont dispose le gouvernement pour amener les criminels devant les tribunaux.

Nous avons examiné cette question, et j'y ai personnellement beaucoup réfléchi. J'étais membre du comité législatif qui a examiné la possibilité d'utiliser les renseignements fiscaux pour aider à faire respecter les ordonnances de pension alimentaire. Pour la première fois au Canada, nous avons décidé d'utiliser les renseignements fiscaux et d'autres renseignements confidentiels pour aider les hommes et les femmes qui ont des enfants à charge et dont les conjoints manquent à leurs obligations. Nous avons également examiné le cas des conjoints qui s'en remettent au Bien-être social pour éviter d'apporter leur contribution.

Le gouvernement a déjà fait un progrès considérable en indiquant que les infractions graves en matière de drogue et la poursuite des trafiquants sont plus importantes que la perception des impôts de ces mêmes trafiquants. En ce qui me concerne, même si j'admets qu'il y a une différence, cela revient presque à dire que le crime organisé mérite une attention spéciale et justifie l'accès aux renseignements qui permettent le recouvrement des impôts.

J'aimerais bien savoir à quel point le principe de la confidentialité qui leur est offerte amène les criminels à payer leurs impôts. A ce que je sache, c'est une question qui n'a jamais été examinée, du moins en public, mais je suppose que les fonctionnaires de l'impôt savent ce qu'il en est.

M. Mosley: Si vous le permettez, monsieur le président, j'aimerais dire que les fonctionnaires de l'impôt ont déjà indiqué, sans mentionner le nom des intéressés, que certains faisaient parfois état de revenus provenant d'activités criminelles, la prostitution, par exemple.

Mr. Horner: Mr. Chairman, we are talking about disclosure provisions. In view of what it says in the preceding proposed section, 420.27, where it includes an enterprise crime offence, I think there is something to be said for also putting it into proposed section 420.28 as a subsection (b).

I am not sure what an enterprise crime offence is. Perhaps Mr. Mosley could explain it to me exactly. Is it only under the Income Tax Act we are talking about?

Mr. Mosley: No, Mr. Chairman, the expression "enterprise crime offence" is defined in the bill and refers to a limited schedule of offences—roughly 22 or 23 in number. They are primarily those that are profit-oriented and are found in the Criminal Code. Proposed section 420.27, although—

Mr. Kaplan: Enterprise crimes are business kinds of crimes.

Mr. Horner: All right, so are you talking about computer theft.

Mr. Mosley: Computer theft would be an example—fraud, extortion and so on. Proposed section 420.27 is intended to deal with the problem of—

Mr. Horner: With the informant.

Mr. Mosley: —with an informant who may be subject to confidentiality rules, primarily the common law confidentiality doctrine, which attaches to anyone who is in a relationship such as bank customer, an accountant customer, or that type of situation. The banker or the accountant is liable civilly in damages for the disclosure of any confidential information concerning the affairs of the individual.

Now, there is a public interest exception to that. The rule was first formulated in the 1920s by a British court and has been followed throughout the common law world. The public interest exception has never been adequately defined by the courts. There is no jurisprudence to assist us in what it means. Proposed section 420.27 is intended to fill the void by spelling out that in relation to proceeds of crime or the commission of an enterprise crime offence or designated drug offence, the individual informant is protected, if he acts on the basis of reasonable suspicion.

It was amended yesterday, as you recall, Mr. Chairman, to specifically exclude the operation of section 241 of the Income Tax Act. Section 241 is the provision that governs confidentiality in relation to information held by Revenue Canada. It was our view prior to that amendment that proposed section 420.27 was limited by section 241. Proposed section 420.27 is a general provision, section 241 is a specific provision, and under general principles of interpretation, the specific would quality the general.

M. Horner: Monsieur le président, nous parlons ici de la communication des renseignements. Comme il est question des infractions de criminalité organisée dans l'article 420.27, qui précède, il serait logique qu'il en soit de même dans cet article 420.28, à l'alinéa b), par exemple.

Cependant, je ne suis pas sûr de bien comprendre ce qu'est une infraction de criminalité organisée. M. Mosley est peut-être en mesure de me l'expliquer. Est-ce que cela concerne seulement la Loi de l'impôt sur le revenu?

M. Mosley: Non, monsieur le président, l'expression «infraction de criminalité organisée» est définie dans ce projet de loi et est limitée seulement à un certain nombre d'infractions, 22 ou 23 environ. Ce sont essentiellement les infractions qui rapportent des profits qu'on trouve dans le Code criminel. L'article 420.27, même...

M. Kaplan: Les infractions de criminalité organisée concernent le domaine des affaires.

M. Horner: Le vol informatique est donc inclus.

M. Mosley: Le vol, la fraude, l'extorsion etc. L'article 420.27 vise essentiellement...

M. Horner: Un informateur.

M. Mosley: ... un informateur assujetti aux règles de la confidentialité, à la doctrine de la confidentialité prévue en common law, quiconque est en rapport avec la personne, une banque, un comptable etc. Le banquier ou le comptable peut faire l'objet d'une poursuite civile s'il a divulgué des renseignements confidentiels au sujet des affaires de la personne.

Il y a une exception de prévue dans l'intérêt public. La règle a été établie pour la première fois au cours des années 1920 par un tribunal britannique et a été respectée depuis dans tous les pays de common law. Cependant, l'exception pour l'intérêt public n'a jamais été précisée de façon adéquate par les tribunaux. Il n'y a pas de jurisprudence qui puisse nous aider à cet égard en plus. L'article proposé 420.27 est destiné à remédier à cet état de choses en précisant que pour ce qui est des produits du crime, de la perpétration d'infraction de criminalité organisée ou d'infraction grave en matière de drogue, l'informateur est protégé s'il a agi à partir d'un doute raisonnable.

Si vous vous souvenez bien, monsieur le président, cet article a été modifié hier spécifiquement pour exclure l'application de l'article 241 de la Loi de l'impôt sur le revenu. Le dit article est celui qui établit le caractère confidentiel des renseignements détenus par Revenu Canada. Sans la modification, nous pensions que l'article 420.27 ne pouvait être limité dans son application par l'article 241. L'article 420.27 est une disposition générale tandis que l'article 241 est une disposition précise. En vertu des principes reconnus d'interprétation, et les

[Text]

However, for greater certainty and to ensure that there was no misinterpretation perhaps by Revenue Canada employees themselves, it was felt necessary to amend proposed section 420.27 to ensure that it referred specifically to section 241 of the Income Tax Act. Section 241 contains a general rule of confidentiality with exceptions and it does qualify the scope of proposed section 420.27.

Mr. Horner: May I ask, Mr. Chairman, if it would be possible, since the amendment has been put in to exclude section 241 of the Income Tax Act, to also put in enterprise crime offence as a subsection (b) and exclude section 241 of the Income Tax Act?

Mr. Mosley: I am not sure I understand, Mr. Chairman.

Mr. Kaplan: It is the income tax information that we want, though.

Mr. Horner: Well, yes, okay.

Mr. Kaplan: The issue really, first of all, is whether we think it is more important to protect criminals earning this income so that they will report their taxes, or to use that information to help nail them and take their proceeds of crime away.

The government feels that in the case of designated drug offences, because of the epidemic, it is, but in the case of enterprise crime it is not. I am arguing by this amendment that enterprise crime ought to be treated in the same way as designated drug offences. Perhaps I will not say any more about it just now.

• 1020

Mr. Nicholson: Let me say that I think the issue at stake is just a little broader than whether or not we are trying to protect income tax records of criminals here.

Mr. Horner: I would hope so.

Mr. Nicholson: There is the overall principle of confidentiality of income tax records that applies to all Canadians. When we are asking for an exception, I think it is legitimate to look very long and very carefully at just what exceptions we will make. I for one, for instance, think the exception should be made in the area of designated drug crimes because of the difficulty in tracking this down, because of the large scales of money that are involved, and because of the epidemic problem we have with this.

Now, when I look at the other ones in the enterprise crime sections, I do not see the urgency to open up the income tax records. It seems to me that the person should be caught, if we are going to nail some of these people, long before they file their income tax records the dispositions précises limitent la portée de la disposition générale.

De façon à ce qu'il n'y ait absolument aucune possibilité de mauvaise interprétation relativement aux employés de Revenu Canada, il a été jugé nécessaire de modifier l'article 420.27 de façon à mentionner spécifiquement l'article 241 de la Loi de l'impôt sur le revenu. L'article 241 a établi la règle générale de la confidentialité avec certaines exceptions et il limite la portée de l'article 420.27.

M. Horner: Puisque cette modification a été apportée, serait-il possible de mentionner à l'alinéa b) les infractions de criminalité organisée et d'exclure également ici l'article 241 de la Loi de l'impôt sur le revenu?

M. Mosley: Je crains de ne pas avoir très bien compris, monsieur le président.

M. Kaplan: Ce sont les renseignements fiscaux que nous désirons obtenir.

M. Horner: Je comprends.

M. Kaplan: La question vraiment est de savoir si nous voulons protéger les criminels de façon à ce qu'ils puissent déclarer leurs revenus et payer leurs impôts ou si nous voulons utiliser les renseignements dont nous disposons pour les traîner devant la justice et saisir les profits de leur activité criminelle.

Le gouvernement estime qu'il faut prendre des mesures spéciales seulement dans le cas des infractions graves en matière de drogue, à cause de l'étendue du problème, non pas dans le cas des infractions de criminalité organisée. Mon amendement place sur le même pied les infractions de criminalité organisée et les infractions graves en matière de drogue. Il convient peut-être que je m'arrête là.

M. Nicholson: Selon moi, la question n'est pas seulement de savoir s'il convient de protéger les déclarations d'impôt des criminels.

M. Horner: J'espère bien.

M. Nicholson: Le principe fondamental de la confidentialité des déclarations d'impôt s'applique à tous les Canadiens. Chaque fois que nous voulons nous écarter de ce principe, nous devons nous montrer d'une extrême prudence. En ce qui me concerne, j'estime qu'une exception doit être faite dans le cas des infractions graves en matière de drogue, à cause de la difficulté de réunir les preuves à cet égard, à cause des montants d'argent impliqués et à cause de l'étendue du problème de façon générale.

Dans le cas des infractions de criminalité organisée, je ne vois pas la même urgence à ouvrir les dossiers de l'impôt. Il me semble que la personne doit être arrêtée, si besoin en est, bien avant qu'elle n'ait la possibilité de présenter sa déclaration d'impôt pour l'année écoulée. Et, following year. The frequency and the seriousness is not there in all cases, as we see with the drug crime. So I for one am willing to make the exception for designated drug offences. Let us see how that works here before we open it up for other exceptions.

Mr. Horner: With respect, Mr. Chairman, what you are dealing with here is organized crime. I cannot buy that there is no urgency just because it is a different type of offence and not a drug offence.

Mr. Nicholson: That is what I am saying. I am saying, Dr. Horner, that the enterprise crime sections cover things like the money from keeping common bawdy-houses and procuring and other offences. I am not saying they are not serious; I am just saying that if you are going to catch some of these people here, you will have to do it long before you trust them to fill out an income tax form for the following year or the previous year. But because drugs are such an international huge crime—and as I say, it is something different and much more serious, I would suggest, than the procuring sections of the Criminal Code—I could see why we would make the exception for income tax records on that because of the sophistication of the international drug market.

The Chairman: This proposed amendment would add a new offence under the provisions of proposed section 420.28.

Amendment negatived.

Mr. Kaplan: I would like to move this amendment because it puts the issue in a slightly different place, but in the same scheme of things, and I expect the same result. In any event, I move that we add immediately after line 14 on page 20 the following:

(ii) a designated enterprise crime offence or

There would be some consequential changes needed, but I will leave it at that, and then if I am successful we will worry about the consequential changes.

Mr. Grisé: Mr. Chairman, I think the same comments would apply as to the previous amendment.

Mr. Horner: If the last one did not pass, this one cannot possibly, because it does not follow along. So I would have to not support this one as well.

Amendment negatived.

Clause 2 as amended agreed to.

de façon générale, ces infractions ne sont pas aussi fréquentes ou graves que les infractions en matière de drogue. Donc, personnellement, je suis prêt à faire une exception dans le cas des infractions graves en matière de drogue. Cependant, je veux voir quel effet cette disposition aura avant de l'étendre à d'autres infractions.

M. Horner: En toute déférence, monsieur le président, nous parlons ici de criminalité organisée. Je ne vois pas en quoi les infractions de ce genre requièrent une intervention moins urgente que les infractions en matière de drogue.

M. Nicholson: Je veux dire, monsieur Horner, que les infractions de criminalité organisée ont trait à des activités comme la tenue de maisons de débauche ou le proxénétisme. Je ne veux pas minimiser leur gravité, mais je fait remarquer que les coupables sont censés être arrêtés bien avant d'avoir l'occasion de présenter leur déclaration d'impôt pour l'année écoulée. Dans le cas du trafic des drogues, qui a une portée internationale, la situation est tout à fait différente et beaucoup plus grave, selon moi; il ne s'agit plus de proxénétisme dans le sens prévu au Code criminel. C'est à cause du degré de raffinement du trafic international des drogues que j'estime qu'une exception doit être faite en ce qui concerne les dossiers de l'impôt.

Le président: Cet amendement créerait une nouvelle infraction en vertu de l'article 420.28.

L'amendement est rejeté.

M. Kaplan: Je propose quand même l'amendement suivant, parce que j'estime qu'il est quelque peu différent, mais il s'inscrit dans la même ligne de pensée; je m'attends aux mêmes résultats. En tout état de cause, je propose de retrancher la ligne 20, à la page 20, et de la remplacer par ce qui suit:

en matière de drogue, d'une infraction de criminalité organisée désignée ou d'un acte ou

Il y a un certain nombre de modifications qui en découlent, mais je vais m'arrêter là pour l'instant. Si l'amendement est adopté, je verrai pour ce qui est des modifications corrélatives.

M. Grisé: Monsieur le président, les arguments déjà invoqués valent dans ce cas-ci.

M. Horner: Si l'amendement précédent n'a pas été adopté, celui-ci n'a pas grand-chance non plus. Je ne suis donc pas plus en faveur.

L'amendement est rejeté.

L'article 2 modifié est adopté.

Le président: Avons-nous d'autres amendements à l'article 10?

The Clerk of the Committee: L-18 is the next one.

The Chairman: L-18 is the last amendment. Mr. Kaplan, please.

Mr. Kaplan: It is on page 29. This will sound familiar to members. It harks back to the issue of defining proceeds earned in other jurisdictions that would be covered by the scope of this legislation. I move that we strike out lines 5 to 7 on page 29 and substitute the following therefor:

(b) an act or omission in a foreign jurisdiction that is designated as an offence in that jurisdiction.

Without having to repeat the arguments, Mr. Chairman, this would protect earnings in other jurisdictions that were not earned as a result of crimes as defined in those jurisdictions.

Mr. Grisé: Mr. Chairman, this amendment would deal with double criminality and is similar to some previous amendments that were defeated. L-1, N-4, N-5, L-1A, N-6, L-2, and N-7 were all defeated.

Criminal Code as well as the report of the Canadian Sentencing Commission.

With respect to the proposed new Criminal Code, we agreed that additional work needs to be done. At the subsequent federal-provincial meeting held in Quebec City last week, my provincial colleagues and I discussed Criminal Code matters and agreed upon the immediate priorities to be addressed.

In Saskatchewan, my colleagues and I recognized the need to examine the recommendations of the Canadian Sentencing Commission on a priority basis and to hold further, more detailed discussions on this issue.

Officials of my department are closely following the excellent work of the standing committee, and I believe your work will prove to be as most valuable contribution to reform in this area.

In Quebec City last week, my provincial colleagues and I agreed that the preliminary round of consultations, which is now being undertaken with the provinces, is proving to be extremely useful. The purpose of these consultations is to permit us to respond quickly to important recommendations that your committee will make.

As you are well are, provisions of the Official Languages Act will also have an impact in the administration of justice and periodically need to be thoroughly reviewed to ensure recognition of rights respecting use of English and French as official languages in federal institutions.

The President of the Treasury Board, the Secretary of State and I are participating in a comprehensive review of legislation and policy in the field of official languages. I informed committee members of this study at the last meeting.

On June 25, 1987, an act respecting the status and use of the official languages of Canada was tabled in the House. The legislation reinforces the rights of all Canadians to communicate with and to receive services from federal institutions in the official language of their choice.

Mr. Chairman, the Government of Canada must meet not only the justice demands of its own people but also international obligations. It must play its part in addressing justice concerns that go beyond our borders.

On May 29, 1987, I introduced another criminal law initiative, Bill C-61, entitled "Proceeds of Crime". The proposed legislation is intended to apply to illicit drug activities and to those offences under the Criminal Code, such as prostitution, robbery, extortion, and fraud, which will be designated as enterprise crimes. The proposals would permit law enforcement authorities, subject to approval by a court, properly to attack the proceeds of crime by granting the power to investigate, freeze, and criminel de la Commission de réforme du droit, ainsi que sur le rapport de la Commission de la détermination de la peine.

En ce qui concerne le nouveau Code criminel, nous avons jugé qu'un travail supplémentaire restait à faire. A la réunion fédérale-provinciale subséquente, tenue à Québec la semaine dernière, mes collègues provinciaux et moi-même avons discuté de nouveau du Code criminel et arrêté les priorités immédiates.

En Saskatchewan, mes collègues et moi-même avons reconnu la nécessité d'examiner en priorité les recommandations de la Commission canadienne de la détermination de la peine et de tenir des discussions plus détaillées à ce sujet.

Les fonctionnaires de mon ministère suivent l'excellent travail du Comité permanent et j'estime que vos travaux seront une contribution très précieuse à la réforme en ce domaine.

À Québec la semaine dernière, mes collègues provinciaux et moi-même avons convenu que la série préliminaire de consultations, qui se déroule actuellement dans les provinces, est une chose extrêmement utile. L'objet en est de nous permettre de réagir rapidement aux recommandations importantes que votre comité formulera.

Ainsi que vous le savez, les dispositions de la Loi sur les langues officielles influeront également sur l'administration de la justice et exigent un réexamen périodique pour assurer le respect des droits en matière d'usage de l'anglais et du français dans les institutions fédérales.

Le président du Conseil du Trésor, le secrétaire d'État et moi-même participons à un réexamen complet de la législation et de la politique en matière de langues officielles. J'ai informé les membres du comité de cette étude lors de la dernière réunion.

Le 25 juin 1987, une loi intéressant le statut et l'utilisation des langues officielles au Canada fut déposée à la Chambre. Elle renforce le droit de tous les Canadiens de communiquer avec les institutions fédérales et d'en recevoir les services dans la langue officielle de leur choix.

Monsieur le président, le gouvernement du Canada doit non seulement assurer la justice pour les Canadiens mais s'acquitter également de ses obligations internationales. Il doit donc se pencher sur des problèmes de justice qui transcendent ses frontières.

Le 29 mai 1987, j'ai introduit une autre initiative de droit pénal, le projet de loi C-61, intitulé «Produits de la criminalité». Il s'applique au trafic de drogues et à ces infractions au Code criminel que sont la prostitution, le vol à main armée, l'extorsion de fonds et l'escroquerie, toutes désignées comme entreprises criminelles. Ces propositions permettraient aux autorités de police, avec l'autorisation d'un tribunal, de s'attaquer aux produits de la criminalité, avec des pouvoirs d'enquête, la possibilité

In a related area, Canada and the United States signed a treaty on mutual legal assistance in criminal matters on March 18, 1985 to address the ever-increasing problem of transnational criminal activity. In an effort to implement the provisions of this treaty and any other treaty on mutual legal assistance, I tabled the Mutual Legal Assistance in Criminal Matters Act. This proposed legislation would enhance co-operation between Canada and its treaty partners to ensure that the existing informal co-operation in this area will continue, with enhanced efficiency.

I would like to mention a matter that although it has international importance is one that seeks a Canadian solution, that of war crimes and crimes against humanity. This is a matter I gave considerable time to at our last meeting, and I am pleased to advise that on September 16, 1987 amendments to the Criminal Code which give Canadian courts jurisdiction to try war crimes and crimes against humanity where the conduct in question would amount to a criminal offence in Canada were proclaimed into force.

I would at this time like to turn my attention to initiatives the department undertook during the past year to respond to the needs of Canadian families through family law reform.

Each year in Canada, thousands of marriages and common-law relationships break down. The result is often separation or divorce. In many cases the separating or divorcing spouses are able to reach a mutual agreement on child custody, access rights for the non-custodial parent, and any child support or spousal payment required. Where this is not possible, a court may issue a family order stipulating support, custody, or access rights. A large percentage of support orders issued in Canada regrettably are not complied with. The enforcement of family orders is a provincial and territorial responsibility. However, with the passage of the Family Orders and Agreements Enforcement Assistance Act, Parliament provided the legislative framework by which the federal government can assist in the enforcement process.

As I reported at our last meeting, royal assent had been given to that act in 1986, and part I, allowing for the release of certain information from a designated federal information bank to assist in locating those who breach support, custody, or access orders or agreements, was proclaimed in 1987.

The act has now been brought fully into force with the proclamation of part II on May 2 of this year. Part II of de bloquer et de saisir ces produits. En outre, les tribunaux disposeront de pouvoirs adéquats pour ordonner la confiscation de ces biens.

Dans un domaine connexe, le Canada et les États-Unis ont signé un traité d'assistance juridique mutuelle en matière criminelle le 18 mars 1985 pour s'attaquer au problème croissant de l'activité criminelle transnationale. Pour mettre en oeuvre les dispositions de ce traité et de tout autre traité d'assistance juridique mutuelle, j'ai déposé la Loi sur l'assistance juridique mutuelle en matière criminelle. Elle renforcerait la collaboration entre le Canada et ses cocontractants afin que la coopération officieuse qui existe dans ce domaine puisse se poursuivre de manière plus efficace.

Je voudrais mentionner un autre aspect qui, bien que revêtant une dimension internationale, réclame aussi une solution canadienne, celui des crimes de guerre et des crimes contre l'humanité. C'est une question que j'ai longuement traitée lors de notre dernière réunion et j'ai le plaisir de vous informer que le 16 septembre 1987, des modifications du Code criminel ont été déposées qui donneront aux tribunaux canadiens la compétence de juger les crimes de guerre et les crimes contre l'humanité dans les cas où les actes en question seraient considérés comme une infraction criminelle au Canada.

Je voudrais maintenant aborder les initiatives que mon ministère a prises au cours de l'année écoulée pour satisfaire les besoins des familles canadiennes, par l'intermédiaire de la réforme du droit de la famille.

Chaque année, au Canada, des milliers de mariages et d'unions de fait se défont. Il en résulte souvent la séparation ou le divorce. Dans de nombreux cas, les conjoints qui se séparent ou divorcent sont incapables de s'entendre par eux-mêmes sur la garde des enfants, le droit de visite du parent ou de la mère qui n'a pas la garde, et sur la pension alimentaire à l'égard du conjoint ou des enfants. Dans ce cas, un tribunal peut rendre une ordonnance familiale fixant la pension alimentaire, les dispositions de garde ou le droit de visite. Malheureusement, un grand nombre de ces ordonnances ne sont pas respectées au Canada. Il s'agit là d'une responsabilité provinciale et territoriale, mais avec l'adoption de la Loi d'aide à l'exécution des ordonnances et des accords familiaux, le Parlement a mis en place le cadre législatif qui permettra au gouvernement fédéral de faciliter le processus.

Ainsi que je l'ai signalé lors de notre dernière rencontre, loi a reçu la sanction royale en 1986 et la partie I, qui autorise la divulgation de certains renseignements contenus dans une banque d'information fédérale désignée dans le but de permettre de retrouver ceux qui enfreignent ces ordonnances ou accords, fut promulguée en 1987.

La loi est maintenant pleinement en vigueur avec la promulgation de la partie II, cette année. Celle-ci permet inquisition. What is necessary is to turn the bright light of publicity on those who would exploit our fellow Canadians.

Something about which we must all surely be aware is that many of the activities of organized crime in Canada hurt the poor and defenceless in particular. Organized crime is being addressed by a Bill still before the House, that is, Bill C-61, an Act to amend the Criminal Code, the Food and Drugs Act and the Narcotic Control Act. This Bill, among other things, addresses the seizures of criminals' profits as well as money laundering. But we have yet to see this Bill available for third reading debate.

Canada still lags behind both the United States and Italy where organized crime has been examined and legislation enacted. The present Secretary of State for External Affairs (Mr. Clark), when he was in opposition, called for a royal commission into organized crime. So did the late Right Hon. Diefenbaker when he was in opposition. But there has never been a national commission into organized crime in Canadian history. We have had two provincial inquiries, one in Montreal and one in Ontario, the Waisberg Commission, which reported, I believe, in 1973. Both of these commissions were very effective in bringing to public attention abuses in the construction trade and other legitimate trades and unions which had been infiltrated by members of organized crime. It is this white light of publicity that will be one of the greatest deterrents to organized crime. When citizens are informed, they can protect themselves and, indeed, more public support and public pressure is needed.

Criminals fear the exposure of their crimes and the resulting efforts by society to limit profitability. The history of what has happened when organized crime has gotten into legitimate business is full of dangerous and unpleasant situations. When organized crime is involved in contract bidding in the construction industry, inferior materials can be used and lives can be lost. The corruption of public officials is necessary for this to happen and the corruption of public officials and business is very difficult to uncover. Last October, in the course of debate, the Hon. Member for St. Catharines (Mr. Reid), described how business people, well known in the community, may be drawn innocently into the circle of organized crime by the prospects of large profits, not always knowing that the links to criminal organizations exist. Poor people find themselves drawn into organized crime. They borrow, they gamble, they then find they are being pressured to do unacceptable things. In Canada and in other countries, organized criminals are protected by using legal businesses to mask their activities.

To look outside of Canada at things that have happened elsewhere in the world, I will point out that in the fall of 1986, most Members here, I think, were reading about the situation of the European Economic Community where millions of dollars a year were being drained from the Community by the very ingenious use by organized crime of the common agricultural policy in Europe. Criminals are ingenious, and if they have officials in place who can give them information about how certain systems work, they are able to exploit the system.

Something else was happening at the same time as the European Economic Community was able to pinpoint the involvement by organized crime in this exploitation and abuse of a particular compensation measure under the common agriculture policy. In Britain people were becoming concerned about the organized structure of the United States illicit drug industry moving into Britain.

To go back a little further, in 1982, an Italian banker was found hanging from a bridge in Blackfriars, London. It was never determined whether this was suicide or murder. But you will remember, Mr. Speaker, this banker was the head of the Vatican Bank. In fact, the Italian Justice Ministry later issued arrest warrants for senior personnel of that bank. This was again proven to be a situation in which the tentacles of organized crime had extended even into the Vatican's own bank.

Members of this House who have read the book Mob Rule by James Dubro will be aware of incidents that have happened in Canada in which criminals have talked about laundering their money through apparently legitimate businesses. They have also talked about their practices in corrupt registration of deeds. Much of this depends on having an official in place who is controlled by these individuals. Without someone in a key position some of these schemes would fail.

Members of this House have been lobbied on behalf of organized crime, but innocently. One particular Member of the House whose integrity is absolutely beyond question was asked by local business people who were well respected and by a priest to write to the Solicitor General asking for special treatment for a prisoner on the grounds of the prisoner's youth and inexperience. That prisoner was a key figure in organized crime who is well known now to have ordered murders from his cell and who was himself subsequently killed by a rival gang. One could go on.

We are all aware that from time to time criminals will allege that they had a judge or a policeman in their pocket. In many cases this allegation is totally without foundation. It is merely a matter of boasting and trying to appear more powerful to the people they are trying to impress. However, it may not always be boasting. While the question exists it should be examined.

I repeat what I said at the outset. I certainly would not want to see, and I know that no Member of the House would want to see, a special committee of the Senate and of the House of Commons used in any way as a fishing expedition or used in any way to endanger people's reputations without full proof. But the mere fact that such a committee was known to be sitting, was known to be willing to receive witnesses, would itself cast a very bright light of publicity on the activities of organized crime and would act as a deterrent.

We have certainly seen that whenever politicians have shown the courage to tackle organized crime they have been able to win. We need only look to that extraordinarily brave

Italian mayor in Palermo who in spite of threats to him and his family went ahead in standing up to organized crime. The implications have been tremendous, both in the United and in Italy.

We also have to remember, as my colleague from Winnipeg pointed out in a previous debate on this subject, now that it is less profitable and less safe for organized criminals to ply their trade in the United States and in Italy they will be looking for other places to move to and other sources of influence. Canada must be prepared for this. I suggest that the establishment of a special joint committee of the House of Commons and the Senate to examine this whole subject could only be a useful and constructive one.

Mrs. Pauline Browes (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of the Environment): Mr. Speaker, I appreciate this opportunity to address the House on the motion of the Hon. Member for Trinity (Miss Nicholson) for a parliamentary inquiry into organized crime. Much of the organized criminal activity in Canada involves the supplying of illegal goods and services, gambling, loan sharking, drugs, prostitution, pornography, and other forms of vice are included. Press reports indicate that organized crime is also involved in legitimate business with the purpose to monopolize services and manipulate prices. Within these structures activity is not dependent upon any one individual, and the criminal activity will continue to flourish even if one or more of the principals is removed.

We also know that persons involved in organized crime represent a wide variety of backgrounds and origins. They are groups of criminals, some working within structures as complex as those of some large corporations and subject to internal laws which are rigidly enforced. Their actions are well thought out conspiracy aimed at gaining control over fields of activity in order to amass profits.

All Canadians are concerned that organized criminals be thwarted, exposed, punished, and incapacitated to show that their business will not be tolerated in Canada. But I ask, Mr. Speaker, is the way the Hon. Member for Trinity suggests the best way to deal with organized crime in Canada?

Some Canadians, perhaps influenced by media, may have vastly inflated views of the extent of organized crime in Canada. While I do not want to minimize the threat posed by organized crime in Canada, particularly with respect to drug trafficking, the combined law enforcement efforts of the various orders of government in Canada are increasingly effective in controlling organized crime.

A major problem with inquiries of the nature proposed here is that they attract a great deal of public attention. There are public hearings, daily reports in the media, and discussions of the latest revelations on national news and interview programs which could sensationalize the issue and undermine the work of law enforcement authorities.

A parliamentary committee collects information. It is not a court of law where the rules of evidence are strictly applied. When there is a breach of criminal conduct only a trial, where a defence can be made public, satisfies the Canadian sense of justice.

Therefore, because the rules of evidence are less rigorous in parliamentary inquiries than those applicable to Canadian courts, inquiries have to be handled very carefully. Moreover, evidence educed before such an inquiry could not be used in court proceedings and thus is of little value from a law enforcement perspective.

Moreover, it is likely that a parliamentary inquiry would unnecessarily alarm Canadians by creating the impression that organized crime has not been adequately addressed by Canadian police and the courts. In addition, I am concerned that an inquiry would tend to deflect both attention and resources away from ongoing intelligence and enforcement efforts, and possibly retard the investigation and prosecution of major cases.

I believe that the arrangements we already have in this country are our strength in combating organized crime. We have a federal police force, the RCMP, dealing with the problem. We have all levels of government and their enforcement agencies co-operating to provide an effective shield against organized crime. We have national intelligence systems, national police training programs, joint force operations, and a host of other mechanisms. Major institutions, such as the Canadian banking community, are examining ways and means of minimizing the extent to which they can be used to launder money.

Those efforts are not widely appreciated and reported on in the media. In Canada, we tend to proceed more quietly and with less fanfare than in the United States.

In my view the approach of Canadian law enforcement authorities to organized crime is effective. It focuses efforts and resources and reflects excellent co-operation between all jurisdictions in the prevention, detection, investigation, and prosecution of organized crime figures. Enforcement policy and activities operate to preserve the confidence of Canadians in the integrity of our social, political and economic institutions as the major influences constraining the corruption that organized crime attempts to promote.

Key to this is the integrity of Canada's police, courts, and other law enforcement institutions as our front line defence against organized crime. Fortunately, these institutions have been and remain free of corruption, and we must sustain policy and programs to ensure that it will never become a country in which the underworld can take root.

The Government recognizes the Hon. Member's legitimate concerns respecting organized crime. A parliamentary inquiry would add little to the mechanisms already in place to deal with organized crime. Rather, this House should support and encourage the federal and provincial Governments in their law enforcement activities, including the expeditious handling of the proceeds of crime and mutual legal assistance legislation which are designed to make the law more effective in dealing with organized crime.

While I am confident that the motion put forward by the Hon. Member for Trinity reflects serious concern over the extent of organized crime in Canadian society and in advancing measures to facilitate enforcement efforts, the Hon. Member can be assured that members of the Canadian police community and other dedicated criminal justice professionals are dealing competently in their response to the problem. They have the confidence of this Government and merit the support of all Members of the House, and Canadians generally.

I believe that it would not be in the best interest of Canadians and our efforts against organized crime to establish a parliamentary inquiry.

Mr. Jack Harris (St. John's East): Mr. Speaker, I am pleased to participate in the debate before the House on the motion of the Hon. Member for Trinity (Miss Nicholson). In looking carefully at the motion I see are not talking about an over-all investigation into organized crime in this country. Canada is a very different country from that south of the border in the United States of America. Many of our images of organized crime come from the United States and perhaps from things that we as children may have seen on television, for those of us who had television when we were children, or read about from south of the border.

Television programs, movies, and books all give us a picture of organized crime, violence and essentially corruption that may result, in addition to the terror, murder, and death that is caused by the activities of people engaged in organized crime. That is one image that we have of organized crime, as I say, mostly coming from south of the border, but more and more we also hear of the activities of organized crime in Canada.

When one looks closely at the motion proposed by the Hon. Member for Trinity, an over-all investigation into organized crime and the extent of organized crime is not what is being suggested, but rather an inquiry into the extent to which organized crime is connected to the legislative, judicial, and administrative institutions of Canadian society. That is a very directed question and I would submit a very timely one, given the nature of this Parliament and the type of changes that are taking place in the way legislative decisions are made in this country.

As a result of the recent reforms to the House of Commons, as a further result of the greater efforts at lobbying individual Members and Governments that have taken place only in the last several years, we are seeing effective means whereby individuals, corporations, or groups with large sums of money, however they may get it, can use that money to influence the decision-making of this Parliament, of the Cabinet, and of the Government.

If that can be done at this level of Canadian society, at what we regard as the highest level of democratic decision-making in the country, at the level of the federal Parliament, and if those lobbying efforts can be made which are financed by funds collected in various ways or coming from corporate coffers, then we must be careful to ensure that any activity of that nature, that any influencing attempted on the legislative, judicial, and administrative bodies, and on the institutions of Canadian society which guarantee us the democracy, is tightly controlled, regulated, and insulated from the activities of those who would seek to corrupt governmental, institutional, and administrative decision-making in this country.

As we know, so many of the decisions that are most important in this country are not made in this legislature or by the Cabinet, because it is impossible for these decisions to be made. There are numerous administrative tribunals and boards. The CRTC makes numerous decisions which affect the corporate viability and profitability of Canadian corporations whether they be privately or publicly owned, or owned by a consortium. The operation of those companies and institutions are affected by many administrative decisions made outside this House.

If we look only at the House of Commons, we increasingly see an incredible effort to influence the decisions of Members of the House. We saw it most recently with the tobacco Bills, C-51 and C-204. There was extensive lobbying of individual Members, and I believe that will increase, perhaps to the extent that it is carried on in the United States where thousands of lobbyists in Washington attempt to influence the decision-makers in the Senate and House of Representatives.

I believe a study of the effect of organized crime on institutions is not a narrow point but a focused point. This is a timely motion moved by the Hon. Member for Trinity. There will be an increased focus of attention on how Members of Parliament and members of the Cabinet are making decisions that affect what happens in Canada.

There has been a rise in the number of corporations that are involved in the decisions that are made behind closed doors on the Hill. Many of these corporations include many former powerful federal and provincial politicians.

We know that organized crime is active in this country but we cannot limit an inquiry of this nature into the kind of godfather, Mafia-type activity with which we associate organized crime.

The definition of organized crime urged upon us by the Member for Trinity involved two or more people working together to effect an illegal purpose. That is somewhat the definition of conspiracy. Any conspiracy where two or more people get together for an illegal purpose is an organized criminal activity.

We must also consider organized crime in relation to corporate activity, whether it is in the area of environmental pollution or the breaking of environmental laws in an organized way by corporate decision-making or by criminal neglect on the part of corporate boards or management. That too is an organized crime and we must be vigilant about that type of activity as well.

When organizations that violate environmental laws, health and safety laws, or laws protecting workers, band together to try to influence the Members of the House, committees of the House or influence the Government to relax enforcement procedures, that too is evidence of organized crime influencing the legislative and administrative institutions of Canadian society.

The Hon. Member who spoke before me was concerned about the danger that this motion may scare people. Other Members may debate organized crime in this country and the extent to which it should be addressed. I think we should focus on what the motion says, which is to consider to what extent organized criminal activity is connected to the legislative, judicial and administrative institutions of Canadian society.

This would be a timely inquiry and one that should consider the activities of lobbyists and lobbying groups. I think this question ought to be studied and a joint committee of this Parliament and the other place would be the appropriate body to study it. I support the motion.

Mr. Barry Turner (Ottawa—Carleton): Mr. Speaker, no one can dispute that there is organized crime in Canada. However, the motion before us today would seem to suggest that Canada does not have enough legal mechanisms to counter organized crime and those who live by it.

The mechanisms we have may not be perfect, but they are continually being improved to ensure that Canadians can live in a safe country.

[Translation]

Mr. Speaker, perhaps I may describe, for the benefit of the Hon. Member for Trinity, a few of the mechanisms that already exist for investigating and fighting organized crime. The police, Crown counsel and the regulatory authorities have used these mechanisms successfully to render harmless those criminals who would otherwise profit from society's illicit lusts and cravings.

[English]

First, let us take the Criminal Code. It contains, in section 31(2), a provision which enables the court to declare "forfeit" the possession of property obtained by crime. Similarly, the Narcotic Control Act allows for the seizure of anything relating to an offence under the Act. Clever use of the provisions of these two Acts has led to the ill-gotten gains of the organized criminal drug trafficker being seized by the courts.

The Member for Trinity (Miss Nicholson) spoke also of the ingenuity of the criminal. I dare say that we have a tremendous amount of ingenuity in our police forces and our research institutions. As they develop more effective techniques of criminal analysis, that ingenuity is on the leading edge of keeping up with and in fact ahead of the criminal element that exists in our country.

Another section of the Criminal Code allows for the same punishment to be given for a conspiracy to commit an offence as for the offence itself. This is a particularly valuable weapon against organized crime because it allows police to be proactive in their investigations. By the means of legal wiretaps, they can follow the planning of a crime and then step in and arrest the offenders before the crime itself has been actually committed. This can stop illicit drugs hitting the street, release the loan shark victim from the threat of violence, and prevent the bookie from laying off his bets with another organized criminal in the United States. In addition, the whole organized criminal gang can be prosecuted at the same time as co-conspirators.

[Translation]

In the past ten years, this tactic has been used successfully against organized criminals. Thanks to the help of judges who are more inclined to impose severe penalties on drug traffickers and want to acquire a better understanding of the mechanisms of organized crime, there have been some real mopping-up operations recently.

[English]

I used the words peines plus sévères. I call upon the Justices of our country to vigorously enforce severe penalties which I believe are the deterrent element.

In one Canadian jurisdiction, 400 organized criminals of one sort or another were put behind bars, rendered inactive, or induced to flee this country to escape prosecution. All this within five years of the decision being taken to declare legal war on organized crime.

The criminal courts are not the only battle front on which the war is being waged. Neither are all the soldiers, police and prosecutors. As vendors of illegal goods and services, organized criminals frequently cross swords with the regulatory agencies in our country, both federal and provincial. Customs and income tax officers, stock exchange and liquor licensing officials are just as involved in suppressing organized criminal activity as are police officers and Crown attorneys.

There is a program you may know of, Sir, called Crime Stoppers which evolved from the U.S. It is now very successfully established in the National Capital Region in co-operation with the public, police forces, the judiciary and the legal community. I want to mention Richard Raymond, from Raymond Steel, Bruce Hillary, Sketchley Cleaners, Sgt. Harrison of the Ottawa Police Force, Gary Grant from Sheffield Graphics and Doris Johnson from Crime Stoppers, all of whom have played a major, private role in making this program in Ottawa a most successful one in attacking the criminal element in the National Capital Region. In fact, it is the most successful one of its kind in North America. All of the individuals and officials I have mentioned are fundamental to the task of tracing the financial exploits, the business deals, the empire building, the cheating and the lying and the scams of the organized criminal. These almost invisible officials and individuals patiently weed out the liquor licence application of known criminals who are seeking it for a bar where the real business is to sell and push drugs. They develop evidence to collect the thousands of dollars of tax on undeclared illicit income. They bring about the dispersion of trading in phoney stock and seize consignments of heroine or other contraband coming into the country's ports of entry.

All this activity incapacitates the organized criminal without fanfare, without drama and usually without the public ever knowing about it. These are the concerned officials and citizens of our country. Regulatory agencies and administrative tribunals do not always make front page news. You know as well as I, Mr. Speaker, that the RCMP always get their man or woman. What they need are more resources to allow them to do that. They do not want to see more public funds spent on expensive task forces to tell them what they should be doing. They know what they should be doing. They need more help and more money.

In the area of legislation, the Hon. Member for Trinity made reference to the fact that the Minister of Justice (Mr. Hnatyshyn) has introduced Bill C-61, which I understand is coming back to the House shortly from committee. It focuses on the proceeds of crime legislation. It will enable the courts in certain circumstances to strip criminals of assets obtained through criminal means. The proposed legislation will allow the courts to order that the proceeds of designated drug offences and 23 Criminal Code offences be forfeited to the federal or provincial Governments. I urge my colleagues on all sides of the House to make the public aware of these efforts and to pass this legislation before a recess for the summer.

It is essential and it is long overdue. It will give the courts an opportunity to enforce more vigorously what we have to do to seize those assets acquired through criminal activity.

The Minister of Justice has also introduced Bill C-58 which will enable the implementation of the mutual legal assistance treaties discussed previously. The battle is far from won. We all know that. A concerted and continuous effort has to be made, but we are on the right track and this Government is proud of what it has tried to accomplish in this area. I am a little apprehensive that the proposed parliamentary task force might retard ongoing federal, national and international initiatives aimed at organized crime control. The key to this is to get Bill C-61 passed to give the courts and the judges more power to seize assets acquired through criminal activities. Let us throw the book at them so that your children, Sir, my children and our children's children will not have their lives affected by disgusting criminal activity that infiltrates our schools, even the primary schools where kids acquire drug habits.

Let us not set up a task force. Let us give the authorities more power, money and resources to go after the criminal element in our country.

[Translation]

Mr. Gilbert Chartrand (Verdun—Saint-Paul): Mr. Speaker, today I would like to give my assessment of the problem of organized crime. First of all, I would like to say that the Hon. Member for Trinity (Miss Nicholson) is right to be concerned about organized crime in Canada. My only criticism is the solution she suggests. In fact, an inquiry of this type would be more appropriate in the United States, where fragmented attempts to enforce legislation, lack of co-ordination, states' rights and many other elements make it very difficult to discover the extent of the problem posed by organized crime.

In Canada, we are lucky to have a very co-operative system under which policing, prosecution and enforcement bodies exchange information and co-operate in their operations. Thanks to this network we have a very clear understanding of the problem we are dealing with.

The many information sources at our disposal include the annual report prepared by Criminal Intelligence Service Canada, published by the committee on organized crime of the Canadian Association of Chiefs of Police; the annual RCMP report on drugs, Customs Canada's drugs seizure report; and the excellent reports prepared by the various services in Quebec and British Columbia dealing with organized crime. According to these sources, organized crime is not beaten but at least there is little chance it will expand.

In recent years, motorcycle gangs have been a major problem. They have become involved in all forms of organized crime, including drug trafficking, prostitution and contract killings.

The major gangs are very business-like. They increase their numbers by taking over smaller ones. Many bikers have shed the image of the sloppily-dressed trouble-maker and become clever, extremely image-conscious businessmen. The big crime organizations are also present in Canada. The most important members work in central and western Canada, but they often have contacts in many other countries. These groups are involved in what are often referred to as consensual crimes, in other words, customers agree to purchase the illicit goods or services they are offered. These crimes include drug trafficking, prostitution, gambling and loan sharking.

Although the Atlantic provinces appear to be relatively untouched by the more insidious forms of organized crime, there is nevertheless a thriving business in cigarette and alcohol smuggling. The region is also used as a dropping-off point for large cargoes of soft drugs, most of which come from the Caribbean. Youth gangs are also involved in organized crime activities and concentrate on gambling, drug trafficking and extortion. Occasionally, intense rivalry among gangs lead to multiple killings.

In a way, these gangs are similar to the motorcycle gangs. Since 1920, sociologists have held the view that youth gangs are often the first step towards much greater involvement in organized crime.

It is essential that measures be taken to prevent new generations of criminals, but I don't think an inquiry on organized crime is the answer. The emphasis must be on education and jobs.

By reducing the unemployment rate and by stressing the needs of Canada's youth, this Government has done a great deal to create a socio-economic climate that is not favourable for the development of organized crime.

Organized crime is a problem in most countries throughout the world. Even East Block countries will admit it exists there as well. There is an international network that focusses on dealing with these problems on a worldwide basis.

Thanks to this mechanism we are familiar with the problems of other countries, and it is reassuring to find that, compared to most countries, Canada has not been overrun by organized crime. Our parliamentary system, and our custom of appointing judges, Crown counsels, police officers and administrators according to merit, have given us a tradition of loyal public servants. It is one of our best defences against organized crime. We have a judicial system that we can trust and of which we can be proud. However, we must be prepared to provide the material assistance that goes along with that trust and that pride. We cannot ask our police officers, our Crown counsels and our judges to keep fighting organized crime without giving them the necessary tools, and today, these include the authority to participate with other countries in a form of judicial co-operation, and also the authority to declare forfeit the financial proceeds of organized crime. The House can give them those tools by adopting Bills C-68 and C-61. We should focus our efforts on supporting our judicial system, instead of ignoring its needs and creating a parliamentary task force.

Mr. Benno Friesen (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Employment and Immigration): Mr. Speaker, we are indebted to the Hon. Member for Trinity (Miss Nicholson) for bringing forward a very interesting motion which has to do with the calling of a special joint committee of the House of Commons and the Senate to inquire into the nature and the extent of organized crime in Canada.

I recall the opening remarks of the Hon. Member for Trinity. She pointed out that when she put forward a similar motion last year, the speeches of government Members who responded had a certain ring of similarity. She responded with some measure of disdain for that, and I do not blame her. I feel the same way about that as she does. Nevertheless, if we wanted to go back into the annals of Hansard, I suspect that we would find that about five or six years ago, she may have been guilty of the same offence. However, we do not take offence for that. I might just say that that is one of the illnesses that exists in this Chamber that we wish we would be cured of.

While the motion is an interesting one, I doubt that it is a very workable one. I say that not because we do not share the same goals. What she is talking about has an awesome ring of urgency to it. We know that organized crime does infiltrate into many segments of our society, and it causes fear and dread in many households, and it feeds on fear and recrimination if the detailed terms of any contract are not fulfilled. We know that it is an awesome problem in Canada. However, it is the kind of problem that I do not know whether we can solve or even approach through a special joint committee of the House of Commons and the Senate.

I might use as an analogy an experience I had when I was living in the United States. I attended a university in the mid-western United States and was graduated there. Upon graduation, I decided that because I could not afford to move home, I would take employment in the United States as a teacher. That was in the late 1950s when that country was still suffering from the backlash of McCarthyism.

Because of the McCarthyism earlier in the fifties, many of the states had enacted legislation which required that people who worked in any way within the public sector, people like teachers, would have to take an oath upholding the Constitution of the United States. That was an admirable goal and I do not blame those states for wanting to ensure that those who worked for the Government in any way and particularly those who were entrusted with the education of their children would also be those who respected democracy and would not endorse the violent overthrow of their Government.

The problem with the proposal, however, was that those people who respected democracy, wanted to enhance freedom, and respected the family and the rights of the children were shut out from the teaching profession, for example, if they were not American citizens. They could not help the United States by enhancing democracy and a sense of freedom within the country. However, native-born Americans, who were full citizens but may have been communists or communist sympathizers and who may have endorsed the violent overthrow of the Government, would have no compunction about taking an oath like that since their sense of morality has nothing to do with absolutes, absolute honesty or absolute truth. They would not mind taking an oath of fidelity to the Constitution of the United States and then doing everything in their power to overthrow the Government of the United States. That would not bother people like that a bit.

There we had the anomaly of people who wanted to preserve and enhance democracy in the United States being shut out if they were not citizens, and those who would have gladly created problems in the United States being willing to take an oath which they did not intend to uphold. The problem is that the proposal of the Hon. Member for Trinity, while it may not be exactly parallel to that, has a similar ring to it.

If we were to conduct public hearings across Canada of the nature the Hon. Member is proposing, those people who have been affected by organized crime would be the least likely to come forward to give testimony in a public hearing because of the nature of the problem. What person who has been caught in the grip of extortionate financiers, threatened for not keeping up extortionate payments, what person who has had his life or possessions threatened or has been told that his legs will be broken if he does not pay that 30 per cent on his loan, will come forward in a public hearing to give evidence of how organized crime is treating him in Canada? Will people like that come forward?

The nature of the problem militates against the success of the proposal. If we recall the Congressional hearings in the United States, the only people who came forward were those who were totally disguised and had been given immunity. They were people who had earlier been convicted of a crime or who were part of the family of crime in the United States and were given immunity from further prosecution or were promised protection. They were people who were plea-bargaining. They appeared because their sentences were minimized or done away with. Those Congressional hearings were at least moderately successful.

However, the proposal of the Hon. Member, while it is a goal that the Government shares and I certainly endorse, will probably not be workable. While I commend her for the goal and the ambition she is showing in trying to deal with organized crime, I think the proposal itself would not be a workable one.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: The time provided for the consideration of Private Members' Business has now expired. Pursuant to Standing Order 42(1), the order is dropped from the Order Paper.

It being three o'clock, this House stands adjourned until Monday next at eleven o'clock pursuant to Standing Order 3(1).

The House adjourned at 3 p.m.

July 7, 1988 [House of Commons]

The extradition treaty provides for a court process before the suspected or the accused person can be extradited. The standards under which these provisions are being put forward would appear to be somewhat less in terms of the gathering of evidence, investigations and other forms of mutual legal assistance.

The final point I want to make is the following. The Government has agreed that the Schedule to the Act will contain the names of states which are signatories to the treaties. If we had had the opportunity, we would have liked to have moved as well for some means of public disclosure around the power of the Government to enter into informal or temporary agreements for mutual legal assistance for periods of up to six months. This can be done either for areas not specified in the treaty—if a treaty exists—or with a country that has not signed the treaty.

Again, there is the possibility of being able to agree to the request from, let us say, a country in Central America, where there are rather undemocratic regimes, for mutual legal assistance because they feel that there are persons in this country whom they are pursuing because of some political problems in their own country. And the idea that that could be done for six months and possibly renewed thereafter—

Mr. Hnatyshyn: It is not possible.

Mr. Cassidy: —without any public disclosure under Section 6—the Minister says that it is not possible, but I am sure that that is the case. That is a very legitimate question which raises concerns with us.

According to the note that was prepared for the House of Commons in June by the Parliamentary Research Bureau, "the administrative arrangements that would be allowed under Section 6 could be negotiated and executed in total secrecy". I do not believe that that has changed.

Those are some of the concerns that we have and those are the reasons why we are not prepared to support the Bill. As indicated previously, we will agree to let the Bill go to third reading on division rather than calling a vote.

I would like the Minister of Justice (Mr. Hnatyshyn) or one of his colleagues to stand up and say, at the very least, that Canada had now determined that we are going to take an active role in negotiating those restrictions on Canadians under the McCarran Act, and in reaching for a resolution for the victims of the CIA experiments and that that would be one of the things that the Government would guarantee as part of the package for mutual legal assistance with the United States.

The Acting Speaker (Mrs. Champagne): Is the House ready for the question?

Some Hon. Members: Question.

[Translation]

Mr. Hnatyshyn moved that Bill C-58, an Act to provide for the implementation of treaties for mutual legal assistance in criminal matters and to amend the Criminal Code, the Crown Liability Act and the Immigration Act, 1976, be read the third time and do pass.

The Acting Speaker (Mrs. Champagne): Is it the pleasure of the House to adopt the motion?

CRIMINAL CODE, FOOD AND DRUGS ACT AND NARCOTIC CONTROL ACT

MEASURE TO AMEND

The House proceeded to the consideration of Bill C-61, an Act to amend the Criminal Code, the Food and Drugs Act and the Narcotic Control Act, as reported (with amendments) from the legislative committee.

The Acting Speaker (Mrs. Champagne): There are 14 motions and amendments on the Order Paper for report stage of Bill C-61, an Act to amend the Criminal Code, the Food and Drugs Act and the Narcotic Control act.

Motions Nos. 1, 2, 3, 4, 6, 7, 8, 9, 11, 12, 13 and 14, standing in the names of the Hon. Member for Burnaby (Mr. Robinson), the Hon. Member for Nickel Belt (Mr. Rodriguez) and the Hon. Member for Hamilton Mountain (Mrs. Dewar) are the same as the amendments which were moved, debated and negatived in committee. Therefore, in accordance with Standing order 114(10), they will not be selected for debate in the House.

[English]

Motion No. 5 of the Hon. Member for Burnaby (Mr. Robinson) is similar to an amendment moved at the committee stage, debated and later negatived. Although similar, this motion is sufficiently different that it shall be put to the House.

[Translation]

Motion No. 10, standing in the name of the Minister of Justice and Attorney General of Canada (Mr. Hnatyshyn), will be debated and voted on separately.

[English]

Mr. Cassidy: Madam Speaker, it was agreed that in the absence of the Member for Burnaby (Mr. Robinson) the motion could be moved by the Member for Hamilton Mountain (Ms. Dewar).

[Translation]

Mr. Grisé: Madam Speaker, on a point of order.

The Acting Speaker (Mrs. Champagne): The Parliamentary Secretary to the Deputy Prime Minister and President of the Privy Council (Mr. Grisé), on a point of order.

Mr. Grisé: Madam Speaker, after discussion among the various parties, I believe you will find there is unanimous consent for the Hon. Member for Hamilton Mountain to move the motion in the name of the Hon. Member for Burnaby.

[English]

The Acting Speaker (Mrs. Champagne): Is there unanimous consent?

Some Hon. Members: Agreed.

Ms. Marion Dewar (for Mr. Robinson) moved:

Motion No. 5

That Bill C-61 be amended in Clause 2 by striking out lines 36 and 37 and substituting the following therefor:

"judge shall require notice to be given to and shall upon request hear any persons who, in the"

She said: Madam Speaker, the purpose in asking for this amendment is that if a person has an interest in the property it should be not only a request but a demand that they be heard. That is all we are asking for. I certainly hope that the Government will agree to the amendment.

• (1600)

The other amendments which have been ruled out of order were ruled out of order because they were debated at committee. However, this one, as you have seen, Madam Speaker, and as you agree, is different enough that it would certainly make the Bill much more fair. The judge would have to hear anybody who has an interest in the property. I see the Minister nodding. I hope that the Government will agree to the amendment.

The amendments which were not allowed included references to bawdy houses and prostitution. Prostitution in this country is not illegal. If this type of recommendation were included, and the Fraser Committee report was very clear on what it would do, prostitutes would be put in the same category as victims of organized crime. If their property, which was acquired not as a result of organized crime but legally, is seized and they have not been heard, it seems important that they should be heard before there is an order put in on it.

I must admit that I am certainly not as familiar with the Bill as the Hon. Member for Burnaby (Mr. Robinson) who worked on it at committee. I apologize for that. But the measure made all sorts of sense to me and I believe that this is the type of amendment that helps to make the Bill more fair.

I will speak to the Bill as a whole after report stage is dealt with.

[Translation]

Mr. Richard Grisé (Parliamentary Secretary to Deputy Prime Minister and President of the Privy Council): Madam Speaker, on a point of order.

The Acting Speaker (Mrs. Champagne): The Parliamentary Secretary, on a point of order.

Mr. Grisé: Thank you Madam Speaker. The Hon. Member for Hamilton Mountain (Mrs. Dewar) is speaking to Motion No. 3, which the Chair has already ruled out of order.

The Acting Speaker (Mrs. Champagne): I will try to clarify the issue for the Parliamentary Secretary. It is true that in the case of Motion No. 5, the Chair's decision acknowledges there is a similarity with another amendment. However, the Chair found that there was nevertheless sufficient difference to allow Motion No. 5 to be moved again in the House.

The Minister of Justice (Mr. Hnatyshyn).

[English]

Mr. Hnatyshyn: Madam Speaker, I just want to spend a couple of minutes trying to deal with the motion which has been accepted by the Chair moved by the Hon. Member for Hamilton Mountain (Ms. Dewar) on behalf of the Hon. Member for Burnaby (Mr. Robinson).

This appears to be something which, if one were to use the logic that is put forward by the Hon. Member that it is something that is desirable, would mandate a court to take certain action, that is to say, hear people who claim to have an interest in property which is subject to deliberations before the court. However, one can understand, in terms of our judicial process, that these are questions, after all, that should be left to the courts to decide.

First, does the claimant have a sufficient prima facie basis upon which to have a hearing? Second, once that has been established, the court should have the discretion to determine the basis upon which the person claiming interest can be heard. It is up to the court, in the final analysis, to determine the merits of these cases.

If we were to put a mandatory provision such as has been suggested by the Hon. Member there would be absolutely no discretion. Anyone could walk in off the streets and say: "I have an interest in this matter" and would be able to take up the time of the court simply as a matter of right.

You point out in your ruling, Madam Speaker, that a similar matter was discussed in the course of the committee. In effect, it was voted down. But since there is some difference in the wording put forward by the Hon. Member today and because it is sufficiently different we are considering it.

We still think that this Bill in its present form, with the exception of an amendment that I want to put forward myself at report stage, achieves a reasonable balance in the interests of the state to pursue, to seize, to freeze and, in effect, to forfeit the proceeds of illicit activity. The whole function of the Bill is to allow us to overcome a situation which, on the face of it, to any Canadian looking at the present situation is absurd.

What we now have is a situation in which a person could be convicted of illegal drug trafficking, could have made an enormous amount of money out of this activity, could be convicted of the offence, served time in jail, came out and enjoyed the proceeds of the crime in circumstances in which the state has no right to attach the proceeds of that illicit activity and use the money for worth-while purposes such as public health, education and other important governmental objectives.

What happens is that we also in the same vein want to allow people who have a legitimate claim to come forward and make application to the court to establish that the moneys that are attempted to be seized by the provincial Attorney General are in fact property which should not be seized because it belongs to them. In our system, of course, there is an obligation to establish not beyond a reasonable doubt but on the basis of reasonable probabilities that there is a case for that person to make. It is always left in these circumstances for the court to hear the application. The discretion is there in the court to hear the application, by all means, but then if it is satisfied that there is a sufficient basis it will give an order.

I do not know whether there is anything accomplished by mandating every claimant, regardless of the merits of the case, to have their day in court to put forward this situation. I think that this balance is one which is understandable. It is consistent with the processes that we have in our Canadian judicial system. It allows an opportunity, a counterbalance, for legitimate third party interests to come forward and to apply to the court to have their cases heard.

I cannot say anything further. I will talk on third reading about this Bill which is, I think, a very good Bill which moves us forward in terms of fairness in the criminal justice system to allow the state to pursue and to discourage people who make large amounts of money out of illicit activity. I gave the example of drug trafficking.

This Bill is a good Bill. I wish I could be more accommodating to the Hon. Member with respect to her amendment. I think, on balance and reflection, she might agree with me that it might lead to unusual and unacceptable consequences for our judicial system. With the greatest of respect for the Hon. Member, I would like to indicate that we are not prepared to agree at this point in time.

The Acting Speaker (Mrs. Champagne): Is the House ready for the question?

Some Hon. Members: Question.

The Acting Speaker (Mrs. Champagne): Is it the pleasure of the House to adopt the motion?

Some Hon. Members: No.

Mr. Cassidy: On division.

The Acting Speaker (Mrs. Champagne): I declare the motion lost.

Motion No. 5 negatived.

Proceeds of Crime

He said: It gives me great pleasure to rise once again to speak to Bill C-61 which has been recognized as fundamental to law enforcement efforts against enterprise crime, especially drug trafficking. It is now recognized that it is long overdue. The Bill is designed to ensure that offenders are not allowed to profit from their crimes. Bill C-61 will provide effective but fair measures to ensure that crime does not pay.

At this time, I would like to commend the legislative committee that reviewed Bill C-61 and has now presented its report to the House. It is obvious that all members of the committee recognized the pressing need for this legislation, given the growth of enterprise crime in recent times. They have obviously carefully considered both the need for the new measures in the Bill and the safeguards contained therein which ensure that the interests of the accused person and the innocent third parties are protected.

Regarding the principles of the Bill, I refer Members to my remarks during second reading. Allow me to review briefly some of the major aspects of the legislation. The courts have been empowered to authorize seizure and restraint of assets upon the undertaking of the Attorney General to provide such compensation as the court deems appropriate where the case for forfeiture cannot be made out and losses to the owner or third parties are suffered. A process of immediate judicial review of these powers, upon application by the persons concerned, has been provided for and includes an opportunity for an accused person to claim the payments of reasonable living, business, and legal expenses out of the seized or restrained property.

I must point out that these types of safeguards are unprecedented in Canadian law. In addition, the rights of third parties are recognized throughout the entire process of seizure, restraint, and forfeiture. The legislation has balanced an effective forfeiture mechanism with the constitutionally protected right to counsel in a manner that is characteristic of the Government's approach to criminal matters and avoids the criticisms that have been levied at similar American legislation in this area.

The Bill also provides that a court may order the payment of a fine when forfeiture is impossible either because the offender has hidden his illicit gains or has removed them from the jurisdiction of Canadian courts.

Aside from the power to order the forfeiture of property on conviction, when the prosecution has established beyond a reasonable doubt, following a hearing, that the property in question is proceeds of crime, the Bill provides that the court may order forfeiture of the goods when the offender has died or absconded to another country.

Madam Speaker, in this regard the legislative committee has passed an amendment allowing this procedure to be applied if the offender has fled to a country that refuses to extradite him to Canada where he would stand trial in criminal court.

I think that this is a useful amendment that complies with the spirit of the act.

[English]

In recognition of the sophisticated attempts that are made to disguise the tainted sources of proceeds of crime and to invest them in so-called "legitimate" enterprises and other forms of property, the Bill creates a new offence of "laundering" that will be punishable by up to 10 years imprisonment.

In recognition of the need for assistance to law enforcement agencies in their efforts against organized and enterprise crime, the Bill has created a protection against liability for any person, such as a bank employee, who reports to the authorities activity related to proceeds of crime on condition that the belief is reasonably held. Also, a provision for access to income tax records to assist in the investigation of drug related offences has been proposed. This will only be available upon court authorization to ensure that confidentiality of these records will be protected as much as possible. All members of the committee recognized the need for special rules regarding income tax information.

These are the principal elements of Bill C-61. In conjunction with Bill C-58—which has just received third reading—concerning mutual legal assistance in criminal matters, Canada will be fulfilling her international commitment to combat organized crime, especially in the area of drug trafficking.

In this regard I find it most appropriate that at this very time officials of my Department, as well as of the Departments of National Health and Welfare, External Affairs, and the Ministry of the Solicitor General, are in Vienna, Austria, with other officials from all countries of the United Nations finalizing the Draft Convention Against Illicit Traffic in Narcotic Drugs and Psychotropic Substances which is expected to be concluded this fall. That document specifically calls for an undertaking on behalf of signatories to implement proceeds of crime legislation.

Bill C-61 represents, together with Bill C-58, Canada's commitment to the international fight against drug trafficking. I ask that Canada be allowed to join the ranks of such nations as the United Kingdom, Australia and the United States that have all recently passed similar legislation.

Let me point out once again that this Bill has finally proceeded to third reading. I trust it will be accepted by the other place and made the law of the land. Similar attempts have been made by previous Governments to bring in legislation in connection with forfeiture of illicit proceeds of crime. This Bill is the synthesis of much consultation by Members of Parliament, in particular the Hon. Member for Etobicoke—Lakeshore (Mr. Boyer) and others who have been of great assistance to me with the legislation.

This Bill is a balanced and fair piece of legislation which does not contain some of the excesses seen in previous legislation. It is one in which the rights of parties are fully respected. There is an an effective mechanism for getting at the illicit proceeds of crime. It does not expand itself to the extent that it is done in the United States. I think this is the Canadian way. We want to make sure, when we are attacking the proceeds of crime, that we do so in a fair way respecting the rights of individuals to ownership of property legitimately obtained.

I commend this legislation at third reading. I hope it will receive the unanimous consent of all Parties. I thank Hon. Members who have been so helpful in their deliberations, especially the Parliamentary Secretary, the Hon. Member for Chambly (Mr. Grisé), who has been in the forefront of the legislative committee's work on Bill C-58 and to whom I owe a great debt of gratitude. He is an outstanding parliamentarian, a man who commands respect of Members on both sides of the House and who does a lot of work for me. I appreciate the great assistance that he gives.

Ms. Marion Dewar (Hamilton Mountain): Madam Speaker, I only wish this Bill contained all the great attributes to which the Hon. Minister has alluded. But we are very disappointed on this side of the House. It could have been a much better Bill.

First, I think this kind of legislation is long overdue in Canada. It is something that we must see implemented. I want to commend the Minister and the Parliamentary Secretary for the amendment which they accepted in recognizing that if a person were found innocent the Government would be required to see that he or she was compensated for loss. That is very important. I also commend the Hon. Member for Burnaby (Mr. Robinson) for putting the amendment forward.

I am disappointed with some of the inclusions. I refer particularly to procurement and bawdy houses. It has been very clear in studies done in this country over the last decade—the latest one being the Fraser Commission Report—is that no direct connections have been made between organized crime and prostitution. We recognize that prostitution is not legal in Canada. But it has not be tied to organized crime. Some prostitutes have been seen to be operating very much in an entrepreneurial sense. The money they have acquired has been money which they have invested and used to look after families and this kind of thing. The Fraser Commission was very clear that if something specific were put in this legislation it would drive prostitutes into organized crime networks and connections. That is something about which we are very concerned. Evidence was brought forward in the committee and it was addressed at that time.

I am very disappointed that the Conservative Government did the royal cave-in to the banks. You can drive a truck full of money to a bank and unload it with no accountability as to where those proceeds came from. Even the administration in the United States that we on this side of the House have often criticized made U.S. banks accountable. It is a shame and a disgrace that the Government has not made the banks accountable for this kind of thing. Many things will be whitewashed if you cannot trace them through the financial institutions.

The Minister has not rushed with this Bill. We had first reading of the Bill in 1987. Here we are at the last minute in an extended session trying to pass the Bill. The Minister has had plenty of time to recognize that the banks should be held accountable.

In 1981 the Government asked that a study be done. The report to the Justice Department in 1983 said:

> —Without clear track and identify the movement of profits by sophisticated criminals, it will be hard for police and the courts to effectively use the—"freeze and seize" provisions.
> Without clear powers to identify and track the proceeds of crime, it is difficult to connect the proceeds to a particular offence or to a particular criminal.
> Given this obstacle, it follows that it would be equally difficult to apply provisions for freezing, seizure and forfeiture of criminal proceeds.

It will be very difficult to implement the objectives of the Bill before us. The senior counsel at the Bank of Nova Scotia said:

> We're efficient at what we do. As such we're a good target of money launderers.

The bank is admitting to laundering, yet the Government has chosen to do nothing about it and has not made the banks accountable. My understanding is that the banks objected to the large amount of paper work. If that is the kind of thing that we are accepting as a legitimate excuse to not make the banks accountable, we should be ashamed of ourselves.

For the record, Madam Speaker, I would like to quote Mr. Rocky Pollack of the Canadian Bar Association. The Bar Association was very concerned. Mr. Pollack said:

> I must say that everyone to whom I spoke, and it is not a representative population, was amazed that, as was reported I think in the paper last week, you can literally back up a truck to a Canadian bank, unload all those dollar bills in the back of the truck, and get a deposit slip, and so on, and it is all private and secret; nobody knows about it. That is rather amazing. That is my only comment.

We had the Hon. Member for Kitchener (Mr. Reimer) saying that he too felt strongly that the Bill had major loopholes and he wished the Government would amend it. When we get those kinds of comments from government Members, surely we must recognize that the Government has done a royal cave-in to the banks. Under no circumstances must the Government ask the banks to be accountable.

That is not the kind of thing New Democrats like to see in legislation. New Democrats believe that all Canadians should be accountable. We think it is very nice to draft legislation, but we will be unable to implement the intent of it because of grand loopholes like those found in tax reform.

The intent of the Bill is good. The goals and objectives are real. They are the kinds of things we like to see. We feel that the Bill is very inadequate when we cannot make the financial institutions accountable to the Government of Canada. We know that nothing different will happen. We know that the banks will still be the source through which people can launder money and remain attractive to criminals. I take exception to the Minister's comments that this is the Canadian way. The Canadian way is much more accountable and not becoming the protectors of people who want to launder money.

The Acting Speaker (Mrs. Champagne): Is the House ready for the question?

Some Hon. Members: Question.

The Acting Speaker (Mrs. Champagne): Is it the pleasure of the House to adopt the motion?

Some Hon. Members: Agreed.

Motion agreed to and Bill read the third time and passed.

FOOD AND DRUGS ACT

MEASURE TO AMEND

The House resumed from Thursday, June 9, consideration of the motion of the Hon. Member for Hamilton East (Ms. Copps) that Bill C-289, an Act to amend the Food and Drugs Act (list of ingredients), be read a second time and referred to a legislative committee.

The Acting Speaker (Mrs. Champagne): When the House last considered Bill C-289, the Hon. Member for Scarborough East (Mr. Stackhouse) had the floor. Resuming debate, the Hon. Member for Kent (Mr. Hardey).

[English]

Mr. Elliott Hardey (Kent): Madam Speaker, I rise today to speak on this Private Member's Bill, Bill C-289, which is intended to amend the Food and Drugs Act regarding the listing of ingredients. The most important aspect of Private Members' Business, of course, is the opportunity for Members of Parliament from all Parties to develop and promote new laws and ideas together or, if some choose, to speak and vote against them and to do so as individual Members regardless of what side of the House they sit on. It is certainly a refreshing exercise and one that we all look forward to participating in.

I want to compliment the Hon. Member for Hamilton East (Ms. Copps) for bringing forward this issue. It is a matter that I support. It is an issue of sensitivity which is receiving increased attention by health professionals and food regulators due to concerns raised by the public at large as well as the print and visual media.

I have noticed that previous speakers have referred to tragedies resulting from food sensitivity reactions in their ridings or in ridings nearby. I too witnessed the grief of a family who lost their nine-year-old daughter last October. Kelly Chinnick was allergic to nuts and she was unaware that peanut butter was in the icing of a cake she tasted at a Thanksgiving celebration at her school. The reaction was fast and no one could help her. I know first hand that this type of grief never really subsides. As a caring society, we must do everything we can to help the Chinnicks and other families who find themselves in such distress.

In order to be of assistance, at first it seemed that I simply had to research and assess this problem in a practical way and surely some answers would surface. As I began that research, I found that the Minister of National Health and Welfare (Mr. Epp) was not only aware of the increased prevalence of food allergy reactions but was also very concerned. He had already issued instructions to his Department to determine how much real increase in food-sensitivity reactions there had been, how much was perceived due to the availability of better instrumentation and diagnoses and how much was due to the population as a whole becoming more sensitive for one reason or another.

I found as well that the Standing Committee on Health and Welfare was already conducting a study on the feasibility of mandatory labelling of food products sold in restaurants and fast-food outlets. Non-medical components used as fill found in prescription drugs, both brand name and generic, were also under study, and representatives from the Canadian Restaurant Association and the Canadian Pharmaceutical Association as well as the Minister of National Health and Welfare were called as witnesses.

I also found that difficulties in assessing the problem also included documenting the specific incidents, determining if the adverse response was related to the consumption of foods in the first instance, and if so, to which food component. Health professionals have to play a detective game, the complexity of which would put any amateur sleuth to shame. They have to consider such things as age, sex, geographic location, racial origin, income levels, lifestyle, diseased state and much more to even properly assess the question. Of course, the question is, what is the rationale for labelling and what needs to be labelled.

The Government is seriously trying to wrestle with these problems in the face of pressure from individuals or groups proposing any number of quick solutions. The Government does not want to end up with an arbitrary system of disclosure that is patently and scientifically unsound. It is likely that a large proportion of food-sensitivity reactions are due to relatively few foods or food components. On the other hand, this is offset by the potential of almost any food to elicit a food-sensitivity response in an occasional individual.

EMERGENCIES BILL

MESSAGE FROM COMMONS

The Hon. the Speaker informed the Senate that a message had been received from the House of Commons to acquaint the Senate that they had agreed, without further amendments, to the amendments made by the Senate to Bill C-77, to authorize the taking of special temporary measures to ensure safety and security during national emergencies and to amend other Acts in consequence thereof.

CRIMINAL CODE
FOOD AND DRUGS ACT
NARCOTIC CONTROL ACT

BILL TO AMEND—FIRST READING

The Hon. the Speaker informed the Senate that a message had been received from the House of Commons with Bill C-61, to amend the Criminal Code, the Food and Drugs Act and the Narcotic Control Act.

Bill read first time.

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, when shall this bill be read the second time?

Hon. Nathan Nurgitz: Honourable senators, with leave of the Senate and notwithstanding rule 44(1)(f), I move that this bill be read the second time later this day.

The Hon. the Speaker: Is leave granted, honourable senators?

Hon. Royce Frith (Deputy Leader of the Opposition): Honourable senators, with respect to the question of leave on these bills—and I say "these bills" because I hope the Senate will give me leave to mention that there are, in all, coming from the House of Commons today, Bill C-61, Bill C-124, Bill C-75 and Bill C-58. The Deputy Leader of the Government and I discussed the anticipated legislative program for this week and we understand—although not officially—that the House of Commons will be sending us a fair amount of legislation this week and that the house leaders in the other place are attempting to complete their work on the other side before adjournment, either this week or early next week.

That, of course, will mean the adoption in the other place of quite a lengthy and important menu of legislation, and we in the Senate will try to deal with and have ready for Royal Assent as much of that menu as it is reasonable to expect from us. However, I believe that the Deputy Leader of the Government and I are agreed that it is impossible for us to have the total program ready for Royal Assent or otherwise dealt with in such a short time. Therefore, he and I have agreed that this week we will try to abridge the time for debate to see if we can at least help the government with legislation that—famous last words!—is non-controversial.

Hon. C. William Doody (Deputy Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, Senator Frith is quite correct. We did have a discussion this morning. It is our hope to move along as much of this legislation as we reasonably can. I agree that some bills are perhaps more controversial than they appeared to be at the beginning—

Senator Frith: And more meaty!

Senator Doody: —but that will evolve as we go along. Therefore, without making any major commitment on either side at this point, it is our hope to move the legislative program that we now have before us fairly quickly, and as additional legislation comes up from the other place we will look at it and judge it on its merits.

At this point I can see no reason why we cannot hope for a speedy disposition of the legislation before us, and I hope that everything else that comes up can be treated equally quickly.

The Hon. the Speaker: Is leave granted, honourable senators?

Hon. Senators: Agreed.

Motion agreed to and bill placed on the Orders of the Day for second reading later this day.

CANADA LABOUR CODE

BILL TO AMEND—FIRST READING

The Hon. the Speaker informed the Senate that a message had been received from the House of Commons with Bill C-124, an Act to amend the Canada Labour Code.

Bill read first time.

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, when shall this bill be read the second time?

On motion of Senator Doody, notwithstanding rule 44(1)(f), bill placed on the Orders of the Day for second reading later this day.

Second reading of the Bill C-72, An Act respecting the status and use of the official languages of Canada.—(Honourable Senator Doody).

Hon. C. William Doody (Deputy Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, could that order stand in the name of Senator Murray? He has asked that he be given the right to speak on this order tomorrow.

Hon. Royce Frith (Deputy Leader of the Opposition): Agreed.

Order stands in name of Senator Murray.

CRIMINAL CODE
FOOD AND DRUGS ACT
NARCOTIC CONTROL ACT

BILL TO AMEND—SECOND READING—DEBATE ADJOURNED

Hon. Nathan Nurgitz moved the second reading of Bill C-61, to amend the Criminal Code, the Food and Drugs Act and the Narcotic Control Act.

He said: Honourable senators, having moved second reading, I should like to explain that the purpose of this legislation is to strike at the profits generated by certain types of criminal offences. The legislation will do this by providing law enforcement agencies with the necessary powers to investigate, freeze and seize the proceeds of certain crimes and by providing the courts with the powers to confiscate the proceeds of these crimes.

It is an initiative that is both firm and fair. The need to deal appropriately with this growing problem has been tempered with the requirement to insure that the fundamental principles of due process are maintained throughout the entire forfeiture process. It is obvious that these measures are sensitive to all of the protections of our criminal justice system, including the developing principles of the Canadian Charter of Rights and Freedoms.

First I wish to comment on the "proceeds of crime" initiative in the international context. In relation to the growing world tragedy of drug abuse, the United Nations has recognized the need to approach the problem on a global level. It is apparent that drug traffickers ignore international borders and the reality of drug abuse will continue to flourish and grow unless all the nations of the world confront it with appropriate criminal sanctions.

In response to this, the United Nations is presently in the process of developing a draft Convention Against Illicit Traffic in Narcotic Drugs and Psychotropic Substances. I, for one, would expect Canada to continue to show leadership in this area by means of a firm commitment to the proposals of that Convention.

In recognition of the fundamental need to prevent and repress the acquisition and laundering of the proceeds of illicit traffic in drugs, the principal undertaking of participating nations is to adopt legislative measures to facilitate the identification, tracing, freezing, seizing and forfeiture of such proceeds. It is clear, therefore, that Canada has anticipated her commitment to the international community of nations with the presentation of this legislation.

I trust honourable senators will allow Canada to join the other members of the United Nations in this important endeavour by allowing the proceeds of crime proposal expeditious passage into law. In addition, this legislation echoes the provisions of the draft convention by authorizing the pre-trial maintenance of the status quo by allowing for court-authorized freezing and seizure of the proceeds of crime. All of these elements of the legislation are reflective of the United Nations' model.

Similar comments apply to the provisions in the bill that create the inference from an unexplained increase in net worth, so that there will be certain procedures for the appointment of managers in conjunction with restraining orders; all of this to stop the fleeing of funds once criminals know they have been detected.

I note that the many built-in protections for third parties are also a feature of the draft convention as well as of this piece of legislation. I am pleased that this bill will enable Canada to assist the United Nations in the efforts that are being made to rid the world of the tragedy flowing from the abuse of drugs by striking out at the very lifeblood of these profiteers: their financial base.

Honourable senators, the communiqué of the 1986 meeting of Commonwealth Law Ministers held in Harare, Zimbabwe, last summer calls on member states to strengthen legal provisions to enable the proceeds of crime to be identified and forfeited, especially in light of the growth of drug abuse and illicit drug trafficking. That communiqué went on to note the concern that these drug trafficking empires posed to the social fabric and security of many countries. One only has to look at the situation in Colombia, where a criminal organization such as the Medillan Cartel, through its involvement and virtual control of the North American cocaine market, is able to function freely, bringing the judiciary, the police and the democratic process to their knees by acts of terrorism and murder. Democracy cannot survive in the face of the strength of such empires based on the trafficking of drugs.

In any event, I note that this bill is consistent with the resolve that has been established in the Commonwealth of Nations to deal appropriately with the international problem of traffic in drugs. We owe this much to the developing nations of the Third World.

With the presentation of this legislation, Canada now joins the list of western democracies to implement a procedure for the confiscation of the proceeds of crime. The most obvious example that we can think of is the RICO or Racketeer Influenced and Corrupt Organizations Statutes in the United States of America. I note that, although this Canadian proposal has the same objective in mind as the American legislation, that is, the elimination of criminal profiteering, it does so in a uniquely "Made in Canada" fashion: the proceeds of crimes—and only the proceeds of crime—will be forfeited under our legislation rather than entire interests in enterprises that may have only a minimal connection with criminal activity. In the Canadian context, the sanction of forfeiture will be proportional to the criminal involvement. Also, the proposal does not target instruments of crime, which can be an unfair application. I believe honourable senators will be impressed by the balance, as well as the firmness, of these measures.

The United Kingdom has recently passed legislation to deal with the problem of the proceeds of crime. In the drug area, the Drug Trafficking Offences Act, 1986 was proclaimed in force in January of 1987. It includes many measures that are similar to this legislation. In particular, it provides for a form of pre-trial seizure of the proceeds of crime. This element of pre-trial restraint appears to be a fundamental feature of proceeds of crime legislation in all countries, including the United States and the United Kingdom. The collective opinion is that it is necessary, like pre-trial detention, in order to make the forfeiture provisions effective.

I note, returning to the situation in England, that they have a provision that is similar, to some extent, to the proposal in our legislation—to allow for the imposition of an alternative fine as a substitute for the proceeds of crime that have been placed out of reach of the authorities. The British experience must be similar to the Canadian one to foresee the need to create this incentive in the minds of enterprise criminals to make their proceeds of crime available to the courts for forfeiture.

When we look at Australia, there are proceeds of crime forfeiture statutes in virtually all of the states and at the federal level. All of them have the same fundamental features that the Canadian proposal will have, including pre-trial restraint of the proceeds of crime. When one looks at the New South Wales legislation, one will see that it too provides for the confiscation of the proceeds of crime of an absconding offender. That feature is found in our bill as well.

In closing, I do not think that anyone would argue against the suggestion that each one of these countries that already have proceeds of crime legislation is, to use words from the opening paragraph of our Charter of Rights and Freedoms, a "free and democratic society." That is obvious. They have all seen fit to attempt to limit the growth of enterprise crime by confiscating its profits from the hands of the criminal.

I trust that all honourable senators will approach this legislation with the same unanimity as the members of the British Parliament did in granting speedy passage to their Drug Trafficking Offences Act, 1986. Not only would this show our maturity as a nation but it would, we hope, be noted by the criminal element that Canada treats the proceeds of crime as seriously as do other nations of the world.

Honourable senators, this bill was passed Thursday last, July 7, in the House of Commons, on division. The New Democratic Party expressed some concern, and no one from the Liberal side spoke on it. However, I should mention that the Liberal Justice critic, Mr. Kaplan, spoke on second reading, I might say endorsing the entire bill and urging quick passage of the bill. Honourable senators, I ask you to support this bill, and I trust it will, after short consideration, be sent to the Standing Senate Committee on Legal and Constitutional Affairs for further consideration.

On motion of Senator Stanbury, debate adjourned.

CANADA LABOUR CODE

BILL TO AMEND—SECOND READING—DEBATE ADJOURNED

Hon. Mira Spivak moved the second reading of Bill C-124, to amend the Canada Labour Code.

She said: Honourable senators, Bill C-124 amends Part IV of the Canada Labour Code.

Enterprises under federal jurisdiction, and to which the Canada Labour Code applies, include interprovincial or international works and undertakings such as railways, highways, transport, telephone, telegraph and cable systems, pipelines, canals, ferries, tunnels, bridges and shipping. As well, the Code applies to broadcasting, banking, air transport and some 40 crown corporations. Also included are industries declared by Parliament to be for the general advantage of Canada, such as grain elevators.

In addition, the occupational safety and health provisions of the Code apply to the federal public service, operating employees in the transportation industry and workers involved in the exploration and development of oil and gas in certain Canada lands. Therefore, over one million workers are covered by the Canada Labour Code's provisions on occupational safety and health.

The bill before us would make necessary changes to this legislation. These changes, while minor in themselves, will help make the Canada Labour Code a more flexible and efficient instrument for the protection of Canadian workers. The first of these changes is a series of amendments to Part IV of the Code, which have general application. The second relates only to the federally regulated coal mines in Cape Breton.

The objective of the proposed bill is to ensure consistency between the recently amended Part IV of the Canada Labour Code and the regulations made pursuant to the Code. One major intent of the Code amendments enacted in 1984 and proclaimed in 1986 was to clarify the prime responsibility of the employer for employees' occupational safety and health. The regulation-making authorities of the Code in this respect were therefore limited to precise standards which could be rigidly prescribed.

This approach has generally shown its merits. However, there can be a problem in some situations and environments in which some flexibility is required. The proposed amendments to the Code will address this problem by providing new or clearer authorities.

Honourable senators, I should now like to present these changes in logical order rather than clause by clause in order to explain more clearly the purpose of this bill and the thinking behind it.

EVIDENCE

Ottawa, Thursday, July 14, 1988

The Standing Senate Committee on Legal and Constitutional Affairs, to which were referred Bill C-58, to provide for the implementation of treaties for mutual legal assistance in criminal matters and to amend the Criminal Code, the Crown Liability Act and the Immigration Act, 1976; and Bill C-61, to amend the Criminal Code, the Food and Drugs Act and the Narcotic Control Act, met this day at 9:30 a.m. to give consideration to the bills.

Senator Joan Neiman (Chairman) in the Chair.

The Chairman: Honourable senators, we had to call this rather impromptu meeting this morning because two additional bills were referred to the committee. I am sure no one has had an opportunity to study them in detail but Mr. Mosley was good enough to make himself available again this morning and he has brought with him Mr. William Corbett, Senior General Counsel, Criminal Prosecutions.

We will commence our hearing by dealing with Bill C-61. Please proceed, Mr. Mosley.

Mr. Richard G. Mosley, Senior General Counsel, Criminal and Family Law Policy Section, Department of Justice: Thank you, Madam Chairman. Perhaps I should indicate that Mr. Corbett will address matters respecting Bill C-58 when the committee proceeds to study that bill.

Bill C-61 to amend the Criminal Code, the Food and Drugs Act and the Narcotic Control Act with respect to proceeds of crime is a result of some eight years of work at the federal and provincial level. The work began with the publication in 1980 by the Attorney General of British Columbia of a report entitled "The Business of Crime." The report was authored by a Vancouver defence counsel who examined the existing Canadian legislation and concluded that it was inadequate to provide the Crown and the courts with the tools necessary to strip offenders of the profits that might be generated from their criminal activity.

As a result of that report, a study was commissioned by federal and provincial ministers responsible for criminal justice late in 1981, and it began in 1982. The study was comprised of representatives of a number of provincial governments, officials of provincial governments and from the federal departments of justice, the ministry of the solicitor general and the RCMP. The study reported in July of 1983 to ministers and, as an outcome of that work, and also as a result of other work that was being done at the time on sentencing, the Minister of Justice, the Honourable Mark MacGuigan, in February 1984, introduced proposals to amend the Criminal Code as part of a piece of omnibus legislation, Bill C-19 which was tabled at that time and which subsequently died on the order paper of the other place with the calling of the general election in the summer of 1984.

Those proposals in 1984 essentially reflected the conclusion of the Enterprise Crime Study which was the task force set up by federal and provincial ministers that Canadian law was, in

Le Comité sénatorial permanent des affaires juridiques et constitutionnelles auquel ont été renvoyés le projet de loi C-58, Loi portant mise en œuvre des traités d'entraide juridique en matière criminelle et modifiant le Code criminel, la Loi sur la responsabilité de la Couronne et la Loi sur l'immigration de 1976 et le projet de loi C-61, Loi modifiant le Code criminel, la Loi des aliments et drogues et la Loi sur les stupéfiants, s'est réuni ce jour à 9 h 30 pour étudier les projets de loi.

Le sénateur Joan Neiman (présidente) occupe le fauteuil.

La présidente: Honorables sénateurs, nous avons dû convoquer cette réunion impromptue ce matin parce que deux nouveaux projets de loi ont été renvoyés à notre Comité. Je suis sûre que personne n'a pu les étudier en détail mais M. Mosley a eu la gentillesse de se mettre de nouveau à notre disposition ce matin et il a amené avec lui M. William Corbett, avocat général, Poursuites pénales.

Nous commencerons notre séance par l'examen du projet de loi C-61. Monsieur Mosley, nous vous écoutons.

M. Richard G. Mosley, avocat général, Section de la politique du droit en matière pénale et familiale, ministère de la Justice: Merci, madame la présidente. Je voudrais vous signaler que c'est M. Corbett qui parlera du projet de loi C-58 lorsque le Comité l'examinera.

Le projet de loi C-61 modifiant le Code criminel, la Loi des aliments et drogues et la Loi sur les stupéfiants en ce qui concerne les produits de la criminalité est le fruit de quelque huit ans de travail au niveau provincial et fédéral. Ceci a commencé lorsque le Procureur général de Colombie-Britannique a publié en 1980 un rapport intitulé «The Business of Crime.» Le rapport était signé par un avocat de la défense de Vancouver qui, après avoir examiné la législation canadienne en vigueur, concluait qu'elle était insuffisante pour donner à la Couronne et aux tribunaux les instruments nécessaires pour enlever aux criminels les produits de leurs activités criminelles.

À la suite de ce rapport, les ministres responsables de la justice pénale aux niveaux fédéral et provincial ont demandé à la fin de 1981 qu'une étude soit entreprise et celle-ci a commencé en 1982. À cette étude participaient des représentants de plusieurs gouvernements provinciaux, des fonctionnaires de gouvernements provinciaux et du ministère de la Justice, du ministère du Solliciteur général et de la GRC. En juillet 1983, les résultats de l'étude ont été communiqués aux ministres et, à la suite de ce travail et d'autres recherches effectuées à l'époque sur la détermination de la peine, le ministre de la Justice, l'honorable Mark MacGuigan, a présenté en février 1984, des propositions visant à amender le Code criminel dans le cadre d'un projet de loi omnibus, le projet de loi C-19, qui a été déposé à ce moment-là mais est ensuite mort au Feuilleton de l'autre endroit, lors de la convocation des élections générales de l'été 1984.

Ces propositions de 1984 reflétaient essentiellement les conclusions de l'étude sur le crime organisé, c'est-à-dire du groupe de travail créé par les ministres fédéral et provinciaux, selon fact, inadequate, and that there was no provision empowering the courts to strip offenders of the actual proceeds of their criminal activity although there were certain specific measures which the courts could employ. Forfeiture, which is the concept we are basically talking about, has long been known in Anglo-Canadian criminal law and, in fact, it is now found in some 100 federal statutory provisions; but it is forfeiture which is specific to either certain instruments of crime or certain specific types of proceeds of crime or contraband—property which is, in itself, illegal to possess.

The conclusion of the 1983 study and the purpose of the 1984 amendments was to provide the courts with a general forfeiture power and with complementary powers of seizure and pretrial, preconviction restraint in order to preserve the property until the ultimate disposition of the issues at trial and an order of forfeiture if one were to follow.

This effort that was attempted in 1984 and which is now reflected in Bill C-61, is part of a worldwide attempt to provide new means to deal with the problem of crime and, in particular, transnational crime. Mr. Corbett will be speaking to Bill C-58 a little later which is also part of this generalized effort on the international level and domestically within nations to try to come up with new tools to deal with the modern problems associated with criminal activity.

It is consistent with efforts which began in the United States with the Organized Crime Commission hearings in the 1950s and 1960s which culminated in 1970 with the adoption of legislation which is popularly known as RRCO, the Racketeer Influenced and Corrupt Organizations Statute and complementary legislation which was found in other pieces of American statutory authority.

It is consistent with legislation which has been adopted in recent years in the United Kingdom; in other European nations; with the terms of a draft convention against drug trafficking which the United Nations is currently working on; and with similar efforts which are underway within the Council of Europe and within the Commonwealth of Nations.

I might characterize this as a generalized response to modern crime problems. It is a recognition that, in the current age, it is extremely simple to transfer property outside of the territorial boundaries of any individual nation.

In Canada we have had for many years—it was adopted as part of the Criminal Code of 1892—a provision against the possession of property that has been obtained by the commission of an indictable offence. Section 312 of the code, which contains that provision, was, in fact, amended in the mid-1970s to extend its ambit to include the profits or proceeds of criminal activity committed either in Canada or abroad and brought into Canada—proceeds that were obtained either directly or indirectly. That amendment in 1975-76 was the direct result of concerns in Canada that the American legislation adopted in 1970 would drive criminal proceeds from the United States lesquelles la loi canadienne était effectivement insuffisante, dans la mesure où aucune disposition ne permettait aux tribunaux d'enlever aux criminels les produits de leurs activités criminelles, en dépit de certaines mesures précises auxquelles les cours pouvaient recourir. La notion de confiscation, puisque c'est en fait de ceci qu'il s'agit, était connue depuis longtemps en droit criminel anglo-canadien et se trouve en fait actuellement dans une centaine de dispositions statutaires fédérales; il s'agit toutefois de confiscation propre soit à certains instruments du crime, soit à certains types de produits d'activités criminelles ou de contrebande—c'est-à-dire des biens qu'il est illégal d'avoir en sa possession.

Les conclusions de l'étude de 1983 et les amendements de 1984 devaient donner aux tribunaux un pouvoir général de confiscation et des pouvoirs complémentaires de saisie et de blocage avant le jugement ou la condamnation, afin de préserver les biens jusqu'au règlement final lors du procès et jusqu'à l'éventuelle ordonnance de confiscation.

Cette tentative de 1984 se retrouve maintenant dans le projet de loi C-61 dans le cadre d'un effort mondial visant à trouver de nouveaux moyens de régler le problème de la criminalité, et en partie, des activités criminelles transnationales. M. Corbett parlera tout à l'heure du projet de loi C-58 qui fait également partie de cet effort généralisé entrepris au niveau international et dans les différents pays pour tenter de trouver de nouvelles solutions aux problèmes modernes associés aux activités criminelles.

Cette démarche est parallèle à celle qui a commencé aux États-Unis avec les audiences de la Commission sur le crime organisé, au cours des années 1950 et 1960, et qui ont atteint leur point culminant en 1970 avec l'adoption de la loi que l'on appelle généralement RRCO, le Racketeer Influenced and Corrupt Organizations Statute et des dispositions complémentaires que l'on trouve dans d'autres textes législatifs américains.

Ceci va également de pair avec les lois adoptées au cours des dernières années au Royaume-Uni, dans divers pays européens, ainsi qu'avec les dispositions d'un projet de convention contre le trafic de stupéfiants sur lequel travaillent actuellement les Nations Unies et avec d'autres initiatives semblables du Conseil de l'Europe et des pays membres du Commonwealth.

C'est un effort généralisé pour répondre aux problèmes de la criminalité moderne. En effet, on reconnaît qu'il est actuellement extrêmement simple de faire sortir des biens des limites territoriales d'un pays.

Au Canada, nous avons depuis de nombreuses années une disposition—elle a été adoptée dans le cadre du Code criminel en 1892—interdisant de posséder des biens obtenus grâce à un acte criminel. l'article 312 du Code, qui contient cette disposition, a été en fait amendé au milieu des années 1970, pour inclure les profits ou produits d'activités criminelles perpétrées soit au Canada soit à l'étranger, et amenés au Canada—produits obtenus directement ou indirectement. Cette modification a été apportée en 1975-1976 parce que l'on craignait au Canada que la législation américaine adoptée en 1970 ne pousse les criminels à faire entrer au Canada les produits de into Canada and that this country would be used to launder those moneys.

That was actually first raised in the Ontario legislature by the late Mr. Renwick and was subsequently adopted by the Minister of Justice and passed by the federal Parliament.

That offence under section 312 makes it a crime to be in the possession, in Canada, of criminal proceeds, but there is nothing in the way of supporting legislation for that offence. In other words, it is entirely possible that an individual who is in possession of criminal proceeds in this country may be arrested and charged, but the court would have no authority to order the confiscation of those proceeds, which is an extraordinary anomaly in our existing law.

There have been some examples and I can point to one in particular. Some years ago, a person of Colombian extraction, who was involved in cocaine trafficking in the southern United States, chose to deposit substantial quantities of money in the Royal Bank of Canada in the City of Montreal. That individual was subsequently killed as a result of having given information to the American Drug Enforcement Administration. When the Attorney General of Quebec attempted to seize the drug moneys in the Royal Bank, it was discovered that there was no authority under our law to permit that seizure. An attempt was made to execute a search warrant, and the courts found—from the Superior Court of Quebec to the Supreme Court of Canada—that there was no room in section 443 of the Criminal Code, the search warrant provision, to permit such a seizure. So the efforts on the part of the Attorney General of Quebec to do something about that money sitting in an account in the Royal Bank were stymied.

Bill C-61 attempts to resolve that anomoly, among others, and to flush out the existing law to provide the necessary mechanisms in order to permit the courts to authorize the seizure or restraint of seizures not physically or practically possible; and, ultimately, if the property is deemed to be the proceeds of crime, to order its confiscation or forfeiture. To a great extent, it reflects the principles that were put forward in the legislation proposed in 1984, although there are significant differences. The bill in 1984 would have applied to all instruments of crime, and it would have applied to the proceeds from all indictable offences. There was a considerable amount of concern expressed at that time and a fair amount of media attention to those proposals.

The Chairman: Sir, what were the objections?

Mr. Mosley: The concern raised by the defence bar at the time was that the proposals went too far, and these were addressed in a number of debates held under the auspices of the Canadian Bar Association at their mid-winter and annual conference in 1984. These concerns were picked up by the media and received considerable attention at the time. Bill C-61 responds to those concerns. It does not apply to instruments at all.

The Chairman: What do you define as an instrument, a bond?

leurs activités criminelles aux États-Unis et que notre pays ne soit utilisé pour recycler ces fonds.

Cette possibilité a en fait été évoquée pour la première fois au Parlement ontarien par feu M. Renwick et l'idée a ensuite été reprise par le ministre de la Justice et par le Parlement fédéral.

C'est donc une infraction en vertu de l'article 312, que d'avoir en sa possession au Canada le produit d'activités criminelles, mais il n'existe aucune loi sur laquelle s'appuyer dans ce domaine. Autrement dit, il est tout à fait possible d'arrêter et de condamner une personne ayant en sa possession le fruit d'activités criminelles au Canada mais les tribunaux n'auraient aucun pouvoir pour ordonner la confiscation de ces biens, ce qui est une anomalie considérable de notre droit.

Il y a eu plusieurs cas et je peux vous en citer un en particulier. Il y a quelques années, une personne d'origine colombienne, qui faisait du trafic de cocaïne dans le sud des États-Unis, a décidé de déposer des sommes importantes à la Banque royale du Canada à Montréal. Cette personne a ensuite été tuée pour avoir donné des renseignements à l'American Drug Enforcement Administration. Lorsque le Procureur général du Québec a tenté de saisir les fonds déposés à la Banque royale, on a découvert que la loi ne contenait aucune disposition permettant cette saisie. On a tenté d'utiliser un mandat de perquisition et les tribunaux, depuis la Cour suprême du Québec jusqu'à la Cour suprême du Canada, ont conclu que rien dans l'article 443 du Code criminel, qui concerne les mandats de perquisition, ne permettait cette saisie. Ainsi, les efforts entrepris par le Procureur général du Québec pour récupérer cet argent bloqué dans un compte à la Banque royale, sont restés vains.

Le projet de loi C-61 vise à résoudre cette anomalie, entre autres, et à mettre en place les mécanismes nécessaires pour permettre aux tribunaux d'autoriser la saisie ou le blocage si la saisie est physiquement ou pratiquement impossible et, en dernier recours, si les biens sont considérés comme étant les produits d'activités criminelles, d'ordonner leur confiscation. Il reflète dans une grande mesure les principes exposés dans la législation proposée en 1984, quoiqu'il y ait des différences considérables. Le projet de loi de 1984 se serait appliqué à tous les instruments du crime et aux produits de toutes les activités criminelles. De vives inquiétudes avaient été exprimées à l'époque et les médias avaient beaucoup parlé de ces propositions.

La présidente: Quelles étaient les objections?

M. Mosley: Selon les avocats de la défense, les propositions allaient trop loin et elles ont été discutées dans le cadre de plusieurs débats organisés par l'Association du Barreau canadien lors de sa conférence annuelle du milieu de l'hiver de 1984. Ces objections ont été reprises par les médias et ont beaucoup attiré l'attention à l'époque. Le projet de loi C-61 répond à ces inquiétudes dans la mesure où il ne s'applique absolument pas aux instruments.

La présidente: Qu'appelez-vous un instrument, un lien?

[Text]

Mr. Mosley: Anything that is used to commit a crime. For example, a car may be an instrument in a bank robbery; a business may be an instrument to commit a sophisticated commercial fraud. One of the concerns raised in 1984 was that those proposals would have permitted the seizure and forfeiture of a business which was only peripherially connected to the commission of the offence, and it would cause a great deal of harm to third parties who might have an interest in that business, but who would not otherwise be involved in the commission of the offence.

Bill C-61 does not deal with instruments at all, nor does it apply to all indictable offences. It applies to a select list of offences that was compiled with the assistance of the provincial Attorney General, which are characterized as enterprise crimes, and to a list of these more serious drug offences, which are characterized as designated drug offences. So its provisions apply only to certain crimes. They do not apply across the board to every offence that the Criminal Code or the two drug statutes provide for.

The scheme is that if the police are investigating an enterprise crime or a designated drug offence and if they have grounds to establish to the satisfaction of a superior court—it would not be a justice of the peace or a provincial magistrate—that certain property is the proceeds of an enterprise or designated drug offence, they may make application to the court for either a seizure warrant, which would normally be employed if the property was tangible and susceptible to being removed and held by the police, or a restraining order.

The restraining order would be used if the property was intangible—such as a bank account—or could not practically be removed—such as real property or a large item such as a boat. The court would have the discretion to issue those orders, depending on the evidence that was presented to the court. If it was established at trial, following the charge and the trial on the merits of the guilt or innocence of an individual, that that individual was guilty of the offence charged and that the property concerned was property obtained by the commission of an enterprise crime or designated drug offence, then the court would have the authority to order the forfeiture of that property to the Crown.

There is also provision made for forfeiture in the case where an offender has either died or absconded. The need for that provision is shown in the case that I referred to earlier of Mr. Luiz Pinto who had deposited the funds in the Royal Bank in Montreal. Mr. Pinto, as I indicated, was killed by his former associates so there was no one to bring to trial within Canada for being in possession of that property in this country. In circumstances in which a charge has been laid, the court could then proceed to a determination that the property was the proceeds of crime and order its forfeiture where the accused has absconded or is dead.

It is felt necessary to require that a charge be laid to ensure that the federal criminal law jurisdiction would permit these proceedings. This area falls under the criminal law of power or within the field of property and civil rights. So this procedure

M. Mosley: Tout ce qui est utilisé pour commettre un crime. Par exemple, une voiture peut être un instrument dans un vol de banque; une entreprise peut être un instrument utilisé pour une fraude commerciale complexe. On redoutait en 1984 que ces propositions permettent la saisie et la confiscation d'une entreprise qui n'avait qu'un lointain rapport avec l'activité criminelle, et ceci risquait de causer des torts considérables à des tierces parties ayant des intérêts dans cette entreprise mais n'ayant autrement rien à voir avec l'activité criminelle.

Le projet de loi C-61 ne traite absolument pas des instruments et il ne s'applique pas non plus à tous les actes criminels. Il s'applique seulement à certaines infractions dont la liste a été établie avec l'aide du Procureur général provincial, dites infractions de criminalité organisée, et à une liste d'infractions graves en matière de drogue, appelées infractions désignées en matière de drogue. Ainsi, ces dispositions ne s'appliquent qu'à certains actes criminels et non à toutes les infractions prévues au Code criminel ou dans les deux lois sur les stupéfiants.

Fondamentalement, si la police fait enquête sur une infraction de criminalité organisée ou une infraction désignée en matière de drogue et a suffisamment d'éléments pour prouver à un tribunal supérieur—il ne pourrait pas s'agir d'un juge de paix ou d'un magistrat provincial—que certains biens sont le produit d'activités de criminalité organisée ou d'infractions désignées en matière de drogue, elle peut demander au tribunal, soit un mandat de saisie, qui serait normalement employé pour des biens tangibles et susceptibles d'être enlevés et détenus par la police, soit une ordonnance de blocage.

L'ordonnance de blocage sera utilisée pour des biens intangibles—comme un compte bancaire—ou impossibles à déplacer—comme un bien immobilier ou un bien de grande taille comme un bateau. Le tribunal a le pouvoir de délivrer ces mandats, selon les éléments de preuve qui lui sont présentées. S'il est établi au procès, après les accusations et le jugement sur la culpabilité ou l'innocence d'un individu, que celui-ci était coupable de l'infraction dont il était accusé et que les biens concernés avaient été obtenus grâce à la perpétration d'une infraction de criminalité organisée ou d'une infraction désignée en matière de drogue, le tribunal a le pouvoir d'ordonner la confiscation de ces biens au bénéfice de la Couronne.

Il existe également une disposition permettant la confiscation dans les cas où le coupable de l'infaction est mort ou s'est esquivé. Cette disposition est nécessaire comme le montre le cas auquel j'ai fait allusion tout à l'heure, de M. Luiz Pinto, qui avait déposé des fonds à la Banque royale à Montréal. Comme je l'ai expliqué, M. Pinto a été tué par ses anciens associés de sorte que l'on ne pouvait plus accuser personne d'avoir eu ces biens en sa possession au Canada. Dans les cas où des accusations ont été portées, le tribunal peut déterminer si les biens sont le produit de criminalité et ordonner leur confiscation si l'accusé s'est esquivé ou est décédé.

On considère qu'il est nécessaire d'exiger que des accusations soient portées pour être sûr que la juridiction fédérale en matière de droit criminel permettrait cette procédure. C'est un domaine qui fait partie soit du droit criminel, soit du droit des in Bill C-61 is tied very closely to criminal proceedings. It is unlike some of the powers in the United States.

The Americans have a mixed system in which they can either use a criminal forfeiture procedure or an administrative forfeiture. You have seen accounts of how the American authorities have seized cars, boats, and planes without obtaining a court order in advance. That is possible because under their system, which is a mixed civil and criminal system at the federal level, they have statutory authority to conduct what are known as administrative seizures which will result in a forfeiture to the state unless challenged by the person from whom the property has been seized or someone else with an interest in the property. If challenged, then the state must bear the onus of proof, but it has proven to be an infrequent occurrence that such seizures are challenged. In many cases, the suspected drug trafficker or other offender walks away from the property and abandons it to forfeiture by the state.

Under our system, because of the constraints of the division of powers, seizures and forfeitures related to crime proceeds have to be linked to criminal procedure. Bill C-61 is very much a criminal scheme of seizure or restraint and forfeiture.

That covers my introductory remarks. I will be pleased to respond to any questions that the committee may have.

Senator Buckwold: Why did you not move to compulsory reporting?

Mr. Mosley: There is a long history to our examination of that question, senator.

Senator Buckwold: I presume that that is done in the United States.

Mr. Mosley: Yes, it is. In Canada, that whole issue was really blown out of proportion as a result of a Globe and Mail story that was published just before this bill was introduced. The journalist had obtained materials through the Access to Information Act and had interpreted those materials as suggesting that government officials had recommended the use of such a procedure in Canada. That was far from the truth.

The Enterprise Crime Study, in which I participated, began looking at the issue as early as 1982-83. At that time, officials travelled to Washington to take a close look at the procedure. The Americans were then having a great many difficulties with the reporting of currency transactions. Under the euphemistic title of "the Bank Secrecy Act", they require a form of disclosure of information. This measure had been brought in in the seventies as part of a general package of measures against organized crime. However, in 1983 they were only beginning to enforce it. The measures had simply not been observed by the major financial institutions in the United States and there had been few efforts to enforce them up to that time. The Americans got tough and went after the financial institutions by imposing upon them significant civil penalties, some of which were in the order of millions of dollars. The institutions then started to respond by more scrupulously observing the terms of that statute.

biens et des droits civils. Cette procédure du projet de loi C-61 est donc très proche d'une procédure pénale. La situation est un peu différente aux États-Unis.

Les Américains ont un système mixte qui leur permet d'utiliser une procédure de confiscation soit pénale, soit administrative. Vous avez sûrement entendu parler de cas où les autorités américaines ont saisi des voitures, des bateaux et des avions sans avoir demandé d'ordonnance préalable du tribunal. Ceci est possible grâce à leur système mixte, civil et criminel, au niveau fédéral, qui permet d'effectuer des saisies dites administratives, qui deviendront des confiscations au bénéfice de l'État, à moins qu'il n'y ait contestation de la part de la personne à qui les biens ont été saisis ou d'une autre personne ayant un intérêt dans ces biens. En cas de contestation, le fardeau de la preuve repose sur l'État, a mais historiquement, les contestations dans ce genre de saisies ont été extrêmement rares. Dans de nombreux cas, la personne soupçonnée de trafic de stupéfiants ou de l'infraction s'en va et abandonne les biens à l'État.

Avec notre système, étant donné les limites imposées par la division des pouvoirs, les saisies et les confiscations des produits de la criminalité ne sont possibles que dans le cadre d'une procédure pénale. Le projet de loi C-61 met en fait en place un système pénal de saisie ou de blocage et de confiscation.

Ceci met fin à mes remarques d'introduction. Je me ferai un plaisir de répondre à toutes les questions du Comité.

Le sénateur Buckwold: Pourquoi n'avez-vous pas opté pour la déclaration obligatoire?

M. Mosley: Nous avons longuement réfléchi à cette question, sénateur.

Le sénateur Buckwold: Je présume que c'est ce qui se fait aux États-Unis.

M. Mosley: Oui. Au Canada, la question a vraiment pris une importance disproportionnée à la suite de l'article du «Globe and Mail» publié juste avant la présentation du projet de loi. Le journaliste avait obtenu des documents grâce à la Loi sur l'accès à l'information et, d'après lui, les fonctionnaires du gouvernement préconisaient ce type de procédure pour le Canada. C'était très loin de la vérité.

Cette question a été examinée dans le cadre de l'étude sur le crime organisé à laquelle j'ai participé, dès 1982-1983. A l'époque, des fonctionnaires étaient allés à Washington pour examiner la procédure de plus près. Les américains avaient alors de grandes difficultés avec les déclarations concernant les transactions monétaires. selon la loi dite—c'est un euphémisme—«Bank Secrecy Act», les renseignements doivent obligatoirement être communiqués. Cette mesure avait aété adoptée au cours des années 1970 dans le cadre du train de mesures de lutte contre le crime organisé. Cependant, en 1983, on commençait à peine à la faire appliquer. Les dispositions n'avaient pas été observées par les grandes institutions financières américaines et l'on n'avait pas fait grand-chose pour y remédier jusque-là. Les Américains adoptèrent une ligne plus dure et imposèrent des pénalités civiles importantes aux institutions financières, allant parfois jusqu'à des millions de dollars. Cel-

The statute provides that whenever a customer deposits or withdraws a sum of cash in excess of $10,000 a form must be filled out and sent to Washington—actually, these forms are now sent to a data processing centre in the Detroit area. The purpose is to provide information concerning large-scale currency movement. The result, however, is that that processing centre now receives some 5 million forms a year. This is an extraordinarily cumbersome system. Those 5 million forms have to be translated into computer-readable form, and there is an army of data processors at the IRS facility near Detroit to do that. The information then has to be analyzed, which is done by a large number of intelligence analysts in Washington.

When we looked at the system in 1983, we could not get any hard information from the Americans as to how effective it was. We went back again in 1986, after they had tightened up their system and had improved enforcement so that the level of compliance was much better. They had tried through legislative and administrative changes to improve the effectiveness of that scheme. However, at that time and even today they still could not give us any hard information about how effective the system really is. Looking for specific information through those 5 million forms every year, from the point of view of cost effectiveness, is like looking for a needle in a hay stack. However, some of the field personnel say that they have been able to use that information to track individuals. There was notable success with an operation entitled "Greenback" as few years ago. The problem is that we simply cannot get an assessment of whether this system is worth it in terms of the cost to the industry, which is a significant factor because those costs are, in turn, passed on to the consumer. It is also difficult to estimate whether it is worth it to government in terms of its improvement in law enforcement effectiveness.

The general accounting office, which is similar to our Auditor General's office, conducted a study a few years ago, the conclusion of which was that the Treasury Department, which administers part of the scheme, simply could not provide any information about the effectiveness of this scheme. We have repeatedly asked the Americans for that sort of information and they still cannot come up with it. Therefore, as a result of our examination of the American scheme, we have concluded that there may be some benefits to it, certainly for tax law enforcement, but for tracking drug offenders or enterprise criminals, as we call them, its cost effectiveness has yet to be demonstrated. In our view, there may well be better ways to get that information. As a result of the Enterprise Crime Study, it was agreed that one of the follow-ups would be a study of methods to obtain information to trace and identify proceeds. The resources were not available for that study immediately following the 1983 report, but it has been undertaken in the context of the national drug strategy that was announced by the government last spring. It is being handled by the ministry of the Solicitor General. It is intended that that study take another look at the American system to see whether some version of it might be feasible in this country—a les-ci commencèrent alors à respecter plus scrupuleusement les dispositions de la loi.

La loi prévoit que lorsqu'un client dépose ou retire une somme en espèces dépassant 10 000 $, un formulaire doit être rempli et envoyé à Washington—en fait, ces formulaires sont maintenant envoyés à un centre de traitement des données dans la région de Detroit. L'objectif est d'obtenir des renseignements sur tous les grands mouvements de fonds. Cependant, en pratique, le centre de traitement reçoit maintenant environ cinq millions de formulaires par an. C'est un système extrêmement lourd. Ces cinq millions de formulaires doivent être traduits en un langage lisible par l'ordinateur et il y a pour cela une armée d'informaticiens dans les locaux de l'IRS près de Detroit. Les renseignements doivent ensuite être analysés, ce qui est fait par un grand nombre d'analystes à Washington.

Lorsque nous avons examiné le système en 1983, il était très difficile de juger de son efficacité d'après les renseignements donnés par les Américains. Nous y sommes retournés en 1986, après que le système ait été renforcé et qu'à la suite de mesures plus sévères, il soit devenu mieux respecté. L'on avait tenté par des changements administratifs et législatifs d'améliorer l'efficacité de la formule. Cependant, il était toujours impossible aux Américains de nous donner des renseignements précis sur l'efficacité véritable du système. C'est encore vrai aujourd'hui. Du point de vue de la rentabilité, l'examen de ces cinq millions de formulaires annuels revient à chercher une aiguille dans une botte de foin. Cependant, certains des employés sur le terrain disent qu'il leur a été possible grâce à ces renseignements de retrouver la piste de certaines personnes. Il y a eu une opération appelée «Greenback» il y a quelques années qui a bien réussi. Le problème, c'est qu'il est impossible de savoir si le système est vraiment rentable sur le plan du coût pour l'industrie, ce qui est un facteur important parce que ces coûts sont ensuite répercutés sur le consommateur. Il est également difficile de savoir s'il est rentable pour le gouvernement dans la mesure où il permet de mieux faire respecter la loi.

Le General Accounting Office, qui se compare à notre Bureau du Vérificateur général, a entrepris une étude il y a quelques années et conclu que le Département du Trésor, qui administre une partie du système, était incapable d'évaluer l'efficacité du système. Nous avons à plusieurs reprises demandé ce genre de renseignements aux Américains et ils n'ont jamais pu nous les donner. Par conséquent, nous avons conclu de cet examen du système américain, qu'il comportait peut-être certains avantages, particulièrement pour le respect de la loi de l'impôt, mais que pour retrouver la piste des trafiquants de stupéfiants ou des criminels organisés, comme nous les appelons, sa valeur était loin d'être démontrée. D'après nous, il y a peut-être de meilleures façons d'obtenir cette information. À la suite de l'Étude sur le crime organisé, on a décidé d'effectuer une étude des méthodes permettant d'obtenir des renseignements pour retrouver et identifier les produits de la criminalité. Les ressources nécessaires n'étaient pas immédiatement disponibles pour ce travail après le rapport de 1983, mais il a été entrepris dans le contexte de la stratégie nationale sur les drogues annoncée par le gouvernement au printemps dernier. C'est le ministère du Solliciteur général qui s'en occupe. Cette étude doit permettre de réexaminer le système version that might be administered by Revenue Canada, for example. Alternatively, we could look at other methods for obtaining the same or better results. The RCMP have told us, for instance, that their main problem is not so much in identifying individuals as it is in being able to trace the flow of the money through the banking system. It may be more effective, then, having taken a hard look at all of these considerations through this study, to require the banks to keep better in-house records that could be accessible through a search warrant or another mechanism than it would be to impose an obligation upon them to routinely submit a form which the government then has to handle and analyze.

I have taken a lot of time to respond to your question, senator, but this has been a bit of a thorn in our side over the course of the past year. It stems from a misinterpretation, if I may respectfully call it that, on the part of a journalist who was chasing a story when the bill was introduced.

Senator Buckwold: Do you feel that voluntary disclosure by the banks is an effective method?

Mr. Mosley: In that regard, there has been a remarkable degree of cooperation from the banks in recent years. I think it fair to say that Canadian financial institutions woke up some years ago to the reality that they were being used to launder drug money and the proceeds of other crimes. As good corporate citizens, this is not something they were very pleased about. There was a case in St. Catherines, Ontario, of a lawyer who managed to launder, through a local branch bank, something in excess of $6 million. This was cash money which he was routinely trundling off to this branch. Nobody twigged to the fact that this was unusual for a lawyer in a small Canadian city.

The banks have implemented "Know Thy Customer" procedures. Their security personnel have worked very closely with senior officers of the RCMP and other Canadian police forces. They now have a money laundering committee which is very much alert to these considerations. so, there has been a remarkable turnaround in the awareness on the part of the Canadian financial community in recent years. We have seen no evidence of any lack of willingness to cooperate.

Senator Buckwold: Through the voluntary disclosure of banks regarding larger deposits, can you say that that disclosure resulted in prosecution?

Mr. Mosley: Cooperation from the banks has always resulted in criminal charges. Over the years, local branch managers have had a quiet word with the police to inform them that something is going on. The financial community has always been very concerned about their liability for the breach of the banker-client confidential relationship.

Bill C-61 attempts to alleviate that concern by clarifying the public interest exception to that confidentiality principle. This is intended to encourage disclosure in circumstances where there is a reasonable basis to believe that a customer is, in fact, américain afin de voir s'il serait possible d'en reprendre une partie dans notre pays, partie qui pourrait par exemple être administrée par Revenu Canada. Autrement, nous pouvons envisager d'autres méthodes qui permettraient d'obtenir les mêmes résultats, sinon mieux. La GRC nous a dit, par exemple, que le principal problème n'était pas tant d'identifier les personnes que de suivre le parcours de l'argent dans le système bancaire. Il serait donc peut-être plus efficace, après avoir passé en revue tous ces éléments dans le cadre de cette étude, de demander aux banques de tenir des dossiers qui pourraient être accessibles grâce à un mandat de perquisition ou un autre mécanisme, plutôt que de les obliger à soumettre régulièrement un formulaire que le gouvernement doit ensuite traiter et analyser.

J'ai mis très longtemps à répondre à votre question, sénateur, mais c'est un problème assez douloureux dont nous avons beaucoup souffert au cours de l'année passée. Il provient d'une erreur d'interprétation, si je puis parler ainsi, de la part d'un journaliste en mal de copie, lorsque le projet de loi a été présenté.

Le sénateur Buckwold: Pensez-vous que la déclaration volontaire par les banques soit une méthode efficace?

M. Mosley: A cet égard, la coopération des banques au cours des dernières années a été remarquable. On peut dire que les institutions financières canadiennes ont ouvert les yeux sur la réalité il y a quelques années, en se rendant compte qu'on se servait d'elles pour recycler les fonds tirés du trafic de stupéfiants et les produits d'autres activités criminelles. C'est évidemment quelque chose qui ne leur a guère plu. Il y a eu le cas à St. Catharines, Ontario, d'un avocat qui avait réussi à recycler, par l'intermédiaire de la succursale locale d'une banque, plus de 6 millions de dollars. C'était de l'argent en espèces qu'il écoulait régulièrement par cette succursale. Personne n'a froncé le sourcil en pensant que c'était inhabituel pour un avocat d'une petite ville canadienne.

Les banques ont adopté des procédures pour «connaître leurs clients». Leur personnel de sécurité a travaillé étroitement avec des agents supérieurs de la GRC et d'autres forces policières canadiennes. Elles ont maintenant un comité sur le recyclage des fonds qui est très attentif à ces considérations. Il y a donc eu un volte-face remarquable de la part de la communauté financière canadienne au cours des dernières années. Nous n'avons vu aucun cas où l'on ait refusé de coopérer.

Le sénateur Buckwold: Est-ce qu'il est arrivé que les déclarations volontaires des banques sur les dépôts importants permettent d'intenter des poursuites?

M. Mosley: La coopération des banques a toujours conduit à des accusations criminelles. Au cours des années, les gérants de succursale ont pris l'habitude de dire un petit mot à la police pour l'informer de ce qui se passait. La communauté financière a toujours été très préoccupée par la confidentialité des relations entre le banquier et ses clients et sa responsabilité dans ce domaine.

Le projet de loi C-61 tente de soulager cette inquiétude en permettant que l'on déroge à ce principe de confidentialité uniquement lorsque l'intérêt public est en jeu. Ceci vise à encourager la communication de renseignements dans les circonstances engaged in laundering moneys. We hope that it will have the intended effect to make such disclosures more common.

Senator Stanbury: Generally speaking, I think all of us—and perhaps I should only speak for myself—are in favour of the bill and are happy to see it coming forward.

The area that senator Buckwold explored is perhaps one of the areas that concerns us most, as it had in the House of Commons and the Commons committee. You have explained quite fully the reasoning for choosing the one course rather than the other.

We will want to satisfy ourselves of the potential effectiveness of the bill in several areas. In other words, will this dependency on the volunteer efforts of the banks and the cooperation with the police be effective? It is not very persuasive when we see that only 50 or 60 disclosures have been made by the banks each year. It is hard for me to believe that there are that few transactions that would fall into this category. I appreciate that we do not have the $5 million, but there must be some middle road between the $5 million and the 50 or 60. I find it incredible that there are only 50 or 60 situations in Canada in a year where the banks feel that the situation calls for an examination by the police.

I am not satisfied at the moment that this bill will be all that effective, but if we are not prepared to follow the course of compulsory reporting, then we have to take this course and monitor it, and see whether it has to be changed at some time in the future. I would like your comments on whether or not it will be effective in terms of fulfilling the purpose for which the bill is developed.

I have another question to ask, and I will ask it now. If you recall, four or five years ago the State of Florida went after a Florida branch of one of our chartered banks. The state held it to ransom and eventually fined it $4 million because the head office of the bank in Canada was not disclosing information that they wanted from the branch in the Bahamas or some place offshore. In my opinion, the State of Florida courts were not using due process of law in attacking that situation. However, their complaint was that we had no laws which would deal with this situation, and therefore they were justified in dealing with it in a harsh way if they felt it necessary to do so.

At the time, that was a real irritant between Canada and the United States. I remember that we promised we would fix it up, that we would have discussions with them and would develop a course of legislation to deal with that kind of situation. Is such legislation going to help in dealing with that sort of situation? If not, what do we do about that?

Mr. Mosley: This bill will not assist in that regard at all. My colleague, Mr. Corbett, could speak to the implications of our efforts with respect to mutual legal assistance, which may help to a certain extent.

I would like to respond to your earlier question about effectiveness. This bill will have an immediate impact in terms of effectiveness, because it will fill the gaps in our legislative framework. The RCMP have contributed significant resources où il y a des raisons valables de croire qu'un client essaie en fait de recycler des fonds. Nous espérons obtenir l'effet recherché, c'est-à-dire rendre ces communications plus fréquentes.

Le sénateur Stanbury: D'une façon générale, nous sommes tous—je devrais peut-être parler seulement en mon nom personnel—favorables à ce projet de loi et nous sommes heureux qu'il soit présenté.

Le problème évoqué par le sénateur Buckwold est peut-être celui qui nous préoccupe le plus, comme c'était le cas pour la Chambre des communes et le comité de la Chambre. Vous avez longuement expliqué les raisons pour lesquelles on a opté pour cette formule plutôt que pour une autre.

Nous voulons être sûrs de l'efficacité potentielle du projet de loi dans plusieurs domaines. En d'autres termes, est-ce que ce système qui repose sur les efforts volontaires des banques et la coopération avec la police sera efficace? Ce n'est pas très convaincant lorsqu'on voit que les banques n'ont fait que 50 ou 60 déclarations de renseignements chaque année. J'ai du mal à croire qu'il y a si peu de transactions qui tombent dans cette catégorie. Je sais que nous n'avons pas les 5 millions de dollars, mais il doit y avoir un moyen terme entre les 5 millions et les 50 ou les 60. Je trouve incroyable qu'il n'y ait que 50 ou 60 cas par an au Canada où les banques estiment qu'il y a lieu de demander un examen de la police.

Pour le moment, je ne suis absolument pas convaincu que ce projet de loi sera aussi efficace, mais si nous ne sommes pas disposés à opter pour la déclaration obligatoire, nous sommes contraints de choisir cette formule en surveillant la situation, pour voir s'il faut apporter des changements à l'avenir. J'aimerais que vous nous disiez si, d'après vous, ce système sera efficace pour atteindre les objectifs visés par le projet de loi.

J'ai une autre question à l'esprit et je vais vous la poser tout de suite. Vous vous souvenez peut-être qu'il y a quatre ou cinq ans, l'État de Floride s'en est pris à la succursale de Floride de l'une de nos banques à charte. L'État a fini par lui imposer une amende de 4 millions de dollars parce que le siège social de la banque au Canada ne communiquait pas les renseignements demandés à la succursale des Bahamas ou d'un autre pays étranger. Je n'approuve pas la procédure adoptée dans ce cas par les tribunaux de l'État de Floride. Ils se sont plaints de ce que nous n'avions pas de loi permettant de régler le problème et ont estimé par conséquent qu'ils avaient le droit d'employer la manière forte, s'ils le jugeaient bon.

A l'époque, ceci a suscité une certaine irritation entre le Canada et les États-Unis. Je me souviens que nous avions promis d'arranger les choses, d'entamer des discussions avec les États-Unis et de mettre en place un projet de loi pour régler ce genre de problème. Ce projet de loi-ci va-t-il être utile dans ce genre de cas? Sinon, que pouvons-nous faire à ce propos?

M. Mosley: Ce projet de loi ne sera d'aucune utilité sur ce plan. Mon confrère, M. Corbett, pourra vous parler des implications de nos efforts en ce qui concerne l'entraide juridique, ce qui pourrait être d'une certaine utilité.

Je voudrais répondre à votre question précédente sur l'efficacité. Ce projet de loi aura un impact immédiat sur le plan de l'efficacité, car il comblera les lacunes existant dans notre cadre législatif. La GRC a consacré des ressources importantes in recent years to conduct financial investigations. Where a financial investigation is underway, they will know that they will have the capacity to make application to a court to seize the property once they are in a position to present their case, or to restrain that property; and, at the end of the road, the court would be in a position to order forfeiture of that property. I think it would certainly serve as an incentive to those financial investigations and would have an immediate impact in that respect.

We do not know whether or not it will result in a greater number of disclosures. We did consult with the financial community before making this proposal. This is based on a British model, and we obtained their view that it would assist them in advising their local branch managers to be more cooperative with the police without fear of liability for infringing the confidential client relationship. It is our great hope and expectation in the context of the new era of cooperation with the financial community in these matters that it will have that result.

We will have to monitor and see what practical effect it has. This study into means to trace and identify will be looking very closely at the effects of this measure and the effects of the bill in general. If it is necessary to consider other means, then, of course, they will be considered in due course.

Senator Stanbury: Does this create any breach into the offshore branches of the banks or other financial institutions?

Mr. Mosley: You are talking there about territorial jurisdiction and sovereignty. The Americans, of course, were acting entirely within their rights vis-à-vis a bank which was in fact operating within the United States, as well as in the Bahamas and Canada. Under their domestic law they could seek that information.

Perhaps my colleague, Mr. Corbett, could provide you with further comments on that.

Senator Stanbury: In view of the time, I will stop there, Madam Chairman.

Senator Doyle: Madam Chairman, I am quite sure that you were surprised—as I was—to hear about the bank disclosures, because this is something for which they do not charge a fee.

May I come back to those disclosures and ask a bit more about the banker-client relationship, because it is one that has not had as much public examination as, say, that of the doctor, priest and lawyer.

Senator Buckwold: The journalist.

Senator Doyle: The journalist, yes, but the journalist goes to jail for it if he preserves it.

Does the act suggest where bankers can look for guidance as to what they should responsibly report and what they should not? What would you do if you were to try to force a bank to say, "You have not made the proper disclosure." Is there a mechanism for that, or just this general feeling of good citizenship?

au cours des dernières années aux enquêtes financières. Dorénavant, lorsqu'une enquête financière sera en cours, les membres de la GRC sauront qu'il leur est possible, une fois qu'ils disposent de tous les éléments de l'affaire, de demander à un tribunal de saisir les biens concernés, ou de les bloquer et, en fin de compte, le tribunal pourra ordonner la confiscation de ces biens. Ceci contribuera certainement à encourager ces enquêtes financières et aura sur ce plan un impact immédiat.

Nous ne savons pas si le projet de loi entraînera un accroissement du nombre de communications de renseignements. Nous avons consulté les membres de la communauté financière avant de faire cette proposition. Celle-ci est inspirée d'un modèle britannique et il semble qu'elle permettrait aux institutions financières d'encourager les directeurs de succursales locales à coopérer davantage avec la police, sans craindre d'être tenus responsables pour n'avoir pas respecter la confidentialité de leurs relations avec leurs clients. C'est en tout cas ce que nous espérons, dans le contexte de cette nouvelle ère de coopération avec le monde financier.

Nous devons suivre l'évolution de la situation et voir quels sont les effets pratiques du système. Cette étude sur les moyens permettant de retrouver et d'identifier les fonds nous permettra d'examiner de très près les effets de cette mesure et du projet de loi en général. S'il est nécessaire d'envisager d'autres moyens, ce sera fait en temps opportun.

Le sénateur Stanbury: Est-ce que ceci crée des problèmes pour les succursales des banques ou d'autres institutions financières situées à l'étranger?

M. Mosley: Vous voulez parler de la juridiction territoriale et de la souveraineté. Les Américains étaient bien sûr tout à fait dans leur droit à l'égard d'une banque exerçant aux États-Unis, ainsi qu'aux Bahamas et au Canada. Leur loi leur permettait de chercher à obtenir ces renseignements.

Mon confrère, M. Corbett, pourra peut-être vous donner davantage des précisions sur ce sujet.

Le sénateur Stanbury: Étant donné le peu de temps que nous avons, je vais m'arrêter ici, madame la présidente.

Le sénateur Doyle: Madame la présidente, je suis sûr que vous avez été aussi étonnée que moi d'entendre dire que les banques allaient communiquer des renseignements sans faire payer de frais.

Je voudrais revenir à ces communications de renseignements et poser quelques questions sur cette relation banquier-client, dans la mesure où l'on en a moins parlé que des relations avec son médecin, son prêtre et son avocat.

Le sénateur Buckwold: Avec les journalistes.

Le sénateur Doyle: Les journalistes, oui, mais les journalistes vont en prison pour sauvegarder leurs sources.

Est-ce que la loi précise où les banquiers peuvent demander conseil pour savoir dans quels cas ils doivent ou ne doivent pas faire une déclaration? Que feriez-vous si vous essayiez de forcer une banque à dire: «Vous n'avez pas fait la déclaration voulue». Y a-t-il un mécanisme pour cela ou fait-on simplement appel aux bons sentiments des banques?

Mr. Mosley: There is no obligation on the banker to disclose, which is consistent with our general approach to the criminal law and our general legal principle that no one is obliged to report information relating to a criminal offence; you are not; I am not.

Senator Doyle: No. If you wanted something and they were not cooperative, you could bring them into court as a witness, and the judge, if he felt inclined, could charge them with contempt for not producing evidence. That is the only prod that is there, other than goodwill and understanding.

Mr. Mosley: Yes. They are very much at risk.

Senator Doyle: Sure. It is the general argument, though, for sensible and responsible citizenship.

Mr. Mosley: Sure, but they perhaps have an even greater interest in being a responsible citizen in the fact that they are handling the property. They have the proceeds in their possession.

Senator Doyle: When you get into their offshore operations I am lost and amazed. I sometimes do not understand where their sense of responsibility does lie.

Mr. Mosley: A simple example is the Hendin case in St. Catharines, for example. The bank branch that handled those funds was laundering the proceeds of crime.

The banks recognize that there is a potential liability for their officers, and that is one of the reasons why they have been anxious to adopt these "know thy customer" policies. It is not inconceivable that a financial institution or its officers could be charged, under either the existing law or the provisions of this bill, with having the possession of the proceeds of crime or laundering. So there is a certain incentive on their part to act responsibly. But there is no obligation on them to comply with section 420.27. It gives them some guidance in that it is not any suspicion which they should report, but they must have some reasonable basis for their suspicion. So a completely arbitrary or capricious report to the police is not protected by this; there has to be some basis for it.

The profile which is now given to bank employees of laundering includes a lot of small bills, money which is not clean and money which does not seem to come from a business that would normally handle small bills. That type of information should normally arouse a reasonable basis for a suspicion that something is amiss. In those circumstances, we feel confident that this provision would protect the bank employee who reported it to the authorities.

There has always been a public interest exception to the confidentality principle, but unfortunately jurisprudence has not defined the scope of that exception. So it has been difficult for the banks and their legal advisers to tell their officers, "Well, you will be okay if you act on these grounds, because there is this exception to the rule." By codifying, in effect, that exception, in these circumstances we hope to give them some more

M. Mosley: Le banquier n'est pas tenu de communiquer des renseignements, ce qui est conforme à notre approche vis-à-vis du droit criminel et correspond à notre principe juridique général voulant que personne n'est tenu de communiquer des renseignements concernant une infraction criminelle; vous n'y êtes pas obligé, moi non plus.

Le sénateur Doyle: Non. Si vous vouliez quelque chose et que la banque refuse de coopérer, vous pourriez la faire comparaître comme témoin devant le tribunal, et le juge pourrait, s'il le désire, l'accuser de désobéissance pour n'avoir pas produit de renseignements. C'est le seul moyen de pression, en dehors de la bonne volonté et de la compréhension.

M. Mosley: Oui. C'est un risque qu'elles courent.

Le sénateur Doyle: Bien sûr. Mais, d'une façon générale, on fait surtout appel à leur sens de la responsabilité et à leur compréhension.

M. Mosley: Oui, mais elles ont peut-être encore plus intérêt à se comporter en citoyens responsables dans la mesure où elles disposent des biens. Elles ont les produits en leur possession.

Le sénateur Doyle: Lorsqu'on parle de leurs activités à l'étranger, je suis perdu et stupéfait. Quelquefois, je me demande vraiment en quoi elles se sentent responsables.

M. Mosley: Il existe un exemple simple, le cas Hendin à St. Catharines. La succursale de la banque qui détenait ces fonds recyclait les produits d'activités criminelles.

Les banques savent que leurs agents peuvent être tenus responsables et c'est entre autres, pour cette raison qu'elles ont tellement tenu à adopter ces politiques pour mieux connaître leurs clients. Il n'est pas impossible qu'une institution financière ou ses directeurs soient accusés, en vertu de la loi existante ou des dispositions de ce projet de loi, pour avoir en leur possession les produits d'activités criminelles ou les avoir recyclés. Les banques ont donc intérêt dans une certaine mesure à se comporter de façon responsable. Mais elles ne sont pas obligées de se conformer à l'article 420.27. Il leur donne une indication dans la mesure où elles ne doivent pas faire de déclaration en se fondant uniquement sur un soupçon mais bien avoir des motifs raisonnables. Ainsi, cette protection n'est pas valable pour un rapport complètement arbitraire ou capricieux à la police; il faut des motifs raisonnables.

Selon la description actuellement donnée aux employés de banques, l'argent recyclé comprend généralement un grand nombre de petites coupures, des billets qui ne sont pas propres et qui ne semblent pas venir d'une entreprise qui reçoit normalement des petites coupures. Ce type de renseignements devrait normalement éveiller les soupçons pour des motifs raisonnable et ainsi, cette disposition protégerait l'employé de banque qui fait une déclaration aux autorités.

Le principe de la confidentialité a toujours comporté l'exception concernant l'intérêt public mais, malheureusement, la jurisprudence n'a pas défini la portée de cette exception. Il a dont été difficile aux banques et à leurs conseillers juridiques de dire à leurs directeurs: «Tout ira bien, si vous agissez sur cette base, parce que c'est une exception à la règle.» En codifiant, en fait, cette exception, nous espérons leur donner des guidance as to when they can feel protected in making such a disclosure.

Senator Doyle: When a person is facing a charge or is convicted of a charge which involves, for example, drug trafficking, and it is found that he has $10 million sitting in the bank or a group of banks and this legislation starts to be activated, is it necessary to prove that the $10 million that is there is entirely from illegal sources, or does the fight then begin over how much of the $10 million that is sitting in the bank accounts is from the proceeds of illegal enterprise?

Mr. Mosley: That will present considerable difficulty. The Crown will always retain the burden of proving that the property has been obtained by crime.

In those circumstances the bill permits an inference to be drawn by the court. If there is no legitimate source of income for the individual, then the court may draw the inference that the net worth of the individual has been obtained by the commission of enterprise or designated drug offences.

One of the reasons why this bill provides for the disclosure of tax information is to support that inference. Quite frankly, we do not expect that the application for tax information will often disclose income from criminal sources—although that is not inconceivable. We are advised by Revenue Canada that sometimes taxpayers report the source of their income, and that source is illegal. But, for the most part, it will go to prove a negative, namely, that this individual has not reported any legitimate source of income from which the assets could have grown.

One example which the police brought to our attention some years ago was of a motorcycle gang member in Calgary who had managed, over the course of a few years, to acquire a magnificent ranch, beautiful automobiles, a plane and business interests. During the course of that period of years he had never worked at any visible job.

In that type of case—and there was evidence that that individual was engaged in drug trafficking—the Crown would have to go to court and prove the predicate offence—that is, the fact that the individual was drug trafficking. He would then have to lead the evidence to support the inference that all this property which has been amassed could not have come from any legitimate source, but must have come from the designated drug offence which the individual had been committing, the drug trafficking.

Senator Doyle: Not the individual offence, but the area of the offence.

Mr. Mosley: Yes.

Senator Doyle: For example, let us sy that I am this drug dealer again. If I get caught bringing in 10 pounds of hashish on an airplane, that could leave my entire fortune vulnerable if I cannot say, "Well this came from this and that came from that."

Mr. Mosley: Yes. The system would be totally ineffective if it did not.

indications plus précises afin qu'ils sachent à quel moment ils peuvent impunément communiquer les renseignements.

Le sénateur Doyle: Lorsqu'une personne est accusée ou condamnée pour une infraction concernant, par exemple, le trafic de drogues, et que l'on s'aperçoit qu'elle a dans une ou plusieur banques une somme de 10 millions de dollars, est-il nécessaire, avec ce projet de loi, de prouver que les 10 millions de dollars viennent entièrement de sources illégales, ou va-t-on se battre pour savoir quelle proportion des 10 millions déposés à la banque provient d'activités illègales?

M. Mosley: Ceci posera des problèmes considérables. Ce sera toujours à la Couronne de prouver que les biens ont été criminellement obtenus.

Ici le projet de loi permet au tribunal de faire des déductions. Si la personne concernée n'a pas de source légitime de revenu, le tribunal peut en déduire que ces biens ont été obtenus poar la perpétration d'infractions de criminalité organisée ou désignées en matière de drogue.

C'est justement pour étayer ces déductions que le projet de loi prévoit la communications de renseignements fiscaux. Très franchement, nous ne pensons pas que l'ordonnance de communication de renseignements fiscaux permettra souvent de faire apparaître des revenus de sources criminelles—quoi que ce ne soit pas inconcevable. On nous a dit à Revenu Canada que les contribuables révélaient parfois la source de leur revenu et que cette source était illégale. Mais dans la plupart des cas, le résultat sera négatif, c'est-à-dire que cette communication de renseignements permettra de montrer que la personne n'a pas fait état d'une source de revenu légitime d'où aurait pu provenir les biens.

Il y a quelques années, la police a attiré notre attention sur les cas d'un membre d'une bande de motards à Calgary qui avait réussi, en quelques années, à acquérir un superbe ranch, de belles voitures, un avion et des intérêts commerciaux. Pendant cette période, il n'avait jamais eu d'emploi visible.

Dans ce type de cas—et il était clair que cette personne faisait du trafic de stupéfiants—la Couronne serait obligée de prouver au tribunal l'infraction présumée, c'est-à-dire que la personne du trafic de drogue. Il faudrait ensuite fournir les preuves suffisantes pour que l'on puisse conclure que tous les biens ainsi amassés ne peuvent pas provenir d'une source légitime mais bien de l'infraction désignée en matière de drogue dont la personne est coupable, c'est-à-dire le trafic.

Le sénateur Doyle: Pas l'infraction proprement dite, mais le type d'infraction.

M. Mosley: Oui.

Le sénateur Doyle: Supposons que je sois ce trafiquant. Si je me faisais prendre avec 10 livres de haschisch à bord d'un avion, toute ma fortune serait vulnérable si je ne pouvais pas expliquer d'où est provenu ceci et d'où est provenu cela.

M. Mosley: Oui. Le système serait tout à fait inefficace autrement.

Le sénateur Doyle: C'est juste.

[Text]

Mr. Mosley: In those circumstances you cannot establish any proceeds from that particular occurrence.

Senator Doyle: It is not just the one transaction, it is the area.

Mr. Mosley: That is right.

The Chairman: Will this bill help you catch that man in Calgary?

Mr. Mosley: Most definitely it will.

The Chairman: How do you link them if you do not have the direct evidence?

Mr. Mosley: You establish first, beyond a reasonable doubt, that the individual is engaged in drug trafficking.

Senator Flynn: It is a presumption.

Mr. Mosley: At that point in time in the sentencing process—

The Chairman: You would have to establish that, though?

Mr. Mosley: Yes. You could not launch an action against the individual without establishing the criminal activity, and it has to be criminal activity of the nature that the bill addresses—that is, an enterprise crime or designated drug offence.

The Americans, as I mentioned earlier, have administrative forfeitures. In a case like that, under their system they might be able to move in and seize the ranch and the other property on the basis of their belief that the individual was a drug trafficker and then put him to the challenge of belief. Our system has to be linked to a criminal prosecution, with the exception of where the accused absconds or dies. In those circumstances, a charge has been laid and then the court could proceed, but the Crown would still have to prove that the individual had been engaged in drug trafficking or other criminal enterprise and that the property in those circumstances, beyond a reasonable doubt, flowed from the commission of such offences.

Senator Doyle: I have one very short question before we finish. It is really not a question; it is an observation, but I will frame it as a question. I hope that you are working on the other half of the legislation, which would prohibit people from making money from having been involved in crime.

Senator Flynn: Having been involved in crime?

Senator Doyle: Yes, people who sell their life stories.

Senator Buckwold: Would that apply to politicians, too?

Senator Doyle: Only if they are caught or if they abscond.

Senator Flynn: That is not fair.

Senator Doyle: No. It is quite a serious question.

Mr. Mosley: It is a serious issue. We have, in fact, looked at that question over the years.

[Traduction]

M. Mosley: Dans ces circonstances, vous ne pouvez pas prouvé que des profits ont été tirés de cette situation particulière.

Le sénateur Doyle: Il ne s'agit pas de la transaction proprement dite, mais bien du domaine d'activité.

M. Mosley: Oui.

La présidente: Est-ce que ce projet de loi vous aidera à attraper cet homme à Calgary?

M. Mosley: Absolument.

La présidente: Comment pouvez-vous établir des liens, si vous n'avez pas la preuve directe?

M. Mosley: Premièrement, vous établissez, au-delà de tout doute raisonnable, que la personne fait du trafic de stupéfiants.

Le sénateur Flynn: C'est une supposition.

M. Mosley: A ce moment-là du processus de détermination de la peine . . .

La présidente: Cependant, vous devriez le démontrer?

M. Mosley: Oui. Vous ne pouvez pas intenter de poursuites contre quelqu'un sans prouver qu'il y a une activité criminelle et ce doit être l'une des activités criminelles concernées par le projet de loi—c'est-à-dire en rapport avec la criminalité organisée ou une infraction désignée en matière de drogue.

Comme je l'ai dit tout à l'heure, les Américains ont un système de saisie administrative. Dans un cas comme celui-là, ils pourraient intervenir et saisir le ranch et les autres biens parce qu'ils pensent que cette personne fait du trafic de stupéfiants et l'obliger ensuite à contester la décision. Notre système exige des poursuites pénales, sauf dans les cas où l'accusé s'esquive ou meurt. Dans ces circonstances, le tribunal peut juger l'affaire lorsque des accusations ont été portées mais la Couronne doit néanmoins prouver que l'individu a fait du trafic de stupéfiants ou s'est livré à d'autres activités criminelles et que les biens en question proviennent, au-delà de tout doute raisonnable, de la perpétration de ces infractions.

Le sénateur Doyle: Une toute petite question avant de terminer. En fait ce n'est pas une question, c'est plutôt une observation, mais je vais la présenter come une question. J'espère que vous travaillez sur l'autre moitié de la législation, qui empêcherait les gens de gagner de l'argent pour avoir participé à des activités criminelles.

Le sénateur Flynn: Avoir participé à des activités criminelles?

Le sénateur Doyle: Oui, des gens qui vendent l'histoire de leur vie.

Le sénateur Buckwold: Est-ce que ceci s'appliquerait aussi aux politiciens?

Le sénateur Doyle: Seulement s'ils sont pris ou s'ils s'esquivent.

Le sénateur Flynn: Ce n'est pas juste.

Le sénateur Doyle: Non. C'est une question très sérieuse.

M. Mosley: C'est une question grave. En fait, nous y réfléchissons depuis plusieurs années.

[Text]

Senator Doyle: You should do it before Peter Demeter dies.

Senator Buckwold: And before Olson writes his book.

Mr. Mosley: It will be addressed by the Uniform Law Conference in August, but it is rife with difficulties, if I may say so.

Senator Doyle: Oh, I understand.

Senator Flynn: I note that the crime of soliciting is not mentioned.

Mr. Mosley: No, although bawdy house is. The pimping and bawdy house provisions were included in the list of enterprise crimes under sections 193 and 195 of the Code.

Senator Flynn: Yes. I see it under procuring, but soliciting itself is not mentioned. I know that they have established that such income is subject to income tax.

Mr. Mosley: The bill really is not addressed to the street level individual.

Senator Flynn: Street level? Would that be the proper description to provide an exception for soliciting?

The Chairman: Mr. Mosley, before we let you go, will you please tell us what happened to the money that Mr. Pinto deposited in the Royal Bank? Is it waiting for this bill to be passed?

Mr. Mosley: I believe it is still there subject to a civil action by the U.S. government, I believe. My friend, Mr. Corbett, may be closer to the actual circumstances.

The Chairman: We will not carry you to the next chapter.

Mr. William H. Corbett, Senior General Counsel, Criminal Prosecutions, Department of Justice: I would expect his heirs are after it now. I would expect it is still sitting there.

Senator Buckwold: But who gets the money?

Mr. Mosley: Under this, either the federal or provincial Crown would get it, depending on who had carriage of the action.

Senator Buckwold: It could be a fair amount of money.

Mr. Mosley: It could be. We have avoided trying to predict the amount because it is difficult to estimate. However, it could be, on a national level, in the millions of dollars every year.

Senator Buckwold: Could I ask Mr. Corbett what to me is an interesting question? When the Americans put in their legislation, was there a trend toward these illegal operators, these criminals, putting their money in our financial institutions?

Mr. Corbett: That is a good question. I have had individuals tell me that there is a trend, not just for money to come to Canada but for criminals themselves to come to Canada and bring their money with them. I had a senior German public servant tell me, years ago in a very quiet and polite way, that Le sénateur Doyle: Vous devriez le faire avant que Peter Demeter ne meure.

Le sénateur Buckwold: Et avant qu'Olson n'écrive son livre.

M. Mosley: Ce sera examiné lors de la Conférence sur l'uniformisation du droit au mois d'août, mais c'est rempli de difficultés, si je puis dire.

Le sénateur Doyle: Oh, je comprends.

Le sénateur Flynn: Je note que la sollicitation n'est pas mentionnée.

M. Mosley: Non, quoique l'on parle de maisons de débauche. Les dispositions sur le proxénétisme et les maisons de débauche ont été incluses dans la liste des infractions de criminalité organisée, en vertu des articles 193 et 195 du Code.

Le sénateur Flynn: Oui. Je vois que l'on parle de proxénétisme mais la sollicitation n'est pas mentionnée. Je sais que l'on a décidé que ces revenus étaient imposables.

M. Mosley: Le projet de loi ne vise pas vraiment les personnes qui travaillent dans la rue.

Le sénateur Flynn: Dans la rue? Est-ce que c'est ainsi qu'il faudrait décrire les choses pour faire une exception pour la sollicitation?

La présidente: Monsieur Mosley, avant de partir, pouvez-vous nous dire ce qui est arrivé à l'argent que M. Pinto avait déposé à la Banque royale? Attend-on que le projet de loi soit adopté?

M. Mosley: Je crois qu'il y a toujours des poursuites civiles intentées par le gouvernement américain. Mon confrère, M. Corbett, connaît peut-être mieux la situation que moi.

La présidente: Nous n'allons pas vous faire passer au chapitre suivant.

M. William H. Corbett, avocat général, Poursuites pénales, ministère de la Justice: Je suppose que ses héritiers essaient maintenant d'obtenir l'argent. Je présume qu'il est toujours là.

Le sénateur Buckwold: Mais qui va avoir l'argent?

M. Mosley: Avec ceci, ce sera la Couronne, soit fédérale soit provinciale, selon la procédure qui a été suivie.

Le sénateur Buckwold: Ce pourrait être une somme considérable.

M. Mosley: Oui. Nous avons évité de tenter d'évaluer la somme, parce qu'elle est difficile à estimer. Cependant, au niveau national, ce pourrait être des millions de dollars chaque année.

Le sénateur Buckwold: Puis-je poser à M. Corbett une question qui m'intrigue? Lorsque les Américains ont adopté leur loi, ces criminels ou ces trafiquants ont-ils eu tendance à déposer leur argent dans nos institutions financières?

M. Corbett: C'est une bonne question. Certains m'ont dit qu'il y avait là une tendance et que c'était non seulement l'argent mais aussi les criminels eux-mêmes, apportant leurs fonds avec eux, qui venaient au Canada. Il y a des années, un haut fonctionnaire allemand n'avait dit très calmement et très

[Text]

Canada was becoming known as a place for criminals and their money to locate because of our lax immigration laws, our absence of mutual legal assistance legislation and the absence of effective proceeds of crime legislation. So it is a combination of things. It is not just a place to put your money; it is also a comfortable place to live with your money.

Senator Buckwold: My question is: Has that happened? You say it has been talked about; but, from your point of view, have you seen people move into Canada as a result?

Mr. Corbett: Yes.

Senator Buckwold: Do you feel this legislation might have a restrictive element in that regard?

Mr. Corbett: Bill C-61, in dealing with the foreign proceeds?

Senator Buckwold: Yes.

Mr. Corbett: Does it cover foreign proceeds?

Mr. Mosley: Most definitely, it does. It does not matter where you made the proceeds.

Senator Buckwold: It says the crime can be committed anywhere, if it was an offence in Canada?

Mr. Mosley: Exactly.

Senator Flynn: This legislation has no retroactive effect?

Mr. Mosley: No.

Senator Flynn: It does not apply to people who are presently in jail and who will come out in a few years and be able to live in luxury for the rest of their lives?

Mr. Mosley: That is an interesting question. It has retrospective effect, in that if they are in possession of the proceeds of crime after the legisltion comes into effect, whenever those proceeds have been generated, then they are committing a crime under this legislation.

Senator Flynn: By keeping them?

Mr. Mosley: By keeping the proceeds.

Senator Flynn: That is interesting.

Senator Buckwold: Would Olson's $100,000 come into that type of proceeds of crime?

Mr. Mosley: No.

Senator Flynn: Would the retroactivity not be contested?

Mr. Mosley: I would characterize it as restrospective.

Senator Flynn: That might go against the Charter; not that I am coming to the defence of these people.

Mr. Mosley: But the offence is committed after the legislation comes into effect.

poliment, que le Canada commençait à se faire connaître comme un endroit privilégié pour les criminels et leurs fonds, étant donné la souplesse de nos lois d'immigration, l'absence de législation d'entraide juridique et l'absence d'une loi efficace sur les produits de la criminalité. C'est donc un ensemble d'éléments. Ce n'est pas simplement un endroit où placer son argent, c'est un endroit confortable pour vivre avec son argent.

Le sénateur Buckwold: La question est de savoir si ceci s'est produit? Vous dites qu'on en a parlé, mais avez-vous vu des gens s'installer au Canada de cette façon-là?

M. Corbett: Oui.

Le sénateur Buckwold: Pensez-vous que cette loi pourrait avoir un effet restrictif à cet égard?

M. Corbett: Le projet de loi C-61, en ce qui concerne les revenus étrangers?

Le sénateur Buckwold: Oui.

M. Corbett: Le projet de loi concerne-t-il les produits étrangers?

M. Mosley: Oui, certainement. Peu importe où les produits de la criminalité ont été obtenus.

Le sénateur Buckwold: Il prévoit que les infractions peuvent être commises n'importe où, à partir du moment où c'est une infraction au Canada.

M. Mosley: Exactement.

Le sénateur Flynn: Cette loi n'a pas d'effet rétroactif?

M. Mosley: Non.

Le sénateur Flynn: Elle ne s'applique pas aux personnes actuellement incarcérées, qui vont sortir dans quelques années et vivre dans le luxe pour le reste de leurs jours?

M. Mosley: C'est une question intéressante. Il y a un effet rétrospectif en ce sens que si ces personnes ont en leur possession les produits d'activités criminelles après l'entrée en vigueur de la loi, quel que soit le moment où ces produits ont été obtenus, elles sont coupables d'une infraction en vertu de cette loi.

Le sénateur Flynn: En les conservant?

M. Mosley: En conservant les produits d'activités criminelles.

Le sénateur Flynn: C'est intéressant.

Le sénateur Buckwold: Est-ce que les 100 000 $ d'Olson entreraient dans cette catégorie de produits d'activités criminelles?

M. Mosley: Non.

Le sénateur Flynn: La rétroactivité ne serait-elle pas contestée?

M. Mosley: Je parle de côté rétrospectif.

Le sénateur Flynn: Ceci peut être contraire à la Charte, non pas que je cherche à défendre ces personnes.

M. Mosley: Mais l'infraction est commise après l'entrée en vigueur de la législation.

[Text]

Senator Flynn: Well, yes, but they are already in possession. You say the fact that you have had possession before this legislation came into force is a crime.

Mr. Mosley: I would argue that the possession is a continuing offence.

Senator Flynn: Yes, continuation of a state of facts that existed prior to the legislation coming into force. That would be an interesting question.

Senator Doyle: We used to get some of this money out of inheritance taxes.

The Chairman: Mr. Mosley, I just want to ask you a short question. I see extortion in the list of offences here. We were just dealing with Bill C-89 where extortion and loan-sharking are mentioned. I do not see loan-sharking here. Maybe I have missed it somewhere. We were talking about restitution in Bill C-89, and here we are talking about forfeiture. Using extortion as an example, can you tell me how you would deal with the money there, or how is it going to be dealt with? If you convict somebody of extorting large sums of money from a range of people, small shopkeepers, for instance, will the first emphasis be on restitution, and if there is any left over or that cannot be traced back to a particular person, then the rest would be forfeited to the Crown?

Mr. Mosley: Exactly.

The Chairman: Is that what happens?

Mr. Mosley: The bill gives priority to restitution. It may be that, in those cases, there will be, in fact, no forfeiture to the state. The bill does provide very useful mechanisms in order to seize or freeze the property. So presumably, if there were identifiable victims, and if at the end of the day the victims received restitution and there was nothing left over for forfeiture, then this legislation would still have provided the administration of justice with a very effective means of grabbing that money before the accused was able to dispose of it. So it would be protected and preserved for disposition by the court and for the benefit of the victims, I would imagine, in most cases of extortion and similar crimes.

The Chairman: Thank you very much. That has certainly given us a useful first look at Bill C-61, Mr. Mosley.

Mr. Mosley: If you do not mind, Madam Chairman, I will remain for Mr. Corbett's presentation.

The Chairman: By all means. I am sorry that we are not leaving very much time this morning for you, Mr. Corbett, but if we cannot finish today, we will certainly look forward to your coming back a little later.

Mr. Corbett: I will try to present this in a brief fashion. I should start, in speaking about mutual legal assistance in criminal matters, which is the mouthful we have to use, with a description of what it is. It has been defined as follows: It is an arrangement whereby a country—the requested state—at the request of another country—the requesting state—agrees to gather, in its own territory, evidence of a crime which is largely or entirely committed in the requesting state. It is gath-

[Traduction]

Le sénateur Flynn: Oui, mais ces biens sont déjà en leur possession. Vous dites que le fait d'avoir eu sa possession ces biens avant l'entrée en vigueur de la législation constitue une infraction.

M. Mosley: Je dirais que la possession est une infraction permanente.

Le sénateur Flynn: Oui, le maintien d'une situation existant avant l'entrée en vigueur de la législation. La question pourrait être intéressante.

Le sénateur Doyle: Nous avions certains de ces fonds avec les impôts sur les successions.

La présidente: Monsieur Mosley, je voudrais vous poser une brève question. Je vois que l'extorsion figure dans la liste d'infractions. Nous parlions justement du projet de loi C-89 où l'on mentionne l'extorsion et l'usure. Je ne vois pas l'usure ici. J'ai peut-être mal regardé. Nous parlions de restitution dans le projet de loi C-89 et ici, il s'agit de confiscation. Si l'on prend l'extorsion comme exemple, pouvez-vous me dire ce que l'on va faire de l'argent? Si l'on condamne quelqu'un pour avoir extorqué de grosses sommes d'argent à différentes personnes, par exemple à de petits commerçants, insistera-t-on sur la restitution, et, s'il reste de l'argent ou si l'on ne peut savoir à qui il appartient, le reste serait confisqué pour la Couronne?

M. Mosley: Exactement.

La présidente: Est-ce ainsi que ça se passe?

M. Mosley: Le projet de loi donne la priorité à la restitution. Il se peut que, dans ces cas-là, il n'y ait pas en fait, de confiscation au profit de l'État. Le projet de loi établit des mécanismes très utiles pour saisir ou bloquer des biens. Par conséquent, s'il est possible d'identifier les victimes et qu'après leur avoir restitué leurs biens, il ne reste rien à confisquer, la loi aura néanmoins donné à l'administration de la justice un moyen très efficace de récupérer ces fonds avant que l'accusé ne puisse en disposer. Ils seront ainsi protégés et préservés pour que les tribunaux en disposent comme ils l'entendent et pour que les victimes reçoivent une compensation, dans la plupart des cas d'extorsion ou d'activités criminelles semblables.

La présidente: Merci beaucoup. Ce premier aperçu du projet de loi C-61 que vous nous avez donné aura été très utile, monsieur Mosley.

M. Mosley: Si vous me le permettez, madame la présidente, je voudrais rester pour l'exposé de M. Corbett.

La présidente: Mais bien sûr. Je regrette que nous ne vous ayons pas laissé devantage de temps, monsieur Corbett, mais s'il nous est impossible de finir aujourd'hui, j'espère que vous pourrez revenir un peu plus tard.

M. Corbett: Je vais essayer d'être bref. Pour commencer, je devrais vous expliquer ce que l'on entend par entraide juridique en matière criminelle. La définition en est la suivante: il s'agit d'une entente en vertu de laquelle un pays, le pays faisant l'objet de la demande, accepte, à la demande d'un autre pays, le pays demandeur, de recueillir, sur son propre territoire, des éléments de preuve sur des activités criminelles perpétrées totalement ou partiellement dans l'État demandeur. Il cring information, intelligence, evidence in Canada by Canadians at the request of a foreign state to assist their investigation or prosecution, and it is reciprocal. In these arrangements, Canada receives the same kind of benefits as it is able to provide.

To distinguish this from extradition, for instance, extradition is the location and the return of a fugitive at the request of a foreign state. Mutual assistance is the obtaining and providing of information, evidence, intelligence to that foreign state. The two are similar. In a general context, both extradition and the providing of information and evidence are mutual assistance factors.

Law enforcement agencies have recognized for many decades that major crimes and criminal organizations are transnational in scope. For instance, drug trafficking, money laundering, major fraud cases, major tax evasion and terrorist offences are all transnational in scope and, in fact, the activities of organized crime are transnational in scope and the police have known this for some considerable time. There has been a great deal of mutual assistance at the police level—that is, police forces across the border helping each other out and providing information and intelligence. The existence of Interpol is a recognition of this. Interpol is, essentially, an organization that looks for fugitives and that indexes international warrants to locate people.

But criminals have also learned, long before the police recognized this, to use international boundaries to cloak their activities, and to use bank secrecy jurisdictions to hide the proceeds of crime and to escape detection.

The solution to this growing international phenomenon was for nations to start acting together to deal with the problem. The Europeans have had a convention and mutual assistance since 1959. The response to the problem has been through the negotiation of treaties.

Canada became involved in this phenomenon as a result of the Bank of Nova Scotia case, which was referred to here, in 1983. We recognized the limitations of existing law in providing the kind of assistance our neighbours wanted. As a conscious decision, we decided that we would sit down and negotiate a treaty with the United States in order to learn what mutual assistance was about; determine what we wanted from it and what the Americans were concerned about. We held seven sessions with them during which we changed from being rather lukewarm about the enterprise to being somewhat enthusiastic about it. A treaty was signed with the Americans on March 18, 1985 and, since then, we have concluded negotiations with the United Kingdom; and we are close to a conclusion with Australia, the Bahamas, and we are about to commence with Switzerland.

The RCMP identified the countries with which they felt mutual assistance was a priority and, besides our close neighbours, they have identified the bank secrecy jurisdictions.

s'agit de recueillir des renseignements, de l'information, des éléments de preuve au Canada, à la demande d'un État étranger, pour l'aider dans une enquête ou des poursuites, et l'entente est réciproque. En effet, le Canada reçoit le même genre de services que ceux qu'il fournit.

C'est différent de l'extradition puisque, en réponse à une demande d'extradition d'un État étranger, on essaie de retrouver et de renvoyer un fugitif dans cet État. Lorsqu'on parle d'entraide juridique, il s'agit d'obtenir et de fournir des renseignemetns, des éléments de preuve, des informations à cet État étranger. Dans un contexte général, l'extradition et la communication de renseignements et d'éléments de preuve sont toutes deux des facteurs d'entraide.

Depuis de nombreuses années, toutes les polices savent que les grandes organisations criminelles et les principales activités criminelles dépassent les frontières. Par exemple, le trafic de stupéfiants, le recyclage de fonds, les grandes escroqueries, les fraudes fiscales graves et les actes terroristes sont tous de nature transnationale et, en fait, ceci est vrai pour toutes les activités du crime organisé, comme les polices le savent depuis bien longtemps. Il y a eu beaucoup d'entraide au niveau de la police, c'est-à-dire que les forces policières des deux côtés d'une frontière s'entraident et se communiquent des renseignements et des informations. L'existence d'Interpol en est la preuve. Interpol est, essentiellement, une organisation qui recherche les fugitifs et établit des mandats internationaux pour retrouver des gens.

Mais les criminels ont également appris, bien avant la police, à se servir des frontières internationales pour dissimuler leurs activités et à utiliser les pays où existe le secret bancaire pour faire disparaître les produits d'activités criminelles et ne pas être découverts.

Pour s'attaquer à ce phénomène international de plus en plus important, il fallait que les pays décident d'agir ensemble. Les Européens ont une convention d'entraide mutuelle depuis 1959. On a tenté de résoudre le problème en négociant des traités.

Ce phénomène a intéressé le Canada pour la première fois lors de l'affaire de la Banque de Nouvelle-Écosse, qui lui a été renvoyée en 1983. Nous nous sommes rendu compte alors que notre loi ne nous permettait pas de donner à nos voisins le type d'aide qu'ils nous demandaient. Nous avons donc décidé d'entamer des négociations en vue de conclure un traité avec les États-Unis pour mieux connaître la question de l'entraide juridique, savoir ce que nous en attendions et ce que souhaitaient les Américains. Nous avons eu sept rencontres avec les représentants américains au cours desquelles notre attitude a considérablement changé puisque nous étions plutôt tièdes au début et que nous étions devenus absolument enthousiastes à la fin. Un traité a été signé avec les Américains le 18 mars 1985 et, depuis lors, nous avons terminé nos négociations avec le Royaume-Uni, nous avons presque terminé avec l'Australie et les Bahamas et nous sommes sur le point de commencer avec la Suisse.

La GRC a déterminé les pays avec qui nous devrions nous entendre en premier lieu et, outre nos voisins immédiats, ce sont les pays où existe le secret bancaire qui ont été retenus.

Our objective is to set up a treaty network that will allow us to pursue crime around the world and to provide assistance to those countries where Canada has been the locus of the evidence or the proceeds of crime.

A treaty, essentially, is a contract. It is an orderly international set of relationships for both receiving and providing assistance, to investigate the crime and then provide the evidence for the trial. The treaties set out what kind of assistance we will obtain and give and they advance the system from the existing law. For instance, under the treaties we are obliged to be able to provide a search warrant to a wholly foreign investigation and receive similar assistance. We are obliged to gather documents, records, evidence, to take evidence on oath, to exchange information or intelligence, as the police call it and, for instance, to survey things for foreign police forces.

The assistance breaks down into two categories: what you would call assistance that needs a compulsory process, where you would go to a court to get an order, and assistance which can be provided without that kind of an order. For instance, if the foreign police simply want to know who is living at a certain address, or if a certain witness can be located in Canada, that does not require court assistance. However, if a search warrant is needed, then that would be something which, under our principles, would require to be obtained through a court.

The treaties need legislation to implement them. The existing legislation is not sufficient. The bill before you, Bill C-58, provides the authority for Canadian officials—those being attorneys, judges and police—to gather the information and evidence that may be contained in the foreign request. Compulsory processes are orders from the court for a search warrant, or for an evidence-gathering order, which may be to produce the records or bring forward documents or to come forward and testify in a certain matter. It is an order from the court. The court may order the release of a prisoner in Canada to allow him, on his own consent, to testify abroad or to help a foreign investigation abroad. In other words, it is a temporary release of a serving prisoner in Canada. It is not uncommon that a prisoner is prepared to assist a foreign investigation.

The order may involve the removal of exhibits that are tied up in a Canadian prosecution to a foreign jurisdiction. For instance, if a murder weapon were involved in a case in Canada and the same weapon needed to be tested for a foreign homicide, an order could be obtained to release an exhibit.

In these cases, applications are made to Canadian courts and those courts must be satisfied that there are grounds to issue the order—that is, grounds that an offence has been committed in a foreign jurisdiction and that there is evidence in Canada that would assist the investigation of that offence.

Notre objectif est d'établir un réseau de traités qui nous permettra de poursuivre les criminels dans le monde entier et de venir en aide à d'autres pays, lorsque les activités criminelles se sont déroulées au Canada ou que les produits de ces activités s'y trouvent.

Un traité est essentiellement un contrat. C'est un système ordonné de relations internationales permettant de recevoir et de fournir de l'aide, de faire enquête sur des activités criminelles et de transmettre des éléments de preuve pour le procès. Les traités précisent le type d'aide que nous obtiendrons et que nous donnerons et vont au-delà de la loi existante. Par exemple, les traités nous obligent à fournir un mandat de perquisition pour une enquête totalement étrangère et nous permettent de recevoir une aide semblable. Nous sommes obligés de recueillir des documents, des dossiers, des éléments de preuve, d'entendre des témoignages sous serment, d'échanger des informations ou des renseignements, comme dit la police et, par exemple, de surveiller certaines activités pour des polices étrangères.

L'aide se divise en deux catégories: d'une part, les mesures obligatoires pour lesquelles il faut obtenir un mandat du tribunal, et d'autre part, l'aide que l'on peut fournir sans ce type d'ordonnance. Par exemple, si une police étrangère veut simplement savoir qui habite à une certaine adresse ou s'il est possible de retrouver un certain témoin au Canada, il n'est pas nécessaire de faire intervenir le tribunal. Par contre, pour détenir un mandat de perquisition, nous devons passer par un tribunal.

Pour appliquer les traités, il faut une loi. En effet, la législation en vigueur n'est pas suffisante. Le projet de loi devant vous, le C-58, donne aux autorités canadiennes, c'est-à-dire les procureurs, les juges et la police, le pouvoir de recueillir les renseignements et les éléments de preuve requis dans une demande étrangère. Il y a des procédures obligatoires comme les mandats de perquisition délivrés par les tribunaux et les ordonnances d'obtention d'éléments de preuve, demandant de produire des dossiers ou de présenter des documents ou de venir témoigner dans une certaine affaire. Ce sont des ordonnances du tribunal. Le tribunal peut ordonner la libération d'un prisonnier au Canada pour lui permettre, avec son consentement, de témoigner à l'étranger ou dans le cadre d'une enquête à l'étranger. Autrement dit, on libère temporairement un prisonnier purgeant sa peine au Canada. Il n'est pas rare qu'un prisonnier consente à apporter son aide dans une enquête étrangère.

L'ordonnance peut obliger parfois de mettre à la disposition d'une juridiction étrangère des pièces à conviction utilisées dans des poursuites canadiennes. Par exemple, si une arme était l'arme d'un crime commis au Canada et devait en même temps être expertisée dans le cadre d'un homicide à l'étranger, il serait possible d'obtenir une ordonnance permettant de la prêter.

Dans ces cas-là, les demandes sont présentées aux tribunaux et ceux-ci doivent être convaincus qu'il existe des motifs raisonnables de délivrer l'ordonnance, c'est-à-dire avoir des raisons de penser qu'une infraction a été commise dans une juri-

Applications are made to superior court judges—that is, high court judges in Canada.

Where a compulsory process is not involved, the police themselves can provide the assistance directly by obtaining publicly available information, records, or things of that nature.

There are built-in safeguards to the process both in the treaties and in the legislation. The assistance is available to what are the more serious crimes, not every crime. In the treaty with the U.S., it is an offence punishable by more than one year imprisonment. For Canada, it is an indictable offence plus a list of selected provincial offences such as securities, wildlife and environment. We are trying to confine it to the more serious criminal matters.

An application for assistance made to Canada must be approved by the Minister of Justice and he can refuse that request if, in his view—and he may consult with provincial colleagues—it is not in Canada's public interest to grant it. Similarly, he can postpone if providing that assistance would interfere with something ongoing in Canada, particularly an ongoing investigation of our own.

As I indicated, it is the Canadian courts that will authorize the compulsory orders. They are also obliged to protect the interests of witnesses and third parties in the proceedings before the courts.

Conditions can be attached to the transfer of evidence by our courts to the foreign authorities—that is, conditions for the return of items that are taken or for the securing of the items that may be sent abroad.

The position would be that this legislation and this system would enhance Canadian sovereignty. In the U.S. treaty, the U.S. is obliged to use the treaty. If they want records from Canada, they cannot issue a subpoena to Canadian banks to cough up the records. They must make a request under this treaty. They cannot act unilaterally.

Under the system, we obtain the same kind of assistance as we are providing. In fact, today we have obtained the same kind of assistance covered here from the United States without being able to provide it on the basis of a good neighbour policy.

Under this system, the foreign police agencies have no authority to act in Canada. We do not open up our systems to foreign police to come in and make use of them. We obtain the request and put it into effect ourselves.

Senator Buckwold: Does that mean that a foreign agent is illegal in Canada?

Mr. Corbett: No, it does not mean that. In our relations with the United States, when foreign U.S. agencies want to do something in Canada, there is a mechanism in place now where they consult with the RCMP, and they obtain the diction étrangère et qu'il existe au Canada des éléments de preuve qui seraient utiles à l'enquête sur cette infraction.

Les demandes sont présentées aux juges des cours supérieures au Canada.

Lorsqu'il n'y a pas de procédure obligatoire, la police peut apporter une aide directe en se procurant les renseignements, les dossiers ou les pièces disponibles au public.

Il y a des mesures de sauvegarde aussi bien dans les traités que dans la législation. Cette entraide n'est valable que pour les actes criminels graves et non dans tous les cas. Dans le traité avec les États-Unis, il faut que ce soit une infraction passible de plus d'un an de prison. Pour le Canada, ce doit être un acte criminel ou une liste d'infractions provinciales touchant par exemple des titres mobiliers, la faune et l'environnement. Nous essayons de limiter ces mesures aux activités criminelles graves.

Les demandes d'aide présentées au Canada doivent être approuvées par le ministre de la Justice qui peut refuser la demande, s'il estime—et il peut consulter ses collègues provinciaux—qu'il n'est pas dans l'intérêt public canadien d'y accéder. De même, il peut surseoir à la demande s'il y a un conflit avec une procédure en cours au Canada, particulièrement une enquête.

Comme je l'ai expliqué, ce sont les tribunaux canadiens qui délivrent les ordonnances obligatoires. Ils sont tenus de protéger les intérêts des témoins et des tierces parties dans les procédures judiciaires.

Il est possible de fixer des conditions à la transmission d'éléments de preuve par nos tribunaux aux autorités étrangères, c'est-à-dire, des conditions concernant le retour d'articles empruntés, ou la mise en sûreté des articles envoyés à l'étranger.

En principe, cette loi et ce système renforceraient la souveraineté canadienne. Selon les dispositions du traité conclu avec les États-Unis, ceux-ci sont obligés d'utiliser le traité. S'ils veulent obtenir des dossiers du Canada, ils ne peuvent pas envoyer une assignation aux banques canadiennes les obligeant à produire les dossiers. Ils sont tenus de présenter une demande en vertu de ce traité et ne peuvent agir de façon unilatérale.

Avec ce système, nous pouvons bénéficier du même type d'aide que celle que nous fournissons. En fait, aujourd'hui, nous avons obtenu des États-Unis le même type d'assistance, ce qui n'aurait pas été possible simplement en vertu de la politique de bon voisinage.

Selon cette formule, les polices étrangères n'ont pas le pouvoir d'agir au Canada. Nous n'ouvrons pas nos portes à la police étrangère en lui permettant d'utiliser notre système comme elle l'entend. Nous recevons les demandes et les mettons en œuvre nous-mêmes.

Le sénateur Buckwold: Est-ce que ceci signifie que la présence d'un agent étranger au Canada est illégale?

M. Corbett: Non, ce n'est pas ce que ça signifie. Avec les États-Unis par exemple, lorsque des organismes américains veulent faire quelque chose au Canada, il existe un mécanisme leur permettant de consulter la GRC en vue d'obtenir son umbrella of the RCMP. If they want to come and speak to someone, it is usually with the RCMP; but it is not illegal for them to come in and endeavour to locate a potential witness.

Senator Buckwold: What about someone in an embassy in Ottawa who has agents who are getting information?

Mr. Corbett: I am not of the view that that would be illegal, although there might be complaints, depending on how he behaved. The danger is that the foreign police officer gets into trouble, and then it embarrasses him, his government, and his police force. The practice is that they consult with the RCMP who will make sure that they do not get into trouble.

Senator Doyle: For years the RCMP have been doing the work of the FBI and the CIA and anyone else who asked them, without reservation. I do not say this off the top of my head. I have been involved with a number of cases where this has been the fact where we have not had a law. Is this simply a law, a bill, a treaty arrangement that establishes what the RCMP have been doing is now legal and we now provide a law to contain it?

Mr. Corbett: I am not familiar with what they have been doing, but this system is predicated—

Senator Doyle: This had a great deal to do with the period involving the U.S. investigation of un-American activities and the entire communist scare up to and including 1981 and 1982; offences that are not offences in Canada that are offences in the United States.

Mr. Corbett: This scheme will only assist the investigation of a foreign offence that is covered in the treaty. In other words, in the United States, it must be an offence punishable by more than one year imprisonment. It could be investigated by local, state, city or federal police or by the FBI, but we could not provide assistance, for instance, to an inquiry into certain activities. It must be in pursuit of a criminal matter.

As my friend reminds me, there is the aspect that they come through us. We must be satisfied that it is in the Canadian public interest to provide the assistance requested. The treaty contains that clause. It is not in the Canadian public interest to provide assistance, for instance, in the investigation of a U.S. company selling buses to Cuba through a Canadian subsidiary. The Minister of Justice can refuse.

Senator Doyle: Then this would not include such things as the U.S. equivalent of a Royal Commission or a Crime Commission.

Mr. Corbett: That is correct.

Senator Doyle: It has to be a specific crime under their Criminal Code—

Mr. Corbett: That is correct.

Senator Doyle: —under their laws, and it would have to be offences that parallel offence here. As you know, there are some areas where extradiction does not work, even though we have a treaty with the United States.

accord pour agir. S'ils désirent venir parler à quelqu'un, c'est généralement par l'intermédiaire de la GRC, mais il n'est pas illégal de venir sur place pour tenter de trouver un témoin potentiel.

Le sénateur Buckwold: Qu'en est-il de quelqu'un qui dans une ambassade à Ottawa a des agents chargés d'obtenir des renseignements?

M. Corbett: Je ne pense que ce soit illégal, quoiqu'il puisse y avoir des plaintes, selon la façon dont la personne se comporte. Le danger c'est que l'agent de la police étrangère s'attire des ennuis et la situation devient alors embarrassante pour lui, son gouvernement et sa police. Dans la pratique, ces agents consultent la GRC pour être sûrs de ne pas avoir de problèmes.

Le sénateur Doyle: Pendant des années, la GRC a fait le travail du FBI et de la CIA et de tous ceux qui le lui demandaient, sans réserve. Je n'invente rien. J'ai suivi de près un certain nombre d'affaires où les choses se sont passées ainsi alors que nous n'avions pas de loi. En somme, nous avons là un projet de loi, un système de traités qui confirme et légalise ce que faisait déjà la GRC.

M. Corbett: Je ne sais pas exactement comment les choses se passaient, mais ce système vise . . .

Le sénateur Doyle: Il s'agit essentiellement de la période où les Américains enquêtaient sur toutes sortes d'activités anti-américaines et toutes les menaces communistes, y compris 1981 et 1982; ce sont des activités qui constituent des infractions aux États-Unis et non au Canada.

M. Corbett: Ce système ne sera valable que pour les enquêtes sur les infractions étrangères mentionnées dans le traité. Aux États-Unis, il faut que ce soit une infraction passible de plus d'un an d'emprisonnement. Ce pourrait être une enquête menée par la police locale ou de l'État, ou la police municipale ou fédérale, ou encore le FBI mais nous n'accordons pas notre aide pour tous les types d'enquêtes; il doit s'agir d'activités criminelles.

Comme me le rappelle mon confrère, il ne faut pas oublier qu'ils doivent passer par nous. Nous devons être convaincus qu'il est dans l'intérêt public canadien de fournir l'aide requise. Cette clause fait partie du traité. Par exemple, il n'est pas dans l'intérêt public canadien de fournir de l'aide dans une enquête sur une compagnie américaine vendant des autobus à Cuba par l'intermédiaire d'une filiale canadienne. Le ministre de la Justice peut refuser.

Le sénateur Doyle: Ceci ne concernerait donc pas l'équivalent américain d'une commission royale d'enquête ou d'une commission sur le crime.

M. Corbett: Exact.

Le sénateur Doyle: Il faut que ce soit un acte criminel particulier en vertu du Code criminel.

M. Corbett: C'est juste.

Le sénateur Doyle: Et il faut que ce soit des infractions qui se retrouvent ici. Comme vous le savez, il y a certains domaines où l'extradition est impossible, même s'il existe un traité avec les États-Unis.

[Text]

Mr. Corbett: We did not build a dual criminality aspect into this. In other words, they may request an offence that we do not have.

Senator Doyle: And we would allow that?

Mr. Corbett: If it is in the Canadian public interest to provide it.

Senator Doyle: If something is legal in Canada, then we assume that it is within the Canadian public interest, and it is good for Canada. As in the case of extradiction, we would not cooperate in the persecution and prosecution of a person in the United States for something that is not an offence in Canada, would we?

Mr. Corbett: Let me give you an example. The U.S. may have legislation aimed at a social evil that we do not have. We may have a different kind of legislation aimed at the same objective. My friend referred to the Bank Act in the United States that tries to monitor the movement of moneys across the border. That is a tool used to go after the proceeds of crime in U.S. prosecutions. We do not have the same kind of legislation. We have a different kind of legislation to attack the same social evil, if you will. The public interest protection allows us to look at the request, require as much information about that request as we think we need—it is set out in the treaty—and then to determine if providing assistance is in our interest.

Senator Doyle: And they will do the same for us?

Mr. Corbett: And they will do the same for us.

Senator Doyle: If they find somebody there who is good at mixing the yellow colour in margarine, they would let us know and give us all of the material that we would need to prosecute him here because it is an offence here and it is not there.

Mr. Corbett: Unless they felt that it was so far removed from the realm of what they wanted to help that it was against their public interest. Even the courts are wondering about the principle of dual criminality. You start looking for a match to those offences. We do not have the RICO legislation, as does the United States, but we recognize the purpose of it, which is to go after organized crime. We do it in a different way, through conspiracy and through the proceeds of crime legislation.

So we wanted something more flexible that would allow us to look at the requests, and, even though we do not have that kind of law, we could see the intent and purpose of the law and the objective they were seeking to achieve. If it were in our interest to provide assistance, we would provide it.

Senator Doyle: How would you explain to some poor Joe who finds that he is being investigated for something that is not a crime in this country, so his police, for whom he pays his taxes can give that information to another country?

Mr. Corbett: If you bind yourself with the dual criminality principle, you will be refusing mutual assistance for the legisla-

M. Corbett: Dans ce cas-ci, il n'y a pas de disposition concernant la double criminalité. En d'autres termes, il peut s'agir d'une infraction que nous n'avons pas.

Le sénateur Doyle: Et nous pouvons le permettre?

M. Corbett: Si c'est dans l'intérêt public canadien.

Le sénateur Doyle: Si quelque chose est légal au Canada, on peut supposer que c'est dans l'intérêt public canadien et que c'est une bonne chose pour le Canada. En ce qui concerne l'extradition, nous ne coopérerions pas pour poursuivre aux états-Unis une personne accusée de quelque chose qui n'est pas une infraction au Canada, n'est-ce pas?

M. Corbett: Je vais vous donner un exemple. Les États-Unis pourraient avoir une loi visant à lutter contre un mal social dont nous ne souffrons pas. Nous pourrions avoir une loi un peu différente visant le même objectif. Mon confrère parlait de la Loi sur les banques aux États-Unis qui vise à surveiller les mouvements d'argent de part et d'autre de la frontière. C'est un instrument que l'on utilise pour retrouver les produits d'activités criminelles dans les poursuites américaines. Nous n'avons pas le même type de loi. Nous avons une loi différente pour lutter contre le même mal social, si vous voulez. Dans le but de protéger l'intérêt public, nous pouvons examiner la demande, demander toutes les précisions qui nous semblent nécessaires—c'est prévu dans le traité—pour définir s'il est dans notre intérêt d'accorder l'aide demandée.

Le sénateur Doyle: Et l'on fera la même chose pour nous?

M. Corbett: On fera la même chose pour nous.

Le sénateur Doyle: Si l'on trouve là-bas quelqu'un qui est particulièrement doué pour ajouter du colorant jaune à la margarine, on nous préviendra et l'on nous donnera tous les éléments nécessaires pour poursuivre cette personne ici, parce que c'est une infraction ici et pas là-bas.

M. Corbett: A moins que les États-Unis ne considèrent que c'est tellement loin de leurs préoccupations que ce n'est pas dans l'intérêt public pour eux. En fait, même les tribunaux se posent des questions au sujet du principe de la double criminalité. On essaie de faire correspondre les infractions. Nous n'avons pas la loi RICO qui existe aux États-Unis, mais nous savons qu'elle a pour but de lutter contre le crime organisé. Nous précédons différemment, en utilisant des lois contre la conspiration et les produits de la criminalité.

Nous voulions donc quelque chose de plus flexible qui nous permette d'examiner les demandes et, même si nous n'avons pas le même type de loi, nous pouvons tenir compte de l'intention et de l'esprit de la loi et de l'objectif que l'on cherche à atteindre. S'il était dans notre intérêt d'accorder de l'aide, nous le ferions.

Le sénateur Doyle: Quelles explications allez-vous donner au pauvre diable qui se rend compte qu'il fait l'objet d'une enquête pour une activité qui n'est pas une infraction dans ce pays afin que sa police, qu'il paie dans ses impôts, puisse communiquer ces renseignements à un autre pays?

M. Corbett: Si vous vous en tenez au principe de la double criminalité, vous refusez le système d'entraide en vertu des tive goals that we pursue. I would say to him: "They say that you are involved in money laundering and that you broke the Bank Act in pursuing money laundering. We have the same kind of legislation here, sir. If you had committed those acts in Canada, all of the acts, not just the movement of money, we would prosecute you." We have looked at their whole investigation, and we are satisfied that this is an attack on a money laundering situation. Even though their legislation is different from ours, we think that it is in the Canadian public interest to provide that sort of help.

Senator Doyle: But you are talking about where it is the equivalent but different.

Mr. Corbett: Equivalent but different, yes.

Senator Doyle: I am sure that you can go through the code and find that there are 87 different offences that have different names in different countries; but surely we are talking about acts here—at least I am—that are not an offence in Canada. It is the same in the United States. There are many things that people can do there that we cannot do here, like have a drink at 2 o'clock in the morning.

Mr. Corbett: Once again, we tried to keep it in the serious realm.

Senator Doyle: I am just using that because it is an obvious example.

Senator Buckwold: That is serious.

Senator Doyle: I think there is an area there where you would have to be—

Mr. Corbett: On the other side, there are Canadian offences that the Americans do not have and do not recognize. Until recently they did not have section 3(12), the possession of proceeds of crime. At one time, we sat down and listed the offences that we had that were not similar in the U.S.

Mr. Mosley: One thing to keep in mind, honourable senator, is that the Minister of Justice of Canada will be accountable in Canada for the administration of this statute. So, in the type of situation you have described, if there is a determination which is believed to be contrary to Canadian public interest, then our minister is accountable for accepting that request from the foreign jurisdiction and for setting the processes in motion for its application in this country. So that is an important safeguard. Questions could be asked in the house; there could be an extremely close scrutiny of the justification for that. There are many such offences in the area of securities law, for example, or elections law. I recently heard an account of an indictment laid down in New York State against a politician for conduct which certainly would not be criminal by any Canadian standard. My point is that the U.S. has determined that conduct to be criminal and accordingly has put in place the mechanisms for the enforcement of that law.

We are not talking about enforcement in Canada. No Canadian citizen is going to be subject to the sanctions of American law as a result of this legislation.

Senator Buckwold: A Canadian citizen could still commit a crime in a foreign country, however.

objectifs législatifs que nous proposons. Je dirais à cette personne: On dit que vous recyclez des fonds d'activités criminelles et que vous avez enfreint la Loi sur les banques. Nous avons le même genre de loi ici, Monsieur. Si ces infractions avaient été commises au Canada, toutes et pas seulement le mouvement d'argent, nous vous poursuivrions. Nous avons examiné toute l'enquête et nous sommes convaincus que l'on cherche à empêcher le recyclage de fonds criminelles. Même si la loi n'est pas exactement la même que la nôtre, nous pensons qu'il est dans l'intérêt public canadien d'accorder notre aide.

Le sénateur Doyle: Mais vous parlez d'un cas où c'est équivalent tout en étant différent.

M. Corbett: Équivalent mais différent, oui.

Le sénateur Doyle: Je suis sûr qu'en examinant le Code, on pourrait trouver 87 infractions différentes ayant des noms différents dans différents pays, mais ici, il s'agit d'activités qui ne constituent pas une infraction au Canada. C'est la même chose aux États-Unis. Là-bas, les gens peuvent faire beaucoup de choses qui sont interdites ici, comme de boire de l'alcool à 2 heures du matin.

M. Corbett: Je le répète, nous nous sommes limités aux choses sérieuses.

Le sénateur Doyle: J'ai pris cet example parce qu'il est particulièrement frappant.

Le sénateur Buckwold: C'est sérieux.

Le sénateur Doyle: D'après moi, c'est un domaine où il faudrait être assez . . .

M. Corbett: Par ailleurs, il existe des infractions canadiennes que les Américains ne reconnaissent pas. Jusqu'à tout récemment, il n'avait pas aux États-Unis l'article 3(12), sur la possession des produits de la criminalité. A un certain moment, nous nous sommes mis à faire la liste des infractions existant au Canada et non aux États-Unis.

M. Mosley: Ce qu'il ne faut pas oublier, honorable sénateur, c'est que le ministre de la Justice du Canada sera responsable de l'administration de cette loi. Ainsi, dans les cas que vous avez évoqués, si l'on n'est pas sûr de défendre l'intérêt public canadien, c'est à notre ministre d'accepter ou de refuser la demande de l'État étranger et de mettre en œuvre les procédures voulues. C'est un élément de protection important. On pourrait poser des questions en Chambre et surveiller les choses de très près. Il y a beaucoup d'infractions de ce genre dans le domaine des titres mobiliers, par exemple, ou des élections. J'ai entendu parler récemment d'un politicien qui avait été condamné dans l'État de New York pour une conduite qui n'aurait pas été considérée comme criminelle au Canada. Mais les États-Unis ont considéré qu'il s'agissait d'une conduite criminelle et mis en place le mécanisme nécessaire pour faire respecter la loi.

Nous ne parlons pas de faire respecter la loi au Canada. Aucun citoyen canadien ne pourra faire l'objet des sanctions prévues dans les lois américaines à la suite de cette loi.

Le sénateur Buckwold: Cependant, un citoyen canadien peut toujours commettre un acte criminel dans un pays étranger.

Mr. Mosley: That is true, but all this bill does is provide the means to assist in the investigation, not in the enforcement. Nobody will be hauled across the border as a result of this legislation.

Senator Doyle: What suddenly comes to my mind is the difference in the way in which the two countries treat sexual activities between two consenting adults. There are different laws governing those activities in Canada and the United States. In the U.S., there is the imposition of a sentence in excess of one year in prison for activities that are considered legal here. What if someone down there has in mind that a certain person is some kind of pervert and wants to check it out by finding out what he does in Canada?

The Chairman: Honourable senators, I am afraid that we will have to suspend this very interesting discussion for the moment because another committee is waiting for this room. On behalf of the committee I would like to thank Mr. Mosley and his colleague for appearing before us.

The committee adjourned.

M. Mosley: C'est vrai, mais on ne parle dans ce projet de loi que des façons de contribuer à l'enquête et non de l'application de la loi. Ce n'est pas parce que cette loi est adoptée que les gens vont être traînés à travers la frontière.

Le sénateur Doyle: Je pense tout d'un coup aux différences dans la façon dont nos deux pays considèrent les activités sexuelles entre deux adultes consentants. Les lois sur ces activités ne sont pas du tout les mêmes au Canada et aux États-Unis. Aux États-Unis, on impose une peine de plus d'un an de prison pour des activités considérées comme légales ici. Que se passe-t-il si quelqu'un là-bas pense qu'une personne est pervertie et veut vérifier ses activités au Canada?

La présidente: Honorables sénateurs, nous allons malheureusement devoir interromptre cette passionnante discussion pour le moment parce qu'un autre comité attend la salle. Au nom de notre Comité, je voudrais remercier M. Bosley et son collègue d'avoir comparu devant nous.

La séance est levée.

Senator Fairbairn: This is a prime example of why we should have the right to put this kind of thing in the report, rather than in a speech, because it is on the strength of this letter that we have come to our conclusion, and it should form part of our report to the Senate.

Senator Doyle: I agree.

The Chairman: I suggest that we use phrasing to say that we concur in the motion for the reasons indicated hereunder, or the following reasons, or whatever. Then we can say that the committee is in receipt of the letter.

Senator Fairbairn: And let it form part of our response.

The Chairman: Yes. And then we will put in a paragraph outlining our considerations.

Assuming there will be Royal Assent at some time before the end of the week, would you prefer that we have a draft of the report made up to be reviewed by the members later this afternoon? I think the members of the committee should see the draft report before we make up the final one for presentation to the house. We could look at it this afternoon after we finish our other hearing today and perhaps report to the house tomorrow.

Senator Grafstein: Could we speak to it tomorrow ? I am not going to be here next week, and I would really like to speak to it.

The Chairman: We would have to get agreement to speak on it tomorrow, but if there is not alot of other legislation, I am sure the Senate would be happy to have us proceed.

Senator Nurgitz: If Senator Grafstein is keen, and if the other members of the committee wish, we could try to have the report ready for today.

The Chairman: I do not think you will get it translated in time.

Senator Hébert: Tomorrow is good enough.

The Chairman: Is there agreement on that procedure?

Hon. Senators: Agreed.

Ottawa, Tuesday, July 19, 1988

The Standing Senate Committee on Legal and Constitutional Affairs to which was referred Bill C-58, to provide for the implementation of treaties for mutual legal assistance in criminal matters and to amend the Criminal Code, the Crown Liability Act and the Immigration Act, 1976; and Bill C-61, to amend the Criminal Code, the Food and Drugs Act and the Narcotic Control Act, met this day at 4:50 p.m. to give consideration to the bills.

Senator Joan Neiman (Chairman) in the Chair.

The Chairman: Honourable senators, we are now resuming our consideration of Bill C-61. We are pleased to have with us, from the Canadian Bar Association, Mr. Rocky Pollack, whom Le sénateur Fairbairn: Voilà vraiment pourquoi nous devrions inclure cette lettre dans un rapport et non dans un discours. C'est cette lettre qui nous a fait changer d'avis et elle devrait figurer dans notre rapport au Sénat.

Le sénateur Doyle: Je suis d'accord.

La présidente: Je propose que nous disions que nous adoptons la motion pour les raisons ci-dessous ou pour les raisons suivantes. Nous dirons ensuite que le Comité a reçu la lettre de la Ministre.

Le sénatrice Fairbairn: Et la lettre fera partie de notre réponse.

La présidente: Oui. Nous ajouterons ensuite un paragraphe exposant nos raisons.

A supposer que la sanction royale soit donnée avant la fin de la semaine, préféreriez-vous étudier cet après-midi un projet de rapport? Je crois que les membres du Comité devraient étudier le projet de rapport avant que nous en déposions la version finale à la Chambre. Nous pourrions l'étudier cet après-midi à la fin de notre autre audience et nous pourrions faire rapport à la Chambre demain.

Le sénateur Grafstein: Pourrions-nous en parler demain? Je ne serai pas ici la semaine prochaine et j'aimerais vraiment en parler.

La présidente: Il faudrait que nous obtenions l'autorisation de le faire, mais si l'ordre du jour n'est pas trop chargé, je suis sûr que le Sénat nous permettra de parler du rapport.

Le sénateur Nurgitz: Si le sénateur Grafstein et les autres membres du Comités sont d'accord, nous pourrions tâcher de voir si on ne peut pas préparer le rapport aujourd'hui.

La présidente: Je ne crois pas que vous pourrez le faire traduire à temps.

Le sénateur Hébert: Pourvu que nous l'ayons pour demain.

La présidente: Êtes-vous d'accord pour procéder ainsi?

Des voix: D'accord.

Le Comité poursuit ses travaux à huis clos.

Ottawa, le mardi 19 juillet 1988

Le Comité sénatorial permanent des affaires juridiques et constitutionnelles, auquel ont été renvoyés le projet de loi C-58, loi portant mise en œuvre des traités d'entraide juridique en matière criminelle et modifiant le code criminel, la Loi sur la responsabilité de la couronne et la Loi sur l'immigration de 1976, et le projet de loi C-61, Loi modifiant le code criminel, la Loi des aliments et drogues et la Loi sur les stupéfiants, se réunit aujourd'hui à 16 h 50 afin d'étudier lesdits projets de loi.

Le sénateur Joan Neiman (présidente) occupe le fauteuil.

La présidente: Honorables sénateurs, nous poursuivons maintenant l'étude du projet de loi C-61. Nous aurons le plaisir d'accueillir aujourd'hui M. Rocky Pollack de l'Association

I understand is a former partner of our vice-chairman, Senator Nurgitz. Mr. Pollack is Chairman of the National Criminal Justice Section. He will give us his views of Bill C-61.

Mr. Rocky Pollack, Chairman, National Criminal Justice Section, Canadian Bar Association: Thank you, honourable senators. This is the second opportunity we have had to talk to those who make our laws about what we see as a significant and important piece of legislation that must succeed.

There is only one part of what I said previously to the parliamentary committee that I want to repeat here today, and it is this: We do not say that the proceeds of crime should be left untouched by the state; we do not say that the profits of crime should be left for the enjoyment of felons after they have served their penitentiary sentences; we do not say that priorities should not be given to the victims of crime when it comes to a redistribution or return of the proceeds of crime. We are not against legislation like this, which deals with the ability of the state to seize the ill-gotten gains of crime. We do not think it is necessary to consult with police chiefs or criminologists to come to the conclusion that taking the profit out of crime is of prime importance to police and the courts in order to deter crime.

What we are concerned about with Bill C-61 is that it might not achieve the important goal that my learned friend, Mr. Mosley, spoke to you about a couple of weeks ago. I see that he is here this afternoon. We are concerned enough that there should be legislation in place to follow up on the Criminal Code section 312 so that once it is proved that someone knowingly had something obtained by crime in their possession it can be dealt with.

Look at how this bill attempts to do that. Mr. Mosley told you—and I hope I do not sound too adversarial here, because I realize that this is not an adversarial process—that, unlike the procedures in the United States, this is primarily criminal law legislation and not legislation which would lead to civil litigation and law concerning private property. Let us look at that for a moment.

It certainly is consistent with existing criminal legislation when a police officer can go before a judge—and when we say "judge" here we are talking about a high court, not a magistrate or justice of the peace—and depose to certain grounds upon which there should be a seizure. We already have that in our criminal law under the existing search-warrant provisions. Here, however, the informant, under section 420.12(1), must satisfy the judge, on reasonable grounds—not reasonable and probable grounds—that property originating from crime is in a certain place. What that amounts to is the deponent saying to the judge, "There has been a crime committed, and the proceeds of that crime are at location A, B and C."

There is another place in the Criminal Code where an officer can depose to the fact that a crime has been committed. That is when an information is laid—not before a high court du Barreau canadien, qui, sauf erreur, était un associé de notre vice-président, le sénateur Nurgitz. M. Pollack est président de la section nationale de la justice criminelle. Il va nous dire ce qu'il pense du projet de loi C-61.

M. Rocky Pollack, président, section nationale de la justice criminelle, Association du Barreau canadien: Merci, honorables sénateurs. C'est la deuxième fois que j'ai l'occasion de discuter avec nos législateurs à propos de cette loi que nous considérons importante et qui doit, selon nous, être adoptée.

Je n'ai pas l'intention de répéter qu'une seule partie de ce que j'ai déjà dit au comité parlementaire, et c'est ceci: nous ne disons pas que l'État ne devrait rien faire à propos des produits de la criminalité; nous ne disons pas non plus que ces produits devraient profiter aux criminels qui les ont acquis, après que ceux-ci ont purgé leur peine. Nous ne prétendons pas non plus qu'il ne faudrait pas accorder certaines priorités aux victimes au moment de la redistribution ou de la restitution des produits de la criminalité. Nous n'avons rien contre une telle loi, qui traite du pouvoir de l'État à saisir des produits de la criminalité. Nous ne pensons pas qu'il est nécessaire de consulter des chefs de police ou des criminologues pour conclure qu'il est de première importance pour la police et les tribunaux d'éliminer les bénéfices que rapporte le crime, afin de les aider à décourager le crime.

Ce qui nous inquiète, à propos du projet de loi C-61, c'est qu'il ne puisse peut-être pas permettre d'atteindre l'objectif important dont vous parlait mon savant ami, M. Mosley, il y a une ou deux semaines. Je constate qu'il est ici cet après-midi. Nous tenons à ce qu'une loi permettre de prendre des mesures après l'application de l'article 312 du Code criminel, de manière à ce que lorsqu'il est prouvé qu'une personne a sciemment profité d'un crime, on puisse faire le nécessaire pour redresser la situation.

Que permet ce projet de loi à cet égard? M. Mosley vous disait—et j'espère ne pas avoir l'air trop accusatoire en disant cela, parce que je comprends que ce n'est pas le caractère du présent processus—que contrairement aux procédures en vigueur aux États-Unis, cette loi est avant tout une loi criminelle, et non pas une loi qui pourrait entraîner des litiges au civil ni une loi qui concerne la propriété privée. Examinons un peu cet argument.

Cela correspond sûrement au droit criminel lorsqu'un policier peut présenter à un juge—et quand nous disons «juge», il s'agit ici d'un haut tribunal, et non d'un magistrat ou d'un simple juge de paix—des motifs justifiant une saisie. Cette mesure est déjà prévue dans les dispositions relatives aux perquisitions de notre Code criminel. Dans le cas qui nous occupe, toutefois, en vertu du paragraphe 420.12(1), celui qui présente les renseignements doit convaincre le juge, à l'aide de motifs raisonnables—et non pas de motifs raisonnables et probables—que certains produits de la criminalité se trouvent dans un certain lieu. Cela revient à dire que celui qui fournit les renseignements informe le juge qu'un crime a été commis et que le produit de ce crime se trouve dans tel et tel lieu.

Il y a un autre endroit dans le Code criminel où il est prévu qu'un agent peut signaler qu'un crime a été commis. C'est l'article où l'on prévoit la présentation de renseignements pour judge but before a justice of the peace or a magistrate—in the initial charging process that someone has committed a crime, deposed to "on reasonable and probable grounds".

If you look at any criminal charge in any provincial court it will say that the officer who swore the charge has reasonable and probable grounds to believe that so and so committed a crime, and the crime will be specified. This bill should say that, when you are talking about an officer who, on the strength of his oath that a crime was committed, can go out and seize and freeze property and tie it up for any number of years during which there will be any number of applications to vary the order so that the subject—I will not say the accused, because we may be talking about someone whose property was seized who is never an accused—can try to get his of her hands on some of the property to pay lawyer's fees, to run his business, or to send his children to university.

Senator Grafstein: To please all lawyers.

Mr. Pollack: One of the reasons why you should accept my sincerity is that I do not think I will make as much money out of this bill as a defence counsel if it is changed the way we are suggesting. I think I will do much better if it is the present third reading form.

The process itself of the officer appearing before the judge and getting the order to seize is a bit like some existing processes that we know of. I refer you to the wiretap legislation where there is a hearing in camera, the other side is not present and certain statutory prerequisites must be met under oath and an order can be issued to intercept someone's private conversations.

There have been some problems with that legislation. I want to tell you about the outcome of one of the cases, a well-known case called Wilson. Finally, after about four or five years of litigation over whether or not a trial judge should have excluded certain wiretap evidence, we got to the point where the Supreme Court of Canada had told us—because the Criminal Code did not—how you go about attacking these orders. When we appeared in front of Mr. Justice Schultz in Winnipeg several years after the making of the wiretap order, we had in the witness box the officer who got the authorization in the first place. That officer did not remember much about what had happened the day he appeared in front of the now deceased judge to get the wiretap order, and there was no court reporter present. In the Winnipeg case—and I know there have been other similar rulings—the judge commented upon how useful it would have been to have had someone taking down the proceedings.

The legislation you approved of involving telephone warrants includes a provision that the proceedings be tape recorded. We do not see anything about that in this bill.

We see a procedural and substantive flaw in the nub of this bill, which is the ability of the police to get orders to seize and freeze the assets of crime.

Let me jump ahead and point out to you that I do not think you want to see four or five years of procedural wrangling in three or four levels of courts before the first cases get down to des motifs raisonnables et probables au début de la procédure, non pas à un juge d'un haut tribunal, mais à un juge de paix ou à un magistrat.

Dans toute accusation criminelle portée devant une cour provinciale, on dira que l'agent qui a porté l'accusation avait des motifs raisonnables et probables de croire que telle ou telle personne avait commis un crime, et le crime en question sera précisé. Ce projet de loi devrait stipuler qu'un agent qui déclare, sous serment, qu'un crime a été commis, peut saisir et détenir les biens pendant un certain nombre d'années au cours desquelles pourraient être faites des demandes pour modifier l'ordonnance afin que le sujet—je ne dirais pas l'accusé, parce qu'il se peut que quelqu'un dont les biens ont été saisis ne soit jamais accusé—puisse tenter de récupérer une partie des biens afin de régler les honoraires de son avocat, de faire tourner son entreprise ou d'envoyer ses enfants à l'université.

Le sénateur Grafstein: Pour faire plaisir à tous les avocats.

M. Pollack: L'une des preuves de ma sincérité, c'est que je ne pense pas que je ferai autant d'argent en tant qu'avocat de la défense après l'adoption de ce projet de loi, si on le modifie comme nous le proposons. J'en ferai au contraire beaucoup plus si on l'adopte dans sa formulation actuelle.

Ce processus, qui veut que l'agent se présente devant un juge pour obtenir une ordonnance de saisie, ressemble quelque peu à certains processus que nous connaissons déjà. Il n'y a qu'à songer à la loi qui régit l'écoute en tiers, dans laquelle on prévoit une audition à huis clos, en l'absence de l'autre partie, et il faut satisfaire à un certain nombre de prérequis juridiques, sous serment. Une ordonnance peut ensuite être émise pour écouter les conversations privées de quelqu'un d'autre.

Cette loi n'a pas toujours été sans difficultés. J'en donnerai pour preuve l'issue d'une cause bien connue, l'affaire Wilson. Après environ quatre ou cinq procédures afin de déterminer si un juge aurait dû exclure certaines preuves d'écoute en tiers, c'est finalement la Cour suprême du Canada qui nous a dit—parce que le Code Criminel ne le faisait pas—comment contester ces ordonnances. Devant le juge Schultz, à Winnipeg, plusieurs années après la délivrance de l'ordonnance d'écoute en tiers, nous avions à la barre des témoins l'agent qui avait initialement obtenu l'autorisation. Il avait oublié en grande partie ce qui s'était passé le jour où il avait comparu devant le juge, maintenant décédé, pour obtenir l'ordonnance en question, et aucun enregistrement n'avait été fait. Le juge de Winnipeg—et je sais qu'il y a déjà eu d'autres jugements analogues—a fait quelques remarques à propos de l'opportunité qu'un greffier ait pris note des délibérations à ce moment-là.

La loi que vous avez approuvée, relativement à ces ordonnances, stipule que les procédures soient enregistrées sur bande. On n'y fait aucunement référence dans ce projet de loi.

Nous voyons une lacune, quant aux procédures et au fond, dans l'intention de ce projet de loi, c'est-à-dire la capacité de la police à obtenir des ordonnances de saisie et de blocage de biens acquis criminellement.

Regardons un peu plus loin, et permettez-moi de vous faire remarquer que je ne pense pas que vous ayez tellement le goût de voir des procédures traîner pendant quatre ou cinq ans whether or not a crime was committed and whether or not someone is guilty and should be punished for the crime while all of this gets sorted out. I do not think you want to see that happen.

The bill concerns, as well, another aspect of existing criminal law down the road at the other end of the case. That is the sentencing aspect of a criminal case when someone is found guilty beyond a reasonable doubt of a crime.

When someone is found guilty beyond a reasonable doubt of, for instance, wilfully damaging a window of a police station, that person will have a sentence hearing at which certain facts may be referred to. If the Crown attorney says that the window costs $100 to repair and the accused says, "I am in the window business; those windows do not cost more than $25 to repair," either the Crown attorney must prove beyond a reasonable doubt that the window costs $100 to repair or the assertion by the accused stands. So even the facts of a sentencing hearing have to be proved beyond a reasonable doubt. Yet that is not the standard for a judge, having convicted someone, to determine under .17(1) that an enterprise crime offence was committed, that seized property came from that enterprise crime and that it should be confiscated or otherwise dealt with.

Again, that is another aspect that is somewhat similar to existing Canadian criminal law, the sentencing process. Yet there is a new rule here that lightens up the burden on the Crown, which we think has been a good burden over the last several centuries, and we would hate to see it be eroded by this piece of legislation. One of the problems that I think you can see developing here is that there is conflict with existing criminal law legislation and jurisprudence, and we have pointed that out in our brief.

I mentioned earlier that, with respect to Mr. Mosley's observations, these are essentially criminal in nature. Of equal concern to the Canadian Bar Association—although not necessarily to those of us who want to see our incomes enhanced, I suppose—is that a whole new area of litigation will be derived from Bill C-61 in its present form. While it is nice to call it criminal legislation, we see it as being inherently civil in nature. Without the development of civil rules of procedure and years of jurisprudence, form which for instance, laws concerning contracts and torts now benefit, the confiscation aspect of this bill—when you consider that the confiscation can affect someone who is not an accused and not even a suspect in a crime—will lead to litigation over the origin of the items seized, commenced by the person from whom they were seized or who is affected by the seizure.

There will be all sorts of civil inquiries about this criminal law bill that is now before you, and what concerns us is that in devant trois ou quatre niveaux de tribunaux, avant que les premières causes visant à déterminer si un crime a été commis ou non et si une personne est coupable d'un crime et devrait être punie en conséquence aient lieu. Je ne pense pas que c'est ce que vous souhaitez.

Dans le projet de loi, on aborde aussi un autre aspect du droit criminel existant, à l'aboutissement des procédures, celui de la peine décernée à celui ou celle qui est reconnu coupable d'un crime au-delà de tout doute raisonnable.

Par exemple, lorsque quelqu'un est reconnu coupable, hors de tout doute raisonnable, d'avoir sciemment endommagé une fenêtre d'un poste de police, cette personne devra se présenter à une audience relativement à la détermination de sa peine où certains faits pourront être invoqués. Si le procureur de la couronne dit que remplacer la fenêtre coûtera 100 $, et que l'accusé prétend de son côté, parce qu'il est dans le domaine, que la réparation coûtera 25 $, le procureur de la Couronne devra prouver ce qu'il avance au-delà de tout doute raisonnable, ou l'on donnera raison à l'accusé. Ainsi, même les faits avancés lors d'une telle audience doivent être prouvés au-delà de tout doute raisonnable. Malgré cela, après avoir reconnu quelqu'un coupable, un juge n'a pas à déterminer en vertu de l'alinéa 17(1) qu'une infraction de criminalité organisée a été commise, que les biens saisis provenaient de cette infraction, et qu'il y aurait lieu de les confisquer ou de prendre d'autres mesures.

Le processus de la détermination de la peine est un autre aspect qui ressemble à certaines dispositions que nous avons déjà dans notre Code criminel. Il y a une nouvelle règle qui allège le fardeau de la Couronne, fardeau dont nous pensons qu'elle s'est bien acquittée au cours des quelques derniers siècles, et nous ne voudrions vraiment pas que cette loi renverse ce mouvement. L'une des difficultés que l'on peut entrevoir ici, c'est un conflit entre le droit criminel existant et la jurisprudence en la matière, ce que nous avons d'ailleurs signalé dans notre mémoire.

Au sujet des observations de M. Mosley, j'ai mentionné plus tôt qu'elles relevaient essentiellement de l'aspect criminel. À l'Association du Barreau canadien, nous craignons également—malgré que cela ne s'applique peut-être pas forcément à ceux d'entre nous qui souhaitent voir augmenter leurs revenus, je suppose—que dans sa formulation actuelle, le projet de loi C-61 engendre une foule de nouvelles matières à litige. Malgré que l'on considère qu'il fait partie du droit criminel, nous pensons pour notre part que le projet de loi C-61 se rattache davantage au droit civil de par son caractère. Sans les règles de procédures élaborées au civil et sans les années de jurisprudence dont bénéficient, par exemple, les lois concernant les contrats et le redressement des torts, les dispositions de ce projet de loi relatives à la confiscation—quand on songe qu'elles peuvent s'appliquer à quelqu'un qui n'est pas accusé ni même soupçonné d'un crime—aboutiront à des poursuites relativement à la provenance des biens saisis, qui seront entamées par la personne qui était en possession des biens en cause ou que vise la saisie.

Ce projet de loi au criminel, que vous avez entrepris d'examiner, va entraîner toutes sortes d'enquêtes civiles, et ce qui the midst of this civil litigation by criminal lawyers over what should become of property, what was its origin, and so on, there is a very serious erosion of what we see as a consistent thread in the criminal law, and that is the sanctity of the presumption of innocence. We do not like to see occurring three or four times in this bill the requirement that a person initiate litigation so that they can show that they appear innocent, and then be entitled to what was lawfully theirs in the first place. We say that there is something inherently wrong with a bill, whether it is called criminal law or not, it puts that kind of an onus on an applicant. That kind of an onus that requires a person to come before a court and to have to ask for your property back, and to show that he appears innocent, is unheard of, and our concern again is that the goals to which this bill is directed will not be attained, and this bill will be a failure unless procedurally it is sanitized and Charter-proofed—and, of course, that means protecting everyone's rights that heretofore the criminal law has attempted to protect.

It is interesting that when I talk about onuses the Crown does not always have the burden of proof beyond reasonable doubt, as I mentioned earlier. There are times when the Crown needs only to show cause on credible and trustworthy evidence why, for instance, someone should be detained in custody if he has been arrested for a crime. The Crown, at a bail hearing, does not have to prove anyone guilty beyond a reasonable doubt but they certainly have the onus of showing cause.

When it comes to ownership or entitlement to property, we say that it is not unreasonable, at some stage, to expect that the Crown will initiate a proceeding to show cause—or at least to alert a person that he may be in jeopardy of losing his property, or at least alert his as to just what it is that some police officer has allegedly done, and what he may be involved in. The very idea of including in a bill the requirement that someone show that he appears innocent we find repugnent. Everyone, unless he has been properly convicted, is presumed to be innocent, and I do not think we needed a Charter of Rights to tell us about that.

Honourable senators, I know you will have some questions and I am not going to deal with every single section of our brief. However, I do want to touch upon one or two other areas that concern us, and one that was modified somewhat on third reading.

The bill deals with a number of ways in which property will become restored, or some other kind of an order will be made. Whether it is in connection with property that has been restrained or property that is actually under physical siege, or perhaps with some kind of receiver-manager appointed, the bill deals with a number of ways in which one can deal with that property. There are at least four sections in the bill that deal with various kinds of hearings in connection with property seized. However, it is not at all clear—and I challenge anyone to read this bill and tell me that it is—what one does if one has been the subject of a seizure, has been found innocent of the crime and all of his appeals are over. It is not at all clear what nous inquiète, dans le contexte de toutes ces procédures civiles qui seront menées par des avocats au criminel à propos de la propriété des biens, de leur provenance, et le reste, c'est une très grave érosion d'une trame que nous considérons continue dans le droit criminel, à savoir le caractère sacré de la présomption d'innocence. Nous n'aimons pas tellement cette récurrence, dans ce projet de loi, de l'exigence qu'une personne entreprenne des procédures pour faire la preuve de son innocence et récupérer son bien, qui lui appartenait de plein droit. Nous soutenons qu'il y a quelque chose de fondamentalement mauvais dans un projet de loi, qu'on le qualifie de loi criminelle ou non, qui impose un tel fardeau à un demandeur. Une telle obligation, qui exige qu'une personne se présente devant un tribunal pour récupérer ce qui lui appartient et démontrer son innocence, est inédite, et je répète que nous craignons que ce projet de loi ne permette pas d'atteindre les objectifs que l'on vise et qu'il soit un échec, à moins qu'on ne l'épure sur le plan des procédures, et qu'on fasse en sorte qu'il satisfasse à la Charte—ce qui signifie, évidemment, qu'il protège les droits de tous, droits que l'on a toujours tenté de préserver dans le Code criminel.

Il est toutefois intéressant de noter que la Couronne n'a pas toujours à faire la preuve hors de tout doute raisonnable, comme je le disais plus tôt. Il arrive parfois qu'elle n'ait qu'à présenter des justifications dignes de foi pour justifier la détention d'une personne soupçonnée d'un crime. À une audience relative à la détermination d'un cautionnement, la Couronne n'a pas à prouver la culpabilité de qui que ce soit au-delà de tout doute raisonnable, mais doit sûrement justifier sa requête.

Pour ce qui est de la propriété et du droit à la propriété, il n'est pas impensable qu'à un moment ou à un autre, la Couronne entreprenne une procédure— ou à tout le moins avertisse une personne qu'elle risque de perdre sa propriété, ou l'informe des mesures qu'a prises un policier, et de ce à quoi elle peut s'attendre. La simple idée d'inclure dans un projet de loi l'exigence que quelqu'un fasse la preuve de son innocence nous répugne. Toute personne est innocente jusqu'à preuve du contraire, et je ne pense que nous ayons besoin d'une charte des droits pour nous le dire.

Honorables sénateurs, je sais que vous avez des questions à me poser, et je ne m'attarderai pas à toutes les idées que nous avons développées dans notre mémoire. Je veux toutefois en aborder une ou deux autres qui nous inquiètent particulièrement, dont l'une a été quelque peu modifiée au moment de la troisième lecture.

Dans le projet de loi, on aborde de nombreuses façons dont les biens seront restitués, ou dont un autre genre d'ordonnance sera émise. Qu'il s'agisse de biens qui ont fait l'objet d'une ordonnance de blocage ou d'une confiscation, ou qui ont été confiés au soin d'un gestionnaire quelconque, on y énumère différentes façons de traiter ces biens. Il y a au moins quatre articles, dans le projet de loi, où il est question des différentes genres d'auditions relatives aux biens saisis. La marche à suivre est toutefois loin d'être claire—et je défie qui que ce soit de soutenir le contraire, après avoir lu le projet de loi—pour celui dont les biens ont été saisis, dont on a reconnu l'innocence, et qui a épuisé toutes les possibilités d'appel. Que doit-il faire he is supposed to do next in order to repossess his property. In other words, he has to do something. Here I am talking about people who have been proclaimed innocent by a court. They cannot expect a knock at the door and the common courtesy of having their property returned to them. We do not understand in this day and age—and indeed when our President of the Canadian Bar Association stresses access to justice—why it is that a bill has to be as complicated as this one is.

I have touched upon the sentencing provisions and the onuses. You will note, of course, when you read the bill over, that for the designated drug offences and the enterprise crime offences of which someone is found guilty, if restoration of the property cannot be carried out because it has been spirited out of the country and is therefore not accessible, a fine equal to the amount of the value of the ill-gotten property can be imposed. However, if the fine cannot be paid, there are mandatory jail sentences, and a vast amount of sentencing discretion is going to be taken away from sentencing judges at a time when, I add parenthetically, the Canadian Sentencing Commission says that these minimum sentences are not satisfactory; they are not desirable and they should be taken out of the criminal law.

Therefore you have people in two kinds of jeopardy at a sentencing hearing. There is the ordinary jeopardy, if you will, of the court not being lenient with them, based upon the sentencing case law to date. Then there is the mandatory sentencing requirement. One can just imagine the protracted litigation that will take place over sentencing when, for instance, you have a drug conspiracy case involving millions of dollars which would normally attract a sentence of ten years, if the value of the drugs could not be paid by way of a fine. You could have someone who was perhaps a courier saying: "I was never involved to that extent," or someone who was a bookkeeper in a criminal enterprise, who never had anything to do directly with the drugs, arguing that he had so little effect on the criminal enterprise that he is not liable for the amount of the contraband that was seized. Therefore we may see all sorts of protracted litigation for nothing, because of a sentencing provision that goes against the current trends in sentencing and takes away a very important discretion vested in the trial judges.

We commented earlier that we were concerned about lawyer-client privilege and that we were aware of the fact that amendments had been made to provide for a hearing at which the prosecutor will not be present, so that the subject can try and justify obtaining some of his or her funds that have been saved in order to pay for legal costs. I am interested in the modification of the clause, because I do not think it refers to business expenses; it refers only to legal expenses that will be dealt with in an in camera hearing. Our objection was simply this, that at the hearing to determine how much money someone needs for his defence, the prosecutor would be there and all sorts of tactical matters would be revealed to the prosecutor that ordinarily one could never compel an accused to reveal. This may satisfy part of that concern. It is a small part of the bill and it certainly takes a useful step in the determination of just how much access a defendant can have to the seized bank ensuite pour récupérer ses biens? C'est loin d'être clair. Autrement dit, il doit faire quelque chose pour récupérer ses biens. Je parle ici de gens dont un tribunal a reconnu l'innocence. Ils ne peuvent espérer que l'on vienne cogner à leur porte pour leur rapporter leurs biens. Nous ne comprenons pas pourquoi, de nos jours—alors même que le président de l'Association du Barreau canadien met l'accent sur l'accès à la justice—un projet de loi doit être aussi complexe que celui-là.

J'ai fait allusion aux dispositions relatives à la détermination de la peine et aux fardeaux que l'on impose aux demandeurs. En relisant le projet de loi, vous remarquerez, évidemment, que dans le cas des infractions reliées au trafic de stupéfiants et des infractions de criminalité organisée dont quelqu'un est reconnu coupable, lorsque la restitution des biens est impossible, parce qu'ils ne sont plus au pays et qu'ils ne sont donc plus accessibles, on peut imposer une amende égale à la valeur des biens mal acquis. Toutefois, lorsque l'amende ne peut être acquittée, on impose des peines d'emprisonnement, ce qui enlève énormément de latitude au juge chargé de déterminer la peine au moment même où la Commission canadienne sur la détermination de la peine dit que ces peines minimales ne sont pas satisfaisantes, elles ne sont pas souhaitables, et il faudrait les retirer du droit criminel.

Il y a donc deux dangers qui se posent en ce qui a trait à la peine imposée: celui que le tribunal ne soit pas suffisamment indulgent, et celui de l'imposition de la peine obligatoire. On peut imaginer combien de temps prendra la détermination de la peine, par exemple, dans le cas d'une organisation de trafic de stupéfiants impliquant des millions de dollars, qui appellerait normalement une peine de dix ans d'emprisonnement, si la valeur des stupéfiants ne pouvait être acquittée sous forme d'amende. Quelqu'un qui n'était qu'un passeur pourrait prétendre n'avoir jamais participé au trafic pour une telle valeur, ou le teneur de livres d'une entreprise criminelle, qui n'avait jamais rien eu à voir directement avec les stupéfiants, pourrait dire que sa contribution à l'entreprise criminelle était si minime qu'il ne peut être tenu responsable de la totalité de la valeur des biens saisis. Il peut donc arriver que toutes sortes de procédures traînent pour des riens, et ce, parce qu'une disposition va à contre-courant de la tendance actuelle dans la détermination de la peine et enlève une très grande partie de la latitude accordée au juge.

Nous avons dit plus tôt que nous entretenons certaines inquiétudes au sujet des relations privées entre le client et son avocat, et que nous savons que l'on a apporté des modifications visant à permettre une audition où la partie demanderesse ne sera pas présente, afin que le sujet puisse justifier d'obtenir une partie de ses fonds pour régler ses frais juridiques. La modification de cet article m'intéresse particulièrement, parce que je ne pense pas qu'elle vise les dépenses d'affaires; elle n'a trait qu'aux frais juridiques dont il sera question à l'audition à huis clos. Nous proposerions que le procureur de la Couronne soit présent à l'audition visant à déterminer la somme nécessaire à l'accusé pour assurer sa défense, afin que toutes les tactiques que l'on ne pourrait ordinairement jamais obliger un accusé à révéler le soient. Cela pourrait en partie calmer cette inquiétude. C'est une petite partie du projet de loi, mais sans doute une étape utile dans la détermination de l'accès que peut avoir account or, indeed, business property. But we still have an overriding concern about a defendant having to go to the court that is supposed to judge him or her, having to justify how much he or shee will have to spend defending a case in which they are, of course, presumed innocent. The Crown has to prove that they are guilty beyond a reasonable doubt, and that has to be done in an open hearing before an impartial jury, and so on, according to the Charter.

That is always going to be a problem with a bill. If there has to be some compromising with individual liberties, that may be where the compromise is going to have to come.

We have just became aware of this change and have not examined it in any depth. What is of concern to us is that the rest of the changes on third reading are merely housekeeping changes. They have not altered the essential problems that we see with this piece of legislation. This, of course, gives you the opportunity to make those alterations so that this bill will be a success and not a failure. That is the message I want to give you on behalf of the Canadian Bar Association. We are not telling you, and we did not tell the House of Commons, that this bill ought to be scraped because some day the Supreme Court is going to shoot it down; our position is that it has to be made workable. It has to be made consistent with individual rights. We think it can be done.

Senator Buckwold: Have you prepared any suggested amendments?

Mr. Pollack: No, sir, we did not.

The Chairman: But you have recommended, here in your brief, certain clauses that should be changed or dropped.

Senator Grafstein: I have some questions arising out of the testimony of the witness. You dealt with two areas on which I would like to have your thoughts. I will deal with the last area first.

The property of a person is seized. That person then seeks to get relief from that seizure order by appearing before a judge. He must establish, not on reasonable grounds, that he needs the property for reasonable business and legal expenses.

Mr. Pollack: Under that section, yes.

Senator Grafstein: Why do you say that it would necessarily be the same judge?

Mr. Pollack: I ought to have said, "The same court." It may not necessarily be the same judge.

Senator Grafstein: There is a material difference between them.

Mr. Pollack: I agree with you.

Senator Grafstein: The person has some protection in the solicitor-client situation. I can, however, see that it might create a problem if he appeared before the same judge.

The second safeguard is that that representation under subsection (5) is made in camera, without the presence of the un défendeur à un compte de banque ou à des actifs ayant fait l'objet d'une saisie. Mais le fait qu'un demandeur ait à justifier à un tribunal qui est censé le juger combien il entend dépenser pour défendre sa cause, compte tenu qu'il est présumé innocent, évidemment, nous inquiète encore énormément. La Couronne doit prouver sa culpabilité hors de tout doute raisonnable, et cela, dans le cadre d'une audition ouverte devant un jury impartial, et le reste, selon la Charte.

Ce sera toujours un problème. S'il y a des compromis à faire au sujet des libertés individuelles, ce sera peut-être de là qu'ils devront venir.

Nous venons tout juste d'apprendre que l'on avait apporté cette modification et nous n'avons pas encore examiné la question en profondeur. Ce qui nous inquiète, c'est que les autres modifications que l'on a apportées à la troisième lecture ne sont que d'ordre technique. Elles n'ont rien réglé aux problèmes de fond que nous avons décelés dans ce projet de loi. Évidemment, les travaux que vous avez entrepris vous donnent l'occasion d'apporter les modifications qui lui sont nécessaires pour éviter qu'il ne soit un échec. C'est le message que je voulais vous livrer au nom de l'Association du barreau canadien. Nous ne vous disons pas, pas plus que nous ne l'avons dit à la Chambre des communes, qu'il faudrait mettre ce projet de loi à la poubelle parce qu'un jour, la Cour suprême le fera de toute façon; nous sommes plutôt d'avis qu'il faut faire en sorte qu'il soit applicable. Il faut qu'il contribue à protéger les droits individuels. Nous pensons que c'est possible.

Le sénateur Buckwold: Avez-vous préparé des modifications à nous proposer?

M. Pollack: Non.

La présidente: Mais, dans votre mémoire, vous recommandez de modifier certains articles et d'en éliminer certains autres.

Le sénateur Grafstein: J'ai quelques questions à poser à notre témoin. Vous avez abordé deux éléments dont je voudrais discuter avec vous, en commençant par le dernier.

Les biens d'une personne sont saisis. Cette personne cherche alors à faire modifier cette ordonnance en se présentant devant un juge. Elle doit démontrer, et non pour des motifs raisonnables, qu'elle a besoin de ses biens en prévision de certaines dépenses.

M. Pollack: Selon cet article, oui.

Le sénateur Grafstein: Pourquoi dites-vous que la requête serait forcément adressée au même juge?

M. Pollack: J'aurais plutôt dû dire: «au même tribunal». Ce ne sera pas forcément au même juge.

Le sénateur Grafstein: Oui, ce ne sera pas forcément à la même personne.

M. Pollack: Vous avez raison.

Le sénateur Grafstein: Le demandeur jouit donc d'une certaine protection. Mais la situation serait peut-être un peu plus difficile s'il avait affaire au même juge.

Le deuxième élément de protection, c'est que la procédure décrite au paragraphe (5) se déroule à huis clos, sans que le

Attorney General. In effect, the other side, the Crown, does not have knowledge, if it is made in camera, as to the nature of the request for reasonable legal expenses.

Mr. Pollack: As I understand the amendment, it is only in camera for the purpose of determining the reasonableness of legal expenses. That is the only part that is in camera.

Senator Grafstein: Which is the point you make on page 13 of your submission.

Mr. Pollack: Right. I presume the Crown will know about the motion. The Crown will know the application is going to be made. As I understand it, the only part that is in camera is the part that is for the purpose of determining the reasonableness of legal expenses.

Senator Grafstein: All that the Crown will know is that an application for relief from forfeiture for legal expenses is being made.

The Chairman: Is it business and legal expenses?

Mr. Pollack: It is only legal expenses.

Senator Grafstein: Subsection (5) limits it to the purpose of determining reasonable legal expenses. Business expenses is not a question of solicitor-client privilege.

Mr. Pollack: Living expenses would be mentioned too.

Senator Grafstein: This would be heard before a separate judge; it would be in camera and the defendant would have made a request. That is all that the Crown would know. What else would the Crown know?

Mr. Pollack: On the aspect of reasonable legal expenses, that is all the Crown would know.

Senator Grafstein: You say that the impact of this legislation will affect the privileged solicitor-client relationship?

Mr. Pollack: That was prepared when we had second reading.

Senator Grafstein: Has that now been modified?

Mr. Pollack: Yes, it has.

Senator Grafstein: Is that no longer a concern?

Mr. Pollack: It is still a concern. It is not as well thought out as it was before the amendment. I tried to give it as much thought as I could today, but there has been a significant change and we acknowledge that.

Senator Grafstein: There would be an application by counsel in the absence of the Crown Attorney to the judge responsible for the forfeiture, directly. The only time the Crown would know is if the release from the forfeiture were granted.

Mr. Pollack: As I read the entire section, I think that notice has to be given to the Attorney General that application is going to be made.

Senator Grafstein: Where does it say that?

Mr. Pollack: 420.14.

procureur général ne soit représenté. Puisque l'audition est à huis clos, la Couronne n'est pas au courant de la teneur de la requête.

M. Pollack: Si je comprends bien la modification, le huis clos n'est imposé que lorsqu'il s'agit de déterminer le caractère raisonnable des frais juridiques.

Le sénateur Grafstein: Oui, ce que vous faites valoir à la treizième page de votre mémoire.

M. Pollack: Oui. Je suppose que la Couronne sera informée de la motion. Elle saura que le demandeur présentera une demande. Le huis clos ne sera imposé que lorsqu'il s'agira de justifier le caractère raisonnable des frais juridiques.

Le sénateur Grafstein: Tout ce que la Couronne saura, c'est qu'une demande de restitution aura été faite.

La présidente: Pour quel genre de dépenses?

M. Pollack: Uniquement pour des frais juridiques.

Le sénateur Grafstein: Au paragraphe (5), on limite l'ordonnance aux frais juridiques. Les dépenses à caractère commercial sont exclues.

M. Pollack: Mais les dépenses courantes sont aussi mentionnées.

Le sénateur Grafstein: Cette demande serait donc adressée à un autre juge; l'audition se tiendrait à huis clos et le défendeur aurait présenté une demande. C'est tout ce que saurait la Couronne. Que saurait-elle encore?

M. Pollack: En ce qui a trait aux frais juridiques raisonnables, rien d'autre?

Le sénateur Grafstein: Vous dites que cette loi influera sur les relations privilégiées entre l'avocat et le client?

M. Pollack: Ce mémoire a été préparé en fonction de la deuxième lecture.

Le sénateur Grafstein: A-t-on apporté des modifications?

M. Pollack: Oui.

Le sénateur Grafstein: Et elles ont calmé vos inquiétudes?

M. Pollack: Non, pas tout à fait. Nous n'avons pas examiné la question avec autant d'attention qu'avant la modification. J'en ai parlé du mieux que j'ai pu aujourd'hui, mais la modification est importante, et nous le reconnaissons.

Le sénateur Grafstein: Une demande serait donc directement adressée par l'entremise d'un avocat au juge qui a imposé l'ordonnance de confiscation, et ce, sans que le procureur de la Couronne ne soit présent. Le seul moment où la Couronne saurait quoi que ce soit serait lorsque la demande de restitution serait acceptée.

M. Pollack: Si j'ai bien compris l'article, je pense que le demandeur doit remettre un préavis de sa demande au procureur général.

Le sénateur Grafstein: Où est-ce?

M. Pollack: À l'article 420.14.

[Text]

Senator Grafstein: That is the notice for relief from forfeiture.

Mr. Pollack: I would refer to subsection (2).

Senator Grafstein: It says that where an application is made under 1(a), which relates to an order for inspection under (4), and (4) is the restoration of property. If it is to deal with legal expenses, he asks that that portion be dealt with in camera or he gives notices that he is going to make a request for legal expenses in camera. That is all he knows.

Mr. Pollack: Right.

Senator Grafstein: How is that a breach of the solicitor-client privilege? What knowledge does a Crown have other than that the person is going to seek money to pay his lawyer for something—an amount which is undefined?

Mr. Pollack: I want to thank you for pointing that out because I had not looked at that aspect of it. The very fact that the subject has to resort to an application like this to pay his lawyer may well be something that ought to remain privileged. I have not given that much thought.

Our concern earlier was that if the Attorney General were at this hearing he would know that it was the intention of the accused to spend a lot of money on, say, electronic surveillance of Crown witnesses and that sort of thing.

Senator Grafstein: The point is that a person not accused but who has property seized would go before a judge and say that he wants to get his property back so he can pay a lawyer to help him with this forfeiture application? The Crown would not have knowledge of that. Am I wrong in my interpretation. I am trying to follow your argument because I am very sensitive to breaches of solicitor-client relationships. Every day the Crown has knowledge of individuals seeking to pay lawyers to defend them on charges where the accused is innocent. That is not a mutual solicitor-client privilege. That is only the knowledge or the nature of it, and that seems to have been amended, I assume.

Mr. Pollack: I would think that discussions between a lawyer and a client about a retainer are ordinarily privileged. That is fundamental to the lawyer-client relationship.

Senator Grafstein: The only issue is, he is making an application to pay a lawyer, and that is all. In other words, I do not see it as going beyond that.

Mr. Pollack: With respect, Senator Grafstein, it could be to pay a lawyer's disbursements for laboratory analysis, hiring private investigators—

Senator Grafstein: But the Crown does not know that.

Mr. Pollack: But our earlier concern was that the Crown would.

Senator Grafstein: Are you satisfied now that the Crown is precluded from this?

Mr. Pollack: I am not sure, frankly.

[Traduction]

Le sénateur Grafstein: C'est pour demander la restitution des biens.

M. Pollack: Au paragraphe (2).

Le sénateur Grafstein: Où il est question de la demande d'ordonnance prévue au paragraphe (1), qui a trait à une ordonnance d'inspection en vertu du paragraphe (4), et le paragraphe (4) porte sur la restitution des biens. Si le demandeur a l'intention d'en réclamer une partie pour régler ses frais juridiques, il demande que cette partie de l'audition soit à huis clos, ou en donne avis. C'est tout ce qu'elle sait.

M. Pollack: C'est juste.

Le sénateur Grafstein: En quoi cela affecte-t-il les relations privilégiées entre l'avocat et le client? La Couronne ne sait rien d'autre que la personne demandera de l'argent pour payer son avocat—une somme quelconque.

M. Pollack: Je vous remercie de me souligner cela, car je ne m'étais pas arrêté à cet aspect. Le fait que le sujet doive faire une telle demande pour payer son avocat peut bien être quelque chose qui doit demeurer privé. Je n'y ai pas tellement réfléchi.

Nous pensons que si le procureur général était représenté à cette audition, il saurait alors que l'accusé avait l'intention de dépenser beaucoup d'argent en fonction, dirons-nous, de la surveillance électronique des témoins de la Couronne, par exemple.

Le sénateur Grafstein: Le fait est qu'une personne qui ne serait pas accusée, mais dont les biens auraient été saisis, devrait se présenter devant un juge et demander la restitution de ses biens afin de pouvoir régler ses frais juridiques. La Couronne ne le saurait pas. Mon interprétation est-elle juste? J'essaie de comprendre ce que vous dites, parce que je m'intéresse énormément à tout ce qui peut nuire aux rapports entre l'avocat et son client. La Couronne rencontre chaque jour des cas de personnes innocentes qui veulent payer des avocats pour les défendre. Ce n'est pas tellement une question de privilège mutuel entre l'avocat et son client. Il s'agit bien davantage de sa connaissance ou de son caractère, ce que l'on semble avoir modifié, je suppose.

M. Pollack: Je pense que les discussions entre un avocat et un client à propos d'un mandat ont habituellement un caractère privé. C'est un élément fondamental des rapports entre un avocat et son client.

Le sénateur Grafstein: Le client fait une demande pour payer son avocat, et ça s'arrête là. Autrement dit, ça se limite à cela.

M. Pollack: Oui, mais ce pourrait aussi être pour rembourser son avocat des frais encourus pour des analyses de laboratoire ou pour l'embauche de détectives privés . . .

Le sénateur Grafstein: Mais, la Couronne n'en sait rien.

M. Pollack: Mais nous pensions qu'il en serait autrement.

Le sénateur Grafstein: Êtes-vous satisfait, maintenant que la Couronne est exclue du processus?

M. Pollack: Je ne sais pas vraiment.

[Text]

Senator Grafstein: Then I suppose the only question I have is: Give us an amendment that would shield this solicitor-client privilege.

Mr. Pollack: This may do it.

Senator Grafstein: This may be a nifty way of solving it. In any event, I just raise that. I am more concerned with my primary question, which related to breach of the Charter, and your argument was that, on forfeiture, the test is "reasonable and probable grounds."

I think your argument, if I followed it, was that reasonable grounds was not good enough, that we should add "and probable grounds." Is that your argument?

Mr. Pollack: Yes. If you were charged with an offence, I would be entitled, as your defence lawyer, to examine the police officer who swore the charge out against you to find out if he had, indeed, reasonable and probable grounds. If he did not, the judge hearing the matter would dismiss the charge right then and there. As reasonable as the grounds may be, if they are highly improbable, the charge will be dismissed right then and there by the judge.

Senator Grafstein: I understand that. The question I want to ask you, though, is this: I take it that the Canadian Bar Association is suggesting the addition of "and probable grounds." Again I want to tell you that I am super sensitive to ensuring that legislation conforms to the Charter and not force a test of presumed innocence.

The staff brought our attention to a case that I am familiar with, the Hunter and Southam case, a Supreme Court case that said there is no difference between reasonable and probable grounds.

Is that right?

Mr. Pollack: That is the Department of Justice's position.

Senator Grafstein: Is that not what the case says?

Mr. Pollack: I do not think that is what the case says.

Senator Grafstein: What does the case say?

Mr. Pollack: I think the case says that when it comes to the kinds of intrusions that the Combines people made in that case, the minimum standard is the search warrant standard.

Senator Grafstein: That is "reasonable"?

Mr. Pollack: That is "reasonable grounds".

Senator Grafstein: And you think that adding the word "and probable" is a higher standard than "reasonable"?

Mr. Pollack: It is a higher standard. Remember, we say it should be applied here because the deponent police officer is saying to the judge that a crime was committed.

Senator Grafstein: This is a pre-emptive strike in advance of the charge. You are saying the strike has to be done on a standard consistent with the charge.

Mr. Pollack: I do not know if it will be in advance of the charge, necessarily.

Senator Grafstein: It normally is because a person has not been charged before the property is seized, such property to be

Le sénateur Grafstein: Proposez-nous donc une modification qui permettrait de protéger la relation entre l'avocat et son client.

M. Pollack: Ce serait peut-être une solution.

Le sénateur Grafstein: Oui, cela réglerait peut-être le problème. Votre réaction à ma première question m'intéresse davantage. En ce qui a trait au respect de la Charte, vous disiez qu'au sujet de la confiscation, le critère était que les motifs soient raisonnables et probables.

Si je vous ai bien compris, vous disiez que les motifs raisonnables n'étaient pas suffisants, et qu'il faudrait ajouter «motifs probables». Est-ce bien cela?

M. Pollack: Oui. Si vous étiez accusé d'une infraction, je pourrais, en tant qu'avocat de la défense, interroger le policier qui a porté les accusations contre vous afin de déterminer si ses motifs étaient raisonnables et probables. Si ce n'était pas le cas, le juge rejetterait les accusations sans autre forme de procès. Que les motifs soient raisonnables, s'ils sont très improbables, le juge rejettera immédiatement les accusations.

Le sénateur Grafstein: Je comprends cela. L'Association du Barreau canadien voudrait qu'on ajoute les mots «et pour des motifs probables. Je répète que je tiens absolument à ce que les lois satisfassent à la Charte en tous points.

Notre personnel de recherche a attiré notre attention sur une cause que je connais bien, la cause Hunter et Southam, dans laquelle la Cour suprême a dit qu'il n'y avait aucune différence entre des motifs raisonnables et des motifs probables.

Êtes-vous du même avis?

M. Pollack: C'est la position du ministère de la Justice.

Le sénateur Grafstein: N'est-ce pas celle qu'a adoptée la Cour suprême?

M. Pollack: Non, je ne pense pas.

Le sénateur Grafstein: Qu'a-t-elle dit, alors?

M. Pollack: Je pense qu'elle a dit que c'était la norme des mandats de perquisition qui s'appliquait dans de tels cas.

Le sénateur Grafstein: C'est un motif raisonnable?

M. Pollack: Oui.

Le sénateur Grafstein: Et vous pensez qu'ajouter le mot «probables» renforce la norme?

M. Pollack: Oui, je le pense. N'oubliez pas que nous disons que ce serait nécessaire parce que le policier en question dit au juge qu'un crime a été commis.

Le sénateur Grafstein: C'est une accusation portée avant la mise en accusation réelle. Vous dites qu'il faudrait qu'elle soit au même degré que les accusations qui seront portées.

M. Pollack: Je ne sais pas si elle précédera forcément les accusations formelles.

Le sénateur Grafstein: Habituellement, oui, parce que les accusations ne seront pas portées avant la saisie des biens, qui used as evidence. Then subsequently a charge is laid. I assume that this is what this is all about, to allow the authorities to pre-emptively obtain property and then lay a charge.

Mr. Pollack: The people affected by the seizure may not necessarily be those who are charged.

Senator Grafstein: I understand that. I am not quarrelling with that. It is a pre-emptive strike against people who may or may not be charged. Some people may be charged subsequently, some may not be charged. The only question on the Charter side—and I am trying to understand this so that the staff will come back and give us their version; but again I read the Hunter and Southam case, as the staff did, and I see that "reasonable" and "probable grounds" are virtually the same and, therefore, a good test is reasonable, and you can import the same standard into "reasonable" as you could into "probable."

Mr. Pollack: If that is how the law unfolds, then we will not have a problem with "reasonable". If "reasonable" is always going to mean "reasonable and probable", then fine.

The Chairman: That is a very moot point.

Senator Grafstein: That is the debatable point on which I want to get the witness' evidence.

My final question is. Is there some place else in the set of provisions where you think the Charter is offended; and, if so, how?

Mr. Pollack: If this is a bill, as we say, that is fundamentally defective because of the lack of reasonable and probable grounds, and if we say further—and we are right—that this is a bill that puts an unfair onus on people who are really accused of some kind of criminality—first of all to come forward, and then to show they are innocent—and if we say in addition that this is a bill that puts a person facing sentencing in a form of jeopardy—if this is not double jeopardy, it is certainly one and three-quarters jeopardy, because they face two sentencing hearings—

Senator Grafstein: You mean they would be hit twice because of the property and the charge itself?

Mr. Pollack: They are hit twice because if they are found guilty of an enterprise crime, or a designated drug offence, they may then face a hearing on the penalty to be imposed in lieu of restoration of the property.

If you look at that you will see that it is a fairly shaky scheme in light of the Charter.

There are some other details. You might want to consider that in the notice provisions—that is, where a judge is asked to give a seizure order—the judge has a discretion to give notice. They have not been tightened up at all. If you look at the reasons why a judge may give notice—well, I can refer you to section 420.12, subparagraph (5). That says that a judge may seront utilisés comme preuves. Les accusations ne sont portées qu'après la saisie. Je suppose que l'on veut permettre ainsi aux autorités de mettre tout d'abord la main sur les biens, et de porter ensuite les accusations.

M. Pollack: Les personnes dont les biens sont saisis ne sont pas forcément celles contre lesquelles porteront les accusations.

Le sénateur Grafstein: Je comprends cela. Je suis tout à fait d'accord avec vous. C'est une mesure que l'on prend à l'égard de personnes contre lesquelles des accusations seront portées ou non. Certaines seront mises en accusation par la suite, et d'autres pas. La seule question qui se pose, en ce qui a trait à la Charte—et j'essaie de comprendre cela, de manière à ce que notre personnel puisse ensuite nous donner son opinion—mais, là encore, je me réfère à la cause Hunter et Southam, comme notre personnel de recherche l'a fait, et je constate que «motifs raisonnables» et «motifs probables» ont à toute fin pratique la même signification, et que par conséquent, le caractère raisonnable des motifs est un critère acceptable, et la notion de probable est sous-jacente à celle de raisonnable.

M. Pollack: Si c'est la signification qu'aura le mot «raisonnable» dans la loi, nous n'avons aucune objection. Si «raisonnable» signifiera toujours «raisonnable et probable», très bien.

La présidente: C'est un aspect très discutable.

Le sénateur Grafstein: C'est un élément controversé sur lequel je veux avoir l'avis de notre témoin.

Ma dernière question est celle-ci: Dans le projet de loi, y a-t-il un autre article qui déroge à la Charte? Le cas échéant, en quoi y déroge-t-il?

M. Pollack: Si l'on admet que ce projet de loi est fondamentalement lacunaire, en raison de l'absence de motifs raisonnables et probables, et si nous disons en outre—et nous avons raison là-dessus—que ce projet de loi impose un fardeau injuste à des personnes vraiment accusées d'un acte criminel quelconque—à savoir, d'assurer leur défense et de prouver leur innocence—et si l'on reconnaît, en outre, que ce projet de loi comporte des risques pour une personne à laquelle une peine doit être imposée—il y a sûrement un double risque, ou presque, parce que cette personne doit faire face à deux auditions pénales—

Le sénateur Grafstein: Vous dites qu'elle subirait deux auditions? Pour la restitution des biens et pour répondre aux accusations portées?

M. Pollack: Oui, en effet, parce qu'en étant reconnue coupable d'une infraction de criminalité organisée ou d'une infraction désignée en matière de trafic de stupéfiants, elle pourrait devoir subir une audition visant à déterminer la peine qui sera imposée au lieu de la restitution des biens.

Si vous examinez cela d'un peu plus près, vous constaterez que ce n'est pas bien reluisant en ce qui a trait à la Charte.

Il y a encore d'autres détails à considérer. Vous remarquerez que dans les dispositions relatives aux avis—c'est-à-dire, lorsqu'un juge se voit demander de décerner un mandat de saisie—le juge a la liberté d'exiger ou non qu'un avis en soit donné. On ne les a pas du tout renforcées. Si vous examinez les raisons pour lesquelles un juge peut donner un avis—jetez un require notice to be given to people who will be affected by the seizure, if I can generalize. There are some reasons stated why a judge would not give notice. If, by giving notice, the judge was going to make sure the property was going to disappear, he would not give notice.

Surely in subparagraph (5) the drafters have exhausted why notice should not be given.

Senator Grafstein: Can I give you a parallel to this, and you tell me if it is offensive. A narcotics squad goes out and decides it will seek permission for a wire tap on reasonable grounds that the person whose telephone is being tapped is a criminal or involved in an enterprise offence.

During the course of that conversation, in the course of the wire tap, I phone, the person's doctor phones, or his lawyer phones. In effect, that person's rights, if you will, are being affected as are other people's rights by the same process.

Does that not happen all the time?

Mr. Pollack: That has happened to me. I have heard my voice on a police tape recorder in a court room.

Senator Grafstein: I have also. I am not sure I characterized the rights, but certainly my rights have been affected. I suppose society's answer to that is that this is one of the costs of ensuring—assuming it is on reasonable grounds that the warrant was issued to begin with—that it weeds out the ills of society; and that is one of the costs to society, that my rights will be interfered with because I happen, innocently or otherwise, to talk to somebody who is affected by this particular tap. This happens to everybody. I am sure that a person who is wire-tapped comes into contact with a lot of people who are not necessarily related to his criminal enterprise. How different is that from this particular statute in terms of that provision? The judge does not phone me up to say, "By the way, I am giving you notice that I am wire-tapping someone you were acting for." If I hear myself on tape in the courtroom, that could be a little embarrassing.

Mr. Pollack: All we are saying about subclause 5 is that the judge should have to give notice, unless notice would result in a dissipation of or reduction in the value of property.

Senator Grafstein: You are saying that it should be mandatory?

Mr. Pollack: Yes. Surely that subsection exhausts the reasons why you would not give notice. Surely there should be an onus on the judge, otherwise, to give notice. Under the wire-tap legislation, for instance, if a law office is going to be affected, then certain safeguards must be applied. A judge actually must conduct part of his inquiry into the nature of that intrusion and apply some safeguards. That is all I am suggesting.

But let me go further to point out that before the issuance of notice under that subclause is dealt with, all the judge has to coup d'œil au cinquième paragraphe de l'article 420.12. On y dit qu'un juge peut exiger qu'un avis soit donné à des personnes qui seront touchées par la saisie, si je peux me permettre de généraliser. On y stipule quelques raisons pour lesquelles un juge n'émettrait pas d'avis, par exemple, si cela risquait d'entraîner la disparition des biens visés . . .

On peut sûrement dire que les rédacteurs n'ont rien oublié au paragraphe 5 en ce qui a trait aux raisons pour ne pas émettre d'avis.

Le sénateur Grafstein: Permettez-moi de vous donner un exemple? Vous me direz ce que vous en pensez. Supposons qu'une équipe de surveillance du trafic de stupéfiants décide, pour des motifs raisonnables, de demander la permission d'écouter les conversations d'une personne soupçonnée d'un acte criminel ou de faire partie d'une entreprise criminelle.

Supposons maintenant que je téléphone à cette personne, que son médecin ou son avocat l'appelle. On empiète sur les droits de cette personne et, en même temps, sur ceux des autres personnes qui l'appellent.

N'est-ce pas fréquent?

M. Pollack: Cela m'est arrivé. Il m'est déjà arrivé d'entendre ma voix, dans un tribunal, sur un enregistrement qu'avait fait la police.

Le sénateur Grafstein: Oui, ça m'est arrivé à moi aussi. Je n'ai rien dit à propos de mes droits, mais on ne les a sûrement pas respectés. Je suppose que la justification de la société à cela, c'est que c'est l'un des prix à payer pour faire en sorte d'éliminer les problèmes dans la société—en supposant que le mandat ait au départ été émis pour des motifs raisonnables—et que mes droits ne seront pas complètement respectés parce que j'aurai eu le malheur d'appeler innocemment quelqu'un dont les conversations sont surveillées. Nous ne sommes pas les seuls à qui cela arrive. Je suis persuadé qu'une personne dont les conversations sont surveillées communique avec bien des gens qui n'ont pas forcément quoi que ce soit à voir avec ses activités criminelles. Quelle est la différence par rapport à cette loi précise? Le juge ne m'appelera pas pour m'informer que les conversations d'une personne que je représente sont surveillées. Il pourrait être un peu gênant d'entendre ma voix sur un enregistrement dans une salle d'audience.

M. Pollack: Tout ce que nous disons, à propos du paragraphe 5, c'est que le juge devrait être tenu d'émettre un avis, à moins que cela risque d'occasionner la dissipation des biens ou une diminution de leur valeur.

Le sénateur Grafstein: Vous dites que cela devrait être obligatoire?

M. Pollack: Oui. On ne peut douter que toutes les raisons pour ne pas émettre d'avis sont mentionnées dans cet alinéa. Dans tous les autres cas, le juge devrait être tenu d'émettre un avis. Dans la loi relative à l'écoute entiers, par exemple, lorsqu'un cabinet juridique est visé, certaines limites doivent être imposées. Un juge doit s'enquérir du caractère de cette intrusion et poser des limites. C'est tout ce que je dis.

Mais permettez-moi de souligner qu'avant que la question de l'émission de l'avis visé par ce paragraphe soit réglée, le go by is one side of the case—the deposition of an eager police officer, who is ready to detect an enterprise crime or a designated drug offence. Surely that calls for some mandatory form of notice, unless the judge can include in the order the reason why notice is not going to be given.

The Chairman: I should probably know this, Mr. Pollack, but has the question of reverse onus been decided definitively by the Supreme Court of Canada?

Mr. Pollack: I think that recent events in the Supreme Court of Canada have indicated that the reverse onus provisions of various statutes are going to be upheld by the courts. This the Supreme Court recently did in terms of the presumption concerning the person driving a car while he is over .08. The court has said that if the shift of the burden is an unfair one, then it will not be upheld by the courts. In a case I was involved in several years ago, the Supreme Court of Canada said that there are unfair burdens placed upon accused persons under the Customs Act. These people were told that they had something in their possession that was imported—prove it in order to enter Canada lawfully. That is what happened to the appellant in the case in which I was involved and that section was struck down. However, a section of the Criminal Code that calls upon a drunk person found behind the wheel of a motor vehicle to give an account of himself that does not include driving is not an unreasonable or unfair reverse onus at all. That kind of reverse onus will be upheld by the courts, because it is fair to cast the onus on the individual. Why? Because there is substantial nexus, in the words of the Supreme Court, between the presumed fact and the subject upon whom the burden is placed.

The Chairman: Your argument is that in proposed subsection 420.21(3) and proposed section 420.22, the reverse onus is unfair. You go further than that to say that the applicant must establish innocence rather than simply to be proven not guilty, which is what any other person would have to do.

Mr. Pollack: That is right. Not only that; when you think about it, this notion of appearing innocent is not something one normally comes across—I certainly have not come across it in my 16 or 17 years of practising this kind of law. It is fairly new. How do you show that you are innocent? How do you appear to be innocent? If you try to show that you appear innocent, is the Crown then allowed to show that you appear guilty? Is that how the disposition of somebody's lifetime acquisition of assets is going to be decided?

Senator Grafstein: The Law Society has done exactly that to a law firm in Toronto.

Mr. Pollack: I know the case of which you are speaking, although I am not familiar with the facts of it.

Senator Grafstein: I wonder whether that is of concern to the Canadian Bar Association. I think it is an obscene way to juge n'a reçu qu'un seul son de cloche—la déposition d'un policier qui a bien hâte de mettre la main au collet de supposés criminels. Il ne fait aucun doute que cela exige que les avis soient obligatoires, à moins que le juge ne puisse inscrire au mandat la raison pour laquelle on n'a pas avisé les intéressés.

La présidente: Je devrais probablement le savoir, M. Pollack, mais la Cour suprême du Canada s'est-elle prononcée de façon définitive sur la question du renversement du fardeau de la preuve?

M. Pollack: Je pense que les derniers jugements qu'a rendus la Cour suprême du Canada indiquent que ces dispositions que l'on retrouve dans diverses lois seront appliquées par les tribunaux. C'est ce qu'a récemment fait la Cour suprême en ce qui a trait à la présomption relative à la personne qui conduit un véhicule en état d'ébriété. La Cour a déclaré que si le renversement du fardeau de la preuve est injuste, les tribunaux ne l'admettront pas. Dans une cause à laquelle j'ai participé, il y a plusieurs années de cela, la Cour suprême du Canada a déclaré que la loi sur les douanes impose des fardeaux injustes à certaines personnes contre lesquelles des accusations sont portées. Ces personnes sont soupçonnées d'avoir en leur possession des produits qui sont importés—elles doivent le prouver pour les introduire légalement au Canada. C'est ce qui est arrivé à celui qui en avait appelé du jugement, et cet article a été éliminé. Toutefois, un article du Code criminel qui exige d'une personne qui a été arrêtée alors qu'elle conduisait un véhicule après avoir consommé des boissons alcooliques qu'elle rende compte de ses gestes, sans qu'il soit question de la conduite du véhicule, n'est pas du tout un renversement du fardeau de la preuve que l'on pourrait considérer déraisonnable ou injuste. Les tribunaux l'appliqueront, parce qu'il est juste d'obliger cette personne à s'expliquer. Pourquoi? Parce qu'il y a un lien important, selon la Cour suprême, entre le fait présumé et la personne qui doit se justifier.

La présidente: Vous soutenez que le renversement du fardeau de la preuve au paragraphe 420.21(3) et à l'article 420.22 est injuste? Vous allez même jusqu'à dire que le demandeur doit prouver son innocence plutôt que de se voir tout simplement reconnaître non coupable, ce qui serait la procédure normale.

M. Pollack: C'est juste. Qui plus est, quand on y songe, cette notion de paraître innocent n'est pas habituelle—il n'en a jamais été question au cours de mes 16 ou 17 années de pratique. C'est une notion plutôt nouvelle. Comment démontrer que l'on est innocent? Comment fait-on pour paraître innocent? S'il en est ainsi, la Couronne peut-elle, de son côté, chercher à démontrer que l'on paraît coupable? Est-ce ainsi que l'on disposera des biens qu'une personne aura accumulés au cours de son existence?

Le sénateur Grafstein: C'est précisément de cette façon qu'a agit la Société du droit à l'égard d'un cabinet juridique de Toronto.

M. Pollack: Je sais que quoi vous parlez, mais je ne suis pas au courant de tous les faits.

Le sénateur Grafstein: Cela inquiète-t-il l'Association du Barreau canadien? Je pense que c'est une façon absolument deal with a firm's reputation. That is precisely what has been done—their innocence has been dealt with on the front page of the Globe and Mail without affording to them the opportunity to defend themselves, whether they are guilty or not. The Law Society has done that. Has the Canadian Bar Association done anything about it? I do not know anything about the facts of that case, either. I just felt that it was a terrible tragedy to take a great firm's name down the pipe, and, with it, the names of 100 lawyers.

Mr. Pollack: I will see to it that that inquiry is addressed with dispatch.

Senator Grafstein: Is the Canadian Bar Association concerned about the innocence of an accused? I am concerned about it. When 100 lawyers get swamped by a blanket charge, I think that is extremely offensive.

Senator Doyle: The only thing I know about that case is that the law firm in question will probably never recover its good name, no matter what the circumstances are.

Senator Grafstein: I agree with that. I found the whole thing obscene.

Senator Doyle: And the attack was from the Law Society, not the Canadian Bar Association. I am not challenging the Canadian Bar Association in this.

Senator Buckwold: I wanted to explore another aspect that was pointed out at page 20 of your brief, Mr. Pollack, and that is the restoration provisions that are too complex. You point out that restoration of seized or restrained property of an accused found not guilty after trial should be automatic. I agree with that. Would you explain to us how it is not automatic? What are the problems? Is this a normal procedure in terms of getting property back?

Mr. Pollack: The problem the justice department has is illustrated by the case of the Montreal bank account containing funds that the entire world knew were obtained through crime. There was no instrument that any judge or magistrate was capable of issuing that could attach to that money. As a result, some modification of the law was called for. In that case, if the subject had not died, had he been prosecuted and had the money become an exhibit in the case, then, under certain provisions of the Criminal Code, the judge could have made any number of orders dealing with it. I am not saying that the money would necessarily have become an exhibit—in the eyes of the court, it may have been irrelevant to the prosecution.

Senator Buckwold: But the bank account could have been frozen?

Mr. Pollack: In that case, it may not have been. Let me provide a better example. If I am accused of stealing this glass and, after the trial, I have been found guilty of having stolen it, the owner of that glass, which would have been marked an exhibit at the trial, would have been able to come forth to make an application under a section of the Criminal Code to immorale de traiter la réputation d'un cabinet juridique. On a discuté de son innocence à la première page du Globe and Mail, sans lui donner la possibilité de se défendre. L'Association du Barreau canadien est-elle intervenue d'une façon quelconque? Je n'en sais pas tellement plus long que vous à ce sujet. J'ai trouvé extrêmement déplorable qu'on salisse ainsi la réputation d'un important cabinet juridique, en même temps que celle d'une centaine d'avocats.

M. Pollack: Je verrai à ce que cette enquête se fasse rapidement.

Le sénateur Grafstein: L'innocence d'un accusé intéresse-t-elle l'Association du barreau canadien? C'est une question que je me pose. Quand une accusation porte sur 100 avocats à la fois, cela me paraît extrêmement offensant.

Le sénateur Doyle: Tout ce que je sais, à ce propos, c'est que ce cabinet juridique ne s'en remettra probablement jamais, quoiqu'ils advienne.

Le sénateur Grafstein: Je suis d'accord avec vous. J'ai trouvé toute cette affaire absolument immorale.

Le sénateur Doyle: Et les accusations provenaient de la Société du droit, et non de l'Association du barreau canadien. Je n'accuse pas l'Association du barreau canadien dans cette affaire.

Le sénateur Buckwold: Monsieur Pollack, je voulais vous demander quelques précisions à propos de certaines observations que nous faites à la 20e page de votre mémoire, au sujet de la trop grande complexité des dispositions relatives à la restitution des biens. Vous dites que la restitution des biens saisis ou bloqués d'une personne reconnue non coupable après un procès devrait être automatique. Je suis d'accord avec vous là-dessus. En quoi n'est-ce pas le cas? Quelles difficultés voyez-vous? N'est ce pas la procédure normale?

M. Pollack: Le cas du compte bancaire à la Banque de Montréal, qui contenait de l'argent que le monde entier savait provenir d'activités criminelles, illustre bien la difficulté à laquelle fait face le ministère de la Justice. Un juge ou un magistrat ne disposait d'aucun instrument permettant de bloquer cet argent. Des modifications à la loi s'imposaient donc. Dans ce cas précis, si le sujet n'était pas décédé, s'il avait fait l'objet de poursuites, et si l'argent avait été retenu comme pièce à conviction au cours du procès, le juge aurait alors disposé d'un certain nombre d'instruments en vertu de certaines dispositions du Code criminel. Je ne dis pas que l'on aurait forcément retenu l'argent comme pièce à conviction, car aux yeux du tribunal, il n'aurait peut-être présenté aucun intérêt pour la poursuite.

Le sénateur Buckwold: Mais le compte bancaire aurait pu être bloqué?

M. Pollack: Dans ce cas précis, peut-être pas. Permettez-moi de vous donner un meilleur exemple. Supposons que je sois accusé d'avoir volé ce verre, et que je sois par la suite reconnu non coupable, après un procès. Le propriétaire de ce verre, qui aurait été reconnu comme pièce à conviction au moment du procès, pourrait demander de le récupérer en vertu d'un article get it back. The judge could agree or disagree, and, in the case of a dispute, civil litigation would be entered into.

This bill is designed to deal with other kinds of things that must be disposed of because they can be proven to result from crime. We are simply saying that when you are affecting someone's property in that way by confiscating it from him, what is wrong with giving him due notice? What is wrong with having in place a reasonable standard—a standard that has stood the test in criminal cases over the years? If it is the intention to restore victims to their earlier status, the Canadian Bar Association thinks that is a good way to deal with the proceeds of crime. If you want to use this as a penalty, we suggest that you have a sentencing hearing. We suggest that you not have in place anything that will tie the judges' hands—have a hearing to determine the disposition of the seized money, thing or whatever the property is.

Senator Doyle: Is this much different from what happens in pornography cases, where entire stocks of books or paraphernalia are seized and sometimes held for years while the guilt or innocence of the accused is determined?

Mr. Pollack: In those cases, though, ultimately the court has the right to confiscate them. Do not forget, there has been proof beyond a reasonable doubt that the books are obscene or the videos are obscene. That is the issue before the court.

Senator Doyle: That is right, and the person is innocent and his stock is his and is his legitimate material for making his livelihood.

Mr. Pollack: Not too many of those prosecutions were under the provisions of the Charter, which called for trial within a reasonable time. It may well be that a trial cannot be held within a reasonable time if it means that the person is put out of business in the meantime while they are presumed to be innocent.

Senator Doyle: I am concerned about whether or not there is a difference in the principle of the procedure. You are taking something and saying, "We think that you got this illegally, you are using it illegally and you are selling it illegally. We are going to hold onto it until we have had a trial." Is that not what is happening here under this bill? We are saying, "Whatever you have there—it may be a house or a business or a solid gold cadillac—we are going to hold onto it until we have had a trial and find out whether or not you are guilty or innocent." I am not saying I am defending that, but is that not a similar process?

Mr. Pollack: It is similar.

Senator Buckwold: Getting back to my original question, after a man has been found innocent and his gold-plated Cadillac or his house has been seized, what are the complications in getting it back? You have referred to it as being too complex and too difficult. Would the judge not normally say that this property is to be returned?

Mr. Pollack: Normally, yes, one would expect that.

du code criminel. Le juge pourrait accepter sa requête ou non, et, en cas de litige, le demandeur ferait une requête au civil.

Ce projet de loi porte sur des biens dont on peut prouver qu'ils ont été acquis à la suite d'actes criminels. Nous disons tout simplement que si l'on a l'intention de confisquer ainsi les biens d'une personne, pourquoi ne pas l'en informer en bonne et due forme? Pourquoi ne pas appliquer une norme raisonnable qui a fait ses preuves dans de nombreuses causes criminelles depuis nombre d'années? Si l'intention est de redresser les torts faits aux victimes, l'Association du barreau canadien est d'avis que c'est une bonne façon de procéder en ce qui a trait aux produits de la criminalité. Si vous voulez appliquer cette mesure en guise de peine, nous pensons qu'il y aurait lieu qu'une audition soit tenue en la matière. Il faudrait éviter de limiter la latitude des juge et pour cela, faire en sorte que les moyens de disposer de l'argent ou des biens saisis soient déterminés dans le cadre d'une audition.

Le sénateur Doyle: Est-ce très différent de ce qui se passe pour les affaires de pornographie, dans lesquelles des stocks entiers de livres ou d'objets érotiques divers sont saisis, parfois conservés sous séquestre, pendant des années en attendant que l'on établisse la culpabilité ou l'innonce de l'accusé?

M. Pollack: Dans de telles affaires, c'est finalement le tribunal qui a le droit de les confisquer. N'oubliez pas qu'il existe déjà une preuve au-delà de tout doute raisonnable que ces livres ou ces vidéos sont obscènes. C'est cela qui est porté devant le tribunal.

Le sénateur Doyle: C'est vrai, et la personne est innocente, son stock lui appartient et est un moyen légitime pour elle de gagner sa vie.

M. Pollack: Peu de ces poursuites relèvent des dispositions de la Charte, qui prévoyaient que les procès devait se dérouler dans des délais raisonnables. Or, cela n'est pas possible si cela signifie qu'en attendant, une telle personne ne peut plus travailler alors qu'elle est présumée être innocente.

Le sénateur Doyle: Ce qui m'intéresse, c'est de savoir s'il y a une différence dans le principe de la procédure. Vous saisissez quelque chose et déclarez: «Vous avez obtenu ceci illégalement, vous l'utiliser illégalement et vous le vendez illégalement. Nous allons le garder sous séquestre jusqu'au jugement.» N'est-ce pas là ce qui se passe en vertu de ce projet de loi? Cela se ramène après tout à dire, «Quoi que vous ayez là—que ce soit une maison, une entreprise ou une Cadillac en or massif—nous allons le conserver sous séquestre jusqu'à ce que vous soyez jugé coupable ou innoncent.» Je ne prétends pas être partisan de cela, mais n'est-ce pas là un processus analogue?

M. Pollack: En effet.

Le sénateur Buckwold: Revenons à ma première question; après qu'un homme ait été reconnu innoncent alors que sa Cadillac plaquée or ou sa maison avait été saisie, à quel genre de complications se heurte-t-il pour la récupérer? Vous avez dit que c'était trop complexe et trop difficile. Le juge ne déclare-t-il pas normalement que ce bien doit être rendu?

M. Pollack: Normalement, oui, c'est ce à quoi on s'attendrait.

[Text]

Senator Buckwold: How is that not done in this bill?

Mr. Pollack: Unless I misread the bill, you have to ask for it. If there is a hearing to determine whether or not a person should have something returned, the judge may well give notice to others involved.

Senator Buckwold: Would he not have to ask for it in any case?

Mr. Pollack: I think he would.

Senator Buckwold: If, for example, you had property that had been stolen and you wanted to get it back because it was your property, you would have to ask for it and have identification in order to get it back. It is not quite automatic.

Mr. Pollack: A judge at a trial has to do something with the matters that are brought before him or her.

Senator Buckwold: I am trying to find out the difference between the judge's powers in this particular bill and what happens in the couse of ordinary litigation.

Mr. Pollack: We have not been too concerned with crime victims until recently. Many is the occasion when the crime victim finds out that someone was convicted of breaking into their house or stealing their bicycle or whatever when they read it in the newspapers. They are not told anything until they ask around the police station, "When can I get my property back?" We do not deal with victims with the sensitivity that we should.

In a new piece of legislation we should know that once it has been determined that someone is innocent of a crime and something was seized from that person that was the subject of prosecution, at least there is an onus on the state to give it back.

Senator Buckwold: Again, you have not answered my question to the satisfaction I would like. Why is this different from any other legislation in getting property back? Is it not almost the same? You are saying that the law should be clearer in this case.

Mr. Pollack: Unless I misread the legislation, it calls on someone to establish to some degree that they appear innocent.

Senator Doyle: But that raises a separate point.

Senator Buckwold: Once the man has been declared innocent by trial, in due course he gets his property back without too much problem.

Senator Grafstein: That does not follow. I have a car in my garage and the kids next door are having a cocaine party. They decide they will dump the coke in my car because the cops are chasing them through the backyard. I have to go and get my car. I am innocent, but the police are not necessarily going to give me my car because they say that they will use it at trial.

[Traduction]

Le sénateur Buckwold: Comment se fait-il que ce projet de loi ne le prévoit pas?

M. Pollack: À moins que je l'aie mal interprété, il faut le demander. S'il y a une audience afin de déterminer si l'on doit rendre quelque chose à quelqu'un, le juge peut fort bien en aviser les autres parties en cause.

Le sénateur Buckwold: De toute façon, ne faut-il pas demander la restitution?

M. Pollack: Je crois que oui.

Le sénateur Buckwold: Si, par exemple, on vous a volé quelque chose que vous voulez récupérer parce qu'elle vous appartenait, a vous êtes obligé d'en faire la demande et de fournir la preuve de votre identité. Ce n'est pas tout à fait automatique.

M. Pollack: À un procès, un juge doit prendre une décision sur les questions qui lui sont soumises.

Le sénateur Buckwold: J'essaie de trouver la différence entre les pouvoirs conférés au juge par ce projet de loi et ce qui se passe dans le cas d'un litige ordinaire.

M. Pollack: Jusqu'à ces derniers temps, nous nous sommes guère souciés des victimes de crimes. Il arrive bien souvent qu'elles apprennent par les journaux que leur cambrioleur ou celui qui leur avait volé leur bicyclette ou autre chose a été condamné. Tant qu'elles ne se rendent pas au poste de police pour demander, «Quand puis-je récupérer mon bien?», on ne leur dit rien du tout. Nous ne traitons pas les victimes avec la compréhension nécessaire.

Un nouveau texte de loi devrait préciser qu'une fois qu'une personne a été déclarée innocente, ce devrait être la responsabilité de l'État de lui rendre ce qui a été saisi et qui a fait l'objet des poursuites.

Le sénateur Buckwold: Encore une fois, vous n'avez pas vraiment répondu à ma question. En quoi la question de la récupération des biens diffère-t-elle ici des autres lois? N'est-ce pas pratiquement la même chose? Vous dites que dans ce cas particulier, la loi devrait être plus claire.

M. Pollack: À moins que je ne l'aie mal interprétée elle exige de vous que vous établissiez dans une certaine mesure votre innocence.

Le sénateur Doyle: Cela soulève une question tout à fait différente.

Le sénateur Buckwold: Une fois qu'une personne a été déclarée innocente à l'issue d'un procès, elle finit par récupérer ses biens sans trop de difficulté.

Le sénateur Grafstein: Il y a une faille dans ce raisonnement. Supposons que j'ai un auto dans mon garage et que les jeunes gens d'à côté fassent la fête et se droguent à la cocaïne. Ils décident de la planquer dans mon auto parce que la police les poursuit dans la cour. Je suis obligé d'aller récupérer ma voiture; je suis innocent, mais la police ne va pas nécessairement me la rendre car elle va me dire qu'elle en a besoin comme pièce à conviction.

[Text]

Senator Buckwold: I do not think we are talking on the same wavelength in this regard. The kids could be found guilty and, in due course, you would get your car back, I would presume.

Mr. Pollack: Let me add another ingredient to the scenario. Suppose the car was driven across the border into Canada. I am not talking about the American zero tolerance operation. After the case was over involving the felon who threw the cocaine into the car, like a client of my firm's recently, Senator Grafstein could find himself dealing with Canada Customs down the street, trying to pursuade them to release the car. That is exactly what occurred in a case in Winnipeg.

Senator Spivak: The question here, though, is this: In every other piece of legislation does the innocent party have to ask for his property back or is it automatically disposed of?

I have a further question: If the innocent party or the victim does not ask for his property back, what automatically happens to that property, either in this piece of legislation or in any other piece of legislation? What is the judge'e role? Who is the person in charge of that property? Who is the agent of the Crown? I do not understand this.

Mr. Pollack: Where a statute gives out responsibility, as this one does, that responsibility appears to be that of the court. The court makes the orders, and the court has to safeguard the property. The court can only do what the statute says. To give back a property, the court has to do what the statute says, and that is to give it back only to those who appear innocent.

Senator Spivak: And those people who come and ask for it?

Mr. Pollack: Yes.

Senator Spivak: Is that any different from any other piece of legislation?

Mr. Pollack: It is different from every other piece of legislation, because there is no other legislation where someone has to come to a court and prove innocence to any degree in order to get back something that is his.

Senator Grafstein: I misunderstood what Senator Buckwold and Senator Spivak said, although I think I understand now. Let us assume there was no legislation, the property is seized and the judge has no sequential legislation to deal with the issue. Assume, also that the man is innocent and he says to the judge, "I want my property back." Does the judge not have the equitable power of the court to give the man back his property?

Mr. Pollack: Are you talking about present search warrant law?

Senator Grafstein: Yes. That was Senator Buckwold's question.

Mr. Pollack: Under present search warrant law, unless there is an extension, the property has to be given back in 90 days or whatever the law says.

[Traduction]

Le sénateur Buckwold: Je ne crois pas que nous soyons sur la même longueur d'ondes. Ces jeunes gens pourraient être déclarés coupables et je suppose que vous finiriez par récupérer votre auto.

M. Pollack: Laissez-moi ajouter un élément supplémentaire à ce scénario. Supposons que l'auto vienne des États-Unis et ait donc franchi notre frontière. Je ne parle pas de l'opération américaine actuelle dans laquelle absolument rien n'est toléré. Cela est arrivé récemment à un client de mon cabinet, et il se pourrait fort bien qu'après que le criminel qui a jeté de la cocaïne dans son auto ait été jugé, le sénateur Grafstein se retrouverait au bureau de Douanes Canada pour essayer de convaincre les douaniers de lui rendre son auto. C'est exactement ce qui s'est passé à Winnipeg.

Le sénateur Spivak: Ma question demeure cependant la suivante: Dans les autres lois, la partie innocente est-elle obligée de demander qu'on lui rendre son bien ou cela se fait-il automatiquement?

J'ai une autre question à poser. Si la partie innocente ou la victime ne demande pas qu'on lui rende son bien, qu'arrive-t-il automatiquement à celui-ci, aux termes de ce projet de loi ou de tout autre texte législatif? Quel est le rôle du juge? Qui est la personne responsable de ce bien? Qui est l'agent de l'État? Il y a là quelque chose que je ne comprends pas.

M. Pollack: Lorsqu'une loi détermine la responsabilité, comme le fait le présent projet de loi cette responsabilité semble être celle du tribunal. C'est le tribunal qui ordonne, et c'est lui qui doit sauvegarder le bien. Ils ne peuvent rien faire d'autre que ce que dit la loi. Pour rendre un bien, le tribunal doit respecter ce que dit la loi, à savoir ne le rendre qu'à ceux qui paraissent innocents.

Le sénateur Spivak: Et à ceux qui viennent le réclamer?

M. Pollack: Oui.

Le sénateur Spivak: En quoi cela diffère-t-il des autres textes de loi?

M. Pollack: Par le fait qu'aucune autre loi n'exige que l'on comparaisse devant un tribunal pour prouver son innocence afin de récupérer quelque chose qui nous appartient.

Le sénateur Grafstein: J'avais mal compris ce que disaient le sénateur Buckwold et le sénateur Spivak, mais je crois saisir maintenant. Supposons qu'il n'y ait pas de loi: le bien est saisi et le juge n'a autre texte sur lequel s'appuyer pour régler la question. Supposons également que la personne est innocente et qu'elle dise au juge, «Je veux qu'on me rende ce qui m'appartient:» le juge ne dispose-t-il pas des moyens de l'équité pour rendre son bien à cette personne?

M. Pollack: Parlez-vous là de la loi actuelle concernant les ordres de perquisition?

Le sénateur Grafstein: Oui. C'était la question du sénateur Buckwold.

M. Pollack: En vertu de cette loi, à moins de l'octroi d'une prolongation, le bien doit être rendu dans les 90 jours qui sont je crois prévus par la loi.

[Text]

Senator Buckwold: You made a major point of how difficult it is, and I am still trying to find out how it is different from any other legislation.

Mr. Pollack: There is an onus on the subject not only to ask for it back but, practically speaking, to get a lawyer to go to the court to persuade the court against perhaps a submission by the Crown or others that he ought not to have it back.

Senator Buckwold: After the man is found innocent does he still have to go through this whole exercise?

Mr. Pollack: Absolutely.

Senator Spivak: This is a step in the wrong direction in terms of getting your property back as an innocent victim.

Mr. Pollack: That is right.

Senator Spivak: It adds a burden that was not there previously.

Mr. Pollack: That is right.

Senator Buckwold: Can you explain how that is read into the law? How does Bill C-61 determine what you have said, namely, after being found innocent of a crime, a person has to go through these procedures you talk about before he or she can get back the property that has been seized.

Mr. Pollack: Would you look at subsection 420.21(3)? Senator, if you are having difficulty understand the clause, of course that is another of our complaints.

Senator Buckwold: Yes, I am having difficulty.

Mr. Pollack: It would be nice if you could read the clause without having any of the interpretive skills that legislative draftsmen have, and know what to do next.

Senator Buckwold: I cannot follow that clause.

Mr. Pollack: Perhaps I could just add something else that comes to mind. It is obvious that it is the intention of those who are behind this legislation to deal with those who make serious profits out of crime, and not with what we are fond of referring to as street-level criminals. However, the problem with a piece of legislation such as this is that it is not only right thinkers who are given power to do things under laws such as this. Time and again, judges have said to prosecutors who would ask that laws be interpreted in that fashion—in other words the way a right thinker would act—that that is not the test; it is the validity of the law. Our concern is also with that.

Senator Grafstein: May I raise another subject matter? I recall that we were upset when the Americans exercised the extraterritorial reach of their sovereignty in a very celebrated case. A bounty hunter came up to Toronto and secured the person of an individual and returned him to a southern state of the U.S.A. We were quite upset by that because we felt that that was a breach of our sovereignty.

Le sénateur Buckwold: Vous avez beaucoup insisté sur la difficulté et j'essaie toujours de découvrir en quoi cela diffère des autres lois.

M. Pollack: Il appartient non seulement à l'intéressé de demander la restitution mais, dans la pratique, de se faire représenter par un avocat au tribunal afin de persuader celui-ci de rejeter la demande de l'État ou de ceux qui estiment que la restitution ne devrait pas se faire.

Le sénateur Buckwold: Une fois l'innocence d'une telle personne établie, est-elle obligée de se soumettre à toutes ces formalités?

M. Pollack: Absolument.

Le sénateur Spivak: Quand on est une victime innocente et qu'on veut récupérer ce qui vous appartient, cela me paraît constituer un pas dans la mauvaise direction.

M. Pollack: C'est exact.

Le sénateur Spivak: Cela ajoute un fardeau qui n'existait pas auparavant.

M. Pollack: C'est exact.

Le sénateur Buckwold: Pouvez-vous nous expliquer ce que dit la loi? Comment le projet de loi C-61 établit-il ce que vous venez de dire, à savoir, qu'après avoir été reconnu innocente d'un crime, une personne doit se soumettre à la procédure dont vous parlez avant de pouvoir récupérer le bien saisi.

M. Pollack: Voulez-vous vous reporter au paragraphe 420.21(3)? Sénateur, si vous avez des difficultés à comprendre cette disposition, cela ne me surprend pas car c'est également là une des autres choses dont nous nous plaignons.

Le sénateur Buckwold: Oui, j'ai des difficultés.

M. Pollack: Il serait agréable de pouvoir la lire sans avoir besoin des talents d'interprétation des rédacteurs juridiques, et de pouvoir savoir que faire.

Le sénateur Buckwold: Je ne réussis pas à comprendre cette clause.

M. Pollack: Permettez-moi d'ajouter une remarque qui me vient à l'esprit. Il est manifeste que les auteurs de ce texte de loi visent ceux qui tirent des profits importants du crime, et non pas ceux que l'on se plaît à appeler les petits criminels communs. Le problème, avec ce projet de loi, c'est que ce ne sont pas seulement les personnes qui pensent sainement auxquelles il donne des pouvoirs. Les juges ont maintes fois répété aux plaignants qui demandaient que les lois soient interprétées de cette manière, c'est-à-dire de la manière dont une personne qui pense sainement agirait, que ce n'est pas là le critère, ce qui compte, c'est la validité de la loi. Cela nous inquiète également.

Le sénateur Grafstein: Puis-je soulever une autre question? Je me souviens combien nous avons été choqués lorsque les Américains ont exercé leur souveraineté au-delà de leur territoire dans une affaire qui a reçu beaucoup de publicité. Un chasseur de primes est venu à Toronto, s'est emparé d'une personne et l'a ramenée dans un état du sud des États-Unis. Cela nous a beaucoup troublés car nous y avons vu une infraction contre notre souveraineté.

[Text]

However, I now look at the definition under 420.1: "Proceeds of crime". It is the last definition on page 4. Let me take you through this and then you can tell me if I should be concerned about this:

> 'proceeds of crime' means any property, benefit or advantage, within or outside Canada, obtained or derived directly or indirectly as a result of
> (a) the commission in Canada of an enterprise crime offence or a designated drug offence—

That seems to be all right. In other words, up to the bottom of (a) it means that, wherever the proceeds went, either this country or that country, if it happened here we could seek to wrest it out. That seems to have some extraterritorial nuances, but it arises out of an offence committed in Canada.

However, the next section takes it one step further where it says:

> (b) an act or omission—

In other words, proceeds from an act or omission:

> —anywhere that, if it had occurred in Canada, would have constituted an enterprise crime offence or a designated drug offence

That, in my opinion, is a highly unusual provision; or am I all wrong?

Mr. Pollack: No, you are not. You may want to consider that one of the series of enterprise crime offences involves book-making. Clearly, you cannot be a "bookie" in Canada unless you are licenced. If you are someone who is a "bookie" where it is legal to be a "bookie", then it would appear that your proceeds of book-making, if they were in Canada, could indeed be seized, even though you broke no law in accumulating that wealth.

One can imagine, I suppose, the temptation that some law enforcers would be faced with in saying to someone: "You have unexplained wealth here. You are not working for a living and you have all these millions of dollars. Where did you get it?" The answer is that I got it at a legal bookmaking outlet in some island somewhere and, conceivably, that money would be seized as crime proceeds under this bill.

Senator Grafstein: I had something else in mind, but that is not a bad example. The scenario I had in mind was that Mr. X or Mr. Y decides he is going to leave this jurisdiction and go to a laxer jurisdiction, or tax haven. Let us use Monte Carlo as an example. He then decides that he wants to conduct business there and he conducts his stock business from there. If he had conducted that stock business in Toronto, it would have been unlawful; however, if he does it in Monte Carlo, he is not breaking the law. However, he would offend section (b) if he did that, would he not? If he makes money from a stock promotion business that is unlawful in Canada but not unlawful in Monte Carlo, he would be breaking this law?

Lisons cependant maintenant la définition de «Produits de la criminalité» à l'article 420.1. C'est la dernière définition, à la page 4. Je vais vous la lire et vous direz si j'ai raison de m'en inquiéter:

> «Produits de la criminalité». Bien, bénéfice ou avantage qui est obtenu ou qui provient, au Canada ou à l'extérieur du Canada, directement ou indirectement:
> a) soit de la perpétration ou d'une infraction de criminalité organisée ou d'une infraction désignée en matière de drogues—

Cela paraît acceptable. En d'autres termes, jusqu'à ce que l'on arrive au bas de a), cela signifie que, où que se retrouvent les produits de la criminalité, que ce soit ici ou ailleurs, si le crime s'est produit chez nous, nous pouvons nous efforcer de récupérer ces produits. Cela semble entraîner quelques répercussions sur le plan extraterritorial, mais au départ, c'est une infraction commise au Canada.

Cependant, la suite nous fait faire un pas supplémentaire:

> b) soit d'un acte ou d'une omission qui, au Canada, aurait constitué une infraction de criminalité organisée ou une infractin désignée en matière de drogues.

Sauf erreur de ma part, il s'agit là d'une disposition extrêmement inhabituelle.

M. Pollack: Non, vous ne vous trompez pas. Considérons, par exemple, le book-making. Manifestement, vous ne pouvez pas être bookmaker au Canada à moins d'être titulaire d'un permis. Si vous êtes bookmaker à un endroit où cette activité est légale, il semble bien que les produits de vos activités, s'ils se trouvent au Canada, pourraient être saisis, en dépit du fait que vous n'avez commis aucune infraction à la loi en accumulant cet argent.

Je suppose qu'on peut imaginer la tentation à laquelle seraient confrontés les défenseurs de l'ordre lorsqu'ils disent à quelqu'un: «Vous avez ici des richesses dont la source est inexpliquée. Vous ne travaillez pas, et pourtant, vous avez des millions de dollars. Où les avez-vous gagnés?» La réponse est que je les ai gagnés chez un bookmaker légal dans une île quelconque. Eh bien, il est concevable que cet argent serait saisi comme produit de la criminalité en vertu de ce projet de loi.

Le sénateur Grafstein: J'avais pensé à autre chose, mais l'exemple n'est pas mauvais. Mon scénario était le suivant: M. X ou M. Y décidie de quitter cette juridiction pour aller vivre dans un endroit où les lois sont moins rigoureuses, ou dans un paradis fiscal, Monte Carlo, par exemple. Il décide alors de s'y lancer dans le commerce des valeurs boursières. S'il l'avait fait à Toronto, cela aurait été illégal; mais à Monte Carlo, il n'enfreint pas la loi. Cependant, il enfreindrait le paragraphe b) s'il le faisait, n'est-ce pas? S'il gagne de l'argent dans une entreprise de promotion des actions, qui est illégale au Canada, mais pas à Monte Carlo, il enfreindrait donc cette loi?

[Text]

Mr. Pollack: Yes.

Senator Grafstein: It would then constitute an enterprise crime offence in Canada?

Mr. Pollack: That is right, and the proceeds are seizable and freezable in Canada under this legislation.

Senator Doyle: But not in Monte Carlo?

Mr. Pollack: No.

Senator Doyle: You may have to leave your ill-gotten gains in Monte Carlo. Is that not the case with respect to every kind of business? People have to leave their money in Switzerland, not just because of tax avoidance but sometimes because of the currency restrictions in the country where you have earned it. For example, authors have to go to Russia in order to spend their Russian royalties, now that the Russians are aligned.

Senator Buckwold: What about the fellow who goes to Las Vegas and makes a killing at the crap tables of large amounts of money and he takes it back? Is he carrying on an illegal act in Canada and would he be subject to this bill?

Mr. Pollack: If what he did was a crime in Canada, yes. It must be a specific crime. If it is a specific crime, it is an enterprise crime offence, so you have to look at the legislation.

Senator Grafstein: In other words, if a male or female attended in a legalized house of what is repute in Nevada but ill-repute in Canada, and brought those proceeds to Canada, that certainly would be an offence under this legislation.

Senator Buckwold: So the crap shooter would be all right?

Senator Grafstein: Not necessarily, if your crap shooter was not into betting pool bookmaking.

Mr. Pollack: If he was the kind of crap shooter that is forbidden in Canada—and there are a number of requirements before you are forbidden—if you are a kind of Nathan Detroit of the game, taking a rake-off and so on, then you are committing a crime in Canada. Therefore if you are involved in that kind of activity in Las Vegas, then certainly that would constitute a crime under this legislation.

However, let me give you one example—

Senator Grafstein: Is that of concern to the bar association? I am not sure whether I am concerned about it or not. I tend to feel that if we complain of others being offensive in the reach of their sovereignty and we are doing the same thing, we should be careful not to criticize others when they do things which we ourselves are doing.

Mr. Pollack: I just want to point out to you that, despite our criticisms, this is still a seizing provision that will be subject to some kind of hearing by a judge before a disposition will be made with respect to what is to be seized.

Senator Grafstein: But that is precisely the point, though, is it not? Because a person's proceeds are seized not on the basis of a crime having been committed but on the basis of reasonable grounds that if the deed or transaction had occurred in Canada, it would have constituted a crime.

[Traduction]

M. Pollack: Oui.

Le sénateur Grafstein: Cela constituerait alors au Canada un crime érigé en entreprise licite?

M. Pollack: Oui, et les produits sont saisissables et gelables au Canada en vertu de la loi.

Le sénateur Doyle: Mais pas à Monte Carlo?

M. Pollack: Non.

Le sénateur Doyle: Vous serez peut-être obligé de laisser vos gains acquis à Monte Carlo. N'est-ce pas ce qui se passe, quelle que soit la nature de vos affaires? Les gens sont obligés de laisser leur argent en Suisse, pas seulement pour éviter les impôts mais parfois à cause des restrictions sur le change dans le pays où ils ont gagné cet argent. Par exemple, certains écrivains sont obligés d'aller en Russie pour y dépenser leurs droits d'auteur, maintenant que les Russes se sont alignés.

Le sénateur Buckwold: Que se passe-t-il pour celui qui va à Las Vegas, qui fait un malheur aux tables de jeu et qui ramène tout cet argent? Commet-il un acte illégal au Canada et serait-il assujetti aux dispositions de ce projet de loi?

M. Pollack: Si ce qu'il a fait était un crime au Canada, oui. Il faut que ce soit un crime précis. Dans ce cas, c'est un crime érigé en entreprise licite, et il faut donc voir ce que dit la loi.

Le sénateur Grafstein: En d'autres termes, si un homme ou une femme fréquentait une maison considérée comme de mauvaises mœurs au Canada, mais pas au Nevada, et ramenait l'argent gagné au Canada, cela constituerait indiscutablement une infraction en vertu de cette loi.

Le sénateur Buckwold: Donc, le joueur de dés s'en sortirait?

Le sénateur Grafstein: Pas nécessairement, s'il trempait dans le book-making.

M. Pollack: Si c'était le genre de joueur de dés interdit de séjour au Canada—il faut réunir un certain nombre de conditions avant que cela n'arrive—mais si vous êtes une sorte de Nathan Detroit du jeu, que vous prélevez votre part, etc., vous commettez un crime au Canada. Donc si vous avez ce genre d'activité à Las Vegas, cela constituerait indiscutablement un crime en vertu de ce projet de loi.

Laissez-moi cependant vous donner un exemple—

Le sénateur Grafstein: Est-ce que cela intéresse vraiment le Barreau? Je ne suis pas certain que cela me concerne. J'ai tendance à penser que si nous nous plaignons de ce que d'autres abusent de leur souveraineté et que nous faisons à notre tour la même chose, nous devrions éviter de les critiquer alors que nous en faisons autant.

M. Pollack: Je voudrais simplement vous faire observer qu'en dépit de nos critiques, il existe une disposition relative aux saisies qui fera l'objet d'une audition devant un juge avant qu'il soit décidé de ce que sera saisi.

Le sénateur Grafstein: N'est-ce point là précisément le problème? Après tout, les produits des activités d'une personne sont saisis non point parce qu'un crime a été commis mais parce qu'il y a des raisons valables de penser que si l'acte ou la transaction s'était produit au Canada, cela aurait constitué un crime.

[Text]

Senator Doyle: In other words, you cannot bring your profits home. You cannot seize those proceeds if they are kept out of the country.

Senator Grafstein: I assume that what this bill is aimed at is laundered funds. It is a major way of doing it. Therefore if someone decides he is going to deposit his money at the Royal Bank while he is conducting business in Bogota or Guatemala, the crown can go in and seize those funds. That is what this bill allows the crown to do.

Mr. Pollack: It allows the court to do it. The court must issue an order.

Senator Grafstein: Yes, it allows the judge, on reasonable grounds, to seize those funds.

Mr. Pollack: Presumably one of the first Charter challenges would be when a person says, "I did nothing illegal", someone who is, perhaps, involved in a pornographic video business where there are not the restrictions that we have in section 159.

Senator Grafstein: But that is not an enterprise offence, is it?

Mr. Pollack: Section 159 of the Criminal Code certainly is. That relates to corrupting morals.

Senator Grafstein: Yes; after reading that, I see that corrupting morals is included in that section.

Mr. Pollack: It could be a legitimate limited partnership venture in an American state where, because of state sovereignty, enforcement is quite lax. You could be a person under that section.

The Chairman: Are there any further questions? In that event, Mr. Pollack, we thank you very much. Your critique has been very helpful. We appreciate your appearing before the committee.

Senator Nurgitz: I apologize for not being here, but I have heard Mr. Pollack before.

The Chairman: Honourable senators, we will now deal with the committee's reports on Bill C-55 and Bill C-84. We will stay on the record since I think honourable senators have had an opportunity of looking at both drafts.

I want to say that I have exercised my pride of authorship and made a couple of minor adjustments to the report relating to Bill C-55.

If honourable senators will look at the final paragraph in the report with respect to Bill C-55, which is the twenty-fifth report of the committee, I am suggesting that that one long paragraph be made into two paragraphs, the first paragraph ending with the words "can not be returned there." And then I suggest that we add, for more emphasis, the following sentence: "As she has stated in the above-quoted letter, 'this policy will ensure that no claimant is put at risk in the interim'".

In the beginning of the second paragraph I am suggesting a slight amendment to the wording as follows: "The Committee is pleased that the Minister is equally concerned that the provi-

Le sénateur Doyle: En d'autres termes, vous ne pouvez pas ramener vos profits chez vous. Vous ne pouvez pas non plus les saisir s'ils sont laissés à l'étranger.

Le sénateur Grafstein: Je suppose que ce que vise ce projet de loi, ce sont les fonds recyclés. C'est une des façons les plus courantes de le faire. Si donc quelqu'un décide de déposer son argent à la Banque royale alors qu'il fait affaire à Bogota ou au Guatémala, l'État peut saisir ces fonds. Ce projet de loi lui en donne le pouvoir.

M. Pollack: Il permet au tribunal de le faire. Le tribunal doit émettre un ordre.

Le sénateur Grafstein: Oui, cela permet au juge, pour des motifs raisonnables, de saisir ces fonds.

M. Pollack: Il est probable qu'une des premières objections en vertu de la Charte prendrait la forme suivante: quelqu'un déclarerait «je n'ai rien fait d'illégal»; il pourrait s'agir de quelqu'un qui vend des vidéos pornographiques là où les restrictions imposées par l'article 159 n'existent pas.

Le sénateur Grafstein: Mais il ne s'agit pas là d'une infraction de criminalité organisée?

M. Pollack: Cela concerne en tout cas l'article 159 du Code criminel, qui a trait à la corruption des mœurs.

Le sénateur Grafstein: Oui après l'avoir lu, je vois que la corruption des mœurs est couverte par cet article.

M. Pollack: Il pourrait s'agir d'une société en commandite légitime dans un État américain où, à cause de la souveraineté de chaque État, la loi est appliquée avec une certaine mollesse. Vous pourriez être visé par cet article.

La présidente: Avez-vous d'autres questions à poser? Puisqu'il n'y en a pas, nous tenons à vous remercier très sincèrement, monsieur Pollack. Vos critiques nous ont été très utiles. Nous nous réjouissons que vous ayiez bien voulu comparaître devant le comité.

Le sénateur Nurgitz: Je vous prie d'excuser mon absence, mais j'ai déjà entendu M. Pollack.

La présidente: Honorables sénateurs, nous allons maintenant examiner les rapports du Comité sur les projets de loi C-55 et C-84. Notre discussion continuera à faire l'objet d'un compte rendu puisque je crois que les honorables sénateurs ont pu examiner les deux textes.

Je tiens à dire que j'ai exercé mes prérogatives d'auteur et apporté une ou deux modifications mineures au rapport relatif au projet de loi C-55.

Les honorables sénateurs voudront bien maintenant se reporter au paragraphe final du rapport sur le projet de loi C-55, qui est le vingt-cinquième rapport du comité. Je propose de scinder en deux parties, dont la première se terminera par les mots suivants «ne peut pas être ramené ici.» Et je propose d'ajouter, pour lui donner plus de poids, la phrase suivante «comme l'a déclaré dans la lettre mentionné ci-dessus, cette politique évitera au plaignant de courir des risques dans l'intervalle.»

Je propose d'apporter une légère modification au libellé du second paragraphe: «le Comité se réjouit de voir que le ministre souhaite également que la disposition soit précisée de sion be clarified so that refugee claimants are not put into 'orbit'." Then we would go on to state: "As she stated in the House of Commons on 3 June 1988."

There is another mistake in that paragraph which we can deal with. It should read: "will be accepted there or will have access—".

Then it will read: "It is with this understanding that the Committee recommends adoption of the motion."

I suggest that we go off the record at this point.

(Discussion off the record.)

The Chairman: Now that we are back on the record, is it agreed that I present the twenty-fifth report as indicated?

Hon. Senators: Agreed.

The Chairman: We will now deal with the twenty-sixth report of the committee relating to Bill C-84. There will be the regular form of report, and then the two paragraphs to be added to the end of the present printed version. Apart from that reservation, are you in favour of what the twenty-sixth report says?

Some Members: Agreed.

Senator Spivak: I would like to say that there are groups out there who had wanted the Senate to stand firm.

The Chairman: I have a file full of that.

Senator Spivak: Certainly there are those in Manitoba who remain unconvinced.

The committee adjourned.

[Traduction]

manière à ce que les personnes qui demandent le statut de réfugié ne soient pas mises en «orbite;» ce à quoi nous ajouterions: «comme elle l'a déclaré à la Chambre des communes, le 3 juin 1988.»

Ce paragraphe contient une autre erreur que nous pouvons corriger. On devrait lire «y sera accepté ou y aura accès . . . ».

Le texte sera donc le suivant: «C'est dans cet esprit que le Comité recommande l'adoption de la motion».

Je propose qu'il n'y ait pas de compte rendu pour la discussion que nous allons maintenant avoir.

(Discussion à huis clos.)

La présidente: Maintenant que nos propos vont de nouveau faire l'objet d'un compte rendu, sommes-nous convenus que je soumette le vingt-cinquième rapport tel qu'indiqué?

Les honorables sénateurs: D'accord.

La présidente: Nous allons maintenant examiner le vingt-sixième rapport du Comité relatif au projet de loi C-84. Il y aura le rapport normal, puis les deux paragraphes qui seront ajoutés à la fin de la version imprimée actuelle. Hormis cette réserve, êtes-vous d'accord avec les conclusions du vingt-sixième rapport?

Des voix: D'accord.

Le sénateur Spivak: Je tiens à dire qu'il existe des groupes qui voulaient que le Sénat conserve une attitude ferme.

La présidente: J'en ai un plein dossier.

Le sénateur Spivak: Il y a certainement des gens au Manitoba qui ne sont toujours pas convaincus.

La séance est levée.

August 17, 1988 [Senate Standing Committee on Legal and Constitutional Affairs]

EVIDENCE

Ottawa, Wednesday, August 17, 1988

[Text]

The Standing Senate Committee on Legal and Constitutional Affairs, to which was referred Bill C-61, to amend the Criminal Code, the Food and Drugs Act and the Narcotic Control Act, met this day at 3:45 p.m. to give consideration to the bill.

Senator Joan Neiman (Chairman) in the Chair.

The Chairman: Honourable senators, we are pleased to have with us this afternoon Mr. David McCombs from the Criminal Lawyers' Association. Some of you may know that he was good enough to attend in anticipation of testifying on this a few weeks ago; but then we got involved in a long session in the Senate and Mr. McCombs had to leave. He has made a special trip back to appear before the committee today, and for that we are grateful.

As you can see, we are here early today, Mr. McCombs, in compensation for your being delayed here so long on the last occasion. I will let you proceed with your presentation on Bill C-61.

Mr. David McCombs, Director, Criminal Lawyers' Association: Thank you.

Senators may not know anything about which association I represent. It is the Criminal Lawyers' Association of Ontario, which has approximately 500 members in Ontario. The views that I am expressing here today are those that are supported by the board of directors of that association. I am one of those directors.

I do not want to bore you with a big preamble of lofty observations, but I want to stress this: There is often a perception that somehow criminal lawyers are the poor cousins in the profession, that perhaps we are the ones with the least integrity, and so on. I do not think that is the perception of members of this committee. It is quite clear that that is not the case. Indeed, many of our finest jurists have been drawn from our profession.

We are not here as a knee-jerk reaction to this bill because it will probably mean that sometimes we will not get paid. We are not here for that reason at all. We are here, first, to say that the principle which says that criminals should not profit from their ill-gotten gains is one that the Criminal Lawyers' Association of Ontario endorses. We are here because, as an association of lawyers who are in court on a daily basis, we see a lot of serious practical problems with this legislation.

With great respect to the people who have drafted the legislation, and who have been kind to us in exchanging views and sharing information with us—and I want to preface my remarks by saying that—we think there are areas of this legislation that have not been carefully thought through. We think they have been vaguely drafted and that the legislation is rife with unfairness and has the potential of being unfair. It is those areas on which I would like to focus.

TÉMOIGNAGES

Ottawa, le mercredi 17 août 1988

[Traduction]

Le Comité sénatorial permanent des affaires juridiques et constitutionnelles, auquel a été déféré le projet de loi C-61, Loi modifiant le Code criminel, la Loi des aliments et drogues et la Loi sur les stupéfiants, se réunit aujourd'hui à 15 h 45 pour en étudier la teneur.

La sénatrice Joan Neiman (présidente) occupe le fauteuil.

La présidente: Honorables sénateurs, nous sommes heureux d'accueillir cet après-midi M. David McCombs de la Criminal Lawyers' Association. Certains d'entre vous savent peut-être qu'il avait été assez bon de venir il y a quelques semaines pour témoigner; nous avons malheureusement ce jour-là siégé longtemps au Sénat et il a dû repartir. Il s'est déplacé de nouveau spécialement pour comparaître devant le Comité aujourd'hui et nous l'en remercions.

Comme vous pouvez le constater, nous nous réunissons tôt aujourd'hui, monsieur McCombs, pour compenser le long retard que nous vous avons imposé la dernière fois. Je vous laisserai donc présenter votre exposé sur le projet de loi C-61.

M. David McCombs, membre du Conseil d'administration, Criminal Lawyers' Association: Merci.

Il se peut que les sénateurs ne connaissent pas l'Association que je représente. Il s'agit de la Criminal Lawyers' Association of Ontario, qui compte quelque 500 membres en Ontario. Les opinions que je vais exprimer ici aujourd'hui sont partagées par le conseil d'administration de cette association, dont je fait partie.

Je ne voudrais pas vous ennuyer avec un long préambule d'observations condescendantes, mais permettez-moi d'insister sur un point: on perçoit souvent les criminalistes, sans trop de justification, comme les parias de la profession, comme peut-être les moins intègres, par exemple. Je ne crois pas que ce soit le cas des membres de ce Comité. C'est très évident qu'il n'en n'est pas ainsi. En fait, un grand nombre de nos meilleurs juristes ont été des criminalistes.

Notre présence n'est pas une réaction instinctive dictée par la crainte que ce projet de loi nous prive éventuellement d'une partie de nos revenus. Nous ne sommes pas ici du tout pour cette raison. Nous nous présentons devant vous pour vous dire premièrement que la Criminal Lawyers' Association of Ontario souscrit au principe selon lequel les criminels ne devraient pas tirer profit de leurs biens mal acquis. Nous sommes ici à titre de représentants d'une association d'avocats qui plaident en cour tous les jours et qui appréhendent que ce projet de loi n'entraîne un tas de problèmes pratiques de taille.

Avec tout le respect que nous devons aux rédacteurs de ce projet de loi, qui ont eu l'amabilité d'échanger avec nous des points de vues et des renseignements—et je dis cela en guise d'introduction—nous estimons que certaines parties de ce projet de loi n'ont pas été examinées dans leurs menus détails. Nous croyons que celles-ci ont été vaguement rédigées, que la mesure législative est parsemée d'injustices et qu'elle risque d'être inéquitable. C'est sur ces points que j'aimerais insister.

[Text]

This legislation has, as its purpose, from there is the way I read it, two things: First, the preservation of property, which the state thinks was obtained by crime, pending the determination in court of the question of guilt. That is its first purpose, namely, to hang onto the property until it is known whether the guy that is thought to be a crook is found really to be a crook. Secondly, if it is proved that he is a crook and that the property came from his crimes, then the property will be taken away from him.

Our association has no quarrel with those objectives. They are valid federal objectives and we would fools to come here to try to suggest otherwise. However, this legislation goes beyond those objectives for the reasons I have stated, namely, that they are vague and potentially unfair.

I know how busy members of the Senate are, and I am not so naive as to think that you have all spent hours in preparation for my attendance here today, but Mr. Gold, who also is a director of the Criminal Lawyers' Association, appeared on April 14 before the House of Commons legislative committee on Bill C-61 and made a number of submissions on behalf of the Criminal Lawyers' Association.

I do not propose to go over the same ground again. If members of this committee are interested in those submissions, I have them here. I will probably be referring to them from time to time, but I realize that this week, for example, you have had a visit from the Ottawa Defence Lawyers' Association, and you have had written submissions from the Canadian Bar Association. So I will try not to go over the same turf again and will try to make as much use of the time that I have as I can.

There were specific criticisms levelled at that time. Some of those criticisms have been answered by Mr. McIsaac and others in informal discussions. So we will not deal with some of them. But we raised some fundamental problems. Quite frankly, in our view the, changes that were made to the bill after April 14 were so minor that they were just window dressing, with the possible exception of the legislation dealing with kicking out the Crown when you go in to talk to the trial judge about what you should be paid or whether you should be paid out of the money that has been restrained. It was important that the Crown not be present.

Since the amendments have already been made I will not waste a lot of time on it, but it is fundamental that the communications made by a client to his lawyer be privileged. If those communications have to be disclosed in circumstances where your opponent in a courtroom will know them, the whole system will not work. So that change was extremely important.

I am jumping ahead of my notes here. If you will bear with me when I pause, it is probably saving you a lot of talk by me.

Après avoir lu ce projet de loi, j'en dégage deux objectifs: premièrement, le projet de loi veut assurer la protection des biens qu'on présume avoir été acquis avec le produit d'une infraction criminelle en attendant que le tribunal se soit prononcé sur la culpabilité de l'accusé. C'est là son premier objectif, à savoir, garder les biens tant qu'il n'a pas été déterminé que le présumé escroc a bel et bien été reconnu comme tel. Deuxièmement, s'il est prouvé que cette personne est un escroc et que les biens proviennent de la perpétration d'une infraction criminelle, ils peuvent alors être confisqués.

Notre association n'a rien à rédire à ces objectifs. Il s'agit d'objectifs valables de la loi fédérale et nous serions stupides de venir ici pour tenter de laisser croire qu'il en est autrement. Cette mesure législative outrepasse toutefois ses objectifs pour les raisons que j'ai données, à savoir, parce qu'ils sont vagues et risquent d'être injustes.

Je sais combien les sénateurs sont occupés et je ne suis pas assez naïf pour croire que vous avez tous passé des heures à vous préparer à ma venue ici aujourd'hui, mais M. Gold, qui est également membre du conseil d'administration de la Criminal Lawyers' Association, a comparu le 14 avril devant le Comité législatif des Communes chargé du projet de loi C-61 et a fait un certain nombre de recommandations au nom de la Criminal Lawyers' Association.

Je n'ai pas l'intention de les reprendre ici. Si les membres de ce comité sont intéressés à en prendre connaissance je les ai ici. Je m'y référerai probablement de temps à autre, mais je me rends compte que cette semaine, par exemple, vous avez reçu un représentant de la Ottawa Defence Lawyers' Association ainsi que des mémoires de l'Association du Barreau canadien. J'essaierai donc de ne pas reprendre les mêmes questions et d'utiliser le mieux possible le temps que vous me consacrez.

Des critiques précises ont déjà été formulées. M. McIsaac et d'autres personnes ont répondu à certaines d'entre elles dans le cadre de discussions non officielles. Nous en laisserons donc quelques-unes de côté. Nous avons toutefois soulevé quelques problèmes fondamentaux. En toute franchise, selon nous, les changements qui ont été apportés au projet de loi après le 14 avril étaient à ce point mineurs qu'ils n'étaient qu'une façade à l'exception peut-être de la disposition prévoyant le retrait de l'avocat de la poursuite lorsque vous allez vous entretenir avec le juge pour discuter de la somme qui devrait vous être être versée ou pour lui demander si vous devriez être rémunéré au moyen de l'argent qui a été retenu. Il était important que la poursuite ne soit pas présente.

Comme les modifications ont déjà été apportées, je n'y consacrerai pas beaucoup de temps, mais il est essentiel que les communications entre un client et son avocat demeurent confidentielles. Si ces communications doivent être divulguées en présence de votre adversaire au tribunal, tout le système s'enfondrera. Ce changement revêtait donc une très grande importance.

Je saute plusieurs pages de mes notes ici. Si vous êtes patients lorsque je m'arrête, cela vous évitera probablement beaucoup de verbiage de ma part.

I propose to go through the legislation and deal with the sections on a clause-by-clause basis where we have major concerns.

Clause 420.11 is what could be called the money laundering section. Arguably, it does not mean anything more than is already found in section 312 of the Criminal Code, which is the section that says that if you are in possession of property obtained by crime you are guilty of a crime yourself. This is another way of saying it. Our concern is with respect to this concept of dual criminality to which I hope that this committee will give careful consideration.

What the clause said in paragraph (b) is that if there was an act or omission which, if it had occurred in this country would be a crime, then the property is forfeitable.

Concerning this we say, that if a person arrives in Canada with property or money that he or she has obtained lawfully in the country of his or her origin in circumstances where, if that had been the case in Canada it would be a crime, that property can be forfeited.

I guess the examples you have already heard are those of the owner of a brothel from Nevada, where the brothel is lawful; the dealer in erotic material from Copenhagen, where material that would be obscene by our standards is lawful in that country; or perhaps, more innocuously, the proprietor of a bookmaking outfit from England, where that activity is lawful, who comes here with his money. This legislation permits the state to go after it. That turns our idea of fairness on its head.

This was one of our most firmly held concerns when Mr. Gold appeared before the committee of the House of Commons.

A number of recent decisions of the Supreme Court of Canada talk about the fact that where legislation is potentially unfair, it must then be struck down whether or not it is unfair in connection with the circumstances of the particular case before the court. If the authorities are saying, "Trust us, we will not do that," then, in my respectful submission, that is not good enough. It is there, the legislation permits it, and it is wrong.

The concept of dual criminality is not unique—I am not the first one to dream it up, by any means. You cannot extradite someone to another country to face a crime which is not one that we recognize here. If a person is here and is wanted in Iran, where he will be beheaded for theft, we will not send him there. We require that that country respect our laws. What we are suggesting here is really the flip side of that, in my submission.

As I understand the answer the government makes, it is along these lines. It says, "Come on, McCombs, this idea is nothing new. It is found in section 312." Section 213 is, of course, existing legislation and says:

> 312. (1) Every one commits an offence who has in his possession any property or thing or any proceeds of any property or thing knowing that all or part of the property or thing or of the proceeds was obtained by or derived directly or indirectly from . . .

Je propose donc que nous examinions la mesure législative et que nous étudiions les articles qui nous posent des problèmes importants un à un.

L'article 420.11 est ce que l'on pourrait appeler l'article ayant pour objet de "blanchir l'argent". On peut soutenir qu'il ne veut rien dire d'autre que ce que l'on trouve déjà à l'article 312 du Code criminel, qui dispose que le fait d'être en possession de biens criminellement obtenus vous rend vous-même coupable d'un crime. C'est une autre façon de le dire. Ce qui nous inquiète, c'est ce concept de double criminalité sur lequel, j'espère, ce comité se penchera attentivement.

Ce que dit l'article à l'alinéa /b/) c'est que s'il s'agissait d'un acte ou d'une omission qui, au Canada, aurait constitué un crime, les biens sont alors confiscables.

À cet égard, nous soutenons que si une personne arrive au Canada avec des biens ou de l'argent qu'elle a obtenus légalement dans son pays d'origine, dans des circonstances où, au Canada, on aurait jugé que leur acquisition constituait une infraction, ces biens peuvent être confisqués.

Je suppose que les exemples qu'on vous a déjà donnés sont ceux du propriétaire de bordel du Nevada, où ce genre d'établissement est légal; le vendeur de matériel érotique de Copenhague où le matériel que l'on considérerait obscène au Canada serait légal dans ce pays; ou peut-être, plus innocemment, le preneur aux livres venant d'Angleterre, où cette activité est légale, qui vient ici avec son argent. Cette mesure législative permet à l'État de courir après cette personne. Voilà qui bouleverse notre conception de la justice.

Il s'agissait de l'une de nos principales préoccupations lorsque M. Gold a comparu devant le Comité de la Chambre des communes.

Un certain nombre de décisions récentes de la Cour suprême du Canada parlent du fait que lorsque la mesure législative risque d'être injuste, il faut alors déterminer si elle est injuste par rapport aux circonstances entourant l'affaire que le tribunal doit juger. Si les autorités disent: «Fiez-vous à nous, nous ne ferons pas cela», alors, avec tout le respect que je vous dois, ce n'est pas suffisant. C'est là, la loi le permet, et c'est mal.

Le concept de la double criminalité n'est pas unique—je ne suis pas le premier à l'imaginer, pas le moins du monde. On ne peut extrader une personne dans un autre pays pour un crime que nous ne reconnaissons pas ici. Si une personne est ici et est recherchée en Iran, où elle sera décapitée pour vol, nous ne l'enverrons pas dans ce pays. Nous exigeons que ce pays respecte nos lois. Ce que nous proposons ici est vraiment le contraire de cela, à mon avis.

Si je comprends, le gouvernement répond de la façon suivante. «Allez, McCombs, ce concept n'est pas nouveau. On le trouve déjà à l'article 312 du Code criminel.» Voici quelle est la teneur de l'article 312 actuellement en vigueur:

> 312. (1) Commet une infraction, quiconque a en sa possession un bien, une chose ou leur produit sachant que tout ou partie d'entre eux ont été obtenus . . .

[Text]

(b) an act or omission anywhere that, if it had occurred in Canada, would have constituted an offence punishable by indictment.

In effect, the government is saying that because we already have that kind of provision in other sections of the code, there is nothing wrong with putting it in here.

Our point of view is that 312(1)(b) is unconstitutional. It has not been used, to my knowledge, and therefore the issue as to its constitutionality has not been decided. I will concede that the authorities do not use this particular section very often, if ever, but what I am saying to the members of this committee is: Let us not compound the problem by putting another unconstitutional provision into the Criminal Code.

Also, I would ask the committee to instruct its employees and research staff to study this particular area carefully and determine whether or not the arguments against its constitutionality are strong ones. I am respectfully of the view that members of the committee will come to the conclusion that it is unconstitutional and should be discarded. Therefore, I suggest that we not include it in this bill. There is no need for it, in any event.

Senator Stanbury: I am sorry, but when you say there is no need for it, what do you mean by that?

Mr. McCombs: I cannot imagine circumstances in which legislators would want to grab property that someone had obtained lawfully in another country. I do not know that the legislators would want to see that. On the other hand, I can imagine prosecutors wanting to see that happening. However, if it is not part of the legislative intention, then why put it in?

Senator Spivak: Can you tell me the rationale behind that statement? Why would the prosecutors want to have it there? What is the rationale?

Mr. McCombs: I am not sure that I am the right person to ask, because quite frankly I would be speculating. I have never really looked at the situation from that point of view.

Senator Spivak: I figure that there must be an argument on the other side.

Mr. McCombs: I suppose one of the arguments is the one that Mr. McIsaac put to me during a discussion that we had earlier today. He said: "Suppose you had a country such as Columbia, where a military coup occurs; suppose further that you then have a corrupt military government in that country that includes drug dealers, that the government repeals all of its drug legislation, and then some drug warlord shows up in Canada with billions of dollars and wants to set up shop here." I think Mr. McIsaac would ask rhetorically: "Would we want to let him do that, or would we want to seize his property?"

I concede that hypothetically that kind of thing could happen. However, I think it is such a remote possibility that if it ever did happen, a special law could be enacted to deal with it. In my opinion, there are existing laws in place that could deal

b) par une action ou omission en quelque endroit que ce soit, qui aurait constitué, si elle avait eu lieu au Canada, une infraction punissable sur acte d'accusation.

De fait, le gouvernement a tout simplement conclu qu'étant donné que cette disposition existe dans d'autres parties du Code, elle pouvait fort bien figurer ici.

Or, à notre avis l'alinéa 312(1)b) est anticonstitutionnel. Pour autant que je sache, il n'a jamais été invoqué et sa constitutionnalité n'a jamais été confirmée. Bien sûr, les autorités n'ont pas fait appel très souvent à cette disposition, si seulement c'est arrivé, mais mon point de vue est le suivant: Ne compliquons pas les choses en introduisant une autre disposition anticonstitutionnelle dans le Code criminel.

Par ailleurs, j'inviterais le comité à demander à ses recherchistes d'examiner cette question attentivement pour déterminer si les arguments mettant en doute sa constitutionnalité sont bien fondés. En toute déférence, je suis convaincu que les membres du Comité concluront que la disposition est invalide et qu'elle ne devrait pas être retenue. Voilà pourquoi, à mon avis, elle ne devrait pas figurer dans le projet de loi. Du reste, on peut fort bien s'en passer.

Le sénateur Stanbury: Je n'excuse, mais quand vous dites qu'on peut bien s'en passer, que voulez-vous dire au juste?

M. McCombs: Je ne peux imaginer aucune circonstance où le législateur voudrait qu'on se saisisse d'un bien que quelqu'un se serait procuré légalement dans un autre pays. Je doute que ce soit là l'intention du législateur. Par contre, il est facile d'imaginer que des procureurs souhaiteraient le faire. Cependant, si telle n'est pas l'intention du législateur, pourquoi mettre cette disposition?

Le sénateur Spivak: Pouvez-vous m'en donner la raison? Pourquoi des procureurs voudraient-ils se prévaloir d'une telle disposition? Quelle en est la raison?

M. McCombs: Je ne sais pas si je suis en mesure de répondre à votre question, parce que je ne peux que vous livrer des spéculations. Je n'ai jamais examiné la situation de ce point de vue.

Le sénateur Spivak: Il doit y exister un argument à l'appui.

M. McCombs: Je suppose que l'on pourrait invoquer l'argument que M. McIsaac m'a exposé plus tôt aujourd'hui. Il m'a dit ceci: Supposons qu'il se soit produit un coup d'État dans un pays, en Colombie, par exemple; supposons également qu'un gouvernement militaire corrompu s'installe au pouvoir dans lequel on retrouve des trafiquants de drogues, et que ce gouvernement annule toutes ses lois anti-drogue; supposons également que l'on voie arriver au Canada un de ces barons de la drogue désireux de fonder un commerce ici. Je pense que la question hypothétique de M. McIsaac est la suivante: est-ce que nous le laisserions faire, ou est-ce que nous devrions confisquer ses biens?

Bien sûr, c'est une situation hypothétique que l'on peut imaginer. Je pense qu'il s'agit là d'une possibilité très faible et que si jamais cela arrivait, il serait toujours possible de voter une mesure spéciale. À mon avis, il existe déjà des lois en vigueur with a situation such as that, and we could throw him out. I frankly cannot think of any other situations in which this provision could be applied.

The Chairman: Perhaps I should give you one. There is one example contained in the briefing notes that have just been prepared, although they have not yet been translated. This is really a summary of the evidence that was given before the legislative committee on this particular question of double criminality. The question was obviously put to the minister on his appearance before that committee and the notes read as follows:

> Mr. Hnatyshyn asserted that section 312 of the Criminal Code had a similar provision, and that it had not been used to apprehend people. He pointed out that it is conceivable that a South American government could repeal all of its drug control legislation. The proceeds from those activities would not be forfeitable in Canada if the bill were changed to require the activity to be a crime in the country where it took place.

Senator Spivak: Madam Chairman, could you repeat that? "The proceeds would not be recoverable . . . "?

Mr. McCombs: They would not be recoverable if that provision was taken out of the bill.

The Chairman: Mr. Hnatyshyn is saying that if we removed this section, we would then not be able to seize all of these proceeds.

Senator Stanbury: All we could do is throw the man out of the country.

Senator Spivak: But, surely, the point is that we are not entitled to that money in any event. What we are entitled to do is to prosecute the man if he continues his activities here.

The Chairman: Yes, in Canada.

Senator Spivak: Yes, but it cannot be the case that we are ever entitled to the money.

The Chairman: I would agree with you, senator.

Senator Spivak: It does not make any difference whether it is a bad or good example, they both mean the same.

Mr. McCombs: For my money, the argument that the government presents on this point just does not wash with me. Perhaps it will with members of the committee, but I do not see it.

Senator Stanbury: In any event, if we are to tailor our law to deal with every hypothetical possibility, not just in this case but in all of the other cases that one might think of, it would destroy what we know as a body of law that we have come to depend upon. If we start to attempt to deal with every hypothetical question, we simply destroy the basic principles of our own law.

Mr. McCombs: I do not quarrel with that at all, senator. I concede that that is the case. I suppose what I am trying to say is that you do not need subsection (b) to further the principles qu'on pourrait invoquer en de pareilles occasions et qui nous permettraient d'expulser notre milliardaire. Honnêtement, il m'est impossible d'imaginer d'autres situations où cette disposition pourrait s'appliquer.

La présidente: Peut-être que je pourrais vous en donner une. On cite un exemple dans les notes d'information qu'on nous a préparées mais qui n'ont pas encore été traduites. En fait, c'est le résumé de témoignages entendus par le Comité législatif en ce qui concerne la double criminalité. La question avait été posée au ministre lors de son témoignage et je vous lis un passage des notes:

> M. Hnatyshyn a affirmé que l'article 312 du Code criminel incluait une disposition semblable, qui n'avait jamais servi pour appréhender quelqu'un. Il a dit qu'il était inconcevable qu'un gouvernement d'Amérique du Sud supprime toute sa législation anti-drogue. Les recettes de ce genre d'activités ne pourraient être confisquées au Canada si on modifiait le projet de loi de manière à exiger que les activités en question constituent un délit criminel dans le pays où elles se sont déroulées.

Le sénateur Spivak: Madame la présidente, pouvez-vous répéter cela? «Les recettes ne seraient pas récupérables . . .»

M. McCombs: Elles ne seraient pas récupérables si cette disposition disparaît du projet de loi.

La présidente: M. Hnatyshyn affirme que si nous supprimons cette disposition, il nous serait alors impossible de confisquer le fruit de ces activités.

Le sénateur Stanbury: Tout ce que nous pourrions faire serait d'expulser le personnage.

Le sénateur Spivak: Mais bien sûr, car nous n'avons pas droit à cet argent de toute manière. Nous pouvons seulement poursuivre ce personnage s'il reprend ses activités ici.

La présidente: Oui, au Canada.

Le sénateur Spivak: Oui, on ne pourra jamais dire que nous aurions le droit de garder l'argent.

La présidente: Je partage votre avis, sénatrice.

Le sénateur Spivak: Qu'importe s'il s'agit d'un bon ou d'un mauvais exemple, les conclusions sont les mêmes.

M. McCombs: En ce qui me concerne, l'argument que le gouvernement fait valoir à ce sujet ne me convainc pas. Peut-être qu'il convaincra les membres du Comité, mais pas moi.

Le sénateur Stanbury: Quoi qu'il en soit, si nous devons confectionner nos lois de façon à prévoir toutes les situations hypothétiques, non seulement dans ce cas-ci, mais pour toutes les autres que nous pourrions imaginer, ce serait une façon de mettre en cause l'importance que nous attachons à nos lois. Si nous essayons de tenir compte de toutes les situations possibles, c'est le fondement même de la loi qui est remis en question.

M. McCombs: Je n'en doute pas, sénateur. Cela ne fait aucun doute. En somme, il n'est pas nécessaire de recourir à l'alinéa (b) pour affirmer les principes sur lesquels repose notre droit criminel. Non ce n'est pas nécessaire.

upon which our criminal law is founded. You just do not need it there.

The Chairman: I think we will have to deal with this, honourable senators. You will receive a copy of this summary in any event and then we will speak to the officials and to the minister in due course with regard to that particular subsection, because obviously it is of considerable importance.

Mr. McCombs: Madam Chairman, the next point that I wanted to deal with is less important than many of the others, but it is next in order, so I will deal with it now. It is a small point but one that I submit is significant. Clause 420.12(1) is the clause that authorizes a judge to issue a warrant to allow a peace officer to go and seize property at a particular location. The clause requires:

> . . . that there are reasonable grounds to believe that there is in any building, receptacle or place any property in respect of which an order of forfeiture may be made . . .

and so on. The part that we are mainly quarrelling with is contained in the last four lines of that subsection where it says:

> . . . and any other property in respect of which that person or peace officer believes, on reasonable grounds, that an order of forfeiture may be made under that subsection.

A wrong-minded police officer—and I think it is fair to say that such police officers do exist—could obtain a warrant from a judge to seize particular items that, on reasonable grounds and to the satisfaction of the judge, should be seized. He goes in front of the judge and says: "Judge, we think this particular person has this much money under his mattress in his house that he obtained through drug dealing and we want to go and get it. We think that is so because we have heard on the wiretap that that is where he hides it." The police officer then obtains his search warrant under this section. However, when he arrives at the premises, he sees a television set and a whole host of other things. He then gets a truck and pulls up in front of the house with two or three other police officers and loads the truck with everything that the man owns, right down to his jockey shorts.

A police officer in such circumstances should be made to go back to the judge and obtain a warrant for all of the items that he intends to seize, and the best way to deal with that situation is to take that part right out of that subsection. There is no need for it to be there. The reason it is included is to make the police officer's job a little easier. In special cases where there is significant property seen by the police officer on the premises, the premises can be secured during the period of time that it takes to go back, see the judge and ask for a further warrant to seize the gold bars or whatever the police officer found in the house.

Believe you me, Madam Chairman—and I say this with respect—the police will read that legislation and they will say to themselves: "This means we can pretty much do what we like. Once we get that warrant, we can take anything that we think was obtained as the proceeds of crime. Mr. X has not done an honest day's work in the last ten years, therefore we

La présidente: Je pense qu'il faudra régler cette question, honourables sénateurs. On vous remettra sûrement une copie de ce résumé et ensuite, nous saisirons en temps et lieu les fonctionnaires et le ministre de cet aspect particulier, car cela en vaut sûrement la peine.

M. McCombs: Madame la présidente, la prochaine question que je veux aborder est moins importante que beaucoup d'autres, mais comme elle est la prochaine sur la liste, je vais vous en parler tout de suite. Ce n'est qu'un détail, mais je crois qu'il en vaut la peine. Le paragraphe 420.12(1) permet à un juge de décerner un mandat autorisant un agent de la paix à saisir des biens dans un lieu donné. Cette disposition exige:

> . . . qu'il existe des motifs raisonnables de croire que des biens pourraient faire l'objet d'une ordonnance de confiscation . . . et se trouvent dans un bâtiment, contenant ou lieu . . .

. . . et le reste. Ce qui nous préoccupe surtout, ce sont les quatre dernières lignes du paragraphe, soit:

> . . . ainsi que tout autre bien dont cette personne ou l'agent de la paix a des motifs raisonnables de croire qu'il pourrait faire l'objet d'une telle ordonnance.

Un policier mal avisé, et je pense pouvoir dire en toute honnêté que ce genre de policier existe, ce policier pourrait donc obtenir d'un juge un mandat l'autorisant à saisir certains biens, s'il a des motifs raisonnables de croire que ces biens devraient être saisis et que le juge en soit convaincu. Il lui suffit de se présenter devant le juge et de lui dire: «Votre Honneur, nous pensons que cet individu cache sous son matelas de l'argent qu'il a obtenu par des transactionsd liées à la drogue; nous voulons nous rendre chez lui pour mettre la main sur cet argent. Nous pensons l'y trouver car l'écoute téléphonique nous a appris que c'est là sa cachette.» Le policier obtient alors un mandat de perquisition aux termes de cette disposition. Cependant, lorsqu'il arrive sur les lieux, il voit un téléviseur et une foule d'autres objets. Il va alors chercher un camion qu'il ramène devant la maison; avec deux ou trois collègues, il peut charger le camion de tout ce que possède l'individu, jusqu'à ses caleçons.

Dans de telles circonstances, le policier devrait être tenu de se présenter à nouveau devant le juge afin d'obtenir un mandat pour tous les articles qu'il compte saisir; la meilleure solution en ce cas serait de supprimer ce membre de phrase du paragraphe. Il est inutile de l'y laisser. Il s'y trouve simplement pour faciliter le travail des policiers. Si une fois sur place le policier trouve une quantité de biens, on peut garder les lieux le temps qu'il retourne demander au juge un mandat l'autorisant à saisir les lingots d'or ou autre biens qu'il aura trouvés dans la maison.

Croyez-moi, madame la présidente, et je dis cela avec tout le respect que je leur dois, les policiers liront le projet de loi et l'interpréteront ainsi: «Le projet de loi nous laisse beaucoup de latitude. Une fois que nous avons obtenu le mandat, nous pouvons prendre tout ce que nous croyons être des produits de la criminalité. Au cours des dix dernières années, M. X n'a think that everything he owns has been obtained with the proceeds of crime, so we are going to take everything he owns." In my submission it is not necessary, and I would ask members of the committee to seek from advisers to the committee a good reason why that provision needs to be there.

The next point was dealt with by the people, but it was bothersome to the board of directors of the association. Proposed subsection 420.12(4) says that when a warrant is executed under this section you must give a copy of the warrant upon request to the person from whom the property is seized. It is the "on request" part that I do not like because, bureaucracy being what it is, you can get the run-around. I am not suggesting sinister motives on the part of individuals, but I can envisage a circumstance where you would hear, "Oh, that is not my job; talk to so and so." The owner of the property should receive a copy as of right within about two weeks. For example, when a policeman wants a search warrant, he must swear out an affidavit and go before a judge and say, "I want to search Joe Blow's car. Here is a sworn affidavit telling you why I want to do so." The courts have now said that we are entitled to that affidavit, that we cannot make full answer in defence unless we have that affidavit. However, trying to get that affidavit is like pulling hen's teeth. No one wants to give it to you, and it takes hours of our time to get it. It is not fair. Please do not put that provision in this legislation. Why cannot the authorities just give us the damn thing?

The Chairman: Are you suggesting that the provision should read "shall be provided?"

Mr. McCombs: Yes. There may be times when the authorities will say, "It might prejudice our investigation." For example, a drug dealer may be in Peru, and you do not want him to know that you have just cleaned out his safety deposit box because you are waiting for him to come back to arrest him. In answer to that possibility, I suggest we add words such as "except in circumstances where the judge is satisfied that it is not in the interests of justice."

Next I would like to deal with proposed section 420.13, the restraining order problem. The practical effect is that once the warrant is executed a restraining order can be issued, which effectively ties up the property until a determination of guilt or innocence is made. The standard which must be met before that property can be tied up is too low. The judge need only be satisfied that there are reasonable grounds to conclude that the property is property in respect of which a forfeiture could be made. The judge need merely ask of himself or herself, "Are there reasonable grounds to believe that a forfeiture could be made?" If it is felt that there are reasonable grounds, the judge is empowered to tie up millions of dollars of property over very extended periods of time. Granted the bill contains jamais fait une journée de travail honnête; en conséquence, nous croyons qu'il a obtenu tout ce qu'il possède grâce aux produits de la criminalité; nous allons donc saisir tous ses biens.» À mon avis, cette disposition est inutile, et j'invite les membres du comité à demander à leurs conseillers de leur fournir une bonne raison justifiant son inclusion.

Le prochain point dont je vais parler a déjà été abordé par d'autres, mais il préoccupe le conseil d'administration de l'Association. Le paragraphe 420.12(4) du projet de loi dispose que lorsqu'on exécute un mandat décerné en vertu de cet article, il faut remettre, sur demande, un exemplaire du mandat à la personne dont les biens sont saisis. C'est l'expression «sur demande» qui me gêne, car l'appareil gouvernemental étant ce qu'il est, on obtient parfois des réponses évasives. Je ne dis pas que les fonctionnaires ont de sinistres intentions, mais j'imagine très bien une situation où l'on dirait: «Oh, ce n'est pas mon travail; adressez-vous plutôt à un tel ou un tel.» Le propriétaire des biens devrait recevoir son exemplaire dans les deux semaines qui suivent ou à peu près. Ainsi, lorsqu'un policier veut obtenir un mandat de perquisition, il fait une déclaration par écrit sous sermet, se présente devant un juge et lui explique qu'il veut fouiller la voiture de Jean Tremblay. Il lui présente sa déclaration sous serment, laquelle explique les raisons pour lesquelles il veut agir ainsi. Les tribunaux ont maintenant établi que nous avons le droit d'obtenir cette déclaration écrite sous serment et que nous ne pouvons présenter une défense complète à moins d'avoir cette déclaration. Cependant, essayer d'obtenir cette déclaration équivaut à chercher une aiguille dans une botte de foin. Personne ne veut vous la remettre et il faut des heures pour l'obtenir. C'est injuste. De grâce, ne laissez pas cette disposition dans le projet de loi. Pourquoi diable les autorités ne peuvent-elles pas nous donner simplement ce que nous leur demandons?

La présidente: Voulez-vous dire qu'il faudrait reformuler la disposition en précisant que cet exemplaire «doit être remis»?

M. McCombs: Oui. Les autorités diront peut-être, en certaines occasions, que cela pourrait nuire à leur enquête. Prenons l'exemple d'un trafiquant de drogue qui se trouve au Pérou; on ne veut pas qu'il sache que l'on vient de vider son coffre à la banque car on attend son retour pour l'appréhender. Pour parer à ce genre d'éventualité, je propose d'ajouter le membre de phrase suivant: «sauf dans des circonstances où le juge est convaincu que cela n'est pas dans l'intérêt de la justice».

J'aimerais maintenant parler de l'article 420.13 c'est-à-dire du problème des ordonnances de blocage. Dans les faits, une fois qu'un mandat est exécuté, une ordonnance de blocage peut-être rendue; celle-ci gèle les biens jusqu'à ce qu'un verdict de culpabilité ou d'innocence soit rendu. Le critère à respecter pour que les biens puissent être gelés n'est pas assez rigoureux. Le juge doit simplement être convaincu qu'il existe des motifs raisonnables de croire que les biens peuvent faire l'objet d'une confiscation. Il doit simplement se demander s'il y a des motifs raisonnables de croire que l'on puisse procéder à une confiscation. Si c'est le cas, il peut geler pendant de très longues périodes des biens d'une valeur de plusieurs millions de dollars. Il est vrai que le projet de loi contient d'autres disposiother provisions which allow the order to be varied. I am saying that the test should be made on the balance of probabilities and not on the test of whether or not there are reasonable grounds. We have made this submission already, and I have been told it has been studied and rejected. Our association wishes to place on record the fact that there is the potential for grave unfairness. For example, the substantial assets of a business could be tied up for a very extended period of time on this very low test of whether or not there are reasonable grounds for forfeiture. We suggest that there be a hearing where evidence is presented and upon which the judge must decide whether on the balance of probabilities the restraining order will be issued. If the balance of probabilities indicates that the order will be issued, then by all means tie the property up, but do not tie up the property simply because a police officer steps into a witness box and provides merely reasonable grounds.

There is a hierarchy of burden in criminal law. There is the business of reasonable grounds to believe, which is what is in the existing legislation, when it comes to search and seizure, and then there is the idea of the balance of probabilities. Some of the statutory presumptions talk about balance of probabilities. Our law is clear that before you can impose criminal sanctions there must be proof beyond reasonable doubt. We are not suggesting that there should be proof beyond reasonable doubt, but that there should be, at least, a balance of probabilities.

With respect to notice of the restraining order, once again, the other side has the option of giving notice. A judge may require that notice be given unless it would result in dissipation of evidence. I would ask that the provision be put the other way around and say that it is mandatory to give notice except where certain conditions precedent are met. In other words, put the onus on the other side to satisfy the judge that notice should not be given. I can envisage situations where an individual learns months later that he is the subject of a restraining order. For example, he might show up at his safety deposit box only to find that he cannot open it and to learn that there has been a hearing. I can see cases where it would be in the interests of justice not to tell the other side. For example, there may be the concern that the individual will run off with the money, or whatever. However, let us put the onus on the investigators to satisfy a court that that notice provision should be met.

The next provision is kind of complicated. I refer to proposed subsection 420.14(6), which deals with how you vary restraining orders. There are two situations in which a judge can vary a restraining order. Let us say that a person has been charged with one of the enumerated criminal offences. In this circumstance, to get a variation, you have to satisfy the judge that the warrant should not have been issued or that the restraining order should not have been made. The second circumstance is where a person appears to be innocent. In other words, a third party is affected and says, "I did not know anything about the property being from the proceeds of crime." If the person appears to be innocent, then the judge does not have to be satisfied that the warrant should not have been issued.

tions permettant de modifier l'ordonnance. Ce que je veux dire, c'est que le critère devrait être celui de la prépondérance des probabilités et non celui des motifs raisonnables. Nous avons déjà présenté une proposition en ce sens; on m'a dit qu'elle avait été étudiée et rejetée. Notre association tient à souligner, aux fins du compte rendu, les risques de graves injustices. Ainsi, les énormes actifs d'une entreprise pourraient être bloqués pendant très longtemps si le critère à respecter consiste simplement à déterminer s'il y a ou non des motifs raisonnables de confisquer les biens. Nous proposons la tenue d'une audience au cours de laquelle des témoignages seront présentés et à l'issue de laquelle le juge devra décider, selon la prépondérance des probabilités, s'il rendra une ordonnance de blocage. Si, selon la prépondérance des probabilités, une ordonnance doit être rendue, on pourra alors bloquer les biens sans hésitation, mais pas simplement parce qu'un policier vient à la barre des témoins présenter des motifs raisonnables.

Il y a une hiérarchie du fardeau de la preuve en droit pénal. Il y a le principe des «motifs raisonnables de croire», sur lequel s'appuie le projet de loi à l'étude, lorsqu'il est question de perquisitions et de saisies, et celui de la prépondérance des probabilités, sur lequel s'appuient certaines lois. Notre droit est clair: avant de pouvoir appliquer des sanctions pénales, il faut avoir des preuves au-delà de tout doute raisonnable. Nous ne préconisons pas la preuve au-delà de tout doute raisonnable. Nous ne préconisons pas la preuve au-delà de tout doute raisonnable, mais au moins la preuve selon la prépondérance des probabilités.

Parlons maintenant des avis concernant l'ordonnance de blocage; une fois encore, l'autre partie a le choix de donner ou non cet avis. Le juge peut demander qu'on avise la personne en cause sauf s'il estime que le fait de donner cet avis risque d'occasionner la disparition des preuves. Selon moi, la disposition devrait être inversée et stipuler qu'il est obligatoire de donner cet avis sauf dans certaines circonstances. En d'autres termes, c'est l'autre partie qui devrait avoir à convaincre le juge de l'inopportunité de donner un avis. Imaginez qu'un individu apprenne des mois plus tard qu'il est sous le coup d'une ordonnance de blocage. Il pourrait, en se rendant à sa banque, découvrir qu'il ne peut ouvrir son coffret et apprendre qu'il y a eu une audience. Je conçois que, dans certains cas, il soit dans l'intérêt de la justice de ne pas en informer l'autre partie. On pourrait, par exemple, craindre que l'individu prenne la fuite avec l'argent, etc. Laissons toutefois aux enquêteurs la charge de convaincre le tribunal au sujet de ces avis.

La prochaine disposition dont je veux parler est assez compliquée. Il s'agit du paragraphe 420.14(6), qui traite de la façon dont on modifie une ordonnance de blocage. Un juge peut modifier ce genre d'ordonnance dans deux situations. Si une personne est accusée d'une infraction criminelle désignée, il faut, pour obtenir une modification, convaincre le juge que le mandat n'aurait pas dû être délivré ou que l'ordonnance de blocage n'aurait pas dû être rendue. La deuxième situation est celle où une personne semble innocente, en d'autres termes, celle où un tiers est en cause et déclare qu'il ne savait pas que les biens étaient des produits de la criminalité. Si la personne semble innocente, le juge n'a pas à être convaincu que le mandat n'aurait pas dû être délivré. Évidemment, le fardeau de la

That, of course, puts the onus on the party making the assertion and it is very often very difficult to accomplish that. This is a very nebulous concept which has been injected into this legislation.

I am suggesting that you consider what would happen if there were an application to vary the order that is reasonable and the judge agreed that it should be varied. He cannot do that unless he is satisfied that the warrant should not have been issued or that the restraint order should not have been made. On the other hand, the judge could find himself in a situation where he would like to agree with the applicant but he cannot because the legislation says that he cannot interfere unless the warrant should not have been issued or unless the restraint order should not have been made. If he feels, based on the information available at the time, that the warrant should have been issued, then he can do nothing although he may feel that the applicant has been treated unfairly. He cannot do anything about it. In my submission, that is not fair. The test should be whether the interests of justice require that a variation be made.

The second part about appearing to be innocent creates a class of black sheep who, by perception, seem to have property for an unsavoury purpose and it casts the onus on them to satisfy the court, on a balance of probabilities, that they are innocent. The burden should be on the Crown.

A partial answer to my complaint about the judge having his hands tied in circumstances where he wants to vary the order may be that the proposed subclause 420.14 provides a review process. Three categories of property are contemplated by this bill: Property seized by warrant; property subject to a restraining order; and property seized by a police officer. Earlier I was complaining about a police officer being given powers beyond those in the warrant. I would submit that, in the proposed subclause 420.14, there is no allowance for that consideration and that there should be. This area needs to be cleared up. I hope I can make this point clearer afterwards and, hopefully, an answer can be given by the committee. This review area does cause me a lot of concern in terms of where the proof lies or where the burden lies and what the burden should be.

The Chairman: You are getting back to paragraph (a) which talks about a warrant or an order which should not have been made, but it does not refer to the third category that you referred to earlier where a police officer can pick up anything else that he believes, on reasonable grounds, might be feloniously acquired.

Mr. McCombs: Perhaps a simple answer is that the officer is there purporting to act under a warrant; so that is covered. However, I feel we should clear this up, because otherwise we will tie up the courts with litigation. Perhaps we should tailor the words somewhat. I am sure it is just an oversight.

The Chairman: That would be tidied up if the government accepted your argument on the other proposed section, which preuve incombe alors à la partie qui fait cette affirmation et la preuve est souvent très difficile à établir. On a inséré dans la loi un concept très nébuleux.

Songez à ce qui arriverait si l'on présentait une demande de modification d'ordonnance qui soit raisonnable et que le juge reconnaisse qu'elle devrait effectivement être modifiée. Il ne pourrait le faire à moins d'être convaincu que le mandat n'aurait pas dû être délivré ou que l'ordonnance de blocage n'aurait pas dû être rendue. Le juge pourrait se trouver dans une situation où il ne demanderait pas mieux que d'accéder à la demande, mais où il ne pourrait le faire parce que la loi le lui interdit sauf s'il appert que le mandat n'aurait pas dû être délivré ou que l'ordonnance de blocage n'aurait pas dû être rendue. Si le juge estime que le mandat devait être délivré compte tenu des renseignements disponibles à l'époque, il ne peut rien faire, même s'il estime que le demandeur a été traité injustement. Il ne peut absolument rien faire, et à mon avis, c'est injuste. Le critère à prendre en considération ici devrait être de déterminer s'il est dans l'intérêt de la justice de modifier l'ordonnance.

La deuxième partie de la disposition traite de ceux qui semblent innocents; elle crée une catégorie de moutons noirs qui semblent avoir en leur possession des biens à des fins louches; c'est à eux qu'il incombe de convaincre le tribunal de leur innocence, selon la prépondérance des probabilités. Cette responsabilité devrait incomber à la Couronne.

Le mécanisme de révision prévu à l'article 420.14 résoud peut-être partiellement le problème des juges qui ont les mains liées lorsqu'ils veulent modifier une ordonnance. Le projet de loi traite de trois catégories de biens: ceux qui sont saisis au moyen d'un mandat; ceux qui font l'objet d'une ordonnance de blocage et ceux qui sont saisis par un policier. J'ai dénoncé précédemment le fait qu'un policier ait des pouvoirs plus étendus que ceux prévus dans le mandat. J'estime que l'article 420.14 ne permet pas de parer à cette éventualité et qu'il le devrait. Cette question doit être éclaircie. J'espère que je pourrai apporter des éclaircissements ultérieurement et que le Comité trouvera une solution. Cette forme d'examen me préoccupe beaucoup parce que je me demande quel type de preuve est exigé et à qui elle incombe.

La présidente: Vous revenez au paragraphe où il est question d'un mandat de perquisition qui n'aurait pas dû être délivré ou qu'une ordonnance de blocage qui n'aurait pas dû être rendue, mais ce paragraphe ne fait pas référence à la troisième catégorie dont vous avez parlé plus tôt, celle des biens qu'un agent de la paix peut saisir s'il a des motifs raisonnables de croire qu'ils ont été acquis illégalement.

M. McCombs: C'est peut-être simplement parce qu'on présume que l'agent de la paix exécute un mandat; donc, cette intervention est sous-entendue. J'estime toutefois qu'il faudrait clarifier cette question, sinon les tribunaux seront dans l'embarras. Nous devrions peut-être formuler la disposition autrement. Je suis sûr que c'est simplement un oubli.

La présidente: On règlerait le problème si le gouvernement acceptait votre argument au sujet de l'autre projet d'article, would be to not allow a policeman to pick up extra goods when he is acting under a warrant.

Mr. McCombs: Yes. He may have to go back and get another warrant.

The Chairman: If he got a warrant, then everything would be all right under this section to that extent; is that correct?

Mr. McCombs: I agree with that.

One of the main concerns of the Criminal Lawyers' Association relates to the whole purpose of the proposed legislation and its forfeiture provisions in section 420.17. I read these provisions several times before I thought I understood what they meant, but I still do not have total confidence that I understand them.

The proposed subsection 420.17(1) says that once you are found to be guilty, the court may then order forfeiture of your property if it is satisfied on the balance of probabilities that the property was the proceeds of crime and that those proceeds were from that particular crime.

If you are found guilty of doing something and the judge is satisfied on a balance of probabilities that the money or the property that is the subject of the application is from that crime, then it is forfeited. We quarrel with "the balance of probabilities" idea. A man has to be found guilty of an offence beyond a reasonable doubt, but, when it comes to taking his property, the judge only requires to be satisfied "on the balance of probabilities" that that is where the property came from. That is just unfair. It turns the criminal law on its head.

Perhaps I can jump ahead to subsection (4). Let us say that the proceeds have been commingled with other property, so that the judge cannot put his hands on the property. In those circumstances, the judge has the power to impose a fine. If he believes that the amount of money acquired was $1 million, he can impose a fine of $1 million. Subsection (4) says that he can impose a sentence of up to ten years as an alternative; so there is a penal consequence to these forfeiture orders. This penal consequence is based on a balance of probabilities. The Supreme Court of Canada, in Regina v. Gardner, said you cannot do that. I understand that that was put before you the other day. The situation in that case is a bit different, but I say that the principle is the same. If I can bore you for a minute, I will tell you what that case said.

Let us suppose that you are convicted of a bad crime such as a robbery. The Crown is saying, "Not only did you commit robbery, but you pistol-whipped the victim," and the accused is saying to his lawyer, "Yes. I robbed that individual but I never touched him. I did not pistol-whip anybody." The distinction is important because it determines whether he is going to jail for two years or five years. The Supreme Court of Canada says there must be a hearing to determine the issue of whether or not that aggravating fact exists. If it does then the person shall be sentenced accordingly. However, the Supreme Court of Canada decided that the Crown must prove that aggravating selon lequel il faudrait interdire à un agent de la paix de saisir d'autres biens que ceux prévus quand il exécute un mandat.

M. McCombs: Oui. Il lui faudrait en obtenir un autre.

La présidente: S'il en obtenait un autre, il n'y aurait plus de problème avec cet article, n'est-ce pas?

M. McCombs: Oui.

Le Criminal Lawyers' Association est bien préoccupé par l'objectif général du projet de loi et de ses dispositions sur la confiscation, énoncées à l'article 420.17. Je les ai lues plusieurs fois avant de les comprendre, et encore je ne suis pas tout à fait sûr d'en avoir bien saisi le sens.

Le paragraphe 420.17(1) du projet de loi dispose qu'une fois que l'accusé a été jugé coupable, le tribunal peut ordonner que ses biens soient confisqués, s'il est convaincu, selon la prépondérance des probabilités, qu'ils sont le fruit du délit en question.

Si un accusé est jugé coupable d'un délit et que le juge est convaincu, selon la prépondérance des probabilités, que l'argent ou les biens qui font l'objet de la demande ont été obtenus en rapport avec cette infraction criminelle, ils sont alors confisqués. Nous contestons l'idée de «la prépondérance des probabilités». Pour qu'il y ait verdict de culpabilité, il faut avoir la quasi-certitude que l'accusé est coupable, mais quand il s'agit de confisquer ses biens, il suffit que le juge soit convaincu «selon la prépondérance des probabilités» que ces biens ont été obtenus en rapport avec le délit. C'est injuste. C'est contraire au droit criminel.

Je passerai tout de suite au quatrième paragraphe. Disons que les produits du délit ont été fusionnés d'autres biens, si bien que le juge ne peut les confisquer. Dans ces circonstances, le juge a le pouvoir d'imposer une amende. S'il estime que la somme d'argent obtenue était d'un million de dollars, il peut imposer une amende d'un million de dollars. Le paragraphe (4) prévoit qu'il peut infliger, à défaut du paiement de l'amende, une peine d'emprisonnement pouvant aller jusqu'à dix ans; donc, les ordonnances de confiscation peuvent aussi avoir des conséquences pénales. L'imposition d'une peine est fondée sur la prépondérance des probabilités. La Cour suprême du Canada a indiqué, dans l'affaire de la «Reine c. Gardner» qu'on ne pouvait agir ainsi. Je crois comprendre qu'on vous en a parlé l'autre jour. Cette affaire est un peu différente du cas qui nous occupe ici, mais je dirais qu'en principe elle y est semblable. Si vous me permettez d'être ennuyeux pour un instant, je vous exposerai la situation.

Imaginons qu'une personne soit accusée d'avoir commis un acte répréhensible, comme un vol. La Couronne prétend qu'en plus d'avoir volé, l'accusé a frappé la victime avec son arme, tandis que l'accusé déclare à son avocat qu'il a bien volé, mais qu'il n'a jamais touché la victime. C'est une nuance importante, parce qu'elle déterminera si l'accusé devra purger une peine d'emprisonnement de deux ou de cinq ans. La Cour suprême du Canada décide qu'il faut tenir une audience pour déterminer s'il y a des circonstances aggravantes et dans l'affirmative, l'accusé sera condamné en conséquence. La Cour détermine aussi que la Couronne doit prouver qu'il y a des cir-fact, not on a balance of probabilities but beyond a reasonable doubt.

I say that this legislation with respect to forfeiture carries a potential penal consequence. We are speaking not only about property forfeiture;l we are speaking about going to jail for up to 10 years, depending on the amount of money involved. In that circumstance, you must require proof beyond a reasonable doubt before you can impose that penal consequence. That is one of the cornerstones of the system of criminal justice and what the Supreme Court of Canada said in the Gardner case.

Senator Doyle: May I ask a question at this point?

The Chairman: You may as well have things clarified as you go along, Senator Doyle.

Senator Doyle: First, the accused has to be convicted of an offence?

Mr. McCombs: Yes.

Senator Doyle: Let us use the example of the drug dealer, as we have been all along. We know that he has been acquiring income from the sale of drugs.

Mr. McCombs: Right.

Senator Doyle: If the punishment is to fit the crime, the amount of property seized should bear a relationship to the profits he is likely to have made.

Mr. McCombs: Yes.

Senator Doyle: So we seize his house, and we say that it is reasonable to suppose that the million dollars are about what he made, that since he was involved in various deals, but we cannot specifically prove that he used the money from that specific deal to buy that specific house.

Mr. McCombs: Yes.

Senator Doyle: We know that he made a million bucks out of the deal; we know he has a million-dollar house; but if we have to prove that he bought that house with the proceeds of that one particular deal, then, surely, the court will never be able to acquire a penny farthing's worth of property.

Mr. McCombs: I understand, senator, and I agree with your concern. Let us suppose he is convicted on the fact situation that you have proposed.

Senator Doyle: Yes.

Mr. McCombs: The Crown says, "We know he has a million-dollar house. He should not be allowed to have that house." He says, "Wait one second. I bought that million-dollar house when I inherited money from my mother," or, "My mother gave me that house." The judge then has a hearing to determine whether or not he is satisfied, on a balance of probabilities, that the Crown is correct. The judge may say, "I believe the Crown is probably right—"only probably right—"so I am going to order the house forfeited." I agree that it is no different from saying, "I am going to put you in jail and fine you a million dollars." He has the power to do that. The difference under this bill is that it provides additional penal consequence.

constances aggravantes, non pas selon la prépondérance des probabilités, mais hors de tout doute raisonnable.

Les dispositions du projet de loi sur la confiscation peuvent effectivement donner lieu à l'imposition de sanctions pénales. Il n'est pas question uniquement de la confiscation de biens, mais de peines d'emprisonnement pouvant aller jusqu'à 10 ans, selon la somme d'argent en cause. Dans ces circonstances, il faut établir la preuve hors de tout doute raisonnable qu'il y a culpabilité avant d'imposer une peine d'emprisonnement. C'est une des pierres de touche du droit pénal et c'est ce que la Cour suprême du Canada a déclaré dans l'affaire Gardner.

Le sénateur Doyle: Puis-je poser une question à ce sujet?

La présidente: Il vaut mieux obtenir les précisions voulues au fur et à mesure, sénateur Doyle.

Le sénateur Doyle: D'abord, l'accusé doit être condamné pour un délit?

M. McCombs: Oui.

Le sénateur Doyle: Prenons le cas d'un trafiquant de drogue, comme nous l'avons fait depuis le début. Nous savons qu'il tire un revenu de la vente des drogues.

M. McCombs: C'est exact.

Le sénateur Doyle: Si la peine doit être proportionnée au délit, la quantité de biens confisqués doit être en rapport avec les profits qu'il est présumé avoir réalisés.

M. McCombs: Oui.

Le sénateur Doyle: Donc, nous confisquons sa maison et nous disons qu'il est raisonnable de prétendre qu'il a dû réaliser des profits d'environ un million de dollars, mais, étant donné qu'il a participé à différentes transactions, nous ne pouvons prouver avec certitude qu'il a utilisé les produits de ce délit pour acheter cette maison.

M. McCombs: En effet.

Le sénateur Doyle: Nous savons que la transaction lui a rapporté un million de dollars et qu'il possède une maison qui vaut un million de dollars; mais s'il faut prouver qu'il a acheté la maison avec les produits de la transaction en question, il est certain que le tribunal ne pourra jamais rien lui confisquer.

M. McCombs: Je comprends vos craintes, sénateur, et je suis d'accord avec vous. Imaginons qu'il soit condamné pour le délit que vous avez proposé.

Le sénateur Doyle: Oui.

M. McCombs: La Couronne affirme savoir qu'il possède une maison valant un million de dollars et qu'il ne devrait pas l'avoir. L'accusé déclare avoir acheté cette maison avec l'argent que lui a laissé sa mère ou encore que sa mère la lui a donnée. Le juge tient une audience pour se convaincre que, selon la prépondérance des proabilités, la Couronne a raison. Le juge n'a qu'a être convaincu qu'il est probable qu'elle ait raison, et seulement probable, pour ordonner que la maison soit confisquée. Je conviens que c'est comme décider de lui infliger une peine d'emprisonement et une amende d'un million de dollars. Il a le pouvoir de le faire. Ce qui est différent avec le projet de loi à l'étude, c'est qu'il prévoit, en plus, l'imposition de sanctions pénales.

[Text]

Senator Doyle: That is the intent of the bill.

Mr. McCombs: That there be a penal consequence in addition?

Senator Doyle: That there be consequences, whether penal or some other type. This particular bill is obviously saying there should be something else.

Now, regarding this million-dollar house, if there were a civil action and it was proved that the guy had taken the million bucks away from somebody by fraud, and he happened to own a million-dollar house, whether it was his mother's or his, he would be required to sell that house and pay his debt.

Mr. McCombs: That is right. I understand that.

Senator Doyle: This bill is not dealing with a civil action. It deals with criminal actions. If he made his money from some kind of foul vice I do not find it as heinous as you perhaps do to say, "Once we have convicted you—but not until we have done that—and once we have satisfied ourselves that there is a reasonable probability that, whether you acquired it from your mother or from whomever, you still hold onto this house, because you have been living off the avails of this terrible crime, you must forfeit it."

Mr. McCombs: I respectfully suggest that we are not talking about the same thing. As I understand the present law—never mind this bill—if a judge thinks a man has taken a million dollars by reason of a crime, he can deal with it by way of imposition of a fine. However, under this bill, he can say, "You have committed the crime of trafficking in heroin. I am satisfied that you have profited to the tune of $1 million. I am going to put you in jail for a length of time and I am going to impose a fine of $1 million upon you because you should not be in the position of profiting from that." The judge can do that now.

Senator Doyle: Yes.

Mr. McCombs: He can also give a sentence as an alternative to the fine. He can say, "If you do not pay the $1 million fine, you are going to jail for this much longer." All I am saying is that—

Senator Doyle: May I finish what you have just been saying? The judge can impose extra time to be served if the accused does not pay his fine.

Mr. McCombs: Yes.

Senator Doyle: However, the man may say, "I will serve the extra time, but I am not going to give you any money." The money then still sits out there and the ill-gotten gains can go to his ill-gotten wife or anybody else.

Senator Spivak: Ill-gotten wife?

The Chairman: Let us not carry this too far, Senator Doyle.

Senator Doyle: This act says that if you made some money and got yourself a million-dollar house, "we are going to take the house away from you," hot, cold or on Tuesday.

Mr. McCombs: And we do not care.

[Traduction]

Le sénateur Doyle: C'est l'intention du projet de loi.

M. McCombs: De prévoir aussi des sanctions pénales?

Le sénateur Doyle: Entre autres. De toute évidence, le projet de loi laisse entendre qu'il doit y avoir autre chose.

Maintenant, au sujet de la maison d'un million de dollars, si un procès au civil prouvait que l'accusé avait acquis un million de dollars frauduleusement, et qu'il avait une maison d'un million de dollar, que ce soit la sienne ou celle de sa mère, il devrait la vendre pour payer sa dette.

M. McCombs: C'est exact. Je comprends.

Le sénateur Doyle: Le projet de loi ne traite pas de procès au civil, mais au criminel. S'il avait acquis cet argent en rapport avec un acte criminel, je ne crois pas qu'il serait odieux, comme vous pouvez peut-être le penser, d'exiger une fois que l'accusé aura été jugé coupable, mais pas avant, et une fois qu'on aura obtenu la certitude, selon la prépondérance des probabilités, que la maison est toujours à lui, qu'il l'ait obtenue de sa mère ou de quelqu'un d'autre, que cette maison lui soit confisquée parce qu'il vit du produit de son délit.

M. McCombs: Avec votre respect, je crois que nous ne parlons de la même chose. D'après ce que je comprends de la loi actuellement en vigueur—je ne parle pas du projet de loi pour l'instant—le juge qui estime que quelqu'un s'est procuré un million de dollars de façon criminelle peut lui imposer une amende. Maintenant, d'après le projet de loi, le juge pourrait décider de condamner à une peine d'emprisonnement et à une amende d'un million de dollars un trafiquant d'héroïne, s'il est convaincu que son trafic lui a rapporté un million de dollars et qu'il n'aurait pas dû en tirer profit. Le juge pourrait agir ainsi.

Le sénateur Doyle: Exactement.

M. McCombs: Il peut aussi imposer une peine à la place de l'amende. Il peut dire: «A défaut de payer un million de dollars d'amende, vous serez incarcéré pendant tant d'années de plus». Ce que je veux dire, c'est que . . .

Le sénateur Doyle: Puis-je terminer votre dernière phrase? Le juge peut allonger la peine si l'accusé ne paie pas son amende.

M. McCombs: Exactement.

Le sénateur Doyle: Mais le contrevenant peut aussi dire: «Très bien, je vais purger la peine supplémentaire, mais vous n'aurez pas d'argent», avec la conséquence que l'argent demeure entre ses mains et le risque que les gains mal acquis aillent à son épouse mal acquise ou n'importe qui.

Le sénateur Spivak: Une épouse mal acquise?

La présidente: Il ne faudrait pas aller trop loin, sénateur Doyle.

Le sénateur Doyle: Cette loi dit que si le contrevenant a réalisé des gains et qu'il s'en est servi pour acheter une maison d'un million de dollars, le tribunal peut trouver le moyen de l'en départir.

M. McCombs: Nous n'y voyons pas d'objection.

[Text]

Senator Spivak: Perhaps I am the only one who is a little mixed up, but could I just get the principle established here? You are saying that because the proposed section 420.17(4) carries penal consequences, then the test is not on a balance of probabilities but beyond all reasonable doubt, which is the same for every crime in the Criminal Code; is that right?

Mr. McCombs: Yes. That is what I said.

Senator Spivak: I understand that. Would it not be better if it were not from that particular crime? What difference does it make which crime?

Mr. McCombs: Do you mean what difference does it make whether he got the house from his mother or not?

Senator Spivak: Yes, because is not the important thing that we know he committed the crime rather than establishing which proceeds are from which crime? Do you understand my point?

Mr. McCombs: I think I do.

Senator Spivak: Surely, the important thing originally is that he committed the crime beyond all reasonable doubt and then that would meet his argument. It would have been beyond all reasonable doubt and, therefore, it is fair game.

Mr. McCombs: Do you mean that the determination of guilt has been decided beyond a reasonable doubt and now the property is fair game?

Senator Spivak: Yes, it is then okay to take his mother's house. The determination of guilt should not be "probable guilt", but "guilt beyond all reasonable doubt."

Mr. McCombs: I am trying to think of a good answer to what Senator Doyle has suggested. You are really giving the judge two kicks at the accused: he is being allowed to sentence him to jail and fine him, and, alternatively, incarcerate him further for not paying the fine without Bill C-61. Bill C-61 gives the judge the additional power to forfeit, and where the money has been co-mingled, to impose a fine and to require a further imprisonment of up to ten years. I do not quarrel with any of that. I am saying that if the additional penal sanctions are going to be allowed beyond those which now exist, I say that that should be done in line with what the Supreme Court of Canada said in Gardner—that is, let "beyond a reasonable doubt" be the test.

Nobody is quarrelling with the idea that a heroin trafficker should be allowed to have his family live in a big mansion while he is in penitentiary.

Senator Doyle: Would you say, then, that the alternative to the bill is simply to increase the penalties for those particular offences?

Mr. McCombs: No, because the power is already there to impose a life sentence and an unlimited fine.

[Traduction]

Le sénateur Spivak: J'ignore si je suis la seule à être un peu perdue, mais pourrais-je connaître le principe qui sous-tend tout cela? Vous dites que, parce que le paragraphe 420.17(4) proposé entraîne l'imposition de sanctions pénales, le critère sur lequel on devrait s'appuyer n'est pas la prépondérance des probabilités mais bien l'exclusion de tout doute raisonnable, comme pour toutes les infractions visées par le Code criminel, n'est-ce pas?

M. McCombs: Exactement. C'est bien ce que j'ai dit.

Le sénateur Spivak: Je vois. N'aurions-nous pas avantage à ce que la propriété n'ait pas été acquise avec le produit de ce crime? En quoi le type de crime importe-t-il?

M. McCombs: Vous demandez-vous si le fait d'acquérir cette maison de sa mère ou non fait une différence?

Le sénateur Spivak: Oui, car n'importe-t-il pas plus de savoir s'il a commis le crime que d'établir quels biens ont été achetés avec quels produits du crime? Me saisissez-vous?

M. McCombs: Je crois que oui.

Le sénateur Spivak: Le plus important, certes, est d'établir d'abord, hors de tout doute raisonnable, si le contrevenant a commis le crime; après cela, celui-ci n'aurait plus rien à redire. La preuve serait établie hors de tout doute raisonnable et, par conséquent, il n'y aurait pas d'injustice.

M. McCombs: Voulez-vous dire qu'une fois la culpabilité établie hors de tout doute raisonnable, la confiscation de cette propriété ne créerait pas d'injustice?

Le sénateur Spivak: Oui, on pourrait alors saisir la maison de sa mère. La preuve de culpabilité ne devrait pas être fondée sur des probabilités, mais établie hors de tout doute raisonnable.

M. McCombs: J'essaie d'imaginer une réponse qui pourrait satisfaire le sénateur Doyle. Le projet de loi donne réellement au juge deux mécanismes pour punir l'accusé; il peut lui infliger une peine d'emprisonnement et lui imposer une amende, ou lui infliger une peine d'emprisonnement plus longue s'il néglige de payer l'amende. Or, le projet de loi C-61 permet aussi au juge de faire saisir les biens du contrevenant, et si les fonds ont été fusionnés, de lui imposer une amende et une peine supplémentaire pouvant aller jusqu'à dix ans. Je n'y vois pas d'objection. Ce que je veux dire, c'est que si le législateur a l'intention d'ajouter des sanctions pénales qui n'existent pas déjà dans la loi, il devrait le faire, selon moi, en conformité avec la décision rendue par la Cour suprême dans l'affaire Gardner, c'est-à-dire en exigeant que la preuve soit établie hors de tout doute raisonnable.

Personne ne met en doute le droit d'un trafiquant d'héroïne de permettre à sa famille de vivre dans un château pendant qu'il est incarcéré.

Le sénateur Doyle: Seriez-vous prêt à dire alors qu'au lieu de ce projet de loi, on pourrait tout simplement accroître la sévérité des peines, dans le cas de ces délits?

M. McCombs: Non, car les juges peuvent déjà imposer des peines à vie et des amendes illimitées.

Senator Doyle: Surely the aim of the bill is to provide some kind of strong medicine in these particular kinds of cases.

The Chairman: I think the witness agrees with you, Senator Doyle. The only point is that it is another penalty to which he is objecting; it is an additional penalty over and above the penalties already provided, and for any penalty for a criminal sanction the test should be "beyond a reasonable doubt". As long as they abide by that test, then at least we are satisfying the possible objections of the Supreme Court of Canada.

Senator Doyle: With respect, Madam Chairman, I do not see a circumstance, unless one had receipts for everything, where it could be proven beyond a reasonable doubt that a specific house was acquired by a specific means. I am talking about visible property.

The Chairman: I should not be getting into this, but even in the example you used in the fraud case no one could prove that that particular house was acquired as a direct result of the fraud. The person, in order to pay the penalties involved, has to sell the house. Perhaps that is what you are getting at, that you are not seizing the house per se; you are saying "You will have to come up with something extra, and if that means selling your house or your yacht, that is the way it is."

Senator Doyle: If a man is sentenced to life, why should he worry about another ten years?

The Chairman: We have a couple of well-known criminals in our penitentiaries these days who are very much concerned with what is happening to their money on the outside.

Mr. McCombs: We still have the parole system.

The other part of the proposed section 420.17, that the association finds perhaps most disturbing, relates to a person who is acquitted. This legislation empowers the court to make a forfeiture order even if the accused is acquitted, if the court is satisfied beyond a reasonable doubt that the property is proceeds from crime.

The Chairman: That would involve a separate hearing. Are you saying that there is one hearing as to the accused's culpability, and that after he is acquitted, if he is acquitted, there is then another hearing to determine whether the property is the proceeds from crime; and then the finding has to be beyond a reasonable doubt?

Mr. McCombs: I do not think it is clear from that section whether or not there will be a separate hearing, or not because it is so vaguely worded.

The proposed subsection 420.17(2) says that if, at the end of the day, a person has been found guilty, and the Crown is saying that it wants to forfeit property other than the property that was the subject of the particular prosecution, this legislation would permit that and imposes the requirement that that be beyond a reasonable doubt.

We say that we are entitled—and the courts have stressed this very much, especially since the Charter—to make full

Le sénateur Doyle: Évidemment, le projet de loi a pour but, au fond, de punir sévèrement ce type de crime.

La présidente: Je crois que le témoin est d'accord avec vous, sénateur Doyle. La seule chose, c'est qu'on ajoute ici une peine, ce qu'il n'approuve pas; elle s'ajoute à celles déjà prévues, et quel que soit le type de délit, le critère servant à établir la preuve devrait être l'exclusion de tout doute raisonnable. Tant qu'on respecte ce critère, au moins, on ne risque pas d'être débouté par la Cour suprême.

Le sénateur Doyle: Sauf votre respect, madame la présidente, j'arrive mal à imaginer une circonstance où, à moins de conserver des reçus pour le moindre achat, il serait possible de prouver hors de tout doute raisonnable que tel ou tel bien a été acquis avec telle ou telle ressource bien précise. Je parle de biens officiellement connus, bien entendu.

La présidente: Je ne devrais pas aborder ce sujet, mais même dans l'exemple de cette affaire de fraude que vous avez citée, personne n'a réussi à prouver que la maison avait été acquise précisément avec le produit de la fraude. Pour verser son amende, le contrevenant doit vendre la maison. Vous voulez peut-être dire que la maison n'a pas besoin d'être saisie; dès l'instant où il doit payer une amende supplémentaire, le contrevenant est obligé de vendre sa maison ou son bateau. C'est ainsi.

Le sénateur Doyle: Si un accusé se voit imposer une peine d'emprisonnement à vie, pourquoi devrait-il craindre une peine supplémentaire de dix ans?

La présidente: Nos pénitenciers comptent actuellement un certain nombre de criminels bien connus qui se préoccupent pas mal de ce qui arrive à leur argent ailleurs qu'en prison.

M. McCombs: Notre régime de libération conditionnelle est encore en vigueur.

L'autre volet de l'article 420.17 proposé qui inquiète peut-être le plus notre association concerne l'accusé qui est acquitté. Le projet de loi autorise les tribunaux à émettre des ordonnances de confiscation même si l'accusé a été acquitté, s'ils jugent hors de tout doute raisonnable que la propriété a été acquise avec les produits d'une activité criminelle.

La présidente: Il y aurait alors un autre procès. Dites-vous qu'il y aura un procès pour juger de la culpabilité de l'accusé et qu'une fois qu'il aura été acquitté, si jamais il est acquitté, il y aura un autre procès pour déterminer si la propriété a été acquise avec les produits d'une activité criminelle et qu'alors la preuve devra être établie hors de tout doute raisonnable?

M. McCombs: Je ne crois pas que cet article dise expressément qu'il y aura un autre procès, car il est plutôt vague à ce chapitre.

Le paragraphe 420.17(2) proposé dispose que si, une fois que le contrevenant a été jugé coupable, la poursuite souhaite confisquer une propriété autre que celle visée par l'accusation proprement dite, la loi le lui permettra pourvu que la preuve soit établie hors de tout doute raisonnable que son acquisition résulte des produits de l'activité criminelle.

Selon nous, nous avons le droit—et les tribunaux l'ont invoqué avec vigueur, surtout depuis l'adoption de la Charte—de answer and defence in relation to the charge the accused faces. Here we will have the additional problem of making full answer and defence with respect to this added spectre of other property that might be disclosed in the case to have been the proceeds from crime.

We are saying that it is laudable that they have obviously recognized the problem by requiring that it be beyond a reasonable doubt. We are also saying that the legislation does not help us as to whether there will be a hearing separate from the trial, whether we are supposed to have notice that the Crown will be trying to do this to the accused. It is so vague and unspecified that it dilutes the burden requirement. The accused may decide to get in the witness stand to answer the particular charge against him and make utterances in that context which provide evidence that other crimes have been committed.

It is understandable that we do not want to see the accused walk away with property, but what we have done is to force him to incriminate himself. Again, that has penal consequences because the court is empowered, by subsection 420.17(4) to impose penal consequences if the property or money is not forthcoming.

Again, this is an end run around the way things have been done in the past. It may be that, as a matter of policy, the legislators are saying: "We are sick and tired of all of this. We just want to see to it that these people don't profit from their crimes." But I predict, with respect, that this proposed subsection is going to run into all sorts of constitutional problems because it really causes two trials to take place at the same time. The accused is testifying but he does not know to which charge he is answering. If he answers to one charge, he may say things that are harmful with respect to the other charge.

If you are requiring that the Crown prove beyond a reasonable doubt that this other property is the proceeds of crime, why not make the Crown use the existing section 312 which says that if you know you are in possession of property obtained by crime you are guilty of an offense. Why add it as an appendage to a proceeding in another criminal prosecution all together? You are prosecuting the accused for a drug offence, and then, at the end of the day, you are wanting to take his house because he is a fraudsman as well. Charge him with fraud. Have a trial.

Senator Doyle: But you said yourself a moment ago that you may seize the property if the property was gained by another act, and it does not have to be proven that that specific property was the fruit of his crime.

Mr. McCombs: Under?

Senator Doyle: Under this bill. There has to be a reasonable probability.

Mr. McCombs: That is under subsection 1.

Senator Doyle: That is different from the law as it applied to fraud.

Mr. McCombs: If the property is obtained by that particular crime, yes.

plaider afin de réfuter une accusation portée contre quelqu'un. Dans ce cas-ci, nous devrons plaider à nouveau pour protéger les autres propriétés de l'accusé que le tribunal pourrait soupçonner avoir été acquises avec des produits de criminalité.

Il est heureux, selon nous, qu'on ait reconnu sans équivoque que cela risquait de poser des problèmes en exigeant que la preuve soit établie hors de tout doute raisonnable. Le libellé de cette disposition nous ne nous aide pas à savoir s'il y aura un autre procès, pas plus qu'il savoir si la Couronne voudra infliger ce fardeau supplémentaire à l'accusé. Le libellé de cet article est si vague et peu précis que cela diminue tout le poids de l'exigence relative au fardeau de la preuve. L'accusé décidera peut-être d'aller à la barre pour répondre de l'accusation portée contre lui et il fera peut-être alors des révélations qui prouveront que d'autres délits ont été commis.

On peut comprendre qu'on ne veuille pas voir des contrevenants profiter des produits de la criminalité, mais nous le forçons à s'incriminer. Je le répète, cette disposition a des conséquences pénales, car elle permet aux tribunaux, de par le paragraphe 420.17(4), d'imposer des sanctions pénales si les biens ou l'argent n'ont pas été rendus.

Encore une fois, c'est, je crois, une conséquence de la façon dont on a agi par le passé. Peut-être que le législateur a voulu faire cesser une situation qui perdure depuis trop longtemps et faire en sorte que les criminels ne profitent plus de leurs crimes. Mais je vous prédis, avec tout le respect que je vous dois, que ce paragraphe va entraîner toutes sortes de litiges constitutionnels, car il nous oblige vraiment à plaider deux causes en même temps. En effet, l'accusé témoigne sans savoir contre quelle accusation il se défend. S'il opte pour l'une des deux, son plaidoyer peut, sans qu'il le veuille, aller dans le sens de l'autre accusation.

Si vous exigez que la Couronne prouve hors de tout doute raisonnable que cet autre bien est le produit de la criminalité, pourquoi ne pas exiger qu'elle invoque l'article 312 du Code qui stipule que: «Commet une infraction, quiconque a en sa possession quelque chose, sachant que cette chose a été obtenue criminellement». Pourquoi l'ajouter à la procédure suivie lors d'un autre procès au criminel? C'est un peu comme si vous poursuiviez un accusé pour possession de drogue et qu'à la fin de la journée, vous vouliez confisquer sa maison parce qu'il s'agit d'un fraudeur également. Accusez-le de fraude. Intentez-lui un procès en ce sens.

Le sénateur Doyle: Mais vous venez de dire vous-même qu'il peut être possible de confisquer le bien si celui-ci a été acquis par une autre action et qu'il n'est pas nécessaire de prouver que ce bien est le fruit de la criminalité.

M. McCombs: Aux termes de quoi?

Le sénateur Doyle: Aux termes de ce projet de loi. Il doit y avoir une probabilité raisonnable.

M. McCombs: C'est au paragraphe 1.

Le sénateur Doyle: La fraude n'est pas traitée de la même manière dans la loi.

M. McCombs: Si le bien est obtenu par ce genre de criminalité, oui.

[Text]

Senator Doyle: That is right. That is the difference as I see it, whether it is justifiable or not.

Mr. McCombs: That is the difference. Even though they have added the requirement of reasonable doubt, when you are talking about different property, you are joining two unrelated prosecutions, both with penal consequences: the prosecution that he is charged with—for example a drug offence—and the prosecution—I call it a prosecution because I submit that is what it is—related to the potential forfeiture of the property that has nothing to do with the drug offence.

Senator Doyle: But before he can confront this second difficulty, it has to be established, by all of the rules in the book, that have always been there, that he indeed was a drug trafficker, since he is the particular kind we are picking out here, and that he indeed made his living that way—whether we can prove that he went out and bought this glass or if he went away and bought that microphone. We know he acquired and lived by that form of income, and we are providing, in that second confrontation that he has with the courts, that they can seize it even though it cannot be established specifically that by his deed he acquired that particular piece of property or wealth.

Mr. McCombs: I see the intention, and I agree that if that—

Senator Doyle: I am guessing too.

Mr. McCombs: If that were the fact situation, then that is a desirable legislative intention, but its application covers a lot of other potential situations. We can always dream up something that seems unfair, and I do not want to go through that exercise with you. I can think of one situation that I can share with you involving keeping a common bawdy house: whether or not the person who was a registered nurse and also a registered masseuse was keeping a common bawdy-house by engaging in certain what I guess are euphamistically called "extras". This particular individual had been in business for many years, and the issue at the trial was: Does that constitute keeping a common bawdy house to provide these kinds of extras which are relatively innocuous but which represent sexually-oriented activity?

The court said that in resorting to that place for the purpose of engaging in indecent activity, at least partly for that purpose, "you are guilty of keeping a common bawdy house". At the trial, the accused testified and called psychiatrists and others to say that there was nothing wrong with this. The judge disagreed with it. The accused said, "I have been doing this for ten years". Can the judge say, "You have been engaging in crime for ten years and your business has been successful, so we will take all of your assets that have increased in value over that ten-year period"? I say that the legislation says "yes". Maybe it should.

But I am saying that if that is going to be property that is not related to the particular crime that the person is charged with, then it is not enough to require that it be proof beyond a reasonable doubt, because you are then marrying two different proceedings together and forcing the person to incriminate

Le sénateur Doyle: C'est juste. C'est à mon avis ce qui fait la différence entre ce qui est justifiable et ce qui ne l'est pas.

M. McCombs: En effet. Même si l'on a ajouté l'exigence du doute raisonnable, lorsqu'il s'agit de biens différents, on associe ni plus ni moins deux types de procès différents, les deux pouvant entraîner l'imposition d'une peine: un premier procès pour possession de drogue, par exemple, et puis un autre procès—je dis bien procès parce qu'à mon avis c'est cela—qui pourrait entraîner la confiscation de biens n'ayant rien à voire avec l'infraction liée à la drogue.

Le sénateur Doyle: Mais avant de pouvoir lui intenter un deuxième procès, on doit établir, en bonne et due forme, que l'accusé est bel et bien un trafiquant de drogue, soit le genre de délinquant que nous poursuivons ici, et qu'il en fait son gagne-pain—que nous puissions prouver ou non que l'argent ainsi gagné lui a permis de s'acheter tel verre ou tel microphone. Nous savons qu'il a acquis des biens et qu'il a assuré sa subsistance avec ce genre de gagne-pain et nous affirmons dans ce second procès qu'on peut lui confisquer ces biens même si l'on ne peut établir de façon certaine que ses acquisitions ou sa fortune résultent des actions pour lesquelles on lui a intenté un premier procès.

M. McCombs: Je vois où vous voulez en venir et je conviens que si ce . . .

Le sénateur Doyle: Je ne fais que supposer moi aussi.

M. McCombs: Si telle était la situation, ce serait une intention législative louable, mais son application couvrirait une foule d'autres situations possibles. On pourrait toujours essayer de penser à quelque injustice mais je ne veux pas me lancer dans cette recherche avec vous. Un exemple me vient quand même à l'esprit. Je pense à une maison close dont la tenancière, une ancienne infirmière doublée d'une masseuse autorisée, se rendait coupable par les extras «qu'elle accordait». Cette dame avait été en affaires pendant des années et à l'issue du procès, on s'est demandé si elle tenait effectivement une maison close du fait qu'elle accordait des extras, qui étaient relativement inoffensifs mais tout de même à caractère sexuel.

Le tribunal a déclaré qu'en se servant de cet endroit pour s'adonner à des activités indécentes, du moins partiellement à cette fin, la personne était coupable de tenir une maison close. Au procès, l'accusée a témoigné et a fait comparaître des psychiatres et d'autres spécialistes pour dire qu'il n'y avait rien de mal à ce qu'elle avait fait. Devant le mécontentement du juge, l'accusée a déclaré qu'elle tenait ce commerce depuis dix ans. Le juge peut-il vraiment décréter que puisque cette personne a agit criminellement pendant dix ans et que ses affaires ont été florissantes, elle doit être dépossédé de tous ses avoirs, qui ont augmenté en valeur pendant cette période de dix ans? Selon ce projet de loi, la réponse serait «oui». Je ne dis pas que ce soit à tort.

Mais comme ce seront là des biens qui ne seront pas reliés au crime commis par l'accusée, il n'est pas suffisant alors d'exiger que ce soit une preuve hors de tout doute raisonnable, parce qu'on associe ainsi deux différents types de procès et on force la personne à s'incriminer elle-même. Lorsqu'elle témoi-himself. When they give evidence in relation to the crime they are charged with, they may make utterances with respect to something else.

For example, say part of the evidence adduced by the prosecution is that they know he is guilty because on such and such a day he flew to Columbia, he came back the next day and he deposited $1 million in his bank account the next morning. That evidence was heard. The accused then gets up and says, "That is not from that; that is from a fraud that I committed". At the end of the day, the judge can say, "We are going to take that money too". No one is quarelling that they should not, but I am saying that there should be a separate hearing for that separate offence.

It is complicated to try to find an answer. I realize that I am not giving you an answer. I am asking the question: Is it fair the way it is now? I submit that it is not. Why not leave it the way it is and leave that section out. Section 312 is there.

Senator Stanbury: I have a lot of questions, but I think you have done an excellent job even though you made it complicated in one way; but you have clarified some of these things about which we had considerable misunderstanding.

One of our witnesses said that this act could be applied to a shoplifter, for instance. We keep talking about drugs. That is the sexy thing to talk about from the point of view of the purpose of the bill.

Mr. McCombs: No one wants to see these heroine traffickers living off it.

Senator Stanbury: We agree in principle, and we would like to see these guys—I suppose that even girls are involved with these matters—penalized properly. The suggestion has been made that this bill applies much more broadly, and the discussions we have been having about drug offences, and so on, could apply to a shoplifter.

Mr. McCombs: That is right. I know that argument has been made, and I guess the government's answer is "trust us; we are not going to do that". But sooner or later, it will be done.

Senator Stanbury: We have had a whole series of bills where the officials have come to us and said, "I understand there may be a bit of a problem there, but you may be sure that we would never take action in such a situation". We dealt with this in connection with the immigration bills. I think that at some point today you said that the Supreme Court had—

Mr. McCombs: The potential for unfairness?

Senator Stanbury: —made it clear that that was quite improper; that we should not be passing legislation which is trusting people.

Mr. McCombs: I should clarify what I understand they said. They said that where the law has the potential to punish a person who is morally innocent, then the law must be struck gne en rapport avec le crime dont elle est accusée, elle peut se compromettre sous un autre chef.

Par exemple, en raison du témoignage amené par la poursuite, on sait que l'accusé est coupable parce que tel ou tel jour, il a pris l'avion pour la Colombie, il est revenu le lendemain et a déposé un million de dollars dans son compte en banque le surlendemain matin. Ce témoignage a été entendu. L'accusé se lève alors et dit que ce n'était pas le mobile, que c'était plutôt à cause d'une fraude qu'il avait commise. À la fin de la journée, le juge peut déclarer qu'il va confisquer l'argent également. Tout le monde semble dire le contraire, mais je soutiens qu'il devrait y avoir un procès distinct pour juger cette autre infraction.

Ce n'est pas facile de trouver une réponse. Je vois bien que je ne vous aide pas. Je pose plutôt la question suivante: Cette disposition est-elle juste? À mon avis elle ne l'est pas. Pourquoi ne pas laisser les choses comme elles sont et oublier cet article, puisque nous avons déjà l'Article 312 du Code.

Le sénateur Stanbury: J'ai une foule de questions à poser, mais vous avez réussi à y répondre assez bien, même si parfois vous avez compliqué un peu les choses; vous avez néanmoins éclairci de nombreux points qui étaient tellement obscurs pour nous.

Un de nos témoins a déclaré que le projet de loi pourrait s'appliquer au vol à l'étalage, par exemple. Or, nous ne cessons de parler de drogues. C'est vraiment la question qui ressort de notre étude.

M. McCombs: Personne ne veut que ces trafiquants d'héroïne restent impunis.

Le sénateur Stanbury: Nous sommes d'accord en principe, et nous souhaiterions que ces gens soient dûment pénalisés. Certains ont reproché au projet de loi d'être trop vague, et même les discussions que nous avons eues au sujet des infractions liées aux drogues etc., pourraient s'appliquer au vol à l'étalage.

M. McCombs: En effet. Je suis au courant de cet argument, et je présume que le gouvernement en guise de réponse peut demander qu'on lui fasse confiance, car il sait faire la distinction. Mais tôt ou tard, l'erreur sera commise.

Le sénateur Stanbury: À l'occasion de l'étude d'une foule de projets de loi, des hauts fonctionnaires sont venus nous dire qu'il étaient bien conscients du problème d'interprétation qui existait, mais qu'on devait leur faire confiance car ils ne prendraient jamais telle ou telle mesure. Cela s'est produit à l'occasion du projet de loi sur l'immigration. Je pense qu'à un moment donné aujourd'hui vous avez dit que la Cour suprême avait . . .

M. McCombs: La possibilité de se tromper?

Le sénateur Stanbury: . . . préciser que c'était tout à fait inapproprié; qu'il ne fallait pas adopter des lois lorsqu'une part de confiance intervenait.

M. McCombs: Permettez-moi de préciser qu'à mon avis, ce qui a été dit, c'est que lorsqu'une loi risque de punir une personne moralement innocente, cette loi doit être balayée peu down, whether or not, in the particular fact situation before it, that is the state of affairs. There is the B.C. reference case on section 94 of their highway traffic law. In that case, British Columbia had passed a law that said you could be convicted of driving under suspension and locked up for it even though you did not know your licence was under suspension. The Supreme Court of Canada said that a law like that is unconstitutional. I say that there is also potential for unfairness in this bill.

Other of our concerns were expressed by Mr. Gold when he appeared before the Commons committee, and that evidence is available to members of this committee. I chose, however, on behalf of the association, to deal with those areas that I have already raised.

Honourable senators, I recognize that it is late in the day. If there are any further questions I will try to answer them. I hope that I have been of some assistance to the committee.

Senator Stanbury: I think Mr. McCombs' evidence has been extremely helpful, Madam Chairman. There are many aspects of the bill that others have questioned, but, as he said, I think he has probably covered the ones that are of the most concern. Perhaps we can leave it at that.

Mr. McCombs: If I may, I will say this before I go. The double criminality problem is the one that I would earnestly ask members of this committee to carefully consider. In addition, proposed section 420.17 presents a complicated problem. I appreciate that there are strong policy arguments the other way, but it will cause situations of extreme unfairness in the real world because it will allow the seizure of property that has nothing to do with the prosecution of the case. That is what is wrong with this provision. There are other ways to achieve the objective of taking property away from crooks besides marrying the seizure up to the particular criminal prosecution of the day.

Those are the two aspects of this bill to which I hope senators will give the most consideration.

The Chairman: We will keep your message in mind, Mr. McCombs.

Honourable senators, we shall proceed to deal with Bill C-145 this afternoon. Its sponsor, Senator Flynn, is here. We understand that this bill is uncomplicated. Mr. Stephens from the Department of Justice has appeared on very short notice this afternoon to assist the committee, and I thank him for doing so. Mr. Stephens, could you provide to the committee members the background to this bill?

Mr. David Stephens, Senior Counsel, Judicial Affairs, Department of Justice: Honourable senators, by way of background, the province of Quebec has adopted legislation integrating three inferior courts, the Provincial Court, the Court of the Sessions of the Peace and the Youth Court, into a new Court of Quebec. I might mention that these are three courts established by the province, whose judges are both appointed and paid by the province of Quebec. There are no federally established courts involved, nor are there any federally appointed judges involved. A number of federal statutes, how-importe la situation. On peut citer par exemple l'affaire jugée par suite de l'application de l'article 94 de la loi sur la circulation routière de la Colombie-Britannique. Dans cette affaire, la Colombie-Britannique avait adopté une loi selon laquelle une personne pouvait être accusée de conduite sans permis et être emprisonnée, même si elle ignorait que son permis avait été suspendu. La Cour suprême du Canada a décrété qu'une telle loi était anticonstitutionnelle, et je prétends qu'il y a aussi une possibilité d'injustice dans ce projet de loi.

Certaines autres de nos préoccupations ont été exprimées par M. Gold lorsqu'il a comparu devant le Comité de la Chambre, et les membres de ce comité-ci peuvent consulter ce témoignage. J'ai choisi, toutefois, au nom de l'Association, de traiter des questions que j'ai soulevées.

Honorables sénateurs, il se fait tard. Si vous avez d'autres questions à poser, j'essaierai d'y répondre. J'espère avoir été d'une quelconque utilité au comité.

Le sénateur Stanbury: Je pense, madame la présidente, que le témoignage de M. McCombs nous a été extrêmement utile. Certains se sont attaqués à bien d'autres aspects du projet de loi, mais comme M. McCombs le dit, je pense qu'il a probablement traité de ceux qui nous préoccupaient le plus. Nous pourrions peut-être en rester là.

M. McCombs: Si vous le permettez, j'ai encore quelque chose à ajouter avant de vous quitter. Je prierais les membres du comité de se pencher attentivement sur le problème de la double criminalité. En outre, l'article 420.17 proposé semble apporter une complication de plus. Je comprends qu'il y ait de forts arguments politiques en sa faveur, mais il créera beaucoup d'injustice lors des procès parce qu'il autorisera la confiscation de biens qui ne sont nullement liés aux poursuites. C'est ce que je reproche à cette disposition. Il y a d'autres façons de confisquer les biens obtenus criminellement au lieu de lier la confiscation à d'autres poursuites.

Ce sont là les deux aspects du projet de loi sur lesquels, je l'espère, les sénateurs se pencheront tout particulièrement.

La présidente: Nous n'oublierons pas votre recommandation, monsieur McCombs.

Honorables sénateurs, passons cet après-midi à l'étude du projet de loi C-45. Son parrain, le sénateur Flynn, est ici. Nous croyons savoir que le projet de loi n'est pas compliqué. Monsieur Stephens, du ministère de la Justice, a comparu presque sans préavis cet après-midi pour aider le comité et je l'en remercie. Monsieur Stephens, pourriez-vous situer le projet de loi pour le comité?

M. David Stephens, avocat général, Affaires judiciaires, ministère de la Justice: Honorables sénateurs, en guise d'information générale, la province de Québec a adopté une loi regroupant trois tribunaux d'instance inférieure à savoir, la Cour provinciale, la Cour des sessions de la paix et le Tribunal de la jeunesse, en un nouveau tribunal, la Cour du Québec. Je souligne que ces trois cours sont de juridiction provinciale et que leurs juges sont nommés et rémunérés par la province de Québec. Aucun tribunal fédéral ni aucun juge nommé par le gouvernement fédéral n'est concerné. Néanmoins, un certain ever, refer by name to the courts that are affected by this reorganization.

The purpose of this bill, then, is to amend those statutes to remove references to the existing courts and to replace those with references to the Court of Quebec. The amendments are set out in the schedule that forms the largest part of the bill. The balance of the provisions, which are few, indeed, are simply transitional or provide for the coming into force of the bill. That will likely be on a date to be agreed upon between the two governments.

The Chairman: Have you any questions, Senator Flynn?

Senator Flynn: No.

The Chairman: This bill seems to be extremely straightforward.

Senator Flynn: If senators read subclause 2(3) of the bill, they will know exactly what it does. If, for example, in a federal law, the Sessions of the Peace Court or the Youth Court or the Provincial Court is mentioned, this bill will cause the name to be replaced by the Court of Quebec. After the proclamation of this bill there will only be one court.

The Chairman: As far as we are concerned, there is nothing of substantive concern in here, then.

Senator Flynn: There is no principle involved. My understanding is that this bill is really for purposes of flexibility. The aim of the Quebec legislation is to allow the chief judge to distribute his judges between the three former jurisdictions or occupations more easily.

The Chairman: That seems to be straightforward. Honourable senators, shall we report this bill without amendment?

Hon. Senators: Agreed.

The Chairman: On behalf of the committee, I thank you very much for appearing this afternoon, Mr. Stephens.

nombre de lois fédérales mentionnent les cours qui sont touchées par cette réorganisation.

Le projet de loi a donc pour objet de modifier ces lois de manière à supprimer les renvois au nom des cours existantes et à les remplacer par l'appellation de Cour du Québec. Les modifications sont comprises dans l'annexe qui forme la majeure partie du projet de loi. Le reste des dispositions, qui sont peu nombreuses, n'ont qu'un caractère provisoire ou encore concernent le moment de l'entrée en vigueur du projet de loi. Il entrera probablement en vigueur à une date dont les deux gouvernements devront convenir.

La présidente: Avez-vous des questions, sénateur Flynn?

Le sénateur Flynn: Non.

La présidente: Ce projet de loi semble être tout ce qu'il y a de plus simple.

Le sénateur Flynn: Si les sénateurs lisent le paragraphe 2(3) du projet de loi, ils en comprendront exactement l'objet. Dans les cas où une loi fédérale renvoie à la Cour des sessions de la paix, au Tribunal de la jeunesse ou à la Cour provinciale, le projet de loi remplace ces noms par l'appellation Cour du Québec. Après la proclamation du projet de loi, il n'y aura plus qu'une seule cour.

La présidente: En ce qui nous concerne, il n'intervient ici aucune question de fond.

Le sénateur Flynn: Aucun principe n'est en cause. D'après ce que je comprends, le projet de loi vise simplement à assurer une plus grande flexibilité. La loi adoptée par le Québec a pour objet de permettre au juge en chef de répartir plus aisément ses juges entre les trois anciens tribunaux ou anciennes fonctions.

La présidente: Cela semble clair. Honorables sénateurs, ferons-nous rapport du projet de loi sans amendement?

Des voix: D'accord.

La présidente: Au nom du comité, je vous remercie beaucoup d'avoir comparu cet après-midi, monsieur Stephens.

Le comité poursuit à huis clos.

I considered the kind of matter we just discussed to be the moral equivalent of the ministerial use of executive jets. I thought there would be a list of who was registered and who was not for those quiet days in the House of Commons. All of a sudden, on such a day, a member would pop up and ask why the minister flew to Halifax on the afternoon of the 23rd when there was a commercial flight leaving an hour earlier. But that is a rhetorical question in the circumstance. That is what I think we are building up here—just a whole legion of that sort of question. But, sir, with respect, I am not after that. If I had been working at this at an earlier date, I might have tried to document those kinds of issues. They are what I am calling administrative issues and will, I fear, be trouble for the government of the day, but they are not really part of an attempt to get the best functioning piece of law that we can.

The Chairman: On behalf of the committee, Mr. Daniels, I would like to thank you for your presentation. You have given us a few more items to think about in our consideration of the bill.

Honourable senators, we are pleased to have back with us this afternoon Mr. Frank Iacobucci, the Deputy Minister of the Department of Justice, to speak to us on Bill C-61. With him is Mr. Rick Mosley, whom we all know from our earlier consideration of this bill, and other officials of the department. I believe Mr. Iacobucci has an opening statement in which he will address some of the questions that have been raised by our previous witnesses.

Mr. Frank Iacobucci, Q.C., Deputy Minister, Department of Justice: Thank you, Madam Chairman. Honourable senators, I am pleased to have this opportunity to be with you and to address the issues that have been examined by this committee in relation to a fundamentally important initiative in the area of the administration of criminal justice in our country. At the outset I would like to acknowledge the presence of Rick Mosley and John McIsaac, colleagues of mines in the Department of Justice who have worked quite hard on this initiative.

Honourable senators, the present ability of offenders to enjoy the fruits of their crimes not only frustrates the deterrent aspect of sentencing but also weakens the public confidence in the Canadian system of criminal law enforcement. Existing powers of fine and imprisonment are rendered ineffective when an offender is entitled to enjoy the property accumulated through such activities as drug trafficking. This legislation is intended to be a balanced but effective initiative against criminals who are motivated by profit. In addition, this legislation, along with the Mutual Legal Assistance in Criminal Matters Act, previously Bill C-58, will fulfil Canada's commitments to the draft United Nations convention against illicit trafficking in narcotic drugs and psychotropic substances. Specifically, Article III of that draft convention, which is expected to be concluded this coming November, requires member countries to develop laws to forfeit the proceeds of drug trafficking offences and to provide for the pretrial seizure and restraint of tainted property. As you know, the means by which the government has chosen to meet those objectives has given rise to several concerns on the part of the defence bar to which I wish to respond this afternoon. Madam Chairman, I would be blème serait l'équivalent moral de l'utilisation des avions du gouvernement par un ministre. Vous savez bien, lorsqu'il ne se passe pas grand-chose à la Chambre des communes, il y a toujours un député pour demander pourquoi tel ou tel ministre a pris un avion du gouvernement pour se rendre à Halifax alors qu'il y avait un vol régulier une heure plus tôt. Je crains que nous ne nous retrouvions avec une foule de questions de cette nature. Quoi qu'il en soit, ce n'est pas ce qui me préoccupe. Il s'agit là de problèmes d'ordre administratif, qui placeront probablement certains gouvernements sur la sellette, mais ce n'est pas vraiment ce qui m'intéresse. Mon objectif est d'essayer d'obtenir le meilleur texte législatif possible.

La présidente: Au nom des membres du comité, je vous remercie beaucoup de votre témoignage, M. Daniels. Vous avez soulevé quelques questions très importantes, qui retiendront certainement notre attention.

Je vais maintenant accueillir M. Frank Iacobucci, sous-ministre de la Justice, qui va nous parler du projet de loi C-61. Il est accompagné de plusieurs collaborateurs de son ministère, notamment de M. Rick Mosley, avec qui nous avons déjà discuté de ce projet de loi. Si je ne me trompe, M. Iacobucci souhaite d'abord répondre à certaines des questions posées par des témoins précédents.

M. Frank Iacobucci, c.r., sous-ministre, ministère de la Justice: Merci, madame la présidente. Je suis très heureux d'avoir la possibilité de m'adresser à vous au sujet d'une initiative extrêmement importante du gouvernement en matière de justice pénale. Je tiens à souligner la présence à mes côtés de Rick Mosley et John McIsaac, du ministère de la Justice, qui ont beaucoup travaillé sur ce projet de loi.

Honorables sénateurs, le fait que les criminels aient actuellement la possibilité de jouir des fruits de leurs méfaits constitue non seulement une entrave à l'effet dissuasif des sentences, mais aussi un facteur d'affaiblissement de la confiance du public dans le système canadien de justice pénale. Le pouvoir d'imposer des amendes et des peines de prison perd de son efficacité si le contrevenant garde le droit de jouir des richesses accumulées par des activités telles que le trafic de drogues. Ce projet de loi est destiné à lutter, de manière juste mais efficace, contre les criminels motivés par le profit. Avec la Loi portant mise en œuvre des traités d'entraide juridique en matière criminelle, l'ancien projet de loi C-58, cette initiative reflète la volonté du Canada de respecter ses engagements à l'égard du projet de convention des Nations Unies contre le trafic illicite des drogues et des psychotropes. L'article III de cette Convention, qui devrait être adoptée au mois de novembre, demande aux pays membres d'adopter des lois permettant à leurs gouvernements de confisquer le produit des trafics de drogues et de saisir avant procès les biens acquis illégalement. Comme vous le savez, la solution retenue par le gouvernement pour atteindre ces objectifs a suscité de la part des avocats de la pleased to answer any questions that you or honourable senators may have after concluding my remarks.

The first topic on which I would like to make a few remarks is punishment before conviction. The submission has been made to this committee that Bill C-61 is fundamentally flawed on the ground that it purportedly punishes an individual before he or she is convicted. On that point, I would remind everyone that the Canadian system of criminal justice has long recognized that in appropriate circumstances the pretrial detention of an alleged offender is justified to ensure his attendance at trial. Surely the freedom of the individual cannot be placed on any plane lower than the enjoyment of the rights of property. It has been recognized in relation to the pre-trial's detention of an individual that these powers are clearly remedial rather than punitive to ensure the availability of property for forfeiture after conviction.

Dual criminality has been raised. This committee has heard evidence criticizing the lack of "dual criminality" requirements concerning the offences covered by the proposed legislation. In short, the complaint is that it is unfair, or perhaps unconstitutional, to criminalize the possession or laundering of assets that are derived from the conduct that Canadian law views as criminal, but it is not necessarily illegal in the country of origin. I gather you were provided with hypothetical examples of the Danish porn merchant and the Nevada gambler. In theory, they are at risk of criminal liability under the present law should they enter Canada with their profit. In reality, there is no record of any enforcement activity against such individuals.

The decision to criminalize the proceeds of activity that is recognized as criminal in Canada but not necessarily illegal in the country of origin, was taken when section 312 of the Criminal Code was amended in 1976. Prior to those amendments, it had been a crime since 1892 to be in the possession of property directly obtained by the commission of an act that if performed in Canada would constitute an indictable offence. So the principle of the approach being reflected in this legislation has a long history and, indeed, was recently confirmed when section 312 of the Criminal Code was amended in 1976.

I mention this background to the present proposal because I think it is worth noting the long history behind the provision and the fact that none of the witnesses before you were able to cite an actual case from that history with which to illustrate their arguments.

It is evident that Canada is entitled in the exercise of its sovereignty to declare that the possession of property obtained by certain means is illegal in this country, whether or not that is the case in its country of origin. There is no reason to believe, however, that the enforcement authorities in this country will concern themselves with the case of an individual who brings such property to this country unless the individual is or has been engaged in serious criminal activity warranting state intervention. Bill C-61 is aimed at the major crime profiteers. They have reason to fear its application—not the small-scale entrepreneur who has sold some pornography in Denmark.

défense diverses questions auxquelles je vais m'efforcer de répondre. Je serais ensuite très heureux de répondre aux autres questions des membres du comité, madame la présidente.

Le premier sujet que je souhaite aborder concerne le fait que ces criminels seraient punis avant d'être condamnés, comme certains témoins l'ont prétendu devant votre comité. Je dois rappeler à cet égard que le système canadien de justice pénale permet depuis longtemps, dans certaines circonstances, la détention préventive d'un contrevenant présumé pour garantir sa comparution devant le tribual. Il est certain que la liberté individuelle n'a pas moins d'importance que le droit à la propriété. On admet généralement que la détention préventive revêt un caractère correctif plutôt que punitif et vise à permettre la saisie des biens après déclaration de culpabilité.

Il a été question de la double criminalité. Le comité a entendu des témoignages de personnes qui se plaignaient de l'absence de dispositions dans le projet de loi concernant la double criminalité. En clair, on allègue qu'il est injuste et peut-être même anticonstitutionnel de criminaliser la possession ou le trafic de biens provenant d'activités jugées criminelles dans le droit canadien mais pas forcément illégales dans le pays d'origine. Je crois comprendre qu'on vous a donné pour exemple le cas hypothétique d'un marchand danois de pornographie ou d'un joueur du Nevada. En théorie, ces personnes sont passibles de poursuites au criminel, selon la loi actuelle, si elles introduisent au Canada les profits de leurs activités. En réalité, il ne semble pas que de telles poursuites aient jamais été intentées.

La décision de criminaliser la possession de produits d'une activité jugée criminelle au Canada, sans être forcément illégale dans le pays d'origine, a été prise à l'occasion de la modification en 1976 de l'article 312 du Code criminel. Or, depuis 1892, la possession de biens provenant directement d'une activité illégale au Canada était considérée comme un délit. On voit donc que le principe consacré dans le projet de loi jouit d'une longue histoire, que la modification de l'article 312 du Code criminel en 1976 ne faisait qu'entériner.

Je tenais à rappeler l'origine de la proposition parce qu'il n'est pas sans intérêt d'en connaître la longue histoire et parce qu'aucun des témoins ne s'en est servi pour étayer ses arguments.

De toute évidence, le Canada est parfaitement en droit d'exercer sa souveraineté en déclarant illégale la possession de biens obtenus par certains moyens, que ceux-ci soient jugés licites ou non dans le pays d'origine. On peut se demander, toutefois, si les autorités policières du Canada prendront la peine de rechercher les personnes qui introduisent ce genre de biens dans notre pays à moins qu'ils ne proviennent de crimes suffisamment graves pour mériter l'intervention de l'État. Le projet de loi C-61 s'attaque aux grands profiteurs du crime. Ceux-ci ont tout lieu de craindre l'application de la loi, con-

One of the objects of Bill C-61 is to ensure that Canada does not become a haven for foreign drug profits. A dual criminality requirement could weaken Canada's ability to achieve that object.

At the same time, the stability of certain drug-producing countries is of great concern. The United Nations International Narcotics Control Board in its 1986 report on the world drug situation as presented in the U.N. Chronicle of May 1987 stated:

> Illicit drug production and trafficking—"financed and masterminded by criminal organizations with international links and accomplices in financial circles"—are expanding. In many regions, these activities also have close ties to illegal weapons, trade, subversion and international terrorism. And vast sums of money generated by illicit trafficking are being laundered through legitimate enterprises.
> "This whole process undermines the economic and social order, spreads violence and corruption and imperils the very political stability and security of some countries" the Board affirms.

Several South American countries are waging an internal war against trafficking cartels. In that context, we cannot afford to impose a requirement in Canadian proceedings that the Crown must prove the state of the criminal law in the country of origin of the proceeds. It would be an impediment to effective enforcement of our domestic law, which is concerned with the possession of those proceeds in this country and not with the state of the law in their country of origin. In short, this law is aimed at discouraging people, whose proceeds come from illegal gains by Canadian standards, from bringing those proceeds to Canada.

During the testimony before this committee, I am also advised that several criticisms were directed towards the provision that forfeits the proceeds of crime as part of the post-conviction process. Here I am referring to clause 420.17. I would like to deal, Madam Chairman, with those criticisms sequentially.

The first criticism that has been levelled relates to proof on a balance of probabilities and pertains to subclause 420.17(1). First, the members of the defence bar testifying were concerned with the lowering of the standard of proof for property connected to the offence for which the offender was convicted and in expressing that concern referred to the Supreme Court of Canada decision in the Gardiner case.

This provision, which is reflected in the section I referred to, was drafted with the full implications of the Supreme Court's judgment in Gardiner in mind. In that case, the court spoke of the standards of proof required for sentencing hearings in the absence of any statutory direction as to the standard that ought to be applied. That is important. The Gardiner case dealt with a standard to be applied in the absence of any traitement aux petits entrepreneurs qui ont vendu un peu de pornographie au Danemark.

Le projet de loi C-61 a pour but notamment de faire en sorte que le Canada ne devienne pas un refuge pour les trafiquants étrangers de stupéfiants. Les dispositions de double criminalité pourraient compromettre la réalisation de cet objectif.

Par ailleurs, la stabilité de certains pays producteurs de drogues suscite de graves préoccupations. Voici un extrait du rapport de 1986 de l'Organe international de contrôle des stupéfiants des Nations unies faisant le bilan sur les drogues à l'échelle mondiale, que présente la Chronique de l'ONU de mai 1987:

> La production et le trafic illicites de stupéfiants «financés et dirigés par des organismes spécialisés dans le crime, s'appuyant sur des réseaux internationaux et pouvant compter sur des complices dans les milieux financiers, sont en pleine expansion. Dans bien des régions, ces activités sont intimement liées au trafic des armes, à la subversion et au terrorisme international. C'est ainsi que des sommes énormes provenant d'activités illégales sont blanchies par des entrepreneurs légitimes.
> Ces réseaux ont pour effet de saper l'ordre économique et social, de généraliser la violence et la corruption ainsi que de mettre en danger la stabilité politique et la sécurité de certains pays.

Plusieurs États sud-américains ont déclaré la guerre aux cartels de trafiquants à l'intérieur de leurs frontières. Nous serions donc mal venus d'exiger, dans la procédure canadienne, que la Couronne soit tenue de déterminer la nature du droit criminel dans le pays à l'origine des poursuites. Cette clause ne servirait qu'à nuire à l'application de la loi canadienne en ce qui a trait à la possession des produits du crime perpétré dans ce pays, indépendamment de ses lois. Bref, le projet de loi a pour but de décourager ceux qui tirent profit du crime d'introduire leurs recettes au Canada.

Il m'a été rapporté par ailleurs que plusieurs personnes se sont élevées, dans leur témoignage au comité, contre la disposition de confiscation des produits du crime après déclaration de culpabilité. Je pense ici à l'article 420.17. J'aimerais examiner une à une, madame la présidente, les critiques qui ont été formulées.

La première se rapporte à la preuve fondée sur la prépondérance des probabilités, et concerne le paragraphe 420.17(1). Tout d'abord, les membres du Barreau de la défense qui ont témoigné ont demandé l'assouplissement de la norme de preuve à l'égard des biens provenant d'un délit pour lequel le contrevenant a été déclaré coupable, en remettant en cause la décision de la Cour suprême du Canada dans l'affaire Gardiner.

Cette disposition du paragraphe 1 a été rédigée après analyse de toutes les implications du jugement de la Cour suprême dans l'affaire Gardiner. Dans ce procès, le tribunal a examiné les normes de preuve à appliquer dans les jugements en l'absence de directives légales. Ce fait est important. L'affaire Gardiner porte sur la norme à appliquer en l'absence de précisions dans la loi. Le Code criminel est muet à ce chapitre et les tribunaux de première instance ne s'entendent pas.

standard specified in the legislation. The Criminal Code was silent on the issue, and the lower courts were quite divided.

In those circumstances, the court held that the standard should be proof beyond a reasonable doubt. No standard was set forth. The standard chosen by the court was proof beyond a reasonable doubt. But when we look at this situation before us, given the difficulty of piercing the organized crime veil and establishing the sources of criminal profits, we believe that the courts will accept a reduction of the standard for these limited and exceptional purposes.

In support of this proposition we can point to the Australian and the U.S. proceeds of crime legislation which have lowered the standard of proof in this context as well. The Supreme Court of the United States has recently affirmed this lower standard in the case of McMillan v. Pennsylvania in relation to the imposition of a sentence for another exceptional case, the use of a firearm in the commission of a felony. Accordingly, Madam Chairman and honourable senators, I am confident that this provision will withstand strict scrutiny by the courts.

The next issue I should like to refer to deals with double trials, and this is covered in subclause 420.17(2). One of the witnesses before this committee complained that this provision created a mechanism for the forfeiture of property unrelated to the conviction that had been registered by the court. Specifically, the protections of a jury trial would not be available to the accused in relation to the possession of that property, and he or she would not know what case they had to meet at the forfeiture stage.

This provision was created to avoid a specific problem which has arisen in actual cases where, although the offender may have been implicated in one offence, such as drug trafficking, he alleges that the property in question was derived from some other enterprise offence. That evidence, as you can understand, may not be forthcoming from the accused until the sentencing stage of the proceedings, and the provisions of section 13 of the Charter, which is the provision dealing with self-incrimination, prevent the use of that testimony at any subsequent proceeding.

So in order to prevent the totally inappropriate return of the asset to the offender in these circumstances, this subclause 420.17(2) provides the court with the discretion—and I emphasize this—to order the property forfeited upon proof beyond a reasonable doubt that it is derived from the commission of one of the enumerated offences in this legislation. Again, it seems to me to be totally reasonable to have this provision in the law. It is not a hypothetical situation. I believe the case was in Manitoba where that kind of circumstance did arise.

The third point under this heading deals with additional penalties. Here I am referring to subclauses 420.17(3) and (4).

A submission was made that the present available penalties are sufficient and that there is no apparent purpose to the creation of these special fines in terms of imprisonment. In response, I would indicate that these provisions were created with a specific purpose in mind because they are directly La Cour a jugé que la norme devait équivaloir à une preuve hors de tout doute raisonnable. Aucune norme n'a été imposée, si ce n'est qu'elle devait correspondre à une preuve hors de tout doute raisonnable. Toutefois, dans le cas qui nous intéresse, nous estimons que les tribunaux accepteront d'abaisser la norme dans les rares cas qui leur seront présentés, en raison de la difficulté de faire la lumière sur la criminalité organisée et de préciser les sources des produits du crime.

À l'appui de cette proposition, nous pouvons nous tourner vers les lois pénales australiennes et américaines applicables aux produits de la criminalité, où la norme de preuve a également été abaissée pour les mêmes raisons. La Cour suprême des États-Unis a récemment eu recours à cette norme assouplie dans l'affaire McMillan contre la Pennsylvanie, en rapport avec l'imposition d'une peine dans une autre cause exceptionnelle, à savoir l'utilisation d'une arme à feu dans la perpétration d'un crime. C'est pourquoi, madame la présidente, mesdames et messieurs, je suis persuadé que cette disposition résistera à l'examen rigoureux des tribunaux.

La deuxième question que j'aimerais examiner est celle qui se rapporte aux doubles procès, dont il est question au paragraphe 420.17(2). Un témoin a déclaré devant le comité que cette disposition autoriserait la saisie de biens non liés à une déclaration de culpabilité. Plus précisément, l'accusé ne bénéficierait pas de la protection d'un procès avec jury en ce qui a trait à ces biens et ne saurait pas de quel procès relève la confiscation des biens.

Cette disposition vise à éviter un problème bien précis qui s'est déjà présenté, où le contrevenant incriminé dans une affaire a fait valoir que les biens en question étaient le produit d'un autre délit. Naturellement, ce n'est qu'au moment de la détermination de la peine que l'accusé peut procéder à cet aveu, alors que l'article 13 de la Charte, portant sur les témoignages incriminants, interdit l'utilisation de ces témoignages dans les poursuites subséquentes.

De manière à empêcher que les biens soient indûment restitués à l'accusé dans un cas comme celui-là, le paragraphe 420.17(2) accorde au tribunal le pouvoir discrétionnaire, j'insiste sur ce terme, d'ordonner la saisie des biens s'il est convaincu, hors de tout doute raisonnable, qu'il s'agit de produits de la criminalité. Il me semble tout à fait raisonnable de prévoir une telle disposition, d'autant plus que le cas s'est déjà présenté, notamment au Manitoba.

Passons maintenant à la question des sanctions supplémentaires. Je vous renvoie ici aux paragraphes 420.17(3) et (4).

Quelqu'un a fait valoir que les sanctions prévues actuellement sont suffisantes et que les amendes spéciales assorties de peines d'emprisonnement ne sont nullement justifiées. Je répondrai que ces dispositions ont un but bien précis et visent directement les produits de la crimnalité que le contrevenant a related to the dollar value of the proceeds of crime that have been intentionally placed by the offender beyond the reach of the court. These provisions were created to encourage offenders to make available their proceeds of crime to the court for the purpose of forfeiture. This is consistent with the fundamental principle of Bill C-61, that an offender should not be entitled to benefit from the fruits of his crime.

As paragraph 420.17(3)(c) indicates, an offender may have placed all of his illicit assets in an off-shore haven. Despite being sentenced to a lengthy term of imprisonment for the substantive offence of, say, drug trafficking, in the absence of a provision like this the offender could enjoy his illicit proceeds upon release, with impunity. This provision will encourage the offender to make arrangements for the return of the assets to Canada to enable the court to forfeit them. The discretion that is built into the operation of both the fine instead of forfeiture and the imprisonment in default of payment of fine will ensure that this extraordinary procedure will only be applied where the court finds that the offender is seeking to avoid the reach of the court's forfeiture authority.

If the court is of the opinion that the accused is trying to avoid the reach of forfeiture, then it will be up to the court to make a determination of fine instead of forfeiture or imprisonment in default of payment of the fine.

The next topic deals with the presumption of innocence. Concern has been expressed that this legislation has created a reversal of the onus of proof, and, thereby, has destroyed the fundamental principle of the criminal law, namely, the presumption of innocence. This onus relates to the review procedure under clause 420.14 and the relief from forfeiture procedures under clauses 420.21 and 420.22.

The criticism of the representatives of the Defence Bar was directed towards the use of the words "appears innocent," and it was suggested that this expression is unknown in the Canadian criminal context. However, Madam Chairman, I should like to point out to this committee that the expression has a long and honourable history in Canadian law and can be found in such federal statutes as the Fisheries Act and the Customs Act. In addition, the expression appears in almost identical form in the relief from forfeiture provisions of section 11 of the Narcotic Control Act. I should also point out that the British Columbia Court of Appeal recently found no constitutional or Charter infirmity with this wording in a fisheries prosecution case, the Milton case.

A spokesman from the Ottawa Defense Lawyers Association indicated that, if these new powers were given to the police, it would just be a matter of time before they were used against a petty shoplifter or a small-time drug dealer at the National Art Gallery. The intention of this bill is that it be used against the upper echelon offender and not against so-called street crime. For that specific reason, the legislation requires the intervention of the Attorney General before any of the pretrial processes, such as special warrants or restraint orders, can be exercised. This procedure will ensure that the new powers will be exercised only in appropriate cases.

délibérément placés hors de portée du tribunal. On cherchait ainsi à encourager les contrevenants à remettre les produits de leur crime à la disposition du tribunal aux fins de la saisie. Cela est tout à fait conforme au principe fondamental du projet de loi C-61, à savoir qu'un contrevenant ne devrait pas être autorisé à jouir du fruit de son crime.

Comme on peut le voir à l'alinéa 420.17(3)(c), le contrevenant pourrait bien avoir placé tous ses biens illicites dans un abri à l'étranger. Même s'il est condamné à une longue peine de prison, après avoir été trouvé coupable d'un délit grave, comme le trafic des stupéfiants, il pourrait en toute tranquillité, en l'absence de dispositions de ce genre, jouir de son bien après sa libération. Cet article encouragera le contrevenant à faire le nécessaire pour que les biens soient ramenés au Canada et saisis par le tribunal, car autrement il s'expose à une amende, si la saisie n'est pas possible, ou à une peine à défaut de paiement de l'amende. Cette mesure extraordinaire, laissée à la discrétion du tribunal, ne s'appliquera que si le tribunal juge que le contrevenant s'emploie à échapper à la saisie.

Si le tribunal estime que l'accusé cherche à se mettre à l'abri de la saisie, il pourra alors décider d'imposer une amende de la valeur du bien à confisquer ou une peine de prison à défaut du paiement de l'amende.

Je passe maintenant au sujet de la présomption d'innocence. Il a été soutenu que le projet de loi aurait pour effet d'inverser la charge de la preuve et, par conséquent, de détruire le principe fondamental du droit pénal, à savoir la présomption d'innocence. Il s'agit de la charge de la preuve dans la procédure de révision à l'article 420.14 et de l'exemption de la procédure de confiscation visée par les articles 420.21 et 420.22.

Les critiques formulées par les représentants du Barreau de la défense portaient sur l'utilisation des mots «semble innocente» qui, pour eux, n'existe nulle part ailleurs dans le droit pénal canadien. Madame la présidente, j'aimerais signaler au comité que cette expression a déjà acquis ses titres de noblesse par une longue histoire dans le droit canadien, puisqu'on la retrouve dans des textes fédéraux comme la Loi sur les pêcheries et la Loi sur les douanes. En outre, l'expression figure sous une forme pratiquement identique dans les dispositions d'exemption de saisie que comporte l'article 11 de la Loi sur les stupéfiants. Je signale enfin que la Cour d'appel de la Colombie-Britannique a jugé récemment dans un litige sur la pêche, l'affaire Milton, que cette expression n'était invalidée ni par la Constitution ni par la Charte.

Un porte-parole de l'Association des avocats de la défense d'Ottawa a déclaré que si ces nouveaux pouvoirs étaient accordés à la police, celle-ci ne tarderait pas à s'en servir contre les voleurs à l'étalage ou les petits revendeurs de drogue au Musée des beaux-arts. Pourtant, c'est bien le criminel d'envergure qui est visé par le projet de loi, et non les petits voyous du coin. C'est d'ailleurs la raison pour laquelle la loi exige l'intervention du procureur général avant que ne soit émis un mandat spécial ou une ordonnance de blocage. De cette façon, les nouveaux pouvoirs ne pourront être exercés que dans les cas qui le justifient.

On the other hand, if a major shoplifting ring has accumulated tens of thousands of dollars in assets from its activities, then it seems to me that there is no reason why this new law should not be applied in those circumstances. I see no legitimate reason why such offenders should be entitled to enjoy the fruits of their crime.

Madam Chairman, in closing, I would like to thank you again for this opportunity to respond to some of the comments that have been made concerning the legislation. It is a necessary and timely initiative that will complement the Canadian criminal justice system. It is a fair and effective response to the growth of enterprise crime. I will be pleased to answer any questions from you and members of the committee.

The Chairman: Thank you, Mr. Iacobucci.

Senator Stanbury: Mr. Iacobucci, as usual, we got a good contribution from you, which helps us with our consideration of the legislation we have before us. I think you have undoubtedly satisfied a number of the concerns of the members of the committee, but I am sure they will all speak on their own behalf.

In terms of the dual criminality question, the main issue that has concerned us is the fairness of seizing property which has arisen from illegal activities, wherever they might be. I am not sure that your answer completely gets rid of that concern.

Another concern is, if the proceeds of legal activities in another jurisdiction are to be found here and are to be seized here, what is our entitlement to those moneys or that property?

Mr. Iacobucci: Regarding the first question of the dual criminality, I pointed out in my comments that this is not a new principle, but that it is in the present Criminal Code.

Senator Stanbury: I appreciate that, but there has been some suggestion that that is contrary to the Charter.

Mr. Iacobucci: As I said, it is there and I am confident that this provision would satisfy Charter arguments that might be leveled against it. You have to look at the context of the conduct; it forms the mischief here. I referred to the no enforcement action against a Canadian who goes to Nevada and does the gambling thing and comes back, or the Danish porn merchant, but that is not what is going to be done.

These provisions, as you know, are very cumbersome. They are procedurally important and time consuming, and deliberately so because we are talking about liberty of the subject, property interests of the subject that are at risk and, indeed, the interests of perhaps third parties. They are very deliberately developed and elaborate, so that I do not see prosecutors using these provisions except in cases of importance.

Senator Stanbury: I should tell you, however, that members of this committee have developed a reaction to that kind of answer. We have seen it in several bills recently, where officials have come before us and said, "We know it is there, but we don't intend to enforce it."

En revanche, si un réseau important de vol à l'étalage a accumulé des dizaines de milliers de dollars grâce à ses activités, il me semble tout à fait logique de le soumettre à la nouvelle loi. Je ne vois pas pourquoi ces contrevenants devraient être autorisés à jouir du fruit de leurs crimes.

Pour terminer, madame la présidente, je tiens à vous remercier encore une fois de l'occasion qui m'a été donnée de répondre à certains des commentaires qui ont été présentés au sujet du projet de loi qui, à mon avis, vient à point nommé comme complément nécessaire du système de justice pénale au Canada. Il s'agit d'une mesure juste et efficace pour contrer la croissance de la criminalité organisée. Je me ferai maintenant un plaisir de répondre à vos questions et à celles des membres du comité.

La présidente: Merci, monsieur Iacobucci.

Le sénateur Stanbury: Monsieur Iacobucci, vous nous avez encore une fois apporté une aide précieuse pour l'examen du projet de loi qui nous a été confié. Vous avez incontestablement répondu à bon nombre des préoccupations des membres du comité, mais je suis sûr qu'ils vous le diront eux-mêmes.

Pour revenir à la question de la double criminalité, nous nous sommes surtout interrogés sur le bien-fondé de saisir des biens provenant d'activités illégales quelqu'en soit le lieu d'origine. Je ne suis pas sûr que votre réponse ait été concluante.

On s'est demandé en particulier de quel droit pourrait s'autoriser le Canada pour confisquer des produits d'activités illégales menées dans d'autres pays.

M. Iacobucci: Pour répondre à votre première question sur la double criminalité, rappelons encore une fois que ce principe n'est pas nouveau, qu'il existe déjà dans le Code criminel actuel.

Le sénateur Stanbury: D'accord, mais certains ont avancé qu'il était contraire à la Charte.

M. Iacobucci: Comme je l'ai dit, ce principe existe déjà et je suis convaincu que la disposition résistera aux arguments que l'on pourra avancer en invoquant la Charte. Il faut bien voir que c'est la gravité de la situation qui entraînera le recours à cette disposition. Celle-ci n'interviendra pas dans le cas d'un Canadien qui rapporte au Canada ce qu'il a gagné dans une séance de jeu au Nevada ni au marchand danois de pornographie.

La procédure, en effet, est trop lourde. Les formalités à remplir sont extrêmement astreignantes et onéreuses, à juste titre d'ailleurs puisque c'est la liberté et le bien de la personne qui sont en jeu, et peut-être même les intérêts de tiers. Ce n'est pas par hasard si cette procédure est si complexe: elle a pour but d'inciter les poursuivants à n'y avoir recours que dans des cas exceptionnels.

Le sénateur Stanbury: Je dois vous dire, toutefois, que les membres du comité en sont venus à se méfier de ce genre de réponse. Il est en effet arrivé plusieurs fois récemment, à l'occasion de notre étude de projets de loi, que des fonctionnaires tiennent des propos analogues: «Nous savons que la disposition existe, mais nous n'avons pas l'intention de l'appliquer.»

[Text]

The law does not say that you can do that. The Supreme Court does not believe in our passing pieces of legislation that say, "Trust me. We won't do it even though it is there."

Mr. Iacobucci: I do not mean this in anything but a respectful way. I agree with that philosophy that you have developed. If that were the only reason, then I would have concerns, but there are other reasons why I do not think that the dual criminality rule is appropriate.

We have to be concerned about what we are trying to do for our country. We are trying to discourage people from coming here who are, by our standards, engaged in criminal activity by bringing their proceeds to this country. I do not think it is something we want to encourage by way of newcomers to our country or, indeed, transients to our country. It is something that we want to discourage.

If we were to have a dual criminality rule—and I do not want to get involved in specifics here because that would be inappropriate—I believe there would be pressure on a number of countries, where the drug trafficking business is very powerful, to have laws passed that might be rather neutral with respect to drug dissemination and distribution such that a dual criminality rule could work against us. In fact, you would find that the people involved in this business were highly sophisticated and highly powerful. There could be pressures brought to pass legislation to make it a legal activity or to withdraw its illegal status. We would then be in a situation where we would be in effect caught by a rule that would be working against us, to the detriment to the administration of criminal justice.

Senator Stanbury: I am sure you realize that we are with you in terms of the objective. Our main concern the strong emotional pull of doing the things that you are trying to do with this bill. We would not allow that strong emotional pull to taint—you used the words "tainted property;" I guess that is as good a word as any—our judicial system of justice by talking ourselves into applying greater legal strictures, and so on, than are necessary. That is why I think we question all of these things.

I am delighted to have your answer, because it helps to explain to us what justifies it, but it seems that there are a number of small matters that could be easily remedied. They do not appear to be significant in the scheme of legislation.

One is that the bill provides that a copy of the report identifying the property seized and the location where it is being detained will be given on request to the person from whom it is seized. Why is it not simply left on the property? Why do they have to go and request it? At this point no one is guilty, it is all suspicion. This is found in paragraph 420.12(4)(c). It simply looks like an addition to the bureaucratic jungle to have to request a copy of what is being seized.

The Chairman: And apparently that is not required in similar circumstances with other types of warrants or authorities. I think that was the point that was made by our witness, was it not?

La loi ne donne pas de directives précises. La Cour suprême nous demande de ne pas adopter de lois qui reposent uniquement sur une entente implicite.

M. Iacobucci: Je suis entièrement d'accord avec vous sur le principe que vous évoquez, mais il y a d'autres facteurs qui entrent en ligne de compte et qui expliquent pourquoi, à mon avis, la double criminalité est injustifiée.

Il est important de se préoccuper de l'évolution de notre pays. Nous essayons de décourager les gens qui se livrent à des activités jugées criminelles au Canada de venir s'installer ici, de venir y investir les produits de leurs crimes. Je ne crois pas que notre société soit intéressée à accueillir ce genre d'individus, à titre d'immigrants ou autres. C'est quelque chose que nous ne voulons pas encourager.

Si nous devions adopter ce régime de la double criminalité—et je vous fais grâce de détails que vous trouveriez impertinents—je crains fort que nous ayons à subir les pressions de plusieurs pays où les trafiquants de stupéfiants sont très puissants pour que nous adoptions des lois plutôt laxistes en matière de distribution de drogues afin que le régime de la double criminalité joue contre nous. À vrai dire, ceux qui étaient engagés dans de genre d'activités étaient extrêmement raffinés et puissants. Ils pourraient exercer des pressions pour faire adopter des lois destinées à légaliser leurs activités ou, du moins, à supprimer leur illégalité. Nous pourrions alors nous retrouver prisonniers de règlements contraires à nos intérêts et à ceux de la justice pénale.

Le sénateur Stanbury: Vous vous rendez compte, naturellement, que nous appuyons de tout coeur cet objectif. Ce qui nous inquiète, c'est l'émotivité que vous semblez introduire dans ce projet de loi. Nous voulons justement éviter d'entacher—pour paraphraser une expression que vous avez utilisée à propos des biens—notre système judiciaire par des mesures légales indûment astreignantes. C'est pourquoi nous nous voyons contraints de remettre certaines choses en question.

Je suis très satisfait de votre réponse, car elle nous aide à mieux comprendre ce qui motive ces dispositions qui, à bien des égards, se rapportent à des problèmes relativement mineurs, que l'on pourrait facilement régler autrement. Ils demeurent accessoires par rapport aux visées du projet de loi.

C'est ainsi, par exemple, que selon le libellé du projet de loi, un exemplaire du rapport comportant la désignation des biens saisis et indiquant le lieu où ils se trouvent doit être remis au saisi sur demande. La liste des biens confisqués ne devrait-elle pas être établie d'office? Pourquoi faut-il en faire la demande expresse? À cette étape de la procédure, personne n'a encore été déclaré coupable. Il n'y a que des suspects. Cette disposition se trouve à l'alinéa 420.12(4)c). N'a-t-elle pas pour effet de compliquer encore les tracasseries administratives, en obligeant l'intéressé à demander un exemplaire de la liste des objets saisis?

La présidente: D'ailleurs, il ne semble pas que cette exigence accompagne les autres types d'ordonnance ou de mandats. N'est-ce pas là l'argument qu'a présenté notre témoin?

[Text]

Senator Stanbury: I think so.

Mr. Iacobucci: Before I answer that, I neglected to answer the second part of the question that you raised with respect to dual criminality, namely, the issue of property. For example, if action is taken with respect to foreign property and proceeds, who gets the benefit of that forfeiture?

The law provides that the prosecuting authority does. For example, if the federal government were prosecuting under the Narcotic Control Act, then it would be a federal prosecution and forfeiture would go to the Consolidated Revenue Fund of the federal government; if it were done by the provincial Attorney General, then it would be done—

Senator Stanbury: It is a bit of a contest.

Mr. Iacobucci: This was recognized by the federal-provincial officials and governments concerned. Ministers were quite content. It is really not changing the nature of it. In other words, there is no race to prosecution. We will not, because of this legislation, suddenly be invading areas of prosecution that we have not prosecuted before.

With respect to the copy of the executing officer's report not being provided automatically to persons whose property is seized, in Working Paper No. 30 of the government, called "Police Powers Re Search and Seizure and Criminal Law Enforcement", in 1983, the Law Reform Commission of Canada recognized that there might be situations where an individual does not require, and perhaps does not want, an inventory after the execution of a search warrant under section 443 of the Criminal Code. For these reasons the inventory needed only to be provided on request. This provision is consistent with the recommendation of the Law Reform Commission in that respect.

Senator Stanbury: I guess that is the answer.

Mr. Iacobucci: We basically followed what they had said.

Senator Stanbury: However, I do not see it as a satisfactory answer; but that is a matter of judgment, I guess.

You have explained that the legislation is not intended to cover the simple shoplifter, and so on, but why is it not expressed as not including theft under $1,000, for instance? Why does it include things like a common bawdyhouse, but not criminal interest rates?

Mr. Iacobucci: As I mentioned in my remarks, although it is not aimed at the small shoplifter, theoretically you could have a situation where there would be—and I am not saying that this would happen—a shoplifting ring. Each offence by itself is nothing, but if you look at it on a cumulative basis you might say, "Wait a minute. Something is going on here."

Senator Stanbury: But your main defence to that is that the Attorney General has to be involved.

Mr. Iacobucci: That is right. The second thing is that the Attorney General is directly involved. We are taking it to that level of accountability because we do not want to encourage

Le sénateur Stanbury: Oui, je pense.

M. Iacobucci: J'y reviendrai, mais je voudrais tout d'abord répondre à la deuxième partie de votre question sur la double criminalité, concernant la propriété des biens. Vous vous êtes interrogé sur le sort des biens saisis.

La loi prévoit que les biens reviennent aux autorités à l'origine des poursuites. Par exemple, si le gouvernement fédéral intente une poursuite en application de la Loi sur les stupéfiants, le montant de la saisie est versé au Fonds du revenu consolidé du gouvernement fédéral. Si l'action en justice est entreprise par un procureur général provincial, c'est alors la province . . .

Le sénateur Stanbury: Cela ressemble un peu à une compétition.

M. Iacobucci: Les autorités provinciales et fédérales se sont entendues sur ce point. Les ministres se sont montrés très satisfaits. L'enjeu n'a rien de fondamental. Personne n'est intéressé à se faire concurrence pour intenter des poursuites. Autrement dit, cette loi n'aura pas pour effet d'inciter qui que ce soit à s'immiscer dans un nouveau domaine des poursuites.

Pour ce qui est de l'exemplaire du rapport des agents d'exécution qui n'est pas remis d'office au saisi, la Commission de réforme du droit du Canada a déjà reconnu, dans son document du travail n° 30 de 1983 sur les pouvoirs de la police en matière de perquisition et de saisie et sur l'application du droit pénal, que dans certaines situations l'intéressé n'a pas besoin, et n'a peut-être même pas le désir, d'obtenir la liste des biens saisis au moyen d'un mandat de perquisition délivré en application de l'article 443 du Code criminel. C'est pourquoi la liste n'est fournie que sur demande. Cette mesure est conforme à la recommandation de la Commission de réforme du droit.

Le sénateur Stanbury: Cela répond effectivement à ma question.

M. Iacobucci: Nous nous sommes contentés de donner suite à la recommandation de la Commission.

Le sénateur Stanbury: Je ne suis cependant pas entièrement satisfait, mais c'est là une question de jugement, je suppose.

Vous avez expliqué que le projet de loi ne vise pas les petits voleurs à l'étalage. Alors pourquoi ne pas préciser que les vols de moins de 1 000 $, par exemple, ne relèvent pas de cet article? Pourquoi les maisons de prostitution sont-elles touchées alors que les taux d'intérêt usuraires ne sont pas inclus?

M. Iacobucci: Comme je l'ai déjà fait remarquer, même si la loi ne s'intéresse pas directement aux petits voleurs à l'étalage, il pourrait arriver théoriquement qu'un réseau organisé de vol à l'étalage exige une intervention. Dans ce cas, chacun des vols pourrait demeurer minime, mais le tout pourrait prendre des proportions inquiétantes sur le plan global.

Le sénateur Stanbury: Vous vous êtes défendu en disant que le procureur général doit intervenir.

M. Iacobucci: C'est exact. Le procureur général doit même intervenir directement. Nous avons prévu une intervention à ce niveau tout simplement pour éviter les poursuites dans des prosecutors to go off on small items, it is as simple as that. But we want to have the capacity. We do not know how criminal activity is arranged to try to get around these provisions, and we have to be careful of that.

Senator Stanbury: I am not sure whether I should stop there and let someone else go on, or shall I keep going for a while?

The Chairman: Yes.

Senator Stanbury: I am covering issues that were raised by the evidence, as you are aware, and I thought we should be sure that we have answers to them.

Next is the forfeiture of proceeds of crime for offences other than the present offence of conviction—and you have dealt with that to some extent. I think you have given us the rationale for it, but why shouldn't people charged with individual crimes, if found guilty, then have forfeiture required for the particular crime, rather than trying later to tack it on, without any proper procedure, to another crime they have been found guilty of?

Mr. Iacobucci: There was a case in Manitoba. Perhaps Mr. Mosley might give you the example of how that arose, and how it shows itself as being a case where the accused can play a bit of a game with enforcement authorities.

Mr. Richard G. Mosley, Senior General Counsel, Criminal and Family Law Policy Directorate: Yes. The case in question concerned a gentleman by the name of Medd and an application for restoration of moneys which had been seized on the basis that they were the proceeds of drug trafficking offences. In the course of the proceedings, Mr. Medd surprised the court and everyone concerned in the case by alleging that the proceeds in question had been obtained by the commission of another offence equally criminal but quite separate and apart from the case before the court.

The difficulty in those circumstances is that the evidence might clearly point to the origin of the property in question but there is no offence with which to charge the individual, and his own evidence cannot be used against him in subsequent proceedings for possession or, perhaps, for laundering of those proceeds. The only point of intersection between the criminal justice system and the proceeds would be that case which is before the court and in which the court has arrived at a finding, on proof beyond a reasonable doubt, that the individual is guilty of the commission of a criminal offence, and then further, during the sentencing proceedings, that beyond a reasonable doubt that property has been obtained by the commission of an enterprise crime or a designated drug offence.

Senator Stanbury: The circumstances under which an accused would actually confess that the proceeds were those of another crime sound to me to be quite unusual.

Mr. Mosley: I suggest, senator, that this sort of admission is not at all unusual and that, if this provision were not in the bill, that type of evidence from the accused would be encouraged. It is not unusual for an individual who is engaged in one form of criminal activity to be engaged in others. Prostitution, loan sharking, gaming offences and drug trafficking often go hand in hand. If the prosecution is based on the affaires sans importance. Mais il importe d'avoir la possibilité d'intervenir en cas de nécessité. Il est impossible de prévoir de quelle manière se déroulera l'activité criminelle, de sorte qu'il convient d'être prudent.

Le sénateur Stanbury: Je ne sais pas si mon temps est écoulé. Dois-je céder la parole à quelqu'un d'autre ou puis-je poursuivre encore un peu?

La présidente: Vous pouvez poursuivre.

Le sénateur Stanbury: J'examine les questions soulevées par nos témoins, comme vous pouvez vous en rendre compte, et il me semble important de trouver des réponses.

Passons maintenant à la confiscation des produits d'un crime autre que celui pour lequel l'accusé a été déclaré coupable. Vous avez déjà traité ce point et expliqué le bien-fondé de cette mesure, mais pourquoi ne pourrait-on pas poursuivre quelqu'un pour le crime qu'il a commis et, sur déclaration de culpabilité, confisquer les biens issus de ce crime plutôt que de procéder à des saisies sans poursuite en bonne et due forme?

M. Iacobucci: Nous nous sommes inspirés d'une affaire qui s'est déclarée au Manitoba. M. Mosley pourrait peut-être vous exposer les détails et montrer comment un accusé peut parfois se jouer des autorités.

M. Richard G. Mosley, avocat général principal, Sous-direction de la politique en matière de droit pénal et familial: Oui. L'affaire concerne un individu du nom de Medd qui avait demandé que lui soient restituées des sommes d'argent saisies parce qu'il s'agissait des produits d'un trafic de stupéfiants. Pendant le procès, M. Medd a pris le tribunal et tous les intervenants au dépourvu en faisant valoir que les produits en question provenaient de la perpétration d'un autre délit, également criminel, mais totalement distinct de celui faisant l'objet des poursuites.

Comme dans ce cas, il arrive qu'on connaisse avec certitude l'origine des biens en cause sans toutefois pouvoir accuser le prévenu d'un délit bien précis, faute de preuve, et sans pouvoir utiliser ses propres témoignages contre lui dans des poursuites subséquentes pour la possession ou pour le recyclage de ces produits. Le seul moment où le système de justice pénale peut exercer sa compétence, c'est celui de l'affaire en instance au cours de laquelle le tribunal en est arrivé à la conclusion, hors de toute doute raisonnable, que le prévenu est coupable d'un délit criminel et que les biens saisis sont le fruit de la criminalité organisée ou d'un trafic de stupéfiants au sens de la loi.

Le sénateur Stanbury: Ce cas où un accusé avoue lui-même que les produits proviennent d'un autre crime m'apparaît tout à fait exceptionnel.

M. Mosley: Je dirais, sénateur, que ce genre d'aveu est au contraire tout à fait courant et qu'il serait même encouragé si la loi ne contenait pas de dispositions destinées à contrer les abus. Il n'est pas rare qu'un individu se livre à de nombreuses activités criminelles différentes. La prostitution, les taux d'intérêt usuraires, les tripots et le trafic des stupéfiants vont souvent de pair. Si les poursuites sont intentées au titre du tra-source of the funds being from drug trafficking and the accused at the end of the day says, "That's all well and good, but I obtained this money from prostitution- related offences," the court would be powerless to deal with the property.

Mr. Iacobucci: He would be powerless because section 13 of our Charter provides, and quite rightly and appropriately so, for a rule against self-incrimination. The evidence he gives in that proceeding cannot be used against him for the conviction of the offence that he says he got it from. So, if we did not include this provision in the bill, then the criminal would have quite a clever avoidance technique by which to get around the forfeiture provision in the first case and the trial for the conviction of another offence in a second case.

Senator Stanbury: My next question has to do with applications for special warrants and restraining orders. There is no provision for the disclosure of previous applications to other judges who have turned down an application; there is no disclosure of the withdrawal of an application for other reasons, either. Is there any reason why we should not have provisions similar to those in the wiretap sections of the Criminal Code or the telewarrant section?

Mr. Iacobucci: The powers that were created under this bill were intended to reflect or mirror the present section 443 of the Criminal Code search warrant provisions. We tried to follow them as closely as possible. Indeed, all of the property that may be seized under this special search warrant procedure is seizable under section 443 of the Criminal Code as evidence. However, since section 443 of the code does not require notification of previous applications, these new provisions do not include a requirement for such disclosure in the application.

In the context of the review of all criminal search and seizure powers, which is part of an ongoing project of the Law Reform Commission on the criminal procedure, consideration is being given to the adoption of such a requirement. There is no evidence to suggest, however, that repeat applications or "judge shopping" is a problem at this time. I do caution and point out to senators that we are looking at this across the spectrum of other provisions. At this stage, however, we are following what is presently contained in section 443 of the Criminal Code.

Senator Stanbury: There is concern about the possibility of a peace officer's being convinced that everything a person owns comes from the proceeds of crime, and seizing everything, even though some of the things he seizes are not items mentioned in the warrant.

Mr. Iacobucci: First, senator, these extraordinary procedures are all under the aegis of the court, so that for orders to be made and for forfeiture to be made there is an appearance before a judicial body. That is the most important point to remember, in my view.

Let me also point out that the provisions of section 445 of the Criminal Code entitle a peace officer executing a section 443 search warrant to seize anything that on reasonable grounds he believes has been obtained or has been used in the commission of an offence. That section 445 is the statutory form of a seizure power that is recognized at common law—in fic de stupéfiants et que l'accusé finit par déclarer que son argent provient de la prostitution, le tribunal a les mains liées.

M. Iacobucci: Le tribunal est alors impuissant en raison de l'article 13 de la Charte qui prévoit, à juste titre d'ailleurs, une protection contre les témoignages incriminants. Les preuves communiquées par l'accusé au cours d'un procès ne peuvent être utilisées contre lui dans une autre poursuite. Nous avons donc inclus ces dispositions dans le projet de loi pour éviter d'inciter les criminels à avoir recours à cette technique habile pour se soustraire aux saisies dans l'affaire en cours et échapper à d'autres poursuites.

Le sénateur Stanbury: Voici maintenant une question sur les demandes de mandats spéciaux et d'ordonnance de blocage. La divulgation des demandes antérieures présentées à d'autres juges les ayant refusées n'est pas exigée. Les retraits de demande pour d'autres raisons ne sont pas non plus divulgués. Pourquoi n'a-t-on pas introduit des dispositions semblables à celles des articles du Code criminel sur les tables d'écoute ou les télémandats?

M. Iacobucci: On cherchait à faire en sorte que les pouvoirs définis dans ce projet de loi reflètent ceux que contient l'article 443 du Code criminel sur les mandats de perquisition. Nous avons tenté de les assortir du mieux possible. Du reste, tous les biens qui peuvent être saisis dans l'exécution du mandat spécial de perquisition pourraient l'être également, à titre d'éléments de preuve, en application de l'article 443 du Code criminel. Toutefois, étant donné que l'article 443 du code n'exige pas la notification des demandes antérieures, les nouvelles dispositions ne l'exigent pas non plus.

Dans le cadre de l'examen de tous les pouvoirs en matière de perquisition et de saisie, qui constituent un projet permanent de la Commission de réforme du droit sur la procédure pénale, cette exigence est à l'étude. Il faut dire, cependant, que le problème des demandes répétées ou du «magasinage des juges» ne semble pas se poser pour l'instant. Je tiens malgré tout à signaler aux sénateurs que nous étudions cette question dans une optique globale. En attendant, nous avons voulu nous conformer aux dispositions actuelles de l'article 443 du Code criminel.

Le sénateur Stanbury: On craint la possibilité qu'un agent de la paix soit convaincu que tout ce que possède une personne est le produit de la criminalité et qu'il décide de tout saisir, y compris des objets non mentionnés dans le mandat.

M. Iacobucci: Tout d'abord, monsieur le sénateur, seul le tribunal a compétence pour demander cette procédure, de sorte que les ordonnances et les saisies supposent au préalable une comparution devant un comité judiciaire. C'est là, à mon avis, un point important.

Permettez-moi d'ajouter que les dispositions de l'article 445 du Code criminel autorisent un agent de la paix chargé d'exécuter un mandat de perquisition en application de l'article 443 à saisir tout ce qui, raisonnablement, a pu être obtenu ou utilisé dans la commission de l'infraction. Cet article 445 définit des pouvoirs de saisie reconnus en common law—c'est-à-dire other words, without the development of a statute—and which is known as the so-called "plain view" doctrine, a doctrine in the American jurisprudence. Since the special search warrant was created on the model of an ordinary Criminal Code search warrant, it is consistent to allow for the seizure of other property which on reasonable grounds is forfeitable under the new legislation.

I referred a moment ago to the working paper 30 of the Law Reform Commission of Canada. In that paper, the Law Reform Commission described this type of seizure power as a valuable one and went on to endorse its incorporation into Canadian law. In addition, the House of Commons committee examining Bill C-61 recognized that the requirement that another warrant be obtained in these circumstances was entirely unrealistic, given the present ability of such proceeds as cash to disappear in a matter of a few minutes.

By way of final comment, I must point out that this "plain view" doctrine of seizing anything which on reasonable grounds the officer believes has been obtained by or used in the commission of offence has received judicial approval as not offending the Charter in a judgment rendered by Mr. Justice Martin in 1984. Mr. Justice Martin is one of the most distinguished criminal law experts and jurists in our country. Therefore, it has been approved from the point of view of the Charter, as well.

Senator Stanbury: Another point which has disturbed people is the undertaking by the Attorney General as to damages and costs and how those are defined. Since we now have the Nelles case and the absolute immunity of the Attorney General from actions for malicious prosecution, how does this all work to protect the interests of the innocent, or, at least, the acquitted?

Mr. Iacobucci: I would not want to make any connection between what I am about to say and the Nelles matter—that is not for me to comment upon, obviously—but I would say that the judge who hears this application for a special search warrant or restraint order will be entitled to require the Attorney General to provide an undertaking that is considered "appropriate according to all the circumstances". This wording is intentionally broad so as to enable the judge to tailor the undertaking to the circumstances of a case, and I would suggest that it will vary depending on the nature of the property that is the subject matter of the request for seizure or restraint. That will obviously be an important consideration. The execution of the warrant or the order is viewed as a continuing event as opposed to an instantaneous one, and therefore could provide for compensation for loss of business income. If an asset were crucial to a business, it would not be just the asset itself, but it could be the business income that flowed from the use of that asset, if it were connected to a business. I suggest that damages from loss of personal reputation could be compensable as a result of the undertaking. So this was not a matter of not being able to define properly; it was a matter of being deliberate, and determining that this was something that ought to be left to the judge and the circumstances of a particular case, and, therefore, not left to legislation to try to anticipate indépendamment de toute loi—ce qui dans la jurisprudence américaine s'appelle le principe de ce qui est «bien en vue». Étant donné que le mandat spécial de perquisition est inspiré du mandat de perquisition ordinaire prévu dans le Code criminel, il est logique de permettre la saisie des autres biens qui, pour des motifs raisonnables, apparaissent saisissables aux termes de la nouvelle loi.

Je mentionnais tout à l'heure le document de travail 30 de la Commission de réforme du droit du Canada. Dans ce document, la Commission confirme le bien-fondé du pouvoir de saisie et approuve son introduction dans le droit canadien. Par ailleurs, le comité de la Chambre des communes chargé d'examiner le projet de loi C-61 a reconnu qu'il était tout à fait irréaliste d'exiger la délivrance d'un autre mandat dans un cas de ce genre, étant donné qu'il suffit de quelques minutes pour faire disparaître des sommes d'argent.

Enfin, je dois signaler que cette doctrine de ce qui est «bien en vue» autorisant la saisie de tous les objets que, pour des motifs raisonnables, l'agent estime qu'ils ont été obtenus ou utilisés dans la commission d'une infraction, n'a pas été jugée contraire à la Charte dans une décision rendue par le juge Martin en 1984. M. Martin est l'un de nos plus grands spécialistes du droit pénal et est un éminent juriste de notre pays. Par conséquent, cette doctrine se trouve sanctionnée par la Charte elle-même.

Le sénateur Stanbury: Plusieurs personnes ont été troublées également par la question de l'engagement du procureur général à l'égard du paiement des dommages et des frais que peut entraîner un mandat. À la lumière de l'affaire Nelles et de la protection absolue du procureur général contre les poursuites abusives, comment peut-on assurer la défense des intérêts de l'innocent ou, du moins, de la personne acquittée?

M. Iacobucci: Je ne voudrais en aucune façon que mes paroles soient interprétées comme un jugement sur l'affaire Nelles—qui de toute évidence n'est pas de mon ressort—mais je dirais que le juge chargé d'examiner une demande de mandat spécial de perquisition ou d'ordonnance de blocage est habilité à exiger que le procureur général «prenne les engagements qu'il estime indiqués». La formulation a été choisie aussi générale que possible pour permettre au juge de définir les engagements en fonction de l'affaire. Ceux-ci, à mon avis, devraient varier selon la nature des biens faisant l'objet de la demande de saisie ou de blocage. Voilà un élément qui m'apparaît important. L'exécution du mandat ou de l'ordonnance n'est pas une opération ponctuelle, mais s'échelonne sur une période de temps, de sorte qu'on pourrait prévoir des indemnités en cas de perte de revenus d'entreprise. Au demeurant, si un bien est essentiel à l'exploitation d'une entreprise, c'est l'ensemble des revenus de l'entreprise qui se trouve en jeu. À mon avis, les indemnités pour pertes découlant d'une atteinte à la réputation pourraient être prévues dans le cadre des engagements. Ce n'est pas un problème de définition. Il s'agit de donner au juge la possibilité d'adapter les mesures à prendre en fonction de chaque cas particulier, plutôt que d'essayer de prévoir dans la loi tous les cas susceptibles de se présenter.

in advance all of the circumstances that could arise in a particular set of facts.

I suspect what will happen is that we will see some guidance, as courts have done in other areas where there is wording that tends to be general, and there will be principles developed as to how it should be interpreted over time.

Senator Stanbury: We get objections from courts when we leave things too general and depend on them to guide us, and this is one area where it seems to me that we are not giving them very much guidance. Unfortunately, Madam Chairman, I have to run because I have an appointment in Toronto and I have a plane to catch. I do not want to shorten the discussion, and I certainly hope that others can pick it up.

The Attorney General may make copies of documents before returning them, and it is thought that there may well be a Charter implication in that. What is the rationale for the necessity of that, especially if the person has been acquitted?

Mr. Iacobucci: You are referring now to clause 420.26?

Senator Stanbury: That is right. Yes.

Mr. Iacobucci: That clause is similar to subsections 446.13 and 14 that were enacted in 1985 together with related amendments that were intended to encourage the return of property seized by the police to the true owners pending the disposition of any charges respecting the property. Included in that property may be documents having evidentiary value, and the proceedings may be lost as a consequence of the order returning them to the applicant.

So to overcome the natural reluctance which the court and the prosecution may have to lose that evidence, these provisions make allowance for copying it and for the admissibility of the copies as a statutory exception to the "best evidence" rule, which provides that you should keep the actual thing as evidence; but rather than tie up the actual thing for the process of the trial and so on, we have determined that the courts are reluctant to let property go. It is not unknown to keep property that is the subject of criminal charges tied up for a long time.

So we have put in a provision to say that copies can be made and those copies are admissible as a statutory exception to that evidence rule, but the provisions are not intended to give the prosecution any kind of advantage over the defence. Indeed, the documents and questions may be ordered returned to a third party who has no direct involvement in the criminal proceedings but might otherwise have to wait until the trial is over to recover the property. Again, this is an example of trying to balance the interests of the administration of justice with the interests of parties affected by those proceedings.

Senator Stanbury: Others may want to follow up on this. I personally would like to thank Mr. Iacobucci, because I think when we have an opportunity to reread his evidence and put it against the problems that we have had with the legislation, it

En réalité, nous verrons sans doute les choses se préciser peu à peu, à mesure que les tribunaux donneront des interprétations, comme ils l'ont fait dans d'autres domaines où les textes de loi sont d'ordre général.

Le sénateur Stanbury: Nous essuyons les critiques des tribunaux lorsque nous nous contentons de libellés trop généraux et que nous comptons sur eux pour nous guider. Voilà justement un domaine où il me semble que nous demeurons un peu trop vagues. Malheureusement, madame la présidente, je dois m'empresser de partir pour me rendre à un rendez-vous à Toronto. Je ne voudrais pas interrompre le débat, mais j'ai un avion à prendre. J'espère que les autres pourront prendre la relève.

Le procureur général est autorisé à faire des copies des documents avant de les restituer, ce qui pourrait être contraire aux dispositions de la Charte. Quelles sont les raisons qui justifient cette prérogative, en particulier si la personne a été acquittée?

M. Iacobucci: Vous faites allusion maintenant à l'article 420.26?

Le sénateur Stanbury: C'est exact, oui.

M. Iacobucci: Cet article est analogue aux paragraphes 446.13 et 14 qui ont été promulgués en 1985 en même temps que d'autres modifications destinées à encourager la restitution des biens saisis par la police à leur propriétaire légitime en attendant un jugement concernant les accusations en rapport avec ces biens. Parmi ces biens, il peut se trouver des documents ayant valeur probante, qui risqueraient d'être perdus après restitution au demandeur.

Pour que le tribunal et le procureur de la poursuite n'aient pas à craindre la perte de preuves, nous avons pris des mesures pour permettre la copie des documents et l'admissibilité en preuve de ces copies selon la règle de la meilleure preuve, qui stipule naturellement que l'on doit conserver l'objet authentique à titre de preuve; mais plutôt que d'immobiliser cet objet authentique pendant toute la durée du procès, nous avons choisi cette solution pour éviter que les tribunaux se montrent réticents à se départir des objets. On sait qu'il arrive parfois que des objets soient conservés pendant très longtemps s'ils sont associés à des poursuites criminelles.

Nous avons donc introduit une disposition pour autoriser les copies et rendre ces copies admissibles en preuve, sans toutefois accorder au procureur de la poursuite un avantage sur la défense. En réalité, ces documents pourraient devoir, sur ordonnance, être remis à un tiers non directement intéressé par la poursuite judiciaire mais qui, autrement, pourrait avoir à attendre jusqu'à la fin du procès pour récupérer son bien. Voilà un autre exemple d'un essai d'harmonisation des intérêts de l'administration de la justice avec ceux des parties touchées par les poursuites.

Le sénateur Stanbury: Je laisse à d'autres la possibilité de poursuivre ce débat. Je remercie personnellement M. Iacobucci, qui nous a donné la possibilité de préciser certains éléments de son témoignage en rapport avec certains problèmes may help us a good deal. I know we will not be completely satisfied and there may well be other questions. However, my apologies, because I had better run.

Senator Fairbairn: I have just one question referring to dual criminality. I listened carefully to your explanation, but can you give us examples in other jurisdictions where dual criminality applies, or does it?

The Chairman: The lack of dual criminality?

Senator Fairbairn: Yes.

Mr. Iacobucci: Let me first say that the three of us have not made an exhaustive search of this. The concept of dual criminality has a lot of acceptance in the area of extradition. If we are talking about extraditing someone from this country to another country, our treaties in our extradition provisions of the Criminal Code have a dual criminality provision. In other words, to extradite, it is important to make sure that the conduct, when a person has been charged with an offence, would give rise to a criminal offence in both countries. That is fundamental as part of our extradition law and apparatus. In terms of domestic criminal law, I don't believe it is common among western countries to provide for dual criminality as a requirement in the context of the proceeds of crime legislation that we have before us. Extradition definitely.

Senator Doyle: This is part of the general confusion I have over dual criminality, and it is the only part of the act I am having any difficulty with at all. We recently dealt with a piece of legislation that will allow for the investigation of Canadians in this country for crimes that do not exist in this country—that is, for a non-criminal action in this country—to satisfy a treaty that we have with the United States. I keep thinking of that when I think in terms of the person who is going to be involved in a situation where he earned his money abroad in a business that was not legal where he earned it. We are at opposite ends of the same argument. I expressed considerable concern with the question of Canadians being investigated for something that was not a crime in Canada; it did not seem to alarm many other people, but there it was.

Mr. Iacobucci: Senator Doyle, the conduct has to be a crime by the laws of Canada.

Senator Doyle: Not to permit—

Mr. Iacobucci: Under this legislation.

Senator Doyle: Yes, but I am talking about the last bill we had. We get a procession of legislation over here, and this one had to do with permitting Americans to investigate people in Canada receiving assistance from Canada for something that was not a crime in Canada. It was fine to do it that way at that time, but today we are talking about another way, and I get confused about this. I should have gone to law school.

Mr. Iacobucci: I have been here on a number of occasions, and I have always had the impression that you went to law school. You should have gone.

qui nous ont été présentés au sujet du projet de loi. J'estime que sa contribution nous a aidé énormément. Je sais que nous ne serons pas entièrement satisfaits, qu'il y aura sans doute d'autres questions, et je vous prie d'excuser mon départ précipité.

Le sénateur Fairbairn: J'ai bien écouté votre explication, mais j'aurais une autre petite question à poser concernant la double criminalité. Pourriez-vous nous donner des exemples de pays où s'applique ce régime de double criminalité?

La présidente: Où la double criminalité ne s'applique pas, plutôt?

Le sénateur Fairbairn: Oui.

M. Iacobucci: Permettez-moi tout d'abord de signaler que nous n'avons pas fait de recherches exhaustives à ce sujet. Le concept de la double criminalité est très répandu dans le domaine des extraditions. La procédure d'extradition que définit le Code criminel comprend des dispositions de double criminalité. Plus précisément, il est important de s'assurer, aux fins d'une extradition, que la conduite de l'accusé est jugée également criminelle dans l'autre pays. C'est là un aspect fondamental de la loi et de la procédure d'extradition. Pour ce qui est du droit pénal, je ne pense pas qu'il soit courant dans les pays occidentaux d'exiger la double criminalité pour intenter des poursuites. Dans le cas de l'extradition, toutefois, l'exigence est courante.

Le sénateur Doyle: C'est cette question de double criminalité qui me gêne le plus et c'est même, en fait, le seul élément du projet de loi qui me pose des difficultés. Nous avons récemment examiné un texte de loi destiné à permettre les enquêtes sur des Canadiens vivant au Canada concernant des crimes qui n'existent pas dans notre pays, uniquement pour satisfaire aux exigences d'un traité que nous avons conclu avec les États-Unis. Je ne peux m'empêcher d'y penser lorsque nous parlons de personnes ayant gagné leur argent dans des pays étrangers grâce à des activités illégales dans ce pays. Nous nous retrouvons encore dans le même dilemme. J'ai déjà exprimé de fortes réserves lorsqu'il s'agissait de faire enquête sur des Canadiens pour des actions non jugées criminelles au Canada, même si ces réserves n'ont pas trouvé beaucoup d'écho.

M. Iacobucci: Monsieur Doyle, dans le cas qui nous intéresse, les activités doivent être illégales selon les lois canadiennes.

Le sénateur Doyle: Ne pas autoriser . . .

M. Iacobucci: Dans le projet de loi que nous examinons.

Le sénateur Doyle: Oui, mais je parle du dernier projet de loi que nous avons étudié. Il était question d'autoriser les Américains à faire enquête sur des Canadiens et à recevoir l'aide du Canada relativement à des comportements non jugés criminels au Canada. Les modalités sont peut-être un peu différentes dans le cas qui nous intéresse, et je n'arrive pas à démêler le vrai du faux. J'aurais peut-être dû faire des études de droit.

M. Iacobucci: Je suis venu ici à plusieurs reprises et vous m'avez toujours donné l'impression d'être passé par une faculté de droit. Vous auriez dû faire des études de droit.

Senator Doyle: I should have gone; there is no question about that.

Mr. Iacobucci: I am sure you would have been quite interested and successful.

I do not want to give too much evidence on the other bill, but again one has to look at the context. I assume you are refering to the Mutual Legal Assistance Bill, Bill C-58?

Senator Doyle: Yes.

Mr. Iacobucci: As you know, that comes out of a treaty context between the United States and Canada. There is provision in that bill that rests with the Attorney General not to be involved, where in fact there was a public interest not to be involved. I do not want to prejudge an Attorney General's opinion on this matter, but it might be a case where, if in fact there was no criminal law involved in the Canadian context, the Attorney General would say, "I am not going to subject a citizen of Canada to that kind of activity of assistance because he is not violating Canadian law."

Senator Doyle: Then in both of these instances you are back to the question of trust?

Mr. Iacobucci: As a lawyer, I would suggest that one has to look at the context of the legislation in question. It appears that there may be a different approach in two cases, but the approach is warranted to be different in those cases.

Senator Doyle: I am appreciative of the import of the bill and of the good arguments that exist for draconian measures. I have a problem here with this small principle that seems to be getting frayed on both sides.

The Chairman: We were very concerned about the possibility of an inequity there, just as we obviously remain concerned here. That is a major problem we have with the bill. Mr. Iacobucci.

In listening to your explanations today, the worry remains. I think you would agree that, simply because a provision or prohibition appears in our criminal law, that does not automatically guarantee its validity. Over time we have had many sections of our criminal law struck down for various reasons when they have been challenged in the courts. We have had a provision since 1892 and another section 312 since 1976, neither of which have been exercised, as you said. Therefore, they have not been challenged.

I understand that Mr. Mosley did concede in a prior appearance that it is possible that that section we have here could offend section 7 of the Charter and, by extension, the sections regarding forfeiture. The concern we have here is that we do not want to encourage putting into our criminal law obvious violations of the Charter, since they are inevitably going to be challenged in courts. We have been charged by the Supreme Court of Canada to try to ensure that those particular types of provisions do not get through in our legislation. That is basically our concern here.

You mentioned extradition. Of course, that is an area where we use it constantly. I have a paper here from the Commonwealth Law Conference, 1986, prepared by Professor Sharon A. Williams and Dean John D. McCamus of the Osgoode Hall Law School on civil liberties and the combatting of interna-

Le sénateur Doyle: Sans aucun doute.

M. Iacobucci: Vous auriez sûrement très bien réussi.

Je ne voudrais pas épiloguer sur l'autre projet de loi, mais le contexte est très différent. J'imagine que vous parlez du projet de loi C-58 sur l'entraide juridique en matière criminelle.

Le sénateur Doyle: Oui.

M. Iacobucci: Comme vous l'avez dit, il s'agissait d'un traité conclu entre les États-Unis et le Canada. Le projet de loi autorise toutefois le procureur général à ne pas s'engager, s'il considère que l'intérêt public le justifie. Naturellement, je ne peux parler au nom du procureur général à cet égard, mais il se pourrait bien qu'après avoir déterminé que la personne faisant l'objet de l'enquête n'a pas commis de crime au sens de la loi canadienne, il décide de ne pas apporter sa collaboration.

Le sénateur Doyle: Dans les deux cas, par conséquent, nous faisons appel à la confiance?

M. Iacobucci: En tant qu'avocat, je suis porté à croire qu'il faut examiner le contexte du texte de loi. Les deux projets de loi semblent s'appuyer sur des principes différents, mais cela est justifié par la situation.

Le sénateur Doyle: Je comprends fort bien les visées de la loi et les arguments en faveur de mesures draconiennes. Ce qui me gêne, c'est que d'un côté comme de l'autre on fait une entorse à des principes.

La présidente: Nous étions extrêmement préoccupés par la possibilité d'une injustice, et ces craintes ne sont pas totalement apaisées. C'est là la principale difficulté que nous pose le projet de loi, monsieur Iacobucci.

Malgré vos explications d'aujourd'hui, nous demeurons préoccupés. Vous conviendrez sans doute que la présence d'une disposition ou d'une interdiction dans notre droit pénal n'est pas une garantie à toute épreuve. Dans le passé, de nombreux articles du Code criminel ont dû être abolis après avoir fait l'objet de contestations devant les tribunaux. Vous avez parlé d'une disposition qui existe depuis 1892 et d'une autre qui a été adoptée en 1976, l'article 312, dont personne ne s'est encore prévalu. Ces dispositions n'ont donc pas pu être contestées.

M. Mosley aurait semble-il convenu, à l'occasion d'une autre comparution, qu'il est possible que l'article en question soit incompatible avec l'article 7 de la Charte et, par voie de conséquence, avec les articles sur la saisie. Naturellement, nous voulons à tout prix éviter d'insérer dans notre droit pénal des articles contraires à la Charte, car inévitablement ils seront contestés devant les tribunaux. La Cour suprême du Canada nous a priés instamment de veiller à ce que ce genre d'articles ne soit pas introduit dans nos lois. Voilà ce qui explique nos préoccupations.

Vous avez mentionné la question de l'extradition. On sait que dans ce domaine la notion de double criminalité intervient constamment. J'ai ici un document issu de la Commonwealth Law Conference de 1986, rédigé par le professeur Sharon A. Williams et le doyen John D. McCamus de la Faculté de droit tional crimes, striking the balance. There is a section in here on double criminality, where they say:

> Double or dual criminality is a threshold requirement. The offence must be recognized as a criminal offence in the requesting and the requested state.

The paper goes on to give examples on extradition in areas where they may have political implications that are differently defined. In different countries there are obvious exceptions, but surely under our extradition proceedings, which occur fairly regularly, the legal counsel involved must provide the proper evidence of double criminality. That does not seem to create any great impediment to the process of the law or of the hearing of the case.

If there is any question here, I feel that we should not encourage the inclusion in our criminal law of questionable provisions such as this.

Mr. Iacobucci: Madam Chairman, I am familiar with the conference and the article in a general sense, because some of my colleagues were in attendance. I know the work of Professor Williams and former Dean McCamus quite well.

Again, I suggest that they were talking in the context of extradition, and I believe it is appropriate for that rule of dual criminality. In the context of this legislation, we are talking about proceeds of crime, which is international, which knows no borders in many ways. What is relevant for Canadian purposes is that, if property or proceeds flow from activities that Canadians regard as criminal, then there is an abhorrence with respect to that property or those proceeds and there is a public interest, I think, that suggests that we do not want to see our country become a haven for those individuals who are dealing in these kinds of activities to choose this country as a place where they place the proceeds and property.

I do not think this is a policy that we, as Canadians, would wish to encourage. To me, that is the point that is of very grave importance.

When I think of it in terms of the drugs and the terrorism crimes and extortion crimes, I must say that that is a matter of fundamental importance.

The Chairman: Those are crimes that would be dealt with obviously in almost any other country; so they really would not be caught in here in any case.

Mr. Iacobucci: As I said earlier in my comments, I am not so sure that the drug situation would be obvious conduct that would be regarded as unlawful in every country.

Senator Doyle: It would depend on General Noriega's mood that day as to whether or not he would pursue the crime.

Mr. Iacobucci: Exactly.

The Chairman: And how we regard General Noriega as well, I guess.

Senator Doyle: Then are we going to take anyone with a pack of Panamanian money?

Osgoode Hall sur les libertés civiles et, dans une recherche d'équilibre, sur la lutte contre le crime international. Dans une section sur la double criminalité, on peut lire:

> La double criminalité est une exigence critique. L'infraction doit être considérée comme un crime dans les deux États.

Le document donne ensuite des exemples d'extradition dont les répercussions politiques peuvent être définies de façon différente. Certains pays font naturellement exception, mais il ne fait aucun doute que dans notre procédure d'extradition, qui intervient assez régulièrement, les juristes chargés de l'affaire doivent faire la preuve de la double criminalité. Cette exigence ne semble pas nuire indûment à l'application de la loi ni à l'audition de la cause.

La seule réserve que j'aimerais apporter, c'est que je ne juge pas opportun d'encourager l'inclusion dans notre droit pénal de dispositions contestables comme celles-là.

M. Iacobucci: Madame la présidente, je suis au courant des travaux de la conférence car certains de mes collègues y ont participé et je possède une connaissance générale de cet article. Je connais très bien les travaux du professeur Williams et de l'ancien doyen McCamus.

Il ne faut pas oublier que le débat portait sur l'extradition et que les conclusions sur la double criminalité sont justifiées dans ce contexte. Pour ce qui est du projet de loi à l'étude, il est question de produits de la criminalité internationale, qui ne connaît pas de frontières. L'important, du point de vue du Canada, c'est que les biens ou les produits découlant d'activités que les Canadiens considèrent comme criminelles, que notre société juge odieuses, ne puissent trouver refuge au Canada et que les personnes qui se livrent à ces activités ne soient pas encouragées à choisir notre pays pour écouler ces produits.

À mon avis, les Canadiens ne veulent pas encourager ce genre de politique. Ce point revêt pour moi une importance extrême.

Lorsqu'il s'agit de stupéfiants, de terrorisme et de crimes d'extorsion, il convient de ne pas prendre les choses à la légère.

La présidente: Manifestement, ces crimes sont réprimés dans pratiquement tous les autres pays, de sorte que de toute façon nous n'aurions pas à faire les premiers pas.

M. Iacobucci: Comme je l'ai dit plus tôt, il n'est pas évident que le trafic des stupéfiants soit considéré comme illégal dans tous les pays.

Le sénateur Doyle: Selon son humeur du jour, le général Noriega pourrait décider de punir ce crime ou de fermer les yeux.

M. Iacobucci: Exactement.

La présidente: Et tout dépend également de la façon de voir le général Noriega, j'imagine.

Le sénateur Doyle: Allons-nous donc nous mettre à arrêter tous ceux qui se présentent avec de l'argent panaméen?

[Text]

The Chairman: No one disagrees with the concept that the proceeds of crime, wherever possible, should be confiscated. That is probably the most sure way of trying to deter or discourage the activities that gave rise to it. No one here, Mr. Iacobucci, disagrees with the principle of the bill. It is only this particular application that is causing us a great deal of trouble. No doubt it will be examined later.

I wish to thank the witnesses for coming today.

The committee adjourned.

La présidente: Personne ne contredit le bien-fondé de saisir dans la mesure du possible les produits de la criminalité. C'est en effet sans doute la meilleure façon de combattre les activités qui en sont à l'origine. Personne ici, monsieur Iacobucci, ne conteste le principe du projet de loi. C'est uniquement cette application particulière qui cause une gêne réelle. Nous y reviendrons sûrement plus tard.

Je remercie les témoins pour leur présence aujourd'hui.

La séance est levée.

September 1, 1988 [Standing Senate Committee on Legal and Constitutional Affairs]

REPORT OF THE COMMITTEE

THURSDAY, September 1st, 1988

The Standing Senate Committee on Legal and Constitutional Affairs has the honour to present its

THIRTY-FIRST REPORT

Your Committee, to which was referred Bill C-61, An Act to amend the Criminal Code, the Food and Drugs Act and the Narcotic Control Act, has, in obedience to the Order of Reference of Wednesday, July 13, 1988, examined the said Bill and now reports the same without amendment, but with the following comments:

The Committee has examined Bill C-61, the Proceeds of Crime Bill, very carefully and has heard testimony from the Minister and his officials and from representatives of the Canadian Bar Association and the defence bar.

All members of the Committee strongly support the goals of this bill. We agree that there is a need for strong measures to deal with organized crime. The Committee does, however, have some concerns which it wishes to outline.

The first is the issue of dual criminality. The bill permits forfeiture of a person's property for certain named offences if the activity which produced the property took place elsewhere and would have constituted an offence if it had occurred in Canada. In theory, therefore, the activity could have been legal in the jurisdiction where it took place. For this reason, the bill has been characterized as lacking the requirement of dual criminality found in extradition proceedings.

Identical issues are raised by the new offence of laundering the proceeds of crime. It will become a criminal offence to launder property or proceeds obtained directly or indirectly as a result of an act or omission that, if it had occurred in Canada, would have constituted one of the named offences.

A very strong argument can be made that to convict people of an offence, or to order their property forfeit, where the underlying activity was legal in the jurisdiction in which it occurred would be to violate section 7 of the Canadian Charter of Rights and Freedoms whereby the right to life, liberty and security of the person is guranteed. We have difficulty in accepting that conviction in those circumstances would be considered to be in accord with the principles of fundamental justice required by the section.

The Criminal Code has long contained a provision (section 312) which makes it an offence to possess property obtained by crime and includes property which results from an act or omission that, it is had occurred in Canada, would have constituted an offence punishable by indictment. In other words, there is no requirement of dual criminality in this offence. Government officials have informed us that this part of the section has never been used. They argue that its existence is proof that the principle is accepted and, somewhat paradoxically, that the fact that no one has ever been charged is evidence that the lack

RAPPORT DU COMITÉ

Le JEUDI 1er septembre 1988

Le Comité sénatorial permanent des affaires juridiques et constitutionnelles a l'honneur de présenter son

TRENTE ET UNIÈME RAPPORT

Votre Comité, auquel a été déféré le Projet de loi C-61, Loi modifiant le Code criminel, la Loi des aliments et drogues et la Loi sur les stupéfiants, a, conformément à l'ordre de renvoi du mercredi 13 juillet 1988, étudié ledit projet de loi et en fait maintenant rapport sans amendement, mais avec les commentaires suivants:

Le Comité a examiné très attentivement le projet de loi C-61 visant les produits de la criminalité, et a entendu le témoignage du ministre, de ses hauts fonctionnaires, ainsi que les représentants de l'Association du Barreau canadien et des procureurs de la défense.

Tous les membres du Comité appuient vigoureusement les objectifs de ce projet de loi. Nous admettons qu'il est nécessaire de prendre des mesures rigoureuses pour contrer la criminalité organisée. Le Comité émet toutefois certaines réserves dont il aimerait traiter dans les lignes qui suivent.

Le première concerne la question de la double criminalité. Le projet de loi autorise la confiscation des biens d'une personne trouvée coupable de certaines infractions désignées, si les actes qui lui ont permis de se procurer ces biens ont été exécutés à l'extérieur du Canada et qu'ils auraient été réputés criminels s'ils étaient survenus au Canada. En théorie, cependant, ces actes auraient tout aussi bien pu être légaux dans le pays où ils ont été exécutés. Pour cette raison, nous croyons que le projet de loi ne répond pas aux critères de double criminalité exigés dans les procédures d'extradition.

La nouvelle infraction portant sur le recyclage des produits de la criminalité pose des problèmes identiques. Sera coupable d'une infraction quiconque recyclera un bien ou ses produits obtenus directement ou indirectement par un acte ou une omission survenu à l'extérieur du Canada qui, au Canada, aurait constitué l'une des infractions désignées.

D'aucuns pourraient invoquer avec force arguments que le fait de déclarer qu'il y a culpabilité, ou d'ordonner la confiscation de biens, lorsque l'activité en litige est légale dans le pays où elle est survenue vont à l'encontre de l'article 7 de la Charte canadienne des droits et libertés, qui garantit le droit à la vie, à la liberté et à la sécurité de la personne. Nous avons beaucoup de mal à admettre qu'une déclaration de culpabilité dans ces circonstances puisse être considérée conforme aux principes de la justice fondamentale dont cet article exige le respect.

Le Code criminel contient depuis longtemps une disposition (article 312) qui mentionne que la possession d'un bien obtenu par la perpétration d'une activité criminelle, y compris d'un bien obtenu par une action ou omission, en quelque endroit que ce soit, qui aurait constitué, si elle avait eu lieu au Canada, une infraction punissable sur acte d'accusation, constitue une infraction. Autrement dit, le critère de la double criminalité n'est pas exigé dans ce cas pour établir qu'il y a infraction. Les hauts fonctionnaires du gouvernement nous ont informés que cette partie de l'article du Code n'avait jamais été invoquée.

The Committee does not believe that this approach will be acceptable under the Charter should such a provision ever be used and its constitutionality challenged, whether the challenge is to a section of the Code that has been there for a considerable time or whether it is to a new provision introduced by this bill. On the other hand, we accept that the problem may be more theoretical than real, given that the acts committed by the people targeted by the forfeiture provisions of this bill will, in virtually all cases, be illegal in the foreign jurisdictions where they took place.

The Committee also has concerns about the provision in the bill that permits forfeiture of proceeds for offences other than the one for which the person has been convicted. If a person is convicted of a named offence but it cannot be established that the property relates to that particular offence, the property can still be ordered forfeit if the court is satisfied beyond a reasonable doubt that the property is proceeds of crime.

The Committee appreciates that the lack of a provision of this type could result in a serious loophole and could jeopardize the attainment of the goals of the legislation. On the other hand, we feel that there is a lack of legislative direction as to how this provision should operate. Will an entirely new hearing be required to determine whether other crimes have taken place? How will it differ from a trial for those very offences? How can the court avoid prejudice to the offender when deciding the sentence for the original crime for which the person has been convicted after hearing evidence related to other criminal activity relevant to the forfeiture proceedings?

The Committee pursued two specific concerns with the Minister. First, that the offence of charging a criminal interest rate, commonly called loansharking, was omitted from the list of named offences. Secondly, that when applying for special search warrants or restraint orders under this bill, there is no requirement that the Attorney General notify the judge of any previous applications made in relation to the same individual. The committee notes that both the wiretap and the telewarrant sections of the Code contain such a notice requirement and we believe that its inclusion is equally important in the forfeiture context. We note as well that the Law Reform Commission of Canada in its Working Paper 30 on search and seizure recommended that such a requirement be added to the general search warrant sections of the Code. The Committee was informed by government officials that certain other provisions of Bill C-61 reflect recommendations of the Commission.

As a result of our representations, the Minister has agreed in principle with our representations and has undertaken to proceed as outlined in his letter as follows:

Selon eux, le fait qu'elle existe prouve que le principe est généralement reconnu et que, paradoxalement, le fait qu'aucune accusation n'ait été portée dans de tels cas illustre que l'on n'exploitera pas indûment l'absence de référence à la double criminalité dans ce projet de loi.

Le Comité ne croit pas que cette argumentation serait jugée conforme à la Charte si la constitutionnalité de cette disposition était remise en question, que la contestation se rapporte à un article inséré dans le Code depuis fort longtemps ou qu'elle porte sur une nouvelle disposition introduite par ce projet de loi. Par ailleurs, nous admettons que le problème est peut-être beaucoup plus théorique que réel étant donné que les actes commis par ceux dont on voudrait confisquer les biens aux termes de ce projet de loi seront, dans presque tous les cas, illégaux dans le pays étranger où ils auront été commis.

Le Comité est également sceptique à propos de la disposition du projet de loi qui permet la confiscation des produits d'infractions autres que celles dont la personne a été trouvée coupable. Si une personne est déclarée coupable d'une infraction désignée, mais qu'on ne peut arriver à prouver que les biens ont été obtenus par la perpétration de cette infraction, le tribunal peut encore en ordonner la confiscation s'il est convaincu hors de tout doute raisonnable que les biens sont le produit de la criminalité.

Le Comité est conscient que l'absence d'une telle disposition pourrait constituer une grave échappatoire et compromettre les objectifs que cette mesure législative veut atteindre. Il nous semble par ailleurs que la façon de l'appliquer n'est pas suffisamment bien décrite. Faudra-t-il entamer un nouveau procès? En quoi celui-ci sera-t-il différent d'une audience où le tribunal aura à juger des accusations initiales? Comment le juge pourra-t-il éviter de causer préjudice au contrevenant en décidant de la peine qu'il devra imposer pour la première infraction, après avoir entendu des témoignages se rapportant à une autre activité criminelle pertinente aux procédures de confiscation?

Le Comité a formulé deux critiques au ministre. Premièrement, il déplore que le fait d'exiger des taux d'intérêt exorbitants, autrement dit, de s'adonner au prêt usuraire, n'ait pas été inclus dans la liste des infractions désignées. Deuxièmement, il constate que lorsque le procureur demande l'exécution d'un mandat spécial de perquisition ou d'une ordonnance de blocage, aux termes de ce projet de loi, le procureur général n'est pas tenu d'informer le juge que des demandes similaires ont déjà été présentées au sujet du contrevenant. Le Comité constate que les dispositions du Code portant sur l'écoute électronique et le télémandat exigent de tels avis, et nous croyons qu'il serait tout aussi important de les exiger dans le cas des confiscations. Nous signalons aussi que la Commission de réforme du droit du Canada, dans son document de travail n° 30 sur la perquisition et la saisie, a recommandé que cette exigence soit ajoutée à tous les articles du Code portant sur les mandats de perquisitions. Les hauts fonctionnaires du gouvernement ont informé le Comité que d'autres dispositions du Projet de loi C-61 ont donné suite aux recommandations de la Commission.

Après lui avoir communiqué nos vues, le Ministre s'est dit d'accord avec nos propositions et s'est engagé à procéder tel qu'il le propose dans la lettre suivante:

CRIMINAL CODE
FOOD AND DRUGS ACT
NARCOTIC CONTROL ACT

BILL TO AMEND—REPORT OF COMMITTEE PRESENTED, PRINTED AS APPENDIX AND ADOPTED

Hon. Joan Neiman: Honourable senators, I have the honour to present the thirty-first report of the Standing Senate Committee on Legal and Constitutional Affairs, respecting Bill C-61, to amend the Criminal Code, the Food and Drugs Act and the Narcotic Control Act. I ask that the report be printed as an appendix in the Debates of the Senate and to the Minutes of the Proceedings of the Senate of this day and that it form part of the permanent records of this house.

The Hon. the Speaker pro tempore: Is it agreed, honourable senators?

Hon. Senators: Agreed.

(For text of report, see Appendix "A", p. 4253.)

The Hon. the Speaker pro tempore: Honourable senators, when shall this report be taken into consideration?

Hon. C. William Doody (Deputy Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, with leave of the Senate and notwithstanding rule 45(1)(f), I move that the report be adopted now.

The Hon. the Speaker pro tempore: Is leave granted, honourable senators?

Hon. Senators: Agreed.

Senator Neiman: Honourable senators, I have only a few words to say with respect to Bill C-61. I think I am speaking for members of the committee when I say that we strongly support the goals of this bill. It has been a serious anomaly of our law that criminals could be allowed to keep and even grow wealthy on their ill-gotten gains. Possession of the proceeds of crime has long been an offence under the Criminal Code, but, until this bill, there were no means by which a court could order the property forfeit.

Despite our general support, there are some matters that concern us. These arose in the course of studying the bill. The first is the somewhat complex issue of dual criminality. Some honourable senators will be familiar with extradition law, where that principle is well established. Our extradition treaties always provide that Canada will not turn a person over to a foreign government unless the act which the person has committed, or is alleged to have committed, is a crime in both Canada and that foreign state. That requirement is missing from this bill. In fact, it permits forfeiture of a person's property for certain named offences, which, if the activity had taken place outside Canada, would have been legal, but which would have consitituted an offence if it had occurred in Canada. In theory, therefore, the activity could have been legal in the jurisdiction where it took place. We have the examples of legal gambling in the State of Nevada and legal prostitution in parts of the Netherlands.

The same approach with respect to allowing this type of forfeiture has been used with the newly created offence of laundering the proceeds of crime. We seriously question whether these provisions will comply with the Canadian Charter of Rights and Freedoms. Do they not conflict with the principles of fundamental justice by providing for the possibility of condemning a person for conduct that is legal in the place in which it occurred? We were advised by the minister and his officials that a provision has existed in the Code for many years that also lacks this dual criminality requirement, but it has never been used in a case where the underlying activity has actually been legal.

Nevertheless, the committee does not believe that this provision will be acceptable under the Charter. Should it ever be used in this particular way, it seems certain that it will be constitutionally challenged. However, we are reasonably confident that the acts committed by the people targeted by the forfeiture provisions in this bill will, in virtually all cases, also be illegal in the foreign jurisdictions in which they take place. For this reason we did not feel that we should retard the passage of the bill by insisting on appropriate amendments.

Another provision of the bill raises concerns because of its vagueness. It is the one that permits forfeiture of proceeds for offences other than the one of which the person has been convicted. If the court is not satisfied that the property in question relates to the offence for which the person is convicted, it can nevertheless order the property be forfeit, if it is satisfied beyond a reasonable doubt that the property is part of the proceeds of crime.

What we found lacking in this provision was any legislative direction as to how the court was to proceed to make this determination. We were left with a number of unanswered questions, and we have raised those in our report. For example, will an entirely new hearing be required to determine whether other crimes have taken place? How will it differ from a trial for those very offences? Will the court hand down its sentence for the offence of which the person has actually been convicted before hearing the evidence of the other offences relating to the question of forfeiture? If not, will this not be very prejudicial to the offender?

Ultimately, all of these questions will have to be worked out by the courts themselves, but we regret that the statute does not give more explicit direction on how this provision should operate.

In its examination of the bill the committee concluded that there were two omissions that should be rectified. First, the offence of loan sharking is missing from the list of offences, or enterprise crimes as they are sometimes called, that trigger the forfeiture provisions of the bill. It is our understanding that this offence is commonly part of a cluster of offences that we think of as organized crime, and we could not understand why it was not included. In fact, we dealt with that particular crime in a bill just a few weeks ago, when we were considering other amendments to the Criminal Code.

The second omission is that, when an Attorney General applies for special search warrants or restraint orders under this bill, there is no requirement to notify the judge of any previous applications made in relation to the same individual. Both the wiretap and the telewarrant sections of the Criminal Code contain such a notice requirement, and we believe that its inclusion is equally important in the forfeiture context as well.

We brought these concerns to the attention of the Minister of Justice in the hope that he would give us an undertaking to bring those amendments forward at the earliest possible date. We have received a letter from the Minister of Justice in which he agrees in principle with the comments we have made. He has undertaken to pursue the matter of making the necessary amendments at an early date. That letter is attached to the committee's report. In fact, I spoke personally to the minister this morning and he assured me that he would follow this up as soon as possible. With that assurance, honourable senators, the committee is reassured and is prepared to recommend passage of this bill without amendment.

Motion agreed to and report adopted.

The Hon. the Speaker pro tempore: Honourable senators, when shall this bill be read the third time?

On motion of Senator Doody, bill placed on the Orders of the Day for third reading at the next sitting of the Senate.

ADJOURNMENT

Hon. C. William Doody (Deputy Leader of the Government), with leave of the Senate and notwithstanding rule 45(1)(g), moved:

> That when the Senate adjourns today, it do stand adjourned until Wednesday next, 7th September, 1988, at two o'clock in the afternoon.

(Senator Nurgitz)

Motion agreed to.

QUESTION PERIOD

AGRICULTURE

ALBERTA—DROUGHT RELIEF PROGRAM—CRITERIA FOR QUALIFICATION

Hon. H.A. Olson: Honourable senators, I should like to ask the Leader of the Government in the Senate several questions. Before I do I wish to congratulate the Deputy Leader of the Government in the Senate for the speed with which he brought back an answer to a question I asked him last Tuesday, August 30.

Senator Doody: You were surprised!

Senator Olson: I was not surprised. Indeed, on Tuesday I mentioned his great influence and persuasive ability, and, although he demurred somewhat, saying that he did not have that great an influence, on Wednesday I received a report from the Department of Agriculture dated August 31, 1988—in other words, the next day, which is good service as far as I am concerned.

Senator Frith: He does not know his own strength!

Senator Olson: That report outlined the terms and conditions, or the criteria, for making applications under the drought relief program related to livestock. I want him to know that I appreciate that, and my confidence in his influence, if he tries, even though it was high, is even higher. However—

Senator Doody: Now for the truth!

Senator Frith: Here comes the "but"!

Senator Olson: One of the conditions for receiving the payment for the livestock is, and I quote:

> Eligibility for the second installment will depend on enrollment in forage crop insurance.

I think that it is an improper use of the terms and conditions of the federal spending power to insist that a producer buy some kind of insurance for 1989 so that he can collect from a program that was supposed to relieve the financial difficulty in 1988. The Conservatives forced this participation. Talk about socialism or all those other words that Senator Doody uses—

Some Hon. Senators: Hear, hear!

Senator Olson: —or that Senator Barootes uses every once in a while. I should think that he would be my greatest ally in trying to get this unjust condition removed from the program. I want to ask the minister—or the deputy leader again—

Senator Argue: You are elevating him!

Senator Olson: His image, in my view, has been elevated tremendously. I have never had such good service.

An Act to amend the Customs Tariff, the Excise Act, the Excise Tax Act, the Customs Act, the Criminal Code and a related Act (Bill C-102)

Citation 1993, c. 25, s. 95

Royal Assent June 10, 1993

Hansard

Hon. Don Mazankowski (Deputy Prime Minister and Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, let me try to explain to the hon. member. The debt that we inherited was something in the vicinity of $200 billion. The member knows that you have to pay interest on that debt. He knows that interest compounds upon interest and that it accumulated to $400 billion plus.

We have been operating in an operational surplus since 1987. As a matter of fact, I repeat, we have not added one red cent to Canada's national debt. As a matter of fact, we have reduced it by $20 billion plus.

Hon. Herb Gray (Windsor West): Mr. Speaker, I have a supplementary question for the minister.

Surely the minister will not try and hide the fact that he and his government have supported the interest rate policy of the Bank of Canada and that interest rates are a cost of government along with all the other costs.

Why does he try to hide the fact that the public debt has moved from $168 billion to more than $423 billion since his government has taken office? Why does he not recognize that and also recognize that a major way of dealing with it is to create more economic growth and jobs for Canadians?

Hon. Don Mazankowski (Deputy Prime Minister and Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, the hon. member suggests that we should have lower interest rates. That is true.

When he was occupying the government benches, we saw interest rates go up to 22 per cent and 23 per cent. We have tried to do two things. We have tried to contain government expenditures against the wishes of the opposition parties. We have tried to contain inflation. The key to bringing interest rates down is to bring down inflation.

The hon. member is suggesting that we should have higher inflation and that we should spend more. That is not a recipe for lower interest rates. That is a recipe for higher interest rates.

TOBACCO SMUGGLING

Mrs. Lise Bourgault (Argenteuil—Papineau): Mr. Speaker, my question is to the Minister of Justice and Attorney General of Canada. The Criminal Code does not provide for the seizure of goods acquired through profits generated by the illegal sale of smuggled tobacco products because this activity is not recognized as a form of organized crime. In practice, this means that some Mohawks could buy the Manoir Richelieu with the money made from the lucrative black market for cigarettes and open a nice casino which Quebec would otherwise not allow them to own.

So as not to make fools of us all in this House, will the minister urgently introduce a retroactive amendment to the Criminal Code and eliminate this unacceptable loophole which enables criminals to launder the money made by smuggling cigarettes?

Hon. Pierre Blais (Minister of Justice, Attorney General of Canada and Minister of State (Agriculture)): Mr. Speaker, my colleague raises the important issue of smuggling. I must remind all members of this House that the Minister of Finance has tabled Bill C-102, which reinforces the legislation on smuggling.

However, it might also be appropriate to remind Canadians who are listening that smuggling is a crime. It is difficult to fight smuggling because people who buy cigarettes, among other contraband items, do not complain. I believe that if all of us in this House made Canadians aware of the danger to society of giving in and buying smuggled goods—and I am speaking to members on both sides of this House—we would probably increase their awareness of the issue. It is quite serious that Canadians snap up smuggled goods so easily.

I thank my colleague for her question and I must tell her—

Some hon. members: Order, order.

Mr. Blais: Mr. Speaker, look at what goes on on the other side when we discuss serious issues. We are giving a great deal of attention to this matter and we hope that our colleagues will co-operate by supporting Bill C-102.

Even though the implementation of the export tax was subsequently suspended by our government the Canadian duty-free operators continue to hold true to their volunteered tobacco limits. This was done on the understanding that once officials from the departments of finance and revenue were reasonably convinced that Canadian duty-free operators were not involved with the tobacco smuggling problem discussions would be held to bring the tobacco sales limits to more constructive levels.

At meetings held with representatives of the departments of finance and revenue on June 23, 1992 and September 28, 1992 it was clearly stated by some of the officials present that they were satisfied that all Canadian duty-free shops were complying to the volunteered selling limits and that they now recognized that the Canadian duty-free shops were not part of the smuggling problem.

Therefore the question is why proceed with legislation to limit the sales from Canadian duty-free shops if it has been demonstrated and recognized that Canadian duty-free shops are not part of the smuggling problem. At a time when the Canadian duty-free industry as a whole is facing significantly increased competition from the United States the only consequences of such restrictive actions will be to provide U.S. retailers with an additional competitive advantage and subsequent loss of millions of dollars in tourist revenue.

The Canadian duty-free industry plays a key element in the Canadian economy through its employment of hundreds of Canadian workers and the generation of substantial tax and revenue dollars to the federal and provincial governments. The vast majority of Canadian duty-free industry is composed of small to medium businesses owned by Canadian citizens.

The political agenda of our current government has been to energize and support Canadian small to medium businesses to stimulate the employment of Canadians and to promote exports in other countries. The current actions to legislate limits on the sales from Canadian duty-free shops directly contradicts such agenda. Therefore, on behalf of the Canadian Frontier Duty-Free Association I ask for your support on this most critical of issues to presently face our industry".

That sets out in capsule from what the position of the duty-free people is; that there is no need for the legislation. They are willing and have been co-operating and reporting to the revenue and customs departments any substantial increases in sales to any particular people. To proceed on anything that would unduly limit these entrepreneurs, or in fact force them out of the business or into bankruptcy would be wrong.

Let me move briefly to another area that has opened up by the very fact of this bill and the other bill before the House today. This was mentioned earlier by the hon. member from Newfoundland in his remarks. That is the loss of billions of dollars to the Canadian coffers as a result of the offshore tax havens. We have been talking about that in this party for a number of years. In last year's report the Auditor General confirmed that in his opinion hundreds of millions of dollars were leaking from the Canadian tax base as a result of offshore tax havens.

The response from the Ministry of Finance was that in the guise of competitiveness we had to allow these tax loopholes. It is interesting that when talking to Revenue Canada officials there appears to be a major rift between the Department of Revenue and the Department of Finance with respect to this. Revenue agrees it is a major problem. There is a major bleeding of our taxes through these loopholes. There are some 360 very large corporations using various tax loopholes to benefit their profits.

Revenue officials tell us that the loopholes could be closed without hurting our competitiveness. The competitiveness thing is simply a red herring. There would never and should not be taxation or double taxation of offshore income in Canada. If income is legitimately earned offshore and is brought back in and dividends are paid out to the shareholders or the corporation in Canada, there should not be taxation of that a second time if it has already been taxed in the other jurisdiction. Revenue Canada states that and I do not have a problem with that.

The key crunch is that Revenue Canada officials tell us that it is not hundreds of millions of dollars that are lost, it is billions of dollars. The member mentioned $2 billion. In fact, revenue officials have told me that it is probably higher than that. Billions of dollars per year are lost in taxes to these large corporations using their shell companies and paper transactions.

In two areas the loophole could be closed in what is called loss importation. That is where there are losses offshore, in offshore corporations. Under the present legislation those losses can be brought forward and offset against the profits of the corporation in Canada. That is a major loophole which amounts to hundreds of millions of dollars right there.

There is another one with Canadian source income that is allowed to be funnelled out through an offshore company. An example of that is the Canada Trust Co. case which is a fairly small one. I believe it is before the courts now. Approximately $30 million of mortgages guaranteed by CMHC were sold to a Shell company in the Netherlands. That company apparently then made the income from these CMHC guaranteed mortgages in Canada. Therefore it was income earned in Canada, taken offshore and declared as income of the offshore corporation and dividended back to the same company. The income lost in that particular case appears to be somewhere in the area of $3 million to $4 million. This is fairly small on the whole scale of things but it is an example of what I mean when I say that these tax loopholes could in fact be closed with major consequences.

Those types of things would help the totality of the Canadian economy. It would assist the regular taxpayer in understanding what is going on within the tax regime, that in fact there is a level playing field and that lower income earners are being treated the same as the huge multinationals and the wealthy corporations and taxpayers within Canada.

I just wanted to mention that and point out that there are many things we can do to try and increase the tax fairness in Canada, to try to ensure that we get back the credibility of our government and the credibility of our parliamentary system.

Mr. Lyle Dean MacWilliam (Okanagan—Shuswap): Mr. Speaker, I appreciate the opportunity to make a few comments with respect to Bill C-102. This bill of course is seeking to enact several tax and tariff measures that have been announced recently.

Some of the measures are notable, for example those addressing tobacco smuggling and tax evasion. The bill also addresses the excise tax rate on cigars and other tariff reductions in order to reduce the cross-border shopping that has been a problem until recently with Canada's high interest rates and high dollar.

Although the bill has some good points, I submit it does not really solve the initial problem which is the fact that we have the GST in the first place. The government knows full well there are many things wrong with this tax. The tax has been a real burden on the economy. It has been difficult for our small business sector to adjust to the administrative costs of this tax. It has been difficult for consumers to put up with the extra financial burden caused by this tax.

The government would solve all problems at once by simply scrapping this tax, phasing it out, getting rid of it and imposing the kind of tax reform we have been requesting for some time. I think the GST is the real source of our misery here. It is not fine tuning of some of the changes that should be made, but take the whole darn thing, do away with it and bring in a system of real tax reform.

I want to cite some very specific problems which have been brought to my attention with respect to the application of the GST. I want to turn to a very specific situation such as the purchase of a new vehicle. Let me break it down into two arguments.

First I would like to look at a private citizen, a person who does not own or operate his own business, purchasing a vehicle. Then I would like to look at the situation of a business registrant purchasing a vehicle. This is someone who pays the GST, has a small business and uses a vehicle as part of that business. This is to show some of the specific problems that have not been addressed by this particular legislation.

• (1425)

First of all the private citizen who trades in his vehicle on a new one has to pay the full cost of the GST on the purchase of that new vehicle. That is fair enough if the consumer also recognizes that in fact there is essentially a tax credit being applied with the trade-in vehicle. That tax credit however goes to the dealer who purchases that vehicle.

The Excise Act and the Customs Act are also being amended to add proceeds of crime provisions for tobacco smuggling and tax evasion offences. These provisions will enable federal enforcement agencies to seize and forfeit to the Crown the profits made by organized crime from the illegal sale of smuggled tobacco products.

Provisions in the Criminal Code which authorize the use of wire-taps in investigations of certain criminal activities are being broadened to cover tobacco-related offences. These amendments will allow the RCMP to obtain wire-tap authorizations for tobacco-related offences, thereby enabling them to make more effective use of the new proceeds-of-crime provisions.

The Excise Act is being amended to reinforce the marking requirements for packages of tobacco products that are exported or sold duty free in Canada. The new marking requirements will assist enforcement agencies in their efforts to combat tobacco smuggling and tax evasion by making duty free tobacco products more readily identifiable.

These measures, together with the substantial new resources allocated to Customs and the RCMP, are intended to provide enforcement agencies with the necessary support to attack organized tobacco smuggling rings and generally reduce the incentives to engage in the contraband tobacco trade, thereby stemming the loss in the government revenues attributable to tobacco smuggling. By reducing tobacco smuggling they will also complement the government's initiatives to discourage smoking in Canada.

Mr. Chairman, the bill also implements the excise tax of 4¢ per cigarette imposed on cigarettes for export or for sale through duty free shops, which was announced in February of 1992. Proportional excise tax is levied on other tobacco products for export or for sale through duty free shops. The tax was in effect for approximately eight weeks from February 13, 1992 to April 8, 1992.

The purpose of this tax is to reduce the profits of tobacco smugglers by narrowing the price differential between Canadian cigarettes for sale in the Canadian tax-paid market and those sold in other countries. It was also intended to address the problem of casual smuggling by cross-border shoppers.

However, following the introduction of this tax, it became apparent that suppliers in the United States would be able to circumvent the tax by sourcing tobacco products for the Canadian market outside of Canada. Thus, while the tax was effective in the short term as long as alternative sources of Canadian-type cigarettes were not available, it would not be an effective measure in the government's fight against tobacco smuggling in the longer term. That is why the government

La Loi sur l'accise et la Loi sur les douanes sont aussi modifiées de manière à y ajouter des dispositions sur les produits de la criminalité concernant la contrebande de tabac et l'évasion fiscale. Ces dispositions permettront aux organismes d'exécution fédéraux de saisir et de remettre à l'État les profits réalisés par le crime organisé dans la vente illégale de produits du tabac de contrebande.

Les dispositions du Code criminel qui permettent d'utiliser l'écoute électronique dans les enquêtes sur certaines activités criminelles sont élargies de façon à inclure les infractions relatives au tabac. Ces modifications permettront à la GRC d'obtenir des autorisations d'écoute électronique relativement à des infractions concernant le tabac, ce qui lui permettra de faire usage plus efficacement des nouvelles dispositions relatives aux produits de la criminalité.

La Loi sur l'accise est modifiée de façon à renforcer les exigences relatives au marquage des paquets de produits du tabac qui sont exportés ou vendus en franchise de droits au Canada. Les nouvelles exigences relatives au marquage aideront les organismes d'exécution dans leurs efforts visant à lutter contre la contrebande de tabac et l'évasion fiscale en permettant d'identifier plus facilement les produits du tabac en franchise de droits.

Ces mesures, ainsi que les nouvelles ressources importantes qui seront allouées à Douanes et Accise et à la GRC, visent à offrir aux organismes d'exécution l'aide dont ils ont besoin pour s'attaquer aux réseaux organisés de contrebande de tabac et à réduire en général les encouragements au commerce du tabac de contrebande, réduisant ainsi les pertes de recettes du gouvernement qui sont attribuables à la contrebande de tabac. En réduisant la contrebande de tabac, ces mesures s'ajouteront aussi aux initiatives prises par le gouvernement pour faire diminuer la consommation de tabac au Canada.

Monsieur le président, le projet de loi met aussi en œuvre la taxe d'accise de 4c. la cigarette imposée sur les cigarettes destinées à l'exportation ou à la vente dans des boutiques hors taxes, mesure qui a été annoncée en février 1992. Une taxe d'accise proportionnelle est imposée sur les autres produits du tabac destinés à l'exportation ou à la vente dans des boutiques hors taxes. Cette taxe est restée en vigueur environ huit semaines, soit du 13 février au 8 avril 1992.

Cette taxe avait pour objet de réduire les profits des contrebandiers de tabac en faisant diminuer l'écart de prix entre les cigarettes canadiennes destinées à la vente sur le marché canadien des produits sur lesquels la taxe est acquittée et les cigarettes vendues dans d'autres pays. Elle visait aussi à régler le problème de la contrebande occasionnelle pratiquée par ceux qui effectuent leurs achats outre-frontière.

Cependant, après l'instauration de cette taxe, il est devenu évident que les fournisseurs aux États-Unis seraient en mesure d'éviter de payer la taxe en s'approvisionnant en produits du tabac pour le marché canadien à l'extérieur du Canada. En conséquence, même si la taxe a été efficace à court terme tant que d'autres sources d'approvisionnement en cigarettes canadiennes n'étaient pas disponibles, elle ne serait pas une mesure efficace dans les efforts que déploie le gouvernement

CUSTOMS TARIFF

MEASURE TO AMEND

The House proceeded to the consideration of Bill C-102, an act to amend the Customs Tariff, the Excise Act, the Excise Tax Act, the Customs Act, the Criminal Code and a related act, as reported (with amendments) from a legislative committee.

Hon. Pierre Blais (for the Minister of Finance) moved that the bill be concurred in.

Motion agreed to.

Mr. Blais (for the Minister of Finance) moved that the bill be read the third time and passed.

Mr. Marcel R. Tremblay (Parliamentary Secretary to Deputy Prime Minister and Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, I am pleased to speak on third reading on Bill C-102, which contains the legislative amendments to implement a number of excise tax and tariff measures announced over the past 20 months. Many of these proposals have already been implemented through notices of ways and means motions tabled at the time of their announcement. Among the measures are tariff changes to reduce cross-border shopping and a range of initiatives to address the problem of tobacco smuggling and tax evasion.

Hon. members are no doubt aware that the growth in tobacco smuggling over the past few years has had a profound economic and social impact. Domestic sales of tobacco products have fallen significantly over the last year and a half, particularly in some parts of the country. The result of falling tobacco sales has been a substantial loss in business for those in the wholesale and retail trade.

Criminal organizations are becoming increasingly involved in the packaging of tobacco products and are using the profits from illegal sales of tobacco to finance other criminal activities.

Tobacco smuggling and tax evasion have also had a serious impact on the fiscal and social policies of the federal government. Revenues from tobacco taxes have declined as Canadian smokers switched to contraband tobacco products. This decline in tobacco tax revenues, which are used to fund important government programs and services, has considerably outpaced the decline in overall tobacco consumption. As well, government health policies to discourage smoking are being undermined by the availability of inexpensive tobacco on the black market.

Without strong action by the government, the level of smuggling would continue to increase, with the resulting costs for the public and private sectors alike. This concern was the basis for the enforcement and control measures announced by the Minister of Finance and the Minister of National Revenue last spring to deter tobacco smuggling. Bill C-102 provides the legislative authority to implement these measures, which can be summarized as follows: tighter controls on the distribution and sale of duty-free tobacco products in Canada; improved markings on tobacco products to better identify duty-free tobacco products; the addition of "proceeds of crime" provisions to the Excise Act and the Customs Act to enable law enforcement agencies to seize the profits made by organized crime from tobacco smuggling and tax evasion; and significantly higher criminal penalties for people caught smuggling tobacco into Canada or selling contraband tobacco products in Canada.

On this last point, I would like to note that amendments were proposed during consideration of this bill by the legislative committee to further increase the penalties for the smuggling and illegal sale of tobacco products under the Excise Act and Customs Act. I am pleased to report that these amendments were approved by the committee and are included in Bill C-102 for consideration by hon. members today.

I should add that over the past year the government has allocated substantial new resources to Revenue Canada and the RCMP to enable these agencies to strengthen their enforcement efforts both at the border and within Canada. These additional resources, together with the higher penalties, new controls on the sale and distribution of duty-free tobacco and the addition of "proceeds of crime" provisions in this bill are vital components of the government's measures to address the tobacco smuggling problem and will improve the government's enforcement efforts in this area considerably.

This bill also implements the excise tax on tobacco products for export or for sale through duty-free shops that was announced in February 1992.

The purpose of this tax was to reduce the incentive to smuggle by narrowing the price differential between Canadian tobacco products for sale in the Canadian tax-paid market and those sold in other countries.

While the tax was effective in reducing the supply of contraband tobacco products in Canada in the weeks following its introduction, it quickly became apparent that its effectiveness would be severely limited in the longer term once suppliers in the U.S. were able to obtain Canadian-type tobacco products outside of Canada. The government therefore suspended collection of the tax in April 1992, when it announced the introduction of additional tobacco enforcement and control measures, which are among those I described a few moments ago.

Bill C-102 also addresses another difficulty Canadian wholesalers and retailers have had to face: cross-border shopping.

Last year the Minister of Finance indicated to the Canadian Retail Council's National Task Force on Cross-Border Shopping that, to help deal with this serious problem, the government would be prepared to remove tariffs on imported consumer products that are not made in Canada and are purchased by cross-border shoppers, where the tariff contributes to higher prices in Canada.

The task force identified a number of products and after consultations with all interested parties it was determined that the tariffs on about 25 products could be removed. These tariff removals represent approximately $1 billion worth of annual imports and about $60 million in duty. Examples are video cassette recorders, microwave ovens, sewing machines, cameras and telephone answering machines.

Canadian consumers benefit as lower prices for these imported goods are passed on by the retailers and wholesalers. The retailers and wholesalers, and the economy in general, benefit as these measures encourage consumers to shop in Canada.

The response to this initiative has been very positive. Department of Finance officials are continuing to work with Canadian industry and the Retail Council of Canada to identify other consumer products on which tariffs can be removed.

I would also like to touch very briefly on some of the other excise and tariff measures contained in this bill.

Hon. members will recall that in the 1992 budget the Minister of Finance announced the elimination of the 8.5 cent per litre excise tax on the ethanol and methanol portions of blended fuels. This measure, which will be enacted by Bill C-102, will encourage the development and use of ethanol and methanol fuels made from renewable feedstocks. The use of these fuels provides a number of environmental benefits, such as a reduction in carbon dioxide emissions.

The bill also contains a number of other tariff changes. Most of these are technical but some of them remove duties in response to requests from Canadian businesses. These amendments cover a variety of products such as peach trays and light bars for emergency vehicles but in my view the most significant change is the extension of duty-free entry to materials and parts imported by manufacturers who make goods that are incorporated into other products that are exported.

Previously those manufacturers could only get a refund of duties after the finished products were exported. Immediate duty relief was restricted to manufacturers who were both importers of the parts and materials and exporters of the finished goods. The extension of this privilege to intermediate producers is a big step in improving the competitive position of those producers.

In conclusion, I would like to emphasize the importance of the provisions in Bill C-102. In particular, this bill contains important measures to address the cross-border shopping problem. As well, the measures that will be enacted by this bill to combat tobacco smuggling will ensure that Canadian enforcement agencies have the proper means to go after and dismantle the criminal organizations involved in the illegal tobacco trade.

I therefore ask hon. members to support the passage of this bill on third reading.

[English]

Mr. Bob Speller (Haldimand—Norfolk): Mr. Speaker, I welcome this opportunity to speak today on Bill C-102.

Basically this bill responds to the cross-border shopping problem and provides additional measures to counteract tobacco smuggling. I think everyone here recognizes the problems of cross-border shopping and tobacco smuggling. We as legislators have been asked by the Canadian people to do something about this problem. I know that we all feel that not enough is being done to attack this epidemic and not enough is being done to attack the whole problem of contraband cigarettes.

This bill was introduced in consultation with the tobacco industry. It is aware of the seriousness of the problem of cross-border shopping and smuggling and understands that it has a role to play in doing something about this problem. However, while this bill takes a first step to deal with the problem of smuggled tobacco by changing packaging rules and imposing stricter penalties for those who deal in these products it does nothing to address the root of the problem, which is high tobacco taxes.

Today as we study this bill I would like to speak specifically about the major problem of smuggling tobacco products in this country because it greatly affects my area of Haldimand—Norfolk. My argument is this: I believe that excessively high taxation on tobacco has created a prohibition-like environment in which otherwise law-abiding citizens are either selling or buying smuggled tobacco.

People from every walk of life, young and old, professional and welfare recipients, are in on the illegal action. All feel that they are over-taxed and for this reason have convinced themselves that buying or selling illegal tobacco is socially acceptable. They think that taxes on cigarettes are too high and that it is not a crime to buy or sell them. Many ordinary Canadians feel no compunction about buying or bypassing this tax-related law. Canadians now wink at cigarette smugglers the same way as Americans winked at the American bootleggers of the 1920s.

Smuggling is dividing communities. It is dividing native communities, inspiring the creation of criminal conspiracies, increasing violence for retailers, and goes hand in hand with the drug trade. In fact, organized crime is turning its attention to the illicit trade of tobacco because the profit from illegal tobacco is much greater than that of drugs and the penalties are not as severe.

There is no dispute in this country over the root cause of smuggling. It is high tobacco taxes which have become such a large component of the product's cost and price that they may offer a massive potential profit margin to those who are able and willing to acquire and trade in cigarettes on which no tax has been paid.

It is difficult to understand why a government would allow something illegal to occur right under its nose because it is politically correct to do so. In other words, because of pressure from non-smoking groups and my friend here in the NDP both federal and provincial governments are afraid to deal with the tobacco taxation problem. They would rather continue with their high taxation policy, which we all know is only conducive to smuggling.

One would think that the federal government, knowing that it has contributed to a billion dollar organized crime industry, might start taking seriously this whole problem of the sale of illegal tobacco. What I find so frustrating about this whole situation is that the solution is simple. We should roll back the taxes. This answer was not arrived at in recent days or recent weeks. The tobacco industry and many Canadians have been offering this government a clear solution. The rolling back of tobacco taxes is not only a peaceful solution to the problem but one which makes sheer common sense.

The fact of the matter is that the RCMP can no longer deal with the problem because the problem is just too big. The RCMP concedes that enforcement is not effective in curbing smuggling. It says what is even more problematic is that enforcement efforts will just drive the illicit tobacco trade underground and into the hands of organized crime, which I think for all of us is really a frightening thought.

• (1600)

After all, Canada has taken a lot of pride in the fact that it has been regarded as the number one country in the world in which to live. According to the UN, one of the reasons why it achieves such high marks is that it offers relative safety to Canadians. The nurturing of organized crime in Canada will not keep us at number one for very long.

Under the provision of Standing Order 78(3), I give notice of my intention to move a time allocation motion at the next sitting of the House for the purpose of allotting a specified number of days and hours for the consideration and disposal of proceedings at the said stages of the said bill.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): Before I recognize the hon. member for Essex—Kent it is my duty, pursuant to Standing Order 38, to inform the House that the questions to be raised tonight at the time of adjournment are as follows: the hon. member for Ottawa—Vanier—Budget; the hon. member for Notre-Dame-de-Grâce—Immigration; the hon. member for Markham—Whitchurch—Stouffville—Child Pornography; the hon. member for New Westminster—Burnaby—Violence against women; the hon. member for Prince George—Bulkley Valley—Softwood lumber.

CUSTOMS TARIFF

MEASURE TO AMEND

The House resumed consideration of the motion of Mr. Mazankowski that Bill C-102, an act to amend the Customs Tariff, the Excise Act, the Excise Tax Act, the Customs Act, the Criminal Code and a related act, be read the third time and passed.

Mr. Jerry Pickard (Essex—Kent): Mr. Speaker, it is my privilege to speak on Bill C-102, which is a very complicated bill for a lot of different Canadians.

I have very mixed feelings about the bill and certainly I can understand what many other Canadians have said. There certainly is a health problem with regard to smoking. Everyone in this House and everyone in this country recognizes that to be a true fact.

We also know that smoking is very tax-high revenue for the government. As mentioned earlier by my colleague, taxes have gone up some 600 per cent in the last 10 years. This shows that maybe the wrong focus has gone toward smoking and I would say alcohol as well. We look at a government that is promoting through taxation smoking and alcohol, in fact deriving the greatest share of the revenues through both, and yet many in this country would say we question the value of cigarettes and alcohol.

My colleagues on the far left of the House, the New Democratic Party, have suggested that there are extreme health problems. From hearing my colleagues from the NDP and as well some of the colleagues from across the way I have to ask why the policy is not to ban smoking in this country. It seems to me that if the health problem they are presenting and they are saying they will end the smoking issue, then it would be a logical step to ban smoking in this country. I certainly do not think that has been done either by the government side or by the NDP, who purport to be the great saviours in terms of health problems.

An hon. member: Because they are hypocrites.

Mr. Pickard: There is a major economical question involved with this bill. Absolutely no one will debate that $34 per carton of cigarettes is a very healthy revenue for the government. It has escalated so much in the last 10 years that it has become a law enforcement problem. That problem then starts to stem out into organized crime which is smuggling cigarettes into this country, causing a second social problem which is the illegal use of cigarettes in the country.

Many people in the RCMP as well as in customs and excise have compared it to our prohibition days with alcohol. Now many organized crime groups are bringing cigarettes in by the truckload and distributing them throughout the country. These illegal cigarettes are raising revenue in this country of as much as $1 billion annually. That is a tremendous problem for our law enforcement agencies. I would say that part of this bill does deal with that problem and corrects some of that. The imposition of fines of up to $200,000, the extra fines that would be imposed on people who bring illegal cigarettes into the country, is good. That portion of the bill is going to stop Canadian-made cigarettes from going over to the United States and then being brought back into Canada.

The real crux of the problem is the fact that we have escalated the cost of a product that many people in this country legally use, are addicted to and have chosen to use. We have escalated the cost of that product so much that people from every walk of life in Canada, from every sector of our society, are purchasing cigarettes illegally and at the most economical prices. It is a tendency that I see happening not only in the tobacco industry but in all facets of Canadian life.

[English]

Hon. Ralph Ferguson (Lambton—Middlesex): Mr. Speaker, I am pleased to take part in this debate today on Bill C-102. I want to speak very briefly on the issue of taxes and tobacco smuggling.

I want to put on record first of all that I too am very concerned about the volumes of tobacco being smuggled. About one pack in six that is consumed in Canada is indeed smuggled. It represents about $1.6 billion in federal and provincial tax revenues. Smuggling profits are estimated to be about $800 million. This represents 48 million cartons of cigarettes, eight times that of 1990, an increase of 650 per cent in smuggling in two years.

This is primarily because governments kept insisting they were going to raise the taxes on cigarettes and tobacco at both federal and provincial levels. Of course in doing so, on the pretext that it is a health risk, and we admit that it is, they have created a whole new underground economy in smuggling. That underground economy applies not just to tobacco but also applies to alcoholic beverages.

The tax rate in Canada for example is 67 per cent, compared to the United States which is 30 per cent. In Europe it is 75 per cent. The difference between the price of a carton of Canadian cigarettes in Canada versus the United States is about $35 per carton. It is not much wonder that there has been a vast increase in the volume of smuggling.

These tax increases have indeed created an underground economy, just as the GST is contributing to an underground economy based on cash being paid for services. That in itself is becoming a very serious problem in this country. We warned the government during the GST debate that this would happen, but of course it turned a blind eye.

The legislation as originally drafted would have unfairly penalized Canada's land frontier duty free shop industry in an attempt by the government to correct problems created by the government's regressive tax regime and lax enforcements. The original clause 73 would have regulated the sales of duty free shops. In terms of correspondence, one operator who lives close to my riding said: "Presently all Canadian duty free shop operators are adhering to a one carton, two tin limit on all sales of cigarettes and fine cut tobacco".

The reason for this is that these duty free shop operators recognized the problem and did not want to be part of it. They voluntarily, as an organization of their own people, put on a limit of what they would sell to people moving out of Canada, whether it is tourists from the United States or Canadians going to the United States.

The question then is why proceed with legislation limiting the sales from Canadian duty free shops if it has been demonstrated and recognized by the Department of Finance that the Canadian duty free shops are not part of the smuggling problem. At a time when the Canadian duty free shop industry as a whole is facing significantly increased competition from the United States, the only consequence of such a restrictive action would be to provide United States retailers with an additional competitive advantage and the subsequent loss of millions of dollars in tourist revenues.

The Canadian duty-free shop industry plays a key role in the Canadian economy through its employment of hundreds of Canadian workers and the generation of substantial tax and revenue dollars for the federal and provincial governments. The vast majority of the duty free shop industry is composed of small to medium sized businesses owned by Canadian citizens.

I had the privilege of being on the steering committee as a co-chair of that original committee that set up the Canadian duty free shop criteria. I am very proud of what these people have done. I am proud of the leadership they have shown in this regard and certainly I am very pleased that they voluntarily took the lead to try to control this terrible problem.

There has been an amendment passed in committee that recognizes their concerns and clause 73 no longer includes these duty free shops. Of course that means recognition of the fact that they are not part of the smuggling problem.

Over the last 10 years federal tobacco taxes have increased by 18.7 per cent per year on average and provincially 18.1 per cent. In 1980-81 the federal government collected $811 million in tobacco taxes. In 1990-91 the federal government collected $2.25 billion in taxes from tobacco. It has increased the taxes by 47 per cent since 1988 alone. Total tobacco sales by producers in 1991 totalled $310 million of which the federal government collected $2.25 billion in taxes. The entire Department

Senator Olson: I give this much notice because further action is essential. We are well into the spring season on the prairies, and therefore the minister may need some time to get all of the details together. I did not want to surprise him with this kind of question, because next Monday will be May 3. By that time, the farmers desperately need to know what the government intends to do in order to deliver on its solemn promise that there will a third line of defence, if and when it is needed.

ORDERS OF THE DAY

EXCISE ACT
EXCISE TAX ACT
CUSTOMS ACT
CRIMINAL CODE

BILL TO AMEND—SECOND READING

Hon. J. Michael Forrestall moved the second reading of Bill C-102, to amend the Customs Tariff, the Excise Act, the Excise Tax Act, the Customs Act, the Criminal Code and a related Act.

He said: Honourable senators, Bill C-102 will implement a number of tariff and excise measures that have been announced in the other place over the past 20 months. The key elements of this bill include a broad range of legislative amendments to implement the government's plan. The one I have just indicated was announced last spring to combat tobacco smuggling and tax evasion, and tariff changes to address the problem of cross-border shopping announced in mid-February of 1992.

Honourable senators are aware that the growth in tobacco smuggling in Canada over the past few years has had serious consequences both for the government and the private sector. In particular, domestic sales in tobacco products have fallen significantly in many parts of the country. The decline in sales is hurting Canadian wholesalers and retailers involved in the legal tobacco trade.

Tobacco smuggling and tax evasion have also had a serious impact on this government's fiscal and social policies over the past two years. As more Canadian smokers have switched to tax-free, smuggled tobacco products, revenues from tobacco taxes have declined by significantly more than expected, based on historical consumption patterns. These revenues have been, and are, used to fund important government programs and services.

As well, honourable senators, inexpensive tobacco products available on the black market are undermining the government's health policies to discourage tobacco consumption through higher tobacco taxes.

To respond to the problems of tobacco smuggling and tax evasion, the Minister of Finance and the Minister of National Revenue announced in February and April of 1992 a series of measures designed to deter smuggling, including important enforcement and control initiatives.

Honourable senators may be aware that in view of the substantial increases in tobacco taxes in recent years, the current penalties under the Customs Act and the Excise Act for persons caught evading federal taxes and duties on tobacco are no longer considered an adequate deterrent to smuggling. In addition to increasing substantially the fines for smuggling and possession of contraband tobacco, Bill C-102 provides clear authority for imposing a jail term as an option for certain offences, including the sale of smuggled cigarettes. The offence of selling or possessing contraband tobacco is the most frequent charge laid by the RCMP against those involved in the illicit tobacco trade.

Bill C-102 also includes important provisions to help law enforcement agencies in their work of breaking up smuggling operations. Indeed, with the evidence that has come to light, these operations could be described as being somewhat in the sphere or orbit of organized crime.

In particular, the "proceeds of crime" provisions of the Criminal Code will be extended to allow the seizure and forfeiture to the Crown of the profits made from tobacco smuggling. As well, the wire-tap provisions of the Criminal Code will be expanded to include tobacco offences.

The problem of diversions of duty-free tobacco within Canada is addressed in Bill C-102 through the introduction of tighter controls on the sale and distribution of tax-free products in Canada. These tighter controls include limiting duty-free exports to direct exports by tobacco manufacturers, as well as limiting the number of suppliers of duty-free tobacco to diplomats and sales of duty-free tobacco through bonded warehouses.

Bill C-102 reinforces the marking requirement for packages of tobacco products that are exported or sold duty free in Canada. The requirements, which will be set out in regulations made under the Excise Tax Act, will assist enforcement agencies across the country in the identification of contraband tobacco products.

I should add that the government has already allocated substantial new resources to customs and to the RCMP to enable these agencies to strengthen their enforcement efforts both at the border and within Canada. These proposed legislative amendments are an important part of the government's efforts to combat tobacco smuggling and tax evasion. They are designed to stem the loss in revenues, provide enforcement agencies with the necessary support to attack organized tobacco-smuggling rings, and generally to reduce the incentive to smuggle tobacco products into Canada. Moreover, the reduction of tobacco smuggling will complement the government's initiatives to discourage Bill C-102 also includes amendments to the Criminal Code and the Prohibited Goods Schedule of the Customs Tariff to correct an oversight in last year's gun control package. In general, the purpose of these changes is to permit authorized shooting competitors, manufacturers and dealers to import and export over-capacity cartridge magazines.

In conclusion, Bill C-102 is an important bill. It proposes a number of measures that will make a significant contribution to the government's efforts to address the problems of cross-border shopping and tobacco smuggling. While some of these measures, such as the elimination of the excise tax on the ethanol and methanol portions of motor vehicle fuels, have been implemented on the basis of Ways and Means Motions, other measures, such as the proceeds of crime amendments and tougher amendments for tobacco smugglers and those involved in the contraband tobacco trade, will not take effect until such time as this bill receives Royal Assent.

Honourable senators may wonder why we are dealing in this manner with customs and tariff matters which, as a rule, are dealt with at the time of consideration of national budgets. They will note that this variance in procedure is not permanent but is being tried as another method of dealing more expeditiously with matters of this nature. It may very well be that in the future we will revert to the customary practice of introducing these measures at the time of the introduction of budgets and supported by the accompanying documentation.

I thank honourable senators for their attention. At the appropriate time, I will refer the matter to the Banking, Trade and Commerce committee.

Hon. M. Lorne Bonnell: Honourable senators, let me first congratulate my good friend Senator Forrestall for his clear and concise description of this bill and for giving us most of the details.

This bill will amend the Customs Tariff and the Excise Act, the Excise Tax Act, the Customs Act, the Criminal Code and related acts. The amendments to these acts are an attempt to address the very serious issues of tobacco smuggling, tobacco tax evasion and cross-border shopping. I will take a few moments to review the amendments contained in the bill.

The purpose of the bill is to enact a number of excise tax and tariff measures which have been announced over the past 18 months in response to an increase in tobacco smuggling and the obvious loss of tax revenue. The government introduced tighter controls on the distribution and sale of duty-free tobacco products in Canada, improved the markings on tobacco products, made new provisions to facilitate seizure of assets required to organize criminal activities, and increased penalties for persons caught smuggling tobacco into Canada and for possession of contraband tobacco products in Canada.

In an attempt to combat cross-border shopping, tariffs are being removed on approximately 25 consumer products which are not made in Canada. It is the government's contention that by lowering the prices of these imported goods, consumers will be encouraged to shop at home.

Furthermore, this bill eliminates the 8.5 cent-per-litre excise tax on ethanol and methanol portions of blended fuels. It is hoped that this measure will encourage the development and use of fuels made by renewable stocks. These small measures are but the first of many needed to address the multi-faceted issue of tobacco smuggling and cross-border shopping.

I think we should ask ourselves why such amendments to these statutes are necessary. Why are Canadians taking it upon themselves to commit these acts? I believe that tobacco smuggling and cross-border shopping are symptoms of an overall tax revolt by Canadians. As noted by a fellow caucus member in the other place, "excessively high taxation on tobacco has created a Prohibition-like environment in which otherwise law-abiding citizens are either selling or buying smuggled tobacco." Unfortunately the amendments contained in this bill only go to prove that while this government may recognize the seriousness of these issues, it does not fully comprehend the profound importance of adequately addressing them.

The root of this problem is the high taxation facing Canadians day after day. Canadians have been subject to 38 tax increases since the Conservative Party was elected in 1984. That is 37 tax increases plus the very destructive and devastating goods and services tax. We on this side of the chamber hear from Canadians every day about their hatred for that very regressive and unfair tax. The number of letters we receive from individuals across the country should make the government realize how damaging the GST has been for overall employment opportunities and for growth in our economy.

However, we should recognize that, in addition to these 38 tax measures, Canadians have also been hard hit in the pocket book by other harmful pieces of legislation. For example, the passage of Bill C-22 and Bill C-91 have certainly increased costs to Canadians. By amending the Patent Act to give multinational brand name companies increased patent protection for higher-priced prescription drugs, some Canadians have been forced to forgo needed medication due to the increased costs.

I say to the government: If you do not realize it now, you will certainly realize the effects of all your regressive measures after the next election when Canadians have had an opportunity to speak at the polls.

Taxation is a complicated issue. Let us take a look at income tax rates for individuals in comparison to big business corporations. I think it is a very telling picture.

In 1984, as a percentage of the total federal budgetary revenue, personal income tax represented 41 per cent. In 1992 this figure had increased to 47 per cent. Interestingly though, big business and corporations represented 13.2 per cent of the total budgetary revenue in 1984, and in 1992 this figure had decreased to 7 per cent.

• (1500)

Individual Canadians paid $92.7 billion in taxes in 1990. That figure rose to $104.6 billion in 1991, an 11 per cent increase. In comparison, corporations paid $14.6 billion in 1991; that figure decreased to $12.4 billion in 1992. I ask you: Is this fair?

I wish to make a few comments on the tobacco industry because I believe it is imperative to understand the situation this government has created by increasing taxes. As noted by the Canadian Chamber of Commerce in their report, "The Cross-Border Shopping Issue":

> High taxes on these sin products — alcohol, beer and cigarettes — are explicit social policy decisions of the federal government and provincial governments that are meant to meet key social objectives, the most important of which is to discourage consumption of these products, cigarettes in particular. These objectives have received a considerable amount of support by an analyst. However, the taxes may have become so high on some products that they are encouraging cross-border shopping and smuggling. Most sin products have a low price elasticity of demand which means that large changes in price do not change the demand by much. Nevertheless, the taxes may now be so high as to encourage smuggling of these goods into Canada.

Honourable senators, especially those of you who are non-smokers, a legal carton of 200 cigarettes costs a smoker today $47.13. Out of this amount, the manufacturer receives $7.79 and the distributor and/or retailer collects $3.38. The remaining $35.96 is a combination of federal and provincial taxes. In comparison, during the War, honourable senators, I can well remember sending my brother a carton of cigarettes for a dollar.

An illegal carton of cigarettes sells for, on average, $22.50. The contraband tobacco trade has a street-value of $1 billion which is costing the federal and provincial governments an estimated $1.4 billion per year in lost revenues.

Over the last ten years, cigarette taxes have increased 620 per cent in comparison to alcohol taxes, which have increased 68 per cent, and personal income taxes, which have increased by 66 per cent.

The Canadian Federation of Independent Business in their report entitled, "Cross-Border Shopping in Canada— The $10 Billion Drain", found in 1991 that the price of a carton of cigarettes was 54 per cent higher in Canada than in the United States. A case of 24 bottles of beer was 40 per cent higher in Canada. The price of a litre of regular gas was 38 per cent higher than in the United States.

The report goes on to state:

> Prices for these three items have not always been so much higher in Canada. In 1984, just before the drastic increase in cross-border shopping, the differential in the price of gasoline was 17 per cent, half of today's gap. In 1979, the price of gasoline was cheaper in Canada while the price of beer was only 6 per cent higher and the price of cigarettes 19 per cent higher.

Honourable senators, I think we all recognize the importance of the revenue generated by these sin taxes. However, I believe we need to have a balanced approach in defining our taxation system. Only by creating a fair taxation system will we be able to fully address the very serious issues of cross-border shopping and tobacco smuggling.

In conclusion, honourable senators, I should like to raise one area of concern which I think the committee should examine in regard to this bill. The bill also implements the excise tax of 4 cents per cigarette, or $8 per carton, imposed on cigarettes for export or for sale through duty-free shops. The tax was in effect for only eight weeks, from February 13, 1992 to April 8, 1992, due to concerns about its long-term effects.

Honourable senators, this bill provides for the reimposition of the tax by an Order in Council. I should like to know by what authority this government intends to impose this tax. I do not believe that the government should have the authority to raise taxes by Order in Council, not by 4 per cent nor by 8 per cent.

For these reasons, I have to vote against this bill on second reading.

Hon. L. Norbert Thériault: Honourable senators, very briefly, I want to make the point again, as I have done many times in this house and in the other place, that I believe the high rates of taxation imposed on tobacco and alcohol, especially on tobacco, have caused an increase in the number of small crimes in Canada greater than any other measure ever taken by government.

I am quite aware of the ill effects of smoking, and I believe that government should try to educate people against the use of tobacco. However, as a result of the debate on free trade, a perception has been left with the Canadian people that they should be able to come and go across the border and bring goods into the country without any problem. This government has set the psychology for that perception.

The Standing Senate Committee on Banking, Trade and Commerce, to which was referred Bill C-102, to amend the Customs Tariff, the Excise Act, the Excise Tax Act, the Customs Act, the Criminal Code and a related act, met this day at 11:30 a.m. to give consideration to the bill.

Senator C. William Doody (Chairman) in the Chair.

The Chairman: Honourable senators, I see a quorum. The purpose of the meeting today is to consider Bill C-102, an act to amend the Customs Tariff and various other acts.

The Minister of State for Finance and Privatization, the Honourable John McDermid, is present, and we thank him. Unfortunately, members of the other party in the Senate are not present at this point. I think we should start because the minister's time is limited. They can pick up when they arrive.

I understand that the minister has several officials with him. He may wish to have them join him at the table. They are Patricia Close and Brian Willis.

I understand the minister has an opening statement. Mr. McDermid, if you will, please.

Mr. John McDermid, Minister of State for Finance and Privatization: Mr. Chairman and honourable senators, it is a pleasure to be with you today. The bill that is before you for consideration contains the necessary legislative amendments to implement excise and tariff changes announced over the past 20 months. The primary purpose of the bill is to address the important issues of cross-border shopping, tobacco smuggling and tax evasion. The bill also contains routine administrative and technical tariff changes. Many of the measures have been implemented on the basis of Ways and Means Motions.

The main provisions in this bill that address the problem of smuggling and illegal sales of tobacco products are as follows: The penalties under the Customs Act for smuggling and those under the Excise Act for possession or sale of contraband tobacco products are increased substantially. The much higher penalties for persons caught evading federal tobacco taxes will act, we hope, as a deterrent to dealing in contraband tobacco products.

TÉMOIGNAGES

OTTAWA, le mardi 1er juin 1993

[Traduction]

Le Comité sénatorial permanent des banques et du commerce auquel a été renvoyé le projet de loi C-102, Loi modifiant le Tarif des douanes, la Loi sur l'accise, la Loi sur la taxe d'accise, la Loi sur les douanes, le Code criminel et une loi connexe, se réunit aujourd'hui à 11 h 30 pour en étudier la teneur.

Le sénateur C. William Doody (président) occupe le fauteuil.

Le président: Honorables sénateurs, nous avons le quorum. Nous sommes réunis aujourd'hui pour étudier le projet de loi C-102, Loi modifiant le Tarif des douanes et diverses autres lois.

Le ministre d'État (Finances et privatisation), l'honorable John McDermid, est parmi nous et nous l'en remercions. Malheureusement, les membres de l'autre parti au Sénat ne sont pas encore ici. Je crois que nous devrions commencer étant donné le temps limité dont dispose le ministre. Les retardataires pourront se rattraper lorsqu'ils arriveront.

Je crois comprendre que le ministre est entouré de quelques représentants. Peut-être veut-il qu'il les rejoigne à la table. Il s'agit de Patricia Close et de Brian Willis.

Je crois comprendre que le ministre a une déclaration préliminaire. Monsieur McDermid la parole est à vous.

M. John McDermid, ministre d'État (Finances et privatisation): Monsieur le président et honorables sénateurs, il me fait plaisir d'être ici aujourd'hui. Le projet de loi dont on vous a confié l'étude contient les modifications législatives nécessaires pour la mise en oeuvre des changements relative à l'accise et au tarif qui ont été annoncés depuis les 20 derniers mois. Le projet de loi qui nous intéresse s'attaque aux importants problèmes des achats transfrontières, de la contrebande du tabac et de l'évasion des taxes sur ce produit. Le projet de loi contient aussi des modifications ordinaires à caractère administratif et technique qui s'appliquent au tarif. Un grand nombre des mesures ont été mises en oeuvre grâce à des motions de voies et moyens.

Les principales dispositions de ce projet de loi qui s'attaquent au problème de la contrebande et des ventes illégales des produits du tabac sont les suivantes: les peines prévues aux termes de la Loi sur les douanes en ce qui a trait à la contrebande ainsi que celles régies par la Loi sur l'accise relativement à la possession ou à la vente de produits de tabac de contrebande sont sensiblement resserrées. Nous espérons que l'augmentation marquée des pénalités pour les gens pris à dissimuler les taxes fédérales sur le tabac décourageront la vente des produits de tabac de contrebande.

Proceeds of crime provisions in the Criminal Code are being extended to cover tobacco smuggling and tax evasion offences under the Excise Act and the Customs Act. These new provisions will allow for the seizure, and forfeiture to the Crown, of profits made from the sale of contraband tobacco products and will enable law enforcement agencies to better target organized tobacco smuggling rings. If anyone read the Globe and Mail last Saturday morning, they probably have an idea of what is happening.

The Criminal Code is amended to expand the provisions authorizing the use of wiretaps in certain criminal investigations to include tobacco-related offences. These amendments will allow the RCMP to make more effective use of the new proceeds of crime provisions.

The controls on the distribution and sale of duty-free tobacco products through Customs bonded warehouses are tightened. The more stringent controls, which have been in effect since February 13, 1992, are intended to address the problem of illegal diversions of duty-free tobacco products within Canada.

The marking requirements under the Excise Act are strengthened for packages of tobacco products that are exported or sold on a tax- and duty-free basis in Canada. The new requirements will assist enforcement agencies across the country by making contraband tobacco products easier to identify.

The Excise Tax Act is amended to implement the excise tax imposed on tobacco products for export or for sale through duty free shops. The tax, equal to $8 per carton in the case of cigarettes, was in effect from February 13, 1992 to April 8, 1992, when a range of enforcement and control measures to counteract tobacco smuggling were announced, and collection of the tax suspended.

These proposed legislative amendments, together with the additional resources that have been allocated to Customs and the RCMP, will greatly enhance the efforts of law enforcement agencies to combat tobacco smuggling and tax evasion. By restricting the availability of contraband tobacco products, these measures will stem the losses in government tax revenues and provide relief to legitimate tobacco wholesalers and retailers. They will also complement the government's health policies to reduce tobacco consumption, particularly among young Canadians, through higher tobacco taxes.

There are two other excise tax measures in this bill, Mr. Chairman. The excise tax on the ethanol and methanol portions of blended fuels is eliminated effective April 1, 1992. This change, announced in the February 1992 budget, is Les dispositions relatives aux produits de la criminalité contenues dans le Code criminel sont ajoutées à la Loi sur l'accise et à la Loi sur les douanes de manière à englober les infractions relatives à la contrebande du tabac et à l'évasion des taxes. Ces nouvelles dispositions permettront la saisie des bénéfices réalisés par la vente des produits de tabac de contrebande et permettront aux autorités chargées d'exécuter la loi de mieux cibler les réseaux organisés de contrebande du tabac. Si vous avez lu le Globe and Mail samedi dernier, vous savez probablement ce qui se passe.

Le Code criminel est modifié afin d'y élargir les dispositions autorisant l'utilisation de l'écoute électronique dans certaines enquêtes criminelles de manière à inclure les infractions relatives au tabac. Ces amendements permettront à la GRC d'utiliser de façon plus efficace les nouvelles dispositions relatives aux produits de la criminalité.

On resserre les mesures de contrôle de la distribution et de la vente des produits du tabac non taxés par les entrepôts de douane. Les mesures plus strictes de contrôle, qui sont entrées en vigueur le 13 février 1992, visent à s'attaquer au problème de détournement illégal des produits du tabac détaxés à l'échelle du pays.

On a renforcé les prescriptions relatives au marquage aux termes de la Loi sur l'accise pour les paquets de produits du tabac qui sont exportés ou vendus en franchise au Canada. Les nouvelles prescriptions aideront les autorités chargées d'exécuter la loi partout au pays à mieux identifier les produits sur lesquels les taxes n'ont pas été payées.

La Loi sur l'accise est modifiée afin d'appliquer la taxe d'accise imposée sur les produits du tabac destinés à l'exportation ou à la vente dans des boutiques hors taxes. La taxe, qui correpond à 8 $ le carton dans le cas des cigarettes, a été en vigueur du 13 février au 8 avril 1992, alors qu'ont été annoncées une série de mesures d'exécution et de contrôle visant à lutter contre la contrebande de tabac et la perception de la taxe a été suspendue.

Ces amendements proposés, ainsi que les ressources supplémentaires qui ont été attribuées aux Douanes et à la GRC, aideront grandement les autorités chargées d'exécuter la loi à combattre la contrebande du tabac et l'évasion de la taxe sur ce produit. En limitant la disponibilité des produits du tabac de contrebande, ces mesures diminueront les pertes en revenus fiscaux et aideront les grossistes et les détaillants de produits du tabac légitimes. Elles viendront aussi compléter les lignes directrices du gouvernement en matière de santé visant à diminuer la consommation de tabac, plus particulièrement chez les jeunes Canadiens, en augmentant les taxes sur le tabac.

Ce projet de loi comporte deux autres mesures relatives à la taxe d'accise, monsieur le président. La taxe d'accise sur la partie éthanol-méthanol du mélange d'essences sera éliminée à compter du 1er avril 1992. Ce changement, annoncé dans le later on, will have something to do with increased taxes in the tobacco field to fund health care proposals.

The third way of combating this problem is increased surveillance and moneys to the RCMP to carry out their work and responsibilities, together with provincial police forces, primarily Ontario and Quebec, which are having major problems.

But taxation is not the answer because once you tax to a certain level, it is much easier for companies to pull up stakes in Canada, produce elsewhere and export to Canada. Therefore, you have lost jobs and revenue. It is a balancing act. The major problem is the differential in costs.

Senator Di Nino: Tell me, Mr. Minister, is it true that since that new regime has existed in Canada — i.e., the increase of the excise tax — that revenues accruing to the federal government, the Government of Ontario and the Government of Quebec have fallen substantially?

Mr. McDermid: No, that is not true.

Senator Di Nino: No? I was told by the president of one of the most important tobacco companies in Canada that in his province, Quebec, the provincial government, since the new system came into effect, is losing about $350 million a year. I find that mind-boggling.

Mr. McDermid: I stand to be corrected. We are off our projections by about $300 million in tax revenue from tobacco. It is estimated that we are losing about $1 billion a year, both provincially and federally, due to smuggling.

Senator Di Nino: $1 billion a year?

Mr. McDermid: Yes.

Senator Di Nino: That is a hell of a lot of money, Mr. Minister, in the hands of criminals. I cannot believe that you, with your advisors, cannot find a way to put an end to smuggling. It is most disturbing.

Mr. McDermid: Senator De Bané, the government has been seized with this issue for some time now and has been working in a cooperative manner with the Quebec and Ontario governments. The Ministers of Finance had this on their agenda yesterday. We have doubled our enforcement since 1992 and further enhanced enforcement just this week. Governments are taking this matter very seriously. They are concentrating their efforts on organized crime and its involvement in the tobacco industry. Organized crime is finding this practice of smuggling very profitable and with doit annoncer ultérieurement, aura quelque chose à voir avec les augmentations de taxes sur le tabac pour financer les propositions à cet égard.

Il existe une troisième façon de lutter contre ce problème et c'est d'accroître l'équipe de surveillance et les budgets de la GRC pour les aider à s'acquitter de leurs fonctions et à assumer leurs responsabilités, de concert avec les forces policières provinciales, surtout en Ontario et au Québec, qui sont aux prises avec d'importants problèmes.

Mais la solution ne réside pas dans la «taxation» étant donné que dès que vous imposez un certain niveau, il est beaucoup plus facile pour les entreprises de déménager leurs pénates à l'extérieur du Canada, d'aller produire ailleurs et d'exporter au Canada. Vous perdez ainsi des emplois et des revenus. C'est une question de garder l'équilibre. Le problème réside surtout dans la différence de coûts.

Le sénateur Di Nino: Dites-moi, monsieur le ministre, est-ce vrai que depuis que le nouveau régime est en place au Canada — c'est-à-dire depuis qu'on a augmenté la taxe d'accise — que les revenus que tire le gouvernement fédéral, le gouvernement de l'Ontario et le gouvernement du Québec ont chuté sensiblement?

M. McDermid: Non, ce n'est pas vrai.

Le sénateur Di Nino: Non? Le président d'une des plus importantes sociétés de l'industrie du tabac au Canada m'a dit que dans sa province, le Québec, le gouvernement provincial avait perdu 350 millions de dollars par an depuis que le nouveau régime est en vigueur. C'est ahurissant.

M. McDermid: Qu'on me corrige si je me trompe. Nous sommes en deçà de nos projections d'environ 300 millions en revenus fiscaux provenant du tabac. Selon les estimations, nous perdons environ 1 milliard par an, tant au niveau des provinces que du fédéral à cause de la contrebande.

Le sénateur Di Nino: Un milliard de dollars par an?

M. McDermid: Oui.

Le sénateur Di Nino: C'est toute une somme, monsieur le ministre, dans les mains des criminels. Je ne peux croire que vous, en collaboration avec vos conseillers, ne puissiez rien faire pour mettre fin à la contrebande. C'est très inquiétant.

M. McDermid: Sénateur De Bané, le gouvernement est aux prises avec ce problème depuis un certain temps maintenant et tente d'y trouver une solution en collaboration avec les gouvernements du Québec et de l'Ontario. Les ministres des Finances devaient en discuter hier. Nous avons doublé nos efforts d'application depuis 1992 et les avons de nouveau renforcés cette semaine. Les gouvernements s'intéressent très sérieusement à cette question. Ils concentrent leurs efforts sur le crime organisé et sa présence dans l'industrie du tabac. Le crime organisé trouve cette pratique de la contrebande très less risk than illegal drugs. It is of great concern to all levels of government.

All I can assure you is that we are not treating this matter lightly. Any Minister of Finance who sees half a billion dollars of revenue not coming in, is upset about it and seized with the problem.

I can assure you, senator, that the governments at both the provincial and federal level are seized with this matter and are working on it around the clock.

Senator Sylvain: Mr. Minister, while you were chatting, I was trying to make a cost benefit analysis of what this law does for us, taking into consideration the law of diminishing returns. If we are losing $1 billion a year in taxes, if regular sales and tax revenues are falling, and if we are increasing or doubling our vigilance in an attempt to stop smuggling, has anyone in your department made a cost benefit analysis to see if our efforts are paying off for Canada? Are we getting revenue from this tax? Or is the only purpose of this tax to reduce the number of smokers so that Health and Welfare will not incur huge expenses? Is this a money-making matter, or are we losing money? Is the sole purpose of this exercise Health and Welfare's concern for smokers?

Mr. McDermid: The purpose is two-fold. Part of the purpose of increased taxes is to discourage young people from smoking. That was stated when the then Minister of Finance brought the large increase into force. It was three cents a cigarette back in the 1991 budget.

Taxation moneys from cigarettes can legitimately be applied to health care, although governments do not specifically take funds and apply them to specific things. Health care costs in this country are growing at a tremendous rate and smoke-related diseases are at a high level. The more we can encourage people not to smoke, it follows that health care costs will be lower. The theory is that the user pays. If you smoke, you will pay a fair amount of tax, which helps support the tremendous amount of money we are putting into health care in this country.

Our cost of enforcement is under $100 million, but that figure is still fairly significant. Federal tobacco taxes in 1992 were $3 billion. I am not sure how you calculate cost effectiveness, but in that particular instance, yes, it is still an important source of revenue for the government.

There is a tremendous amount of tax evasion at the present time because of smuggling; that must be curtailed. The increase in fines for tobacco smugglers, with increased enforcement and a few good arrests over the next while, may lucrative parce qu'elle est moins risquée que le trafic des drogues illégales. Tous les paliers de gouvernement se préoccupent grandement de cette question.

Tout ce que je puis vous dire c'est que nous ne traitons pas de cette question à la légère. Tout ministre des Finances qui constate qu'il perd un demi-million de dollars de revenus, est contrarié et est saisi du problème.

Je puis vous assurer, sénateur, que les gouvernements tant au niveau provincial que fédéral sont saisis de cette question et qu'ils s'acharnent jour et nuit à y trouver des solutions.

Le sénateur Sylvain: Monsieur le ministre, pendant que vous bavardiez, j'essayais de faire une analyse de rentabilité de ce que cette loi fait pour nous, en tenant compte de la loi du rendement non proportionnel. Si nous perdons 1 milliard de dollars par an en taxes, si les recettes découlant des ventes et des taxes ordinaires diminuent, et si nous augmentons ou doublons notre vigilance pour tenter de mettre fin à la contrebande, y a-t-il quelqu'un au sein de votre ministère qui a fait une analyse de rentabilité afin de voir si nos efforts rapportent quelque chose au Canada? Cette taxe nous rapporte-t-elle quelque chose? Ou le seul but de cette dernière consiste-t-il à réduire le nombre de fumeurs pour que Santé et Bien-être n'engage pas d'énormes dépenses? S'agit-il de faire de l'argent ou en perdons-nous? Le seul but de cet exercice est-il la préoccupation de Santé et Bien-être pour les fumeurs?

M. McDermid: Le but comporte deux volets. En augmentant les taxes, on voulait en partie décourager les jeunes de fumer. Cet objectif a été énoncé lorsque le ministre de l'époque a appliqué d'importantes hausses. C'était trois sous la cigarette dans le budget de 1991.

Les recettes fiscales provenant des cigarettes peuvent légitimement être appliquées aux soins de santé, même si les gouvernements n'affectent pas nécessairement les fonds à des fins particulières. Les coûts des soins de santé dans ce pays augmentent à un rythme effarant et les maladies associées au tabagisme atteignent un niveau élevé. Il va sans dire que plus nous encouragerons les gens à cesser de fumer plus les coûts de soins de santé diminueront. La théorie veut que ce soit l'utilisateur qui paie. Si vous fumez, vous paierez des taxes élevées, ce qui aide à supporter les sommes astronomiques que nous investissons dans les soins de santé dans ce pays.

Il nous en coûte moins de 100 millions de dollars pour l'application, mais ce chiffre reste très important. Les taxes fédérales sur le tabac en 1992 étaient de 3 milliards de dollars. Je ne sais pas comment vous calculez le rapport coût-efficacité, mais dans ce cas particulier, oui, il s'agit toujours d'une importante source de revenu pour le gouvernement.

À l'heure actuelle, la contrebande des cigarettes entraîne une importante évasion des taxes sur ce produit; il faut y mettre fin. L'augmentation des amendes pour les contrebandiers de tabac, assortie du renforcement des mesures d'application pendant

SEIZED PROPERTY MANAGEMENT ACT

MEASURE TO ENACT

Hon. Don Mazankowski (for the Minister of Justice) moved that Bill C-123, an act respecting the management of certain property seized or restrained in connection with certain offences, the disposition of certain property on the forfeiture thereof and the sharing of the proceeds of disposition therefrom in certain circumstances, be read the second time and referred to a legislative committee in the Departmental envelope.

Hon. Doug Lewis (Solicitor General of Canada): Madam Speaker, I must say that I am extremely pleased to speak to this bill. That may sound strange, but this bill has been in the preparation stage for an awfully long time and I am pleased that it is now introduced in the House so we can deal with it.

This bill gives the government the authority and flexibility to deal with property which has been seized and restrained from the time that takes place until the property is forfeited under the Criminal Code, the Narcotic Control Act or the Food and Drugs Act.

This is a bill the importance of which will probably not be readily apparent to Canadians, but it will be greatly effective in improving Canadian society. It is an essential part of our law enforcement strategy.

This bill manoeuvres around technical and legal obstacles behind which organized crime hides the profits of the drug trade, international smuggling or other serious crimes which attack our youth, industry and society as a whole.

Where criminals are able to conceal the profits of their activities it is no secret this is used to further more crime. Organized criminals have long attempted to invest the proceeds of their crimes in legitimate business thus erecting a front for their illegitimate activities and providing a permanent and well-hidden camouflage for their crime-raised money.

Bill C-123 adds to the legislative tools given law enforcement officers from coast to coast in stripping criminals of their cover by facilitating the management of seized assets until they are forfeited and then facilitating their sale.

• (1010)

In 1989 the Government of Canada first enacted proceeds of crime legislation. The purpose of the legislation was to take action against organized crime, particularly drug trafficking and money laundering.

At that time we put a great deal of focus on the process whereby we seized property and forfeited it because we were concerned about taking away people's property. I think we got that right but this bill corrects the manner in which it is managed while it goes from the point of seizure to the point of forfeiture.

It is a weapon in crime prevention that we think will help to counter the growth of the drug trade because putting the profit potential of crime at risk will not only reduce the motivation for traffickers but will also undermine the ability of organized crime to use its accumulated profits to further finance trafficking endeavours.

From 1989 to the end of 1992 the RCMP seized some $76.3 million in suspected proceeds of crime. In the same period the courts forfeited approximately $17.7 million and levied fines of $12.5 million.

The types of assets that have been seized are what make this bill so important. There is no trick to managing a bank account. That is easy. What the RCMP and other police forces are dealing with are assets such as cars, airplanes, boats, homes and businesses. It is difficult to manage them and maintain their value after seizure, before forfeiture and up to sale.

This act balances the Proceeds of Crime (money laundering) Act which was enacted in 1991 and which provided another set of measures to strengthen the ability of the government to use the proceeds of crime provisions effectively.

I have to say that despite the creation of these legislative tools the proceeds of crime policies have not been maximized, and that is what we are attacking in this bill.

One of the reasons we have not been able to maximize it is because there has been an absence of a coherent and effective asset management regime pending the forfeiture of the seized assets. The management of seized assets requires considerable human and financial resources, particularly where real property or ongoing businesses must be managed.

Unfortunately the proceeds of crime legislation did not clearly allocate responsibility for asset management, nor did it adequately address the need to allocate the legal responsibility for the maintenance of restrained property and the need for clear authority to advance funds as may be necessary to maintain property or compensate creditors.

It is one thing for Treasury Board to manage the operations of the government but it is quite another thing when Treasury Board is asked to advance moneys through the RCMP to make sure a ski hill is operating effectively. Those are some of the difficulties we are dealing with. What we are trying to do with this bill is to correct things.

As well as managing the assets I think it is fair to say there has been a strong demand for equitable sharing of the proceeds of crime, both domestically and at the international level.

My notes say that there is a perceived disincentive to co-operation on the part of provincial and local governments whose police forces have conducted long investigations in support of federal prosecutions. There is no question that it goes beyond a disincentive. It is something that has been advanced to me by municipalities across the country in my capacity as Minister of Justice in 1989-90 and as Solicitor General for the past two years.

• (1015)

I would not say that our police forces at the municipal, provincial and federal levels are not doing drug investigations the way they might. I would suggest that they see a much greater opportunity to put more focus on drug prosecutions and really turn the screws on these people who are making money at the expense of the public.

I want to point out that when the question of asset sharing with municipal and provincial authorities has come up, I have maintained two very strong positions. Number one, I believe that they should be shared according to the input into the solution of the crime with a certain amount for the financing of the bureau of asset management. That is fine. We are looking at 10 per cent there.

I believe in sharing with the municipalities and the provinces. I do not believe in the provinces having any control over how much goes to the municipalities. We should have an independent authority saying: "All right, this crime had a third input each by the RCMP, OPP and metro Toronto police, and it should be shared that way". That is the way I feel about it personally and I want that clearly on the record of this House. It should be shared according to input.

The second point I want to make personally is the distinction. It should not go to the actual police force. It should go to the taxing authority that is in charge of the budget of the police force. It would not go to the metropolitan Toronto police force but to the metropolitan Toronto police commission or whatever. It would go to the body that funds the police operations.

In addition to the problems I have just spoken about, the current proceeds provisions in the drug area provide for the disposition of corporate proceeds by the minister of health and welfare. I think it is fair to say this is not a function of which the minister of health and welfare in any government would be the main focus of their activities. If we combine it in legislation which puts a better focus on it and more specific responsibility then we will have a better operation.

There is also a problem in cases which are prosecuted by the provincial attorneys general. Bill C-123 provides for a correction of that. The bill provides for the creation of an office within the Department of Supply and Services which will operate on a cost mutual basis and whose primary task will be in federally initiated prosecutions to manage seized, restrained and forfeited property up until the time of its sale or other disposition.

The act also provides for the sharing of corporate assets within and outside of Canada. The office will be established by the Minister of Supply and Services to allow that minister to have custody and management of any property falling under the scope of this legislation.

Once the office has possession or control over the property it will have the power to manage it in the manner it considers appropriate up until the time the property is disposed of. This includes the advancing of money at a commercial rate of interest if that is necessary to maintain the ongoing operation of the property. It is also anticipated that the office will contract out to the private sector for most of the management services required.

I will give the House an explanation of this and how it will work. If for example the RCMP is about to seize 10 video stores in Vancouver, the idea is not that 10 bureaucrats from Ottawa will fly to Vancouver and operate the video stores while they are going from seizure to forfeiture.

My conception of this as a chartered accountant is that we bring in receivers in bankruptcy. They are in the business of doing this. If that seizure were to take place in the city of Vancouver one would go to a receiver in bankruptcy and contract with it to have people on the ground in that area who do it most effectively rather than create a bureaucracy to be able to jump in and do those kinds of things because the private sector is in the business of doing it.

As well, the office will provide consultative and other services in relation to the seizure or restraint of property in connection with designated drug offences or property that is or may have been obtained through the proceeds of crime.

It is also important that under authority of this bill we will have the ability to share the forfeited proceeds of crime with domestic governments or with foreign governments. This is important because we have to realize that international crime is just what it is, international crime. We co-operate with many other law enforcement bodies and as we receive proceeds it is important that we be able to share with the international governments that have helped us.

In the past we have been the beneficiary of money. Specifically, last year we received approximately a million dollars in U.S. funds from the proceeds of a joint crime investigation. We have the ability to receive but we do not have the ability to reciprocate. I think that is very important.

I think we have the management down. I think we have a regime in place for the sharing of the proceeds and regulation will come forward on that.

As well, the legislation corrects an anomaly that currently affects the provinces of Quebec and New Brunswick. In most of Canada federal prosecutors conduct proceedings related to drug offences. However, in Quebec and New Brunswick drug cases investigated by local or provincial police are handled by provincial prosecutors. The new legislation will provide that where the prosecution of the offences commences at the instance of a government of a province or conducted by or on behalf of that province, any forfeited property will be disposed of as the attorney general of that province directs and not by a minister of the federal government as is currently the case.

I believe that this will be a very effective instrument in our fight against organized crime. We will be finishing off the proceeds of crime legislation that we have already passed and completing the task which will enable us to really put pressure on organized crime in their pocketbooks. That will reduce their ability to continue in an activity that is of absolutely no benefit to Canada whatsoever.

Mr. Russell MacLellan (Cape Breton—The Sydneys): Madam Speaker, I thank the Solicitor General for his remarks. This bill before the House today is well overdue. There have been a lot of shortcomings in the present legislation as the Solicitor General has mentioned. This bill goes a long way to correcting these shortcomings.

We have to look at this bill in committee. There are some questions which have to be examined. Nevertheless if the government is willing, we can move this bill along quite expeditiously.

While we can give careful study and due examination and allow the interested groups to make their comments, if the government is serious about this bill we can have it passed by the time the House adjourns. I am hoping that is the case because as I said initially this legislation is well overdue.

The bill establishes a federal program to share forfeited proceeds of crime with other jurisdictions. These are the jurisdictions that are also involved in drug and other criminal prosecutions. It would include foreign governments as well. This would be in cases where the crime is international in nature and the police forces involved have been Canadian as well as from other countries. The question is: How are these funds to be shared? I think the Solicitor General said that a lot of this is still under review.

• (1025)

It is important that we get at least the basic parameters of how these funds are to be shared set down so that when we pass the bill and in the discussion of the bill we are able to give this very important aspect some definition to the people of Canada, particularly the police forces of Canada.

The individual police forces would not receive the money under this legislation but rather the municipal and/or provincial governments which fund the department would be the recipients.

I was encouraged by one thing the Solicitor General said. He stated that money would not just be given to the provinces and the provinces allowed to pass it on to the municipalities. I think that is absolutely necessary and is a very good point. We have to be sure that the municipal police forces receive an appropriate share of the proceeds of crime. I would be interested in more definition of how this is to be done, but I welcome the Solicitor General's unsolicited remarks in that regard.

Also, this bill will establish an office in the Department of Supply and Services to manage seized and restrained assets which have been seized in federal crime cases. Cases prosecuted by the provincial attorneys general are not covered by this legislation.

Special allowances, as the Solicitor General has said, will be made for Quebec and New Brunswick. Where the attorney general of a particular province has instigated the action, then the attorney general will have the say over how the assets are to be disposed of.

It is also important, as the Solicitor General has said, that those managing the assets be the proper people. He is aware that the RCMP cannot run ski hills very well. No reflection on the RCMP, but I think that goes without saying. There will be an advisory capacity for the minister's office and probably the Department of Justice, which I think is important.

Canada has had proceeds of crime legislation since 1989 but all the moneys and assets collected reverted to the federal government. This has been seen as unfair to the provincial and municipal governments which assisted in solving these cases, many of which were under investigation for long periods of time and which were very costly to local and provincial police departments.

What we are doing in this bill is equitably giving financial assistance to these police departments. I think the Solicitor General agrees that these departments are entitled to this because they have played integral roles in solving these very important cases.

In the past, problems have arisen with respect to the cost of managing seized and restrained assets and the Solicitor General has alluded to those. As I mentioned, there have been situations where the RCMP has found itself running pizza parlours, hotels and ski resorts. Needless to say this is problematic and they have to be addressed.

The idea of trustees in bankruptcy is a good one. It means there are going to be a lot of trustees in bankruptcy moving to coastal communities if the drug trade continues the way it has. Fine, that is free enterprise.

It is true we have not taken the initiative in obtaining and seizing these assets of crime that perhaps we should have. This bill is going to give the incentive to do that.

• (1030)

Where municipal and provincial police forces feel they are going to be making money for the federal coffers, they do not have the initiative to go that extra step, do that extra amount of footwork and the long and boring surveillance work that needs to be done to solve these cases. Now they have more initiative. There will be initiatives by the forces and their respective provincial and municipal governments. The assets must be managed, as we have said.

There is one thing I did not hear the Solicitor General mention and that is recommendation three of the report on crime prevention in Canada by the Standing Committee on Justice and Solicitor General where the committee recommends: "that a share of the moneys forfeited as proceeds of crime be allocated to crime prevention activities and that the federal government allocate 1 per cent a year of the current federal budget for police, courts and corrections to crime prevention over a five-year period. At the end of five years Canada should spend 5 per cent of the current federal criminal justice budget on crime prevention".

Maybe the federal government intends to do it through the federal budget. However it is important, even though we are giving the money to the municipal and provincial governments, that it go back into police work. There are financial constraints today. The problem is that we do not want our criminal justice system to suffer as a result of these financial restraints when we are seizing property that is the proceed of crime. That funding should go back into our criminal justice system, to the police departments for crime prevention. I think more attention should be given to this by governments.

There has to be a concerted effort not only by the federal government but by provincial and municipal governments for a meaningful thrust toward crime prevention in Canada. The whole idea of the sharing of the proceeds of crime is a good one.

The Liberal Party has been supportive of this for some time. We recommend that the proceeds of any crime operation be split among all the parties involved in a case, the percentage of which would depend on each party's level of involvement in the particular case. For us, and I am sure for others as well, this is a basic means of sharing.

Since 1989, $60 million in assets have been seized through the current proceeds of crime legislation. It is imperative that the government work more closely with law enforcement agencies in the provinces and the municipalities to find ways of making this legislation work. The Solicitor General referred to that, and rightly so. With this legislation this may happen automatically because there will be more incentive for these police agencies to work to solve these crimes if there is going to be some return for their police work in their respective jurisdictions.

However it is not all going to happen automatically. More of the crimes can be solved and more of these assets can be distributed through dialogue among the police forces and perhaps some liaison work done among the police forces to ensure that everything is being integrated, everything is being shared and there is a co-operative and good attitude toward a full assault against crime and the proceeds of crime.

I do not exactly know on what basis we are considering the sharing with foreign countries. I do think that is a fair proposal. If we are going to work with other countries, the incentive for police forces in other countries has to be the same as we have for police forces in our provinces and municipalities. The only thing I would say is that we should have some parameters on an international basis for how we share them. I think it should be reciprocal. I do not think, if we have a situation where another country does not share funds with Canada, we should through largesse share funds with them. Perhaps there can be international understandings with other countries and I think it is in the interest of other countries.

There can be a formula agreed to. It does not have to be a rigid formula, but basically a formula on cost sharing of the proceeds of crime. This would be welcomed. It would certainly be welcomed by the people of Canada. As has been alluded to by the Solicitor General, crime and particularly the drug trade is very much an international business. It is through international co-operation that we will make the biggest impact on solving these crimes.

We want assurances, from the Minister of Justice in particular, that the proceeds of crime will indeed find their way back to local and provincial police departments. We want assurances that this will be done but, as I said earlier, we need some parameters and some regulations on the matter. I know the Solicitor General feels the same way and he will be working to this end.

We want to be certain that provincial and municipal governments will not keep the money to build new roads and pay down their deficits. We want to be certain that their police forces, their crime prevention and criminal justice activities will benefit and that the criminal justice system will benefit. It is very important that justice on a municipal and provincial basis will benefit from the proceeds going back to the municipal and provincial governments.

Police departments are already suffering from severe fiscal restraint. They need these funds to keep up their wars against crime, particularly the war against drugs. It is so insidious today that we need every tool to fight this war on drugs. We cannot at the same time let down our guard on the rights of citizens, on our principles of law and our principles under the Charter of Rights and Freedoms. We must, in ways that do not infringe on the rights of our citizens, do everything we possibly can to gain an upper hand in this war against drugs.

With respect to the new office to which I referred in the Department of Supply and Services, we want assurances that it will not evolve into a bureaucratic nightmare, making it very difficult for local and provincial governments to have access to the money from the seized assets the office will be managing. We need more clarification from the government of the exact function or role of this office. I hope this will be forthcoming. It will not be a difficult procedure, but maybe it will take a little time to circulate some regulations, a discussion paper or just an information sheet. It would go a long way toward not only informing but also promoting the program the government wants to foster.

We would like to know who will be paying for the operation of the office. Will its expenses be covered by the money and assets it is managing and sharing with the other levels of government? Is that how it is to be paid for, or is it to be paid for via the estimates in estimate costs? Will all three levels of government have a share in its operating costs? That is the question. The Solicitor General shakes his head indicating that they will not. That answers that question. How will an office, presumably located in Ottawa, manage assets seized in Vancouver or Halifax?

The Solicitor General has talked about trustees in bankruptcy, which is important. The network of liaising with trustees in bankruptcy is also important. I agree we should not be sending public servants to Vancouver or Halifax to manage the proceeds of crime from a drug bust, for instance. However there should be some idea of how the network of control and management is to be developed.

All the questions we want answered by the government are really questions of procedure. Nevertheless they are important as this process and legislation evolve. I also want to mention a couple of points to the Solicitor General who is very kindly sitting through my speech, as painful as it may be. They relate to the services presently being provided.

I will just use the RCMP as an example, but not as a scapegoat or because I feel it is going to happen. There has been a great deal of concern in Nova Scotia and certain other parts of the country that the RCMP will place its laboratories on a cost recovery basis as a means of cutting federal government expenses.

I do not want that to happen because funding is to go back to the RCMP. I do not want the government to undercut present funding for our police forces at the same time as they get the proceeds of crime. It is not only a question of taking funding away if cost recovery of the laboratories of the RCMP is demanded. It gets to be a problem of law enforcement in Canada.

Provincial and municipal police forces now have access to the RCMP laboratories. In order to save funds perhaps they will start using laboratories in the United States that may not cost as much or may provide the services at a lower rate, but they will not give the results we have been used to getting from the RCMP laboratories. We will get a lower standard of laboratory services for our police forces. Therefore we will have a reluctance to utilize the laboratory services. We will have a problem verifying a lot of what we want to verify in our fight against crime. I would ask for that not to be the case.

I would also suggest to the Solicitor General that if we are to make a meaningful assault on crime, particularly the drug trade, we have to examine some items that have already been cut. As an example I would use coastal surveillance boats in Atlantic Canada. The RCMP has operated in Nova Scotia three small boats along the coastline. It has managed to speak to fishermen and residents of the coastal communities in Nova Scotia, thereby getting a good deal of information that has led to drug seizures, to convictions and ultimately to the seizure of assets and proceeds of crime.

These boats do not operate now. The RCMP will say that they do, but actually the boats are there and no one is assigned to them. For a boat to be put in the water a complaint has to be received from a person first. The boat is brought on a trailer down to the water, launched and taken to the area of concern. The persons investigated could be in Panama by the time the RCMP coastal cruiser gets to that particular spot. That is not the answer.

Also, the dialogue with the communities must be done by RCMP officers while they are doing their other functions, such as traffic control or whatever else they are doing. I think that that is not fair. The result is that if it is optional work, in most cases the RCMP officers do not have the time to do it. They are not doing it because they have other concerns. If they do not look after the job they were assigned to do and if that job is not done then they will be criticized and perhaps reported. They have to do the job they were assigned to do first, even though they may feel that something of an optional nature may be more important in the long run.

I would like to see RCMP officers assigned back on coastal surveillance and have these boats staffed by men and women of the RCMP on a regular basis as was the case before so that we can have this information flowing back the way it once was.

I want to just finish by saying that I think this bill is a major step forward. I think I have stated the questions I have and that our party has regarding this legislation. I think that with information at committee stage we should be able to answer some of these questions and I welcome that.

We are going to be recommending certainly the passage of this legislation on second reading and the opportunity to examine it, not exhaustively, not without reason, and certainly not to delay the bill in committee stage, but to get some feedback by groups that we think can provide information.

Mr. Nelson A. Riis (Kamloops): Madam Speaker, first of all I would like to say that we are happy that the Solicitor General has brought this legislation forward. To my recollection this is the third piece of legislation in this law enforcement family that will enable law enforcement officers and others to have a little better chance of fighting and combating crime in the country, particularly when it comes to dealing with drug dealers and those people who participate in that business.

I also would like to say to my hon. friend who just spoke that I appreciated his remarks as an indication of support for this general initiative taken by the government. I want to say on behalf of my party that we support this initiative. It is a little late but that is the way the world is sometimes. We appreciate the Solicitor General's work on this. I understand that it was the Solicitor General's recommendation that when we proceed to the next stage of this legislation it will go to the Standing Committee on Justice and Solicitor General. It seems to me that that would be a good idea and would facilitate its passage because the people there have done all the necessary preliminary work in the reports that they recently made public.

I must say that the publication Crime Prevention in Canada: Toward a National Strategy, which is the 12th report of the Standing Committee on Justice and Solicitor General may turn into a best seller in the country. People have been anxious to get copies of this because it is a very comprehensive study of the problems associated with crime prevention and more important, it lays out a whole number of recommendations that people on balance find very progressive and very useful.

Today we are moving in that direction. There is a little work to do on this legislation and I will get to that in a moment. However, I want to say to the Solicitor General that we would be prepared to see this referred to the Standing Committee on Justice and Solicitor General to ensure that its passage is completed in a most expeditious way and to ensure that it becomes law before summer. I want to say again that the Department of Justice says that the bill is aimed at promoting co-operation among all levels of law enforcement, especially when dealing with drug trafficking and smuggling.

I remember a day last August when a van from the province of British Columbia was stopped in Winnipeg. In the van 244 kilograms of high quality marijuana were found. Obviously it was confiscated. The people involved, the RCMP and the officers from the local force who, if my memory serves me, were part of a new integrated intelligence enforcement unit that was created, really did some excellent work and need to be congratulated.

This is an example of the kind of effort that we can achieve when there are different levels of law enforcement and different groups of people working to combat the spread of the drug trade. They combine their efforts, talents and energies and come up with these kinds of seizures and arrests.

Let us face it, we are just seeing the tip of the iceberg in this whole process. When we start looking at the extent of drug trafficking in this country, the amount of drug abuse and the amount of smuggling that takes place, particularly on the two coasts of Canada to say nothing about crossing over the land border with the United States and Alaska, we have really just begun to fight this incredible and sinister aspect of our society.

Two weeks ago I had a chance to meet with a number of people who are involved with drug enforcement in my community and representatives of agencies that deal with people who suffer from drug abuse and in their own way attempt to combat the importation and sale of drugs. They are almost at a point where they are throwing their hands up. The court system does not seem to be designed to handle it. There is an overwhelming demand on the time of present law enforcement officers. They can only seem to react to the most serious initiatives. There is a real level of frustration.

I want to say to my friend the Solicitor General that I think everyone will find this initiative to be not only a welcome one but very helpful. We appreciate this initiative.

I want to say that the bill will establish a federal program to share forfeited proceeds of crime with other jurisdictions involved in federal drug and other criminal prosecutions.

I think the Solicitor General made some important remarks in his speech today. I read from the list that goes back into August of this year some comments by the inspector of vice in the Winnipeg police force. He was delighted when he heard about this initiative because he felt this would assist them in their budgeting and provide funds for the police force.

As my friend has said, this is not quite the case. He went on record to say that the proceeds of crime will be divided up to reflect the amount of participation of the various levels presumably in the undercover work, investigations and the actions leading to arrest.

As he said, if it is one-third federal, one-third provincial and one-third municipal then that is the way the sharing would be. I think he would admit that is not in the legislation now and that is one thing we can presumably do by regulation and so on. I think we all find his remarks comforting in that respect but I will have something more to say about that in a moment.

I also want to say that the bill will establish an office within the Department of Supply and Services in order to manage the seize and restraint assets that are subject to forfeiture in the proceeds of crime in these cases that are prosecuted by the Attorney General of Canada. That is helpful to know.

To reflect some of the comments made by my colleague from the Liberal Party who spoke, we will have to ask how this office will be set up and who will support it. Will it be from the proceeds that will be collected? Will it be from just regular federal government operations? Will it be on a cost-sharing basis? This is something that is rather minor in this whole initiative and something that hopefully we can work out either again through regulation or while we are in committee dealing with this issue.

Let me go back and say that when the government introduced the proceeds of crime legislation that came into effect back in 1989, we in the New Democratic Party greeted it with some enthusiasm. It was a major step forward and a very important step.

At that time our justice critic, the member for Burnaby—Kingsway, had this to say when we discussed it at second reading: "I am pleased to rise to debate this important legislation that will ensure that Canada finally takes the long overdue step to recognize that those who profit from organized crime in many cases are able to use weak and inadequate legislation as a means of laundering the profits of crime. We in this party certainly support effective legislation that will deal with the proceeds of organized crime".

While praising the principle of that legislation, which in effect gives police and the courts the ability to confiscate the profits of crime, we raised examples of how the legislation would not be improved by this and we suggested a number of improvements.

Most significant was the concern that the legislation did not encompass banking and financial institutions. I remember that I raised that point myself at that time and said that as long as the banks and financial institutions are not involved to stop the laundering of drug money, it is going to be almost impossible because there is where their main problem exists. We have all sorts of stories about how banks and financial institutions that are unscrupulous have been involved in drug money laundering of one kind or another.

At that time the Canadian law enforcement agencies were not allowed to access information about bank accounts suspected to be conduits for laundering schemes, unlike the United States where financial institutions were required to report their deposits over certain amounts on a regular basis. I suggested that for Canada this legislation be amended. It certainly would have had our support at least.

Unfortunately that change was not made until Bill C-9 that was passed in the House of Commons in June 1991. I wish that our voices had been heard a little earlier but we are proud of the role that we played in the eventual passing of that legislation that resulted in banks and financial institutions being involved in helping law enforcement agencies identify money laundering particularly associated with the drug trade.

We also brought forward some other concerns. What is now section 462.47 provides for the disclosure of tax information in cases involving offences in relation to drugs. It does not allow for similar disclosure for some other enterprise crimes which were established by the legislation. This is something that we have yet to act upon and perhaps we should act now very quickly.

I also want to say that what is now section 462.3 defines enterprise crime and unlike other jurisdictions, including Australia, Britain and the United States, includes proceeds from bawdy houses. Certainly no one would disagree that those who exploit the sex trade workers and acquire property and other proceeds as a result should get away with it.

However, there was compelling evidence from the Fraser commission that was responsible for one of the most in-depth studies of prostitution in our country to show that this inclusion would drive prostitutes into organized crime.

Again, I want to point it out to my hon. friend, the Solicitor General of Canada. Whether the Fraser commission was correct or not will become clear in the upcoming years as police forces widen the net on money laundering.

Here in Ottawa and in other cities the police are using the proceeds of crime provisions to go after criminals involved in prostitution. Pimps are using shell companies to channel credit card payments from johns who frequent escort services. We have seen some interesting examples of that here in our own city of Ottawa lately.

Exercising control over another person to commit prostitution and living off the profits of prostitution are serious crimes and I am satisfied to know that this new law is being used in this way in terms of combating that.

We will have to watch carefully to see if we have not inadvertently caused prostitution to become enmeshed in organized crime. That is something we will deal with if that becomes obvious.

I want to ask a rhetorical question: How much money are we talking about here? It is interesting and rather disturbing when we speculate on just how much property is involved and how much money flows through money laundering schemes that are involved in large-scale drug smuggling and trafficking operations in Canada.

Between 1989 and 1992 over $60 million was seized. We would all recognize that this is simply the tip of the iceberg as well. We are probably talking about literally hundreds of millions if not some billions of dollars. Surely after it came into effect the new law that was used successfully in a big Canada-U.S. investigation was helpful in uncovering a $1.2 billion scheme that moved money from banks in Panama and the United States through Toronto and Switzerland.

I might say that a recent United Nations survey set the total dollar value of the illegal drug trade world-wide as second only to the amount spent on the international arms trade which we all know to be astronomical. The changes in the law regarding bank recording will be even more helpful. As was said previously, we are proud of the role we have played in seeing those provisions implemented.

When we left off before Question Period I was saying that there were a number of concerns. They will be raised at the committee stage but I want to put them clearly on the record.

One is the fact that this procedure of sharing the proceeds of crime between those participating in the successful conclusion of an inquiry or prosecution has been implemented in the United States where there is evidence that in some cases police departments have grown to view the prosecution of cases from which they are more likely to receive rewards in the form of the forfeiture of significant proceeds as being the most important cases to work on and proceed with.

Those crimes that do not involve the possibility of such a reward, such as crimes involving family violence, are not given the same attention that might have been given where there is not a dollar value attached.

I do not want to suggest for a moment that this would influence police departments in our country but it must be recognized that there is some possibility of this.

• (1215)

However this concern has also been alluded to by Department of Justice officials. It will be interesting for us to hear from the various witnesses in committee. I think it is fair to say that anything that would inadvertently shift the system away from responding to the needs of a community based on the degree of urgency or harm done and the potential for harm toward a greater interest in the number of dollars involved must be avoided.

I believe that the Solicitor General earlier today put this concern at rest, at least here on the floor of the House, when he said that it may not go directly to the police departments or to the agencies or departments involved but to those agencies that fund them. In other words, it is a bit of an arm's length relationship here.

The second concern we have is that there have been concerns expressed that the implementation of this program may be the thin edge of the wedge leading to police departments becoming more and more reliant upon proceeds of crime forfeitures for their base budget funding.

There is nothing in this bill to give any indication as to how this might be prevented. I am again just identifying concerns we will be raising in committee so that those who will be responding can be forewarned. In fact, details of how the funds are to be shared by the various levels of government are still under review although we have heard comments from the Solicitor General.

Another area of concern would be who will pay for the new office that would be struck. Obviously the new office will be established within the Department of Supply and Services. I think it is a fair question to ask. Whenever a new office, department or agency is being set up by government we ask where the money for that will come from. That is what the taxpayers of Canada are asking us to do at all times. In committee we will be asking: Who will fund this? Will it simply come from the estimates of the department? Will the proceeds of forfeited moneys from crimes be used to fund this office? Will it be shared between the various jurisdictions, for example federal, provincial, municipal and regional? These are questions that are fair to ask.

The last point is certainly frustrating in the sense that one of our primary concerns is that a significant share of the money forfeited as proceeds of crime go toward crime prevention and substance abuse prevention. This was one of the primary recommendations of the unanimous report on crime prevention tabled in this House by the chair of the Standing Committee on Justice and Solicitor General in February. It is certainly a recommendation that we in the New Democratic Party will support.

I noted with interest yesterday that when the member for Kitchener rose and introduced the government's psychoactive substances legislation he pointed out that for every dollar spent on prevention, and specifically the prevention of substance abuse, the government could expect to save $7 down the road in treatment and justice system costs. There is all kinds of evidence that $1 set aside for prevention would result time and time again in that $1 being saved a little bit further along the way.

I would like to simply say that we want to see this preventative initiative focused not only on hard drugs but on smoking and alcohol abuse as well.

We will have more to say in committee and I will leave my remarks at that.

Mrs. Beryl Gaffney (Nepean): Madam Speaker, I too am pleased to stand here and speak in this House on Bill C-123, which establishes a federal program to share forfeited proceeds of crime with other jurisdictions involved in federal drug and other federal criminal prosecutions.

I know the details of how the funds will be shared are still under review. Today individual police forces do not receive the money, but under the proposed legislation they would still not receive the money but the money would certainly go to the department that funds those same police forces, which is either the provincial or municipal government. In my case it would be the city of Nepean.

It also proposes to establish an office within the Department of Supply and Services to manage the restrained assets that have been seized in the particular federal crime cases. This office would also have an advisory function for law enforcement agencies.

Canada has had proceeds of crime legislation since 1989 but all the moneys and assets collected reverted to the federal government. In many cases this was seen as unfair to the provincial and municipal governments that assisted in cracking these cases. Many of these cases were under investigation for long periods of time and were very costly to local and provincial police departments. Problems have arisen with respect to the cost of managing seized or restrained assets.

In consultation with my own Nepean police services department I have been advised by the deputy chief of Nepean, Devon Fermoyle, that the Ontario police chiefs have called for a cost sharing of crime proceeds. The Ontario chiefs feel the money should be divided among the various levels involved in the cases because many of the raids—in fact probably all of the raids—do involve local forces in addition to the RCMP forces or the FBI. The moneys that are generated should also go to the municipal forces through the municipality.

Deputy Chief Fermoyle gave me one example of how in a recent bust in collaboration with a number of other levels they recovered $14,000 and yet the cost to the city of Nepean police department was $60,000. They really believe they should have been able to at least recover their costs and they have not been able to do so until this point in time. Even if there is real property on sale the money goes to the federal agency and not to the municipal agencies.

In the United States there is quite a different situation. Say for example if the FBI, the RCMP and the tobacco-firearms department in the U.S.A. are involved. They had a big bust recently in the U.S. As a result the United States government handed over $100,000 to the Canadian government. Its system is very different from ours and the federal agency is able to put this money in its pocket and obviously the local forces should be able to receive some of this money.

We on this side of the house proposed a similar scheme to this in a recent policy paper on justice issues. We have been calling for legislation such as this for a good number of years now. We have recommended that the proceeds of any crime operation be split among all parties involved in the case and the percentages would depend upon each party's level of involvement.

Since 1989 I am told that only $60 million in assets has been seized through the current proceeds of crime legislation. Obviously someone is not doing one's job. A lot more money than that should have come into the coffers if somebody had been monitoring it and ensuring that the law enforcement agencies and the government were working very closely together to make sure that this money came in.

We on this side of the House want assurances from the Minister of Justice that the proceeds of crime will indeed find their way back to local and provincial police departments through their municipalities. We want to be certain that provincial and municipal governments will not just keep this money to build new roads or pay down their deficits.

As a 10-year member of a municipal council I know that they tend to shift money from one little pocket to another or from one little pay account to another or reserve account to another. I would certainly want to make sure that the municipalities direct this money right back into police service.

Mr. Gauthier: Not in Nepean.

Mrs. Gaffney: "Not in Nepean", my colleague from Vanier says. This does happen in any municipality. I believe that the police forces are having a very difficult time these days. They have been cut back drastically due to fiscal restraint and they need these additional funds as much as anybody else.

With regard to the proposed new office for the Department of Supply and Services, I think that is another area that we must monitor. Every time a new department is created we create a bureaucratic nightmare. I think we need to make sure that this office is efficiently run and efficiently established and that there is more clarification from the government on the exact function and role of this particular office.

Assurances also need to be given by the Minister of Justice that the proceeds of crime will definitely find their way back into the proper pockets as I mentioned a few minutes ago. Although the proposed new office is probably considered of a secondary nature with regard to this bill, I think we need to ensure that we have everything tied down if we are going to establish a new department.

I have a letter from the Canadian Centre on Substance Abuse. It concerns the proposed changes to the proceeds of crime legislation.

The Canadian Centre on Substance Abuse outlined a position paper that pertained to this matter that has been put out by the Federation of Canadian Municipalities and the Canadian Association of Chiefs of Police. They met and jointly agreed on the importance of this legislation.

I do have a copy of that brief here and I would like to table it for the information of the Minister of Justice. It is important that when there are agencies such as these three I have mentioned that are standing in strong support of this legislation then it needs to be passed and our police services departments need to be the recipients of these funds. We must make sure that this legislation does goes through.

I wish I had had the opportunity to read this brief but it was just handed to me this moment. I have not had the time to read it but I think it is important that it is filed and that everyone is aware of it.

Again thank you for the opportunity of speaking in the House on this very important bill. I am sure that it will pass quickly.

[Translation]

Mrs. Shirley Maheu (Saint-Laurent—Cartierville): Madam Speaker, I would like to take this opportunity to mention another point which so far has not been brought to the attention of the Solicitor General. It concerns a ski resort in Quebec.

Bill C-123 would authorize the minister to manage and dispose of property referred to in paragraph (b), and property that is from the proceeds of crime or offence-related property, when such property is forfeited to Her Majesty. It would provide that on taking possession or control thereof, the minister shall be responsible for the custody and management of the property.

When I started to look into the case of the ski resort in Quebec, I realized that it took a long time for the case to get started because there were so many searches and investigations. I believe it took about two years. At one point the forfeited property was operated, if I am not mistaken, by the RCMP. To have the RCMP operating a ski resort is positively mind boggling.

When we consider the amounts of money involved in these cases, as was said earlier by my colleagues, since 1989 all we have is $60 million, but $60 million is still $60 million. If my information is correct, the money is never deposited in a bank account and that has been the case for many years. We are talking about several million dollars that were deposited in a bank vault—this is cash—and will stay there until there is enough evidence, a sufficient number of searches have taken place and enough statements have been gathered to bring the case before the courts. Sometimes it can take years.

I think all this is incredible and pretty ridiculous. The time involved may be considerable because the procedure includes preliminary investigations, statements and searches, as I said before. The latter are initiated to find other properties, such as houses or cars, which the accused may own.

I think this is all quite unacceptable, and I will explain why. If for some reason the Crown does not gather enough evidence to lay charges it is obliged to return the money in whole or in part. Usually, as I said before, the money is put in a vault. However, when a decision is reached by the courts, it always allows for the accumulated interest. The courts always consider the real value of the money, not the amounts seized at the beginning of the investigation. This means the taxpayer has to pay the interest on those amounts. I wonder why this money cannot be deposited in a trust account pending court proceedings. In this way Canadian taxpayers would not be stuck with paying millions of dollars in interest costs.

• (1230)

[English]

The brief that we have from the Canadian Association of Chiefs of Police about the proceeds of crime recommends that the federal government proceed with the proposed ethics management office establishing an audit mechanism that includes other orders of government, that participating governments be involved in the development of fair procedures for the sharing of net forfeited assets, that the federal government in consultation with the orders of government develop a mechanism which would enable direct sharing of net proceeds with entitled parties and that guidelines be provided for the use of forfeited drug proceeds in accordance with the policy thrust of Canada's drug strategy.

As my other colleagues mentioned, we proposed a similar scheme to this one but I am not sure that anyone took a real hard look at the money that is stuck in a vault. I am not talking about the money that has fingerprints on it or that was marked money in order to catch some of our drug traffickers. We are not even touching the bottom of the barrel. We are just skimming off the surface with our $60 million. Consequently once this money has filtered back down to the forces and to the levels of government that are paying the bill we could have many more millions.

We have to come up with a way to keep the money in an interest-bearing account. I have nothing against the office proposed by the minister, but that office should have a special, entirely separate bank account for the proceeds of money laundering.

[English]

We want the minister to assure us that the proceeds of these crimes will find their way back to local and provincial police departments. We do not want the bureaucracy eating all the money that is being made from the proceeds of crime.

This war against drugs is a difficult one. It may never be won. If we do not start putting the money back into fighting the drug lords then we will never win it.

I would like to see the minister amend this bill so that a trust account could be opened. It would be one that will not be bogged down by bureaucracy and the money will be available when the judges say it is available. It will earn interest in the meantime because we as taxpayers cannot afford any more expenses especially not from the laundering of drug money.

POINT OF ORDER

CANADIAN AIRLINES INTERNATIONAL

Mr. Nelson A. Riis (Kamloops): Madam Speaker, this may not be quite a point of order but on the day before yesterday in a speech I was making on NAFTA I inadvertently made the statement that Canadian Airlines was planning to close down its maintenance shop in Vancouver and open a new shop in Mexico. I think one might recall that I said that.

What I should have said was that sources have indicated to me that in the foreseeable future the operational maintenance base in Richmond, B.C. will be closed. The job being done by the employees there will be contracted out to a large, mega maintenance base that is presently being built in northern Mexico to serve not only Canadian Airlines but a number of other airlines.

• (1235)

I thought in light of the statement made today that I should put that on the record. I did inadvertently misspeak. The point still remains of the concern by a number of very informed sources that this will be the inevitable result of maintenance for Canadian Airlines and also other airlines as well.

Madam Deputy Speaker: I thank the hon. member.

MEASURE TO ENACT

The House resumed consideration of the motion of Mr. Blais that Bill C-123, an act respecting the management of certain property seized or restrained in connection with certain offences, the disposition of certain property on the forfeiture thereof and the sharing of the proceeds of disposition therefrom in certain circumstances, be read the second time and referred to the Standing Committee on Justice and Solicitor General.

Madam Deputy Speaker: Is the House ready for the question?

Some hon. members: Question.

Madam Deputy Speaker: Is it the pleasure of the House to adopt the motion?

Some hon. members: Agreed.

Motion agreed to, bill read the second time and referred to the Standing Committee on Justice and Solicitor General.

CRIMINAL CODE

MEASURE TO AMEND

Hon. John C. Crosbie (for the Minister of Justice) moved that Bill C-90, an act to amend the Criminal Code (sentencing) and other acts in consequence thereof, be read the second time and referred to a legislative committee in the Departmental envelope.

Mr. Peter L. McCreath (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister for International Trade): Madam Speaker, the need for the reform of sentencing in Canada has long been recognized by judges, parliamentarians, law reformers and members of the legal profession.

During the past 20 years there have been calls for reform from various committees, a royal commission and from the Law Reform Commission of Canada. More recently, the Canadian Sentencing Commission which reported in 1987 and in 1988, a report of the House committee, the Standing Committee on Justice and Solicitor General, made extensive recommendations regarding the reform of sentencing, conditional release and corrections.

Bill C-90 gives Canadians for the first time a say on the purpose and principles of criminal sentencing. Extensive consultations were carried out involving both justice professionals and representatives of the community.

These consultations followed joint publication by the Solicitor General and the Minister of Justice of directions for reform, sentencing, corrections and conditional release in July 1990. The changes proposed in this bill have been broadly accepted by criminal justice professionals, provinces and territories.

Together with Bill C-36 passed by Parliament last year, Bill C-90 presents a strong and unified approach to criminal justice. I believe that sentencing practices in Canada must consistently reflect values that Canadians have told us are important to them in the treatment of offenders. Considering the fact that criminal sanctions provide for one of the most serious intrusions of the state into the lives of individuals, the absence of a policy statement from the Parliament of Canada seems quite remarkable.

Bill C-90 provides courts with clear policy direction from Parliament. The bill states that the fundamental purpose of sentencing is to contribute to the maintenance of a just, peaceful and safe society by imposing just sanctions. A statement of principles is set out, designed to establish a coherent framework of policy and process in sentencing matters and to bring consistency, fairness and accountability to the sentencing process. The establishment of a statement of the purpose and principles of sentencing has been endorsed by the Canadian Sentencing Commission, the standing committee and the former Law Reform Commission of Canada.

This is a large and detailed bill. I cannot discuss all of the provisions but would like to highlight a number which I feel are particularly important. I will start by elaborating on the statement of the purpose and principles of sentencing.

In addition to the fundamental purpose of sentencing, the bill sets out objectives which judges should consider when sentencing.

The objectives available to judges in this bill include denunciation, deterrence and separation of the offender from society. These are clearly appropriate sentencing objectives to apply to the 8 to 10 per cent of violent crime which is handled in our courts. This does not suggest, of course, that we can ever eliminate violence totally in our society. In absolute terms, wanton violence by deranged individuals is probably unavoidable except at a cost in terms of rights and freedoms which Canadians would be unwilling to accept.

Mr. Waddell: Mr. Speaker, this is the proceeds of crime bill in which property from crime is forfeited to the government. It deals with how that is to happen, how it is to be shared with the provinces and so on.

I know the figures vary. One figure being bandied about is $20 million. I have heard the figure $60 million and others. I will operate under the figure of $20 million. It is a substantial amount of money.

I am the justice critic in the New Democratic Party. We are not opposed to the bill, but we are very much opposed to what the government is going to do with the proceeds of crime. We think the proceeds of crime should go to crime prevention. That is what my amendment is about. It is very simple. The proceeds of crime should go into crime prevention, or at least part of it.

The government wants some money for debt reduction. It could put 70 per cent of the proceeds of crime into debt reduction but keep a part of the money for crime prevention. That is what my amendment says. The reason, as I will explain in my speech, is very important because it follows a principle set out in a unanimous report of the justice committee of this House of Commons called Crime Prevention in Canada—Towards a National Strategy, dated February 1993.

Recommendation No. 3 of the report states that we should spend some money on crime prevention and take some money from the proceeds of crime. It is very simple, but let us look at the bill and deal with the technicalities. Clause 16 reads:

> At the prescribed times, all amounts credited to the Proceeds Account that are not shared pursuant to sections 10 and 11, less such amounts as are reserved
> (a) for future losses,
> (b) to pay claims arisings from undertakings given by the Attorney General pursuant to subsections 462.32(6) and 462.33(7) of the Criminal Code, and
> (c) for ongoing expenses,
> shall be credited to the Debt Servicing and Reduction Account established by the Debt Servicing and Reduction Account Act.

The government proposes to amend this point and put them, as I understand it, into the general revenues. Whether it is debt reduction or into the general revenues, it still does not meet the test of the justice committee. I have proposed a change to this clause. My motion states that this money:

> "shall be credited seventy per cent to the Debt Servicing and Reduction Account established by the Debt Servicing and Reduction Account Act and applied thirty per cent to supplement the funding of crime prevention programs administered in whole or in part by the Attorney General".

We are not interfering with the provinces. It is the Attorney General of Canada. We in the NDP want the government to commit some of the proceeds from crime to crime prevention, and here is why.

The report I mentioned of the justice committee was an all-party report. The committee was chaired by the hon. member for Mississauga West. Recommendation No. 3 reads:

> The committee recommends that a share of the moneys forfeited as proceeds of crime be allocated to crime prevention activities and that the federal government allocate 1 per cent a year of the current federal budget for police courts and corrections to crime prevention over a five-year period.
> At the end of five years, Canada should spend 5 per cent of the current criminal justice budget on crime prevention.

The report clearly says that moneys forfeited as proceeds of crime should be allocated to crime prevention activities. My friends in the government say they will do that, but will they do it? We cannot be sure. We do not know. The amendment says a certain amount of moneys will be allocated.

• (1040)

I draw attention to recommendations Nos. 1 and 2 of the same justice report. I think this is a great report. It is a great step forward in fighting crime in Canada. Here is what it says:

> The committee recommends that the federal government, in co-operation with the provinces and municipalities, take on a national leadership role in crime prevention and develop a national crime prevention policy.

That is what I want to see, a national crime prevention policy. Money is needed to pay for it, right? The distinguished hon. member from Mississauga, the chair of the finance committee who is in the House, keeps telling the House: "Look at the money. You need money to pay for these programs".

The crime prevention policy should set out the following principles and initiatives:

> a. Crime prevention will be included in the mandates of the federal departments
> b. All levels of government are responsible for crime and they must work together

Crime occurs in communities and priorities concerning crime prevention are best determined at the local level. The primary approach taken to prevent crime and create safer communities entails a co-ordinated, multi-disciplinary effort to address the root causes of crime.

Finally:

> e. Prevention measures include law enforcement, community-based policing, social development and reduction of criminal opportunities.

Recommendation No. 2 which goes along with this says:

> The committee recommends the federal government, in consultation with the provinces and territories and the Federation of Canadian Municipalities, support the development of a national crime prevention council.

The council's job would be to promote safety, to provide the federal government with advice and to gather and analyse information.

We found that while the community of Coquitlam may be doing some great stuff in community-based policing, the community of Montreal did not know about it. Whereas the community of Montreal may have been doing some wonderful work in neighbourhood programs, the community of Coquitlam did not know about it.

Therefore we want to bring them together. We do not want to reinvent the wheel. We will do it through the national crime prevention council.

As a matter of fact the present Minister of Justice who has the right intentions and who is a good man has started the beginnings of a national crime prevention council. We have to give it some money. What better way to do it than to earmark some of those moneys from the drug dealers, criminals and so on. When we get that money it should be put it back into crime prevention.

They also say that the national crime prevention council should provide training, research, evaluation and public education on the prevention of crime. That takes money. They say that it should provide funding assistance to local governments and community organizations to implement safety initiatives.

In my own riding of Port Moody—Coquitlam a number of people are involved in Block Watch and Crime Stoppers. Even the insurance industry is now involved in community programs. The local police, the social workers, the teachers, everybody wants to get involved in crime prevention and they are doing it on the community basis. That is where it is really happening. They need some funding.

Here is a way to get some funding:

> f. include membership from federal, provincial and municipal governments, and professionals and practitioners involved in crime prevention

This is a great report of the justice committee. It is in the right direction. It received critical acclaim in the press. I will remind the government once again that recommendation No. 3 says:

> The committee recommends that a share of the moneys forfeited as proceeds of crime be allocated to crime prevention activities

That is exactly what my motion does and that is why the government should support this motion. It is the litmus test of how much this government is committed to crime prevention.

When the report came out some of the sceptics, the media and various people in Canada said: "We do not believe it. This government is actually doing something right." They said: "We will wait and see".

They take one step forward and two steps backward. That seems to be this government. Daniel Drolet who is a distinguished journalist writing recently in The Ottawa Citizen said the other day:

> Some critics wonder how committed the government is to crime prevention.

Now we have the answer. This is how committed it is. It is missing an opportunity to show its commitment.

• (1045)

I see my friend in the House, the distinguished critic for the Liberal Party. I look at the Liberal policy paper on crime prevention. It says that the Liberal Party is committed to money going for crime prevention. It also cites with approval the justice committee.

I see reported in Vancouver Sun of June 1 my friend, the member for Cape Breton—The Sydneys, the justice critic of the Liberal Party quoted as saying this: "He thinks it is a lousy idea to funnel the proceeds of crime back into prevention". He wants a separate budget. The journalist asked: "When is that going to happen?" That is a good question because it is not going to happen. I hope the member for Cape Breton—The Sydneys and the Liberal Party change their minds. Right now we have the Liberal Party and the Conservative Party not wanting to follow the unanimous report—

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): Order, please. The hon. member's time has expired.

Mr. Waddell: Mr. Speaker, I thought I had 20 minutes for this.

[Translation]

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): I remind the hon. member that as shown in the Projected Order of Business and also in the Order Paper, speeches at report stage are limited to 10 minutes. Therefore time is up.

[English]

Mr. Waddell: Mr. Speaker, I would make a request to the House that I be allowed to take one minute to just sum up. I will not abuse it.

Some hon. members: Agreed.

Mr. Waddell: They are in fine spirits, they give me much more than I deserve sometimes.

In closing I will say this because I want to hear from the hon. member from the Liberal Party and the government. Perhaps they will accept my amendment.

The Ottawa Citizen has an editorial today saying the Tories are missing a good investment, that this is a smart investment. It says: "The committee recommended more action to prevent crime. By identifying people at risk of becoming criminals, kids in poverty and abusive homes with bad schooling, governments can save on both crime and punishment".

I think the committee report was right. We have to earmark that money. I only ask that it be 30 per cent of the federal moneys, but it will be in there. It will be earmarked and it will be a commitment to crime prevention. It may not be historic but it will be important and it will show that the government is prepared to take seriously its own unanimous report of a House of Commons committee.

I urge the members of the House to support this amendment. I am not trying to delay the bill. I think the bill could get through today. I would like to see a commitment from the government. If I cannot get my motion by some miracle and it does not pass, I hope the government will give at least a verbal commitment from the ministry that moneys will go to the crime prevention because it is very important in Canada. Canadians want us to fight crime and the way to fight crime is to prevent it in the first place. The NDP says get tough with violent criminals, but we also say put money into crime prevention, especially among young people and stop crime from happening in the first place.

Mr. Russell MacLellan (Cape Breton—The Sydneys): Mr. Speaker, I will speak on both the amendment of the government and the amendment brought forward by my friend from the New Democratic Party.

First I want to deal with the one from the government. I am rather at a loss to explain why the amendment is here. I would appreciate it if the Parliamentary Secretary to the Minister of Justice could give some explanation.

With respect to the amendment of my colleague from Port Moody—Coquitlam, he is certainly wrong when he says we do not support his motion because we do. That piece that he quoted from a Vancouver newspaper is inaccurate. At no time did I ever say that using the proceeds of crime for crime prevention was a lousy idea. He and I were both members of the Standing Committee on Justice and the Solicitor General's task force on crime prevention.

We both supported the report. The report "calls for a share of the moneys forfeited as proceeds of crime be allocated to crime prevention". Also in our party paper on justice we advocate that some of the proceeds of crime be used to fund drug education programs, arguably another mode of crime prevention activity and crime prevention.

As the hon. member knows, I supported him on his motion in the legislative committee on using the funds from the proceeds of crime for crime prevention. That is fundamentally the thing to do. The misrepresentation arose when I was trying to explain to the journalists what the position of the government was. The position of the government was that it does not favour this even though, as the hon. member for Port Moody—Coquitlam has said, it goes against the report of the standing committee.

The government says it does not want to do this because it needs to be assured in a budget how much money is applicable to crime prevention. It says that if we did this from the proceeds of crime, it would be an uncertain amount and we would not have any fixed amount. If it is going to have a budget for crime prevention, it should be allotted in the estimates and should be something that everyone can rely upon.

I can understand the government's concern for wanting a fixed budget. However it is using that as a red herring. We can certainly have a budget but use the proceeds of crime for that budget. If the proceeds of crime from some event do not match what is budgeted for crime prevention, the government can supplement the amount. There is no reason it cannot be done.

As has been said, communities want crime prevention. This government used the standing committee's report on crime prevention as a linchpin for its symposium in Toronto the first week of March. If it was good enough to use as a linchpin for a symposium, why in the name of heaven can it not adopt the report?

We heard ministers at this symposium speaking time after time about how great a report this was and how we needed to work for crime prevention. But there is no commitment from the government for this report or for crime prevention.

If the government wants to have a fixed amount in the estimates, or whatever it wants to do, I can condone that as long as it is doing something for crime prevention. But it is not. It has not supported crime prevention in any sense of the word other than to speak about it and to use it as a means of glossing over the intentions and the aspirations of people who were at the symposium.

That is not good enough. There has to be a commitment. The amendment of the hon. member for Port Moody—Coquitlam gives teeth to what the standing committee says in its report. I support that because it is the first thing we have seen in this House as a means of having funding for crime prevention. If the government has an alternative, then have the government put it forward.

We in the Liberal Party are on record as having supported entirely the report on crime prevention by the standing committee. Why can the government not do that? Why can the government not come forward with tangible recommendations on the funding of crime prevention? It says that it does not want to support this amendment. Then fine, come forward with something it does want to do to fund crime prevention. It will not do it and you wonder what its intentions are. Does it really support crime prevention at all? There is nothing tangible to show that it does. We in the Liberal Party want something tangible and we are asking the government for something tangible. We are supporting the hon. member's amendment.

Mr. Rob Nicholson (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Justice and Attorney General of Canada and Minister of State (Agriculture)): Mr. Speaker, we are dealing with two amendments to Bill C–123. This is the proceeds of crime bill. It is a good bill. I believe it has support on all sides of the House and I think justifiably so.

The proceeds of crime bill is part of our drug prevention scheme. I believe, and I hope other members agree, that one of the best ways to attack crime is to attack the profits of crime. Bill C–123 fits into our strategy. It provides an effective method for managing assets that have been seized by the Crown. As well, it provides a framework for sharing the proceeds of crime with other law enforcement jurisdictions.

In my riding of Niagara Falls I heard this on a number of occasions in response to questionnaires that I regularly send out to the people. When I asked them this question they said: "Yes, share it with the jurisdictions that are on the front lines and are in the business of seizing the proceeds of crime".

This is a tremendous step in the right direction. It fits in with all the other things the government is doing. Members of the opposition can stand up and say: "We are all in favour of crime prevention. We are tough on crime but we just do not like the things that the government is doing". The government is doing an awful lot in this area.

One bill that will come before Parliament in the next couple of days that I hope will get the support of everyone is the new anti-stalking legislation. It makes it a crime for individuals who want to repeatedly follow and communicate with individuals and put individuals in fear for their safety. That is a step in the right direction. I believe and hope that it will get the support of all hon. members.

However, this is just part of it. One of the other things that we are doing, since this whole question of the government's crime prevention strategy has been raised in the House this morning, is allowing for the first time in Canadian law a prohibition order against people who like to molest children. These are convicted paedophiles. We now make it possible for a lifetime ban to be imposed, keeping them from being anywhere near public parks, swimming pools and other places where children frequent.

As well, just last night, not even 12 hours ago, we changed that bill again to affect those individuals who want to participate in voluntary organizations. I am thinking of things like the Boy Scouts and the Big Brothers organizations. We put that in the bill.

All of these things are part of a larger strategy which is to rebalance the system to make sure that victims are protected and that the rights of law-abiding citizens are considered at all times. I look at the proceeds of crime bill as just part of that particular strategy.

The hon. member for Cape Breton—The Sydneys says: "Why with the government motion are you changing the present provisions which state that the proceeds of crime will immediately go to the debt servicing reduction account". This is a laudable goal by the way. The taxpayers in this country are very interested in things going to debt reduction. However he asks why we are changing that to use the wording: "The proceeds of crime shall be credited to such account in the accounts of Canada as is prescribed". This actually gives us some flexibility. We can by regulation then decide if we want different accounts or where we want it to go so that the legislation does not tie our hands and say that it must exclusively go into the debt servicing reduction account.

I will address the point the hon. member made. He said this is the way we should fund crime prevention. Make sure of a certain percentage. In his case the amendment says 30 per cent.

• (1100)

Let us just look at 1992. Let us see how that would work. The figure that was quoted this morning was that the Crown seized $20 million in the profits of crime in 1992. This is not $20 million that we have in our hands to decide what we want to do with it. That is not the case at all. Most people would be aware that when assets are seized we have to effectively manage those assets because they are still the property of the individual from whom they have been seized. The forfeiture is not final. There are appeal processes. One example was given of a resort seized by the government. We are still within the appeal process and that has been several years.

In fact if we want to talk figures $2 million was forfeited to the Crown in 1992. Consider using the scheme of the hon. member for Port Moody—Coquitlam where 30 per cent is directed toward drug prevention.

Mr. Waddell: No. To supplement.

Mr. Nicholson: To supplement. I will pick up with what the hon. member for Cape Breton—The Sydneys said: "If it goes down one year and up the other then the government will just fill in".

I have news for this House. I do not think it is news to the members who sit on this side. We spend an awful lot more on crime prevention than 30 per cent of $2 million and we spend more than 30 per cent of the $20 million figure that was quoted. Concerning the national strategy on drug prevention, 70 per cent of those millions of dollars committed to that is for reducing demand and trying to get at the source of the problem.

There are many worth-while projects that all of us in this House are aware of which are directed toward the very laudable goal of crime prevention.

A scheme whereby the priority is set that in one year we may have $50 million of assets that are forfeited to the Crown and the next year it is $2 million or zero is not what groups that are in this area would want. It would add an uncertainty as to what they are going to get.

I know that in the land of the NDP, money is never a problem but I believe the groups we are involved with—

Mr. Waddell: Ask the premier of Ontario.

Mr. Nicholson: I say that sincerely. I know there is no problem ever with spending money and there is no problem with cash.

I believe we have to plan these things in a manner that is responsible and will be helpful to people who are trying to work in this area and responsible to the taxpayers who are paying us. Say that in one year the Crown seizes $500 million and according to the NDP it is $470 million. If that does not accord with what it is then it says: "Just write a cheque for the extra $30 million. Top it up. Just send the cheque out".

I do not think that is a good way to do it. I believe we should evaluate each project that we get involved in to make sure it does the job of reducing the demand for drugs or that it is used for crime prevention. We should be very careful without arbitrarily making up our minds in advance as to how we are going to do this.

I am asking the House to reject the NDP amendment. I believe the government amendment is a more even-handed approach to this in saying that it may be our decision. We think we can make this amount go here to supplement or replace whatever we have but at least it is open-ended and we are not tying ourselves in with legislation by insisting that it go to the debt reduction account.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): Is the House ready for the question?

Some hon. members: Question.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): Is it the pleasure of the House to adopt the motion?

Some hon. members: Agreed.

Some hon. members: No.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): All those in favour of the motion will please say yea.

Some hon. members: Yea.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): All those opposed will please say nay.

Some hon. members: Nay.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): In my opinion the nays have it.

And more than five members having risen:

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): Call in the members.

The House divided on the motion, which was negatived on the following division:

create new offences or subject a new class of persons to an existing offence.

The bill corrects anomalies, inconsistencies, archaic expressions and errors in federal statutes and deals exclusively with non-controversial matters.

The bill also repeals statutes that have ceased to have effect. The provisions of this bill were submitted as proposals to the House Standing Committee on Justice and the Solicitor General and the Senate Standing Committee on Legal and Constitutional Affairs last February. Both committees have examined the proposals and reported to the House and the Senate. Only proposals which have been unanimously approved by both committees are entered into this bill.

Mr. Russell MacLellan (Cape Breton—The Sydneys): Mr. Speaker, we did a pre-study in the Standing Committee on Justice and the Solicitor General on Bill C-125. We noted the recommendations and made suggestions. We had second reading and then went back to committee and reviewed it.

My party and I find the bill acceptable. As the parliamentary secretary has said, it is really of a technical nature.

Mr. Ian Waddell (Port Moody—Coquitlam): Mr. Speaker, on behalf of the New Democratic Party, we are in agreement with what the parliamentary secretary and the hon. member for Cape Breton—The Sydneys has said. We are in agreement with this bill.

While I am on my feet I would just remind the hon. member from Calgary of a good quote from Mick Jagger of the Rolling Stones: "You can't always get what you want, but sometimes you might just find you get what you need". Maybe he could ponder that a little bit with respect to the proceedings in the House in the last few minutes.

In any case, we are in agreement that Bill C-125 should go through. It is basically technical and cleans up some statutes.

Mr. Alex Kindy (Calgary Northeast): Mr. Speaker, I think if it is simply a bill to clean up statutes it is certainly in order to pass it. I do not know what the justice committee studied but apparently it made some corrections. I suppose they are right.

In answer to what my friend from B.C. said, I think if one has an amendment one has to believe in that amendment. That amendment was defeated and we did not get a commitment from the minister. A commitment from the minister is not worth the paper it is written on therefore I cannot support and give unanimous consent to pass the bill.

As far as the present one goes, I have no problems with its passage.

• (1200)

Mr. Don Boudria (Glengarry—Prescott—Russell): Mr. Speaker, I want to use the next few moments to bring something to the attention of this House while speaking on Bill C-125.

A few moments ago we were debating Bill C-123. We dealt with an amendment proposed by the hon. member for Port Moody—Coquitlam and I believe the amendment he was proposing to that bill was good. It was worthy of support. I supported it and so did my colleagues.

All members of Parliament should remember that there is a difference between a good bill and one that is already good which we want to make even better. The bill we were discussing at the time was already good and we wanted to make it better. That amendment was defeated but we still have to work on the premise that the bill was good because we initially said it was.

I live in a riding where smuggling is a terrible problem. It is taking a terrible toll on the constituents of my area. My colleague for Stormont—Dundas who represents a riding in Ontario that adjoins with mine told me of a recent auction sale in Cornwall where 250 cars were sold that had been seized because of smuggling at that port of entry. The fines right now are so low that it is a farce and we need to increase them. We need to do what is necessary to cut down smuggling and hopefully even stop it. Unless we get Bill C-123 passed in the very few days left in this Parliament, we are not going to have that.

We saw the shootings in my riding not that long ago. People were shooting at each other for control of that trade. That is terrible and it is incumbent upon all of us in the few days that we have left to pass that legislation which is so vital. That unanimous consent was refused earlier but I ask all colleagues in the House to take a few minutes to pause and reflect. Just maybe common sense will prevail and consent will be given. We will then debate that legislation and do what is good for the people of Canada and the people who I have the honour and privilege to represent in this House.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): Is the House ready for the question?

Some hon. members: Question.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): Is it the pleasure of the House to adopt the motion?

Some hon. members: Agreed.

Some hon. members: On division.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): Carried on division.

Motion agreed to, read the third time and passed.

Mr. Boudria: Mr. Speaker, I am going to do something that is somewhat unusual. I am going to ask for unanimous consent that we revert to the bill that was denied earlier. It is unusual for an opposition member to ask for the unanimous consent to deal with a government bill but I will do that now because of the reasons I have already explained in this House. I hope that compassion and common sense will prevail and we will be able to do what I am asking.

Mr. Nicholson: Mr. Speaker, let me indicate to the House the hon. member for Calgary is quite correct that the motion from the member for Port Moody—Coquitlam was defeated. It specified a percentage of the proceeds of crime that would go to crime prevention and what would stay or otherwise, as directed by the government.

The government motion that was concurred in by the House actually opens up the possibility that the government can direct the proceeds of crime to an account to be decided upon by regulation. That is a change from the original bill that indicated that all funds that came to the Crown must go into the debt reduction account. We made a change to that.

I did not get an opportunity but I should have touched on the report of the standing committee. It had very impressive recommendations. Certainly the minister has an ad hoc committee looking at that. I expect we will probably be getting recommendations as well from the ad hoc committee that advises the minister as to where and how the funds should be spent. I do not want the House to be left with the impression that the door was closed on this or that this was not an outstanding report by the standing committee on justice.

I think the words of the hon. member for Glengarry—Prescott—Russell should be heeded by the House. It is an excellent bill, supported on all sides of the House and the window of opportunity for passing something that our constituents have been asking for is very small. I hope all hon. members, in considering this request, will give that unanimous consent so we can move to third reading on this bill.

Mr. Kindy: Mr. Speaker, I was listening with interest to the hon. member. My experience as a former member on the justice committee is that if it is just left to regulations and the bureaucracy, the advice is never going to be followed to put the money in a fund to reduce our debt or for crime prevention.

If we are serious about this matter and if the government had been serious about this matter, it would have accepted the amendment because it was a good amendment. It was very simple for government members to vote for it because it would have directed 70 per cent of the funds to debt reduction and 30 per cent to crime prevention. If the government is still serious, it still can bring it back and have debate and so on therefore I cannot give my consent.

Mr. Angus: Mr. Speaker, I think we have to recognize that having been reported, there is no longer an option to make further amendments in this room. The other House can amend it if it so chooses. To even delay third reading in no way provides an opportunity for the government to amend the bill.

The only way we could do that is if by unanimous agreement the House reverted to report stage. I am not suggesting we do that. There comes a point in time in which we have to recognize that we tried. We did not get there, so let us move on with it.

I would encourage the hon. member to reconsider whether or not he grants unanimous consent to allow us to move this bill through third reading to get it into the other place so it can be passed into law.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): Is there unanimous consent?

Some hon. members: No.

The Chairman: We have a lot of witnesses to hear from today: the Canadian Federation of Municipalities, the Canadian Police Association, and the Canadian Association of Chiefs of Police.

The order of the day is Bill C-123, an act respecting the management of certain property seized or restrained in connection with certain offences, the disposition of certain property on the forfeiture thereof and the sharing of the proceeds of disposition therefrom in certain instances.

I would like each of the groups to present a short brief, and then we'll have questions to all three groups, if that's suitable. We'll start with the Canadian Federation of Municipalities.

M. Michel Hamelin (Fédération canadienne des municipalités): Merci, monsieur le président. Je m'appelle Michel Hamelin; je suis le président de la Communauté urbaine de Montréal et le président du Comité sur la sécurité et la prévention de la criminalité en milieu urbain à la Fédération canadienne des municipalités. M'accompagnent, M^me^ Donna Blake, coordonnatrice du Programme de prévention de la criminalité à la Fédération canadienne des municipalités, et M. Louis Théoret qui s'occupe de la liaison communautaire.

Monsieur le président, je vous remercie de me donner l'occasion d'aborder devant ce Comité une question dont l'importance et l'intérêt sont primordiaux pour les municipalités canadiennes.

Nous vous félicitons de l'excellent travail que vous avez accompli concernant cette initiative et nous sommes enchantés des progrès réalisés à ce jour.

La lutte contre la criminalité représente un enjeu très important pour les municipalités. Chaque jour, les dirigeants municipaux constatent que la criminalité est devenue une préoccupation croissante pour les citoyens et citoyennes. Nous travaillons régulièrement avec des intervenants dans le domaine de la prévention de la criminalité afin de faire face aux problèmes causés par le commerce de la drogue, la prostitution, la violence chez les jeunes, les crimes contre la propriété, etc. Grâce à la FCM, les dirigeants municipaux ont été en mesure d'entreprendre l'élaboration de stratégies permettant de faire face aux problèmes de criminalité par l'intermédiaire de notre propre comité permanent sur la sécurité et la prévention de la criminalité en milieu urbain. Les gouvernements locaux étant affectés plus que tout autre par la criminalité, nous apprécions que l'on reconnaisse notre contribution à la prévention et à la lutte contre la criminalité.

Tous connaissent l'ampleur des coûts de police. La loi sur les produits de la criminalité, plus précisément le plan de partage, est une des façons de s'assurer que les municipalités continueront de faire face à la criminalité et d'investir dans la prévention et la sécurité au sein de la société canadienne. Il est clair que le but de cette loi est de traiter du facteur de responsabilité en ce qui a trait à l'administration des biens saisis.

Le mardi 25 mai 1993

Le président: Nous avons de nombreux témoins à entendre aujourd'hui: la Fédération canadienne des municipalités, l'Association canadienne des policiers et l'Association canadienne des chefs de police.

À l'ordre du jour le projet de loi C-123, Loi concernant l'administration de biens saisis ou bloqués relativement à certaines infractions, l'aliénation de biens après confiscation et, dans certains cas, le partage du produit de leur aliénation.

Si cela vous convient, je demanderais à chacun des groupes de nous présenter un court exposé, après quoi nous pourrons leur poser des questions. Nous allons commencer par la Fédération canadienne des municipalités.

Mr. Michel Hamelin (Canadian Federation of Municipalities): Thank you, Mr. Chairman. My name is Michel Hamelin; I am president of the Communauté urbaine de Montréal and chairman of the Canadian Federation of Municipalities Committee on Urban Safety and Crime Prevention Program. Accompanying me today are Mrs. Donna Blake, coordinator of the Crime Prevention Program, Canadian Federation of Municipalities, and Mr. Louis Théoret, who is responsible for community liaison.

Thank you, Mr. Chairman, for allowing me the opportunity to address the committee on this important issue of great relevance and interest to Canadian municipalities.

Congratulations on your excellent work on this initiative. We are very pleased with the progress to date.

Municipalities have a huge stake in fighting crime. Municipal politicians deal daily with crime as a growing concern and issue for constituents. We work regularly with stakeholders in crime prevention to deal with problems associated with the drug trade, prostitution, youth violence, property crimes and the list goes on. Through FCM, municipal politicians have been able to begin to develop strategies to deal with crime problems through our own Standing Committee on Urban Safety and Crime Prevention program. Given that crime affects local government more than any other order of government, we appreciate being recognized for our contribution in tackling crime and prevention issues.

Everyone knows that the cost of providing police services is very high. The proceeds of crime legislation and more specifically the sharing plan is one way of ensuring that municipalities can continue to deal with and invest in crime prevention and safety in Canadian society. It is clear the intent of the legislation is to address the liability factor in dealing with the management of seized goods.

[Texte]

Bien que notre intention ne soit pas de nuire au processus législatif ou de provoquer un retard, nous souhaitons qu'un certain nombre de préoccupations soient prises en considération. Notre objectif est de faire en sorte que cette loi serve à diminuer la criminalité, et les gouvernements municipaux sont les premiers à savoir ce qui est efficace sur le plan local. La position de la FCM est donc la suivante.

Concernant le partage des biens, une structure doit être établie pour administrer le partage juste et équitable du produit net des biens acquis par des activités illégales. Nous sommes d'accord sur le raisonnement du gouvernement fédéral concernant le partage, à savoir que les gouvernements locaux et provinciaux méritent de partager équitablement les fruits de la confiscation résultant des efforts qu'ils font pour appliquer la loi, ce qui représente des coûts significatifs pour les municipalités.

Le gouvernement fédéral semble être favorable à un partage direct avec les gouvernements provinciaux uniquement. Le partage des biens saisis par les forces de police municipales avec les provinces suivant ce que celles-ci «jugent approprié» n'est pas acceptable. La Fédération canadienne des municipalités est fermement convaincue que les produits de la criminalité devraient être directement transférés aux gouvernements municipaux. Le partage direct avec les municipalités aura pour effet d'encourager les gouvernements municipaux, par l'intermédiaire de leurs services de police, à utiliser la loi. Actuellement, il existe une certaine réticence à prendre part à des enquêtes étant donné que les dépenses ne sont jamais remboursées. Le partage direct contribuera grandement à atténuer cette préoccupation.

Un autre effet sera d'éliminer la possibilité que les gouvernements provinciaux utilisent les produits de la criminalité pour remplacer d'autres fonds envoyés aux municipalités. Ces produits doivent être utilisés pour investir directement dans les activités de prévention et dans la sécurité de nos collectivités. Les gouvernement municipaux sont pleinement en mesure d'administrer les transferts directs au sein de leur propre structure administrative.

Dans l'ensemble, le gros du financement des services de police est assuré par les gouvernements municipaux, tant pour la GRC que pour les forces de police municipales, avec une contribution relativement faible des provinces. Il est essentiel que le gouvernement qui assume le coût principal des enquêtes initiales soit celui qui reçoive les produits relatifs à la confiscation des biens.

En ce qui concerne le plan de partage des coûts, le plan de partage des biens que propose le fédéral met de l'avant une formule de répartition proportionnelle où il est question de 90, 50 ou 10 p. 100, cela calculé sur la base du produit net dans chacun des cas. Il est à noter que c'est le procureur fédéral qui déterminera la répartition des pourcentages. Pour faciliter son travail et assurer un jugement logique et équitable, la formule de partage doit être clarifiée sous certains aspects. Cette proportion de 90, 50 ou 10 p. 100 n'apparaît évidemment pas dans le projet de loi. Il s'agit de discussions qui auraient eu lieu concernant la réglementation qui rendrait le projet de loi opérationnel.

Voici donc les aspects qui nécessitent ce besoin de clarification: Comment mesurera-t-on la participation aux enquêtes? Quelles sortes et combien d'activités faudra-t-il pour constituer une participation de 90 p. 100, par opposition à une

[Traduction]

Our intention is not to block the legislation or encourage delays, but we have a number of concerns we wish considered. Our goal is to make this legislation useful in reducing crime, and municipal governments know first-hand what is effective at the local level. Consequently, the FCM position is as follows.

Regarding the sharing of assets, a structure must be established to manage the equitable and fair sharing of net proceeds of goods acquired through illegal activities. We agree with the federal government's rationale for sharing, namely, that local and provincial governments deserve to share equitably in the fruits of forfeitures resulting from their enforcement efforts that result in significant costs to local municipalities.

The federal government appears to favour direct sharing with provincial governments only. Sharing assets seized by municipal police forces with the provinces for distribution "as they deem appropriate" is not acceptable. The Federation of Canadian Municipalities firmly believes that the proceeds of crime should be transferred directly to municipal governments. Direct sharing with municipalities will encourage municipal governments, through local police services, to use the legislation. Currently there exists a reluctance to become involved in investigations due to expenses that are never recovered. Direct sharing will do much to alleviate this concern.

Direct sharing will also avoid the possibility that provincial governments could use the proceeds to replace other funds directed to municipalities. The proceeds must be used to directly invest in prevention activities and in the safety of our communities. Municipal governments are fully capable of managing direct transfers within their own administrative structures.

Overall, the bulk of funding for police services is borne by municipal governments, both for RCMP and municipal police forces, with relatively small contributions from the provinces. It is essential that the government that bears the major cost for initial investigations should be the recipient of any asset proceeds.

As for the cost-sharing scheme, the proposed federal asset-sharing scheme puts forward a 90%, 50% or 10% of a pro-rated share calculated on the basis of the net proceeds in each case. It is noted that the federal prosecutor will determine the percentage breakdowns. In order to facilitate this individual's work and ensure consistent and fair judgment, the FCM believes the sharing formula needs clarification in some areas. Obviously, this 90%/50%/10% breakdown is not found in the bill. This breakdown may have been proposed in discussions regarding the regulations that would make the bill operational.

Here are some of the things that need to be clarified: How will involvement in any investigation be measured? What kinds of activities and how many will constitute a 90% involvement as opposed to a 50% or 10% contribution? In our view, all orders contribution de 50 ou de 10 p. 100? Tous les ordres de gouvernement, selon nous, doivent participer à l'élaboration d'une formule neutre et au choix de l'organisme ou de l'individu le mieux qualifié pour prendre cette décision.

Le plan de partage proposé est vague et a besoin d'être beaucoup mieux défini.

Pour ce qui est de l'administration des biens, nous appuyons pleinement la création d'un bureau central entièrement responsable de l'administration des produits de la criminalité saisis ou bloqués. Les municipalités ne sont pas équipées pour administrer de façon intérimaire les biens et propriétés confisqués. Cette responsabilité devrait continuer d'échoir au gouvernement fédéral bien que nous exhortions celui-ci à exercer une certaine prudence concernant le remboursement des frais généraux liés au régime d'administration. Il pourrait y avoir des coûts généraux élevés, ce qui réduirait considérablement les montants dont disposeraient les municipalités pour couvrir le coût des enquêtes et de la prevention de la criminalité.

La FCM suggère d'instaurer un mécanisme de révision des coûts autre que celui du ministère fédéral afin d'établir un coût administratif maximum pour le traitement des produits de la criminalité. Idéalement, on devrait mettre sur pied une équipe administrative nationale à laquelle les intervenants pourraient participer.

Enfin, parmi les points généraux, le processus législatif progresse selon nous de façon encourageante. Votre Comité a accompli beaucoup de travail à cet effet. En tenant compte des points que nous avons soulevés précédemment, nous sommes persuadés que les règlements relatifs à cette loi répondront aux préoccupations que nous venons d'exposer et assureront un partenariat réel entre les trois ordres de gouvernement, en ce qui a trait à la sécurité et à la prévention de la criminalité.

Comme dernière suggestion, nous recommandons qu'une clause de révision soit intégrée à la loi de façon que, dans cinq ans, par exemple, nous puissions déterminer si nous avons respecté l'esprit de la loi et si celle-ci répond aux objectifs fixés. Cette mesure nous permettrait de régler les problèmes survenant dans l'administration de la loi concernant la division des biens.

En terminant, la FCM vous remercie de lui avoir donné l'occasion de commenter cette initiative importante et se fera un plaisir de répondre à vos questions après une dernière clarification, cependant. Dans la loi on dit: «le ministre peut répartir les biens». Je pense que la loi devrait se lire: «le ministre doit répartir les proceeds of crime ou les biens qui seront saisis.

Merci.

The Chairman: Thank you very much.

I wonder if we could have the submission from the Canadian Police Association.

Mr. James Kingston (Canadian Police Association): Mr. Chairman, the Solicitor General over the last year and a half has come to our conferences, and this is one of the subjects he has talked about. It certainly has always been our position that those who are providing the service should share in the proceeds. Of course one of our rather blunt criticisms of this bill is that it doesn't seem to do that.

of government must have input in developing a neutral formula and in selecting the organization or individual best suited to make this decision.

The proposed sharing scheme is vague and needs to be much more clearly defined.

With respect to managing assets, we fully support the creation of a consolidated and fully accountable office to manage seized or restrained proceeds of crime. Municipalities are not equipped to manage property and assets on an interim basis. Federal government should retain that responsibility, but we urge the federal government to exercise some caution with respect to the recovery of overhead costs of the managing regime program. The potential exists for significant overhead costs which would result in greatly reduced proceeds being directed to municipal investigative and crime prevention costs.

The FCM suggests that a cost review mechanism be established other than the federal government ministry itself to set a maximum administrative cost for proceeds cases. Ideally, a national management team should be established in which stakeholders can become involved.

Finally, with respect to the general points, I must say that the progress of the legislation is encouraging. Your committee has achieved a great deal. With consideration of the above points, we are confident that the regulations governing this legislation will meet the concerns outlined and ensure real partnerships between the three orders of government in addressing crime and safety issues.

As a final suggestion, we recommend that a review clause be built into the legislation so that in five years, for example, we can determine whether the spirit of the legislation has been achieved and if the legislation is achieving that to which it is intended. This would provide us the opportunity to work through any problems with the administration of the act in arranging for the division of assets.

The FCM appreciates the opportunity to comment on this important initiative and looks forward to responding to your questions. However, before I do that, I would like to add one final clarification. The bill says that, "the Minister may. . .share the proceeds". I think that the bill should read: "the Minister shall. . .share the proceeds of crime or the seized goods."

Thank you.

Le président: Merci beaucoup.

La parole est maintenant aux représentants de l'Association canadienne des policiers.

M. James Kingston (Association canadienne des policiers): Monsieur le président, le solliciteur général assiste à nos conférences depuis un an et demi, et il nous a déjà parlé de cette question. Il ne fait aucun doute que nous avons toujours dit que ceux qui offrent le service devraient recevoir une part du produit de l'aliénation. Bien sûr, une de nos plus vertes critiques du projet de loi est qu'il ne semble pas prévoir ce partage.

[Texte]

There also seems to be some strong opposition from staff in the ministry about whether or not this should go back to the provinces or whether it finds its way back to the municipalities. I want to make it very clear that it's our position that it has to go back to the municipalities. Certainly we feel they are involved in the joint forces operations, and usually these seizures are a direct result of joint forces operations, and they in fact should share in the proceeds.

This has been the position that has been put forward to the Solicitor General. We have correspondence from him indicating that would be his wish. We thought that would be the purpose of this bill. Unfortunately, we're left to find out what the intent of this bill really is through the regulations. We have some very serious difficulty with that.

You see, really, this bill talks about sharing the assets. One of the problems we see with it is what we're really doing is creating another federal bureaucracy, and this bureaucracy could in fact eat up the profits. It should be going back to the provinces and the municipalities. It doesn't say in the bill, even though there is some sort of an understanding that they will take only 10%. . .but 10% of the net profit or 10% of what's left, we really don't know. The fundamental problem we see with it is that we don't know what these regulations are.

We also are somewhat disturbed. . .I'll just quote from page seven of our brief, from the backgrounder material:

> It can be argued that direct contribution to municipalities or police agencies runs the risk of distorting their investigative priorities by creating a bias in favour of "profitable" investigations at the expense of important but "less profitable" ones, fostering unnecessary competition among police forces, and distorting police budgetary processes.

Within the police service, we always say we have thin skins. Well, something like that certainly gives us a thin skin. Priorities are not set that way. These particular investigations are complex. They require a long time to achieve the result.

Right now, we're told $65 million in funds have been seized up to this particular point. I'd like to know how much of that has found its way into the policing portions of the federal government up to this point.

Again, we're not going to belabour this issue. We just would like to think that before this thing is passed, your committee would want to know, as we do, what is the fine point in the regulations.

Mr. Scott Newark (General Counsel, Canadian Police Association): I might add that the point, of course, is that the police are the ones who do the original investigation in terms of this type of crime, which is often very sophisticated. It requires some equally sophisticated techniques, long expensive investigations. I think what would be helpful is asking why proceeds of crime legislation exists in the first place, why we've gone toward it. The answer indicates, probably better than anything else, where the money should therefore end up.

En outre, le personnel du ministère semble s'opposer fortement au projet de loi car il n'est pas sûr si le produit de l'aliénation devrait être payé aux provinces ou aux municipalités. Je veux être très clair sur ce point: nous estimons que le produit doit être versé aux municipalités. Il ne fait aucun doute qu'elles participent aux opérations conjointes des forces policières et, d'habitude, les saisies sont le résultat direct d'opérations conjointes. Donc, les municipalités devraient toucher une part du produit.

Nous avons fait part de cette position au solliciteur général. Nous avons des lettres de sa part qui démontrent qu'il est du même avis que nous. Nous avons cru que ce projet de loi traduirait cette volonté. Malheureusement, ce sont les règlements qui nous feront découvrir la véritable intention de ce projet de loi. Nous avons des inquiétudes très sérieuses à cet égard.

Vous voyez, on parle du partage des biens dans ce projet de loi. Le problème, c'est qu'il crée une autre bureaucratie fédérale, une bureaucratie qui pourrait absorber le produit de l'aliénation. Il devrait être versé aux provinces et aux municipalités. Le projet de loi ne l'indique pas, même s'il y a un genre d'entente voulant que le fédéral ne prenne que 10 p. 100. . .mais nous ne savons pas vraiment s'il s'agit de 10% des recettes nettes ou 10% de ce qui restera. Selon nous, le problème fondamental de ce projet de loi, c'est que nous ne savons rien au sujet des règlements.

Par ailleurs, nous sommes quelque peu inquiets. . .Permettez-moi de vous lire un paragraphe tiré de la page 7 de notre mémoire où nous citons un extrait des documents d'information:

> On pourrait dire qu'une contribution directe aux municipalités ou aux forces policières risque de fausser leurs priorités en matière d'enquête en créant un parti pris en faveur des enquêtes rentables aux dépens des enquêtes moins rentables, d'encourager une concurrence inutile entre les forces policières et de fausser les processus budgétaires de ces dernières.

Dans les services policiers, nous disons toujours que nous sommes susceptibles. Eh bien, voilà certainement le genre de chose qui nous rend susceptibles. Les priorités ne sont pas établies de cette façon. Ces enquêtes sont complexes. Il faut beaucoup de temps pour arriver à des résultats.

À l'heure actuelle, on nous dit que jusqu'à présent 65 millions de dollars de biens ont été saisis. J'aimerais savoir quel pourcentage de cette somme le gouvernement fédéral a envoyé aux forces policières jusqu'à présent.

Encore une fois, nous ne voulons pas trop insister sur la question. Nous voudrions tout simplement qu'avant d'adopter ce projet de loi, votre comité veuille savoir, comme nous, ce que l'on retrouvera dans le règlement.

M. Scott Newark (avocat général, Association canadienne des policiers): J'aimerais ajouter que naturellement, ce sont les forces policières qui font l'enquête initiale dans ce genre de crime, qui est souvent très complexe. Les enquêtes sont longues et coûteuses et exigent des techniques toutes très perfectionnées. Je pense qu'il serait utile de demander tout d'abord pourquoi il existe des mesures législatives concernant le produit de la criminalité et la réponse est sans doute que c'est pour indiquer où l'argent devrait en fin de compte être envoyé.

[Text]

The answer, at least from our perspective, is that it is saying that crime does not or will not pay the same way it has in the past. That is a very real deterrent to crime. As well, the dollars that come back... I mean, presumably the reason why we want to do this is so that we can continue the process of crime suppression.

That being so, I think it's a very good idea to examine whether the structure suggested in the bill is going to do that the most efficiently. The last thing I would imagine anybody really wants to see is a federal bureaucracy involved in running pizza parlours across the country, or car dealerships or anything like that. The act itself is entitled the Seized Property Management Act. I must admit, I would be more comfortable if I saw added in there the words, "...Property Management and Disposal Act".

The purpose should be to accumulate the assets to take them away from organized or sophisticated crime, to convert them, to liquidate them, and to put the money back into the hands of the people who literally are going to be in the front lines of the ongoing fight, namely, the police. I must admit, I suppose if we're talking about distributing the money to a civilian agency, I would think the one closest to the police force is the closest.

Subject to something I have not as of yet run into, large police forces have complex and sophisticated budget sections. That's what they do. They budget for how they're going to spend their money. I'm not sure why there needs to be a stop of the dollars once calculated, however it's calculated, at any bureaucracy along the way.

I don't think it's beyond our capacity to figure out how we're going to manage the assets. We agree that should be done by somebody other than the police. It requires something that's not completely consistent with ongoing police functions. But once that's done, have the property liquidated, work out the formula, however you're going to work out the formula, and then directly transfer the funds back to the people who do the job in the first place, the police.

I agree completely with Mr. Kingston and with the gentleman from the Canadian Federation of Municipalities. It is important to know how sharing is going to take place, to know, I suppose, if sharing is going to be realistic. There's a very real concern that a large administration could end up simply eating away all the profits, which is a disincentive to doing what could be extremely effective intervention in crime suppression of important and very sophisticated crime we do want to stop, that all of us have an interest in stopping.

The Chairman: Thank you very much.

From the Canadian Association of Chiefs of Police, we have ex-Chief, still-Chief Flanagan.

Mr. Thomas Flanagan (Vice-President, Canadian Association of Chiefs of Police): Mr. Chairman, thank you. I'm Vice-President of the Canadian Association of Chiefs of Police. I also chair the law amendments committee.

I have very little to say other than the fact that we support the remarks by Mr. Hamelin and the Canadian Federation of Municipalities. We would like to see this bill pass as soon as possible, but mainly we would like to see it pass. We don't want

Si nous adoptons de telles mesures, c'est à notre avis pour dire que le crime ne paie pas ou qu'il ne paiera pas de la même façon qu'il a payé par le passé. Il s'agit d'une mesure vraiment dissuasive. En outre, les sommes qui sont réinvesties... Je présume que la raison pour laquelle nous voulons faire cela c'est que nous voulons continuer de lutter contre le crime.

Je pense que c'est une très bonne idée d'examiner si la structure proposée dans le projet de loi permettra d'atteindre cet objectif le plus efficacement possible. J'imagine que la dernière chose que l'on voudrait, c'est que la bureaucratie fédérale se retrouve à administrer un peu partout au pays des pizzerias, des concessions d'automobiles ou d'autres entreprises de ce genre. La loi elle-même s'intitule Loi concernant l'administration de biens saisis. Je dois admettre que je serais plus à l'aise si la loi s'intitulait: «Loi concernant l'administration et l'aliénation de biens».

Le but devrait être d'accumuler les biens pour les retirer du crime organisé, les convertir, les liquider et remettre l'argent entre les mains de ceux qui se retrouveront sur le front pour lutter contre la criminalité, notamment la police. Je dois admettre, je suppose que si l'on parle de distribuer l'argent à un organisme civil, alors je pense qu'il faudrait le distribuer à celui qui est le plus près des forces policières.

Je ne connais aucune force policière importante qui n'ait pas un service budgétaire complexe et perfectionné. Ces services établissent le budget et décident comment l'argent sera dépensé. Je ne vois pas pourquoi il serait nécessaire qu'une fois le calcul fait, peu importe la façon dont il est fait, ces sommes passent par une bureaucratie.

Je ne pense pas que ce soit au-dessus de nos capacités de déterminer comment nous allons gérer les biens. Nous convenons que cela doit être fait par quelqu'un d'autre que la police. Ce genre de travail ne correspond pas tout à fait aux fonctions des forces policières. Mais une fois ce travail fait, que les biens sont liquidés, qu'on en est arrivé à une formule, il faudrait alors transférer directement les fonds à ceux qui font le travail en premier lieu, c'est-à-dire la police.

Je suis tout à fait d'accord avec M. Kingston et avec le représentant de la Fédération canadienne des municipalités. Il est important de savoir comment le partage sera fait, de savoir, je suppose, si le partage sera réaliste. On craint qu'une grande administration absorbe tout simplement tous les profits, ce qui découragerait une intervention extrêmement efficace pour mettre fin à ce genre de criminalité très complexe à laquelle nous voulons tous mettre fin.

Le président: Merci beaucoup.

De l'Association canadienne des chefs de police, nous recevons l'ancien chef et toujours chef Flanagan.

M. Thomas Flanagan (vice-président, Association canadienne des chefs de police): Merci, monsieur le président. Je suis vice-président de l'Association canadienne des chefs de police. Je suis en outre président du Comité des modifications législatives.

Je n'ai pas grand-chose à dire, sinon que nous appuyons les observations de M. Hamelin et de la Fédération canadienne des municipalités. Nous aimerions que le projet de loi soit adopté le plus rapidement possible, mais nous tenons surtout à ce qu'il to do anything to obstruct the passage of the bill, whereas everyone here, I suppose, concerned mainly with the regulations. . . We hope and expect that we will have some input into those regulations, but we feel time is of the essence. I don't think I need to elaborate on that, but we would like to see this bill pass. We support it and our main thrust, as the other two or three speakers have stated, is that money does get down to the municipalities, whose taxpayers have to spend it.

• 1550

Mr. Wappel (Scarborough West): I want to begin by saying that I haven't had as much of an opportunity to review this bill as I would have liked, with the detail I would have liked, so some of the questions I'm going to ask may have been dealt with by officials at the first meeting. I haven't had a chance to review the transcript, but maybe you can help me with it.

First of all, Mr. Hamelin, on page 2 of your opening remarks you said that the federal government appears to favour direct sharing with provincial governments only. Can you direct me to the section in the bill that says that?

Mr. Hamelin: I think it's not in the bill, it's in the background.

Mr. Wappel: Don't you consider that to be a problem?

Mr. Hamelin: Yes, it is a problem because the provinces have such big budgets. How can we assure that those proceeds of crime will be directed to prevention and to police costs?

Mr. Wappel: But that's exactly the point. This bill is about as skeletal as one could get. The flesh and the muscles are all in the regulations. How can we go charging around supporting a skeleton when we have absolutely no idea what the body will look like? Don't you think that's dangerous?

M. Hamelin: Il me semble que beaucoup de projets de loi, de tous les ordres de gouvernement, sont des squelettes. C'est la réglementation qui devient importante à ce moment-là. Cela a été souligné tout à l'heure par le représentant de l'Association des chefs de police. Donc, au niveau de la réglementation, il devra y avoir un input.

Ce qui est important pour nous, c'est que le principe du projet de loi soit adopté. De toute façon, il n'y aura sûrement pas de réglementation tant que le projet de loi n'aura pas été adopté. L'important est d'adopter le projet de loi, de consacrer ce principe et de voir par la suite à ce que la réglementation reflète bien les aspirations de ceux qui doivent lutter contre la criminalité sur le terrain.

Mr. Wappel: Let's talk about the principle of the bill. Wouldn't you agree with the Canadian Police Association that the principle of the bill, and if not the primary principle then certainly one of the major principles, should be the prevention of drug crime and the suppression of crimes involving drugs, yet as the Canadian Police Association points out in its brief, that's not even mentioned in the bill.

soit adopté. Nous ne voulons rien faire pour bloquer l'adoption du projet de loi et, je suppose, comme pour tous ceux qui sont ici, ce sont surtout les règlements qui nous préoccupent. . . Nous espérons qu'on nous demandera notre avis au moment de l'élaboration de ces règlements, et nous nous y attendons, mais nous estimons que le temps presse. Je ne pense pas qu'il soit nécessaire d'élaborer davantage, mais nous aimerions que ce projet de loi soit adopté. Nous l'appuyons et notre principal objectif, comme l'ont dit les deux ou trois témoins qui m'ont précédé, c'est de voir cet argent versé aux municipalités, car en fin de compte ce sont les contribuables municipaux qui doivent le dépenser.

M. Wappel (Scarborough-Ouest): J'aimerais tout d'abord dire que je n'ai pas eu l'occasion d'examiner ce projet de loi comme je l'aurais voulu, d'en faire un examen aussi approfondi que je l'aurais voulu, de sorte que les représentants du ministère ont peut-être déjà répondu lors de la première séance à certaines des questions que je vais poser. Je n'ai pas eu l'occasion de lire le procès-verbal de cette première séance, mais vous pourrez peut-être m'aider.

Tout d'abord, monsieur Hamelin, à la page 2 de vos remarques liminaires, vous dites que le gouvernement fédéral semble être favorable à un partage direct avec les gouvernements provinciaux uniquement. Pouvez-vous m'indiquer dans quel article du projet de loi on dit cela?

M. Hamelin: Je ne pense pas que ce soit dans le projet de loi, c'est dans les documents d'information.

M. Wappel: Ne considérez-vous pas cela comme étant un problème?

M. Hamelin: Si, c'est un problème car les provinces ont de si gros budgets. Comment pouvons-nous nous assurer que les produits de la criminalité seront utilisés pour la prévention et les coûts de police?

M. Wappel: Mais c'est exactement ce que je veux dire. Ce projet de loi est on ne peut plus squelettique. Tout ce qui pourrait l'étoffer se retrouvera dans le règlement. Comment pouvons-nous appuyer un tel projet de loi lorsqu'on n'a aucune idée de ce à quoi ressembleront les règlements? Ne croyez-vous pas que c'est dangereux?

Mr. Hamelin: It would seem to me that many bills, from all orders of government, are skeletal. Then, the regulations become important. This is what the representative of the Canadian Association of Chiefs of Police just said. So, as far as the regulations are concerned, we will have to have an input.

The important thing for us is that the principle of the bill be passed. Anyway, there surely won't be any regulations as long as the bill has not been passed. What is important is passing the bill, establishing this principle and ensuring that the regulations truly reflect the aspirations of those who must fight crime in the field.

M. Wappel: Parlons un peu du principe du projet de loi. N'êtes-vous pas d'accord avec l'Association canadienne des policiers pour dire que le principe du projet de loi, et si ce n'est pas le premier principe alors il s'agit certainement de l'un des grands principes du projet de loi, devrait être la prévention et la suppression des crimes reliés à la drogue, et pourtant, comme l'a mentionné l'Association canadienne des policiers dans son mémoire, on n'en parle même pas dans le projet de loi.

M. Hamelin: Il n'y a pas seulement la criminalité ou le problème de la drogue. Il y a aussi toute la criminalité organisée qui s'attaque à l'ensemble de la société canadienne. La drogue est un problème important, et nous le reconnaissons tous, mais il y a aussi l'ensemble du crime organisé. Pourquoi se partagerait-on uniquement les profits tirés de la criminalité liée à la drogue et non pas les profits tirés de tous les autres genres de criminalité? J'appuie le gouvernement quand il dit que les fruits de tous les genres de criminalité, quels qu'ils soient, doivent être partagés et doivent pouvoir, au niveau des municipalités, être utilisés pour payer les coûts de police ou pour travailler à la prévention de la criminalité.

Mr. Wappel: Okay. Let me ask a provocative question. What will guarantee that the money paid to municipalities would be plowed back into the police forces, as opposed to being used to buy plows?

• 1555

M. Hamelin: C'est bien simple. La réglementation n'a qu'à prévoir que ces sommes doivent être envoyées aux municipalités pour la prévention et les coûts de police. Toutes les municipalités ont des firmes de comptables qui doivent approuver les états financiers. Si des sommes versées à la municipalité sont employées à autre chose, la firme de comptables agréés devra dénoncer ce fait. Je ne vois absolument aucun problème là si c'est dans la réglementation.

Mr. Wappel: Shouldn't that sort of thing be in the act itself?

M. Hamelin: Eh bien, je laisse aux législateurs le soin de trouver la meilleure façon de traduire leurs intentions, de déterminer si cela doit être inscrit dans la loi ou dans la réglementation. Ce qui nous importe, c'est que cela soit inscrit quelque part et se fasse le plus rapidement possible.

Mr. Wappel: The reason I ask this is that I had a private member's bill—I still do—on this subject, admittedly directed to drug crimes. In my private member's bill I specifically put it in that the money was to be given back for continued use against, in that case, the investigation of drug crimes and the suppression of drugs. My concern is that if money is plowed back and no principle is stated in the bill that it must be used for the fighting of crime, it might end up being used for other things.

M. Hamelin: Je viens de répondre à cela en disant que la réglementation ou la loi devrait préciser que ces sommes d'argent doivent servir à la lutte contre la criminalité et à la prévention. Pour ce qui est de la drogue en particulier, je pense qu'il faut consacrer autant d'argent à la prévention qu'à la lutte contre le trafic. Ce qui rend le trafic florissant, c'est qu'en bout de ligne, il y a des usagers qui veulent avoir de la drogue. Si on pouvait faire de la prévention et réduire de moitié le nombre de personnes qui achètent de la drogue, on réglerait une bonne partie de notre problème.

Il faut donc que la réglementation ou la loi précise que les sommes versées aux municipalités doivent servir uniquement à la prévention et aux coûts de police. À ce moment-là, la municipalité qui ne veut pas s'en servir à ces fins renverra l'argent au fédéral. J'ai cependant l'impression que chaque municipalité s'en servirait à ces fins-là si la loi ou la réglementation l'exigeait.

[Translation]

Mr. Hamelin: It's not only the problem of crime or drug crime. There's also the whole problem of organized crime which is damaging the Canadian society as a whole. Drug crime is a major problem, and we all recognize it, but there's also the problem of organized crime. Why should we only share the proceeds of crimes involving drugs and not all the proceeds of all other types of crimes? I support the government when it says that the proceeds of all types of crimes, whatever they are, must be shared and that the municipalities must be able to use these proceeds towards police costs or crime prevention.

M. Wappel: Très bien. Permettez-moi de vous poser une question provocante. Qu'est-ce qui garantira que les sommes versées aux municipalités seront réinvesties dans les forces policières plutôt que dans l'achat de charrues?

Mr. Hamelin: It is quite simple. It must be specified in the regulations that these moneys must be sent to the municipalities to be directed towards prevention and police costs. All municipalities must have their financial statements approved by accounting firms. If moneys paid to the municipality are directed towards something else, the accounting firm will have to denounce that fact. I don't see any problem whatsoever if it is specified in the regulations.

M. Wappel: Est-ce que ce genre de chose ne devrait pas se retrouver dans la loi elle-même?

Mr. Hamelin: Well, I leave it up to the legislators to find the best way to translate their intentions, to determine whether it should be specified in the Act or in the regulations. What is important to us is that it be written somewhere and that it be passed as soon as possible.

M. Wappel: La raison pour laquelle je pose la question c'est que j'avais et j'ai toujours d'ailleurs un projet de loi d'initiative parlementaire sur cette question, portant sur les crimes reliés à la drogue. Dans mon projet de loi, je précise que les sommes doivent être renvoyées pour être utilisées, dans ce cas-ci, pour faire enquête sur les crimes reliés à la drogue et pour lutter contre les drogues. Ce qui m'inquiète, c'est que s'il n'est pas précisé dans la loi que ces sommes doivent être utilisées pour lutter contre la criminalité, ces sommes risquent d'être utilisées à d'autres fins.

Mr. Hamelin: I just answered that question by saying that it should be specified in the regulations or in the Act that these moneys must be used for crime prevention and suppression. As far as drugs are concerned, I think we must spend just as much money on prevention as on the fighting of trafficking. What makes trafficking so flourishing is the fact that there are users who want to have drugs. If through prevention it was possible to reduce by half the number of people who buy drugs, we would have solved a good part of the problem.

Therefore, it must be specified in the regulations or in the Act that the moneys paid to the municipalities must be used only toward prevention and police costs. In that case, a municipality which doesn't want to use these moneys for those purposes will have to send them back to the federal government. I am however under the impression that every municipality would use it to that purpose if it was specified in the Act or in the regulations.

[Texte]

Mr. Wappel: In your opening remarks you talked about the 90%, 50%, and 10%. I presume that is also not in the bill. It was announced in the backgrounder or is in the regulations.

M. Hamelin: Non, ce n'est pas dans le projet de loi. Lors de discussions, on s'est fixé des guidelines. On disait: Si un corps policier a fait pratiquement tout le travail, il a droit à 90 p. 100, s'il a collaboré avec un autre corps policier, il a droit à 50 p. 100 et s'il a travaillé simplement par incidence, il a droit à 10 p. 100. Évidemment, ce sont des choses qui restent à préciser.

Comme on le dit dans notre mémoire, il y aurait peut-être lieu de créer un tout petit comité de quelques personnes qui pourrait agir comme arbitre dans ces circonstances. On sait aussi qu'il y a beaucoup de corps policiers qui travaillent en collaboration, et il ne faudrait pas qu'une réglementation empêche les gens de travailler en collaboration parce qu'ils se diraient: Si j'aide mon voisin, je risque de ne pas avoir d'argent, ou c'est lui qui va avoir tout l'argent. Il faut prévoir un mécanisme qui fasse en sorte que les sommes seront distribuées de façon équitable entre les corps policiers et les municipalités qui ont vraiment participé à l'arrestation des criminels en question.

The Chairman: Supplementary to that, do you think any problems would arise out of what might be seen as an inequity? Suppose there is a mechanism for sharing these funds and the municipal police say we think we had a big, important part to play in this, and they get 20%, and then the Ontario Provincial Police say we feel we had a huge, important part to play in this, and they get 20%, and the RCMP grab 60%. Do you think there may be any bickering or any problems that may arise from that?

I would ask that of any of the witnesses.

M. Hamelin: Il y aurait peut-être de légers problèmes, mais tout le monde sera certainement content de recevoir au moins quelque chose au départ. Dans notre mémoire, on vous demande de réviser le tout au bout de cinq ans.

À mon avis, entre gens intelligents, on pourrait réussir à mettre certaines balises. Si on dit 90, 50 et 10 p. 100, cela me semble plus facile à déterminer que si on dit 90, 80, 70 et 60 p. 100. Si on dit 90, 50 et 10 p. 100, avec un comité d'arbitrage très restreint, on pourra arriver très rapidement à des conclusions satisfaisantes pour tout le monde.

• 1600

Encore une fois, il vaut mieux d'avoir 10 p. 100 que de n'avoir rien du tout.

Mr. Wappel: I agree with the five-year review. I think that is a good idea.

To turn to the Canadian Police Association, I have just quickly scanned this brief. Let me cut to the quick. Having heard what Chief Flanagan said, that "time is of the essence", and we would like to see this bill passed, what is your recommendation to this committee? Your last line says:

> This Bill, by its failure to make this clear, and by its creation of an asset management oriented scheme with no third part information accountability requires a fundamental re-thinking of priorities and principles.

M. Wappel: Dans vos remarques liminaires, vous avez parlé de 90 p. 100, de 50 p. 100 et de 10 p. 100. Je présume que ce n'est pas non plus dans le projet de loi. C'est dans les documents d'information ou dans les règlements.

Mr. Hamelin: No, it's not in the bill. During some discussions, we established guidelines. We said: if a police force practically did all the work, it is entitled to 90%, if it collaborated with another police force, it is entitled to 50% and if it simply worked on the case incidently, it is entitled to 10%. Of course, those things will have to be specified.

As we said in our brief, maybe a small committee with a handful of people should be established to act as an arbitrator in these circumstances. There are a lot of police forces who cooperate with each other and we wouldn't want to have regulations which would prevent them from working together because they would say to themselves: if I help my neighbour, I might not receive any money, or he might get all the money. We have to have a mechanism to make sure that these moneys are shared equitably between police forces and municipalities who really participated in the arrest of the criminals in question.

Le président: J'ai une question supplémentaire à vous poser à ce sujet. Croyez-vous qu'il pourrait surgir des problèmes découlant de ce que l'on pourrait percevoir comme étant une iniquité. Supposons par exemple qu'il y a un mécanisme pour partager ces fonds et que la police municipale dit qu'elle a joué un rôle important dans l'arrestation des criminels et qu'elle n'obtient que 20 p. 100, et que la police provinciale de l'Ontario dit avoir également joué un rôle très important dans cette affaire et obtient 20 p. 100 et que la GRC va chercher 60 p. 100. Est-ce que vous pensez que cela pourrait être source de chamaille ou de problèmes?

Ma question s'adresse à l'un ou l'autre des témoins.

Mr. Hamelin: There could be some small problems, maybe, but everyone would certainly be happy to receive at least something. In our brief, we're asking you for a five-year review.

In my opinion, intelligent people should manage to establish some parameters. It would seem to me that it is easier to determine if we say 90, 50 and 10% than if we say 90, 80, 70 and 60%. If we say 90, 50 and 10%, I think that a very small arbitration committee would be able to very quickly come to conclusions that would be satisfactory for everyone.

I repeat, it is better to have 10% than to have nothing at all.

M. Wappel: Je suis d'accord avec vous au sujet d'un examen après cinq ans. Je pense que c'est une bonne idée.

Je vais maintenant passer à l'Association canadienne des policiers, dont je viens de feuilleter rapidement le mémoire. Si vous le permettez, je vais entrer dans le vif du sujet. J'ai entendu le chef Flanagan dire que «le temps presse» et que vous aimeriez voir le projet de loi adopté, mais que recommandez-vous au comité? Vous dites à la dernière ligne de votre mémoire:

> Comme le projet de loi ne le précise pas clairement et comme il crée un mécanisme pour l'administration des biens sans exiger que des comptes soient rendus à un tiers, il faut en repenser complètement les priorités et les principes.

[Text]

The way I read that is to go back to the drawing board and start over again. Is that about it?

Mr. Kingston: Unless the committee can look at, I think perhaps, clause 10... What we are very seriously concerned about is that it is not going to find its way down to the municipalities. Our understanding is that the Province of British Columbia has a law that it goes back to their province. We also understand that the Province of Ontario is making overtures that since they already provide sustaining grants to the municipalities, it should come back to their coffers.

What we are really concerned about is that those police agencies—and not all police agencies provide human resources to joint forces operations, but most of the large ones do and they should in fact be reimbursed for that. We are seriously concerned that they are going to get exactly the same per capita grant as all of the rest of them in the provinces. What we think will ultimately happen is that people will say to devil with it, that if they are not going to be compensated for it they are not going to provide that service. Then, we all fail.

We are very, very concerned that because it is left up in the air, the fight is now going to be on. This is just a backgrounder, but the fight will now come on between the municipalities and the provinces as to whether or not they share it. I suspect that the federal government will then share it with the provinces but that the municipalities will have to get their grants from the provinces. Right now, when there are very, very slim resources, that is going to be very difficult. Again, it goes away from the fundamental position that was put forward certainly to our membership by the Solicitor General, that it would go back to the police agencies that were in fact involved.

We are seriously concerned that may not happen with the regulations unless there is some direction from the committee that clause 10 be changed and that where it says "may" it says "shall", that they "shall" share it.

Mr. Wappel: Let me put it to you, Mr. Kingston. Is it your recommendation that this bill should not proceed at the present time unless there are those amendments you have proposed? Is it that serious in your view, in your association's view?

Mr. Kingston: I think we are probably going to take the easy way, say that half a loaf is better than none, and fight those wars out with the regulations. We do think this bill is terribly flawed, but it may be better to go than not go at all. There isn't any mechanism to share it all, so perhaps sharing something is better than sharing nothing.

Mr. Wappel: Unless you are fighting over that loaf and in the end the only people who get anything are the lawyers. In that case you have gained absolutely nothing.

Mr. Newark: As one of the lawyers, I sense the difficulty as well. You have identified clearly in your questions what the gaping holes are. The question is whether on review of the legislation by the committee you have the ability—and in that

Si je comprends bien, il faut tout recommencer à zéro. Est-ce bien cela?

M. Kingston: À moins que le comité puisse faire quelque chose au sujet de l'article 10, peut-être... Nous craignons fort que le produit de l'aliénation de ces biens ne parvienne pas aux municipalités. Nous croyons savoir que la Colombie-Britannique a une loi stipulant que cet argent revient à la province. Nous savons également que l'Ontario est en train de dire que cet argent doit revenir au Trésor provincial, étant donné que la province verse déjà aux municipalités des subventions de soutien.

Nous craignons vraiment que ces services de police—il est vrai que tous les services de police ne fournissent pas des ressources humaines à des opérations conjointes, mais la plupart des grands corps de police le font et on devrait les rembourser pour cette contribution. Nous craignons fortement qu'ils reçoivent comme tous les autres corps de police des provinces exactement les mêmes crédits proportionnels à la population. Nous pensons que les gens vont finir par se dire qu'ils ne fourniront tout simplement pas ce service s'ils ne sont pas indemnisés. Dans ce cas, nous y perdrons tous.

Nous craignons que parce que la question n'est pas réglée dans le projet de loi, des querelles vont s'ensuivre. Les municipalités et les provinces vont se quereller quant au partage de cet argent. Je suppose que le gouvernement fédéral va accepter de partager avec les provinces, mais que les municipalités devront ensuite obtenir leurs subventions des provinces. Dans le contexte actuel, étant donné que les ressources sont extrêmement limitées, ce sera très difficile. C'est contraire à ce que le solliciteur général avait dit à nos membres, c'est-à-dire que les corps de police ayant participé à des opérations recevraient leur part.

Nous craignons fort que cela ne se produise pas si ce n'est pas stipulé dans les règlements, à moins que le comité ne propose une modification à l'article 10, afin que les mots «peut partager» soient remplacés par le mot «partage», c'est-à-dire que le ministre «partage» le produit de l'aliénation.

M. Wappel: Monsieur Kingston, recommandez-vous que ce projet de loi ne soit pas adopté maintenant, à moins qu'on le modifie comme vous l'avez proposé? La situation est-elle grave à ce point, d'après vous et d'après votre association?

M. Kingston: Je pense que nous serons probablement assez souples, disant que mieux vaut peu que pas du tout, et que nous chercherons à régler le problème lors de l'étude du règlement. Nous estimons vraiment que le projet de loi est terriblement imparfait, mais cela vaut mieux que pas de projet de loi du tout. Il n'institue pas de mécanisme assurant le partage complet du produit de l'aliénation, mais il est peut-être préférable de partager quelque chose que de ne rien partager du tout.

M. Wappel: À moins que vous ne vous disputiez tellement sur le partage de ce qui est disponible qu'en fin de compte seuls les avocats en retireront quelque chose. Dans ce cas, vous n'aurez absolument rien gagné.

M. Newark: Je suis moi-même avocat et j'entrevois la difficulté. Vous avez très bien identifié dans vos questions les lacunes flagrantes. Il s'agit de savoir si lors de l'étude de cette mesure, le comité peut—je suppose qu'il incombe à chaque sense I suppose it is more incumbent on you as individual MPs to make amendments that would be accepted in the legislation. All we can really try to do is point out to you what you have already clearly identified in the question, and it is odd, is it not, to have a bill that deals with this but fails to address that in the legislation itself? Instead, you are required to simply wait, I suppose, close your eyes, take a big jump and hope that the regulations do what you think the legislation should do. I suggest that is something, by your own question, you have indicated could be done in the amendments to the legislation that can be done at the committee stage.

This bill could end up being something we would all like to see. It could also end up being something all of us would not like to see, and that perhaps is a strong condemnation of the bill in its current form.

• 1605

The Chairman: Supplementary to that, would it be suitable to the groups of witnesses if an amendment were moved to the bill stating that when the draft regulations were tabled in the House, before implementation they be referred to the appropriate committee for study? Would that make you feel better?

Mr. Wappel: That's exactly what happened with the gun control; the regulations were brought here.

The Chairman: That might be a way of assisting you.

Mr. Flanagan: Mr. Chairman, this is exactly what we had in mind, but we would rather it come from you.

The Chairman: The chairman very seldom makes recommendations like this, but I thought it was a way we might move...

Mr. Wappel: I just want to ask a question of Chief Flanagan, and thank you for your indulgence. Chief, this may sound naive. I know the police have been waiting for this a long time; I know that all the money gets eaten up in the consolidated revenue fund, but why is time really of the essence? Why does this have to pass now? Why do we have to have half a loaf rather than a whole loaf? Why can't this wait until the new Parliament four months from now?

Mr. Flanagan: With respect, I think you've given all the answers with your questions. First of all, we don't know what's going to happen with the new Parliament or whether it will ever come up again. I don't think it's any secret that before elections, not only the police but other people had better strike while the iron is hot because the members of Parliament—it's no secret and I'm not an expert on this—not that they don't always have a very attentive ear, but they might have an even more attentive ear prior to the election.

As you have said, sir, we have been waiting a long time. Certainly the Canadian Association of Chiefs of Police does not want to be responsible for this bill not going through. I very much like what the chairman has said, because I think I said earlier we want and would very much appreciate being taken into discussions on the regulations. If this happens, I think the thing can be sorted out, but I certainly hope we wouldn't have to start all over again with this bill.

député de proposer individuellement des amendements acceptables. Nous pouvons seulement vous signaler ce que vous avez déjà très bien identifié dans votre question, et il est étrange, n'est-ce pas, qu'un projet de loi traitant de cette question ne la règle pas dans le texte même du projet de loi? Au lieu de cela, on doit simplement attendre, accepter la mesure aveuglément, et espérer que les règlements feront ce que la loi devrait faire, d'après nous. D'après ce que vous avez dit dans votre question, vous pourriez faire cela en modifiant le projet de loi pendant cette étape de l'étude en comité.

Le projet de loi pourrait ainsi répondre à nos attentes. Il pourrait aussi être contraire à ce que nous voulons et il s'agit peut-être là d'une condamnation du projet de loi dans son libellé actuel.

Le président: Les groupes de témoins seraient-ils d'accord si nous proposions un amendement au projet de loi stipulant qu'au moment du dépôt du projet de règlement à la Chambre, avant sa mise en oeuvre, il sera soumis à l'examen du comité idoine? Cela vous rassurerait-il?

M. Wappel: C'est exactement ce qui s'est passé dans le cas du contrôle des armes à feu; les règlements nous ont été envoyés.

Le président: Cela pourrait peut-être vous aider.

M. Flanagan: Monsieur le président, c'est exactement ce que nous pensions, mais nous préférions que la suggestion vienne de vous.

Le président: Le président fait très rarement des recommandations de cette nature, mais j'ai pensé que nous pourrions peut-être procéder ainsi...

M. Wappel: Je voudrais poser encore une question au chef Flanagan et je vous remercie de votre indulgence. Ma question vous paraîtra peut-être naïve. Je sais que les policiers attendent une telle mesure depuis longtemps; je sais que tout l'argent se retrouve englouti dans le Trésor, mais pourquoi le temps presse-t-il? Pourquoi la mesure doit-elle être adoptée maintenant? Pourquoi devons-nous nous contenter d'un peu plutôt que de tout avoir? Pourquoi cette mesure ne peut-elle pas attendre la nouvelle législature dans quatre mois?

M. Flanagan: Sauf le respect que je vous dois, je pense que vous avez donné toutes les réponses dans vos questions. Premièrement, nous ne savons pas ce que fera la nouvelle législature et si la question reviendra sur le tapis. Nous savons tous qu'avant les élections, les policiers, comme tout le monde d'ailleurs, doivent battre le fer pendant qu'il est chaud, car les députés—je ne suis pas spécialiste en la matière, mais c'est un secret de Polichinelle—je ne veux pas dire qu'ils n'écoutent pas toujours d'une oreille très attentive, mais ils sont probablement encore plus attentifs avant les élections.

Comme vous l'avez dit, monsieur, nous attendons depuis longtemps. L'Association canadienne des chefs de police ne veut pas être tenue responsable du rejet de ce projet de loi. J'aime beaucoup la suggestion du président, car je le répète, nous voulons participer aux discussions sur les règlements et nous vous en serions très reconnaissants. En l'occurrence, je pense que nous pourrions régler cette question, mais j'espère de tout coeur que nous ne devrons pas reprendre ce projet de loi au point de départ.

[Text]

Mr. Fee (Red Deer): I only have three points. Mr. Kingston, I start with you because I take it you are less enamoured of this bill than any of the three groups here. You made the comment that it's half a loaf. The other two groups both refer to a five-year review. Are you going to accept half a loaf with a five-year review as being better than putting it on the shelf until it's perfect?

Mr. Kingston: Knowing what happens in Parliament and the priorities and how long it has taken this to get to here now, yes, I would accept half a loaf rather than no loaf. We're afraid that if it does get put off it will maybe take four or five years before we get it back on the table. Assets will continue to be seized and continue not to be shared.

Mr. Fee: I would like you to know that I agree with most of the concerns you raised in your brief. I certainly don't want to see another large federal bureaucracy chewing up the funds that should go to better use. I too want to know what's going into the regulations.

I appreciated the chairman's suggestion. Two of us were sitting on the other committee that had to do with regulations. We sat on the gun control bill. As a result of that, I was seconded by our whip to sit on a committee called the scrutiny of regulations. It was my way of learning how regulations are drafted. What happens is that Mr. Wappel and I end up spending a lot more time than we intend to on Thursday mornings going though a lot of regulations. I think the process the chairman suggested is far superior to that. Instead of some committee sitting in the room over in the corner of the Senate looking at them, they're out, and the public has a chance for some input and concerned groups can put their concerns on the table. I think we end up with better regulations and our committee doesn't have to fight over in the corner about what's right and wrong. Mr. Chairman, I want to compliment you on the suggestion and I hope we can do something with it.

I want to talk about the proceeds, though. The concern was expressed that the provinces were going to get the lion's share and it would go into consolidated revenue. I think we probably all have the same share if the federal government is just going to put theirs into consolidated revenue. The objective, at least for me, is that some more money is going to be made available to help reduce crime. It may not happen.

I'm assuming that the position all three of you have taken is that the municipalities, the governments closest to the people, are more likely than either the provincial or federal government to use it for crime prevention.

• 1610

Mr. Newark: I'd add to that the suggestion that I think came from the Canadian Federation of Municipalities about the regulation itself. It might be a pretty good idea to draft something on there so that if it does end up in the municipalities, that's what it's earmarked for, that it's not, as Mr. Wappel put it, used for snow-plows or if it's in the province end up in legal aid overruns.

[Translation]

M. Fee (Red Deer): Je n'ai que trois questions à poser. Je commence par vous, monsieur Kingston, car des trois groupes ici présents, je pense que vous êtes le moins entiché de ce projet de loi. Vous avez dit que c'était peu. Les deux autres groupes ont parlé d'un examen après cinq ans. Êtes-vous prêt à accepter ce peu assorti d'un examen après cinq ans plutôt que de mettre cette mesure de côté jusqu'à ce qu'on puisse la perfectionner?

M. Kingston: Je sais comment les choses se passent au Parlement, quelles sont les priorités et combien de temps il a fallu pour en arriver à ce point, alors, en effet, mieux vaut peu que pas du tout. Nous craignons que si l'adoption de la mesure est reportée, il faudra peut-être encore quatre ou cinq ans avant qu'elle soit proposée de nouveau. Les biens continueront d'être saisis et le produit de leur aliénation continuera de ne pas être partagé.

M. Fee: Je tiens à vous dire que je partage la plupart des préoccupations que vous avez soulevées dans votre mémoire. Je ne veux certainement pas qu'une autre grande bureaucratie fédérale s'accapare des fonds qui pourraient servir à un meilleur usage. Je tiens moi aussi à connaître le contenu des règlements.

Je remercie le président de sa suggestion. Deux d'entre nous ont siégé à l'autre comité qui a examiné des règlements. Il s'agissait du projet de loi sur le contrôle des armes à feu. Par la suite, notre whip m'a délégué à un comité chargé de l'examen de la réglementation. C'est ainsi que j'ai appris comment on rédige les règlements. En fin de compte, M. Wappel et moi passons beaucoup plus de temps que nous le voulons à examiner une foule de règlements le jeudi matin. Je pense que la méthode suggérée par le président est bien supérieure. Au lieu d'être examinés par un comité siégeant dans la salle située dans la partie de l'édifice qui appartient au Sénat, les règlements sont rendus publics et la population a la possibilité de donner son point de vue et des groupes intéressés peuvent exprimer leurs préoccupations. Je pense qu'on obtient ainsi de meilleurs règlements et notre comité n'a pas à aller se chamailler là-bas au sujet de ce qui est bon et de ce qui ne l'est pas. Monsieur le président, je tiens à vous féliciter de votre suggestion et j'espère que nous pourrons y donner suite.

Je tiens cependant à parler du produit de l'aliénation. On a dit craindre que les provinces ne se taillent la part du lion et que tous ces fonds aillent au Trésor. Je pense que nous aurons probablement tous la même part si le gouvernement fédéral verse simplement la sienne au Trésor. D'après moi, du moins, l'objectif est de consacrer plus d'argent à la répression de la criminalité. Cela ne se produira peut-être pas.

Vous êtes tous d'avis, je suppose, que les municipalités, c'est-à-dire les gouvernements les plus près de la population, sont mieux placées qu'un gouvernement provincial ou le gouvernement fédéral pour consacrer ces fonds à la prévention du crime.

M. Newark: J'ajouterai à cela la suggestion qui a été faite, je pense, par la Fédération canadienne des municipalités quant aux règlements eux-mêmes. Si une partie de cet argent doit être remise aux municipalités, il serait sans doute bon de prévoir une disposition pour garantir que l'argent soit réservé à ces fins et ne soit pas utilisé, comme le disait M. Wappel, pour acheter des chasse-neige ou, dans le cas des provinces, pour compenser les dépassements de budget de l'aide juridique.

[Texte]

The other thing I'd suggest be built into the regulations is some kind of openness in the process so that the individual forces that do the initial work to make the seizures are able to find out what's happened to the money.

As I read through it, one thought I had was that exempting the statute from the operation of the Privacy Act, for example, would certainly afford anybody the opportunity of finding out what actually happened, where the dollars were going. I think there should be that added public accountability context in any regulations that are drafted.

Mr. Fee: I would look to the lawyers to tell me if it is possible to exempt it.

Mr. Newark: I can even answer. The Privacy Act applies to a number of bodies by schedules, and you could make clear in legislation that there were aspects of it that were not subject to Privacy Act restrictions. It's not a constitutional document, it's simply a statute of Parliament.

Mr. Fee: Thank you.

Mr. Newark: I think you could do it. I'm exaggerating in one sense to make the point about it being exempt from the Privacy Act. I think you could structure the legislation in such a way by giving to people rights of access to information, which would functionally accomplish the same thing.

Mr. Fee: I'd like to continue my question about the Canadian Federation of Municipalities. This legislation has come through a little faster than I expected. We've had a number of bills presented to us in the last few weeks. I'd like to know if you have had discussions amongst your member municipalities about receiving the proceeds of crime.

M. Hamelin: Ces discussions, monsieur le député, ont lieu depuis de nombreuses années. Personnellement, à titre de président du Comité sur la prévention de la criminalité en milieu urbain, je peux vous dire qu'il y a au moins deux ans que la Fédération canadienne des municipalités se penche régulièrement là-dessus. Nous avons nos réunions tous les trois mois, et la question est régulièrement posée par les municipalités membres: Où en est-on rendus avec ce projet de loi?

Notre prochain congrès a lieu la semaine prochaine à Edmonton, et je suis attendu, on sait que je viens comparaître aujourd'hui devant vous et je vais sûrement me faire poser des questions. On n'aura peut-être pas des résultats concrets à rendre compte, mais les membres de la Fédération canadienne des municipalités sont impatients de voir ce projet de loi finalement adopté, avec sa réglementation certes, mais aussi mis en application.

Ce sont les élus municipaux qui sont au premier chef pris avec la criminalité dans les différents quartiers.

The Chairman: When is that conference?

Mr. Hamelin: It is next weekend in Edmonton, from Friday to Monday.

The Chairman: Thank you. We'll do what we can.

[Traduction]

Il faudrait aussi que les règlements prévoient une certaine transparence du processus pour que les forces qui effectuent le travail initial qui mène à la saisie de biens puissent savoir ce qu'on a fait de l'argent.

Je me disais en lisant la loi que si elle n'était pas assujettie aux dispositions de la Loi sur la protection des renseignements personnels, quiconque pourrait se renseigner pour savoir ce qui s'est passé, ce qu'on a fait de l'argent. Je pense, ainsi, qu'il faudrait inclure l'obligation de rendre compte publiquement dans tout règlement qu'on rédigera.

M. Fee: Il faudrait demander aux avocats s'il est possible d'exempter le projet de loi des dispositions de la Loi sur la protection des renseignements personnels.

M. Newark: Je pourrais même répondre. C'est en vertu des annexes de la Loi sur la protection des renseignements personnels que cette loi s'applique à un certain nombre d'organismes. Vous pourriez, par voie législative, exclure certaines dispositions du projet de loi des restrictions imposées par la Loi sur la protection des renseignements personnels. Ce n'est pas un texte constitutionnel, ce n'est qu'une loi du Parlement.

M. Fee: Merci.

M. Newark: Je pense que cela pourrait se faire. J'exagère pour souligner le fait qu'on pourrait exempter cette loi de la Loi sur la protection des renseignements personnels. Ou on pourrait inclure dans la loi des droits d'accès à l'information, ce qui reviendrait au même.

M. Fee: J'aimerais continuer ma question à propos de la Fédération canadienne des municipalités. Cette loi nous est présentée un peu plus rapidement que je ne l'avais prévu. On nous a présenté un certain nombre de projets de loi au cours des quelques dernières semaines. J'aimerais savoir si les municipalités membres de votre fédération ont eu l'occasion d'échanger leurs impressions sur le fait de recevoir, éventuellement, de l'argent qui serait le produit de la criminalité.

Mr. Hamelin: We have been having those discussions for a number of years, sir. Personally, as chairman of the Committee on Urban Safety and Crime Prevention, I can tell you that the Canadian Federation of Municipalities has been examining this issue on a regular basis for at least two years now. We meet every three months and member municipalities regularly ask for updates on the status of this bill.

Our next convention will take place in Edmonton next week and people are waiting to hear what I will have to say; they know that I am appearing here today and will surely have questions for me. We may not have concrete results to report, but I can assure you that the members of the Canadian Federation of Municipalities are anxious to see this bill and its regulations become law and be implemented.

Those who hold municipal office are in the front lines when it comes to dealing with crime in their neighbourhoods.

Le président: Quand cette conférence aura-t-elle lieu?

M. Hamelin: Elle aura lieu le week-end prochain à Edmonton, du vendredi au lundi.

Le président: Merci. Nous verrons ce que nous pourrons faire.

Mr. Fee: While you're there, would you like to give a gentle jab to the president of the Alberta Municipalities Association? I'm a past president of that association. He has not written me about this legislation. You can tell him that we're here without his pushing us, but I would have appreciated a letter from him.

M. Hamelin: Parfait.

Mr. Fee: There's one statement in your brief that I wanted you to explain. You said that currently there exists a reluctance to become involved in investigations due to expenses that are never recovered. I believe the Canadian Police Association also quoted someone that said something similar to that. Could you expand on that a little bit? That concerns me immensely. It's on the second page of your brief.

M. Hamelin: Non, je pense que ce sont des canulars, des rumeurs; nos services policiers font suffisamment preuve de professionalisme pour ne pas agir uniquement en fonction de ce qui serait payant ou non-payant pour eux.

Si jamais les corps policiers avaient cette idée-là, les élus municipaux, je pense, sont là pour corriger le problème, et inversement. Si jamais les élus municipaux demandaient aux corps policiers de ne s'occuper que de ce qui est payant, je pense qu'on se ferait répondre à juste titre par nos directeurs de police et par nos policiers de nous mêler de nos affaires, parce qu'il s'agit à ce moment-là d'un travail de spécialistes face au combat qu'il faut mener contre la criminalité. Je ne prête absolument aucune bonne foi à ces commentaires-là.

Mr. Fee: Thank you. I appreciate that comment and clarification.

The Chairman: Mr. Thacker.

• 1615

Mr. MacLellan (Cape Breton—The Sydneys): Mr. Kingston, in light of what the—oh, sorry, Mr. Thacker.

The Chairman: It doesn't really matter. Please proceed.

Mr. Thacker (Lethbridge): I defer to my senior colleague.

The Chairman: Please, go ahead. It was an interesting point, whatever it was.

Mr. MacLellan: Wait until you hear what it is. It'll knock you off your seat.

I just want to clarify something, Mr. Chairman. If these regulations are presented to this committee for review, and the association agrees that this should be the case, does that alleviate all of the association's concerns regarding this bill?

Mr. Kingston: We have two concerns. First of all, the bureaucracy will eat up the profits of what it is really intended to do. If we create this gigantic bureaucracy, it may well be that when the proceeds of the crime are left to split, there will be precious little to be split.

[Translation]

M. Fee: Quand vous serez à votre conférence, pourriez-vous rappeler gentiment à l'ordre le président de l'Alberta Municipalities Association (Association des municipalités de l'Alberta)? J'ai été président de cette association. Il ne m'a pas écrit à propos de ce projet de loi. Vous pouvez lui dire que nous ne l'avons pas attendu pour présenter ce projet de loi, mais j'aurais quand même apprécié qu'il m'envoie une lettre.

Mr. Hamelin: Certainly.

M. Fee: J'aimerais que vous m'expliquiez l'une des déclarations que vous faites dans votre mémoire. Vous avez dit qu'à l'heure actuelle les municipalités hésitaient à participer aux enquêtes étant donné que leurs dépenses ne leur sont jamais remboursées. Je crois que l'Association canadienne des policiers a aussi cité quelqu'un qui disait quelque chose de semblable. Pourriez-vous nous fournir quelques précisions là-dessus? Cela m'inquiète beaucoup. C'est à la troisième page de votre mémoire.

Mr. Hamelin: No, I think that is an impression, a rumour; the professionalism of our police forces is such that they would never let their actions be guided by cost considerations alone.

Should our police forces ever decide to act on that basis, those who hold municipal office are there to correct the problem, and vice versa. If municipal counsellors decided to ask police forces to get involved solely in profitable activities I think that police chiefs and police officers would tell us to mind our own business, and rightly so, because it is up to them, as specialists, to determine the activities that will allow them to wage the battle against crime. I don't think such statements have any kind of basis in fact.

M. Fee: Merci. J'apprécie ce commentaire et ces éclaircissements.

Le président: Monsieur Thacker.

M. MacLellan (Cap-Breton—The Sydneys): Monsieur Kingston, à la lumière de. . .oh, je suis désolé, monsieur Thacker.

Le président: Cela ne fait rien. Continuez.

M. Thacker (Lethbridge): Je cède la place à mon collègue plus chevronné.

Le président: Procédez, je vous prie. Je ne sais pas exactement ce que vous disiez, mais c'était intéressant.

M. MacLellan: Et quand vous saurez de quoi il s'agit exactement, vous en serez renversé.

Je désire simplement une précision, monsieur le président. Si les règlements sont soumis à l'examen de ce comité, et si l'Association est d'accord avec cette façon de faire, cela suffira-t-il pour dissiper toutes les inquiétudes de l'Association en ce qui a trait à ce projet de loi?

M. Kingston: Deux choses nous préoccupent. Premièrement, nous craignons que la bureaucratie n'absorbe les profits qu'elle est censée administrer. Si nous créons cette énorme bureaucratie, il se peut qu'au moment de répartir les biens saisis, nous nous apercevions qu'il ne reste plus grand-chose à répartir.

[Texte]

Secondly, is it going to get back to the municipalities that are in fact providing the service? Most of these operations are joint forces operations, which would be a combination of provincial—where they have provincial—RCMP and municipal. They are long and time consuming.

I was told by Chief Barry King the other day—and I think he is national chairman of the drug strategy program for the Ontario association of chiefs, and maybe even the CACP—that they are having some problems with some of their chiefs of police, who are simply saying look, we are just not going to provide you with the resource; we just can't afford to give you the five or six personnel to work on this for months on end with no cost recovery.

The simple fact of the matter is that we are hoping that unless this thing is directed back to those particular chiefs of police who in fact do now give the resources out, whether it is Metro Toronto, whether it is Ottawa, they will take that same tack that some of the other chiefs of police are already taking because of budget restrictions, saying they are not going to provide the resource because they are not being reimbursed for it.

Our main concern is, will these regulations ensure that it gets back to the municipalities and directed to law enforcement, either prevention or apprehension, whatever is necessary?

The Chairman: Mr. Kingston, if this amendment is put through in this way, it gets the bill through and at the same time allows you a chance to come forward on the draft regulations and make representation.

Mr. Kingston: Mr. Chairman, we don't disagree with that. We would welcome that.

The Chairman: Fine.

Mr. MacLellan: Mr. Chairman, I think it is important that there comes a point when the framework of the legislation just isn't satisfactory, even if the regulations are. There is a point where unless you go a certain distance in the legislation, the regulations just aren't going to be able to cover it.

Should we have something more definitive in the legislation that would be comparable to good regulations? This may be just too bare bones a legislation even with the format that we intend to follow.

Mr. Hamelin: At least one word changed from "could" to "should".

Il faut enlever «peut» et le remplacer par «doit». À ce moment-là, le projet de loi sera bonifié. Par la suite, on pourra toujours revenir devant le Comité pour discuter au niveau de la réglementation.

S'il y a une chose à changer dans le projet de loi pour le rendre très acceptable, c'est de remplacer «peut» par «doit»: le ministre doit répartir les sommes qui sont ainsi générées par la criminalité.

The Chairman: If it was going to be changed, it would be changed to "shall".

[Traduction]

Deuxièmement, les municipalités recevront-elles quelque chose au bout du compte, comme ce sont elles qui fournissent les services, concrètement? La plupart de ces opérations sont des opérations conjointes, qui font appel aux forces provinciales—là où elles existent—à la GRC et aux forces municipales. Elles durent longtemps et prennent beaucoup de temps.

Le chef de police Barry King me disait l'autre jour—je crois qu'il est le président national du programme stratégique de lutte contre la drogue de l'Association ontarienne des chefs de police et peut-être même de l'Association canadienne—qu'il rencontrait des problèmes avec certains chefs de police, qui menacent de ne plus fournir les ressources nécessaires à ce genre d'opérations, car ils ne peuvent plus se permettre, disent-ils, de détacher cinq ou six personnes pendant des mois, sans récupérer leurs coûts.

Très simplement, à moins qu'on ne trouve le moyen d'acheminer les ressources vers les chefs de police qui fournissent, en fait, la main-d'oeuvre à l'heure actuelle, que ce soit dans la région métropolitaine de Toronto ou à Ottawa, nous espérons qu'ils adopteront la même politique que d'autres chefs de police qui disent que les restrictions budgétaires ne leur permettent plus de fournir les ressources humaines nécessaires à ces opérations conjointes, comme ils ne sont pas remboursés.

Notre principale préoccupation est la suivante: ce règlement garantira-t-il que les municipalités pourront profiter des produits de biens saisis et que ces sommes seront utilisées pour l'application de la loi, que ce soit par des activités de prévention ou par des arrestations, selon les besoins?

Le président: Monsieur Kingston, si cet amendement est adopté sous sa forme actuelle, le projet de loi sera adopté et vous aurez l'occasion de comparaître pour exprimer votre point de vue quant au projet de règlement.

M. Kingston: Monsieur le président, nous ne sommes pas contre; nous serions très heureux qu'on nous donne cette occasion.

Le président: Très bien.

M. MacLellan: Monsieur le président, je pense qu'il est important de se souvenir que la loi elle-même peut être inadéquate, alors que nous sommes satisfaits des règlements. Si les dispositions même de la loi n'ont pas une portée suffisante, les règlements ne suffiront pas à rétablir les choses.

Ne devrions-nous pas, en définitive, inclure une disposition dans la loi qui serait comparable à de bons règlements? Même avec ce que nous entendons faire par la suite, le contenu de cette loi est peut-être finalement insuffisant.

M. Hamelin: Nous devrions au moins remplacer le mot «peut» par le mot «partage».

We must change the word "may" to "should". That change would improve the bill. Later, we can appear before the committee again to discuss regulations.

If you were to make just one change to the bill to make it highly acceptable, that would be it: changing "may" to "should". The minister should share the proceeds of disposition of that forfeited property.

Le président: Si nous devions changer ce mot, il faudrait le remplacer par le mot «shall».

[Text]

Mr. Hamelin: Yes. Devra, shall.

Mr. Newark: Clause 10, actually.

The Chairman: Yes.

Mr. Newark: Can I also add to Mr. MacLellan's question. Obviously there are some things that can be done in the sense of the regulations, the nuts and bolts of how things get shared.

• 1620

The challenge, I suppose, for a committee of MPs on something like this, in being able to make the amendments... I would suggest there are three other areas missing in this bill. Mr. Wappel has alluded to some of them. One is the absence in the legislation itself, not in the regulations, indicating the purpose and intent of why we seize and share proceeds of crime in the first place. We alluded to that earlier in the sense of whether we call it crime prevention, crime suppression, or any other permutation or combination of it. That is not in the bill. With respect, I think the bill is where that should be, not in regulations.

Secondly, there is the notion of it being done expeditiously. In other words, although property is required to be managed, it is also required to be disposed of. It is not meant as a long-term employment project.

Thirdly, what I would stress should be in the bill as a principle is information accountability. God forbid, five years from now, if it is not working, one of the best ways... I think everybody in this room has dealt in other criminal justice areas in the correctional services area with trying to find out what happened, if you can't penetrate through what people do in doing the job, to find out where the money has gone. That should be in the bill, it strikes me, as a principle, as opposed to the nuts and bolts of the regulations.

Those are three areas, sir, that I think need to be in the bill and not just simply left to regulations.

Mr. MacLellan: What about your concern that if there is a breakdown the money will go to the province, with the responsibility of the province to turn it over to the municipality, and not to the municipality directly? Do you feel that is adequately covered in this legislation? Do you feel that the deficiency can be straightened out in the regulations?

M. Hamelin: Si vraiment le but est d'aider les corps de police et les municipalités, pourquoi est-ce que ça devrait passer par le gouvernement provincial? Ça va faire du monde de plus à contrôler cet argent-là.

Si c'est un service de police provincial qui a fait le travail, d'accord, à ce moment-là l'argent serait remis à la province. Par exemple, dans la province de Québec, c'est la Sûreté du Québec qui a fait l'enquête, et l'argent est donc remis à la Sûreté du Québec. Mais si c'est un corps de police municipal, l'argent devrait être remis directement à la municipalité. Pourquoi mettre un intermédiaire de plus?

[Translation]

M. Hamelin: Oui. «Devra partager», «shall».

M. Newark: C'est à l'article 10.

Le président: Oui.

M. Newark: Puis-je ajouter quelque chose à la question de M. MacLellan? Certaines modalités pourront être fixées par règlement, c'est-à-dire les aspects pratiques du partage des biens.

Dans un cas comme celui-ci, je suppose que le défi à relever pour un comité de députés c'est de pouvoir faire les amendements... Ce projet de loi a, selon moi, trois autres lacunes. M. Wappel a fait allusion à certaines d'entre elles. Premièrement, la loi—pas les règlements, mais bien la loi—ne fait aucunement allusion à l'objectif ou à l'intention de ces saisies ou du partage du produit de la criminalité. Nous y avons fait allusion auparavant quand nous nous sommes demandés si, dans le cas de ce genre d'action, nous devions parler de prévention ou de répression du crime, ou d'autres choses. Ce n'est pas dans le projet de loi. Sauf votre respect, je pense que cet objectif devrait être explicité dans le projet de loi et non pas dans les règlements.

Deuxièmement, le projet de loi ne fait pas mention du fait que les choses doivent se faire promptement. En d'autres termes, bien qu'il faille administrer les biens, il faut aussi les vendre, tôt ou tard. Il ne s'agit pas de créer un projet d'emploi à long terme.

Troisièmement, je pense qu'on devrait inclure dans le projet de loi, comme principe, le libre accès à l'information qui satisferait à l'obligation de rendre compte. Si, dans cinq ans, on se rend compte que le projet de loi ne donne pas les résultats escomptés—que Dieu nous en préserve—l'une des meilleures façons... Je pense que tous ceux qui sont présents dans cette pièce ont dans d'autres cas, qui relevaient de la justice criminelle ou des services correctionnels, essayé de découvrir ce qui s'était passé, où l'argent était passé, et se sont heurtés à l'impossibilité d'obtenir de l'information sur ce que faisaient les gens dans l'exercice de leurs fonctions. Il faudrait inclure ce droit d'accès à l'information dans le projet de loi, il me semble, comme principe, plutôt que dans les dispositions plus concrètes des règlements.

Voilà les trois choses qu'il faudrait inclure dans le projet de loi, à mon avis, monsieur, et pour lesquelles il ne faudrait pas se contenter de simples règlements.

M. MacLellan: Vous vous préoccupiez aussi du fait que l'argent ne soit pas remis à la municipalité directement s'il y a partage, mais soit versé à la province qui aura la responsabilité de le remettre à la municipalité; pensez-vous que le projet de loi tienne suffisamment compte de votre préoccupation? Pensez-vous qu'on puisse rectifier la situation dans les règlements?

Mr. Hamelin: If the purpose is really to help police forces and municipalities, why should you go through provincial governments? You will have even more people controlling the same funds.

If a provincial police force did the work, then I would agree that the money should be given to the province. For instance, in the province of Quebec, if the Sûreté du Québec carried out an investigation, the money would be given to the Sûreté du Québec. But if a municipal police force did the work, the money should be given directly to the municipality. Why add an intermediary?

[Texte]

Mr. Newark: I must admit that I start with the burden that Mr. Wappel does. I don't understand why the money is not going back, subject to all the sharing. I don't understand why it is not going back to police departments to administer. With respect, when it stops, every little bureaucracy it stops at on the way takes a cut. My worry is that by the time it gets to where it started, in the sense of police officers, when it gets back into the hands of what we really want it to do, there's not going to be as much left.

Mr. MacLellan: I see what you mean, and I agree with you, but do you think that the way this bill is set out the regulations can possibly change that? The regulations are only going to flesh out what is in the legislation.

Mr. Newark: To give you my opinion in the sense of having dealt with other legislation, yes, regulations could do that.

Mr. MacLellan: They could?

Mr. Newark: Yes.

The Chairman: Mr. Thacker.

Mr. Thacker: Mr. Chairman, our witnesses have called for a five-year review. Your idea about the regulations would be a good one. But I don't see any reason why it couldn't be a three-year review. This isn't a huge bill with an enormous, complex structure to it. Within three years it would also help to put more pressure on governments at two levels. I would be inclined, Mr. Chairman, if our colleagues agreed, to put a three-year review on it, which means it will very likely have to be dealt with in the next Parliament rather than the Parliament after it.

My second point is a question to Mr. Newark with respect to the balance between management of assets and disposition. When I read it I didn't pick up on the point that you alluded to that there might be more management than disposition. The bill actually does say it shall be disposed of, etc. It seemed to me, when I first read it, that it was okay in terms of disposition. What have I missed?

• 1625

Mr. Newark: I'm not sure that you've missed anything, sir. It may be that I have a greater degree of cynicism. I was referring to clause 9 of the bill, specifically paragraph 9(b), which refers to the powers of the minister. This is the Minister of Supply and Services, as well. It is not exactly the Solicitor General of Canada. It's their function to maintain public property, and in subparagraphs 9.(b)(i), (ii) and (iii)—in particular (i) and (iii)—it speaks of the ability of the minister "by advancing money at a commercial rate of interest to":

(i) maintain the ongoing operation of the property,

(iii) make improvements to the property to preserve the property and the economic worth of the property;

[Traduction]

M. Newark: Je dois dire que j'ai, au départ, la même difficulté que M. Wappel. Je ne comprends pas pourquoi, après le partage, l'argent n'est pas remis aux services de police, qui pourraient l'administrer. Sauf le respect que je dois à tous les intéressés, si l'argent doit passer par plusieurs paliers, chaque bureaucratie prendra sa part. Ce qui m'inquiète, c'est qu'après ce long périple, les sommes qui arriveront à filtrer jusqu'aux services de police seront bien amoindries et il ne leur restera plus grand-chose pour poursuivre les objectifs dont nous avons convenu.

M. MacLellan: Je vois ce que vous voulez dire et je suis d'accord avec vous, mais, vu le texte du projet de loi, pensez-vous que les règlements puissent changer quoi que ce soit à cette situation? Les règlements viendront simplement compléter ce qui est dans la loi.

M. Newark: D'après l'expérience que j'ai d'autres lois, je pense qu'on pourrait, effectivement, arriver à modifier les choses par le biais des règlements.

M. MacLellan: Ah oui?

M. Newark: Oui.

Le président: Monsieur Thacker.

M. Thacker: Monsieur le président, nos témoins ont demandé qu'une disposition de révision quinquennale soit intégrée à la loi. L'idée que vous avez avancée, à propos des règlements est bonne. Mais je ne vois pas pourquoi cet examen de la loi n'aurait pas lieu après trois ans. Ce n'est pas un projet de loi très volumineux avec une structure énorme et complexe. La perspective de cet examen dans trois ans exercerait aussi une pression supplémentaire sur les deux paliers de gouvernement. Si nos collègues sont d'accord, monsieur le président, je serais pour l'inclusion d'une disposition portant examen après une période de trois ans, ce qui signifie que cet examen devrait sans doute avoir lieu dans le cours de la prochaine législature plutôt que dans le cours de celle qui lui succédera.

Deuxièmement, j'aimerais poser une question à M. Newark en ce qui a trait à l'équilibre entre l'administration des biens et leur aliénation. Quand j'ai lu le projet de loi, je n'ai pas pensé comme vous au danger qu'il puisse y avoir plus d'administration que d'aliénation. Le projet de loi dit bien que les biens saisis devront être vendus, etc. J'avais cru comprendre, après l'avoir lu une première fois, que le projet de loi traitait de façon adéquate de l'aliénation des biens saisis. Qu'est-ce qui m'a échappé?

M. Newark: Je ne suis pas sûr que vous ayez raté quoi que ce soit, monsieur. Peut-être suis-je plus cynique que vous, tout simplement. Je faisais allusion à l'article 9 du projet de loi, à l'alinéa b) notamment, qui traite des pouvoirs du ministre. Il s'agit du ministre des Approvisionnements et des Services, et non pas du solliciteur général du Canada. Il est responsable du maintien de la propriété publique et à l'alinéa b), on dit que le ministre peut «consentir des avances aux taux d'intérêt du marché»:

afin de maintenir l'usage auquel les biens sont destinés, ou afin de faire les améliorations requises pour la conservation des biens et de leur valeur économique;

[Text]

I understand why all of that would be necessary, in particular on the clause 6 management orders where you're seizing in advance of actual disposition. All of that potentially is necessary. My concern, though, is that we don't end up—if I can put it this way, and I will again exaggerate to make the point—having decisions made, for example, in Ottawa about when the proper market value is to sell a restaurant in Saskatoon or to change the menu in Saskatoon to attract a better level, to get a higher price.

I think the emphasis should be on the fact that these assets are there so they can be liquidated, so that the dollars that are realized from that can get back into the hands of crime prevention or crime suppression. All I'm doing is looking at the sections that are in there and saying that they would justify retention of some of that property in the way I'm talking about.

I'm looking at it in a worst case scenario, very much so, as to what's there. That's what makes me nervous about it, and I don't see anything in the legislation, for example, that expresses that as a priority. When I saw nothing in the stated purpose of the legislation in the first place in terms of crime prevention or suppression, that started to make me a little bit nervous, yes.

Mr. Thacker: Mr. Chairman, I think we can fix that up very quickly by having a clause to say that notwithstanding anything else in the act, it is the intention that the goods be disposed of as quickly as is reasonably possible.

Mr. Newark: Yes, something like that, a statement of purpose or principle.

Mr. Thacker: I don't see why we can't take a look at something like that, Mr. Chairman.

M. Hamelin: Pour ce qui est de la question de trois ans au lieu de cinq ans, en principe, on ne voit pas d'objection à ce que la loi soit révisée au bout de trois ans. On parlait de cinq ans parce que c'est un projet de loi un peu complexe, et il y aurait peut-être lieu d'acquérir un peu d'expérience avant de revoir la loi. Mais si on disait trois ans ou quatre ans, il n'y aurait aucun problème. L'important est de prévoir une date à laquelle on pourrait, tous ensemble, réviser la loi pour voir si elle a vraiment atteint les buts qu'on s'était fixés au départ.

Mr. Thacker: Mr. Chairman, my last one is really just a comment. It's obvious to me too as I read the bill, especially clause 10, that there is an ongoing political dialogue as to who the proceeds should be shared with. There's nothing in my entire experience that raises the ire of the provinces higher and with more passion than the federal government giving some recognition in law to a creature of the province, i.e. municipalities. It gets back to the fact that we're a federation rather than a unitary state. Quebec leads that charge; Alberta is right behind it, right on its heels.

The Chairman: Or beside it.

Je comprends pourquoi de telles mesures seraient nécessaires, surtout si l'on tient compte de l'ordonnance de prise en charge de l'article 6 qui vous permet de demander de prendre en charge des biens saisis avant d'en disposer. Toutes ces dispositions peuvent s'avérer nécessaires, éventuellement. Ce qui me préoccupe, toutefois, c'est d'éviter le genre de situation—permettez-moi d'exagérer, encore une fois, pour illustrer le point que je veux faire ressortir—où des décisions seront prises, par exemple, à Ottawa quant à la valeur du marché d'un restaurant qu'on veut vendre à Saskatoon, ou qu'on change à Ottawa le menu de ce restaurant à Saskatoon pour attirer une meilleure clientèle ou augmenter les marges.

Je pense qu'il faudrait mettre l'accent sur le fait que ces biens ont été saisis afin d'être liquidés, pour qu'on puisse en réaliser le produit et remettre ces sommes à ceux qui s'en serviront pour la prévention ou la répression du crime. Mais, en regardant les dispositions telles qu'elles sont rédigées, je pense qu'on pourrait les invoquer pour justifier le fait de ne pas vendre certains biens.

J'imagine bien sûr le pire des cas possibles en vertu des dispositions du projet de loi. C'est ce qui me rend nerveux; on ne parle nullement dans ces dispositions de priorité. J'ai commencé à me sentir nerveux quand je n'ai rien vu dans l'article qui définit l'objet de la loi qui traite de la prévention ou de la répression du crime.

M. Thacker: Monsieur le président, je pense que nous pouvons régler ce problème très rapidement en rédigeant un article qui précise que nonobstant toutes les autres dispositions du projet de loi, la présente loi a pour objet de faire en sorte que les biens soient vendus le plus rapidement possible, dans les limites du raisonnable.

M. Newark: Oui, quelque chose comme cela, un énoncé de principe ou d'objet.

M. Thacker: Je ne vois pas pourquoi on ne pourrait envisager quelque chose de ce genre, monsieur le président.

Mr. Hamelin: As for making it a three-year review instead of a five-year review, we see no reason, in principle, why the law should not be reviewed after three years. We spoke of a five-year period because the bill is somewhat complex and it might be useful to gain some experience before reviewing the legislation. But if you wanted to change that to a three or a four-year review, we would have no objection. The important thing is to agree on a period after which we could all sit down to review the Act together, to see whether it has really reached the objectives that were set for it at the outset.

M. Thacker: Monsieur le président, j'aimerais en dernier lieu faire une simple observation. En lisant le projet de loi, il me semble évident à moi aussi, surtout à l'article 10, que ceux qui partageront le produit de l'aliénation font l'objet d'un dialogue politique qui se poursuit. Toute mon expérience m'a appris que rien ne suscite la colère des provinces comme la reconnaissance, en loi, par le gouvernement fédéral, d'entités qui ont en fait été créées par les provinces, c'est-à-dire les municipalités. C'est dû au fait que nous sommes une fédération, plutôt qu'un État unitaire. C'est le Québec qui est à la tête du mouvement qui s'oppose à ce genre de reconnaissance et l'Alberta vient au second rang, juste après.

Le président: Ou à côté.

[Texte]

Mr. Thacker: Or beside it. It causes a reaction at the provincial level that just defies description. Of course, we all live in municipalities and deal with local police forces.

I don't think this committee would be able to make a legislative change that the executive council at the federal level would accept, because it would cause problems with them in all sorts of other areas of their dealings with the provinces.

So with great respect, I don't think we're going to be able to move on that one, truthfully.

M. Hamelin: Il y a peut-être une façon de répondre à cela. Étant moi-même du Québec, je peux concevoir que le gouvernement provincial puisse être réticent devant des subventions directes du fédéral à des municipalités. Mais ici, que je sache, il n'est pas question de subventions. Il est question de remettre à des municipalités des produits de la criminalité. Ce n'est absolument pas une subvention. C'est en quelque sorte payer le travail qui a été fait par un corps policier ou remettre à la municipalité des sommes d'argent que celle-ci a dû engager pour arrêter des criminels. On est loin d'une question de subventions. Si on faisait un fonds fédéral et qu'on le répartissait entre les provinces selon la population de chacune, etc., on pourrait avoir des problèmes; mais comme il s'agit tout simplement d'argent provenant de la criminalité et qu'on retourne à la municipalité qui a fait le travail, je pense que la situation n'est pas tout à fait la même que pour des cas de subventions.

Mr. Thacker: Mr. Chairman, I agree with Mr. Hamelin, but it's a question of precedence, and I can assure him that no province will want to get into that as a question of precedence.

I noticed that clause 10 of the bill states

Where a law enforcement agency in Canada has participated. . .

It then goes on to say the minister may. . .

which we should change to "shall"

in accordance with the regulations, share the proceeds of disposition. . .

It would be easy to put "with that law enforcement agency", but I just don't think cabinet will buy it. We can always try.

Mr. Newark: Mr. Thacker, I noticed the same phrase you're referring to when I was doing up the brief. The only agency mentioned in clause 10 are the police, a "law enforcement agency". One would think that when one is talking about sharing, one is talking about sharing with the people who are mentioned.

The other point that's fairly made is that there are other examples of federal levies, if I can put it that way, that have gone through the provinces with less than intended results. I'm thinking specifically of the victim fine surcharge. In at least two provinces that I am aware of, these have ended up in the black hole of provincial general revenue, which was not the intention of Parliament.

M. Thacker: Ou à côté. Toute mesure de ce genre cause une réaction au niveau provincial d'une telle véhémence qu'il est difficile de la décrire. Bien sûr, nous vivons tous dans des municipalités et profitons de la présence des services de police locaux.

Je ne pense pas que ce comité puisse apporter de modifications à la loi qui soient acceptées par les hautes instances au niveau fédéral, car cela nuirait de mille et une façons à leurs rapports avec les provinces dans d'autres domaines.

Donc, avec tout le respect que je vous dois, je ne pense pas que nous puissions faire quoi que ce soit à cet égard, vraiment.

Mr. Hamelin: There may be a way around that problem. As I am myself from Quebec, I can understand that the provincial government would be reluctant to accept direct grants from the federal government to municipalities. But, as far as I know, we are not talking about grants here. We are discussing giving municipalities the proceeds of crime. That is not a grant, by any definition. In a way, it amounts to paying a police force for the work it has done or reimbursing a municipality for money it had to spend to apprehend criminals. That is very remote from the idea of a grant. If we set up a federal fund and decided to distribute the monies in it to the provinces according to each one's population, etc., we might run into problems; but since the funds in question are simply the proceeds of crime that would be returned to the municipality that provided the resources to stop the crime, I think this type of payment is quite different from a grant.

M. Thacker: Monsieur le président, je suis d'accord avec M. Hamelin, mais cela créerait un précédent, et je peux lui garantir qu'aucune province ne voudra créer un précédent de cet ordre.

Je remarque que l'article 10 du projet de loi dit que:

. . .lorsqu'un organisme chargé de l'application de la loi au Canada a participé,

Et on dit précédemment que le ministre peut. . .

que nous allons remplacer par «partage»

conformément aux règlements, partager le produit de l'aliénation. . .

Ce serait facile d'ajouter «avec l'organisme chargé de l'application de la loi», mais je ne pense pas que ce soit acceptable au conseil des ministres. Nous pouvons toujours essayer.

M. Newark: Monsieur Thacker, j'ai remarqué cette même phrase quand je préparais le mémoire. Le seul organisme dont il est question à l'article 10 est la police, «l'organisme chargé de l'application de la loi». Comme l'article traite du partage du produit de l'aliénation de biens confisqués, on pourrait supposer que c'est avec l'organisme mentionné qu'on envisage de partager ces sommes.

On pourrait aussi dire, sans risque de se tromper, qu'il existe d'autres exemples de prélèvements fédéraux, pour les appeler ainsi, qui sont effectués par les provinces sans qu'on obtienne les résultats escomptés. Je pense, notamment, aux suramendes compensatoires. Dans deux provinces, au moins, ces suramendes ont disparu dans le trou noir des recettes générales des provinces, ce qui n'était pas l'intention du Parlement.

[Text]

As well, there is a recognition in legislation like this that the assets we're dealing with are much more sophisticated. Crime has become much more sophisticated and the method of diversification of property from crime has become much more sophisticated. It's become much more national.

In closing, I had not thought of the perspective that you've mentioned, but I think you're quite correct about our home province guarding its jurisdiction. It strikes me as well, however, that the electorate is increasingly challenging government to find better ways of spending money. There's a recognition that there are no new pools of money out there, and that the real skill comes in a better method of spending money. This one, by going directly to the source as opposed to stopping a couple of ways, may just be that.

It may be that the best championing of Alberta's interest, for example, is in being cost effective. Perhaps if we marketed the argument in that way we might have greater success in trying to do it, but I think it's worth a try.

The Chairman: It's been brought to my attention that paragraph 3.(d) of the act talks about > the sharing, in certain circumstances, of the proceeds of disposition therefrom or the fine, as the case may be, with jurisdictions, the law enforcement agencies of which participated in the investigations of the offences that lead to the forfeiture or imposition of the fine.

Mr. Newark: "Jurisdictions".

The Chairman: It's spelled out there, isn't it?

Mr. Wappel: What is it? Provinces? Municipalities? What's the jurisdiction?

The Chairman: They don't define jurisdiction, but. . .

Mr. Wappel: It isn't spelled out, Mr. Chairman.

Mr. Thacker: It's provincial.

Mr. Wappel: Then it's clear from the purposes that it's not going to go to the municipalities but to the provinces, if that's the interpretation we put on jurisdiction.

Why should we be putting any interpretation on it or be letting the courts put an interpretation on it? Why don't we define what we're talking about with the word "jurisdiction"?

Mr. Thacker: They're saying they'll define it in the regulations, and that's where the battle will occur. I think "jurisdictions" could include "municipalities". It's a big battle, I'm sure.

Mr. Newark: I'd just like to include police forces.

Mr. Thacker: I'll bet $100 that the Solicitor General's file has letters from every attorney general of every province stating they want the money in their provincial fund and they'll decide how to give it out. I'm sure he has those letters.

Aussi, les lois comme celle-ci reconnaissent que les biens dont il est question sont beaucoup plus sophistiqués qu'autrefois. La criminalité est devenue beaucoup plus sophistiquée et les méthodes qu'on utilise pour diversifier les propriétés qui sont le produit de la criminalité sont devenues beaucoup plus sophistiquées aussi. Ces opérations se font beaucoup plus à l'échelle nationale.

Pour conclure, j'ajouterai que je n'avais pas pensé à cette perspective que vous avez mentionnée, mais je pense que vous avez tout à fait raison quand vous dites que notre province d'origine protège jalousement sa juridiction. D'autre part, il est vrai aussi que les électeurs demandent de plus en plus aux gouvernements de trouver des façons plus efficaces de dépenser les deniers publics. On reconnaît qu'il n'y a pas de nouvelles sources d'argent dans lesquelles les gouvernements pourront puiser et que la vraie compétence se manifeste chez ceux qui sauront trouver le moyen de dépenser l'argent du contribuable à meilleur escient. Cette méthode, qui permettrait de remettre de l'argent entre les mains de ceux dont le travail consiste à tuer le mal dans l'oeuf, est sans doute l'une de ces méthodes novatrices qu'on réclame.

Peut-être que la meilleure façon pour l'Alberta de protéger ses intérêts serait de privilégier la rentabilité. Peut-être aurions-nous plus de succès si nous présentions notre argument en ces termes; je pense que ça vaut la peine d'essayer.

Le président: On me signale que l'article 3.d) de la loi décrit un des objets de la loi en ces termes:

> de prévoir le partage, dans certains cas, du produit de l'aliénation des biens visés à l'alinéa c) ou des amendes perçues. . . avec les autorités dont les organismes chargés de l'application de la loi ont participé à l'enquête qui a mené à la confiscation des biens ou à la condamnation aux amendes.

M. Newark: «Les autorités».

Le président: C'est dit en toutes lettres, n'est-ce pas?

M. Wappel: Qui sont ces autorités? Les provinces? Les municipalités? De quelles autorités s'agit-il?

Le président: Ils ne les définissent pas, mais. . .

M. Wappel: Ce n'est pas dit en toutes lettres, monsieur le président.

M. Thacker: Ce sont les autorités provinciales.

M. Wappel: On peut donc conclure de cette disposition qui traite des objets de la loi que ces sommes ne sont pas destinées aux municipalités mais aux provinces, si c'est ainsi qu'on interprète les autorités dont il est question.

Mais pourquoi devrions-nous interpréter ce mot ou permettre aux tribunaux de l'interpréter? Pourquoi ne pas définir ce que nous entendons par «autorités»?

M. Thacker: Ils entendent en préciser le sens dans les règlements, et c'est à ce moment-là que le conflit va éclater. Je pense qu'on pourrait inclure les municipalités dans ces «autorités». Cela va susciter toute une querelle, j'en suis certain.

M. Newark: J'aimerais simplement qu'on inclue les services de police.

M. Thacker: Je suis prêt à parier 100$ qu'on trouve dans les dossiers du solliciteur général des lettres du procureur général de chaque province déclarant qu'ils veulent que cet argent soit déposé dans leur fonds provincial et que la province décidera de sa répartition. Je suis sûr que le solliciteur général a reçu ces lettres.

An hon. member: Now that you've alerted them, if they haven't, they will.

The Chairman: Thank you. Are there any further questions? I think we have this thing well in hand.

I think you will have some good things to report when you go to your conference. I want to thank all of you for taking the time to make your thoughts known. We'll be proceeding with this bill tomorrow at 3:30 p.m.

I want to explain to the witnesses what's going on here. We have this bill going on today. We have Bill C-125 going on tomorrow. We have the stalking legislation, Bill C-126, upstairs, and we have Bill C-90 being heard next door. So it's a strange situation, and we're spread a little thin on justice issues right now, but we'll do the best we can to come up with the best solution in the best interest of everyone.

• 1635

I want to thank all of you for being here and for answering our questions so candidly.

I declare this meeting adjourned.

Une voix: Maintenant que vous les avez avertis, si ces lettres n'avaient pas encore été expédiées, elles le seront.

Le président: Merci. Y a-t-il d'autres questions? Je pense que nous avons fait un examen complet de la question.

Je pense que vous aurez des choses intéressantes à rapporter quand vous irez à votre conférence. Je veux vous remercier tous d'avoir pris le temps de nous faire part de vos opinions. Nous reprendrons l'étude de ce projet de loi demain à 15h30.

Je veux expliquer ce qui se passe aux témoins. Nous examinons ce projet de loi aujourd'hui et le projet de loi C-125 demain. À l'étage supérieur, les députés examinent la loi sur les prédateurs sexuels, le projet de loi C-126, et on étudie le projet de loi C-90 dans la salle d'audience voisine. La situation est donc quelque peu inhabituelle, et nous sommes un peu trop sollicités par les questions juridiques à l'heure actuelle, mais nous ferons de notre mieux pour trouver la meilleure solution possible, celle qui servira le mieux les intérêts de tous les intéressés.

Je veux vous remercier tous d'avoir bien voulu venir et d'avoir répondu à nos questions si ouvertement.

La séance est levée.

Mr. Nicholson: It's a bill, it's an act—

Mr. Wappel: It's the Seized Property Management Act, not an amendment. There may be consequential amendments, but it is an actual statute. I see nothing improper with adding paragraph 3.(e) unless there is some reason not to.

Mr. Nicholson: Would you like to make comments on that, sir?

Mr. Michael Dambrot (Senior General Counsel, National Strategy for Drug Prosecutions, Department of Justice): My only comment is that the essential scheme that accomplishes the crime prevention purpose is the scheme already in the Criminal Code. This bill really provides the management and sharing, which is just a small part of the overall scheme.

Mr. Wappel: I agree. That's why I said "to aid" in the prevention of crime. Is there some dastardly reason we shouldn't put it in? I mean, what harm could it do?

Mr. Nicholson: Is there any dastardly crime? No, Mr. Wappel, there is no dastardly crime. We don't have an amendment here before us to see what the wording would be. As I said—

Mr. Wappel: It's seven words: "to aid in the prevention of crime".

Mr. Nicholson: —a scheme for the management of assets seized is not specifically schemed for the prevention of crime. It is a management scheme to administer and ultimately dispose of the assets. It is not in and of itself a crime prevention scheme.

Mr. Wappel: I accept that it is not in and of itself; however, paragraph 3.(d) clearly provides that you are going to, in some circumstances, pay money to jurisdictions whose law enforcement agencies have participated in investigations. Now, what's the purpose of that? It's to give them money to allow them to continue to do just that. Why not put it in? I really am asking you.

Mr. Nicholson: The purpose of the bill is to have a fairer distribution of assets that have been seized by the Crown and become Crown property.

Mr. Wappel: That's true.

Mr. Nicholson: It's a fairer way of administering the proceeds of crime.

Mr. Wappel: The police seem to think it is going to be coming to them, or at least they seem to hope it is going to be coming to them. It isn't coming to them to buy brass buttons for the uniforms. It is coming to them to continue in the investigation and prosecution of further crimes. I don't understand why there is a difficulty with simply putting in that very simple phrase as paragraph 3.(e), following perfectly logically from paragraph 3.(d).

I have made the point, Mr. Chairman.

[Traduction]

M. Nicholson: C'est effectivement un projet de loi, un document législatif. . .

M. Wappel: Il s'agit bel et bien de la Loi sur l'administration des biens saisis et non pas d'un amendement. Il y aura peut-être des amendements corrélatifs, mais il s'agit d'une mesure en soi. Je ne vois rien d'incongru à ajouter l'alinéa 3.e), à moins qu'il n'y ait de bonnes raisons de ne pas le faire.

M. Nicholson: Voudriez-vous prendre la parole à ce sujet, monsieur?

M. Michael Dambrot (avocat général principal, Stratégie nationale des poursuites en matière de drogues, ministère de la Justice): Tout ce que je veux dire, c'est que le mécanisme fondamental qui permet la prévention du crime figure déjà dans le Code criminel. Pour sa part, le projet de loi ne vise que la gestion et le partage des biens saisis, ce qui n'est qu'une composante mineure du mécanisme global.

M. Wappel: Je suis d'accord. Voilà pourquoi j'ai dit «contribuer» à la prévention du crime. En quoi serait-il particulièrement abominable d'intégrer ces six mots? Quel tort cela pourrait-il causer?

M. Nicholson: Cela constituerait-il un crime abominable? Non, monsieur Wappel. Cela dit, nous n'avons pas d'amendement sous les yeux. Nous ne savons donc pas quelle serait la formulation choisie. Comme je l'ai dit. . .

M. Wappel: Cela représente sept mots: «de contribuer à la prévention du crime».

M. Nicholson: Un plan de gestion des biens saisis n'est pas précisément axé sur la prévention du crime. Il s'agit d'un mécanisme de gestion visant l'administration et, finalement, l'aliénation des biens en question. Il ne s'agit pas fondamentalement d'un mécanisme de prévention du crime.

M. Wappel: J'en conviens. Cependant, l'alinéa 3.d) précise que, dans certaines circonstances, on versera de l'argent aux autorités dont les organismes chargés de l'application de la loi ont participé aux enquêtes. Quel est l'objectif de cette disposition? Il s'agit de donner aux autorités compétentes l'argent qui leur permettra de continuer à s'acquitter de leur tâche. Pourquoi ne pas intégrer ces mots? Je vous le demande franchement.

M. Nicholson: Le projet de loi vise à assurer une distribution plus équitable des biens qui ont été saisis par la Couronne et qui deviennent propriété de la Couronne.

M. Wappel: Exact.

M. Nicholson: On cherche à établir une façon plus juste d'administrer les produits de la criminalité.

M. Wappel: Les policiers semblent penser—ou en tout cas, espérer—qu'ils recevront une part de l'argent tiré de l'aliénation de ces biens. Si on leur donne cet argent, ce n'est pas pour qu'ils achètent de beaux boutons de cuivre pour leurs uniformes, mais pour qu'ils continuent d'enquêter sur d'autres crimes et de poursuivre les criminels. Je ne comprends pas pourquoi on s'opposerait à l'insertion de cette toute petite phrase très simple qui constituerait l'alinéa 3.e). D'ailleurs, je signale que cela offre une suite parfaitement logique à l'alinéa 3.d).

J'ai présenté mes arguments, monsieur le président.

[Text]

The Chairman: I understand you have. I might say that even though paragraph 3.(e) might be in there, it doesn't necessarily mean that money has to be diverted to crime prevention. It doesn't have to mean that at all. So putting it in doesn't mean very much. However, I do tend to agree with the fact that this is for the administration. I don't think the seven words would adequately fit if we didn't alter the seven words.

• 1640

Mr. Thacker (Lethbridge): Mr. Chairman, I agree with the point you're making. If you look at (a), it's to authorize the minister to provide consultative and other services, (b) is to authorize the minister to manage property, (c) is to authorize the minister to dispose of property, and (d) is to give authority for the sharing of the benefits. So to add "to aid the prevention of"—crime prevention—I think would be seen to be out of place. It's superfluous to the purposes of this bill, which is an authorizing bill.

The Chairman: But if you were to say "to authorize the minister to provide money for social programs to aid in crime prevention"...

Mr. Thacker: I guess I would argue that would go against the scope of the bill.

The Chairman: Thank you. Do you wish to put forward a motion on that?

Mr. Wappel: No.

Clause 3 agreed to

On clause 4—Minister to be responsible for management of property

Mr. MacLellan: On a point of order before I begin, Mr. Chairman, we talked yesterday about the possibility of the regulations coming before this committee. Is there anything more on that?

The Chairman: Yes, that could be an amendment put at the end.

Mr. MacLellan: All right.

Subclause 4.(2) says:

Where property referred to in subsection (1) that is in the possession or under the control of the Minister is forfeited to Her Majesty, the Minister shall continue to be responsible for the custody and management thereof until the property is disposed of.

Mr. Chairman, I'd like to have a little more information from Supply and Services as to exactly what they're planning to set up. I have a concern that this is going to be another bureaucracy and that we're going to spend a lot of the money that is going to be received on this bureaucracy.

I realize that there are going to be some kinds of trustees in bankruptcy or liquidators, or whoever will be hired to manage some of these operations—key ski hills and so on—but I'm concerned that this is going to turn into another arm of government that's out of control. I want to have some idea of how this clause is going to be comprised, what exactly they are going to do, and how many people they are going to have to do it.

Mr. N. Bhumgara (Director General of Science and Professional Services, Department of Supply and Services): It's our intention, as I said at a previous meeting, to manage most of these assets through contracts. We don't intend to have a

Le président: Je comprends. Permettez-moi de dire que même si l'on ajoutait l'alinéa 3.e), cela ne signifierait pas forcément qu'une part de l'argent ira à la prévention du crime. Cet alinéa ne veut pas nécessairement dire cela. Par conséquent, son insertion ne porte guère à conséquence. J'ai cependant tendance à penser moi aussi que c'est une question qui concerne l'administration. Je ne pense pas que ces mots-là seraient à leur place tels quels.

M. Thacker (Lethbridge): Monsieur le président, je suis d'accord avec ce que vous nous dites. L'alinéa a) autorise le ministre à fournir des services consultatifs et autres, b) l'autorise à administrer les biens, c) à aliéner ces biens et d) à partager le produit de leur aliénation. Il me paraîtrait donc déplacé d'ajouter «pour contribuer à la prévention de» c'est-à-dire la prévention du crime. Cela ne concorde pas avec l'objectif de ce projet de loi, qui constitue une mesure habilitante.

Le président: Mais vous pourriez dire qu'il s'agit d'autoriser le ministre «à mettre des fonds à la disposition des programmes sociaux afin de contribuer à la prévention du crime»...

M. Thacker: Cela ne me paraît pas compatible avec la nature de ce projet de loi.

Le président: Merci. Voulez-vous présenter une motion à ce sujet?

M. Wappel: Non.

L'article 3 est adopté

Article 4—Responsabilité du ministre

M. MacLellan: Avant de commencer mon intervention, j'invoque le Règlement. Monsieur le président, nous avons dit hier qu'il était possible que les règlements soient présentés au comité. Y a-t-il du nouveau à ce sujet?

Le président: Oui, cela pourrait faire l'objet d'un amendement à la fin.

M. MacLellan: Très bien.

Le paragraphe 4.(2) est libellé de la façon suivante:

Le ministre demeure responsable, après leur confiscation au profit de Sa Majesté et jusqu'à leur aliénation, de la garde et de l'administration des biens visés au paragraphe (1) qui sont en sa possession ou dont il a la charge.

Monsieur le président j'aimerais qu'Approvisionnements et Services précise un peu mieux ce que le ministère envisage de mettre sur pied. Je crains que l'on édifie une bureaucratie supplémentaire qui finira par nous coûter très cher.

Je me rends bien compte qu'il faudra des syndics de faillites ou des liquidateurs, ou je ne sais qui d'autres pour s'occuper de ses activités—pour les stations de ski ou autres—, mais je crains que cela ne devienne un autre secteur d'activité gouvernementale qui échappera à notre contrôle. Je veux avoir une idée de la façon dont on appliquera cet article, de ce que nous ferons exactement et du nombre de personnes qui participeront à son application.

M. N. Bhumgara (directeur général, Sciences et services professionnels, ministère des Approvisionnements et Services): Comme je l'ai dit lors d'une réunion précédente, nous avons l'intention de faire gérer la plupart de ces biens par des large organization. In fact, our budgetary plans are to have between a half a dozen to a dozen people at the maximum—fewer than ten—with a small budget for travel and for professional services. Beyond that, we don't see any eventuality of there being any larger an organization.

Bear in mind that we're looking at seizures estimated at best at $75 million a year, so that shouldn't account for a lot of activity. We're very conscious these days of the size of government and the number of public servants.

Mr. MacLellan: Well, the thing too is that we want some of this funding to go back to the police forces. If they're involved and they're recipients of some of the proceeds of crime, of course I think there will be more funding coming—not infinitely more, but there would be more. I think it's important to try to get some idea of exactly the scale of the operation. Thank you, you've helped in that regard.

Mr. Bhumgara: That's our budgetary plan at this time.

Mr. MacLellan: You're saying up to ten. Is that correct?

Mr. Bhumgara: That's the maximum. Both Rick Lauzon and I as director general are part-time workers on this project. We run other things in the government, mainly in the area of contracting for services. We intend to follow that modus operandi. We have contracting officers right across the country, dealing with a whole variety of things.

• 1645

Mr. MacLellan: Is it your intention that things that don't need to be managed would be sold almost immediately? Is that it?

Mr. Bhumgara: Yes.

Mr. MacLellan: You don't see any reason to hold onto them, other than perhaps to manage them until a more opportune time for sale, or to get them in a more attractive financial condition—is that correct?

Mr. Bhumgara: As I understand it, after the seizure we have an obligation to manage those assets—we're talking about business assets as opposed to moveable assets now—until such time as the courts have decided on them. It's only after forfeiture that we would take immediate action to dispose of any property.

Mr. MacLellan: I realize that, but after the courts have decided, from the time the courts have made the decision and the time you dispose of them, what would be the policy? Would it be to sell them right away or to try to wait to get the maximum return?

Mr. Bhumgara: I think it will depend very much on the circumstances, again, depending on the type of property and where it would be optimized. I don't foresee an instance where we will hang onto it for an indefinite period of time. There will be a disposal plan in place for an appropriate time, and it could be anything, depending on where the business cycle is, if it's a seasonal activity, or whatever.

Mr. MacLellan: Thank you.

contractuels. Nous ne voulons pas nous doter d'une grosse organisation. En fait, notre budget prévoit qu'il y aura au maximum entre une demi-douzaine et une douzaine de personnes—plutôt moins de dix—avec des crédits limités réservés pour les frais de voyage et les services professionnels. À part cela, nous ne voyons aucune raison d'avoir une organisation plus importante.

N'oubliez pas que ces saisies se chiffrent au maximum à quelque 75 millions de dollars par an, ce qui ne nécessitera donc pas un travail énorme. Nous sommes, par les temps qui courent, très conscients des problèmes que posent la taille de l'administration et le nombre de fonctionnaires.

M. MacLellan: Il y a aussi le fait que nous voulons qu'une partie de ces fonds revienne à la police. Si celle-ci participe et reçoit une partie des produits de la criminalité, cela fera donc pour elle des fonds supplémentaires. Ce ne sera pas énorme, mais ce sera quelque chose. Je pense qu'il est important d'essayer d'avoir une idée exacte de l'ampleur de tout cela. Je vous remercie de votre aide.

M. Bhumgara: Telles sont actuellement nos intentions sur le plan budgétaire.

M. MacLellan: Vous avez parlé d'une dizaine d'employés, n'est-ce pas?

M. Bhumgara: Au maximum. Rick Lauzon et moi-même, en tant que directeur général, nous occupons de ce projet à temps partiel. Nous administrons d'autres secteurs, surtout du côté des marchés de services. Nous avons l'intention de continuer d'opérer ainsi. Nous avons des agents de négociation des contrats dans l'ensemble du pays qui s'occupent de toute une gamme de choses.

M. MacLellan: Avez-vous l'intention de vendre presque immédiatement des biens qu'il n'est pas nécessaire d'administrer? C'est bien cela?

M. Bhumgara: Oui.

M. MacLellan: Vous ne voyez pas pourquoi vous devriez les garder, si ce n'est, peut-être, pour attendre une période plus propice à leur vente ou pour redresser leur situation financière, n'est-ce pas?

M. Bhumgara: À ma connaissance, après la saisie, nous sommes tenus de gérer ces biens—je parle des biens d'entreprise, et non pas des biens meubles—jusqu'à ce que les tribunaux se soient prononcés à leur sujet. C'est seulement en cas de confiscation que nous procéderions immédiatement à l'aliénation de ces biens.

M. MacLellan: Je comprends bien, mais une fois que les tribunaux ont rendu leur arrêt, que feriez-vous en attendant l'aliénation? Chercheriez-vous à les vendre immédiatement ou attendriez-vous pour essayer de réaliser le meilleur profit possible?

M. Bhumgara: Je pense que cela dépendra beaucoup des circonstances, du type de biens et de la meilleure façon de le vendre. Je n'envisage pas de cas où nous conserverions un bien pendant une période illimitée. On prévoira un plan d'aliénation pour un moment approprié, qui pourrait varier beaucoup, selon le cycle d'activité correspondant, par exemple s'il s'agit d'une activité saisonnière.

M. MacLellan: Merci.

large organization. In fact, our budgetary plans are to have between a half a dozen to a dozen people at the maximum—fewer than ten—with a small budget for travel and for professional services. Beyond that, we don't see any eventuality of there being any larger an organization.

Bear in mind that we're looking at seizures estimated at best at $75 million a year, so that shouldn't account for a lot of activity. We're very conscious these days of the size of government and the number of public servants.

Mr. MacLellan: Well, the thing too is that we want some of this funding to go back to the police forces. If they're involved and they're recipients of some of the proceeds of crime, of course I think there will be more funding coming—not infinitely more, but there would be more. I think it's important to try to get some idea of exactly the scale of the operation. Thank you, you've helped in that regard.

Mr. Bhumgara: That's our budgetary plan at this time.

Mr. MacLellan: You're saying up to ten. Is that correct?

Mr. Bhumgara: That's the maximum. Both Rick Lauzon and I as director general are part-time workers on this project. We run other things in the government, mainly in the area of contracting for services. We intend to follow that modus operandi. We have contracting officers right across the country, dealing with a whole variety of things.

• 1645

Mr. MacLellan: Is it your intention that things that don't need to be managed would be sold almost immediately? Is that it?

Mr. Bhumgara: Yes.

Mr. MacLellan: You don't see any reason to hold onto them, other than perhaps to manage them until a more opportune time for sale, or to get them in a more attractive financial condition—is that correct?

Mr. Bhumgara: As I understand it, after the seizure we have an obligation to manage those assets—we're talking about business assets as opposed to moveable assets now—until such time as the courts have decided on them. It's only after forfeiture that we would take immediate action to dispose of any property.

Mr. MacLellan: I realize that, but after the courts have decided, from the time the courts have made the decision and the time you dispose of them, what would be the policy? Would it be to sell them right away or to try to wait to get the maximum return?

Mr. Bhumgara: I think it will depend very much on the circumstances, again, depending on the type of property and where it would be optimized. I don't foresee an instance where we will hang onto it for an indefinite period of time. There will be a disposal plan in place for an appropriate time, and it could be anything, depending on where the business cycle is, if it's a seasonal activity, or whatever.

Mr. MacLellan: Thank you.

contractuels. Nous ne voulons pas nous doter d'une grosse organisation. En fait, notre budget prévoit qu'il y aura au maximum entre une demi-douzaine et une douzaine de personnes—plutôt moins de dix—avec des crédits limités réservés pour les frais de voyage et les services professionnels. À part cela, nous ne voyons aucune raison d'avoir une organisation plus importante.

N'oubliez pas que ces saisies se chiffrent au maximum à quelque 75 millions de dollars par an, ce qui ne nécessitera donc pas un travail énorme. Nous sommes, par les temps qui courent, très conscients des problèmes que posent la taille de l'administration et le nombre de fonctionnaires.

M. MacLellan: Il y a aussi le fait que nous voulons qu'une partie de ces fonds revienne à la police. Si celle-ci participe et reçoit une partie des produits de la criminalité, cela fera donc pour elle des fonds supplémentaires. Ce ne sera pas énorme, mais ce sera quelque chose. Je pense qu'il est important d'essayer d'avoir une idée exacte de l'ampleur de tout cela. Je vous remercie de votre aide.

M. Bhumgara: Telles sont actuellement nos intentions sur le plan budgétaire.

M. MacLellan: Vous avez parlé d'une dizaine d'employés, n'est-ce pas?

M. Bhumgara: Au maximum. Rick Lauzon et moi-même, en tant que directeur général, nous occupons de ce projet à temps partiel. Nous administrons d'autres secteurs, surtout du côté des marchés de services. Nous avons l'intention de continuer d'opérer ainsi. Nous avons des agents de négociation des contrats dans l'ensemble du pays qui s'occupent de toute une gamme de choses.

M. MacLellan: Avez-vous l'intention de vendre presque immédiatement des biens qu'il n'est pas nécessaire d'administrer? C'est bien cela?

M. Bhumgara: Oui.

M. MacLellan: Vous ne voyez pas pourquoi vous devriez les garder, si ce n'est, peut-être, pour attendre une période plus propice à leur vente ou pour redresser leur situation financière, n'est-ce pas?

M. Bhumgara: À ma connaissance, après la saisie, nous sommes tenus de gérer ces biens—je parle des biens d'entreprise, et non pas des biens meubles—jusqu'à ce que les tribunaux se soient prononcés à leur sujet. M. MacLellan: Merci.

The Chairman: If you would care to read the amendment into the record, then we'll have some discussion on it.

Mr. Stupich: I move that clause 16 be amended by striking out lines 7 to 9 on page 11 and substituting the following:

> shall be credited 50 percent to the Debt Servicing and Reduction Account established by the Debt Servicing and Reduction Account Act and applied 50 percent to the funding of crime prevention programs administered in whole or in part by the Attorney General.

The Chairman: Mr. Nicholson.

Mr. Nicholson: Mr. Chairman, I'm sure Mr. MacLellan wouldn't agree to setting up another bureaucracy, after his earlier comments.

It seems to me this is a policy decision. It's already part of the Department of Justice to sponsor and support programs in the area of drug and crime prevention. It seems to me that's the appropriate part, for it to be decided within the budget as a whole.

With respect to the recommendations of the standing committee, I don't want to start making piecemeal changes to legislation when I think that deserves to be looked at in its entirety.

The way the legislation is worded it goes to the Debt Servicing and Reduction Account. I think there's a general consensus that the debt is a problem in this country. I think most people would agree that the proceeds of crime could vary. In trying to establish programs, you might have up-and-down amounts in any particular year. I think it's a better policy move to say that it's all going to the debt, at the same time recognizing the responsibility of the department, which I believe we do, in terms of initiating and helping to sustain programs in the area of drug prevention and cooperating with the provinces on that.

I don't think this is the place for it, Mr. Chairman.

The Chairman: Mr. Wappel.

Mr. Wappel: Mr. Chairman, Mr. Nicholson raises an interesting problem, I think, from a logic point of view. This committee unanimously recommended that a portion of assets seized from crime — I don't know how it was phrased in our report — be used —

The Chairman: I have it here. Would you like me to read it?

Mr. Wappel: Yes, please.

The Chairman: Recommendation 3 of the twelfth report:

> The committee recommends that a share of the moneys forfeited as proceeds of crime be allocated to crime prevention activities and that the federal government allocate one percent a year of the current federal budget for police, courts, and corrections to crime prevention over a five-year period. At the end of five years Canada should spend five percent of the current federal criminal justice budget on crime prevention.

[Traduction]

Le président: Si vous voulez bien nous en donner lecture pour le procès-verbal, nous pourrons ensuite en discuter.

M. Stupich: Je propose que l'article 16 soit modifié ainsi: suppression de la ligne 42, page 10, et des lignes 1 à 4, page 11, pour les remplacer par ce qui suit:

> conformément aux articles 10 et 11 sont, pour moitié, portés au Compte de service et de réduction de la dette ouvert en application de la Loi sur le compte de service et de réduction de la dette, et pour moitié affectés au financement de programmes de prévention du crime administrés en tout ou en partie par le Procureur général, après soustraction des sommes réservées.

Le président: Monsieur Nicholson.

M. Nicholson: Monsieur le président, après ce qu'il a dit, je suis sûr que M. MacLellan ne serait pas d'accord pour créer une bureaucratie supplémentaire.

Il me semble qu'il s'agit d'une décision de nature politique. Le ministère de la Justice parraine et appuie déjà certains programmes dans le domaine de la prévention de la toxicomanie et du crime. Il me semble que c'est ainsi qu'il faut procéder, c'est-à-dire prendre des décisions dans le cadre du budget global.

Pour ce qui a trait aux recommandations du comité permanent, j'aimerais mieux ne pas apporter de modifications éparses à la loi, car je pense qu'elle doit être réexaminée dans sa totalité.

D'après le texte actuel, ces fonds vont au Compte de service et de réduction de la dette. Tout le monde convient que la dette constitue un grave problème dans notre pays. Presque tout le monde conviendra que les produits de la criminalité peuvent varier. Des sommes pourraient connaître des hauts et des bas d'une année à l'autre et il me paraît plus sage que tout soit affecté à la dette, tout en reconnaissant la responsabilité du ministère, comme nous le faisons, pour ce qui est de lancer et de financer des programmes relatifs à la prévention de la toxicomanie et de coopérer à cet égard avec les provinces.

Je ne crois donc, monsieur le président, que ce soit le cadre pour en débattre.

Le président: Monsieur Wappel.

M. Wappel: Monsieur le président, le problème que soulève M. Nicholson me paraît intéressant du point de vue logique. Le comité a recommandé à l'unanimité qu'une partie des biens confisqués — je ne me rappelle pas des termes utilisés dans notre rapport — soit utilisée. . .

Le président: J'ai le texte ici. Voulez-vous que je le lise?

M. Wappel: Oui, je vous en prie.

Le président: Recommandation numéro 3 du Deuxième rapport:

> Le comité recommande qu'une portion des fonds confisqués en tant que produits de la criminalité soit affectée à des activités de prévention du crime et que le gouvernement fédéral alloue à des activités de prévention du crime, pendant une période de cinq ans, 1 p. 100 par année du budget actuellement consacré à la police, aux tribunaux et au système correctionnel. Au bout de cinq ans, le Canada devrait consacrer à la prévention de la criminalité 5 p. 100 du budget fédéral affecté au système de justice pénal.

[Text]

Mr. Wappel: There are two distinct things there. One percent is one thing, and the other is a share—an undefined share—of seized assets to be used for crime prevention. This, to me, presents a logical problem, because here we have a committee that has made a unanimous recommendation that a share of crime proceeds be used in crime prevention programs. We all agreed on that; we all thought it was a good idea. Now this very same committee, if we don't amend this section, is saying that the share, any share, of crime proceeds that's left over, after it has been distributed at the whim of the minister, is to be put into the Debt Servicing and Reduction Account, thereby leaving no share, no portion of any share, to be used as per the recommendation of the committee in crime prevention programs.

I would think that we are acting in a way opposite to our very own recommendations if we now pass this clause as it is shown in the draft bill. I really hadn't thought of it until the motion.

I have a problem with applying 50%. There may not be crime prevention programs; they may not need 50%. But I have no problem with the concept of providing that some portion, a share, be used in crime prevention programs as per our unanimous recommendation. Surely we can grapple with the wording of that in some way and not tie it to 50%. But I disagree. If we were to ask Canadians whether it should all go to the debt or to try to prevent some crimes, I think we'd find a general consensus that Canadians would think we should do both. Sure we want to reduce the debt; we also want to reduce crime.

• 1655

I think we'd be inconsistent with our previous report if we passed this clause as it's written.

Mr. Thacker: Mr. Chairman, my friend Mr. Waddel is right on the surface of it, but since we made those recommendations, which were all made in good faith, we've had further discussions in terms of the problems it actually causes. The whole system of government operates on estimates and their anticipation of what's going forward. The Financial Administration Act is in support of that.

It would cause chaos in terms of planning, if nothing else, to have $50 million one year, zero the third year, and $500 million the next year, depending on what happens to get seized. You just can't run programs that way, particularly when you have to be working with the municipalities and provincial governments. I'm therefore persuaded by officials that although it was a well-intentioned recommendation, it just isn't that practical when you get right down to it, with the way government actually has to operate on a day-to-day basis.

What we really wanted was to have more money allocated to crime prevention. That should be done in a regular budgetary process, as Mr. Nicholson said.

So with great respect, I think I would be against the amendment.

[Translation]

M. Wappel: Il y a là deux choses différentes. D'un côté on parle de 1 p. 100, et de l'autre, on mentionne une portion—non précisée—des fonds confisqués qu'il faut affecter à la prévention du crime. Cela me paraît poser un problème de logique car nous avons une recommandation unanime d'un comité, selon laquelle une portion des produits de la criminalité devrait être affectée à des programmes de prévention du crime. Nous étions tous d'accord là-dessus; cela nous a paru être une bonne idée. Et voilà que le même comité, si nous ne modifions pas cet article, dit que tout ce qui restera des produits de la criminalité une fois que le ministre en aura disposé à sa guise, doit être porté au Compte de services et de réduction de la dette; il n'en resterait donc rien, aucune portion à utiliser conformément à la recommandation du comité relative aux programmes de prévention du crime.

Il me semble que nous agissons à l'encontre de nos propres recommandations si nous adoptons l'article tel qu'il figure dans le projet de loi. Je n'y avais pas pensé avant cette motion.

Le fait de préciser «pour moitié» me pose un problème. Il n'y aura peut-être pas de programmes de prévention du crime ou ceux-ci n'auront peut-être pas besoin de cette «moitié». Je n'ai cependant rien contre l'idée de préciser qu'une portion, une partie, devra être affectée aux programmes de prévention du crime, conformément à notre recommandation unanime. Il y a sûrement moyen de modifier ce libellé pour ne pas être tenu de respecter cette proportion d'une moitié. Mais, je ne suis pas d'accord. Si nous demandions aux Canadiens s'il convient de consacrer ces sommes entièrement à la dette ou à la prévention du crime, je pense qu'ils nous répondraient pour la plupart que nous devrions faire les deux. Nous voulons certainement réduire tout autant la dette que la criminalité.

Je pense que l'adoption de cet article sous sa forme actuelle serait contraire à l'esprit de notre rapport.

M. Thacker: Monsieur le président, mon ami, M. Waddel, a apparemment raison, mais, depuis que nous avons présenté—en toute bonne foi—ces recommandations, nous avons eu d'autres discussions sur les problèmes que cela pourrait entraîner. Toute la machine gouvernementale fonctionne d'après les prévisions budgétaires et ce à quoi l'on peut s'attendre. La Loi sur la gestion des finances publiques appuie cette façon de faire.

Ce serait catastrophique, ne serait-ce que pour la planification, si l'on avait 50 millions une année, zéro l'année suivante et 500 millions celle d'après, selon la quantité de biens saisis. On ne peut pas administrer les programmes de cette façon, surtout s'il faut le faire en collaboration avec les municipalités et les gouvernements provinciaux. Les fonctionnaires m'ont donc convaincu que, même si cette recommandation partait de bonnes intentions, elle n'est en fait pas très réaliste, compte tenu de la façon dont fonctionne le gouvernement jour après jour.

Ce que nous voulions en fait, c'était que l'on affecte plus d'argent à la prévention du crime. Cela devrait se faire suivant la procédure budgétaire normale, comme l'a dit M. Nicholson.

Donc, en toute déférence, je crois que je serais contre cet amendement.

[Text]

The Chairman: When we tabled the twelfth report, we did ask for a comprehensive reply, which we expect will be forthcoming. Hopefully, recommendation number three will be addressed at that time.

Mr. Stupich: I think there is general widespread public agreement that we should be doing more about prevention of crime, rather than simply dealing with the results of crime.

Even if it is to some extent cosmetic, if people know that a portion of the proceeds from the seizure of property under this legislation would go to crime prevention, they'd feel a lot happier about what the government is doing.

It's so easy when things get tough for the government to cut back on programs that are financed from general revenue. If it's left simply to general revenue, one year there might be nothing available at all for crime prevention. I suppose the same thing could be said here.

The Chairman: That's what Mr. Thacker just said.

Mr. Stupich: If nothing is seized, well then. . .but at least if the legislation does say that if property is seized, there will be a contribution from the proceeds from that property to crime prevention, there will be much more certainty to the idea that something will be spent on crime prevention than if it's simply left to the whim—I think that's the word someone used—of the finance minister, at any particular time.

I would urge the committee to adopt some formula. It needn't be 50%. It could be a percentage with a cap on it that can be changed from time to time or even a cap left to regulation, or whatever, but let's allocate something from these proceeds for crime prevention.

Mr. MacLellan: Mr. Chairman, I want to ask the parliamentary secretary and perhaps officials from the Department of Justice what they plan to do about the recommendation we made. Do they plan to implement it in another way, if not here?

I think it's a good recommendation that the committee made. You could say you don't have to respond to the committee's report now, but I think we're at a juncture where we require some kind of reply from the Department of Justice.

Mr. Nicholson: Thank you, Mr. Chairman. I don't want to leave the impression that may have been left on the record concerning the government's commitment to crime prevention and a reduction in drug crimes in this country. We announced for 1992 a five-year program to spend $270 million in the area of crime and drug reduction or prevention programs. That's part of the program.

The department has the report of the standing committee, and the department will come up with a comprehensive review of it. They're looking at it very carefully, and the second part of the recommendation read by Dr. Horner said that while a certain percentage of the budget, the overall police budget, should be used, the department is obviously having a look at that. But it's having a look at it in view of the programs and the expenditures we have already committed to.

[Traduction]

Le président: Lorsque nous avons déposé notre douzième rapport, nous avons demandé une réponse exhaustive, que nous comptons recevoir bientôt. On peut espérer que la recommandation numéro trois y sera commentée.

M. Stupich: Je pense que, dans l'ensemble de la population, on convient qu'il faudrait faire plus en matière de prévention du crime, sans se contenter simplement de s'occuper des effets de la criminalité.

Même si cela n'est, dans une certaine mesure, que cosmétique, si les gens savent qu'une partie des biens saisis dans le cadre de cette loi seront affectés à la prévention du crime, ils seront satisfaits de ce que fait le gouvernement.

Lorsque le gouvernement se trouve dans une impasse, il est bien facile pour lui de rogner sur les programmes financés à même les recettes générales. Si tous les fonds proviennent de celles-ci, on risque, une année ou l'autre, de ne rien avoir pour la prévention du crime. Je pense que l'on pourrait dire la même chose dans ce cas-ci.

Le président: C'est ce que M. Thacker vient de dire.

M. Stupich: Si rien n'est saisi, alors. . . mais si la loi dit au moins que, si des biens sont saisis, une partie des produits de la criminalité sera affectée à la prévention, on sera beaucoup plus sûr qu'une certaine somme sera consacrée à la prévention du crime que si on laisse simplement cela à la discrétion du ministre des Finances.

Je pense que le comité devrait adopter une formule; il n'est pas nécessaire que ce soit la moitié. On pourrait prévoir un pourcentage avec un plafond que l'on pourrait modifier de temps à autre ou qui pourrait même être établi par règlement, par exemple. Mais il faut qu'une partie de ces produits de la criminalité soient affectés à la prévention.

M. MacLellan: Monsieur le président, je demanderais au secrétaire parlementaire et peut-être aux représentants du ministère de la Justice ce qu'ils ont l'intention de faire au sujet de notre recommandation. Envisagent-ils de l'appliquer sous cette forme-ci ou sous une autre?

Je pense que cette recommandation du comité est bonne. Vous pouvez nous dire que vous n'avez pas à faire part de votre réaction au rapport du comité maintenant, mais je pense que, dans les circonstances actuelles, nous avons besoin de recevoir une réponse du ministère de la Justice.

M. Nicholson: Merci, monsieur le président. Je voudrais corriger l'impression qui a pu être créée au sujet des intentions du gouvernement en matière de prévention du crime et de réduction de la criminalité reliée à la toxicomanie dans notre pays. Nous avons annoncé pour 1992 un programme quinquennal comportant des crédits de 270 millions de dollars consacrés au programme de réduction et de prévention du crime et de la toxicomanie. Cela fait partie de ce programme.

Le ministère a reçu le rapport du comité permanent et il va l'examiner à fond. Il l'étudiera soigneusement, et la deuxième partie de la recommandation qu'a lue M. Horner précise qu'il faudrait prévoir un certain pourcentage du budget pour la justice pénale, ce que le ministère étudiera évidemment. Mais il le fera en tenant compte des programmes et des dépenses à propos desquels nous avons déjà pris des engagements.

So I want to assure the committee that it's not something that's indefinite. The government's commitment is there, for $270 million, and I agree with Mr. Thacker. I'll state the point again: it's not a way to do it, in my opinion, to make it a percentage, a cap, or a portion of an indefinite amount. Most of the people involved with this area appreciate being able to plan long-term strategies, rather than have it dependent, in whole or in part, on whatever has been seized or becomes an asset of the Crown.

Mr. MacLellan: Mr. Chairman, I don't think that's what Mr. Thacker is saying. I don't think he's saying we don't need something to apply to crime prevention. I think he's just saying this is perhaps not the best place for it, as I understand it. This may not be the right way.

My concern, Mr. Chairman, is that Parliament prorogues and there is no obligation for the Minister of Justice to then reply to our report. They can look at it all they want over the summer and into the fall, but if there's an election in the meantime, that's it.

At least on this area, I would hope there would be something, because I agree with Mr. Wappel and Mr. Stupich: it's a very important recommendation the committee made. If we're not going to accept this recommendation that Mr. Waddell is putting forward, then what's the alternative? Unless we see something else, this is certainly the best avenue.

Mr. Nicholson: Mr. Chairman, if what happened at the end of the last Parliament is any indication of what will happen, I'll give you the example of the Daubney report. It was tabled right at the end of the 33rd Parliament; it was given a very comprehensive look by the Department of Justice, and replies were made to that report.

Indeed, Mr. MacLellan, I think you sit on the sentencing committee, which is just one of the responses to that report. So that report has had a life that has extended into the 34th Parliament, and I expect the same will apply to the reports of the Standing Committee on Justice that have come out of this Parliament, if we are interrupted by an election this summer.

Mr. MacLellan: As a result, Mr. Chairman, we have a sentencing bill that ignores most of the recommendations of the Daubney report.

Mr. Nicholson: You missed the testimony last night, Mr. MacLellan. Professor Julian spoke in glowing terms of how we had picked up and incorporated recommendations of the Daubney committee into the legislation.

Mr. MacLellan: Portions. I think he said "portions". Anyway, I don't want to get into Bill C-90 and the Daubney report.

Mr. Thacker: I call the question, Mr. Chairman.

Mr. Stupich: The Minister of Justice announced today an ad hoc advisory committee, on the Canadian Strategy on Community Safety and Crime Prevention. I am just wondering where the budget for that committee is coming from.

But apart from that matter, I just wanted to talk about this five-year program. I can recall the person who was the Attorney General of B.C. some years ago, when I was a member of that government, and he said the verbal promise

Je veux donc assurer au comité que ce n'est pas quelque chose de vague. Le gouvernement s'est engagé, à raison de 270 millions de dollars, et je suis d'accord avec M. Thacker. Je le répète, on ne peut pas, selon moi, parler de pourcentages, de plafonds ou de portions à propos d'un montant incertain. La plupart des personnes actives dans ce domaine souhaitent pouvoir élaborer des stratégies à long terme plutôt que de les voir dépendre, entièrement ou partiellement, de ce qui a pu être saisi ou qui est devenu un bien de la Couronne.

M. MacLellan: Monsieur le président, ce n'est pas, me semble-t-il, ce que dit M. Thacker. Il ne dit pas qu'il ne faut pas prévoir quelque chose pour la prévention du crime. Il dit simplement que ce n'est peut-être pas le meilleur endroit pour le faire. Ce n'est peut-être pas la bonne façon.

Ce qui m'inquiète, monsieur le président, c'est qu'en cas de prorogation du Parlement, le ministre de la Justice n'est pas tenu de répondre à notre rapport. Son ministère peut l'étudier autant qu'il le voudra cet été ou cet automne, mais si une élection intervient entre-temps, c'est fini.

J'espère donc qu'au moins dans ce domaine, une décision sera prise, car je conviens avec MM. Wappel et Stupich que le comité a présenté là une recommandation très importante. Si nous n'acceptons pas celle que propose M. Waddell, que pouvons-nous faire d'autre? À moins de trouver une autre solution, celle-ci est certainement la meilleure.

M. Nicholson: Monsieur le président, si ce qui s'est passé à la fin de la dernière législature constitue une référence valable, je peux vous donner l'exemple du rapport Daubney. Il a été déposé à la fin de la 33e législature et, après l'avoir étudiée de façon très approfondie, le ministère de la Justice y a répondu.

En fait, monsieur MacLellan, je crois que vous faites partie du comité qui s'occupe de la détermination de la peine, qui constitue l'une des suites données à ce rapport. L'existence de celui-ci a donc eu des prolongements dans la 34e législature, et je pense qu'il en ira de même des rapports que le comité permanent de la Justice a publié au cours de la présente législature, si une élection y met fin cet été.

M. MacLellan: Le résultat, monsieur le président, est que nous avons un projet de loi sur la détermination de la peine qui ne tient pas compte de la plupart des recommandations du rapport Daubney.

M. Nicholson: Vous n'avez pas assisté au témoignage présenté hier soir, M. MacLellan. Le professeur Julian a parlé en termes très élogieux de la façon dont nous avions intégré à ce projet de loi des recommandations du comité Daubney.

M. MacLellan: Des «portions», du rapport, je crois qu'il a employé ce terme. De toute façon, je ne souhaite pas maintenant parler du projet de loi C-90 ou du rapport Daubney.

M. Thacker: Je demande le vote, monsieur le président.

M. Stupich: Le ministre de la Justice a annoncé aujourd'hui la création d'un comité consultatif spécial concernant la Stratégie nationale sur la sécurité communautaire et la prévention du crime. Je me demande d'où viendra le budget de ce comité.

En dehors de cela, je voulais simplement parler de ce programme quinquennal. Je me rappelle que le procureur général de la Colombie-Britannique, il y a quelques années, lorsque je faisais partie de ce gouvernement, avait dit qu'une wasn't worth the paper it was written on and a five-year promise isn't legislation. There's nothing on that paper saying that the government's really going to do it, other than a verbal promise, whereas having it in this legislation and saying that in the event something is seized that year some portion of these proceeds will be spent on crime prevention I think is a good policy.

As much as we would like to see a five-year program in effect, we could easily have two different Prime Ministers in the next six months. And with Prime Ministers changing, Ministers of Finance are also apt to change. To say that for five years we've got a plan that we're going to follow, Mr. Chairman, is dreaming in technicolour. But if you put it in the legislation, at least it's there as something for this government to go by—or whatever the government, whoever the Prime Minister, and whoever the Minister of Finance.

Mr. Wappel: Mr. Chairman, Mr. Thacker may have been convinced by officials, but I'm certainly not convinced. I find it had to believe that officials would be opposed to receiving money. I can understand in terms of planning. You can't plan something unless you have money, but once you have the money you can make the plans.

Just take a number. If $10 million is seized in a year, obviously you can't do anything, or plan anything, in the year in which the $10 million is seized. But if you know, under this clause, you've got $10 million sitting in the bank, then next year you can plan $10 million worth of crime prevention programs, if that is your wish. No one is asking the officials to plan in advance for moneys that may or may not come in. What we're saying is that moneys that are actually in our hot little hands, we're actually holding them, either go into the debt servicing account or we use them for future plans.

The Chairman: But what Mr. Thacker is saying, Mr. Wappel, with respect, is if you legislate 50%, in one year you have $10 million —

Mr. Wappel: I'm not suggesting, for a moment, an amount. I would say something to this effect—

The Chairman: Is this an amendment to the amendment?

Mr. Wappel: I'm just throwing it out for consideration. That's all. We'll see where it goes.

But instead of a period after the word "act", you put a comma, and then you say something like this, "or may be applied", not "shall", at the discretion of the Attorney General, in whole or in part, to the funding of crime prevention programs, administered in whole or in part by the Attorney General.

That leaves it completely wide open for the Attorney General. We're talking about moneys in the hand, not moneys in the bush, and yet it does at least give some moral support to what Mr. Stupich was talking about, of putting something in the statute, that there's a recognition that not necessarily will it go to debt service but that it may go to crime prevention programs—not in any particular amount, not in any particular year—completely at the discretion of the Attorney promesse verbale reste paroles en l'air et qu'une promesse portant sur cinq ans ne vaut pas une bonne loi. Rien ne nous dit que le gouvernement fera vraiment quelque chose, à part cette promesse verbale; en revanche, si la loi stipulait qu'une partie du produit de la vente des biens saisis cette année sera consacrée à la prévention du crime, cela me paraîtrait une bonne politique.

Nous aimerions que l'on mette en oeuvre un programme quinquennal, mais il se peut fort bien que l'on ait deux premiers ministres différents dans les six prochains mois. Et, quand il y a changement de premier ministre, le portefeuille des Finances risque de changer de mains. Dire que nous avons un programme qui sera appliqué au cours des cinq années à venir, monsieur le président, c'est rêver en couleur. Par contre, si l'on inclut cela dans la loi, cela devient quelque chose que le gouvernement doit respecter, quel qu'il soit, quel que soit le premier ministre ou le ministre des Finances.

M. Wappel: Monsieur le président, M. Thacker s'est peut-être laissé convaincre par les fonctionnaires, mais certainement pas moi. J'ai du mal à croire que des fonctionnaires s'opposeraient à recevoir des fonds. Je comprends les préoccupations en matière de planification, car on ne peut rien planifier si l'on a pas d'argent, mais une fois que l'on a reçu ces fonds on peut faire des plans.

Prenons un chiffre. Si l'on saisit pour 10 millions de dollars de biens en une année, on ne peut bien sûr rien planifier au cours de l'année où ces biens ont été saisis. Mais si, en application de cet article, on sait que l'on dispose de 10 millions en banque, on peut élaborer en conséquence des programmes de prévention du crime pour l'année suivante, si c'est ce que l'on souhaite. Personne ne demande aux fonctionnaires de planifier en fonction de sommes qu'ils ne sont pas sûrs de recevoir. Nous disons simplement que l'argent que l'on a déjà bien au chaud au creux de la main peut être consacré au service de la dette ou à des activités futures.

Le président: En toute déférence, monsieur Wappel, M. Thacker dit que, si l'on prévoit d'affecter la moitié des fonds, l'année où l'on a 10 millions de dollars...

M. Wappel: Je ne veux pas du tout que l'on précise la somme. Je dirais plutôt quelque chose comme...

Le président: S'agit-il d'un sous-amendement?

M. Wappel: Je présente cela seulement à titre indicatif. C'est tout, nous verrons bien ce qu'il en est.

On pourrait modifier l'article en y ajoutant que les sommes peuvent être affectées, à la discrétion du procureur général, totalement ou en partie, au financement de programmes de prévention du crime, administrés entièrement ou partiellement par le procureur général.

Le procureur général a donc toute la latitude requise. Il s'agit de sommes réelles, et non pas imaginaires, et cela apporte au moins un appui moral à ce dont parlait M. Stupich, c'est-à-dire le fait d'indiquer dans la loi que ces sommes ne seront pas nécessairement portées au compte du service de la dette mais qu'elles pourront être affectées à des programmes de prévention du crime—sans que l'on précise ni le montant, ni l'année où cela doit se faire. Cela resterait à la discrétion du

General, in whatever amount the Attorney General may feel is appropriate in any particular year. Surely that's reasonable.

The Chairman: Before we go any further I want to state that as well as governments having plans for funds, crime prevention programs must have continuation of funding. I think the point Mr. Thacker made, if I'm correct and correct me if I'm wrong, is that if one year you legislate some portion to go, and the next year there are no seizures and nothing to be disposed of, there is no way for crime prevention programs being able to plan their continuation. They're not a start-and-stop operation.

Mr. Thacker: But I think the stronger argument, and it is just based on my experience—maybe an official from Finance could assure us of it—is that under the Financial Administration Act there are real limitations. That's why Parliament has had to get into these special revolving funds that have a separate authority in their own right. Otherwise, under the Financial Administration Act all the money goes into the Consolidated Revenue Fund, and as of March 31 that's the end.

Then you're starting another year only with funds that have been appropriated by Parliament for that year and have gone through the estimates process. Whereas putting in this line is really trying to impose a whole different regime on Parliament, which I believe to be improper under the Financial Administration Act.

Mr. Wappel: I don't understand about the Financial Administration Act and things like that. Let me just give a simple example. You have a million dollars in the kitty, and the minister says okay, I'd like a program for five years, where somebody goes to various schools in Vancouver. We're going to fund it for five years, $200,000 a year. We've got the million dollars in the bank, we've got the $200,000 a year, we've got a five-year program.

Is it illegal under the Financial Administration Act to do something like that? We've got the money, we've got the program, we've got the time, we've got the amount of funding per year. What's the problem with that?

Mr. Peter DeVries (Director of Fiscal Policy, Department of Finance): That wouldn't be illegal if the funds were earmarked as such for a particular program.

Mr. Wappel: That's my precise point, and the Attorney General, at his complete and absolute discretion, would be able to earmark those seized funds in the bank for that program, for those periods of time, at a specific amount per year. That would be perfectly okay under the Financial Administration Act.

Mr. DeVries: But under the Financial Administration Act it would be the Minister of Finance who would first determine whether or not those funds could be allocated out of that account.

Mr. Wappel: Except we've got another act here.

• 1710

Mr. DeVries: No, he would have to sign on to that act prior to. . .

Mr. Wappel: That's an administrative, is it not?

procureur général qui pourrait chaque année choisir le montant qui lui paraîtrait adapté. Voilà qui est certainement raisonnable.

Le président: Avant d'aller plus loin, je dirais que, tout comme les gouvernements ont des plans pour l'utilisation des fonds, les programmes de prévention du crime doivent avoir un financement continu. Je me trompe peut-être, mais à mon avis, M. Thacker veut dire que, si l'on prévoit d'affecter une certaine portion une année donnée alors que l'année suivante on risque de ne rien avoir si l'on n'effectue aucune saisie, il est impossible de planifier à long terme le fonctionnement des programmes de prévention du crime. Ces programmes ne peuvent pas fonctionner par à-coups.

M. Thacker: D'après mon expérience, il me semble que l'argument le plus solide—un représentant du ministère des Finances pourrait nous le confirmer—est que la Loi sur la gestion des finances publiques impose de sérieuses limites. Voilà pourquoi le Parlement a dû créer des fonds renouvelables qui sont gérés de façon tout à fait autonome. Sinon, d'après la loi, toutes les sommes sont versées au Trésor après le 31 mars.

On recommence alors un nouvel exercice avec seulement les fonds qui ont été votés par le Parlement pour la nouvelle année et qui ont été répartis dans le cadre des prévisions budgétaires. Par contre, si l'on ajoute cette précision, cela revient à essayer d'imposer au Parlement un régime tout à fait différent que rejette, je crois, la Loi sur la gestion des finances publiques.

M. Wappel: Je ne sais pas ce qu'il en est de la Loi sur la gestion des finances publiques, entre autres. Je vais vous donner un exemple bien simple. Vous avez un million de dollars en caisse, et le ministre dit qu'il aimerait avoir un programme permettant d'effectuer pendant cinq ans des visites dans différentes écoles de Vancouver. Il sera financé pendant cinq ans à raison de 200 000 $ par an. On a un million de dollars en banque et un programme de cinq ans prévoyant 200 000 $ par an.

La Loi sur la gestion des finances publiques interdit-elle de procéder de cette façon? On a l'argent, on a le programme, on a la période, et on a la somme nécessaire chaque année. Quel problème y a-t-il?

M. Peter DeVries (directeur, Politique fiscale, ministère des Finances): Cela ne serait pas illégal si les fonds sont réservés pour un programme donné.

M. Wappel: C'est précisément ce que je veux dire, et le procureur général serait totalement libre de réserver les fonds provenant de ces saisies pour ce programme et pour les périodes en question, en fonction du montant annuel prévu. Cela serait tout à fait acceptable en vertu de la Loi sur la gestion des finances publiques.

M. DeVries: Mais, d'après cette loi, le ministre des Finances devrait tout d'abord décider si l'on peut ou non réserver les fonds.

M. Wappel: Mais, il y a une autre loi qui intervient ici.

M. DeVries: Non, il devrait d'abord répondre aux exigences de cette loi, avant de. . .

M. Wappel: C'est une exigence administrative, n'est-ce pas?

As it was indicated, the Crown has to manage the assets until the process is ended. By the time somebody is charged, convicted, and the appeal process is over, that's generally in the area of two to three years. Even though we will be as expeditious as possible in getting the regulations, we're now talking three and a half to four years already. I just don't think it's there. I think this is unnecessary.

The Chairman: Are you saying we will not be able to identify any glitches that may be within this bill in three years?

Mr. Nicholson: Dr. Horner, you're a bright guy. The people who've always sat on this committee are very bright people. I'm quite sure if you decide four, five, or ten years from now that you want to study this or any other section of the Criminal Code, you may find glitches or ways you could improve it. Certainly that is open to this committee.

If you're asking that it be placed into the Criminal Code requiring this, I'm suggesting to you that the experience is that three to five years doesn't provide you with the scope, the body of evidence, the decisions that would probably justify the expense you and others would be undertaking to get into that. That's my guess on it.

Mr. Thacker: Mr. Chairman, I have immense respect for my good friend Mr. Nicholson, but on this one I find myself in a difficult position. It's a principle. I really like the idea of parliamentarians being able to review things—

A voice: Hear, hear.

Mr. Thacker: —against the forces of government and all of that. My support might be dependent upon what treatment this is going to get at report stage and third reading. If we're going to go through quite quickly, this amendment would be quite acceptable to me.

The Chairman: Mr. Stupich, you have to go to your caucus. I understand. We're aware of that.

Mr. Stupich: There won't be any problems.

The Chairman: No problems.

Mr. Nicholson wants to speak again now.

Mr. Nicholson: My view of clauses like this: don't change. But what would be less unacceptable than three years would certainly be five years, Mr. Thacker. I believe there might more reasonably be something or a body of evidence that could be studied. Five years would put it within our next mandate or within the time period.

The Chairman: The reasoning behind the five years was that there would be a whole Parliament gone through before it would be at all looked at. That's why they thought in the next Parliament it should be looked at. This is something fairly new, you know. So you would like five years instead of three.

Mr. Thacker, you don't agree with that?

• 1735

Mr. Thacker: No. With great respect, I have immense respect for him, but three years would be better, in fact. If the god-damned Grits are in, we have to be checking this stuff, Rob.

Some hon. members: Oh, oh.

Comme on l'a déjà dit, la Couronne doit gérer les biens jusqu'à la fin de la procédure. Il faut compter deux à trois ans pour la mise en accusation, le jugement, et les appels. Même si nous avons l'intention de préparer les règlements avec toute la célérité possible, il faut déjà compter trois ans et demi à quatre ans. Cette disposition ne paraît donc inutile.

Le président: Vous voulez dire qu'au bout de trois ans, il sera impossible de savoir si le projet de loi présente des difficultés?

M. Nicholson: Monsieur Horner, vous êtes un homme intelligent. Ce comité a toujours eu des membres très intelligents. Je suis sûr que, si vous décidez dans quatre, cinq ou dix ans, d'examiner telle ou telle partie du Code criminel, vous trouverez toujours des petits problèmes ou des passager susceptibles d'amélioration. Le comité a toujours cette option.

Mais si vous voulez imposer cela dans le Code criminel même, je vous dirai que l'expérience a montré que trois à cinq ans ne suffisent pas pour fournir les éléments, les faits nécessaires pour prendre une décision, et pour justifier les frais que vous et d'autres engageriez. C'est mon avis.

M. Thacker: Monsieur le président, j'ai le plus grand respect pour mon ami, M. Nicholson, mais dans ce cas-ci, je me trouve dans une situation délicate. C'est une question de principe. J'aime beaucoup l'idée que les parlementaires puissent revoir ces dispositions. . .

Une voix: Bravo, bravo.

M. Thacker: . . .contre les forces mêmes du gouvernement. Mon soutien dépendra de ce qu'on en fera à l'étape du rapport et à la troisième lecture. Si nous procédons assez rapidement, je trouverais l'amendement acceptable.

Le président: Monsieur Stupich, vous devez consulter votre caucus, je comprends. Nous le savons.

M. Stupich: Cela ne posera aucun problème.

Le président: Aucun problème.

Monsieur Nicholson demande à nouveau la parole.

M. Nicholson: Je préférerais ne rien changer. Mais si vraiment il le faut, monsieur Thacker, je préférerais certainement cinq ans, plutôt que trois. Cela donnerait le temps de recueillir une quantité raisonnable d'informations ou de données à examiner. Cinq ans, ce serait dans notre prochain mandat.

Le président: Cinq ans, cela voudrait dire toute une législature avant que les dispositions soient revues. Nous avions pensé que cet examen devrait être réalisé par la prochaine législature. C'est assez nouveau, vous savez. Vous préféreriez cinq ans plutôt que trois.

Monsieur Thacker. Pouvez-vous l'accepter?

M. Thacker: Non. J'ai vraiment le plus grand respect pour M. Nicholson, mais je pense que trois ans serait un meilleur délai. Si les fichus Libéraux sont élus, il faut que nous puissions les surveiller, Rob.

Des voix: Oh, oh!

L'amendement est adopté

Mr. Speaker, I think you will find consent for the following motion. I move:

That the motion for second reading of Bill C-128 be amended by having the bill referred to the Standing Committee on Justice and Solicitor General, rather than a legislative committee in the Departmental envelope.

Some hon. members: Agreed.

Motion agreed to, bill read the second time and referred to the Standing Committee on Justice and Solicitor General.

SEIZED PROPERTY MANAGEMENT ACT

MEASURE TO ENACT

Hon. Gerry Weiner (for the Minister of Justice) moved that Bill C-123, an act respecting the management of certain property seized or restrained in connection with certain offences, the disposition of certain property on the forfeiture thereof and the sharing of the proceeds of disposition therefrom in certain circumstances be read the third time and passed.

Mr. Rob Nicholson (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Justice and Attorney General of Canada and Minister of State (Agriculture)): Mr. Speaker I am pleased to rise and speak on third reading of this bill.

Right off the top, I want to say I am not prepared to apologize, nor is the Minister of Justice or anyone on this side of the House, for the justice bills or the number of them that are before the House.

The record of this Parliament will show that there has been continuous government action taken in making this country a better place and a safer place in which to live. When people say: "My heavens, you are doing something with child pornography; you have wire-tap legislation", I make no apologies for it at all. It is part of a continuing process.

To my knowledge, there has not been one month in the last four and a half years in which this Parliament has not been seized with justice legislation. Most of my colleagues on this side of the House have welcomed that and are very pleased to see it.

• (1550)

Hon. members will know that just the changes to the Young Offenders Act alone were a considerable improvement over the provisions that prevailed in the Young Offenders Act when we began this session of Parliament.

Of course we have to react and we have to react quickly. Some of the wire-tap provisions in the Criminal Code were struck down by the Supreme Court of Canada. At that point we did not simply throw up our hands and say: "Well, that is it. We will not revisit this as we do not want to upset somebody in the opposition because we have so much in the area of justice". We did not say that. We said: "All right. If there is a problem with one of the wire-tap sections, let us have a look at it", and we have changed it.

In the area of child pornography I hope members of the House will support and expedite that. We have already had a couple of attempts at it. It was very difficult, quite frankly, to get that kind of co-operation to move a bill on pornography through the House.

The bill before us now deals with the proceeds of crime. It works in conjunction with a whole host of initiatives and I mentioned the wire-tap legislation. I will explain why we are bringing them in.

The people working against making Canada a wonderful place to live, the people involved with crime in this country, are very sophisticated. There is quite a bit of money involved with these things. Therefore, should the law be constantly updated and reviewed to make sure we have the tools to effectively combat crime?

My answer and that of members on this side of the House is that yes, Canadians want us to do that. This has been confirmed in every questionnaire I have sent out in my riding. I questioned people on a whole host of issues, including crime prevention. I asked them what they thought about the distribution of the proceeds of crime, sharing it with law enforcement jurisdictions. Overwhelmingly people said that it was a good idea.

So when my colleague, the Minister of Justice, introduces a piece of legislation I can say that it certainly goes with my complete blessing and full support. That is what we have here. This bill which deals with the proceeds of crime is a good one.

When people ask me about crime prevention, I say we must get at the profits from crime. That is one way to help prevent crime. This was mentioned in the debate on the previous bill. There is big money in pornography. Let us get to the source of that.

This bill provides for effective management of assets that are seized by the Crown. As well it gives us a regime, a framework whereby we can share the proceeds of crime with the law enforcement community. People may say: "Well, you do not have the regulations". Of course the regulations are not there but we will work that out. It is important for Parliament to state its intention to distribute the proceeds of crime in a fair manner.

Forfeiture and seizure is not an easy process. We had the example of a skiing resort in Quebec that was seized by the Crown at least three years ago. There is still an appeal process going on. The ownership of that does not preside with the Crown at the present time, but we have an obligation to effectively manage it on behalf of the individual from whom it was taken. We owe that individual an obligation until the case is decided one way or another. If it is forfeited to the Crown, we need to have a regime in place for the distribution of that.

This is one part of the government's program but it is an important part. As I say, for my money every month since this Parliament was sworn in over four years ago, we have been seized with justice issues. These issues have the support of people in my riding of Niagara Falls and a lot of ridings across the country.

• (1555)

I do not apologize for the fact that this Parliament is spending time on this. Most Canadians worry about these things and they are reassured when they see their parliamentarians bringing legislation forward that will help make this country a safer one in which to live.

Mr. Ron MacDonald (Dartmouth): Mr. Speaker, I will be splitting my time with the hon. member for Moncton who also has some things to say on this piece of legislation.

I listened with interest to the introduction of the remarks by my hon. colleague who is representing the government on this legislation. Maybe he protests just a little too much. He is unusually sensitive today to observations by the opposition.

I think it was the New Democratic member who said that some people would be cynical in wondering why the government waited until five days before probably the end of its time in office before it came in with this law and order series of legislation.

When trying to support his minister, the current Minister of Justice, the hon. member indicated that he has worked quite hard. There has been a bill a minute, a bill a day, or something like coming into the House lately dealing with justice reform.

It is too bad the former Minister of Justice was not as diligent. The former Minister of Justice, every time I read an article in the newspaper or Maclean's, likes to claim about all the tough work she has done in the Department of Justice. It is just too bad she did not suffer from the same work ethic the hon. member feels the current Minister of Justice has as he brings these bills in hand over fist, faster than a speeding bullet. But I guess that is what happens when a minister's eyesight is focused on another seat to occupy in the House of Commons.

Let us just say that Bill C-123 on the proceeds of crime should have been here a heck of a long time ago. This bill simply changes the legislation that has been on the books since about 1989 dealing with the proceeds of crime.

When somebody is convicted of trafficking in illegal drugs, the assets would be seized and those assets would be disposed of. The value of those assets or the assets themselves would revert to the Crown.

Clearly this was an attempt by the Crown to get right down to the root cause of this, as my colleague has said. People who sell drugs or are engaged in child pornography do so for a profit. If we could seize the profits then that would be an additional penalty to the incarceration or fine they would get under the law. It is about time that this has happened.

It is not really the federal government. We make the laws here. With the exception of the RCMP which is a federal force, it nearly always goes to the municipal police force. The municipal police force, which is controlled and paid for by municipal taxes, hunts out these low life and arrests them. It builds a case against them, takes it to the courts and sees them properly prosecuted and if convicted, incarcerated. It is the provincial and not the federal government in most cases and the municipal governments that bear the costs of the administration of justice in these and other cases.

The legislation of 1989 was good in its intent in that it was seizing the assets or the profits of the criminal activity. However, one would beg to ask why the value of that would go over to the federal government and not the provincial one.

Just to highlight my point, in my riding of Dartmouth there are two police forces. There is the RCMP in the county. It is woefully understaffed and that has caused big problems with morale and its pursuit of the administration of justice in keeping the community safe. It does the best job it can with the resources it is given.

However, to give an idea of what the municipal police forces are facing, in times of recession these types of crimes go up. In times of recession there are more break and enters. There is more violent crime. There is more trafficking in drugs. There is an increase in all kinds of criminal activity where there is a profit to be made.

In my riding of Dartmouth the current chief of police, Chief McRae, and the former chief, Chief Cole, will tell you that in the last two years because of cutbacks in transfers to the provinces by the federal government and then cutbacks in transfers from the provincial government to the municipal government, they have had to freeze their budgets.

• (1600)

They have frozen their budgets at $11 million over the last two years but there has been no freeze on the crime rate. The crime rate continues to accelerate but because of the type of downloading of debt from the federal government there has not been a corresponding increase in the level of resources given to municipal police forces like the police force in Dartmouth.

They tell me in Dartmouth that not only is crime going up as resources are frozen but they are now absorbing costs previously absorbed by the RCMP, the federal law enforcement agency. In affect costs have been downloaded from the federal government to the provincial or municipal level.

Budgets are frozen, crime is on the increase, there is no money coming to help them from anywhere and even the RCMP, which has seen its budget frozen over the last few years is now talking about charging municipal police forces user fees for forensic work. As budgets have been frozen and other costs have continued to escalate Dartmouth has lost 13 officers over a period of two years which is a 10 per cent reduction.

I called just before this bill came up and was told the cost of undercover work, if it was contracted out, would be $60 per hour per officer. Usually in drug undercover work there are at least two officers required as well as a patrol car. The work is not usually done during daylight hours so overtime is paid in many cases.

The cost of law enforcement when it comes to trying to break some of these drug rings and crack down on the distribution and sale of illegal drugs in our communities is excessive. In Dartmouth in the last year we have statistics showing there were 108 trafficking charges in a city of 68,000 to 70,000 people. There were 73 possession charges and 181 people taken into custody.

They tell me in Dartmouth there has been a significant increase in the level of crime since 1991, primarily because of the economy and this government-made recession, however there has been no increase in the level of resources given to combat these crimes. This bill goes somewhat in the direction of rectifying this.

Instead of the federal government getting the value of the assets that are confiscated in cases of criminal activity, particularly dealing with illegal drugs, some of these proceeds will go down to the provincial and municipal governments. They will not be going down to the respective police forces but hopefully they will find their way to the forces that are expending resources to get rid of the low life that is infecting our communities far too often.

This is the type of legislation that perhaps we should have more debate on. We are at third reading so it has gone to committee but there are some questions that will probably still have to be asked. It is unfortunate that we are pushing this through as quickly as we are but in the dying days of the government, with six days left before these guys opposite are kicked out of office for a good long time, I guess they are trying their very best to at least put it on the record that after nine years they did try to address some of the serious flaws in the criminal justice system.

Mr. George S. Rideout (Moncton): Mr. Speaker, the member for Dartmouth has really captured the spirit of what is going on here. There is no question that in the dying days of a dying government this type of legislation will be put on the record with no hope that it will ever be adopted.

I think we are fooling the government because we have been working night and day in order to see some of this legislation passed and see some progress. In this particular bill on the proceeds of crime I think we are all supportive of what is going on.

I can tell the member for Dartmouth who really captured the spirit of it, I know of what he speaks. I was the mayor of Moncton a few years ago and I have a real appreciation of what it is like to run a municipal police force. I appreciate the costs associated with it and the number of men and women needed on the force to just try to stem the tide of crime. As the member from Dartmouth has so eloquently said, throw in a government-made recession and the cost escalates that much more.

We were successful in Moncton in negotiating with the provincial government on something completely different. We had to look after traffic violations, speeders and those types of people and all the fines went to the province. We were able to negotiate with the province to get some of the money from fines returned to the municipality. It could be reinvested in our police forces so they could arrest more speeders and use it for other types of crime prevention.

• (1605)

I think that is what we have to be concerned about with this legislation. There is no question that the legislation has indicated that the minister can and does have the power to distribute the proceeds of crime to other levels of government.

The concern I have as I read the definitions and look at what is going on is that this legislation just provides the minister with authority. It does not make distribution mandatory. It makes it questionable as to how this money is going to be divided and whether it will actually get down to the police force that is doing the work. I think that is the critical thing.

If it just ends up in the general revenue of the provincial or municipal government coffers and is not earmarked for crime prevention, investigation and all the things that have to be done then I do not think we are really serving the citizens properly.

I am sure each and every one of us has seen some of the alarming statistics concerning the amount of money that is now earned by the drug barons of the world and the sophistication and type of equipment that is now being used by elicit drug traders. If we are not going to match that expenditure with similar expenditures within our forces then we are going to face some very serious problems.

They are simply going to dominate the situation by sheer weight of wealth and they certainly have done that in the past. At the same time we in government and particularly at the federal government level have been passing restraint on and on down the line until it gets to the municipality that is not capable of providing or having the resources to provide the proper equipment for the police force. Yet we demand that those forces arrest and control the situation.

We on this side are supportive of this legislation. We are anxious to see it better defined so we know exactly where the dollars are going. We want to see it earmarked for use primarily against the drug traffic as well as on the front lines. The troops on the front lines need the resources to fight crime. That is why we are supportive of this legislation.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): Before I recognize the hon. member for Port Moody—Coquitlam it is my duty pursuant to Standing Order 38 to inform the House that the questions to be raised tonight at the time of adjournment are as follows: the hon. member for St. Boniface—Student aid; the hon. member for Parkdale—High Park—Crime prevention; the hon. member for Okanagan—Shuswap—Trade; the hon. member for Prince George—Bulkley Valley—Health care.

Mr. Ian Waddell (Port Moody—Coquitlam): Mr. Speaker, the justice committee report, Crime Prevention in Canada, says clearly in recommendation No. 3 that the share of the moneys forfeited as proceeds of crime be allocated to crime prevention activities.

This is the bill the government is presenting. It is about forfeiture of moneys and property the police have been able to get. It seems to me the government had a golden opportunity to take the second step toward a national program of crime prevention and that was to have a guaranteed means of funding crime prevention through this mechanism. I think it would be supported by the public. An editorial in The Ottawa Citizen said the government missed a good investment.

The government did make an amendment to the bill today which originally said that the moneys were supposed to go to the debt reduction fund. Now it has left it open and by regulation it can still go to crime prevention.

As I said to the hon. member for Calgary a few hours ago quoting Mick Jagger: "You can't always get what you want but you will find sometimes you might get what you need". What we need is money for crime prevention. What we have is a clause that allows it to happen. I give the parliamentary secretary his due here. He said today that he would do his best to see that those moneys were allocated for crime prevention and so did the Minister of Justice. That is on the record here of the House of Commons. He can rest assured that we will keep reminding him of that particular record. Let us not lose a golden opportunity. Let us get some funds to crime prevention.

• (1610)

Before I sit down I want to add two more points. The first point is that in terms of crime prevention and moneys, the government should not forget that jobs and employment are related to violence and crime. We are seeing the beginning of youth violence in this country and it is scary whether they are breaking into the legislature in B.C. on an environmental process or whether it is the Nazi youth here in Ottawa last week against another group of youth who were protesting against the Nazis. It is scary and it is beginning.

There is overwhelming evidence to show that there is a strong connection between employment and crime, particularly violent crime. An extensive 1990 study of data from the preceding 40 years prepared by the British home office of the United Kingdom dramatically identified: "the profound importance of economic factors in the determination of crime. A comparison of personal consumption per capita, with both property and personal crimes in Britain and other countries, revealed that the significance of these factors goes beyond national borders". It goes to Canada as well.

When the study examined unemployment rates it found: "Growth in offences of violence against the person was also found to be associated with growth in unemployment during the previous year—the relation was strong". These are real studies. I have them and I will show them to the House.

There is also evidence to show that Canadians understand this connection and view crime prevention as a broadly applied policy. While politicians in general continue to subscribe to the myth of neo-Conservative, tough on crime rhetoric, recent survey data suggests that Canadians do not see an increasingly punitive justice system alone as an effective defence against crime.

A survey done for the Canadian Sentencing Commission found that the most popular solution to crime was to reduce the level of unemployment. In a poll regarding the effective ways to control crime, 41 per cent of Canadians said to reduce the level of unemployment; 27 per cent said to make sentences harsher; 13 per cent said to increase the use of non-imprisonment sentencing such as restitution to community service officers; 4 per cent said to increase the number of police officers and 10 per cent said to increase the number of social programs.

The government, in its so-called law and order agenda which is mainly full of rhetoric, is basically phoney and on the wrong track. The right track is to be tough on violent crime and criminals but at the same time balance this with a crime prevention program. We must get at people, particularly young people, before they become criminals.

Did you see the news last night and the story from Cape Breton about the 20-year old kid who murdered the people in the McDonald's? We wonder how we could have reached that obviously disturbed person earlier and perhaps helped him or the family or taken that person right out of society if that was the necessary thing to do. That is the real challenge for crime prevention in the future. That is what I call getting tough on crime. That is what I call being effective on crime. We owe it to the kids.

A kindergarten teacher could tell us about children who could be in trouble in the future. We need to intervene early and have programs for crime prevention, but we have to fund those programs.

We in the NDP give our consent today to the third reading of this bill so it gets through. We urge the government to implement its promises to this House today that money taken from criminal activities, from the forfeiture of moneys from crime, go toward crime prevention because crime prevention is the way of the future.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): Is the House ready for the question?

Some hon. members: Question.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): Is the pleasure of the House to adopt the motion.

Some hon. members: Agreed.

Motion agreed to, bill read the third time and passed.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): It is my understanding that we can call it five o'clock.

SUSPENSION OF SITTING

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): If the hon. member for Abitibi were here we could carry on, or I could suspend the House.

Some hon. members: Suspend.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): I will suspend the House to the call of the Chair.

Some hon. members: Agreed.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): Maybe the Whip can get a hold of the hon. member.

The sitting of the House was suspended at 4.16 p.m.

SITTING RESUMED

The House resumed at 4.25 p.m.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): Pursuant to Standing Order 30(6) the House will now proceed to consideration of Private Members' Business as listed on today's Order Paper.

STATUS OF WOMEN

MOTION FOR PAYMENT OF A SALARY TO WOMEN WHO REMAIN AT HOME

Mr. Guy Saint-Julien (Abitibi) moved:

That, in the opinion of this House, the government should consider paying a salary to women who remain at home.

He said: Mr. Speaker, we all know that, in 1991, I received many petitions from men and women in my constituency saying that a salary should be paid to women who remain at home. I tabled the petition which was deemed out of order because it requested an amount of $12,000. Immediately following this refusal, and in compliance with the procedure of the House of Commons, I took the initiative of presenting the petition in the form of a motion which read: "That, in the opinion of this House, the government should consider paying a salary to women who remain at home". We all know that the procedure of the House of Commons consists of a draw. I was lucky last month, since my name was drawn. Among the 21 motions which I tabled in this House, and which are the result of consultations with my constituents about what can be done for my constituency, I chose this particular motion.

We all know that most Canadian women spend at least part of their life being at home full time. Almost half of these women do not belong to the work force, and less than one third of those who have preschool children hold a full time job.

When it comes to raising children, Canadian parents seem full of good intentions regarding work sharing. However, for better or worse, work at home remains a woman's job.

Genetically, nothing predisposes women to housework. In practice, however, women do most of the housework. That is why I am referring to "women who remain at home" here, meaning mothers at home.

In Canada, women who stay at home work full time and even do overtime. Studies show that they work between 41 and 60 hours a week, depending on how many children they have and how old they are. Women at home are on duty 24 hours a day, 7 days a week. Try to find a more demanding job.

SEIZED PROPERTY MANAGEMENT BILL

SECOND READING—DEBATE ADJOURNED

Hon. Jean-Claude Rivest moved the second reading of Bill C-123, respecting the management of certain property seized or restrained in connection with certain offences, the disposition of certain property on forfeiture thereof and the sharing of the proceeds of disposition therefrom in certain circumstances.

Honourable senators, I imagine all senators have understood this is a technical bill that will give the Government of Canada additional means to deal with crime, and especially with drug trafficking and the proceeds of these activities.

In 1991, Parliament passed legislation dealing with the proceeds of crime. The Canadian anti-drug strategy, launched in 1987 and renewed in March 1992 for another five-year period, admits that one of the best ways to deter drug traffickers is to make their business unprofitable. The proceeds of crime legislation is part and parcel of this strategy. Its purpose is to confiscate the profits of drug-related offences, which, as I said before, is an effective way to counter such activities. Attacking the potential profits of drug-trafficking acts as a deterrent to potential drug traffickers and is at the same time a well-deserved penalty for those who take part in this activity.

Honourable senators, these provisions, which were adopted by Parliament, have been used very little so far and need improvements. That is the purpose of the bill before us today, and there are two main reasons for this.

First of all, there has been an absence of an effective asset management regime pending the forfeiture of the seized assets. There is no administrative apparatus to supervise the management of these assets.

Second, there is a lack of co-operation by provincial and local police forces in investigating offences subject to the provisions of proceeds of crime legislation.

This particular bill would fill these two gaps in our current legislation. It would create a bureau within the Department of Supply and Services to manage seized, restrained and forfeited property.

Once the bureau has possession or control over the property seized or restrained in federally initiated prosecutions, it will have the power to manage it until the time the property is disposed of. This includes the advancing of money and any payments that may be necessary to maintain the ongoing operation of the property. It will also advise law enforcement agencies on the seizure or restraining of proceeds of crime.

Finally, the bureau to be created within the Department of Supply and Services would dispose of the confiscated property and administer the asset sharing program. The operations of this bureau would not generate any costs for the federal Treasury, since it would be part of the Department of Supply and Services and would be doing what the government does now with its not altogether adequate resources.

The second main component of this bill is the sharing of forfeited proceeds. This is, in fact, becoming an increasingly pressing issue, both in Canada and at the international level. In fact, provincial and local police forces are becoming increasingly reluctant to spend time and money on investigations connected with the proceeds of crime in support of federal prosecutions. Such investigations are generally very long and very costly.

Honourable senators, under present Canadian legislation, reciprocity is impossible and the purpose of the bill is to deal with this situation.

The proposed law would provide for a fair system to share the net proceeds from the disposal of confiscated goods with the governments responsible for the organizations that participated in the investigation which led to the confiscation. In the same way, proceeds could be shared with foreign governments whose legislation provides for a similar sharing program.

Finally, the bill makes changes to existing laws whereby provincial governments could dispose of the confiscated goods as they see fit. As we know, the provincial attorneys general take legal action for drugs seized as a result of investigations conducted by provincial or local police forces. It is a matter of applying to all provincial governments in Canada the system which already exists under administrative agreements between Quebec and the federal government and between New Brunswick and the federal government. This would be extended to all of Canada.

Honourable senators, that summarizes the main points of this bill. Thank you, and of course I urge you to adopt it.

On motion of Senator Lewis, debate adjourned.

FORTY-FIFTH REPORT ADOPTED

The Senate proceeded to consideration of the Forty-Fifth Report of the Committee on Internal Economy, Budgets and Administration (Budget—Transport and Communications Committee), presented in the Senate on June 3, 1993.

Hon. Thérèse Lavoie-Roux: Honourable senators, I move the adoption of this report concerning the committee on Transport and Communications.

SEIZED PROPERTY MANAGEMENT BILL

SECOND READING

On the Order:

> Resuming the debate on the motion of the Honourable Senator Rivest, seconded by the Honourable Senator Lavoie-Roux, for the second reading of Bill C-123, respecting the management of certain property seized or restrained in connection with certain offences, the disposition of certain property on the forfeiture thereof and the sharing of the proceeds of disposition therefrom in certain circumstances.

Hon. P. Derek Lewis: Honourable senators, I am happy to speak on second reading of Bill C-123, and to say that, in principle, we support the bill.

As the Honourable Senator Rivest said on introducing this bill, this is an effort to overcome various shortcomings in present legislation aimed at combating organized crime, particularly drug trafficking and money laundering. That legislation, which might be described as "the proceeds of crime legislation", focused on the seizure and forfeiture of property used in, or earned, as a result of criminal activity. It was aimed at reducing the profit potential of crime and thereby to reduce the motivation for organized crime to finance further elicit efforts. In this it has had some success in that, in the period from 1989 to 1992, something in the order of $60 million has been realized from forfeited property. These moneys have, in the past, reverted to the federal government where the forfeited assets have resulted from criminal cases prosecuted by the Attorney General of Canada.

The present legislation did not provide explicit provision for the management and maintenance of seized property from the time of its seizure to realization, or to its return to owners where that was the ultimate outcome of the seizure. Neither did it provide for division with other jurisdictions of the proceeds of the forfeited property. In this respect, the proposed legislation is long overdue and is welcome.

The bill's object is to lessen the disincentive to various authorities to undertake cooperative investigations. It must be remembered that, in the investigation of crime, prosecution of the offenders and the seizure of property arising therefrom, several authorities are quite often involved. You may have municipal police forces, provincial police and justice officials and courts, as well as the RCMP and the federal justice department, all involved in such proceedings. However, other than the federal government, none of these authorities receive any benefit or share from the proceeds of forfeited property, even though they may have provided the cost of such services in varied amounts.

We are here, of course, dealing with cases prosecuted by the Attorney General of Canada. This can understandably be a cause of disincentive to cooperation between the various authorities who might otherwise be involved in these efforts.

As Senator Rivest has said, the aim of the present bill is to provide authority to the government, through the relevant minister, to make provision for the sharing of the proceeds of forfeited property with the various authorities which may have been involved in the proceedings. This will apply to both domestic and foreign governments. If this is arranged in a satisfactory manner, it should lead to an equitable division of the proceeds.

• (2020)

The bill also provides for the establishment of an office in the Department of Supply and Services which will be empowered to have custody and management of any property within the scope of the legislation. Under this provision, property management services may be engaged for both maintenance and operation of property until it is either disposed of by sale or returned to the proper owner.

There is provision in the bill to cover the cost of such maintenance and operation. I understand that services from outside the department will be engaged for such management services.

Honourable senators, while we feel that we can support the bill, there are a few points we believe must be made, which I hope can be addressed more fully when the bill goes to committee.

First, as I have said, this bill provides authority for the sharing of the proceeds of forfeited property. In fact, clause 10 of the bill provides that the minister shall — and I emphasize "shall" — share the proceeds of disposition of forfeited property in accordance with regulations.

Clause 19 of the bill authorizes the making of regulations respecting the sharing of such proceeds. In other words, although the bill provides that the proceeds shall be shared, there are as yet no provisions for what amounts are to be shared, how those amounts are to be determined, or the times or manner of the sharing.

We are not told how, when, in what amounts or proportions, or with whom the proceeds are to be shared. It is all left to regulations to be made after the bill is passed. We are left in the dark. While we may agree in principle with the bill, surely we should know what the principles of such a division will be.

It is almost like signing a blank cheque, except that in this case there will be no cheque at all, even though the minister is directed to share the proceeds. We are asked to agree to blank regulations.

As well, when this bill was introduced in the other place by the Solicitor General, it was suggested that the sharing of the proceeds would be on the basis of the proportion of input provided by the authority involved in the investigation and successful prosecution. It was further suggested that such share would go to the taxing authority in charge of the body doing the actual work on the investigation.

In other words, if a provincial police force were cooperating in the investigation, its share of the proceeds would go to the provincial government rather than directly to the provincial police force, and might then become part of the provincial general revenues and be used as such. In such a case, the share of the proceeds would not go to augment the provincial police budget, where the money could have been used to further police work in areas such as crime prevention. This might well reduce the incentive for police forces to involve themselves deeply in investigations that would not likely result in monetary benefit to them.

On the other hand, if a police force were to receive directly the share of such proceeds, it is possible that the taxing authority in charge of such a force would be tempted to reduce the police budget by the amount received from the share of the proceeds. This would appear to defeat the incentive to the police force to press such investigations. Then again, we might find that, if a police force did directly receive a share of the proceeds in proportion to the effort put into an investigation, there might be a tendency for it to keep such investigation in its own hands as long as possible in order to enhance its own portion of the proceeds. It seems to me that vying for the work would be a disincentive to cooperation among the various law enforcement agencies.

These are points which, I believe, need discussion and clarification.

Finally, honourable senators, there are questions with respect to the new office to be established to administer the provisions of this bill. Is it to evolve into another bureaucratic nightmare that will frustrate various governments' attempts to gain access to the proceeds of seized property or to obtain information as to their management?

How will the operation of the office be financed? Will the costs of operation be taken out of the proceeds realized from the forfeited property? In this respect, I note from what Senator Rivest said — if I understood him correctly — that there would be no cost to government from the office's operations. That is something we should look into, honourable senators.

What will be the actual function of the office? How much involvement will it have with the private sector in its operations? These are all problems upon which we should have clarification.

Honourable senators, while supporting the bill in principle, I feel there are many questions, particularly with respect to the matter of the sharing of proceeds, that require some clarification in committee.

Honourable senators, I hope the bill will go to committee for study shortly.

Hon. Senators: Hear, hear!

Motion agreed to and bill read second time.

REFERRED TO COMMITTEE

The Hon. the Speaker pro tempore: Honourable senators, when shall this bill be read the third time?

On motion of Senator Lynch-Staunton, for Senator Rivest, bill referred to the Standing Senate Committee on Legal and Constitutional Affairs.

INVESTMENT CANADA ACT

BILL TO AMEND—SECOND READING

Leave having been given to revert to Order No. 7:

On the Order:

> Resuming the debate on the motion of the Honourable Senator Ghitter, seconded by the Honourable Senator Stratton, for the second reading of Bill C-89, to amend the Investment Canada Act.

Hon. Michael Kirby: Honourable senators, I rise to make a few comments on the second reading of Bill C-89 prior to its being sent to the Standing Senate Committee on Banking, Trade and Commerce for consideration.

I wish to begin by pointing out some of the history of Bill C-89. Bill C-89 amends the Investment Canada Act, which many of you will recall was the act that replaced the Foreign Investment Review Act in 1985.

The history of foreign investment legislation in Canada goes back to the Gray Report of 1972, which was a report to the government of the day on foreign direct investment in Canada. The outgrowth of that report lead to the establishment of the Foreign Investment Review Act (FIRA) of April 1974. That act was the first piece of legislation in this country to deal with foreign investment and how government could maximize the benefit of foreign investment in the country.

The Standing Senate Committee on Legal and Constitutional Affairs, to which was referred Bill C-123, respecting the management of certain property seized or restrained in connection with certain offences, the disposition of certain property on the forfeiture thereof and the sharing of the proceeds of disposition therefrom in certain circumstances, met this day at 3 p.m. to give consideration to the bill.

Senator Gérald-A. Beaudoin (Chairman) in the Chair.

The Chairman: Honourable senators, I call the meeting to order.

We meet today to give consideration to Bill C-123, the seized property management bill. We have several witnesses with us today. They are Mr. Michael Dambrot, Mr. Daniel Murphy, Mr. Gérard Normand, Mr. Noël Bhumgara, Chief Superintendent Ryan and Inspector B.W. Bowie.

I understand that one of you will be doing most of the talking.

Mr. Michael Dambrot, Senior General Counsel and Director, National Strategy for Drug Prosecution, Department of Justice: I shall, Mr. Chairman. Chief Superintendent Ryan also has some remarks to make.

The Chairman: Go ahead, sir.

Mr. Dambrot: The purpose of this bill is to provide some new and greatly needed features to our existing proceeds-of-crimes scheme. Canada's original proceeds-of-crime legislation was enacted in 1989 as part of the Criminal Code, the Narcotic Control Act and the Food and Drugs Act. Some additional provisions were enacted in 1991 in the Proceeds of Crime Money Laundering Act.

Despite considerable federal enforcement activity, the utilization of the scheme has not been maximized. The absence of a coherent and effective asset management regime and the low level of involvement in investigating proceeds of crime offences by local police forces, have been of significant concern.

The RCMP are of the view that there are tens of millions of dollars of uninvestigated proceeds of crime in Canada. That is not to say we are not having some successes with the current regime.

In Montreal, for example, a federal prosecutor recently obtained a conviction in a case which should result in a forfeiture of two properties with a value in excess of $1.5 mil-

OTTAWA, le mercredi 16 juin 1993

Le Comité sénatorial permanent des affaires juridiques et constitutionnelles, à qui a été renvoyé le projet de loi C-123, Loi concernant l'administration de bien saisis ou bloqués relativement à certaines infractions, l'aliénation de biens après confiscation et, dans certains cas, le partage du produit de leur aliénation, se réunit aujourd'hui à 15 heures pour étudier le projet de loi.

Le sénateur Gérald-A. Beaudoin (président) occupe le fauteuil.

Le président: Honorables sénateurs, je déclare la séance ouverte.

Nous nous réunissons aujourd'hui pour étudier le projet de loi C-123 sur l'administration des biens saisis. Nous accueillons plusieurs témoins. Il s'agit de MM. Michael Dambrot, Daniel Murphy, Gérard Normand, Noël Bhumgara, ainsi que du surintendant principal chef Ryan et de l'inspecteur B.W. Bowie.

Je crois savoir que l'un d'entre vous sera le porte-parole principal.

M. Michael Dambrot, avocat général principal et directeur, Stratégie nationale des poursuites en matière de drogues: Ce sera moi, monsieur le président. Le surintendant principal Ryan aura également quelques observations à faire.

Le président: Allez-y, monsieur.

M. Dambrot: L'objet du projet de loi est d'ajouter quelques éléments dont nous avons grand besoin dans le régime actuel d'administration des produits de la criminalité. Les premières dispositions canadiennes dans ce domaine ont été adoptées en 1989 dans le cadre du Code criminel, de la Loi sur les stupéfiants et de la Loi sur les aliments et drogues. D'autres dispositions sont venues s'ajouter en 1991, dans la Loi sur le recyclage des produits de la criminalité.

Malgré les efforts considérables déployés au niveau fédéral pour appliquer ces dispositions, ce régime n'a pas été exploité au maximum. L'absence de régime cohérent et efficace de gestion des biens et la faible participation des forces policières locales aux enquêtes sur les infractions relatives aux produits de la criminalité ont donné lieu à de grandes préoccupations.

La GRC estime à des dizaines de millions de dollars les produits de la criminalité qui ne font l'objet d'aucune enquête au Canada, mais il ne faut pas en conclure que nous n'obtenons aucun résultat au moyen du régime en place.

À Montréal, par exemple, un procureur fédéral a obtenu récemment dans une cause une condamnation qui permettra de confisquer deux propriétés d'une valeur de plus de 1,5 million lion. Such results are being achieved, however, despite the fact that we are experiencing problems with the management of seized and restrained assets.

No police department is currently adequately equipped to carry out these management responsibilities. Police lack the necessary property management expertise, the budgetary mechanisms and so on, needed to finance management. They also lack familiarity with the private sector resources available to assist with the management of these assets.

Even if the police forces acquire the needed wherewithal, the problem would not be eliminated. The responsibility to manage effectively the type of assets that are the target of proceeds-of-crime cases would require the police to redirect limited resources away from their real investigative duties. The attack against the profits-of-criminal enterprises will obviously be most effective if the police are doing the work they do best and asset management is left to professional asset managers.

The management of seized or restrained assets requires considerable human and financial resources, particularly where real property or ongoing businesses must be managed. The original proceeds-of-crime provisions did not clearly establish responsibility for asset management. They did not adequately address the need to allocate the legal responsibility for the maintenance of restrained property. They did not address the related need for clear authority to advance necessary moneys for this purpose to the asset managers.

There has also been a strong demand for what is called equitable sharing, both domestically and at the international level, as a method to respond to the perceived disincentive to cooperation on the part of provincial and local governments. In an effort to resolve these difficulties, the government introduced the seized property management bill.

This legislation provides needed powers to the Minister of Supply and Services to assist the police with the management responsibilities associated with the proceeds-of-crime assets that they target. These powers would be exercised on behalf of the Minister of Supply and Services by officials in a small office within the Department of Supply and Services. This office, it is anticipated, would operate on a cost-neutral basis. Its primary task would be in federally-initiated prosecutions to plan for and manage the seizure, the restraint, the forfeiture and the disposition of properties.

de dollars. Nous obtenons des résultats comme ceux-là même si nous éprouvons des problèmes dans la gestion des biens saisis et bloqués.

À l'heure actuelle, aucun service de police n'est suffisamment bien équipé pour s'acquitter de ces responsabilités de gestion. Ces services n'ont pas les compétences nécessaires en gestion immobilière ni les mécanismes budgétaires, par exemple, pour assurer la gestion financière. Ils ne sont pas assez au courant non plus des ressources auxquelles ils pourraient faire appel dans le secteur privé pour les aider à gérer ces biens.

Même si les services policiers se dotent de tous les moyens nécessaires, le problème ne sera pas éliminé pour autant. Pour assumer la responsabilité de gérer efficacement les types de biens qui sont en cause dans ces affaires criminelles, les services policiers devraient détourner des ressources limitées de leurs fonctions réelles, celles des enquêtes. De toute évidence, les offensives contre les activités criminelles lucratives seront plus efficaces si les services policiers font le travail qu'ils savent le mieux faire, laissant la gestion des biens à des spécialistes du domaine.

La gestion des biens saisis ou bloqués exige des ressources humaines et financières considérables, surtout lorsqu'il s'agit de gérer des biens immeubles ou des entreprises en exploitation. Les dispositions initiales sur les produits de la criminalité n'établissaient pas clairement les responsabilités en matière de gestion des biens. Elles ne tenaient pas compte adéquatement de la nécessité d'attribuer la responsabilité légale de gérer les biens bloqués, ni, non plus, de la nécessité d'autoriser clairement l'avance des fonds nécessaires aux gestionnaires des biens.

Il s'est manifesté également une forte demande de ce qu'on a appelé un partage équitable, aux niveaux national et international, comme moyen d'éliminer ce qu'on a perçu comme un obstacle à la coopération des administrations provinciales et locales. Le gouvernement a présenté le projet de loi sur l'administration des biens saisis afin de tenter de régler ces difficultés.

Cette mesure législative donne au ministre des Approvisionnements et Services les pouvoirs nécessaires pour aider les services policiers à s'acquitter de leurs responsabilités en matière de gestion des produits des activités criminelles contre lesquelles ils luttent. Ces pouvoirs seront exercés au nom du ministre des Approvisionnements et Services par les fonctionnaires d'un petit service relevant du ministère des Approvisionnements et Services. Il est prévu que ce service fonctionnera sans engagement de coûts. Sa tâche principale serait, dans les poursuites intentées à l'échelon fédéral, de préparer et de gérer la saisie, le blocage, la confiscation et l'aliénation de biens.

[Text]

As I have said, the bill also establishes a regime for equitable sharing of forfeited assets within and outside Canada. The office would be empowered to share, in accordance with regulations, the proceeds of disposition of forfeited property with governments responsible for law enforcement agencies that have participated in the investigation of the offence that leads to the forfeiture.

As you are no doubt aware, there is an issue outstanding concerning the appropriate government to receive the share. The Justice Department and the Ministry of the Solicitor General engaged in an extensive consultation process on this issue over a period of several months. The issue had not been resolved at the time that this bill was tabled in the house.

In the consultation process, however, the two departments consulted provincial attorneys general, provincial solicitors general, the Federation of Canadian Municipalities, the Canadian Association of Chiefs of Police, the Canadian Police Association, the Canadian Association of Police Boards, the Canadian Bar Association and the Canadian Insolvency Practitioners Association. Unfortunately, there was far from a consensus on this issue from these various consultees.

All of the provincial attorneys general and the solicitors general strongly expressed their preference that sharing be directed to provincial governments only for subsequent reallocation by them for law enforcements purposes. They said this would recognize that municipalities and municipal police forces are creatures of the province, that they were in the best position to make the kinds of allocations that were appropriate.

The municipalities and police organizations, on the other hand, strongly pressed their claim for direct sharing with municipal governments as well as provincial governments.

I should say that none of the consultees supported direct sharing with police forces. The Canadian Bar Association, in particular, strongly opposed direct sharing with police forces. What we learned from the process is that very few people support direct sharing with police forces for many policy reasons.

This is obviously a sensitive issue between provinces and municipalities. A process has been put in place to try to finally develop a consensus which does not yet exist on this issue.

Once the consensus or a decision is reached, the intention is that regulations will be prepublished and subjected to the regular regulatory review process.

There were witnesses who appeared in the House committee on behalf of the Canadian Association of Chiefs of Police, the Canadian Police Association and the Federation of Canadian Municipalities. They were asked if they preferred the bill to go

[Traduction]

Comme je l'ai déjà dit, le projet de loi établit également un régime de partage équitable des biens saisis tant au Canada qu'à l'étranger. Le bureau sera autorisé à partager, conformément aux dispositions d'un règlement, le produit de l'aliénation de biens confisqués avec les gouvernements dont relèvent les services d'application de la loi qui ont participé à l'enquête ayant abouti à la confiscation.

Vous le savez sans doute, le problème du partage entre les diverses instances n'est toujours pas réglé. Les ministères de la Justice et du solliciteur général ont mené d'importantes consultations sur la question pendant plusieurs mois, mais le problème n'était toujours pas résolu lorsque le projet de loi a été déposé à la Chambre.

Néanmoins, ces deux ministères ont pu consulter les procureurs et les solliciteurs généraux des provinces, la Fédération canadienne des municipalités, l'Association canadienne des chefs de police, la Canadian Association of Police Boards, l'Association du Barreau canadien et la Canadian Insolvency Practitioners Association. Malheureusement, aucun consensus ne s'est dégagé, beaucoup s'en faut, entre les diverses parties consultées.

Tous les procureurs et solliciteurs généraux des provinces préfèrent très nettement que la part revenant aux provinces soit versée aux gouvernements provinciaux, quitte à ce qu'elle soit ensuite partagée entre les services d'application de la loi. Selon eux, cette formule reconnaît que les municipalités et les forces policières municipales sont créées par les provinces et que ce sont ces dernières qui sont les mieux placées pour faire les partages qui s'imposent.

Les municipalités et les organismes policiers, par contre, ont vigoureusement réclamé pour les municipalités et les provinces une participation directe au partage.

Je dois dire qu'aucune des parties consultées ne s'est prononcée en faveur d'un partage direct avec les forces policières. L'Association du Barreau canadien, notamment, s'y est opposée énergiquement. Ce que les consultations nous ont appris, c'est que fort peu de gens sont favorables à un partage direct avec les forces policières, et ce, pour de nombreuses raisons qui tiennent à la politique.

Il s'agit de toute évidence d'une question délicate qui se pose entre les provinces et les municipalités. Un dispositif a été mis en place en vue de dégager enfin un consensus sur la question, mais l'objectif n'est pas encore atteint.

Une fois qu'il y aura consensus ou qu'une décision aura été prise, on entend publier une première version du règlement, qui sera soumis à examen ordinaire de la réglementation.

Des témoins représentant l'Association canadienne des chefs de police, l'Association canadienne des policiers et la Fédération canadienne des municipalités ont comparu au comité de la Chambre des communes. Il leur a été demandé forward as is or that it be held up while this issue was resolved. My understanding of their testimony is that they all prefer that the bill go forward as it is because they feel it is an important initiative for them.

The bill also contains a provision that deals with the remaining federal funds, after any applicable sharing has been distributed to provincial or local governments. Clause 16 provides that the remainder, after making allowances for losses, claims, and ongoing expenses, shall be paid into accounts as prescribed in the regulations. The purpose of this is to permit the government to give consideration to creating a new account for the purpose of providing funding for other crime prevention initiatives. No such account exists at the moment, but the matter is under active consideration.

Sharing is obviously an important element in this scheme and of equal significance is the establishment of an effective, efficient and accountable asset-management procedure. If assets are not effectively managed, there will be nothing at the end of the process available to share.

One other feature of importance, particularly for Quebec and New Brunswick, is that the legislation will provide that where prosecution of an offence was commenced at the instance of a government of a province and conducted by, or on behalf of that government, any forfeited property will be disposed of as the attorney general of that province directs. This is in response to a concern raised by the attorneys general of Quebec and New Brunswick who, unlike other provincial attorneys general, conduct some drug prosecutions which are investigated by local or provincial police agencies. Those moneys presently go to the federal treasury. Understandably, they believe that those forfeitures in their own cases should go to their governments. Clause 16 of the bill provides that change.

Finally, the bill provides for a review of the legislation after three years. This would give an opportunity to determine if this management structure and the sharing expectations are sound and whether it has been done right or should be improved.

I thank you for this opportunity to deliver these brief remarks, Mr. Chairman. My colleagues and I are ready to answer any questions you may have on the bill. Although I believe, as I have indicated, Chief Superintendent Ryan also has some remarks to make.

The Chairman: Before asking the witnesses from the RCMP for their comments, I understand that there will be some questions concerning the bill at the moment. Of course, you are in a position to answer questions about the sharing aspects.

s'ils préféraient que le projet de loi soit adopté tel quel ou qu'on attende que le problème soit résolu. Si j'interprète fidèlement leur témoignage, tous préfèrent que le projet soit adopté dans sa forme actuelle, car ils y voient une initiative importante pour eux.

Le projet de loi comporte également une disposition sur les sommes qui restent après la remise aux provinces ou aux municipalités de la part qui leur revient. Aux termes de l'article 16, les sommes qui restent, une fois soustraits les montants réservés aux pertes, aux indemnités et aux dépenses de fonctionnement sont portées au crédit de comptes prévus par le règlement. La raison d'être de cette disposition est de permettre au gouvernement d'envisager la création d'un nouveau compte en vue de financer d'autres initiatives de prévention du crime. Il n'existe aucun compte de cette nature pour l'instant, mais la question est étudiée de près.

De toute évidence, le partage est un élément important du régime; il est tout aussi important que l'établissement d'un dispositif de gestion des biens efficace, efficient et responsable. Si les biens ne sont pas gérés efficacement, il ne restera rien à partager, en bout de ligne.

Une autre disposition de la loi qui est importante, notamment au Québec et au Nouveau-Brunswick, est que, lorsque les poursuites sont intentées à la demande du gouvernement d'une province, menées par lui ou en son nom, tous les biens confisqués seront aliénés selon les instructions du procureur général de cette province. Cette disposition répond à une préoccupation des procureurs généraux du Québec et du Nouveau-Brunswick qui, à la différence de ce qui se passe dans les autres provinces, intentent des poursuites en matière de drogues dans des causes sur lesquelles les services policiers locaux ou provinciaux ont fait enquête. En ce moment, cet argent est versé au Trésor fédéral. Ils estiment, et cela se comprend fort bien, que les biens saisis dans ces causes doivent revenir à leur gouvernement. L'article 16 prévoit ce changement.

Enfin, le projet prévoit un examen de la loi après trois ans. Cet examen devrait permettre de voir si la structure de gestion et le partage sont satisfaisants, si les choses se passent normalement ou s'il y a des améliorations à apporter.

Monsieur le président, je vous remercie de m'avoir permis de faire ces brèves observations. Mes collègues et moi sommes prêts à répondre à toutes les questions que vous pouvez avoir à poser sur le projet de loi. Je crois cependant, comme je l'ai dit, que le surintendant principal Ryan a des observations à faire.

Le président: Avant de demander leur point de vue aux témoins de la GRC, je crois que nous allons passer dès maintenant aux questions sur le projet de loi. Vous êtes évidemment en position de répondre aux questions sur le partage.

It is unfortunate that the minister and his parliamentary secretary cannot be with us either today or tomorrow. However, I understand that you may speak on his behalf because there is a policy question here that has been raised by the members of the other side.

Senator Lewis: Mr. Dambrot, can you tell us what happens now where you effect a seizure? Can you give us the background? What is the procedure so that we can understand it?

Mr. Dambrot: If there is a seizure of an asset which requires management, almost inevitably it would be an RCMP case because the local police are not actively engaged in those kinds of cases. At present, the RCMP would provide whatever management is required, if management is required.

I suppose the best example of that is a case in the province of Quebec in which a ski resort was restrained under the provisions of the act. The RCMP has been responsible for the management of that ski hill. It was recently forfeited, but they have been responsible for its management for the three-year period during which it was in litigation and before the courts. The RCMP retained private managers to do the work.

That is probably the case that most underscored the need for some reform because there were many problems which were not anticipated that resulted from that case. There were difficulties in how the RCMP could obtain the funds necessary to keep the ski hill in operation. There are third parties who have interests in the property. The legislation clearly intends to respect the rights of third parties. There are many difficult problems of that, but that is the way it has been done up to the present.

Senator Lewis: I presume properties are held and eventually disposed of?

Mr. Dambrot: That is correct. They ordinarily cannot be disposed of until there is a criminal conviction of the accused and an order of forfeiture. We have the obligation to manage the property until it is forfeited, no matter how long it takes to work through that process. Once it is forfeited, the government can sell the property, subject to appeals.

Senator Lewis: If there is no conviction, the property might be returned?

Mr. Dambrot: The property would ordinarily be returned if there was no conviction.

Senator Lewis: I have not traced the offences which would result in seizure or forfeiture, but we are dealing primarily with drug offences. There are other offences, are there not?

Il est regrettable que le ministre et son secrétaire parlementaire ne puissent comparaître aujourd'hui ou demain. Je crois savoir, cependant, que vous êtes autorisé à répondre au nom du ministre. Les membres de l'autre côté ont soulevé une question de politique.

Le sénateur Lewis: Monsieur Dambrot, pouvez-vous nous dire ce qui se passe maintenant lorsque vous faites une saisie? Pouvez-vous nous situer? Quelle est la procédure suivie, pour que nous puissions la comprendre?

M. Dambrot: S'il y a saisie de biens qu'il faut gérer, il s'agit presque inévitablement d'affaires dont la GRC est chargée, car les services locaux de police ne s'occupent pas activement de ces affaires. À l'heure actuelle, c'est la GRC qui se charge de la gestion, s'il y a lieu.

Le meilleur exemple est sans doute celui d'un centre de ski, au Québec, qui a été bloqué, en vertu des dispositions de la loi. C'est la GRC qui a été chargée de la gestion de ce centre, qui a d'ailleurs été confisqué récemment. La GRC a été responsable de la gestion pendant les trois années qu'ont duré le litige et les procédures judiciaires. Elle a retenu les services de gestionnaires du secteur privé pour effectuer le travail.

Il s'agit probablement là de l'affaire qui a fait le mieux ressortir la nécessité d'une réforme, car de nombreux problèmes ont surgi qui n'avaient pas été prévus. Ainsi, la GRC a eu du mal à obtenir les fonds nécessaires pour maintenir l'exploitation du centre de ski. Des tiers détenaient des intérêts dans ce centre. Or, l'intention du législateur est clair: il importe de respecter les droits des tiers. Tout cela pose des problèmes difficiles, mais c'est ainsi que les choses se passent pour l'instant.

Le sénateur Lewis: Je suppose que les biens sont détenus et éventuellement liquidés.

M. Dambrot: C'est exact. Normalement, les biens ne peuvent être aliénés tant que ne sont pas terminées les poursuites au criminel contre le prévenu et tant qu'il n'y a pas eu ordonnance de confiscation. Nous avons l'obligation de gérer les biens tant qu'ils n'ont pas été confisqués, peu importe le temps que cela peut prendre. Après la confiscation, il est possible au gouvernement de vendre les biens, sous réserve des appels qui peuvent être interjetés.

Le sénateur Lewis: S'il n'y a pas condamnation, les biens peuvent être rendus?

M. Dambrot: Ils sont normalement rendus à leur propriétaire s'il n'y a pas condamnation.

Le sénateur Lewis: Je n'ai pas essayé de voir quelles infractions peuvent donner lieu à des saisies et à des confiscations, mais il s'agit essentiellement d'infractions relatives aux drogues. N'y en a-t-il pas d'autres?

[Text]

Mr. Dambrot: There are other offences, but the reason our focus is on drugs is that this bill creates a federal management scheme to support federal prosecutions. That is almost invariably drug offences. Other offences come within the "proceeds of crime" scheme and are prosecuted by provincial attorneys general, but they do not fall within this scheme. This is a federal management scheme.

Senator Lewis: I understand that occasionally the provincial attorneys general may prompt offences.

Mr. Dambrot: Yes, indeed.

Senator Lewis: Which would result in forfeiture and seizure?

Mr. Dambrot: Yes. There is a list of offences which they prosecute.

Senator Lewis: In those cases, what happens to the proceeds? I am given to understand that they come from the federal government.

Mr. Dambrot: No. I did not mean to mislead you.

The problem I referred to in Quebec and New Brunswick is a special problem. If a provincial attorney general is prosecuting a "proceeds-of-crime" offence under the Criminal Code and there is a forfeiture, the proceeds of that forfeiture go to the provincial government. We have nothing, federally, to do with that.

The problem area relates to forfeitures under the Narcotic Control Act which, because of its special language, results in the forfeiture going to the federal government, even though it was a provincial case.

That problem arises only in Quebec and, to a small degree, in New Brunswick. Those are the only two provinces that undertake drug prosecutions. That problem could arise elsewhere, but it does not.

Senator Stanbury: Are the provinces saying that even though the federal government seizes the property, they should be the beneficiaries because of that peculiarity of its jurisdiction?

Mr. Dambrot: The situation is a bit worse than that. In Quebec, for example, the Montreal Urban Community Police may make a seizure. The provincial attorney general may prosecute the case under the Narcotic Control Act. If there is a forfeiture, the proceeds come to the federal government. There is no question that such a procedure is not equitable. It probably arose in the days when the Narcotic Control Act was passed and this state of affairs did not exist. The province of

M. Dambrot: Il y en a effectivement d'autres, mais si l'attention se porte surtout sur les drogues, c'est que le projet de loi prévoit la mise en place d'un régime fédéral à l'appui des poursuites intentées à l'échelon fédéral. Il s'agit presque invariablement, dans ce cas, d'infractions relatives aux drogues. D'autres infractions relèvent du régime qui régit les «produits de la criminalité», mais les poursuites sont intentées par les procureurs généraux des provinces et les biens en cause ne sont pas gérés dans le cadre du régime fédéral.

Le sénateur Lewis: Je crois savoir que, à l'occasion, l'initiative peut venir des procureurs généraux des provinces.

M. Dambrot: C'est juste.

Le sénateur Lewis: Et il peut y avoir saisie ou confiscation?

M. Dambrot: Oui. Il y a une série d'infractions pour lesquelles ils peuvent intenter des poursuites.

Le sénateur Lewis: Dans ces cas, qu'advient-il des produits de la criminalité? Je crois savoir que la question relève des autorités fédérales.

M. Dambrot: Non. Je ne voulais pas vous induire en erreur.

Le problème dont j'ai parlé à propos du Québec et du Nouveau-Brunswick est particulier. Si le procureur général d'une province intente en vertu du Code criminel des poursuites pour une infraction où il peut y avoir confiscation de «produits de la criminalité» et qu'il y a effectivement confiscation, les biens reviennent au gouvernement provincial. Les autorités fédérales n'ont rien à y voir.

Les problèmes sont liés aux confiscations faites en vertu de la Loi sur les stupéfiants. À cause d'un libellé particulier, les biens confisqués reviennent au gouvernement fédéral même si l'affaire relève de la province.

Le problème se pose uniquement au Québec et, dans une mesure modeste, au Nouveau-Brunswick. Ce sont les deux seules provinces qui intentent des poursuites en matière de stupéfiants. Le problème pourrait se poser ailleurs, mais ce n'est pas le cas pour l'instant.

Le sénateur Stanbury: Les provinces disent-elles que, même si le gouvernement fédéral saisit les biens, ceux-ci doivent leur revenir à cause des particularités en matière de compétence?

M. Dambrot: La situation est légèrement pire. Au Québec, par exemple, la Police de la Communauté urbaine de Montréal peut effectuer une saisie. Le procureur général de la province peut intenter les poursuites en vertu de la Loi sur les stupéfiants. S'il y a confiscation, les produits reviennent au gouvernement fédéral. Il est certain que cela n'a rien d'équitable. Le problème remonte probablement à l'époque de l'adoption de la Loi sur les stupéfiants; à ce moment-là, ce Quebec did not start prosecuting drug offences until some time considerably later.

The Chairman: If the forfeiture is in Quebec and the prosecutor is from Quebec, the property seized would remain federal property. Is this controversial in Quebec?

Mr. Dambrot: The Narcotic Control Act is very clear. The Attorney General of Quebec has never questioned that that is what the act requires. He has merely put pressure on us, understandably, to change the law because it is not fair. We agree that it is not fair.

Senator Lewis: I am from Newfoundland. I am under the impression that some provincial prosecutions have resulted in seizure and forfeiture.

Mr. Dambrot: Other than in drug cases?

Senator Lewis: Yes.

Mr. Dambrot: That is quite possible. If there have been, those forfeitures would go to the provincial government.

Senator Lewis: Perhaps my information is incorrect, because I was given to believe they must have been drug prosecutions.

Mr. Dambrot: If they were drug prosecutions, that would be different; but, as far as I am aware, all of the drug prosecutions in Newfoundland are conducted by agents of the Attorney General of Canada.

Senator Lewis: That is the prosecution, but investigative forces might involve — in the case of Newfoundland — provincial police.

Mr. Dambrot: Yes, absolutely.

Senator Lewis: And possibly prosecution. The province, in that case, bears the cost?

Mr. Dambrot: Yes. It bears the investigative cost.

Senator Lewis: And gets no benefit?

Mr. Dambrot: At the moment.

Senator Lewis: That is the cause of a bit of friction, I suppose.

Mr. Dambrot: This sharing scheme is meant to address that exact scenario. If the constabulary to investigate a drug case in Newfoundland where the prosecution was taken by the Attorney General of Canada and there was a forfeiture, this scheme would provide for sharing back to someone — the Newfoundland government or the municipal government. That is the unresolved issue.

genre de situation ne se présentait pas. Le Québec n'a commencé que beaucoup plus tard à intenter des poursuites pour infractions liées aux stupéfiants.

Le président: Si la confiscation est faite au Québec et que le procureur est celui du Québec, les biens saisis reviennent aux autorités fédérales? Cela ne prête-t-il pas à controverse au Québec?

M. Dambrot: La Loi sur les stupéfiants est très claire. Le procureur général du Québec n'a jamais nié cette exigence de la loi. Il est simplement intervenu auprès des autorités fédérales, de façon tout à fait compréhensible, pour qu'elles modifient la loi parce qu'elle est injuste. Nous avouons qu'elle est effectivement injuste.

Le sénateur Lewis: Je suis de Terre-Neuve. J'ai l'impression que certaines poursuites au niveau provincial ont permis des saisies et des confiscations.

M. Dambrot: Dans des causes qui ne concernent pas les stupéfiants?

Le sénateur Lewis: Oui.

M. Dambrot: C'est tout à fait possible. Si c'est le cas, les biens confisqués reviennent à la province.

Le sénateur Lewis: Mes renseignements sont peut-être erronés, car on m'a donné à croire qu'il devait s'agir de poursuites relatives aux stupéfiants.

M. Dambrot: Si c'est le cas, la situation est différente, mais, à ma connaissance, toutes les poursuites de cette nature, à Terre-Neuve, sont prises en charge par les représentants du procureur général du Canada.

Le sénateur Lewis: Pour les poursuites, sans doute, mais la police provinciale, à Terre-Neuve, peut participer aux enquêtes.

M. Dambrot: Absolument.

Le sénateur Lewis: Et peut-être aussi aux poursuites. Dans ce cas, c'est la province qui assume les coûts.

M. Dambrot: Effectivement. Elle assume les coûts des enquêtes.

Le sénateur Lewis: Mais elle n'a droit à rien?

M. Dambrot: Pour l'instant.

Le sénateur Lewis: Cela doit occasionner des frictions, sans doute.

M. Dambrot: Le régime de partage vise justement à résoudre ce genre de problème. Si un policier fait enquête dans une affaire de stupéfiants à Terre-Neuve, que les poursuites soient intentées par le procureur général du Canada et qu'il y ait confiscation, le régime prévoit un partage avec le gouvernement de Terre-Neuve ou la municipalité. C'est là le problème qui reste en suspens.

Senator Lewis: I gather there have been discussions between the provinces and other authorities on this question for some time?

Mr. Dambrot: There have been discussions. I spoke of the consultation process, but discussions preceded that process for a long time.

Senator Stanbury: This goes back to the first bill in 1989. I remember we raised the problem. We could see the problem then.

Senator Lewis: What is the proposal, or is there any proposal? Has the sharing proposal been settled on?

Mr. Dambrot: No, it has not been settled on due to difficulty in attaining consensus. As I indicated, a completely opposing view is presented by provincial solicitors general and attorneys general, on the one hand, and umbrella groups for local police forces and municipal groups. There is an effort to find a consensus that would give satisfaction to all parties, but there has been no decision or resolution of the issue in the consultation process because it has been so difficult.

Senator Lewis: So the question of who receives the boodle is not yet settled?

Mr. Dambrot: It is not settled. There is no question that we want to give it away; it is merely a question of which level should receive it.

The Chairman: Is that done by regulation?

Mr. Dambrot: That is the proposal; to have it done by regulation.

The Chairman: At the end of negotiations?

Mr. Dambrot: After negotiations, in the end result, the minister must make a decision. The Minister of Justice is responsible for the bill.

Senator Lewis: The bill provides that the minister "shall" share the proceeds.

Mr. Dambrot: That is correct.

Senator Lewis: So if we have no regulations, how will he share it?

Senator Rivest: The minister will decide.

Mr. Dambrot: Obviously there is a pressing need for regulations.

Once the act is in place, there will be a time period between money coming into the scheme, and forfeitures and money going out. However, the intention is to move as quickly as possible to get the issue resolved and a regulatory scheme in place.

Senator Jessiman: Mr. Dambrot, you said that the Law Society or the Bar Association and others agreed that the Le sénateur Lewis: Je puis conclure que les discussions entre les provinces et les autres autorités se poursuivront un certain temps sur cette question?

M. Dambrot: Il y a eu des discussions. J'ai parlé de consultations, mais les discussions avaient débuté bien avant ces consultations.

Le sénateur Stanbury: Cela remonte au premier projet de loi, en 1989. Je me souviens que nous avons soulevé le problème. Nous étions conscients du problème à l'époque.

Le sénateur Lewis: Quelle est la proposition? Y en a-t-il une? Y a-t-il eu entente sur une proposition de partage?

M. Dambrot: Non, la question n'a pas été réglée à cause de la difficulté d'établir un consensus. Comme je l'ai dit, deux groupes, celui des procureurs et solliciteurs généraux des provinces et celui des polices locales et des municipalités, ont des points de vue diamétralement opposés. Il se fait des efforts pour parvenir à un consensus satisfaisant pour toutes les parties, mais il n'y a eu aucune décision, aucun règlement du problème par la consultation, parce que les difficultés sont considérables.

Le sénateur Lewis: La question du fric n'est donc pas réglée?

M. Dambrot: Non. Nous savons ce que nous voulons donner, mais il reste à savoir quel niveau doit le recevoir.

Le président: La solution sera prévue par règlement?

M. Dambrot: C'est ce qui est proposé, le recours au règlement.

Le président: À la fin des négociations?

M. Dambrot: Après les négociations, le ministre devra prendre une décision. Le projet de loi relève du ministre de la Justice.

Le sénateur Lewis: Le projet de loi dit que le ministre devra partager les produits.

M. Dambrot: C'est juste.

Le sénateur Lewis: Si nous n'avons pas de règlement, comment se fera le partage?

Le sénateur Rivest: C'est le ministre qui va décider.

M. Dambrot: Il est évident que nous avons besoin d'un règlement de façon pressante.

Une fois que la loi aura été adoptée, il y aura un certain délai entre l'entrée des fonds provenant des confiscations et le versement de fonds en vertu du partage. Néanmoins, nous entendons résoudre le problème le plus tôt possible et adopter un règlement.

Le sénateur Jessiman: Monsieur Dambrot, vous avez dit que l'ordre des avocats, l'association du Barreau et d'autres agencies — such as the police — should not share in this money.

Mr. Dambrot: Yes.

Senator Jessiman: But the RCMP is an agency of the Canadian government, is it not?

Mr. Dambrot: Yes. Well —

Senator Jessiman: Or is it?

Mr. Dambrot: It depends. In terms of this scheme, where the RCMP is doing local policing pursuant to contract, it will be treated as a municipal police force for the purpose of sharing. The sharing would go to the municipality or the provincial government responsible for the policing.

Senator Jessiman: So there would not be any circumstance under which they could ask or demand. . .

Clause 10 says, "Where a law enforcement agency in Canada has participated. . ." If the RCMP is participating, it is doing so on behalf of Canada. The clause says "the Minister shall", not the minister "may".

Clause 9 says, "In carrying out the purposes of this Act, the Minister may. . ." share the proceeds. However, under clause 10, the word used is not "may"; it is "shall".

I hope you do not get the superintendent of the RCMP saying. . .

Mr. Dambrot: That problem should arise for two reasons. I appreciate the way the clause is drafted. I also appreciate the issue you raised, but the clause says "the minister shall, in accordance with the regulations," and the regulations will clearly not provide for sharing with the commissioner of the RCMP or any other police force.

When you look at the purpose clause — which should shed some light on the interpretation of that clause — clause 3(d), where property is forfeited, provides authority for the sharing of the proceeds of disposition with jurisdictions, the law enforcement agencies of which participated in the investigation.

The Chairman: Usually the word "shall" is imperative. In that context, since the word was changed in the House of Commons, it is obviously imperative.

Mr. Dambrot: Yes, sir. It was changed in the House of Commons.

The Chairman: In the original bill, the word was "may", and it was subsequently changed to "shall". Obviously it becomes imperative.

Mr. Dambrot: The issue arose in committee in the House. The concern was that given the way the bill was drafted, there might be discretion in the minister, even with regulations, to estimaient que des organismes comme les services de police ne devaient pas avoir droit à une part des fonds.

M. Dambrot: Effectivement.

Le sénateur Jessiman: Mais la GRC est rattachée au gouvernement canadien, n'est-ce pas?

M. Dambrot: Oui, mais. . .

Le sénateur Jessiman: Est-ce bien le cas?

M. Dambrot: Cela dépend. Dans le cadre du régime et aux fins du partage, la GRC sera considérée comme un service municipal lorsqu'elle est chargée à contrat de la police locale. C'est la municipalité ou le gouvernement provincial responsable des services de police qui recevrait l'argent.

Le sénateur Jessiman: Donc, en aucune circonstance, la GRC ne pourrait demander ou exiger. . .

L'article 10 stipule: «. . .lorsqu'un organisme chargé de l'application de la loi au Canada a participé. . .» Si la GRC participe, elle le fait au nom du Canada. L'article dit bien: «Le ministre doit. . .» et non pas: «Le ministre peut. . .»

Il est vrai que l'article 9 dit: «Le ministre peut, pour l'application de la loi. . .» partager les produits de la criminalité, mais l'article 10 dit qu'il doit et non pas qu'il peut le faire.

J'espère que vous n'amenez pas le surintendant de la GRC à dire. . .

M. Dambrot: Le problème peut surgir pour deux raisons. Je comprends comment l'article est libellé. Je comprends aussi la question que vous avez soulevée, mais l'article dit que «le ministre doit, conformément aux règlements», et le règlement, c'est évident, ne prévoira pas de partage avec le commissaire de la GRC ni avec d'autres forces policières.

Si vous jetez un coup d'oeil sur l'article qui énonce l'objet du projet de loi, article qui doit éclairer l'interprétation de cette disposition, vous constaterez que le paragraphe 3 d) prévoit le partage du produit de l'aliénation des biens confisqués avec les autorités dont les organismes chargés de l'application de la loi ont participé à l'enquête.

Le président: Habituellement, le mot «doit» est impératif. Dans ce contexte, il l'est de toute évidence, puisqu'il a été modifié par les Communes.

M. Dambrot: C'est exact. Il a été modifié par les Communes.

Le président: Dans le texte initial, c'est le mot «peut» qui figurait. Il a ensuite été remplacé par «doit». De toute évidence, il a une nuance impérative.

M. Dambrot: La question a été soulevée au comité de la Chambre. Ce qu'on craignait, vu le libellé du projet de loi, c'est que le ministre n'ait la possibilité, même aux termes des not share. That was certainly not intended. That is how the change came about.

The Chairman: The problem remains the same. They must agree. They have no choice.

Senator Neiman: Given that whatever decision arrived at could be changed again by regulation because the Minister of Justice has the sole prerogative to make regulations, what recourse would the provinces or anyone else have if the Minister of Justice decided he was giving them too big a share or they did not like the proportion? What recourse is there, if any?

Mr. Dambrot: This issue is sufficiently sensitive, so that any minister who tampered with the — I should not use the word "tampered" — who wanted to make changes to the formula, would engage in a consultation. The stakes or the concerns at the municipal and provincial levels are very intense.

Senator Neiman: I know that. I come from the Region of Peel where we have a great interest in this legislation.

Mr. Dambrot: I used to prosecute cases there at one time.

The Chairman: You mentioned municipal authorities. Are they at the negotiating table with the Minister of Justice of Canada and the attorneys general of the provinces?

Mr. Dambrot: They are at the table, in the sense. They were part of the consultation process. There was no large meeting for the different parties, but the municipalities were consulted. The Solicitor General sent officials to meet with various municipal and police organizations summer. There was a meeting of the police board's organization in Victoria. There were a series meetings. There were direct consultations with all of the organizations I mentioned in my remarks.

Senator Neiman: Is there a constitutional question or problem of going over the provinces and giving the money directly to municipalities? Is that not a large issue?

Mr. Dambrot: There is concern about that, but. . . Excuse me for one second.

Senator DeWare: A consult.

Senator Neiman: It is serious when we talk about money.

Mr. Dambrot: The minister considered that issue. He was satisfied that there was no constitutional impediment.

The Chairman: The minister was satisfied of what?

Mr. Dambrot: That there was no constitutional impediment to sharing with municipalities.

The Chairman: Directly?

règlements, de décider de ne pas partager. Ce n'était certainement pas là l'intention du législateur. C'est pourquoi l'amendement a été apporté.

Le président: Le problème demeure entier. Ils doivent s'entendre. Ils n'ont pas le choix.

Le sénateur Neiman: Quelle que soit la décision, elle pourrait être modifiée par règlement, étant donné que le ministre de la Justice a seul la prérogative de prendre des règlements. Quel recours auraient les provinces ou d'autres instances si le ministre de la Justice décidait que la part cédée est trop importante ou si la proportion ne leur plaisait pas? Y a-t-il un recours? Lequel?

M. Dambrot: La question est suffisamment délicate pour que tout ministre qui voudrait tripatouiller — je ne devrais pas employer ce terme — la formule procéderait à des consultations. Les enjeux ou les préoccupations sont très importants aux niveaux municipal et provincial.

Le sénateur Neiman: Je sais. Je viens de la région de Peel, où ce projet suscite un vif intérêt.

M. Dambrot: À une époque, j'agissais comme procureur dans les poursuites, dans cette région.

Le président: Vous avez parlé des autorités municipales. Prennent-elles part aux négociations avec le ministre de la Justice du Canada et les procureurs généraux des provinces?

M. Dambrot: En un sens, oui. Elles ont participé aux consultations. Il n'y a pas eu de grande réunion pour les différentes parties, mais les municipalités ont été consultées. Le solliciteur général a chargé des fonctionnaires de rencontrer divers organismes municipaux et policiers. Il y a eu une réunion des commissions de police à Victoria. Il y a eu toute une série de réunions et des consultations directes avec toutes les organisations que j'ai mentionnées dans mon exposé.

Le sénateur Neiman: Y a-t-il des obstacles de nature constitutionnelle qui empêchent de contourner les provinces et de verser directement de l'argent aux municipalités? Est-ce que ce n'est pas un problème important?

M. Dambrot: C'est un objet de préoccupation, mais. . . Excusez-moi un instant.

Le sénateur DeWare: Une consultation.

Le sénateur Neiman: C'est sérieux, lorsqu'il s'agit d'argent.

M. Dambrot: Le ministre a tenu compte du problème. Il était convaincu qu'il n'y avait aucun obstacle constitutionnel.

Le président: Le ministre était convaincu de quoi?

M. Dambrot: Qu'il n'y avait aucun obstacle constitutionnel au partage avec les municipalités.

Le président: Directement.

Senator Rivest: We will have a political problem in Quebec if we try to avoid the Minister of Justice.

The Chairman: When you say the Minister of Justice —

Senator Rivest: Does that all go directly to the municipality?

Mr. Daniel Murphy, Deparment of Justice: I am not suggesting that there would not be a political —

Senator Rivest: No, I do not want to hear that from you.

The Chairman: We have to be clear, here. You mean the Minister of Justice of Canada?

Mr. Murphy: Yes, sir.

The Chairman: The Attorney General of the province concerned may object to that. He may say, "I keep that money for me, not for the municipalities." What happens then?

Senator Stanbury: That is why we need the minister here.

Mr. Murphy: That is not a question that we can answer. If we have regulations that provide for it, then we would attempt to abide by the regulations.

Senator Jessiman: But what if the regulations are contrary to what the act says? The act says, "where a law enforcement agency in Canada has participated". Let us assume it is the City of Winnipeg Police Force and their council and I am acting for the police force. I am now saying, "We want to get paid." You cannot have regulations that are contrary to what it says here. You have to share that.

Mr. Murphy: The phrase that you are referring to is what triggers the obligation to share. It is silent as to who receives.

Senator Jessiman: I know, but it says, "if a law enforcement agency has participated". Let us assume that the City of Winnipeg police seized millions of dollars worth of property. They want a piece of the action. I think they are entitled to it under this in view of the way it is worded.

Mr. Murphy: The section says that where a law enforcement agency has participated, the minister shall share in accordance with the regulations. If the regulations say that he shall share with a municipal or provincial government—

Senator Jessiman: You do not think it would be that they have to share with the law enforcement agency?

Mr. Murphy: That is certainly not the intention of the drafter.

Le sénateur Rivest: Il y aura des problèmes politiques au Québec si nous essayons de contourner le ministre de la Justice.

Le président: Lorsque vous dites que le ministre de la Justice. . .

Le sénateur Rivest: Tout va-t-il directement à la municipalité?

M. Daniel Murphy, ministère de la Justice: Je ne veux pas dire qu'il y aurait, sur le plan politique. . .

Le sénateur Rivest: Je ne veux pas entendre cela de votre bouche.

Le président: Il faut que les choses soient bien claires. Vous voulez parler du ministre de la Justice du Canada?

M. Murphy: Oui, monsieur.

Le président: Le procureur général de la province en cause peut élever des objections. Il peut dire: «Je garde cet argent pour moi; ce n'est pas pour les municipalités.» Que se passera-t-il alors?

Le sénateur Stanbury: C'est pour cela que la présence du ministre est nécessaire.

M. Murphy: Ce n'est pas une question à laquelle nous puissions répondre. Si nous avions un règlement qui le prévoit, nous nous efforcerions de le respecter.

Le sénateur Jessiman: Et si le règlement va à l'encontre de ce que dit la loi? La loi stipule: «lorsqu'un organisme chargé de l'application de la loi au Canada a participé. . .» Supposons qu'il s'agisse de la police et du conseil de Winnipeg, et qu'ils veulent être payés. Vous ne pouvez pas prendre des règlements qui vont à l'encontre de la loi. Le partage est obligatoire.

M. Murphy: Le passage que vous citez établit l'obligation de partager, mais il ne précise pas à qui le versement doit être fait.

Le sénateur Jessiman: Je sais, mais le texte dit bien: «lorsqu'un organisme chargé de l'application de la loi au Canada a participé. . .» Supposons que la police de Winnipeg saisisse des biens valant des millions de dollars. Elle voudrait sa part. Je pense qu'elle y a droit, si je me fie au libellé du projet.

M. Murphy: L'article dit que lorsqu'un organisme a participé, le ministre doit partager les produits conformément aux dispositions du règlement. Si celui-ci stipule que le partage doit se faire avec les autorités municipales ou provinciales. . .

Le sénateur Jessiman: Vous ne pensez pas que cela veut dire que le partage doit se faire avec l'organisme d'application de la loi?

M. Murphy: Ce n'est certainement pas l'intention du rédacteur.

Senator Jessiman: If I were interpreting it, I would think they would be entitled.

Mr. Murphy: It is coloured by the purpose clause to which I referred.

Senator Rivest: Is it possible that the regulation concerning the sharing could be different from one province to another?

Mr. Murphy: It has not been anticipated that it would be. Up until now the positions taken have approached it in a uniform way. I do not know that there would be any impediment to tailoring it to provinces, but that has not been contemplated up to now.

Senator Jessiman: Concerning the jurisdiction example that I gave you, it would be the City of Winnipeg not the province of Manitoba. That is, the jurisdiction as far as the police force of the City of Winnipeg would be the City of Winnipeg, not the Province of Manitoba, though it is a creature of the Province of Manitoba. I do not think that section covers this situation.

Mr. Murphy: There are lots of problems and lots of access. That is why we are in the business.

Senator DeWare: The regulations will cover it.

Senator Stanbury: My supplementary question is basic and probably there is an easy answer, but I wonder why the federal government cares. If the money is going to the province and to the municipalities, why not send it to the province and let the province fight with their own municipalities? Do we have a reason why we do not want to do that?

Mr. Murphy: We do not have a strong reason to do it one way or another. We are trying to accommodate the interests that are out there about where the sharing should go.

Senator Stanbury: By that you mean that you are trying to protect the local municipal organizations so that the provinces do not just stick it into their general funds and not pass it on for incentive purposes to the police?

Mr. Murphy: That is certainly what some of the municipal organizations have raised as their concern. We would have been happy if the provinces and municipalities could have reached a consensus, but so far that has not happened.

The Chairman: But the municipalities are delegates of the provincial Crown. If they disagree with the provincial Crown, obviously we cannot be the umpire, can we?

Mr. Murphy: In the end result.

The Chairman: In the end result we are?

[Traduction]

Le sénateur Jessiman: Selon mon interprétation, il y aurait droit.

M. Murphy: L'interprétation est guidée par l'article qui énonce l'objet du projet de loi.

Le sénateur Rivest: Est-il possible que le règlement qui régit le partage varie d'une province à l'autre?

M. Murphy: La possibilité n'a pas été envisagée. Jusqu'à maintenant, les formules étudiées sont uniformes. Je ne vois pas d'obstacles à une modulation selon les provinces, mais cela n'a pas été envisagé jusqu'à maintenant.

Le sénateur Jessiman: Dans l'exemple que je vous ai donné, ce serait Winnipeg qui aurait la compétence et non le Manitoba. La compétence, pour ce qui est des forces de police de Winnipeg, appartiendrait à la ville et non à la province, même si la ville est la création de la province. Je ne pense pas que cet article s'applique à cette situation.

M. Murphy: Il y a beaucoup de problèmes et de considérations en cause. C'est pourquoi nous nous occupons de l'affaire.

Le sénateur DeWare: Le règlement résoudra le problème.

Le sénateur Stanbury: Ma question complémentaire est élémentaire, et la réponse est probablement facile, mais je me demande pourquoi le gouvernement fédéral s'en mêle. Si l'argent doit être versé à la province et aux municipalités, pourquoi ne pas le faire parvenir aux provinces et les laisser se bagarrer avec leurs municipalités. Y a-t-il une raison de ne pas agir de la sorte?

M. Murphy: Nous n'avons aucune raison contraignante d'agir d'une manière ou de l'autre. Nous essayons, dans le partage, de tenir compte des intérêts en présence.

Le sénateur Stanbury: Vous voulez dire par là que vous essayez de protéger les municipalités, de manière que les provinces ne se contentent pas de tout empocher sans rien verser aux services policiers, à titre de mesure incitative?

M. Murphy: C'est là une crainte qu'ont exprimée certaines municipalités. Nous aurions été heureux que les provinces et les municipalités arrivent à un consensus, mais cela ne s'est pas produit jusqu'à maintenant.

Le président: Mais les municipalités sont les déléguées de l'État provincial. Si elles ont des différends avec lui, nous ne pouvons pas nous imposer comme arbitre, n'est-ce pas?

M. Murphy: En fin de compte.

Le président: En fin de compte, nous pouvons le faire?

[Text]

Mr. Murphy: No, in the end result we cannot be. If a province decided that they were to recover the moneys from the municipalities, they could do that.

Senator Rivest: In Quebec there is a law prohibiting any municipalities or agencies of the Quebec government to make a direct deal with the federal authorities.

The Chairman: With the federal authorities?

Senator Rivest: Yes. They need formal acceptance by the Quebec government. That is the practice in Quebec. However, I understand you only discussed this with associations of municipalities. Did you discuss it with particular municipalities?

Mr. Murphy: No.

Senator Rivest: Only the association, the Canadian federation?

Mr. Murphy: Yes. It was thought that to try and engage in consultations with all municipalities would be impossible.

The Chairman: Take a big municipality like Montreal, Toronto or Vancouver. What do you do?

Senator DeWare: If no one agrees the minister does it.

The Chairman: You mean the ministers — plural.

Senator Stanbury: Let the courts decide.

Senator DeWare: The ministers have the power to do that.

The Chairman: I have no problem with the ministers — provincial or federal. It is when there is a conflict between a municipality in a province with their own attorney general.

Senator Lewis: There is another aspect of this which follows from it. I presume that in the prosecution of these offences, where you avail of the services of municipal and provincial police forces, you enjoy or hope to enjoy the cooperation of those forces.

Mr. Murphy: Yes.

Senator Lewis: Whether it be a disincentive or an incentive, is that one of the objects in order to try and encourage cooperation?

Mr. Murphy: Yes it is.

Senator Lewis: Therefore, it is important that these forces be dealt with and be encouraged by receipt of some of these proceeds. Will that lead to problems between the province and the municipality or police force?

Mr. Murphy: Whether we share with municipalities or provinces, it should have some impact in terms of encouraging local police forces, because if it were municipalities they

[Traduction]

M. Murphy: En fin de compte, nous ne pouvons pas le faire. Si une province décide de recouvrer l'argent auprès des municipalités, elle peut le faire.

Le sénateur Rivest: Au Québec, nous avons une loi qui interdit aux municipalités ou organismes du gouvernement de traiter directement avec les autorités fédérales.

Le président: Avec les autorités fédérales?

Le sénateur Rivest: Oui. Le gouvernement québécois doit donner son autorisation officielle. C'est ce qui se fait au Québec. Cependant, je crois savoir que vous n'avez discuté qu'avec les associations de municipalités. Avez-vous eu des entretiens avec certaines municipalités?

M. Murphy: Non.

Le sénateur Rivest: Seulement avec l'association, avec la fédération canadienne?

M. Murphy: Oui. Il a semblé que ce serait impossible d'essayer de consulter toutes les municipalités.

Le président: Prenons une grande municipalité comme Montréal, Toronto ou Vancouver. Que faites-vous dans ce cas?

Le sénateur DeWare: Si personne ne s'entend, le ministre intervient.

Le président: Vous voulez dire les ministres, au pluriel.

Le sénateur Stanbury: On laisse les tribunaux décider.

Le sénateur DeWare: Les ministres ont le pouvoir de le faire.

Le président: Je n'ai aucun problème à accepter que les ministres, provinciaux ou fédéral, le fassent. La difficulté surgit lorsqu'il y a un différend entre une municipalité, dans une province, et son propre procureur général.

Le sénateur Lewis: Il y a un autre aspect qui découle de cela. Je suppose que, dans les poursuites au sujet de ces infractions, lorsqu'on se prévaut des services des polices municipale ou provinciale, on souhaite avoir leur coopération.

M. Murphy: Effectivement.

Le sénateur Lewis: Qu'il y ait incitation ou le contraire, est-ce là un des buts visés, soit favoriser la coopération?

M. Murphy: C'est juste.

Le sénateur Lewis: Il est donc important de tenir compte de ces forces policières et de les encourager en leur remettant une partie des produits de la criminalité. Cela suscitera-t-il des difficultés entre la province, la municipalité et les forces policières?

M. Murphy: Que le partage se fasse avec les municipalités ou avec les provinces, il devrait avoir pour effet d'encourager les forces policières locales; si ce sont les municipalités qui would be able to make use of those moneys in the budgetary process for the local police forces; if it is the provinces, they tell us that they will use the money to further law enforcement and will not put it in general revenue. Either way, there is a potential for encouraging greater municipal or provincial police involvement.

Senator Lewis: Without putting you on the spot, I suppose you would like to see it dribble down to the police forces upon whom you want to rely for assistance, is that correct?

Mr. Murphy: I would certainly like to see it happen in a way that encourages the local police forces.

Senator Lewis: Would there be an incentive to a police force to try and occupy the field and keep an investigation in their own hands if they realize they will get a greater portion by prolonging their own investigation and making it appear that they have had a bigger input.

Mr. Murphy: I am not quite sure I understand.

Senator Lewis: Would there be too much of an incentive on a particular police force to try to hog the investigation and not cooperate with other forces?

Mr. Murphy: Perhaps my friends from the RCMP might be more helpful in answering that.

Inspector B. W. Bowie, Officer in Charge, Anti-Drug Profiteering Section, RCMP Headquarters — Drug Enforcement Directorate: In the process of several years of discussion, we have taken the position that we are opposed to any of these forfeited proceeds going directly to the police forces. If that is your question, there are some fundamental and real disadvantages in that process for the very reasons you state.

Senator Lewis: And on principle too, I would think.

Mr. Bowie: Absolutely. We are talking about a process of forfeiture that is generally dependent on a conviction for an underlying, serious criminal offence. If there is a perception either in the public or by the judiciary that the police forces are getting something, then we risk the general view that police testimony in criminal cases is credible because it is impartial.

We believe that it is very dangerous to start altering the proper goals of law enforcement, which is to deliver a service to the public with a high degree of impartiality and a view towards the enforcement goals, not revenue production.

There are a great many police forces that share those concerns, even though individual members of forces may advance what I believe is a shortsighted viewpoint that they reçoivent l'argent, elle s'en serviront dans leur budget pour les forces policières locales; si ce sont les provinces, elles s'en serviront, nous ont-elles dit, pour améliorer les mesures d'application de la loi au lieu de les verser dans les recettes générales. De toute façon, il sera possible d'encourager une plus grande participation de la police municipale ou provinciale.

Le sénateur Lewis: Sans vouloir vous mettre sur la sellette, je suppose que vous aimeriez que l'argent se retrouve entre les mains des forces policières dont vous souhaitez obtenir l'aide. N'est-ce pas?

M. Murphy: Je voudrais que les choses de passent de manière à encourager les forces policières locales.

Le sénateur Lewis: Est-ce que ce serait un encouragement, pour les forces policières, à essayer d'occuper le terrain et à conserver la responsabilité des enquêtes si elles savent qu'elles obtiendront une plus grande part en prolongeant leur propre enquête et en montrant qu'elles ont participé davantage?

M. Murphy: Je ne suis pas sûr de bien comprendre.

Le sénateur Lewis: Est-ce que les forces policières ne seraient pas un peu trop portées à s'accaparer des enquêtes et à ne pas collaborer avec d'autres forces?

M. Murphy: Mes collègues de la GRC seraient peut-être mieux placés pour répondre à cette question.

L'inspecteur B.W. Bowie, officier responsable, Section des enquêtes économiques antidrogue, administration centrale de la GRC — Direction de la Police des drogues: Pendant les quelques années qu'ont duré les entretiens, nous nous sommes opposés à ce qu'une partie quelconque du produit des biens confisqués soit versée directement aux forces policières. Si telle est bien votre question, il y a des inconvénients fondamentaux réels à ce processus, précisément pour les raisons que vous avez données.

Le sénateur Lewis: Et pour des raisons de principe aussi, je dirais.

M. Bowie: Absolument. Nous parlons d'un processus de saisie qui, généralement, dépend d'une condamnation pour délit grave. Si le public ou la magistrature pensent que les forces policières reçoivent quelque chose, nous risquons de donner une image contraire à l'impression générale voulant que les témoignages de la police dans les causes pénales soient dignes de foi parce qu'ils sont impartiaux.

Nous croyons qu'il est très dangereux de commencer à altérer les objectifs normaux de l'application de la loi, c'est-à-dire donner un service au public avec une grande impartialité dans le but d'appliquer la loi et non de percevoir des recettes.

De très nombreuses forces policières partagent ces préoccupations, même si certains agents peuvent soutenir une opinion qui me paraît à courte vue, soit que l'argent doit leur revenir should get the money and that will allow them to do more. The reality of the situation, as has happened elsewhere, is that it is unrealistic to expect a taxing authority — whether it be municipal, provincial or federal — to allow an agency of that authority to start making windfall profits of millions of dollars, especially since those agencies, with very few exceptions do and must operate on the basis of a predetermined budget. Does that assist you in any way?

Senator Lewis: Yes. It is almost analogous to giving an officer a commission on traffic fines.

Mr. Bowie: Yes.

Mr. Murphy: The view Inspector Bowie expressed is the view that has been taken by the Canadian Association of Chiefs of Police. They do not want the money to go directly to police forces for the very reasons Inspector Bowie mentions.

Senator Lewis: Have we any assurances that this will not be a provision in the regulations?

Mr. Murphy: It is intended to be accomplished by clause 3(d), which says that the purpose is to share with jurisdictions the law enforcement agencies of which participated.

I can assure you that no one in the government that is involved in this is of the view that there should be direct sharing with police forces.

Senator Lewis: Possibly, then, the regulations to comply with that could not make that provision.

Mr. Murphy: That is quite likely. In any event, the intention is not to do that. The issue has been provinces and municipalities.

The Chairman: Who suggested that? The Canadian Bar Association?

Mr. Murphy: Suggested what?

The Chairman: That there would be no sharing with police forces.

Mr. Murphy: That was our position long before we consulted the Canadian bar, but it was of the same view.

Senator DeWare: And the chiefs of police as well.

Senator Rivest: And RCMP.

Senator Rivest: Give the money to the provincial government.

Mr. Gérard Normand, Counsel, National Strategy for Drug Prosecution, Department of Justice: I wish to add to what Senator Rivest said earlier when he referred to the Federation of Canadian Municipalities. As a group, they came pour qu'ils puissent faire davantage. Dans la réalité des faits, comme on a pu le constater ailleurs, il est peu réaliste de s'attendre qu'une autorité fiscale — municipale, provinciale ou fédérale — permette à un organisme qui relève d'elle de commencer à faire des bénéfices inattendus de millions de dollars, d'autant plus que ces organismes, à quelques très rares exceptions près, fonctionnent et doivent fonctionner au moyen d'un budget prédéterminé. Cette explication vous éclaire-t-elle?

Le sénateur Lewis: Oui. C'est un peu comme de donner une commission à un agent sur les amendes pour infractions au code de la route.

M. Bowie: C'est cela.

M. Murphy: L'opinion que l'inspecteur Bowie vient d'exposer est la position adoptée par l'Association canadienne des chefs de police. Elle ne veut pas que l'argent soit versé directement aux forces policières pour les raisons que l'inspecteur Bowie a mentionnées.

Le sénateur Lewis: Avons-nous l'assurance que ce ne sera pas là une disposition du règlement?

M. Murphy: Le paragraphe 3*d*) précise les intentions du législateur, qui sont d'assurer un partage avec les autorités dont les organismes chargés de l'application de la loi ont participé à l'enquête.

Je puis vous assurer que personne, au gouvernement, parmi ceux qui s'occupent de ce dossier, n'estime qu'il devrait y avoir un partage direct avec les forces policières.

Le sénateur Lewis: On pourrait donc dire que le règlement, s'il est conforme à la loi, ne peut prévoir ce partage direct.

M. Murphy: Vous avez très probablement raison. De toute manière, ce partage direct n'entre pas dans nos intentions. Le problème est celui qui se pose entre les provinces et les municipalités.

Le président: Qui a proposé cela? L'Association du Barreau canadien?

M. Murphy: Proposé quoi?

Le président: Qu'il n'y ait pas de partage avec les forces policières.

M. Murphy: C'était notre position bien avant que nous ne consultions le Barreau canadien, mais celui-ci est du même avis.

Le sénateur DeWare: Et les chefs de police aussi?

Le sénateur Rivest: Et la GRC.

Le sénateur Rivest: Donnez l'argent au gouvernement provincial.

M. Gérard Normand, conseiller juridique, Stratégie nationale des poursuites en matière de drogues, ministère de la Justice: Je voudrais revenir sur ce que le sénateur Rivest a dit plus tôt en faisant allusion à la Fédération canadienne des to testify, but the person who was there on their behalf was Mr. Michel Hamelin. He is aware of this. He is the person who represented the federation before the legislative committee.

The Chairman: Certainly we cannot be involved in a battle between a municipality and a provincial authority. There is no doubt about that.

Senator Rivest: That is the reason why the minister is so cautious.

Senator Stanbury: I am concerned that the provinces must surely make the same objection to the money going to the municipalities as the municipalities and the police do about the money going to the individual police forces. In other words, municipalities say that the money should not go to the police forces because they are creatures of us; the provinces say that the money should not go the municipalities because they are creatures of us. Surely that militates in favour of simply putting it into the hands of the provinces, perhaps with an agreement with the federal government as to the general manner in which the funds should be handled. If you are so opposed to the money going directly to the police force, why are we talking about it going to the municipalities? It seems to me that it is the same principle.

Mr. Dambrot: That principle is the same, but there is more to the problem of sharing with police forces because there are dangers in sharing with the police forces.

Senator Stanbury: I appreciate that. However, millions of dollars would make quite a difference to municipalities.

Mr. Bowie: Perhaps I can draw an analogy, sir. I did all my investigative work in Calgary. The revenue generated from every traffic ticket, parking ticket, or speeding ticket that was written within the confines of the city of Calgary went to the municipality of Calgary. If it was outside the boundaries of Calgary, the traffic ticket revenue went to the province. That is a very common feature. When I left the City of Calgary five years ago, the revenue from traffic tickets was in excess of $20 million per year. The parallel is there, sir, if that is of some assistance.

Senator Neiman: Mr. Chairman, I cannot spot the particular provision that makes an exception or a difference for the provinces of Quebec and New Brunswick. For example, a criminal was apprehended or a crime was committed within the region of Peel, the prosecution took place there and after successful prosecution and an order or forfeiture, it was found that the assets included a famous ski resort in the province of Quebec. Under this scheme, who receives the proceeds?

municipalités. Comme groupe, la fédération a témoigné, mais son porte-parole était M. Michel Hamelin. Il est au courant. C'est lui qui a représenté la fédération au comité législatif.

Le président: Chose certaine, nous ne pouvons pas nous mêler de querelles entre les municipalités et les provinces. Cela ne fait aucun doute.

Le sénateur Rivest: C'est pourquoi le ministre est tellement sur ses gardes.

Le sénateur Stanbury: Je crains que les provinces n'aient la même objection à ce que l'argent soit versé aux municipalités que celles-ci et la police peuvent avoir à ce qu'il soit donné directement aux diverses forces policières. Autrement dit, les municipalités prétendent que l'argent ne doit pas être donné aux forces policières parce que celles-ci sont leur création; et les provinces soutiennent qu'il ne doit pas être remis aux municipalités parce que celles-ci sont leur création. Assurément, cela devrait inciter le gouvernement fédéral à simplement remettre l'argent aux provinces, peut-être en s'entendant avec elles sur une formule générale d'utilisation des fonds. Si vous vous opposez tellement à ce que l'argent soit versé directement aux forces policières, pourquoi envisageons-nous de le donner aux municipalités? Il me semble que le principe en cause est le même.

M. Dambrot: Le principe est le même, mais le problème du partage avec les forces policières est plus complexe, vu les dangers de ce partage.

Le sénateur Stanbury: Je le comprends, mais des millions de dollars peuvent faire toute une différence pour les municipalités.

M. Bowie: Je pourrais peut-être faire une analogie. J'ai fait toute ma carrière d'enquêteur à Calgary. Les recettes provenant des contraventions pour infraction au code, pour stationnement illégal, pour excès de vitesse données sur le territoire de Calgary allaient à la municipalité. Celles qui étaient données en dehors de ce territoire étaient remises à la province. C'est une formule très courante. Lorsque j'ai quitté Calgary, il y a cinq ans, ces recettes dépassaient les 20 millions de dollars par an. Voilà une comparaison, si toutefois elle peut être utile.

Le sénateur Neiman: Monsieur le président, je n'arrive pas à retrouver la disposition qui prévoit une exception ou une formule différente pour le Québec et le Nouveau-Brunswick. Par exemple, supposons qu'un criminel soit appréhendé ou qu'un crime soit commis dans la région de Peel; les poursuites sont intentées, il y a condamnation et ordonnance de confiscation; il a été constaté que les biens comprennent un célèbre centre de ski au Québec. Aux termes de ce régime, qui reçoit le produit?

[Text]

Mr. Dambrot: For example, under this scheme the Peel Regional Police investigated a drug case that led to the seizure and ultimate forfeiture of a ski resort. If that case were prosecuted by the Attorney General of the province, as a result of the amendment that affects Quebec and New Brunswick, it would equally affect Ontario if that happened and the forfeiture would go to the provincial government in Ontario. However, it is unlikely because the Attorney General of the province does not prosecute drug cases.

As is more likely, if the case were prosecuted by the Attorney General of Canada, then the forfeiture would go into this sharing scheme. In that instance, since it was a provincial prosecution, once the regulations are in place, there would be sharing which would lead to either going to the municipality or the province of Ontario, depending on how the regulations were finalized.

Senator Neiman: If there are several different police forces and jurisdictions involved, who will make the decision and on what basis as to the proportion that will be divided among all the different jurisdictions?

Mr. Dambrot: No regulations exist, obviously, but there will be a simple formula to decide what proportion would go for sharing and what proportion would be the share of the federal government. If the example of the case we started with which was purely a Peel Regional Police investigation, then something like 90 per cent would be shared provincially or locally and 10 per cent would stay federal, to account for our role in prosecuting and certain other involvement.

Senator Neiman: Such as administrative expenses.

Mr. Dambrot: In the case where there were multiple police forces involved, whatever the system is, there will be some requirement for someone to give an indication of the nature of contribution of the different forces. The idea we have looked at would be having the prosecutor on the case who has not got a stake in it, such as Peel Regional, as opposed to Metropolitan Toronto Police writing a report which would give an indication of the roles of the forces. That would then come to the Attorney General of Canada in order to allocate the percentages; that would be the manner in which it was broken down. The idea is to have as simple a formula as possible with minimal administrative costs.

Senator Neiman: Is it the Attorney General of Canada who makes the decision and directs the Minister of Supply and Services or the agency as to the distribution to be made?

Mr. Dambrot: That would be the idea.

[Traduction]

M. Dambrot: Aux termes du régime, la police régionale de Peel a fait enquête sur une affaire de drogues qui a abouti à la confiscation d'un centre de ski. Si c'était le procureur général de la province qui intentait les poursuites — vu la modification qui touche le Québec et le Nouveau-Brunswick et qui pourrait s'appliquer également à l'Ontario — le produit de la confiscation irait au gouvernement provincial de l'Ontario. Cela est cependant peu probable, car le procureur général de cette province n'intente pas de poursuites dans les affaires de drogues.

Si, comme il est plus probable, les poursuites sont entreprises par le procureur général du Canada, le produit de la confiscation sera partagé conformément au nouveau régime. Dans ce cas-ci, étant donné qu'il s'agit de poursuites provinciales, le partage, une fois le règlement en place, se ferait en faveur de la municipalité ou de la province de l'Ontario, dépendant des dispositions réglementaires.

Le sénateur Neiman: Si plusieurs forces policières et autorités sont en cause, qui prendra la décision et de quelle manière seront établies les proportions qui reviennent aux différentes autorités?

M. Dambrot: Il n'existe aucun règlement, de toute évidence, mais il y aura une formule simple pour calculer la proportion à partager et celle qui revient au gouvernement fédéral. Si, comme dans l'exemple que nous avons pris, il s'agit d'une enquête effectuée par la police régionale de Peel uniquement, environ 90 p. 100 iraient à la province ou à la localité, et 10 p. 100 aux autorités fédérales, étant donné leur rôle dans les poursuites et d'autres formes de participation.

Le sénateur Neiman: Et les frais administratifs, par exemple.

M. Dambrot: Dans les cas où plusieurs forces policières sont intervenues, il faudra, quel que soit le régime, donner une indication de la nature de la contribution des différentes forces. L'idée que nous avons envisagée serait de demander au procureur, qui n'a pas d'intérêt dans l'affaire, ni du côté de la région de Peel, ni de celui de la police du Grand Toronto, de rédiger un rapport donnant des indications sur le rôle respectif des forces. Il appartiendrait ensuite au procureur général du Canada de fixer les pourcentages de chacun. C'est ainsi que se fera le partage. Il s'agit de chercher la formule la plus simple possible et celle qui coûtera le moins cher sur le plan administratif.

Le sénateur Neiman: Est-ce que c'est le procureur général du Canada qui prend la décision et donne des instructions au ministre des Approvisionnements et Services ou à l'organisme en cause quant à la répartition à faire?

M. Dambrot: C'est l'idée qui est envisagée.

[Text]

Mr. Normand: To return to your original question, clauses 22 to 29 deal with this situation to cover provinces. It amends the Narcotic Control Act and the Food and Drugs Act to provide for that.

Senator Lewis: If this bill were passed tomorrow, it may be quite some time before the regulations are made because it will depend on what arrangements are finally made with the provinces and/or the municipalities.

There is no urgency in having a bill at this stage which will state that something "shall be done", when in fact you will not be able to pass the regulations for quite some time.

Mr. Dambrot: In large measure, the urgency of the bill is because of the need to have the management resource in place. The absence has been a serious impediment for the greater success of the program. The greatest aspect of the urgency is for the management. If the bill is passed, moneys that are forfeited will be subject to the sharing; even if the sharing cannot take place until the regulations are completed, the moneys that are coming in will still be in the fund for that purpose.

Senator Stanbury: That will be an incentive to get a settlement.

The Chairman: What will be done with that money? Will it be kept in a bank?

Mr. Dambrot: It will go into the proceeds account under the scheme and be available for sharing once the regulations are in place.

The Chairman: It is true that it may help the agreement.

Senator Lewis: You mentioned the management scheme is to have an office set up in the Department of Supply and Services. How big an office will that be? Will the officials actually do the maintenance and management of the forfeited property, or will that be handled by an outside contract?

Mr. Dambrot: Mr. Bhumgara is here from the Department of Supply and Services and perhaps he could explain what is anticipated.

Mr. Noël Bhumgara, Director General, Science and Professional Directorate, Supply and Services Canada: Mr. Chairman, it is not anticipated that we will have a large core of people in the department to manage these assets. It is our intention to use the private sector to manage the assets, depending on the assets. In fact that is how we became involved with the ski hill project. We arranged the contract for the management of that ski hill on behalf of the RCMP.

By virtue of our ministry's mandate, we have been able to have contracting experience with a management services organization and a variety of other things that are in our own

M. Normand: Pour en revenir à votre question initiale, les articles 22 à 29 portent sur ce genre de situation dans le cas des provinces. La Loi sur les stupéfiants et la Loi sur les aliments et drogues sont modifiées en conséquence.

Le sénateur Lewis: Si ce projet de loi était adopté demain, il faudrait encore un certain temps avant que le règlement soit adopté, car tout dépend des ententes qui seront conclues avec les provinces et les municipalités.

Il n'est pas urgent d'adopter dès maintenant un projet disant que «quelque chose se fera» puisque vous ne pourrez pas prendre de règlement avant un certain temps.

M. Dambrot: Dans une grande mesure, le projet de loi est urgent parce qu'il faut mettre le dispositif de gestion en place. L'absence de ce dispositif a été un grave obstacle au succès du programme. C'est la gestion qui pose la plus grande urgence. Si le projet de loi est adopté, le produit des confiscations sera sujet à partage; même si le partage ne peut se faire avant que le règlement ne soit pris, l'argent sera tout de même versé dans le fonds à cette fin.

Le sénateur Stanbury: Cela favorisera la conclusion d'un règlement.

Le président: Que fera-t-on de cet argent? Sera-t-il gardé à la banque?

M. Dambrot: Il sera versé au compte des biens saisis et il pourra être partagé une fois le règlement adopté.

Le président: Il est vrai que cela peut favoriser la conclusion d'un accord.

Le sénateur Lewis: Vous avez dit que le régime serait appliqué par un service faisant partie du ministère des Approvisionnements et Services. Est-ce que ce sera un gros service? Est-ce que les fonctionnaires vont effectivement gérer les biens confisqués ou bien le travail sera-t-il confié à des contractuels?

M. Dambrot: Nous avons avec nous M. Bhumgara, du ministère des Approvisionnements et Services. Il pourrait expliquer ce qui est prévu.

M. Noël Bhumgara, directeur général, Direction générale des sciences et des services professionnels, Approvisionnements et Services Canada: Monsieur le président, nous ne prévoyons pas une très grande équipe pour gérer ces biens. Nous avons l'intention de faire appel au secteur privé pour assurer la gestion, tout dépendant des biens en cause. En fait, c'est de cette façon que nous en sommes venus à nous occuper du centre de ski. Au nom de la GRC, nous avons pris les dispositions pour conclure le marché de gestion de ce centre.

Vu le mandat de notre ministère, nous avons pu compter sur des compétences, dans une organisation des services de gestion et divers autres éléments de notre propre ministère. Nous department. It is contemplated that we will have a small core of people reporting to me, no more than a dozen at this time. That should be able to manage these matters for some time.

Senator Lewis: Would the cost of that office come out of the proceeds of the forfeited property?

Mr. Bhumgara: Yes. The cost of the office and the cost of managing the property itself, because there will be some costs associated with that.

Senator Stanbury: Mr. Bhumgara, I take it that you do not anticipate that this task will be so great as to require something like the Crown Assets Corporation?

Mr. Bhumgara: Certainly not. We do intend to use the Crown Assets Disposal Act to dispose of assets and for storage of movable assets, but that is a service.

Senator Stanbury: You do not need the machinery?

Mr. Bhumgara: This bill will give us all the administrative tools, in terms of the funding regimes, for us to manage these assets pending forfeiture and the disposal of the assets after forfeiture.

The Chairman: We kept the testimony of representatives of the Royal Canadian Mounted Police for the second part of the meeting. We will now hear from Mr. Ryan and Mr. Bowie.

Mr. J.T. Ryan, Chief Superintendent, Director, Drug Enforcement, Royal Canadian Mounted Police Headquarters: Mr. Chairman, members of the committee, on behalf of the Royal Canadian Mounted Police, I wish to thank you for the opportunity to appear before the committee to discuss this important piece of legislation.

The principal focus of our drug enforcement effort is directed against organized criminal groups that are active in the importation and distribution of large quantities of illicit drugs within Canada. The scope of the drug trade is international. The attack against powerful drug organizations, which extend across international boundaries, presents a unique challenge to the enforcement agencies of any country.

Despite the hundreds of millions of dollars expended on world-wide enforcement efforts over the last several decades, the international drug trade has continued to flourish, with crime groups growing more powerful.

Canadian seizures of illicit drugs have reached unprecedented levels: during the last three years, nearly 200,000 kilograms of cannabis were seized in Canada, double the total amount seized during the previous 15-year period. The envisageons une petite équipe qui relèvera de moi. Il ne devrait y avoir qu'une douzaine de personnes pour l'instant. Ce service devrait pouvoir assurer la gestion pendant un certain temps.

Le sénateur Lewis: Les coûts de ce service seront-ils payés sur le produit de l'aliénation des biens confisqués?

M. Bhumgara: Oui. Les frais de ce service et ceux de la gestion des biens, car cela représentera également des dépenses.

Le sénateur Stanbury: Monsieur Bhumgara, je crois comprendre que, selon vos prévisions, cette tâche ne sera pas lourde au point de justifier une organisation analogue au Centre de distribution des biens de la Couronne.

M. Bhumgara: Certainement pas. Nous allons effectivement nous prévaloir de la Loi sur les biens de surplus de la Couronne pour nous départir des biens et pour entreposer les biens meubles, mais il s'agit d'un service.

Le sénateur Stanbury: Vous n'avez pas besoin de tout un dispositif?

M. Bhumgara: Ce projet de loi nous donnera tous les moyens administratifs voulus, en ce qui concerne les régimes de financement, pour gérer les biens en attendant leur confiscation et pour nous en départir après la confiscation.

Le président: Nous avons gardé pour la deuxième partie de la réunion le témoignage des représentants de la Gendarmerie royale du Canada. Nous allons maintenant entendre MM. Ryan et Bowie.

M. J.T. Ryan, surintendant principal, directeur, Police des drogues, Administration centrale de la Gendarmerie royale du Canada: Monsieur le président, membres du comité, je voudrais vous remercier, au nom de la Gendarmerie royale du Canada, de m'avoir donné l'occasion de vous adresser la parole aujourd'hui au sujet de cet important projet de loi.

Dans ses efforts visant à réprimer le problème de la drogue, la GRC s'intéresse plus particulièrement aux organisations criminelles qui se livrent à l'importation et à la distribution de grandes quantités de drogues illicites au Canada. Le trafic des stupéfiants est un commerce d'envergure internationale, et la lutte contre les puissantes organisations de trafiquants qui débordent les frontières nationales constitue un défi unique pour les forces de l'ordre de tous les pays.

Malgré les centaines de millions de dollars qui ont été dépensés pour vaincre ce fléau au cours des dernières décennies, le trafic international des stupéfiants n'a pas cessé de prospérer, et les groupes de criminels sont encore plus puissants qu'auparavant.

Les saisies canadiennes de drogues illicites ont atteint de nouveaux sommets: durant les trois dernières années, presque 200 000 kilogrammes de cannabis ont été saisis au Canada. Ce montant représente le double du total saisi durant les quinze incidence of cocaine seizures is increasing at an even more dramatic rate. We have seized over seven tonnes of cocaine during the last three years. Despite seizures of this magnitude, we continue to experience full availability of illicit drugs throughout Canada, at lower prices, increased purity, and in greater volumes.

The profits available from the traffic in illicit drugs represents a double-edged threat to the success of conventional enforce measures; On the one hand, the potential for profit is a motivating factor which encourages new entrants to the drug trade; on the other hand, a criminal organization with accumulated financial resources is able to finance sophisticated importation and distribution networks, as well as being able to absorb periodic enforcement actions. As a result, the RCMP has, since 1981, focused on attacking the profits derived from the drug trade.

Our efforts in this regard were considerably enhanced by the enactment of the proceeds of crime legislation in January 1989. For the first time, police and prosecuting authorities in Canada were able to address all types of property generated by serious criminal offences, including real estate, business enterprises and bank accounts. Since 1989, the RCMP has initiated investigations which have resulted in asset seizures totalling nearly $83 million; forfeiture of assets valued at approximately $25 million have occurred in the same time period.

These new legal powers were, however, accompanied by significant problems associated with the nature of the assets being contemplated for seizure. The responsibility to effectively maintain the value of such property has presented considerable pressures on the human and financial resources of the police. Essentially, we were forced by circumstances to assume the roles of property and business managers, functions for which we have neither the money nor the expertise.

The management facility and budgetary flexibilities offered by this bill represent progressive and most welcome solutions to the problems we have experienced. Moreover, the provisions which would facilitate the sharing of the proceeds of forfeitures should function as an encouragement for greater application of this important investigative field.

We were pleased to have been afforded the opportunity to participate fully in the discussions which resulted in Bill C-123. This bill appears to be a worthwhile legislative initiative which should improve our effectiveness in attacking the proceeds generated by organized drug trafficking and other profitable criminal endeavours.

The Chairman: Are there any questions?

années précédentes. La fréquence des saisies de cocaïne augmente à un rythme encore plus alarmant. Ainsi, la GRC a déjà saisi plus de sept tonnes métrique de cocaïne durant les trois dernières années. Malgré ces coups de filet de la police, les drogues continuent d'abonder au pays, et on peut se les procurer à meilleur marché, en plus grandes quantités et à des niveaux de pureté plus élevés.

Les profits tirés du trafic des stupéfiants compromettent doublement le succès des mesures de répression conventionnelles: d'une part, l'appât du gain est un facteur incitatif qui attire de nouveaux criminels; d'autre part, l'organisation criminelle qui a su accumuler des richesses est en mesure de financer des réseaux d'importation et de distribution élaborés et aussi d'absorber des pertes périodiques attribuables aux actions policières. La GRC a donc résolu, en 1981, de s'attaquer aux profits provenant du trafic des stupéfiants.

Nos efforts dans ce domaine ont été considérablement intensifiés avec l'établissement en janvier 1989, de la Loi sur les produits de la criminalité. Pour la première fois, les services de police étaient en mesure de s'occuper de tous les types de biens accumulés au moyen de crimes graves tel que les biens immeubles, les entreprises commerciales et les fonds déposés dans les institutions financières. Depuis 1989, la GRC a entrepris des enquêtes qui ont rapporté environ 83 millions de dollars en biens saisis, et les confiscations se sont élevées à environ 25 millions.

Ces nouveaux pouvoirs accordés par la loi se sont toutefois accompagnés de problèmes importants liés à la nature des biens qui peuvent être saisis. La responsabilité de maintenir la valeur des biens saisis occasionne des difficultés aux services de police en matière de ressources financières et humaines. Essentiellement, ces services policiers ont été mis en position d'assumer le rôle et les responsabilités d'administrateurs d'immeubles ou d'entreprises commerciales. Or, ils n'ont ni les compétences ni l'argent nécessaires pour remplir ces fonctions.

Les avantages offerts par le projet de loi en matière de gestion et en matière budgétaire sont des solutions progressistes et fort bienvenues aux problèmes que nous avons éprouvés. De plus, les dispositions facilitant le partage du produit de l'aliénation des biens confisqués devraient encourager de meilleurs mesures d'application de la loi dans cet important domaine d'enquête.

Nous sommes heureux d'avoir pu participer activement aux discussions sur le projet de loi C-123. Ce projet de loi me semble être une mesure législative fort valable, qui devrait nous permettre d'atteindre une plus grande efficacité, puisque nous nous attaquerons aux profits que rapportent le trafic de la drogue et les autres activités criminelles lucratives.

Le président: Y a-t-il des questions?

An Act to amend the Criminal Code and Customs Tariff (child pornography and corrupting morals) (Bill C-128)

Citation 1993, c. 46, s. 5

Royal Assent August 1, 1993

Hansard

As a consequential amendment to the Customs Tariff Act the definition of child pornography will be incorporated in schedule VII to the tariff. This will provide customs officials with the necessary authority to ban the importation of these materials into Canada. This, of course, will be bad news for those individuals who would love to try to import this sort of material into the country. We have seen to it that they will continue to be blocked.

In summary, Bill C-128 will amend the Criminal Code to include a specific definition of child pornography and offences for the possession, production, distribution and sale of such materials as defined. It would subject those accused of these offences to greater penalties upon conviction than those currently associated with the obscenity sections of the Criminal Code.

• (1515)

We need to reinforce the message that children are in need of protection, that they are not appropriate sexual partners. Conduct which fosters and exploits the harm and humiliation to which children are exposed must be punished.

Bill C-128 supports the government's commitment to the well-being of children as outlined in the protection component of the Brighter Futures initiative which was announced by the Minister of National Health and Welfare in April of last year.

This bill is yet another step in ensuring a brighter future for all of Canada's children. I urge the members of this House to deal with this legislation expeditiously. If and when this becomes the law of Canada, and I believe it will, hon. members can take the satisfaction of going home this summer knowing that this country is a better place in which to live because we have criminalized the possession of child pornography.

[Translation]

Mr. Langlois: Mr. Speaker, I rise on a point of order.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): The hon. parliamentary secretary on a point of order.

Mr. Langlois: Mr. Speaker, if there is any time left when we have completed second reading of Bill C-128 today, I would like to request the unanimous consent of the House to proceed with third reading of Bill C-123 later today.

[English]

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): Does the hon. member have unanimous consent?

Some hon. members: Agreed.

Mr. George S. Rideout (Moncton): Mr. Speaker, it is a pleasure to rise on Bill C-128. I guess we could say that it is about time. There has been a flood of justice legislation over the last number of weeks. We are always faced with time constraints in trying to get legislation passed before Parliament is through for good and we are into an election.

We on this side are faced with the conundrum of not wanting to pass legislation in haste but at the same time wanting to do something that is good. We faced that dilemma with Bill C-126, the stalking bill. The committee met until last night at 10 o'clock to try to get a good bill before Parliament and finished before the session is over.

This is another example of a piece of good legislation that probably needs some fine-tuning by committee. I only hope the government will allow enough study of this particular bill while it is in committee. I hope it will not adopt the jackboot tactics it has used with other legislation, particularly Bill C-90, of trying to force legislation that needs to be studied through in a matter of hours or minutes.

That being said, we are supportive of this bill going to committee and receiving the necessary study. I do not think anyone would question that pornography has been with us almost since the beginning of history, from the time we learned how to draw.

We have seen the pornography industry grow from a $5 million industry in the seventies to a $10 billion business today. That is reprehensible when one considers that kind of money is generated from that kind of trade.

What is really even more reprehensible is the growth in child pornography. For that we say to the government: Good for you, that you are bringing this legislation forward. One thing that is a little irksome is that in the minister's own background documentation it says that the government has been urged to bring this legislation forward since 1984. Here we are in 1993, in the dying days of this Parliament, and now we are presented with the bill.

I hope not, but I think we should call Alan Borovoy before this committee and find out what more he has to say about this and we should examine the clauses of the bill.

Keith Kelly, who is the distinguished director of the Canadian Conference of the Arts and the Writers Guild, is concerned about the onus of proof in the bill. I will quote what he says in The Toronto Star to Mr. David Vienneau, a reporter for The Toronto Star. Mr. Kelly says:

> The defence of artistic merit exists but the burden of proof—and that is a costly burden—would rest with the person who is charged. We have some very real concerns about this.

Let us get him before the justice committee to tell us what the matter is.

I want to hear from my hon. friend from Saskatoon—Clark's Crossing who has had a private member's bill on this and has done a lot of work on it.

However let me recap as NDP justice critic. We are in favour of this bill. We are concerned about where it impinges on the artistic community and freedom of expression. Let us hear about that in the committee. We want to have an inclusive process. We want to tackle violent crime and at the same time we want to balance that with dealing with crime prevention. All too often the children, the victims of child pornography, end up being abusers themselves. We have to protect those children.

Mr. Chris Axworthy (Saskatoon—Clark's Crossing): Mr. Speaker, I am pleased to rise in support of the aims and objectives of this bill to criminalize child pornography and to make the possession of and all other activities dealing with child pornography a crime.

I would like to thank the member for Port Moody—Coquitlam and the member for Dartmouth for their support of my private member's bill. If that private member's bill had any small part to play in moving along the government then I am pleased that has happened.

It is late in the parliamentary session but I do not think that should prevent us from moving as quickly as possible on this bill. Like my colleagues who have already spoken I look forward to the passage of this bill. However I do have a couple of concerns that I would like to raise and have the government mull over. Hopefully in committee we can expeditiously deal with the issues, hear witnesses on some of these complex points and make the bill an even better bill. I will just briefly relate each one.

One that has been raised already is the issue of the definition of child pornography. It is never easy to define these subjects in pieces of legislation. I do think that we should look very carefully at the restrictive definition which, as has already been indicated, really narrows child pornography to the depiction of explicit sexual activity.

• (1545)

I think the vast majority of Canadians would view other areas than explicit sexual activity as pornographic when children are involved. We should explore the opportunity to expand that definition. At the moment I think it is too narrow.

Another point which is worth exploring is the issue of making importation or attempted importation of child pornography a criminal offence. That is not the case under this bill. It seems to me that it is not the case under any other legislation either.

It is clearly the case that child pornography brought into Canada if apprehended by the customs officers would be confiscated, but it is not clear that anybody would be committing an offence by importing or attempting to import it. We should look at that.

Also the bill does not cover pornographic performances involving children. Perhaps we should look at that.

Last, what we have seen in Canada with regard pornography but particularly with regard to child pornography because of the underground nature of it, is that new technology has enabled child pornography to be imported into Canada and then moved around the country very easily through the use of word processors and video recorders.

We need a process—and it was a part of my private member's bill—whereby from time to time we review the way in which child pornography is brought into Canada, produced in Canada and circulated within Canada because of the opportunities which are generated by new developments in technology. I suggest we do something like that.

While I support the government's intentions behind this bill and the thrust of it, and I know that my colleagues in the Liberal Party feel the same, there are a few things we should look at. I look forward to exploring those in the committee.

to prohibit pseudo child pornography, that is, where adult models are presented to appear as children. This type of pornography also promotes the sexual use and exploitation of children and conveys the message that children are appropriate objects of sexual interests.

The offences of production, distribution, and sale of child pornography would be subject to terms of imprisonment to a maximum of ten years. The offence of possession of child pornography would be subject to a term of imprisonment not exceeding five years.

Bill C-128 includes a defence of artistic merit or of an educational, scientific, or medical purpose. It is essential to include this defence in the proposed legislation in order to protect the rights of freedom of expression, which are entrenched in section 2(b) of the Canadian Charter of Rights and Freedoms, and to ensure that reach of the legislation does not extend to forms of expression that the courts consider beneficial to society.

There are also a number of consequential amendments to the Criminal Code contained in clauses 4 and 5 of Bill C-128. These amendments would include the child pornography offences in the definition of offence in part VI of the Criminal Code so that the electronic surveillance provisions will apply.

Additionally, the definition of child pornography is included in the definition of enterprise crime offence in part XII.2 of the Criminal Code so that they will fall under the proceeds of crime provisions.

Clause 6 of the bill sets out consequential amendment to the customs tariff, which incorporates the definition of child pornography in schedule 7 to the tariff, in order to provide customs officials with specific authority to ban the importation of these materials into Canada.

• 1015

Finally, clause 1 of the bill amends subsections of section 163 of the Criminal Code in order to ensure conformity with the charter in response to current case law.

Mr. Chairman, that is an outline of the contents of the bill. Ms Lieff and I will be happy to answer any questions that committee members may have.

The Chairman: Thank you very much. I'm sure we have a few questions we'd like to ask you. We'll begin with Mr. Wappel.

Mr. Wappel: Do you have any information on whether or not there are going to be any government amendments proposed to this legislation?

Mr. Piragoff: We'll see what happens. We will take the benefit of the hearings and see what witnesses propose. But at this time we don't propose any. It's really not up to the officials to propose any. It's up to the government to decide whether they wish to bring forward amendments.

Mr. Wappel: Well, that's what I'm asking you. Has the government indicated to you, to the best of your knowledge, that they would like to bring forward any amendments to this bill?

Mr. Piragoff: I have no idea what the government is thinking.

pornographie juvénile, c'est-à-dire les cas où des personnages adultes sont présentés comme s'ils étaient des enfants. Ce type de pornographie encourage aussi l'utilisation et l'exploitation sexuelles des enfants et véhicule le message selon lequel ces derniers peuvent faire l'objet de désirs sexuels.

Les infractions relatives à la production, la distribution et la vente de pornographie juvénile seraient passibles d'un emprisonnement maximal de dix ans. La possession de pornographie juvénile serait passible d'un emprisonnement maximal de cinq ans.

Le projet de loi C-128 prévoit un moyen de défense si la représentation a une valeur artistique ou un but éducatif, scientifique ou médical. Ce moyen de défense est essentiel pour protéger la liberté d'expression, qui est enchâssée dans l'article 2(b) de la Charte canadienne des droits et libertés, et pour s'assurer que les dispositions du projet de loi ne s'appliquent pas aux formes d'expression que les tribunaux jugent utiles à la société.

Dans les articles 4 et 5 du projet de loi C-128, il y a aussi un certain nombre d'amendements corrélatifs au Code criminel. Ces amendements ajoutent les infractions de pornographie juvénile à la définition de l'infraction dans la Partie VI du Code criminel afin que l'on puisse appliquer les dispositions relatives à la surveillance électronique.

De plus, la définition de la pornographie juvénile est incluse dans celle de l'infraction de criminalité organisée dans la Partie XII.(2) du Code criminel; ainsi, elle sera visée par les dispositions relatives aux produits de la criminalité.

L'article 6 du projet de loi énonce l'amendement corrélatif au Tarif des douanes, qui incorpore la définition de la pornographie juvénile dans l'annexe 7 du Tarif, afin de donner aux autorités douanières le pouvoir effectif d'interdire l'importation de cette pornographie au Canada.

Enfin, l'article 1 du projet de loi modifie les paragraphes de l'article 163 du Code criminel afin d'assurer la concordance avec la Charte compte tenu de la jurisprudence actuelle.

Monsieur le président, voilà donc brièvement la teneur du projet de loi. M[me] Lieff et moi-même serons heureux de répondre aux questions des membres du comité.

Le président: Merci beaucoup. Je suis sûr que nous avons quelques questions à vous poser. Nous commencerons avec M. Wappel.

M. Wappel: Savez-vous si le gouvernement va proposer des amendements à ce projet de loi?

M. Piragoff: Nous verrons ce qui va se passer. Nous allons suivre les audiences et voir ce que les témoins proposeront. Pour l'instant, nous n'avons rien à proposer. En réalité, il n'appartient pas aux fonctionnaires de proposer quoi que ce soit. C'est le gouvernement qui doit décider s'il veut présenter des amendements.

M. Wappel: Eh bien, voilà ce que je vous demande. Autant que vous sachiez, le gouvernement vous a-t-il indiqué qu'il veut proposer des amendements à ce projet de loi?

M. Piragoff: Je n'ai aucune idée de ce que le gouvernement pense.

[Text]

The Chairman: There is, obviously, also the problem the courts will face. The Supreme Court of Canada has to interpret the Constitution and the Criminal Code. If the legislation is very vague, greater power is given to the judges. This is a difficulty which, in cases involving obscenity and pornography, perhaps, cannot be avoided. In other words, to a certain extent it has to be left to the courts.

Mr. Blais: The point of possession was raised by Senator Lewis at the beginning of his remarks. Since all that material is circulating underground, possession has to be targeted. If possession is not targeted, the real problem cannot be addressed. As soon as people know that possession is a crime, the situation will become quite different. At the moment it is not a crime to possess such a video or other material. Once this bill is passed it will become a crime. From my point of view, one of the major elements of this bill is contained in subclause (4).

Senator Stanbury: One of our witnesses earlier this morning made the point that the amendment in clause 163.1(b) has had an effect on the offence of explicit sexual activity. I am not sure I can explain exactly what the witness had in mind. The fact that has been added has excluded that particular aspect of the charge from the explicit sexual activity definition or the nature of the offence in clause 163.1(a)(i). Adding paragraph (b) has affected the impact of paragraph (a).

Mr. Blais: I am not sure I understand the question.

Senator Stanbury: Mr. Henry is in the room and perhaps he could speak to you later, Mr. Minister.

Mr. Blais: It should be remembered that "...the dominant characteristic of which..." has been added. This is another element which was forgotten for some time.

The Chairman: It was there for a century.

Senator Lewis: I appreciate the problem you had in the past with obscenity and pornography prosecutions.

Mr. Blais: It was not easy. Perhaps that is the reason why it was not done before.

Senator Lewis: Following our session last week on Bill C-123 relating to the disposal of proceeds of crime, I would like to direct your attention to the seizure clauses of this bill. It is interesting to note that on page 4 of the bill it states that where this material is seized and forfeited, the court shall make an order declaring the matter "...forfeited to Her Majesty in the right of the province." This is not really relevant to what we are discussing today, but it follows from Bill C-123 which dealt with the proceeds of crime. Under this bill will the proceeds go to the province?

[Traduction]

Le président: Évidemment, les tribunaux vont se trouver également face à un problème. La Cour suprême du Canada doit interpréter la Constitution et le Code criminel. Si la loi est trop vague, cela confère davantage de pouvoirs aux juges. C'est un problème qu'il n'est peut-être pas possible d'éviter dans les cas d'obscénité et de pornographie. Autrement dit, il faut laisser une plus grande latitude aux tribunaux.

M. Blais: Le sénateur Lewis a soulevé tout à l'heure la question de la possession. Comme toute cette pornographie est distribuée sous le manteau, nous devons nous attaquer à la possession faute de quoi nous ne remédierons pas au problème. Dès que les gens sauront que la possession est un acte criminel, la situation va changer. Pour le moment, ce n'est pas un crime que de posséder de la pornographie juvénile sous forme de vidéo ou autre. Une fois ce projet de loi adopté, cela deviendra un acte criminel. J'estime que l'un des principaux éléments de ce projet de loi figure au paragraphe (4).

Le sénateur Stanbury: L'un de nos témoins de ce matin a déclaré que la modification apportée au paragraphe 163.1b) avait des répercussions sur l'infraction relative à l'activité sexuelle explicite. Je ne suis pas certain de pouvoir expliquer exactement ce que le témoin voulait dire. Ce qui a été ajouté a exclu cet aspect particulier de l'accusation de la définition de l'activité sexuelle explicite ou de la nature de l'infraction prévue au sous-alinéa 163.1 (1)a)(i). L'ajout de l'alinéa b) s'est répercuté sur la portée de l'alinéa a).

M. Blais: Je ne suis pas certain d'avoir compris votre question.

Le sénateur Stanbury: M. Henry est dans la salle et peut-être pourrait-il vous l'expliquer tout à l'heure, monsieur le ministre.

M. Blais: N'oublions pas que nous avons ajouté «...dont la caractéristique dominante...». C'est un autre élément qui avait été oublié pendant un certain temps.

Le président: Il était là depuis un siècle.

Le sénateur Lewis: Je sais que vous avez eu des difficultés, par le passé, dans les cas de poursuites pour obscénité et pornographie.

M. Blais: Ce n'était pas facile. C'est peut-être la raison pour laquelle on ne l'a pas fait avant.

Le sénateur Lewis: À la suite de notre audience de la semaine dernière sur le projet de loi C-123 concernant les produits de la criminalité, je voudrais attirer votre attention sur les articles de ce projet de loi concernant la saisie. À la page 4 il est dit «...confisquée au profit de Sa Majesté du chef de la province». Ce n'est pas vraiment en rapport avec ce dont nous discutons aujourd'hui, mais cela découle du projet de loi C-123 concernant les produits de la criminalité. Selon ce projet de loi, la pornographie saisie est confisquée par la province?

[Text]

Mr. Blais: The provinces are dealing with the prosecutions themselves and that is why this clause is worded in this way. Other legislation also deals with the proceeds of crime. I presume that those documents or those videos will be destroyed, but it will be done under the control of the provinces, given that the provinces are involved in the procedure. It will avoid duplication by the federal officials and provincial officials involved. It is a correlation clause.

Senator Lewis: Although it is not really relevant to our present discussion, I was curious to hear your remarks.

Mr. Blais: We have to ensure that those documents do not return to the public domain.

Senator Lewis: If they are to be forfeited and sold, what is the province to do with them? They should be destroyed.

Mr. Blais: They will be destroyed. They will not be sold. In some drug seizures there may also be videos and perhaps money. In some cases the videos may be destroyed, but there may also be equipment which could be sold for, say, $1,000.

I do not have those details. It is up to the provinces to make those decisions in each situation. However, I can assure you that those documents and pornographic items will not go back on the market.

Senator Lewis: Section 163.1(6), on page 3 of the bill, deals with what it calls defences. That seems to be a direction that the court shall find an accused not guilty if the representation or written material that is alleged to constitute child pornography has artistic merit or an educational, scientific or medical purpose.

There seems to be some confusion as to where the onus lies. From what you said earlier, you feel that the accused does not have to prove that the work in question has artistic merit; that the accused need only raise the matter.

I am wondering whether that is the case, because the bill says it is a defence, and it is also a direction to the court. Where is the onus in that case?

Mr. Blais: The onus will be on the prosecution to prove beyond a reasonable doubt that the representation does not have artistic merit, and so on.

The Chairman: We have two theories on this. Some say it is the Crown, others say it is the accused.

[Traduction]

M. Blais: Ce sont les provinces qui s'occupent des poursuites et voilà pourquoi cet article est ainsi libellé. D'autres mesures législatives portent sur les produits de la criminalité. Je suppose que ces documents ou vidéos seront détruits, mais cela se fera sous le contrôle des provinces étant donné que ce sont elles qui se chargent des poursuites. Cela évitera un chevauchement inutile des responsabilités des fonctionnaires fédéraux et provinciaux. Il s'agit d'une disposition corrélative.

Le sénateur Lewis: Même si ce n'est pas directement en rapport avec l'objet de notre discussion, je voulais savoir ce que vous en diriez.

M. Blais: Nous devons veiller à ce que ces documents ne soient pas remis en circulation.

Le sénateur Lewis: S'ils sont confisqués, que va en faire la province? Ils devraient être détruits.

M. Blais: Ils seront détruits. Ils ne seront pas vendus. Dans certaines saisies de drogue, il peut y avoir des vidéos et peut-être aussi de l'argent. Dans certains cas, les vidéos peuvent être détruits, mais il peut y avoir également de l'équipement qui peut être vendu pour 1 000 $, par exemple.

Je n'ai pas de précision à cet égard. C'est aux provinces qu'il incombe de prendre une décision dans chaque cas. Je peux toutefois vous assurer que cette pornographie ne sera pas remise en circulation.

Le sénateur Lewis: Le paragraphe 163.1(6), à la page 3 du projet de loi, traite des moyens de défense. Il semble ordonner au tribunal de déclarer le prévenu non coupable si la représentation ou l'écrit qui constituerait de la pornographie juvénile a une valeur artistique ou un but éducatif, scientifique ou médical.

On ne semble pas d'accord pour ce qui est du fardeau de la preuve. D'après ce que vous avez dit tout à l'heure, vous estimez que l'accusé n'a pas à prouver que l'oeuvre en question a une valeur artistique et qu'il lui suffit d'invoquer cet argument pour sa défense.

Je me demande si c'est vraiment le cas étant donné que le projet de loi dit qu'il s'agit d'un moyen de défense et qu'il donne également une directive au tribunal. À qui incombe le fardeau de la preuve dans ce cas?

M. Blais: Le fardeau de la preuve revient à la poursuite qui devra prouver, hors de tout doute raisonnable, que la représentation en question n'a pas de valeur artistique, et cetera.

Le président: Nous avons deux théories à cet égard. Certains disent que c'est à la Couronne d'en faire la preuve et d'autres que c'est à l'accusé.

If the Liberal Party would allow a free vote on this bill I think we would really see whether there is broad public support for this. We would see whether that is true, as the minister claims.

I think it would prove that the Liberal Party believes in true democracy between elections as well as during them. I wish it would come clean on this issue and allow that free vote to take place.

Whether a Canadian is a gun owner or not here are some principles on which this legislation should be judged. I encourage every voter to inform themselves, to judge this legislation against their own personal beliefs, not what the government, not what the media, not what the politicians are telling them. This is one nasty piece of legislation. It will affect not only our lives but also the lives of our children and our grandchildren.

The Minister of Justice is right, the legislation is about the kind of country we want to live in. Canadians owe it to themselves and the next generation to get it right. Their safety, the safety of their families, their friends, their homes and their properties is at stake.

If Canadians believe in less government and less bureaucracy then they will not support this gun control bill. If Canadians believe in less government spending then they will not support this bill. If Canadians believe in lower taxes, they will not support this gun control bill. If Canadians believe in personal freedom and personal responsibility, then they will not support this gun control legislation. If Canadians believe in every citizen's right to private property, then they will definitely not support this gun control legislation.

● (1525)

If Canadians believe in true equality and that the law should be applied equally regardless of their race or where they live, then they will not like what they read in this gun control bill. If Canadians believe in every citizen's constitutional right to life, liberty and security of the person, then they will oppose this gun control bill with every ounce of energy they have.

If Canadians believe in everyone's right and responsibility to defend themselves, their family, their property and their home, as described in the Criminal Code of Canada, then they will not like what they read in this gun control bill. If Canadians believe the federal government should not interfere in areas of provincial jurisdiction, then they will not support this gun control bill.

A recent survey conducted by Simon Fraser University learned that support for the Liberal Party's firearm registration system drops significantly as the respondents' knowledge of existing gun control laws increases and the full cost of the measures is understood.

In his attempts to confuse the issue of gun control with the issue of crime control, the minister has included some things in his legislation which I support. I maintain that if the Minister of Justice is really interested in public safety he will divide this bill into two parts. Part one would be crime control and part two would be gun control. Even though there are some monumental flaws with the crime control provisions of the bill, I think we could fix those and ensure easy passage through the House so that the police could use these tools to put real criminals behind bars where they should be.

Here is a list of measures in the bill which I think could be modified and amended and which I could support because they truly concern crime. I would support the four-year mandatory minimum sentence for the 10 violent offences committed with a firearm as long as the word firearm was replaced with the word weapon. More people are murdered with knives and other weapons than with guns. I think any criminal who uses a weapon in the commission of a crime should be subject to the same mandatory jail term.

I support using section 85 of the Criminal Code effectively, but again this mandatory sentencing provision should be extended to any weapon used in a crime, not just firearms.

I support the lifetime prohibition from possessing a restricted weapon for the conviction of violent crimes. I also support the inclusion of replica or imitation firearms under section 85 of the Criminal Code. I support the new offences for large scale smuggling and trafficking of firearms. I support the new offences for possessing stolen or smuggled firearms of a one-year minimum jail sentence. I support adding firearms trafficking to the list of enterprise crime offences.

I oppose the banning of 553,000 handguns. I oppose the banning of 19,000 restricted firearms. However, I support the proposed firearms possession certificate, in principle anyway. I support the offence for failing to report a lost or stolen firearm. I support the 10-year prohibition on possession of firearms to those convicted of serious firearms offences. I support the prohibition on possession of firearms for those convicted of stalking and drug offences. I support the tighter border controls, the inspection procedures by Canada customs. Also, I support the forfeiture of vehicles used in smuggling contraband and the proceeds of smuggling activities. I support the requirement for import-export permits for firearms moving across the border for commercial use.

I also support the requirement to record the entry or exit of firearms to or from Canada by tourists and outfitters. I add that these people bring hundreds of millions of dollars into our country, creating thousands of jobs and tourists should not be needlessly harassed at our borders.

I support the provision of minor's permits for persons between 12 and 18 to acquire firearms. I support the extension of authority to approve firearm safety courses to the provinces.

I also support the creation of a separate safety course for handgun users and I support the use of valuable police time and scarce tax revenues on cost effective crime control.

● (1530)

This is a list of the things I support. Because gun control measures will do next to nothing to deter real criminals from obtaining or using firearms, and because these measures are not a cost effective way of improving public safety, I will vote against the bill unless they are changed.

Here is a list of reasons why I am opposed to the gun control legislation. I oppose the mandatory registration of all rifles and shotguns and the provision that would make failing to register them a criminal offence. This will do nothing but make criminals out of law-abiding people.

Here are a few reasons why I oppose mandatory registration of all rifles and shotguns. It will cost hundreds of millions of dollars. It is not a cost effective way of improving public safety or saving lives. It will not help police investigate and prosecute violent criminals. It will not alter police procedures for dealing with domestic disputes. It will not reduce the use of firearms in violent crime.

It will keep the police off the street and in the office, not where they should be. It will require more government bureaucracy, not less. It will require an increase in taxes in the form of registration fees. It will also require other members of society to pay those taxes because the initial registration fees will be waived. It will target law-abiding responsible gun owners, not real criminals. It will help trace firearms but tracing will serve no real useful purpose.

Gun smugglers can already be identified without a registration system. Handgun registration has been in effect since 1934 and has not reduced handgun crime. Registration has been tried and failed in Australia and New Zealand. Hundreds of millions could save more lives if spent elsewhere.

It will have a negative effect on a billion dollar economy. It will undermine respect for the law. I cannot emphasize this more. There are jokes going around. There are ads in the newspapers in my province showing people how to hide their guns. They openly advocate that this law will not be complied with.

We have a huge problem when we put in place a law that everyone regards as being useless. It undermines respect for the law, and we must take that into consideration. We need to maintain that respect. People know this will do nothing to make society safer. In fact it will do the exact opposite. I do not have time today to go into them but there are very valid reasons for opposing the legislation because it will actually increase the risk for most people.

I am particularly opposed to the extreme penalties for persons failing to register their rifles and shotguns: a one-year mandatory jail term and up to 10 years in jail if one fails to fill out that little card the minister says is so easy. Denis Lortie killed three people and only spent 10 years in jail. Where is the justice in this legislation? It defies common sense.

I also oppose the added tax burden on law-abiding citizens, the responsible gun owners, through registration fees, permit fees, and renewal fees. Like I said before, I oppose the banning of legally owned handguns, scary looking semi-automatic rifles and so on, and the banning of all replica toy guns. I oppose those kinds of measures.

I oppose the restrictions on crossbows, the banning of one-hand crossbows and the additional restrictions on air guns. I oppose the prohibition and confiscation of guns without fair, just and timely compensation. I oppose the confiscation of thousands of firearms without compensation when the owner dies.

I oppose the use it or lose it provision which requires law-abiding handgun owners to re-establish their reason for owning a handgun every five years. I oppose the proposed controls on the purchase of ammunition and the additional and unnecessary controls on legitimate gun collectors. I oppose the prohibition of entire households from having firearms because of the actions of a single resident.

● (1535)

I oppose the exemption of certain Canadian citizens from firearms prohibition orders. All Canadians should be treated equally under the law and in this case under this law. I oppose the requirement of an import-export permit for bringing a personal use firearm into Canada.

I oppose the expanded use of orders in council to restrict or prohibit firearms. I oppose the different application of the firearms laws for remote and aboriginal communities. Canadians should be treated equally regardless of where they live, regardless of their race, and regardless of their occupation. I oppose the waste of valuable police time and scarce tax revenue on useless, ineffective gun controls.

I have 28 amendments here. At this time I will not read them all out. I have gone through a lot of things already. I think we need to have a debate because there are many things that need to be addressed. I will hold this up at a later date.

In closing, I make five recommendations to the government. I recommend holding separate votes for crime control provisions and gun control provisions. We should separate those.

I recommend early passage of crime control provisions with consideration of Reform amendments to really get tough on violent criminals.

the application. This is followed by a 28-day mandatory waiting period during which a firearms officer can conduct an investigation on applicants. Upon completion the applicants must then pass a course or test on the safe handling and use of firearms and the laws relating to them. The applicant is then photographed and his or her certificate is processed centrally by the chief provincial or territorial firearms officer. What more can you do?

In the time it takes one legal gun owner to go through this process, thousands of stolen or smuggled guns will change hands in the streets. That is the problem. If this government would take more time to identify the right problem, it would find 60 per cent of the solution.

The national debt is the problem. The deficit is a contributing factor. That is why we have to get to a zero deficit, not just 3 per cent of GDP. The lack of deterrence for the criminal misuse of firearms is the problem. Registration is not even a contributing factor.

The Liberals are identifying the wrong problem. The Minister of Justice stated in the House that last year an estimated 375,000 weapons were smuggled into Canada. In the same breath he went on to say last year approximately 3,800 firearms were lost or stolen by those who lawfully own them in Canada. In the years since 1974 a cumulative total of 65,000 firearms have been stolen or lost, not recovered.

There were 3,800 stolen or lost weapons as opposed to 375,000 smuggled guns, yet the main emphasis of our new gun control laws will be registration for legal gun owners. I believe that instead of throwing millions of dollars toward registration we should look at all possible ways to beef up our security at borders.

Let us do everything in our power to stop the 375,000 guns from finding their way into hands of criminals. Let us send a clear message to the people who bring them across the border that if they get caught, they will not just get a slap on the wrist or a fine, but a guarantee of time behind bars.

Currently we have mandatory sentences for firearms offences that are not enforced because they are plea bargained away. Therefore a mandatory sentence is utterly meaningless and useless. I can see the need for a crown prosecutor to have some latitude in handling a case. The flexibility that plea bargaining offers is intended to lead to a conviction. I realize it is necessary, but not the outright elimination of a mandatory sentence. It should be a reduced sentence.

• (1650)

A national firearms registry flies directly in the face of today's reality which is that the vast majority of people want less government regulation and intrusion in their lives, not more. A 10-year jail term for failure to register and the right to register a firearm and the right to search and seizure without a warrant are incomprehensible.

Are we headed for a police state if this bill passes in its present form? Is the minister not willing to separate the bill and debate the two separate issues? He knows full well that they are two separate issues. He knows that this party would support the amendments to the Criminal Code to make it tougher on crime. He knows he would get our support.

Why bother with this national registration issue with the same bill? Separate the two. Have the courage and conviction to have a true and honest debate. People are sick and tired of hearing about the rights of criminals. They want them caught. They want them off the streets. They want them punished and, above all, they want laws that will make people think twice about becoming criminals in the first place.

Mr. Sarkis Assadourian (Don Valley North, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, 128 years ago our founding fathers came together, gave this House power to enact laws, to ensure peace, order and good government in Canada.

Even President Clinton on his visit to this country on February 23 said Canada has shown to the world how to balance freedom with compassion and tradition with innovation. Canada set the example for the rest of the world on many occasions. This certainly is one of those occasions when we can say to the world that we set the standards and we make the examples for the rest to follow.

On October 25, 1993 the people of Canada voted for the Liberal Party. In the red book we made a promise to make our streets safe and offload the guns. Bill C-68 goes in that direction.

Public support for this bill has been enormous, 80 per cent to 85 per cent. Even in Alberta we are told 62 per cent of the population supports the bill. In my riding of Don Valley North, which I am proud to represent, 90 per cent of the population supports this bill.

In my riding I received only seven or eight representations opposing the bill. Out of those, one of them was a U.S. citizen complaining about the bill. When I asked him why he does not complain to U.S. senators, he said he lives here and has to complain to me.

Many of us receive many letters from various organizations and individuals regarding Bill C-68. I received maybe 200 letters from various parts of the country. One said in part: "It has come to my attention that someone has sent a number of misleading letters to various members of Parliament and some Reformers, including yourself".

These letters are on the subject of government policy proposals and gun controls. One says in part: "Many of these letters bear my name and address and are signed but were not written, signed or sent by me. My signature is false. I believe you have illegal importation or smuggling of guns into this country? There it appears everyone is in agreement. That aspect is good.

However, one has to look at that aspect practically. How do we control such a provision? Such a provision cannot be effectively dealt with without registration. Without registration such an aspect cannot be dealt with whatsoever. It appears a phobia has taken over with respect to registration, that this is a restriction on legitimate gun owners.

I own a gun. How the filling out of a page, signing it and sending it in to the appropriate authorities is going to restrict me in any way with that gun is a matter I do not understand to this day. There is absolutely no restriction on legitimate gun owners.

We have to deal with the question of registration and what its possible benefits are. Sure, we have many legitimate gun owners. There are people, the criminal element, who use guns and obviously do not register them after they have stolen them or come to have them in some other way.

We have to make sure the legitimate gun owners show some responsibility. Being a legitimate gun owner means storing guns properly, which matter has been often overlooked in this country. Storage is crucial in keeping guns out of the hands of the criminal element which has used this as a source of getting guns. There are break-ins to homes where guns are not properly stored. Guns are stolen from homes of legitimate gun owners who do not properly store them.

They have to pay a price for that. That price is an offence if they do not properly store their guns. If they do not properly store their guns, they will be charged. That matter has been in effect for many years, but has not been properly enforced or the mechanism has not been in place. With registration there will be more responsibility on the part of the gun owners.

■ (1110)

As the Canadian Association of Chiefs of Police put it, the registration of firearms will help control smuggling, gun theft and the misuse of legal firearms. It continued to explain what is meant by this.

The association indicated that with respect to smuggling, guns do not have to be smuggled into this country; they can be brought in legitimately. Any member in this House who has a proper certificate can bring a dozen guns into the country.

Under the current system, the type of guns, the number of guns, and the serial numbers of the guns are not tracked when they come into Canada. A recent report indicated that customs officers are more focused on the value of the gun shipments than on any other aspect.

Once these guns are in the country, we do not know what happens to them. We lose complete track of them as to whether they get into the hands of illegitimate gun owners, et cetera. That matter will be taken care of if registration comes about.

Registration will leave a paper trail. The guns will be traced back to the source to determine how they got into illegitimate hands, if they have transferred to such hands, once they have come into the country.

Not always but generally, guns that are stolen have not been properly stored. Registration will promote safe storage which will reduce gun theft as well as reduce suicides and accidents.

One may say, how will it reduce suicides? Safe storage generally prevents the gun from getting into the hands of a person who is in a temporary state of depression. Again, as the chiefs of police so eloquently put it in their report on this matter, suicide is a permanent solution to a temporary problem.

A person with a problem becomes depressed and if there is easy access to a gun, deals with the problem on the spur of the moment. If access to the storage container is just a little more difficult, especially for young people, and if they do not have access to the ammunition, a temporary problem may pass and the permanent solution will not occur.

Certainly that is an important factor. If we can save some lives from suicides, that would be an important factor for us. That aspect and the suicides in this country are matters we have to look at very closely. It is important to prevent the senseless loss of young people's lives, those people who have been unable to deal with temporary situations and have immediately dealt with them by ending their own lives with a gun.

Of course, there is the question of collectors. No one believes that collectors should be disarmed of their gun collections. That matter can be dealt with in committee. No one indicates that firearms safety is not an important factor.

What we have to understand is that registration will in no way whatsoever cause any restrictions on legitimate gun owners. The filing of the certificate once in a lifetime for a gun is not a restriction but it is certainly a help to the authorities in enforcing the laws. It is not a restriction whatsoever on anyone in society. The question really is, what is the problem?

[Translation]

Mr. Bob Ringma (Nanaimo—Cowichan, Ref.): Mr. Speaker, it is with pleasure that I rise today to address this House and the people of Canada in support of the motion put forth by my hon. colleague from Yorkton—Melville.

■ (1115)

This motion suggests that firearms control and crime control be addressed separately by dividing Bill C-68 in two. By making the two issues of lawful possession of firearms and their use for criminal purposes separate, this amendment could help introduce nuance and sophistication in this debate on firearms

• (1130)

There is evidence that despite some very good material on current gun laws most Canadians lack a basic understanding of the measures already in place. Before adding to the law it is essential to find out if education programs are working. If they are not, let us fix them. Because many people are not aware of the control and limits on private firearm ownership, many do not distinguish between the legal firearm owner and user and the criminal who uses guns.

It has been argued that the lack of public awareness about the existing law extends to gun owners and law enforcement officials. This prevents the law from being applied properly. It also may prevent those directly involved in or aware of dangerous situations from informing the police and preventing tragedies.

The federal and provincial governments need to sponsor an effective public education program to inform Canadians of all aspects of current gun control laws. They should at least wait to see if current laws are working before imposing what may be unnecessary limits on Canadians. Public safety balanced with the rights of legitimate law-abiding gun owners should be the guiding principle for any changes.

The minister should also remember that for many Canadians, especially aboriginal peoples and those living in the north, firearm use is a part of their tradition and culture and may be necessary for survival. For others such as farmers, hunters and sportsmen, firearm expertise is a part of the job or a legitimate hobby.

The new bill also prohibits gun collectors from leaving their guns to members of their families after death. A number of gun collectors have come to me very concerned about this. I cannot believe the minister understands any of this when he called—as he did at the Canadian Club—lawful, responsible gun owners who disagree with parts of his bill an American style gun lobby. Comments like this show he is not recognizing, let alone understanding, the reality of many Canadians.

I believe in public safety. I believe in the kind of public safety brought about by effective laws that protect the victims and punish the criminals. I am not convinced the measures in this bill will do that.

Mr. Andy Mitchell (Parry Sound—Muskoka, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, I appreciate the opportunity to talk about Bill C-68, the firearms legislation.

As a representative from rural Ontario I have some concerns about the legislation which I intend to address in a minute. I want to express both my support and the support of my constituents for the minister's objective to curb violence in our society. That is the intent of the legislation and I fully share that. My constituents share that. It is a worthwhile objective. The debate on Bill C-68 is about the best method to curb violence in our society.

I support a number of the things the minister has proposed. I support increased criminal sanctions for the illegal use of a firearm. On average right now it is about 16 months for committing those 10 designated offences. Under this legislation it would be four years, an increase of 300 per cent in the sentence.

I agree with the sanctions individuals will have to absorb if they are caught smuggling firearms. I agree with his direction to provincial attorneys if they have evidence not to bargain away a firearms offence, go to court and find the individual guilty.

I agree with an enterprise crime for the smuggling of firearms. If someone is caught doing it, the assets they have gained can be seized by the crown and used for further criminal control. I agree with increased border controls, recognizing that we will not be able to stop every vehicle that crosses the border. If we are able to reduce it by 20 per cent or 30 per cent, it is better than not doing anything. I agree with his interdiction activities.

I was very pleased to hear that the minister agreed there are legitimate uses of firearms. He agreed that hunting is a valid pastime. He agreed that target shooting is a valid sport. He agreed that collectors have a right to collect.

• (1135)

He talked about the needs for pest control and the needs of trappers. I agree with that. I agree with his statement of the economic impact hunting has on areas like mine. Every fall thousands of people travel to Parry Sound—Muskoka to participate in hunting. They have a significant economic impact on my area.

I hope the committee studying the bill looks at ways of having that support better enshrined in the legislation because it is an important concept which should be in the legislation.

I do not agree with the comments by some of my colleagues opposite regarding self-defence. I agree fully with the minister that police officers and military officers should carry firearms for self-defence. I do not agree with arming civilians for the sole purpose of self-defence against criminals. We are not the United States. We do not settle our arguments at the end of a gun barrel. That does mean there are not legitimate uses like hunting, target shooting and gun collecting. We have to make the distinction between the two.

I have some concerns regarding some of the proposals, particularly related to registration. The minister has suggested we are going to spend $85 million to register firearms. I want to be clear that is the best way to control violence.

The minister said registration will not stop a criminal from using an illegal weapon. He indicated it will not stop somebody remember that the good things in this bill can be supported by almost every Canadian. However, there are matters in it that affect the average Canadian. These must be corrected. There are things in this bill that affect estates. I want to see some of those corrected in committee.

• (1200)

I have voted over 2,000 times in the House of Commons and on only one occasion have I voted against the government. If further changes are not made to this legislation, I am afraid I am going to have to see the second time that I will vote against my own government. That does not sit well with me personally because I am a loyalist and a constructive worker trying to get things done. I do not want to vote against this bill, but if I must, I will. My constituents are not part of the problem with their hunting and their sports clubs that operate throughout the area.

Mr. Jim Abbott (Kootenay East, Ref.): Mr. Speaker, I respect the comments of the preceding speaker. I suggest to him that he seriously consider what we are debating today, which is an amendment by the Reform Party to split the bill into the parts that he and I agree are workable and necessary.

I also refer to the comments of my Reform colleague from Nanaimo—Cowichan. He spoke about the amendment to split the bill as being a practical solution.

For the benefit of the justice minister and his staff, I would like to set my speech around some things that have been in the public domain that his staff should have brought to his attention. However, I assume they have not, otherwise he too would be inclined to split the bill.

I would like to identify the real problem. Referring to documents that are in the public domain, I would like to read briefly from one. It is an article referring to Project Gun Runner in the Kingston Whig–Standard Companion of April 9, 1994 and I read in part:

> A total of 86 charges were laid during Gun Runner, which ended last April. Of the 17 guns the team bought on the black market, one came from a break-in. The rest were smuggled into Canada.

That is one out of 17. It goes on:

> Of the 243 other firearms that participating police forces seized during the operation, the vast majority came into the country illegally from the United States.
>
> "The project certainly opened our eyes to the fact that stolen guns from B&Es aren't the problem. Smuggled guns are the area of concern," says Detective Sergeant Wayne Moore of the Hamilton–Wentworth police criminal intelligence unit.
>
> Gun Runner helped open a lot of people's eyes.

It is unfortunate that many of the eyes belonging to the backbenchers and the Liberals were not opened by this information. Perhaps they should review it.

Metro Toronto firearms expert, Detective Paul Mullin says:

> It's a lucrative business—On the streets of Hamilton and Toronto a handgun is going to sell for $300 to $500.
>
> And when it comes to smuggling, handguns are an easily concealed commodity.
> Let's face it, 10 handguns don't add up to a carton of cigarettes in size. And at $500 apiece, that is $5,000 to be made.

Further on in the same article it describes how they are getting into the country. You name it: trains, planes, boats, trucks and cars. Last year Canada Customs seized 1,681 guns at border crossings with the U.S., an increase of 124 over the previous year. But 98 per cent of those firearms were seized from American tourists who were simply not aware of Canadian gun laws.

There are a lot of areas and ways and means of getting into Canada without coming through customs. "There are lakes and backroads and rivers and unmanned locations," says a director of intelligence services with Revenue Canada and Customs.

> And when a smuggler comes across he is usually carrying more than one or two guns.
> He's going to be come back with a quantity—10, 15, 20 guns. He's going to make the run worth his while because he's going to get into as much trouble for one gun as he is for 20.
>
> A Davis .380–calibre sold to a licensee for $70 may be sold to a first–level street dealer for $90. The dealer then sells it to a Canadian importer for maybe $120 and then the importer or his mule will drive it across the border and sell it for $500.

• (1205)

This article clearly delineates the fantastic profits that can be made.

Again, for the benefit of the justice minister and his researchers, they might want to take a look at a January 7 article in the Montreal Gazette, headlined "Illegal guns pour in from U.S.", detailing a number of illegal importations. I will cite two here:

> Toronto, September 13, 1993. Three Armenian jewel thieves enter a downtown jewellery wholesaler, pistol–whip the owner with a 9–mm Sigarms and escape with $90,000 in merchandise. Where did the gun come from? From Vermonter Wayne D. Reed.
> Vancouver, October 15, 1993. Five men, three of whom are jailbreakers, steal $500,000 worth of jewellery from a Birks store. They are armed with a 9–mm Cobray Mach II with the serial numbers drilled out, a .25–calibre Sundance and a 9–mm Glock pistol. Where did the guns come from?—Wayne D. Reed.
> Wayne D. Reed, 49, lives with his wife and four children in a lower–middle–class housing development in north Burlington.

The article continues:

> From this modest home Reed has fed since 1991 an ever–expanding hunger for guns in Canada's criminal underworld. According to his own estimates given to The Gazette, he has sold about 900 firearms, mostly high–powered pistols, to Mohawk Indians who smuggled them over the border into Quebec and resold them to criminals across Canada.

> The same routes developed for cigarette and booze smuggling—river crossings at Akwesasne on the St. Lawrence River, and Walpole Island on the St. Claire River north of Detroit—are now being used for the more lethal commodity, firearms.

Further on in the article it states:

> With a U.S. federal dealer's licence, Reed can legally buy and sell any firearm except machine guns. He waits for the orders to pile up so he can get a cut rate from the wholesaler by buying in quantity.
> Criminals place their orders through various Mohawk gun dealers who in turn place the orders with Reed or dealers like him. The Mohawks fill out U.S. federal firearms transaction forms (referred to as "yellow sheets") with false names taken from the Vermont phone books.

We have seen from Project Gun Runner and other documentation that the problem is one of illegal importation or smuggling. The fundamental problem here, although it does occasionally relate to guns that are stolen from private owners, is illegal guns.

What is the response? As the revenue critic I was very interested to read the fact sheet put out by Revenue Canada on the government's firearms control initiative. It reads in part:

> New firearms control measures, November 30, 1994. An expanded commercial permit system. All commercial import, export and in-transit shipments of firearms will require a permit in advance issued by the Solicitor General, with the approval of Foreign Affairs.

I think that Mr. Reed will shake in his boots.

> Revenue Canada will verify that every firearms shipment, import and export, is accompanied by an approval permit.

I am sure that the criminals that are bringing them in illegally will be concerned about this.

> A National Firearms Registration System. Under this system, which will be implemented by January 1, 1998:
> all firearms entering, leaving and moving through Canada will have to be registered in the National Firearms Registry.

Again, I am sure that Mr. Reed will be complying with that, along with the rest of the people who are smuggling guns into Canada.

> Firearms Control Enhancements: Summer, 1994
>
> Enhanced verification of the accuracy and integrity of documentation accompanying shipment of firearms;
>
> Implementation of a more rigorous inspection program at all land border crossings—100 per cent of firearms shipments are now examined.

• (1210)

That certainly gives me a lot of confidence that all of Mr. Reed's firearms are now going to be examined. Perhaps he might not care. What does this have to do with the problem? Absolutely nothing.

The enforcement activities contained in the bill are bogus in light of the fact that the government is bringing down penalties in Bill C-68 while at the same time it is loosening restrictions in a bill that was just passed through the House, Bill C-42.

These restrictions are supposed to help when there is domestic violence and in the illegal use of weapons. I have in my hand a document from the provincial court judiciary, provincial court of British Columbia where it explains that the act that was just passed will be changing assault with a weapon or causing bodily harm from an indictable offence to one that could be treated in a summary fashion in court.

How serious is the government about gaining control? We know that the Saskatoon police officers are not in favour of this. We know that there is presently a meeting of the Canadian Police Association and its members may or may not be in favour of this. We know that Saskatchewan will not be enforcing this.

I conclude by drawing to the attention of the House something I raised with the justice minister last Tuesday with a question.

The environmental extremist, Paul Watson, who allegedly was attacked by concerned residents in the Magdalen Islands was widely reported as saying that he held off his alleged assailants by using a stun gun and his fists.

I asked the justice minister this. Stun guns are prohibited weapons under section 90(1) of the Criminal Code. Mr. Watson admits to having this prohibited weapon in his possession. Would the minister confirm if the gun was confiscated, if Mr. Watson was charged for having an illegal weapon in his possession. If he was not charged, why not?

In part, the justice minister answered: "I commend the member on his knowledge of the Criminal Code but I also remind him that enforcement of such provisions is entirely a matter for the provincial authorities to which I invite his attention".

I asked, if that is the case, are we going to have two sets of laws, one for people outside of Saskatchewan and one in or is this whole thing bogus?

Hon. Raymond Chan (Secretary of State (Asia-Pacific), Lib.): Mr. Speaker, I am very pleased today to have the opportunity to speak to Bill C-68, an act respecting firearms and other weapons.

The issue of gun control has generated a tremendous amount of controversy over the last year. I have heard from many of my constituents expressing concerns on both sides of the debate. I would like to commend the Minister of Justice for introducing a bill that took into consideration the concerns of gun owners while at the same time acting to improve public safety.

I believe there is broad public support for the bill. I know it has responded to the concerns of my constituents by delivering stiffer penalties for the criminal use and smuggling of firearms.

At the same time, the bill provides a context in which legal gun owners can pursue their interest in a manner that is consistent with public safety. The creation of a national registration system is an essential part of the legislation. Registration of all firearms will improve public safety and help police fight the criminal misuse of firearms.

I understand that the registration of firearms is one of the most controversial aspects of the bill.

• (1215)

Opponents of the bill have charged registration will cost the government in excess of $1 billion. This is not true. To set up this system will cost $85 million spread over seven years. This will be recovered over time from the fees charged to gun owners.

Opponents of the bill have charged registration will not reduce the criminal use of firearms because criminals do not register their guns. They charge registration will not improve public safety. The Canadian Association of Chiefs of Police agrees with the Minister of Justice that the registration of firearms will help control smuggling, gun theft and the misuse of legal firearms.

Registration will make it more difficult for criminals to acquire illegal firearms by helping police trace and eliminate sources of firearms entering the underground market. Registration will help ensure legal gun owners are held accountable for their firearms and do not sell them illegally or give them to individuals without appropriate authorization.

Registration will promote safe storage which will reduce gun theft as well as reducing suicides and accidents. Police and women's groups both support the bill because registration will assist the police in removing guns from volatile domestic situations. The bill will help the police in enforcing the estimated 13,000 prohibition orders issued every year, to remove guns from volatile domestic situations and from individuals considered to be a risk to society.

I will vote in favour of the bill because the registration of firearms will save lives. It is critical to controlling the illegal gun trade, to prosecuting offenders, to promoting safe storage and to removing guns from the hands of dangerous individuals.

Many opponents of the bill have told the government to deal with crime control, not gun control. The bill deals harshly with the criminal misuse of firearms. I am pleased to see the bill includes minimum sentences for violent offences using firearms, a lifetime ban on owning handguns and stiff penalties for illegally importing and trafficking firearms.

I have listened to the concerns of legal gun owners in my riding. I am pleased to see the bill has also taken their concerns into consideration. To avoid undue financial hardship on the owners whose guns will be prohibited, the new legislation allows them to buy and sell to individuals owning firearms in the same category. This measure addresses one of the very legitimate concerns of gun owners.

Our government is working on many fronts to reduce crime and improve public safety. Strengthening gun control is only one part of the government's strategy on crime prevention. We must also address the social roots of crime including poverty, illiteracy and family violence.

Gun ownership is not a right, it is a privilege. It is subject to regulation by government because firearms can be dangerous. It is in the best interest of society to have some degree of regulation.

[Translation]

Mr. Ghislain Lebel (Chambly, BQ): Thank you, Mr. Speaker, for recognizing me at this time. The firearms bill introduced by the Minister of Justice is motivated by the best of intentions. I am sure.

Who in this House is for violence? Who does not want control to be exercised over violence? I do not think anyone in this place or in the general public does. Polls show that 100 per cent of the population is against violence, and already 73 per cent of the population says it wants stricter firearms control.

• (1220)

In this regard, the views of my party are no different from those expressed by the public at large. It is just that, sometimes, debates such as this one lend themselves to extremes that need to be moderated. When I hear certain members opposite tell us that 73 per cent of the population is for the proposed firearms control measures, I cannot help but wonder if all these people who are for the control measures are aware of what implementing such a system entails and how much it will cost.

A study conducted by a British Columbia university professor indicates that there are between three and seven million firearms in circulation and, if all of these weapons now had to be registered, it would cost the Canadians taxpayers, the public purse, or the hunters at the very least $500 million. That is half a billion dollars.

Of course, these figures are just thrown at us. Can they be checked? It would be rather difficult. On the other hand, if we look up in the auditor general's 1993 report how much the present registration system or firearms acquisition certificate system has cost to operate—these figures are now available—we can see that an inefficient and counterproductive system costs at the very least $50 million.

I did not pressure in any way the Auditor General of Canada to say that the current system fell short of our requirements. There is therefore reason to believe that the proposed system may well have a starting cost of $500 million. In the current economic context, I wonder if clear information regarding the costs involved would have made a difference in how the public answered the poll.

Needless to say, this kind of bill leaves the door wide open to sheer demagogy. It has been said that even if this bill saved only one life in Canada, it would deserve our support. I say this with all due respect for the opinion of my colleagues across the way who made that claim, including the hon. member for Ottawa West, who spoke to this bill yesterday, the hon. member for Lachine—Lac-Saint-Louis and the hon. member for Nickel Belt.

Of course, I would try to contribute to the $500 million needed to save a life. However, if we invested this amount in public awareness, in the fight against spousal abuse—if that is really the purpose of this bill—, I would not think it is too much. I am convinced that investing $500 in one of these areas could certainly save more than one life, at least two, as I am sure you will agree, Mr. Speaker. This bill would then be 100 per cent cost-effective in relation to the position of my friends across the way.

There is another aspect to this bill. In this regard, I tend to side with my friends here who say that this bill should be split in two. First of all, by giving the federal government the opportunity to create new crimes as it sees fit, this bill will—in Quebec and, I assume, in all Canadian provinces—encroach on areas of provincial jurisdiction, namely civil rights and freedoms as well as the sport of hunting.

In this regard, I am very reluctant to give my support, unless it is conclusively demonstrated that the bill cannot fail to achieve the goals established. As you know, hunting generates regional revenues of $300 million a year in Quebec at a specific time of year.

• (1225)

This is a windfall for most Quebec regions: the Eastern Townships, the Upper Laurentians, the Abitibi-Témiscamingue area, the Lac Saint-Jean region, the North Shore, the Gaspé Peninsula, you name it. In these regions, some small communities live off sport and recreational activities such as hunting in the fall and fishing in the spring and summer. They could lose all of that. I am not saying that I oppose this bill, but I wonder about its consequences, which may not be obvious at this stage.

However, I do think this is a prime example of federal interference in a field of provincial jurisdiction. The Quebec environment minister also had reservations about this legislation. Sure, the initial intent is laudable and everyone supports such a measure, the Bloc perhaps more than any other party. However, given the current economic context, we have to be careful before adding an extra $500 million to the deficit. Let us not forget that our deficit is the sum total of 20 years of good intentions in Quebec. It is thanks to all those who meant well and tabled various pieces of legislation if we are now struggling with this uncontrolled and uncontrollable deficit.

As regards this aspect, I hope that those who support this legislation, as well as those who oppose it, will come to present their respective views to a parliamentary committee. There is another aspect of this bill which concerns me. I said earlier that we should make sure that the goals sought are indeed reached. In addition to being able to afford all this, we should have some assurances that these objectives are reasonably attainable. When we consider the opportunities for smuggling, in his study Professor Mauser said he is not at all sure that smuggling will be stopped.

In fact, the Canadian Association of Chiefs of Police expressed some reservations in this respect. The Reform Party's brilliant representative said earlier that a single shipment of guns can generate incredible profits, as much as 400 or 500 per cent. That is quite a lot. We had a terrible time trying to stop cigarette smuggling last year. We never succeeded, so that the federal government finally abdicated its responsibility and reduced taxes, although it needed these to pay for its current operations. It is no secret that the government raises revenue through taxes. Since the government realized it could not stop cigarette smuggling otherwise, it preferred to forgo revenues that were legally acceptable and warranted.

So will it be the same in the case of firearms? Will the government abdicate its responsibility, will they still shoot at government helicopters about to land on a reserve straddling the border between Canada and the United States, the message being: "Get out of here, this is our business". At least, that is what happened with cigarettes. I would appreciate some certainty in this respect, some assurances that smuggling is a thing of the past.

You know, we have another problem with imports not necessarily connected with smuggling. Recently, I was working on the Customs Act and the notorious procedure I mentioned here in the House during Question Period, the so-called low value shipment, a term used in the customs sector. For instance, a truck comes in from the United States, a bonded carrier with a shipment of merchandise, and they do spot checks. They look at the manifest, they look at the list and they say: Okay, Mickey Mouse watches, straw hats, whatever. They do a spot check. They take items at random from the truck and check whether these items correspond with what is on the manifest.

Customs officers told me that in nine cases out of ten, if not ten out of ten, they might be carrying a handgun or a firearm that is not only restricted but prohibited in Canada. In nine cases out of ten this would go unnoticed.

So that is why I have a number of questions about this bill. I am not saying I am against the bill but I am not saying I support it either. I think we should all discuss this. That is why we are debating the bill here in the House, so that in the end, we can make an informed decision.

[English]

Mr. Derek Wells (South Shore, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, I am pleased to have the opportunity to speak on Bill C-68, an act respecting firearms and other weapons. I particularly wanted to speak on this legislation because of the great deal of concern it has caused both myself and my constituents.

This legislation is an important part of the Liberal government's broad strategy on crime prevention. It should work in concert with previously introduced pieces of legislation relating to sentencing reform, corrections and parole reform, the Young Offenders Act and the consultation document on the National Crime Prevention Council.

I agree with the overall intent of this legislation as well as the three principles that motivated this government to introduce Bill C-68. At the same time I believe it is incumbent upon all members of this House to recognize that there are two sides which must be heard. We must recognize the sincerity with which both sides bring their views to the table.

I have constituents in my South Shore riding who are in favour of the government measures and I certainly have constituents who are opposed. For this reason, I have formed a riding committee which will meet with me on a regular basis to review the legislation in detail. This committee will be reporting to the Minister of Justice and to the Standing Committee on Justice and Legal Affairs on areas of concern with a view to offering suggestions for improvements.

I expect that people on both sides of this issue would agree with the three principles as previously outlined by the Minister of Justice in this House. In essence these principles are: one, that Canadians do not want to live in a country where people feel they want or need to possess a firearm for their protection; two, that if we are to retain our safe and peaceful character as a country, those who use a firearm in the commission of a crime will be severely punished; and three, as a government and as a country, we must acknowledge and respect the legitimate use of firearms by law-abiding Canadian citizens.

The Minister of Justice and this government have acknowledged throughout this debate their respect and consideration for the traditions of hunting, both for sustenance and for sport, as well as the use of firearms for farming, ranching and other legitimate activities. It is not the intention of this government with this legislation to interfere with these rights. As well, we wish to go on record as acknowledging that these rights will continue to exist into the future.

I would like at this time to comment on the various components on the firearms control package as outlined in the legislation.

I believe that increased penalties will act as a deterrent to the criminal use of firearms. A mandatory four-year jail term for the use of a firearm in the commission of a serious crime, in addition to charges for the offence in which the gun was used, is deemed by those concerned with law and order to be much more acceptable than the status quo.

The present law is often criticized as being inadequately enforced with charges too often dropped as part of a plea bargain or otherwise not pursued. This problem is addressed by this legislation.

In relation to the aforementioned, I fully support any change that will see young offenders who commit firearms offences being treated in the same manner as adults. The criminal penalties as outlined in the legislation will also limit access to firearms for felons, including young offenders.

Prohibition orders on the possession of restricted and non-restricted firearms for those convicted of serious violent crimes will range from 10 years to life. People convicted of stalking or drug related charges will be subject to prohibition orders.

Not only does this make good common sense, but it is a crime prevention measure that will go a long way toward restoring public confidence in the justice system. It is clear that the intention of this legislation is to offer more protection to the law-abiding citizen.

Bill C-68 includes border control measures which are directed at curtailing smuggling activities and tightening up importation regulations. In addition, the bill adds a number of new offences arising from the trade in illegal firearms or other weapons. The overall penalty provisions will put these offences among the most serious class of crimes in the Criminal Code.

The most contentious part of this legislation is the registration provision which will apply to all guns, regular, restricted, and prohibited. Many of my constituents have raised concerns or worries about the registration requirement. They are concerned about the cost, both to themselves as individuals and to the country at large. They have concerns that the system will be cumbersome. They have concerns that registration will lead to the eventual confiscation of their firearms. They are concerned that the registration system will not be secure and that others, including criminals, could gain access to the information.

an all–out debate on the subject of crime control in the House is being prevented by the government.

The bill is solely aimed at punishing law–abiding legitimate owners of firearms in Canada. These law–abiding citizens are more concerned than anyone with the safe usage and storage of firearms. Of all people they should not be the target of the legislation.

All Canadians want crime to be reduced on the streets, in our cities and in our towns. Canadians want to be able to feel that the authorities are able to control crime.

The Minister of Justice stated in the House that it was estimated some 375,000 guns were smuggled into the country and about 3,800 weapons were lost or stolen within our borders. The justice minister introduced legislation which concentrated on the 3,800 weapons loose in society.

What about the 375,000 smuggled weapons? As far as I can see the minister's actions are twofold. First, his actions are directed at punishing legitimate owners of firearms, appeasing a special interest group. Second, as some kind of afterthought his actions may do something about the real problem, the 375,000 weapons smuggled into the country. This is preposterous. Anti–gun groups are not amused. Neither are sporting groups, hunting clubs, target shooters or Olympic sports spectators. The grass-roots of Canada is not amused.

There is no reason the government cannot attempt to control smuggled weapons without slapping the faces of law–abiding citizens. My constituents therefore stand in favour of splitting the bill.

Recently I conducted a household survey in my riding and 78 per cent of my constituents said that they did not want all guns including shotguns and rifles registered. Seventy–eight per cent of my constituents said that they did not want short barrelled pistols banned. Most important, 92 per cent of my constituents want tougher mandatory sentences for criminals who use guns.

• (1305)

To date I have presented 43 petitions in the House containing over 3,000 signatures of constituents who oppose further legislation for firearms acquisition and possession. They call on Parliament to provide strict guidelines and mandatory sentences for the use or the possession of a firearm in the commission of a violent crime.

People do not have to look far for an example. They can turn to their local newspapers for examples of how the criminal justice system is letting the public down. For instance, I turn to the Penticton Herald that had an article entitled "Slap on the wrists no deterrent".

The article was about a man convicted of a weapons offence involving a restricted weapon. He was convicted, given a slap on the wrist, a $440 fine and a year's probation. Canadians must be asking themselves, if the courts do not do their part in placing a deterrent on this kind of offence, what good is it to demand that hunters and sportsmen register their shotguns and long arms.

As members of the House we ought to be doing all we can to protect our borders from those who seek to bring crime to our otherwise free and peaceful nation. We ought to make it very clear to the international criminal community, as well as our own criminal community, that Canada will put behind bars anyone who attempts to bring weapons into the country. We must ensure that is well known beyond our borders and that the maximum punishment for those bringing weapons into the country will be applied.

Not only anti–gun groups but all Canadians want smuggling stopped. I might add that all Canadians want the full force of our laws and maximum punishment delivered to persons using firearms in the commission of an offence.

While the citizens of the nation have the privilege of owning firearms, we must make it perfectly clear that we do not and will not tolerate abuse of the privilege. We must adopt a zero tolerance policy on criminals in the country.

Society has been living with handgun registration for over 60 years. Because of the difficulty our citizens face in terms of obtaining an FAC, we do not take lightly abuse of firearms laws. Virtually every constituent, firearm owner or member of an anti–gun group that contacted me during the debate of this issue has left me with one thought above all: punish the criminals who use firearms. Firearm owners, law–abiding citizens and anti–gun groups are sick and tired of legislators going after the wrong guy when dealing with the problems associated with firearms in society.

Together all groups and all Canadians ask the minister not to follow the precedent set by former ministers of justice. He should do us all a favour and split the bill. Let us do some work in the House on crime control. Canadians will continue to read in the newspaper and see on television the mayhem, the bloodshed, the heartache and the horrors lethal weapons in the hands of criminals are causing on our streets. We will continue to see and hear of such criminals walking away from their deeds in that our courts refuse to deal out maximum penalties for crimes committed with a firearm because of plea bargaining and other reasons.

In other words, by splitting the bill in half we would be allowed to deal with the two issues: first, crime control and, second, a gun registry. All sides of the House would be able to work on crime control first and most importantly. Surely the Minister of Justice would have us believe that he is so well intended he can accommodate the desire of this side of the House and Canadians who recognize that crime control is the most important issue.

Any right thinking Canadian knows that with some 375,000 weapons being smuggled into the nation, the criminal use of firearms will continue. The criminal use of firearms does not exist because of hunters, sportsmen, gun collectors and law-abiding citizens. The criminal use is by criminals.

• (1310)

In closing, the constituents of Okanagan—Similkameen—Merritt would support the bill being split in two. By doing so we could deal with crime control and then the gun registry. We could salvage some good sections in terms of protecting our borders from international criminals. We could try to protect law-abiding Canadians at the same time.

Mr. Don Boudria (Glengarry—Prescott—Russell, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, let us start by calling what we have before us today what it really is. We have before us a motion. It is not to split the bill. That is utter and sheer nonsense. The motion asks that the House decline to give second reading to Bill C-68.

The effect of adopting such a motion is not to split the bill, no matter what words are in the motion. Any member who says that the effect of adopting such a motion is to split the bill either does not know the rules of the House at all or knows better and refuses to say so, not to put it too unkindly.

Citation 559 of Beauchesne, just in case the member across does not know how it works, is entitled: "Types of Motions". It refers to different types of motions. The motion introduced by the member is known as a dilatory motion. In that motion is a reasoned amendment. We decline to give second reading to a bill. Perhaps the reason he wants to decline giving second reading is that he would prefer to have the bill split two ways, three ways or ten ways. It does not matter, because any member voting in favour of the motion would be voting to kill the bill.

The hon. member and other hon. members have sent letters to my constituents and other constituents across Canada asking them to tell us to support the motion, the effect of which would be to split the bill. Let me say kindly that it is not true. There is no such effect. It would kill the bill.

I am a rural Canadian. I live in the riding of Glengarry—Prescott—Russell. I was born on a farm. Yes, guns were around my home. That does not mean, as some members are trying to portray, that rural Canadians want to have guns that are not registered and that they have a right to do so, or that urban Canadians want rural Canadians to be deprived of all firearms. Both concepts are wrong.

Mr. Penson: Should your father have registered his gun?

Mr. Boudria: My father died when I was four years old, in answer to the question being asked about my father.

Perhaps I could get back to the topic at hand; it would be more appropriate. There were guns in my home. Guns were not registered 40 years ago. Motorcycle drivers did not wear helmets 40 years ago. Cars did not have seatbelts and there was no such thing as a freeway in Ottawa. The concept that may escape some members across the way is that we have evolved. Things have changed. Hopefully we are here to make life better for all our constituents. That is what the Minister of Justice is trying to do.

Perhaps not all initiatives proposed by everyone with regard to gun control have been perfect. Perfection is not here, but we have a good bill before us that will go to committee. It will be a better bill when it comes out of committee because there are members of the House who will do a job for Canadians by trying to make the bill better.

[Translation]

And what do we want? First, we want legislation that provides stricter punitive measures for those who use weapons illegally. Second, we want to put a stop to arms smuggling or limit it as much as possible.

• (1315)

Third, and there are perhaps other elements I could enumerate, we also want to register firearms so we know who has them and how many they have. Is this such a strange concept in civilized society? After all, I register my car.

[English]

I do not have a dog now but when I did I had to register it. Some people are telling me if we register our firearms that automatically means it is the first step toward confiscation. No one ever attempted to confiscate my dog. It was registered. To pretend, as some hon. members have, that this is the first step toward confiscation is not right.

Some of those people saying that will someday have to justify what they are doing before their constituents. An hon. member sent me what he called his test as to whether we should support gun control. In the hon. member's test was a questionnaire. In the questionnaire of the member from the Reform Party it said: "Do you think members should vote according to the majority of their constituents?"

If that were the only test applied to the bill—not that it should always be the strict and only test any member should be governed by—to the hon. members across, this debate would have been long over. That is not the only test. The members across should not pretend it is either, because they are wrong.

The impact of the legislation on the average Canadian has to be considered. One has to ask whether making some people pay for the justice system for all is fair and just. There are people paying for the education system who do not use it. They are paying for it the same as everyone else. Why should not Canadian people as a whole pay, if it is to serve the justice of the country and their safety? Instead we are targeting many people who are innocent and law-abiding Canadians. If the system is to benefit all, why should not all of us contribute? I have no problem in that regard, and I do not own a gun.

Training program costs have been mentioned as a great inhibitor. The costs for training courses are considerable. People are complaining to me about the red tape they have to go through. Many police officers whom I have been talking with have not taken the training, yet they will be faced with it. There are major problems in administration out there.

They talk about a coalition of forces. That is not the point. The point is providing good legislation with common sense logic, fairness and justice built into the system. Decisions based on emotions will not stand up over time; but decisions based on justice, fairness and common sense will stand the test of time.

A lot of the problems, the real hype and the gearing up of emotions started with incidents such as the murder at the Just Desserts restaurant in Toronto, in Montreal and in the Quebec legislature such incidents were quickly linked to all guns in general. That was wrong. It should be targeted to certain weapons and not to people who are capable of handling weapons safely.

It is unfair to attribute the problem we are facing today in part to everyday honest people. The ferociousness of the debate does not make for constructive solutions. I have heard some very outlandish speeches in the House and more outside it.

Guns increase violence is the saying, but what about countries where there are guns in nearly every home and there is no violence?

• (1155)

I quote from a very good speech delivered by the hon. member for Cochrane—Superior two weeks ago yesterday:

> A number of inquiries conducted in various countries have shown there is no connection between the percentage of crimes involving firearms and the degree of regulation of firearms in that country. In countries with a very low rate of violent crimes or homicide like Japan or Switzerland, the presence or absence of firearms is irrelevant. However making young people socially responsible, giving them a good education and warning them against criminal behaviour, is a major factor in producing low crime rates.

If we look at Switzerland, by its nature over many years it has been a fully armed nation as far as its citizenry is concerned yet has one of the lowest crime rates in the world.

It is a culture. It is the enforcement of law. It is the values we put into society. It is the way we train people generation after generation. That will improve the legal system and the courts by taking away plea bargaining in such cases.

The justice minister has made a good start in the legislation. Let us make the justice system work and not have people on the streets who should not be there, not have innocent people become victims of law and become criminals by virtue of it. Because of lack of information or indeed a lack of memory, if someone forgets to do something, according the act as it is written now he would be charged under the Criminal Code.

Nobody would argue about the need for anti-smuggling legislation. It is motherhood. It is necessity. Everyone in Canada, gun owners and non-gun owners alike, would support restrictions against smuggling. On the possession of stolen weapons outdoor sportsmen's clubs would support restrictions on that. They enforce laws within their own clubs, their own bylaws or their own regulations. They have very severe rules in that regard.

Export-import laws are great. They prevent the inflow or outflow of illegal arms. We have a 4,000-mile boundary to handle and it is very difficult to control border problems. With a 4,000-mile border we will have a challenge on our hands with the export-import laws. However it must be done and I give the minister credit for bringing forward that part.

No one should be in illegal possession of a firearm. There is a charge in that regard. We should get rid of plea bargaining and the minister has done part of it.

There is absolutely no sympathy out there for illegal trafficking of firearms, not by sportsmen or anyone else. They know if people with firearms get into trouble it will impact on them. The message is immediately spread on radio stations, TV stations and newspapers. It is very easy to start the hype that everything is wrong in society when certain things should be corrected.

The minimum sentence of four years for a list of 10 crimes is a good start. The court system, plea bargaining and the justice system must generally be upgraded and enforced. It is supported by the general public. There will be no pity on anyone who allows the system to deteriorate in any way. Canadians want the sentence to fit the crime.

This is my fourth time around on gun legislation. None of them has been easy. None of them has been very productive in the sense of the rhetoric used. We keep coming forward with legislation. As time goes on we must pass legislation to deal with the times. We are going through difficult times but let us

Mr. Harper (Calgary West): When did you table the bill?

Mr. Milliken: January.

The hon. member has had ample opportunity to discuss this matter. They have had opposition days when they could raise this issue if they wanted to; yet we have not seen it then.

We have offered to sit at night. The hon. member does not want to do that either. Why? Because he wants to have days and days of filibuster and hold this bill up until next year or the year after.

The government is decisive. The government made promises in the red book. The government made promises to the people of Canada when it introduced this bill. The government knows how to govern. It will show leadership to Canadians and it will proceed with this bill. It will do a great job in enacting legislation that will help reduce crime in Canada and help to solve the problems confronting this country in a way that is meaningful and sensible, instead of the ranting, pillaging and raving the Reform Party is engaging in.

Mr. Preston Manning (Calgary Southwest, Ref.): Mr. Speaker, I rise today to participate in the debate on the government's gun control legislation, in particular to support the Reform amendment that the bill be split into two parts, each to be voted on separately.

In doing so I wish to vehemently protest the restrictions the government has placed on this debate in order to rush the bill through Parliament. It strikes me as supremely ironic that a government that seems incapable of imposing any kind of discipline on the criminal elements in society has no hesitancy about imposing a strict discipline on its own caucus and on the debates of this House.

For more than five years Reformers have been criss-crossing this country asking the question, what do Canadians want and, in particular, what kind of country do Canadians want for themselves and for their children as we approach the 21st century. One of the most frequent answers we get to that question is that Canadians want safe streets, safe homes and safe communities.

• (1350)

This was expressed to me very eloquently several years ago at a meeting in Toronto when in response to my questions, what do Canadians want, a man in the audience got up and said the following. He said: "Do you know what I want? I want my wife to be able to leave this hotel at 10 p.m. and go to our car in the parkade a block away without running the risk of being mugged, robbed or assaulted. I want the state to discharge the most elemental of its responsibilities, namely, its responsibility to protect the life and property of its citizens. I want to live in a country where the rights and security of law-abiding citizens and innocent victims of crime take precedence in criminal law and the Constitution over the rights and security of criminals."

There are not many MPs in this House who would disagree that increasing public safety must be a priority of this Parliament. The disagreements among us arise over what is the best way to achieve that result.

With respect to Bill C-68 and the motion to split it, the key question is this. What role does gun control have to play in making Canada a safer place? Two different answers to this question are being given in the 35th Parliament: the Reform position and the Liberal position. Canadians must decide which position maximizes public safety.

The Reform position, which has been stated eloquently by my colleagues, is that gun control will only contribute to public safety if its primary focus is on the criminal use of firearms. The diversion of police attention and financial resources into excessive regulation of the non-criminal use of firearms will not enhance public safety. Canadian voters are telling Reformers and pollsters that their number one priority for justice is strong action directed toward persons who commit violent criminal acts. Based on this position, Reform MPs have taken the lead in proposing measures to tighten up the regulation of the criminal use of firearms.

These measures include the following: implement a zero tolerance policy for criminal offences involving firearms; ensure that charges are laid in all firearms crimes and that plea bargains are not permitted; impose mandatory one-year minimum jail sentences for using any weapon in the commission of a violent crime; provide for progressively more severe penalties for repeat violent and firearms offenders; ensure that all sentences for violent crime and firearms convictions are served consecutively; provide for lifetime prohibitions from ownership of firearms for all persons convicted of violent crimes; impose the same penalty for the use of a replica firearm as for using a real gun in a violent offence; create a new offence of theft of a firearm sentence three to fourteen years; impose sentences of three to fourteen years for unlawful importation or illegal sale of a firearm for a criminal use; deem the seller of a firearm to a criminal as having aided in any future crime committed; and transfer young offenders to adult court for using firearms in the commission of an offence.

In short, the Reform Party is opposed to gun controls that are not cost effective in reducing violent crime, improving public safety and saving lives, and would repeal any gun control provisions that are not cost effective in reducing violent crime, improving public safety and saving lives.

The position that the Liberal government has taken on gun control is utterly predictable and typical of Liberals. If one comes to a hard choice between two options, in this case focusing scarce resources on regulating the criminal or non-

Crime is what we should be attacking here, not registration. Registration is not the answer. Therefore, let us split this bill in two and make sure that we deal with crime. As the bill is now responsible firearms owners are going to be labelled and become criminals.

Mr. Bob Speller (Haldimand—Norfolk, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, it is a pleasure to rise to speak on the motion. I have been spending the last few days listening to the debate on it.

I must say that some good ideas came from across the floor. Some good ideas also came from this side of the House of changes we could make to really reflect the concerns of some of my constituents.

Over the past few months I have been talking to a number of my constituents who have been hearing a lot of misinformation concerning this bill. It has been very difficult to really debate the bill in an open and meaningful way. I end up spending half of my time trying to explain to constituents parts of the bill that they believe are there but actually are not. I find that a very difficult way to deal with the legislation.

I have a number of concerns with the legislation but before I get into that I want to talk about those areas which I think everyone in the House supports. When Bill C-17 came into the House under the former Conservative government I could not support and voted against the sections on the increased criminal sanctions for the illegal use of firearms. One of the reasons I voted against the bill was that I did not believe it dealt with the criminal use of guns. My constituents did not feel these issues were properly dealt with.

• (1705)

I brought those points forward and I want to thank the minister for at least listening to Canadians who felt there was not enough being done to sanction people who use guns in the commission of crimes. I appreciate that he and the Prime Minister are taking our ideas and moving forward with them.

As members know, the average sanction across the board is about 16 months. The minister has increased it to four years. I would rather have seen it go higher but I see that as a positive step and a good way forward.

I also agree with what the minister is doing with the whole question of smuggling. I have talked with the Minister of National Revenue and he has indicated to me that he, along with the Solicitor General and the Minister of Justice, have a task force together. They are going to focus on smuggling.

This will not work unless smugglers are stopped at the border. There is one major place at the border where the majority of these guns are coming across. I call on the Minister of Justice and the Solicitor General to deal with that situation and to get the guns off the street. I also agree with the seizure of the assets of those people who smuggle. If assets are seized and smuggling is stopped it will go a long way in dealing with some of the problems.

I have not heard anybody on the other side thank the minister for dealing with the whole situation of young offenders with regard to handguns. I see that as a positive step forward and something we could support.

I want to get into those areas that I feel are not very well represented. Specifically, there is the whole area of registration. It is probably the area that concerns most of my constituents. When I was putting forward proposals on that, I always said that registration would have to be proven to me to be effective, efficient and affordable. When I look at some of the proposals put forward by the minister, I am concerned whether they actually meet that criteria.

I hope the members of the committee on justice will tear the bill apart, get the minister before them and get the proof whether these sorts of criteria are met. I see that as an important role of the committee and I hope it will take that challenge on.

I also wanted to split the bill. A lot of members wanted to split the bill but I have to say to my colleagues across the way that their motion does not split the bill.

Miss Grey: Make a motion.

Mr. Speller: I will make a motion. I wonder if I can have unanimous consent to move this motion. I move:

That section 80 on page 36 through to section 112 on page 51 could be removed from this bill and brought back as another bill under the name of the Canadian firearms registration system.

The Deputy Speaker: Does the member have unanimous consent to move the motion?

Some hon. members: Agreed.

Some hon. members: No.

The Deputy Speaker: There is not unanimous consent. The member has the floor on debate.

Mr. Stinson: A Liberal said no.

Mr. Speller: Mr. Speaker, a number of members on all sides of the House would support a motion like that. I hope that maybe we can work as this bill goes through its other stages to convince the minister to do something like that.

Miss Grey: Absolutely.

Mr. Speller: Mr. Speaker, I notice that you gave our hon. colleague a going over for heckling before.

The Deputy Speaker: The member has a good point. As the member for Beaver River will agree, I asked the member not to heckle her. I wonder if members on the Reform side would not heckle the member.

SPEAKER'S RULING

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, rule 22(4) of the Rules of the Senate of Canada states:

> (4) When "Senators' Statements" has been called, Senators may, without notice, raise matters they consider need to be brought to the urgent attention of the Senate. In particular, Senators' statements should relate to matters which are of public consequence and for which the rules and practices of the Senate provide no immediate means of bringing the matters to the attention of the Senate. In making such statements, a Senator shall not anticipate consideration of any Order of the Day and shall be bound by the usual rules governing the propriety of debate. Matters raised during this period shall not be subject to debate.

At this stage, the proposed bill is not an Order of the Day. Therefore, it is in order for the honourable senator to proceed.

I might add that the precedents in the Senate have been such that we have commented not on matters which are on the Orders of the Day but on other matters. I rule that Senator Ghitter may proceed.

Hon. Norbert L. Thériault: Your Honour, am I to understand from your ruling that once a subject matter is placed on the Order Paper, senators are prevented from discussing it?

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, I am sorry to interrupt Senator Thériault. The rules do not provide for points of order to be raised under the rubric "Senators' Statements." The honourable senator may make a statement, but he is not allowed to raise a point of order.

Senator Ghitter may proceed.

Hon. Ron Ghitter: I anticipate that Your Honour will have the opportunity to make a further ruling at a later date.

On February 16, in relation to the question of gun registration, the Honourable Allan Rock said:

> May I deal directly with the issue of registration and how it is going to enable us to achieve the objectives of a safe and peaceful society, a more effective response to the criminal misuse of firearms and enhanced public safety.
>
> I will begin with the proposition that we live in a society in which all manner of property is licensed, registered or regulated in some way. All manner of activities are regulated either by legislation or administrative action to achieve a level of orderliness which is desirable in a civilized society. In that context, where cars, pets, and property of all description are registered or recorded for purposes of tracing ownership or reflecting transfers, surely the prospect of registering firearms is rationally justified by a society that wants to achieve a level of order....
>
> Those who engage in street crime tap into a market that is fed from one of two sources: guns that are smuggled into Canada and therefore are here illegally, or guns that are stolen from lawful owners and then traded in the underground....
>
> Surely we must choke off the sources of supply for that underground market.

• (1400)

> Surely we must reduce the number of firearms smuggled into the country. Surely we must cut down on the number of firearms stolen and traded in the underground. How do we achieve that? Through registration.
>
> The registration of all firearms will enable us to do a better job at the borders. We will never stop the smuggling of firearms entirely. There are 130 million border crossings per year....
>
> Last year approximately 375,000 firearms came into Canada. Almost all guns sold here are imported. We do not know where they are or how they got here....
>
> Registration will enable us to record what arrives and track it to the point of sale into the hands of a lawful owner. Registration will enable us to stop the kind of leakage that now occurs, to reduce the incidence of people illegally selling that which is legally imported.
> ...registration which obligates each of us to record the fact of our ownership of firearms will imbue the owners with a heightened sense of responsibility...
>
> Registration will reduce crime and better equip the police to deal with crime in Canadian society by providing them with information they often need to do their job....
>
> ...Registration will assist us to deal with the scourge of domestic violence....
>
> When firearms are registered, if it is necessary for a person to register and show proof of registration to buy ammunition, as it will be, the police will know what firearms are there. The police will be able to enforce those orders and lives will be saved....
> We have provided our estimate of the cost of implementing universal registration over the next five years. We say that it will cost $85 million....
>
> It is crucially important, in my judgment, that as we debate this question of registration, in respect of which there are strongly held views on both sides, that we do so on the real facts. Let us confine ourselves to the reality of the situation. Let us not hear that the registration system will cost $100 per firearm. Let us not hear that it is a prelude to the confiscation by the government of hunting rifles and shotguns. Let us not contend that it will cost $1.5 billion to put in place.

Controlled Drugs and Substances Act (Bill C-8)

Citation	1996, c. 19, s. 68, 70(a)&(b)
Royal Assent	June 20, 1996

substances; to provide the mechanisms needed to implement our obligations under international agreements—this relates to the restricted production or trade of internationally regulated substances destined for medical, scientific and/or industrial purposes—and to enhance the ability of the police and the courts to enforce our laws. The bill actually provides for the seizure and forfeiture of property used in offences involving controlled substances.

The existing Narcotic Control Act and the Food and Drugs Act do not deal effectively with emerging trends in drug abuse. These trends point to the increasing availability of new illicit or new designer drugs which, under current law, can escape effective control.

Under the aegis of the drug strategy, the government remains committed to a working partnership whose "raison d'être" is the reduction of drug abuse in Canada.

● (1220)

[English]

The controlled drugs and substances bill is an integral part of the strategy. It consolidates, modernizes, enhances and streamlines drug abuse provisions contained in the two current laws. Simply put, it builds on the government's current policy on drug abuse.

Those who profit from this are undeniably resourceful, determined and cunning. Their methods, their tactics and their products are forever undergoing change. We need flexible legislation which allows those on the front lines of enforcement to adapt quickly to these new developments as they occur.

For example, one of the more recent developments in the drug underworld is the production and illicit sale of so-called designer drugs and look alike drugs. Designer drugs are potent substances with slightly different chemical structures than substances presently controlled by the Food and Drugs Act and the Narcotic Control Act, substances like stimulants, tranquillizers and pain killers. These drugs affect abusers in similar ways and can lead to the same health and social problems produced by more conventional drugs.

Look alike drugs, on the other hand, are substances made to resemble illegal drugs. The manufacturers of these malicious offerings can mimic the more powerful drugs. Much harm can result from the abuse of these drugs and primary targets of these merchants of misery are often school-age children.

The manufacture and sale of designer drugs and look alike drugs can be a very profitable business. Sadly, it is a business with terrible consequences for hundreds of thousands of customers, many of them young people.

Under the current Food and Drugs Act and the Narcotic Control Act, drugs must first be listed on a schedule to the act. This regulates the conditions for the sale of that particular substance in Canada. Only once a given substance is listed can it become an offence to sell it. To correct this deficiency the controlled drugs and substances bill proposes interpretive clauses to include these substances.

Under this proposed act, new illicit drugs appearing on the street which fit this description will be covered automatically.

The bill also permits the control of precursors. Precursors are chemical substances used to produce controlled substances. New provisions contained in this bill will enable authorities to regulate the import and export of these substances.

Other sources of drugs sold on the street are substances intended for medical or scientific use. They may be stolen from a hospital, obtained through illegal prescriptions, secured by obtaining numerous prescriptions from different doctors for the same ailment, or via a forged prescription. People who deal in diverted pharmaceutical drugs are collecting very large profits.

The bill enhances present controls that deal with this issue. Under this bill the monitoring of the distribution of drugs will continue.

[Translation]

To ensure compliance with the law and prevent diversion, inspectors, in close co-operation with law enforcement authorities would continue to visit pharmacies, hospitals, licensed dealers, dispensing practitioners, researchers and laboratory analysts.

We know there exists a criminal element which is using more and more sophisticated networks to illegally produce, sell, export or import controlled substances in Canada.

These people buy property and consumer goods to further their criminal activities and bolster their personal wealth.

As I see it, such people should be prevented from retaining illegally obtained capital and goods.

The bill before us today, together with the proceeds of crime legislation, strikes at the heart of criminal enterprise.

Together, these enactments will enable the courts to strip criminals of profits and property illegally amassed through drug dealing.

Trends in illegal production, distribution and use of controlled substances change frequently and quickly.

This bill is designed to deal with current problems and to anticipate future needs. There is no doubt that there is a very real problem of drug abuse in Canada.

Second, it will provide a control on the import and export of precursors, which are chemical substances used to produce controlled substances.

Third, it will enhance enforcement measures available to all police services, the Royal Canadian Mounted Police, and provincial and municipal police forces to suppress unlawful import, export, production and distribution of psychoactive substances.

• (1410)

It will provide for the forfeiture of any property used to commit such offences. On the home front this bill will make it easier for the police to deal with those who produce illegal drugs.

Under the old legislation new drugs were not considered to be illegal until they were analysed and identified. Needless to say this process took time. This bill instead uses a broad description to define psychoactive drugs. In the future new drugs appearing on the street that fit this new generic description would automatically be covered by the bill. This would give the police the authority to arrest traffickers dealing in these new illicit drugs.

Last but by no means least, this bill will help us better protect our young people. I do not think anyone in this House would argue with the statement that our children represent our most precious resource and that we must do everything in our power to protect them.

Unfortunately one of the facts of modern life is that our young people are often the most vulnerable to the temptations of drug use. Drug traffickers know this and take full advantage of any opportunity to peddle their deadly products in places where young people congregate. Today's schools and even playgrounds are no longer safe from the attentions of drug traffickers.

To help protect children from this influence, the bill will introduce new criteria known as aggravating factors to assist judges in determining sentences for drug traffickers. Examples of these factors include dealing drugs in a school, near a school or to minors or involving minors in drug trafficking operations.

There are also other aggravating factors, such as previous drug convictions, possession of a weapon or the use of violence while engaged in drug trafficking. These are laid out in the bill.

Generally under these new provisions a convicted drug trafficker can expect to receive a stiffer sentence, particularly a jail term. Judges who do not impose a prison term in such circumstances will be required to give the reasons for their decision.

[Translation]

In conclusion, I believe that the Controlled Drugs and Substances Act will give Canadians the tool they need to better protect their health which is threatened by the harmful effects of drugs.

From the Solicitor General's point of view, in terms of enforcement, this bill will give the police the power they need to organize more effective anti-drug operations, especially against major traffickers.

[English]

The proposed legislation will broaden the impact of existing proceeds of crime legislation which allows the police and the courts to strip the traffickers of the profits of their criminal enterprises. This bill will also enable the police to deliver a more forceful one-two punch to drug traffickers to severely curtail their deadly trade.

[Translation]

This is the kind of approach that the people, the courts and the police have rightly demanded to deal with this type of criminal justice problem and our government is committed to such an approach.

[English]

I ask members on all sides of the House to give early and full support to this bill.

I have listened to the concerns raised by opposition spokespersons about it. I believe those concerns should and will be addressed in committee when the bill is considered in detail following second reading. This is the place to go into the concerns that have been raised about the bill, its purposes, its approach and so on.

Therefore I urge hon. members to give early second reading to the bill to enable it to go quickly to committee so that all the points raised by opposition spokespersons and by other members in the House can be looked at and dealt with in the seriousness with which they were raised in the first place.

• (1415)

I say this because I believe this bill will provide important additional tools to the enforcement community and the courts to fight the drug problem everywhere in this country.

Again, I ask this House to give this bill its early and full support.

Mr. Grant Hill (Macleod): Mr. Speaker, one of the instructive things when one has been on the opposition side of the benches and one moves to the government side allows one to look back at how one referred to a bill when one was in opposition. I encourage the members opposite to do that.

I have taken the opportunity to go back into the committee hearings and look at comments made by the hon. member when he sat over here.

Is it appropriate, Mr. Speaker, for me to refer to one comment made by one member when that member was in the opposition?

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Kilger): I believe so.

Despite a gradual decline in the abuse of most drugs, there are several alarming trends emerging on the horizon. Many drugs which are abused today are extremely potent with more potentially damaging consequences. Abusers are consuming drugs by much more dangerous means and they are using drugs in more dangerous combinations.

There is a growing frustration among law enforcement officials, community leaders from across the nation and Canadians in general. They are calling on provincial governments and the Government of Canada to assign a higher priority to dealing with drug abuse and its costly impact. Demands are being made for more severe sentences, a streamlining of the judicial system and assignment of the proceeds of drug crimes to help finance education and enforcement programs.

Court delays and complexities of administering the law have only helped to fuel the public's growing concern. Some law enforcement agencies have declared that the costs of enforcing the law against drug dealers have become high.

The government recognizes that these concerns require deliberate and sustained action, including combating the evil of addiction on three fronts: education and prevention, treatment and rehabilitation, and enforcement and control.

Bill C-7 corrects the deficiencies of existing drug control legislation. It encompasses all listed substances and declares them illegal for other than legitimate medical, scientific or industrial use.

In conjunction with the proceeds of crime legislation adopted in 1988 and proclaimed on January 1, 1989, the bill will empower the courts with the right to confiscate all property and capital accumulated as a result of or used in the commission of drug related crimes. This will provide police forces and the judiciary with the tools they need in a manner consistent with the charter of rights.

With the bill Canada will fulfil its international obligations found under the 1961 single convention on narcotic drugs, the 1971 convention of psychotropic substances and an international treaty governing the trade of illicit drugs.

The proposed bill can become an effective instrument in enforcing the law and controlling the import, export, production, sale, distribution and possession of illegal drugs. The bill seeks to update, enhance and consolidate a section of the Food and Drug Act and the Narcotic Control Act, both passed long ago in the sixties.

While the whims and wants of society have become more and more sophisticated since that time, unfortunately so has the network of drug producers and dealers.

• (1535)

The bill is designed to correct certain anomalies and shortcomings in our current law. In so doing it will enable law enforcement agencies to deal more effectively with a cunning, determined and resourceful adversary, the dealer in illicit drugs.

The new main provisions of the bill include controls on the import and export of precursor chemicals used by drug manufacturers. These chemicals include substances, usually not themselves psychoactive, which criminals can change easily into illicit drugs.

The bill also provides for provisions to control the production, sale, distribution, import and export of androgenic-anabolic steroids; provisions to control the possession, production, distribution, sale, import and export of designer drugs developed by dealers for the purpose of evading current laws; provisions to search, seize and have forfeited property used or intended for the purpose of committing drug offences, also known as offence related property including fortified drug houses.

The bill also includes a complete scheme for obtaining search and seizure warrants; the expansion of offences concepts relating to trafficking and production; the enhancement of control over disposal of controlled substances including forfeiture; new provisions to control the possession, production, distribution, sale, import and export of designer drugs; provisions which will facilitate Canada's commitments under the international conventions; and treatment by the courts of drug dealing in and around schools and other public places frequented by children and dealing drugs to minors as aggravating factors at the time of sentencing.

The principal purposes of the bill are to provide one comprehensive act for the drug control policy of the government and to provide for the enforcement and control aspects of Canada's drug strategy.

I will review briefly the seven principal parts of the bill as well as the introduction. Part I sets out the offences and punishment commensurate with breaking the proposed new law. The particular offences may include possession, trafficking, importing and exporting, production, possession of property obtained as a result of certain offences, and the laundering of proceeds obtained as a result of certain offences.

Part I also sets out specific aggravating factors to be considered by the court at the time of sentencing. These are directed particularly at drug dealers who target children, those who use weapons and violence, as well as those who have previous drug related convictions. This part also included a purpose clause dealing with sentences and, more particular, encouraging rehabilitation and treatment in appropriate circumstances.

Part II deals with enforcement of the proposed act by police. This includes provisions relating to search, seizure and detention of property or illegal substances, forfeiture of offence related property, as well as a complete scheme for protecting innocent third party rights over such property and forfeiture of proceeds of drug related crimes.

Part III outlines procedures for disposal of controlled substances. Part IV covers administration and compliance.

There are seven parts to the bill and its most important provision is that it moves Canada 30 years in time from the sixties to the nineties. It codifies and empowers police while at the same time it protects citizens. It gives us a Controlled Drugs and Substances Act that has merit and is enforceable.

The Speaker: Notice was given to another Speaker and I was just given a paper indicating that the member for Oakville—Milton is splitting her time with the hon. Parliamentary Secretary to the Prime Minister. The parliamentary secretary has approximately 9.5 minutes.

Ms. Jean Augustine (Parliamentary Secretary to Prime Minister, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, I rise to speak on Bill C-7, a bill in which many in Etobicoke—Lakeshore have an interest. I am talking about individuals who work in the areas of education, prevention, rehabilitation, treatment enforcement and control. Those individuals are very interested in the general types of control substances outlined in Bill C-7.

• (1540)

Narcotics are covered under the Narcotic Control Act, as well as some from the 1961 single convention. Examples of drugs in this group are cocaine, opium, codeine, morphine and marijuana. Controlled drugs, as defined under the Food and Drugs Act, are stimulants such as amphetamines and sedatives such as barbituric acid. Restricted drugs come under the Food and Drugs Act, the so-called designer drugs, as well as the anabolic steroids, the precursors and the drugs from the 1971 convention on psychotropic substances.

The majority of the substances are diverted from legitimate manufacturers and then illegally imported and sold. Until recently dealers have been able to sell the steroids at up to 20 times their prescription value with little risk of getting caught.

The amendments to the Food and Drugs Act and its appended regulations contained in the bill have resulted in 42 androgenic-anabolic steroids and their derivatives being classified as controlled drugs.

In the grim world of the effects of illicit drugs on the lives of abusers can be severe. This is the crux of my argument. If the effects on the lives of the abusers can be severe, the penalties proposed for convicted dealers in the most dangerous drugs should be severe. Sentences for the most serious offences of trafficking, importing or exporting narcotics remain life imprisonment in the bill.

We know that the specific provisions of the bill have been given the close scrutiny they deserve by a subcommittee on Bill C-7 of the Standing Committee on Health. I will comment on the work of that committee. Members heard from many national groups and associations representing a community of thousands of people, as well as officials from the departments of health and justice.

I will quickly list some of the groups that made representations before the committee: the Canadian Medical Association, the Canadian Pharmaceutical Association, the Canadian Association of Chiefs of Police, the Royal Canadian Mounted Police, the Canadian Centre on Substance Abuse, the Department of Public Health, the city of Toronto, the Addiction Research Foundation, the Canadian Bar Association, the Canadian Foundation for Drug Policy, Lambton Families in Action for Drug Education, the Quebec Bar Association and the Criminal Lawyers Association, et cetera. Many groups appeared before the subcommittee.

The subcommittee fully addressed each and every concern with the intent of improving the bill before us today. Several amendments were made at committee stage. Some particular issues of discussion resulted in amendment. The main amendments to Bill C-7 are the ones in which my constituents are interested.

The amendments create a new offence for possession of marijuana and hashish involving certain quantities. They create a new offence for trafficking in marijuana and hashish in certain quantities. They provide for a purpose clause dealing with sentences and, more particular, they encourage rehabilitation and treatment in appropriate circumstances.

The aggravated circumstances section has been expanded to cover in or near public places usually frequented by minors. This means that when an offender has been convicted in those circumstances a judge will have to give reasons for not imposing a jail term.

The amendments will delete subsection 3(1), which was meant to cover non-scheduled substances having or presented as having the same effect as scheduled substances. There were some apprehensions among other things that it might cover herbal products.

At the same time there is a limit on the ability of inspectors to examine the records so that they may not examine the records pertaining to the medical condition of patients.

• (1545)

The bill clarifies those situations where a practitioner would be considered to be trafficking by providing that unless authorized by the regulations it will be illegal to sell a prescription to obtain a scheduled substance. Several things have been done and several amendments have been made to the original Bill C-7.

Criminal Law Improvement Act, 1996 (Bill C-17)

Citation 1997, c. 18, s. 27

Royal Assent April 25, 1997

Hansard

June 10, 1996 [House of Commons]

Mr. Michel Bellehumeur (Berthier-Montcalm, BQ)

…Another amendment in this bill is aimed at making it easier to prove that someone helped launder the proceeds from crime. I must say right away that this is a step forward. We in the opposition have sought and continue to seek a major change, or at least a tougher attitude, in this regard, given that several countries consider Canada as an ideal place to launder money. I think this amendment is a step forward, but we will still need to look very seriously into this issue at some point in time, to ensure that Canada does not keep this unenviable title of crime money laundering paradise. For the time being however, as far as the bill before us, Bill C-17, is concerned, we suggest adding to the list of ways of participating in the laundering of proceeds of crime the fact that a person accepts that money be deposited in an account under his or her name, while knowing or believing this money was derived from a designated offence. Recently, several people have received letters requesting permission to deposit certain amounts in their banks accounts. Again, this is a current concern. There was a piece on this in L'Actualité a few months ago. Those who accepted later found their bank accounts to have been emptied out. Certainly, there is an element of voluntary blindness in accepting money from some unknown source abroad, under the mere promise of an eventual profit. But it did not pay off in the end, as the defrauder, who had deposited money in their bank accounts, then took it out, along with all their savings. This may be one of the means used to hide and launder proceeds from crime and, as I said, I think it should be provided for and included in Bill C-17. Other provisions complement existing provisions regarding credit card forgery and unlawfully obtaining computer services. For instance, it will now be illegal to possess or use a computer password to unlawfully obtain computer services. We must keep up with our times, and I think that the Criminal Code was in great need of updating, from a legal point of view, to be in step with new technologies, such as computer services.

June 10, 1996[House of Commons]

Mr. Jack Ramsay (Crowfoot, Ref.)

... We also support the portion of the bill which strengthens the proceeds of crime legislation by ensuring that criminals do not retain the profits of their crimes, but we cannot support Bill C-17. We do not support Bill C-17 because we are vehemently opposed to that portion of the bill which lessens the penalty for certain offences. That the justice minister felt it was necessary to slip this into an otherwise supportable bill is very regrettable in my eyes. We oppose Bill C-17 because it places Canadians at risk through continued Liberal leniency. The Reform Party will only support a judicial system, and changes within that system, that places the punishment of crime and the protection of law-abiding citizens and their property ahead of all other objectives and considerations.

...

November 28, 1996 [House of Commons]

Ms. Shaughnessy Cohen (Windsor-St. Clair, Lib.)

…We established an anti-smuggling strategy to combat illegal trade in tobacco, firearms and alcohol. We continue to implement the war crimes strategy announced in January 1995. We expanded efforts to fight organized crime by seizure and forfeiture of assets and provisions against money laundering, and on and on and on. Never, I would venture to guess in the history of our country, has there been a more prolific Minister of Justice. Never has there been a government so closely aligned with concern for Canadians and for their safety. This morning the member for Medicine Hat went out of his way to reinforce what Reform hammers home and that is the scare tactics, the irresponsible creation out of the air of statistics that are not valid. Crime has not increased. Youth crime has not gone up.

April 11, 1997 [House of Commons]

Mr. Michel Bellehumeur

…Here are some of the main areas affected by Bill C-17. The bill proposes a series of changes to deal more effectively with the proceeds of crime. Some of these changes will help the police to carry out seizures, including the money that makes the world of organized crime go round. In politics, money makes the world go round; the same is true of organized crime. I think we must have all the tools we need to seek out the proceeds of crime. If I may digress for a moment, this is what Mr. Bégin made very clear in a proposal that was rejected out of hand by the Minister of Justice on Monday, a proposal that favoured anti-biker legislation, with provisions that would help the police seize their money, their property, their bunkers, their armoured cars and their big limousines. The bill will make all this possible. I think that by cutting off their livelihood, it will be possible to get rid of the organized crime element. I just wanted to say that in passing. As for other aspects of this bill, there were several changes with respect to computer-assisted crime, counterfeiting and the fraudulent use of credit cards. I think we have to move with the times. The Criminal Code goes back many years and has to be updated regularly. That is the purpose of Bill C-17. We certainly had no objection to updating the Criminal Code. There are also provisions to deal more severely with driving under the influence. Here again, I think that considering certain court decisions, it was necessary to amend the Criminal Code in this respect. There are also provisions-and this is very important as far as the provinces are concerned-that will save money while helping counsel with court appearances. For instance, there are provisions for videoconferencing and the issuing of warrants by means of modern communications. Here again no one would have thought of this ten years ago, but, today, with informatics and the whole field of telecommunications, things like remote appearances are possible so as to save money for the provinces, which administer justice. All that is in Bill C-17. Clearly we support these provisions, but, once again, I think things could have gone further, as for example with the provisions on money laundering, because this is glossed over somewhat. Canada, let us face it, is the best country for money laundering. The Liberals opposite often boast that Canada is the finest country in the world, but in this finest country in the world, we annually launder, according to estimates, between $20 billion and $90 billion. The police estimate it as follows: only some 10 per cent of drugs are seized annually. The seizures are worth between $1.5 billion and $4.5 billion a year. A quick calculation reveals that 100 per cent would be over $20 billion. The President of the Treasury Board is looking at me with great interest. I am sure he sees a lot of numbers, but he has only to consult the Canadian crime service and the RCMP for confirmation of my figures. Bill C-17 should contain provisions to reinforce the whole matter of money laundering to further prevent it and to better equip the police so Canada loses its title. I will conclude on this point. The title is awarded by the great jurists of the world and by the Americans annually in September, because American inquiries and commissions look into the matter. Every year, the Canadian government is encouraged to strengthen its legislation to prohibit this activity because of the border between Canada and the United States. I could go on with my speech, but I see my time has run out.

Mr. Chairman, what I understand is that they are introducing the first phase because they do not know what to propose in the further phases. The minister has just said so. I understand. What I do not understand however is when he says that it was quick and effective. Again, I remind members that we have been asking the government to introduce this bill for two years now. The same thing can be said about Bill C-17. The minister spoke about it three or four times. I remind him that this bill had been introduced back in 1994. The Bloc Quebecois had to threaten the government to propose anti-biker amendments in order to get the minister to bring that bill back to the House and have it passed. There is another point I want to raise with the minister. The government of Quebec and the Bloc Quebecois raised on several occasions the issue of crime proceeds and money laundering in Canada. Again today, a newspaper mentioned that legislation on money laundering is very difficult to implement because there are so many loopholes. Reference is made to Canadian policemen; they must be the ones the minister says he has met several times. I also met several chiefs of police and policemen in Quebec, who told me almost the opposite of what the minister has been telling this House for the last little while, in particular about the legislation on money laundering, about which they were almost unanimous. I have even talked to judges and attorneys general of Canada. So, we read in the paper this morning that the police in Canada would love to have half or even one quarter of the measures that exist in similar legislation in the United States. As for the whole issue of anti-biker or anti-gang or anti-crime in general, we in the Bloc Quebecois have said repeatedly that stricter legislation is needed on money laundering. I realize that Bill C-95 contains provisions concerning the seizure of real property or other property. I know that Bill C-95 is a step forward. However, this is nothing compared with what chiefs of police have been asking for years in the way of legislation on money laundering. While the minister was at it, why did he not add some amendments on money laundering, in order to make this activity more difficult in Canada? Now we are known as the drug trafficker's paradise. We already knew that Canada was a tax haven for money laundering. The minister should realize there is some urgency in this case as well, and even the Bloc Quebecois would have liked to see him pass legislation to deal with this. As far as money laundering is concerned, when we talk to the police, they say that between 20 and 30 billion dollars are laundered annually. A judge of the Quebec Superior Court told me it could be as much as 50 or 60 billion dollars. Again, considering the urgent nature of these demands which, I think, we made very clear to the government, the same way we did in the case of anti-biker legislation, I want to ask the minister why, when he was working on this bill, he did not introduce legislation to make it well nigh impossible to launder money, an activity that is today a disaster for the economy? And tomorrow it will be even worse for Quebec, for a sovereign Quebec, but for Canada as well.

April 21, 1997 [House of Commons]

Mr. Alan Rock

Mr. Chairman, the hon. member mentioned his interest in the issue of money laundering. As I said before, we already adopted Bill C-17. In this bill, sections 27 to 39 deal with money laundering. Most of the improvements mentioned by the hon. member have already been passed in Bill C-17. Of course we need more. As I said before, we do not see Bill C-95 as the last phase of our efforts but as an initial step. So let us start with the first step, and then in a few months or a few years we will propose other measures, but for the first time, this bill will provide a legal framework for dealing with organized crime.

April 21, 1997 [House of Commons]

Mr. Michel Bellehumeur (Berthier-Montcalm, BQ)

Mr. Speaker, I am extremely pleased to speak at this stage on Bill C-95. As my hon. colleague for Hochelaga-Maisonneuve has just said, we have co-operated throughout the day and the Bloc Quebecois proposals are what accelerated the process of getting Bill C-95, an aAct to amend the Criminal Code (criminal organizations) and to amend other Acts in consequence, passed as quickly as possible. For us in the Bloc Quebecois, this is not just a matter that has been debated here for the past week. It is a very important subject. From the start, the Bloc Quebecois has been highly aware of the problem, because it is very much present in Quebec.

As far back as 1995, we tried to convince the minister of the importance of legislation on gangs, of anti-biker gang legislation, of legislation to fight the scourge of organized crime.

You will recall that the Bloc Quebecois had to question the government on several occasions sine 1995, that we in the Bloc Quebecois, the official opposition, had to make speeches in this House in order to convince the minister. Press conferences had to be held. On several occasions, the hon. member for Hochelaga-Maisonneuve met with the police chiefs. He even played a lead role in a pressure group lobbying for action to finally be taken in this area, for the passage of legislation against the biker gangs. You will recall, as well, that we even applied to the Speaker of the House for an emergency debate to be held on the whole matter of motorcycle gangs, organized crime and money laundering. You will recall that we were told there was no emergency. In 1993, the Bloc Quebecois promised its electors to give them real power and to defend their interests and it kept asking the federal government to take action, to do something that would put an end to this scourge. Though we are not responsible for introducing legislation, because we do not have the millions of dollars and the hundreds of lawyers who work in the Department of Justice-our means are very limited-we proposed in 1995 and later in private bills some definitions and means that would allow us to really go after organized crime and gang leaders. We proposed that in good faith to the government. We tried to force it to do what it is expected to do, and that is to legislate in its own jurisdiction. But that was not enough. We had to have bombs. How many bombs went off in Quebec before the minister decided to take action? There had to be murder attempts. We had to find dynamite across Quebec. There had to be murders. There were marches in Saint-Nicolas, demonstrations by mayors and public pressure. Some innocent people were injured. Members will also recall that young Daniel Desrochers was killed in that gang war. I remember very well that one day I asked the minister what he was waiting for to legislate. He kept saying there was no rush and that no legislation was necessary. The same day, we had six incidents connected with the biker war. Bombs exploded, someone was killed, a Molotov cocktail was thrown into a restaurant in Quebec City. Dynamite was found in Longeuil. There was a shooting in Saint-Nicolas. And the minister said there was no rush.

Do you know what convinced the minister that perhaps he should do something? It was when we threatened to amend Bill C-17 which been languishing in the House for at least two or three years, to amend it and include anti-biker provisions. The minister decided to act. More than that, after repeated questioning in the House, the minister decided to go and see for himself the problems they had in Quebec City. Fortunately, the air in Quebec City had a very salutary effect on the Minister of Justice, since he came back saying there was some urgency. There are those who fell from their horse on the road to Damascus and there are others who went to Quebec City to realize that action was urgently needed on the whole issue of the biker gang war in Quebec. So the minister came back from Quebec City saying this could not go on, a situation where people stayed home because they were afraid of being shot, because they were afraid of the biker war that was going on in a number of municipalities in Quebec. The problem is not recent. Back in 1982, a municipality, I think it was Sorel or Tracy, asked both levels of government to intervene, to pass legislation to help them fight what was starting to come to a head, in other words, all the bunkers being built and all the organized crime connected with all this.

The government of the day failed to act, and today's government, the Liberal government opposite, was not doing anything either. It took the members of the Bloc Quebecois, who are here solely to look after Quebec's interests, to make them understand that there was a problem and that immediate action was required. As I said earlier, we worked together to help the government get the bill passed as quickly as possible, in view of the fact that everyone knows elections are in the wings. We need only listen to the Prime Minister and his wife if we have any doubt at all. However, what surprises me today is that the Minister of Justice says this is just a first step. We are delighted the Minister of Justice has taken this course, as we have been pointing it out since 1995. We would have liked a bill that went further in fighting crime, but we accept the bill as it is. We will pass it in the hope that we can someday amend it as we would like in order to reach the goal we set ourselves. The Minister of Justice says it is a first step, a first stage. I asked the minister why, since he said that it was a first stage, a first step, he did not decide to go further. Quite candidly he told me that he will continue to look into this matter and see what he can do. Finally, he does not know what to do as the second, third and fourth stages. I encourage him to reread the entire private member's bill my colleague from Hochelaga-Maisonneuve introduced. I also suggest he reread the letters I wrote him in 1995 providing certain definitions in order to get to the leaders. Perhaps then the Minister of Justice will include a second stage, which we will soon have in another legislature. I hope that the Bloc Quebecois will be as strong then in order to defend Quebec's interests. I expect the minister will continue to move in the direction of the claims we made in this matter.

I can tell you right off two points the minister should consider for the second stage: the leaders and money laundering. On three occasions today, I asked the justice minister, who says that his bill goes directly after gang leaders, to show me where in Bill C-95 I could find something that dealt directly with gang leader. On three occasions he answered that it did so in a global way, that the bill had to be looked at in a global way. The minister never told me precisely where to look, and I will tell you why. It is because there is nothing in this bill which really deals with gang leaders. True, it is a step forward; true, it gives greater powers to the police; true, these are things the Bloc Quebecois had been demanding; true, we are satisfied and happy, but this bill does not go as far as we would have liked it to go. I would invite the minister not to misinform the public, but to tell what is truly in the bill; one thing that is definitely not in it is provisions dealing directly with gang leaders.

Among the definitions that the minister has put in this bill, there are certainly good ones. This is the first time that a criminal organization and an association have been defined. These are things that we have been asking for in the House since 1995, and we were told that it was not appropriate, that it could not be done. Of course, we are very happy to find that in a bill. This is a step forward. The Bloc Quebecois has helped the government, has contributed to the drafting of a new provision that had never been seen in Canada. Thanks to the Bloc Quebecois and its repeated representations, the government was convinced to proceed. We are very happy about that. However, although a gang and an association have been defined, the provision is drafted in such a way that it is still related to an individual, to the committing of a crime. We know full well that it is not the gang leaders who do the heavy work. It is not the leaders who set the bombs that exploded. It is not the leaders who gunned down an individual. It is not the leaders who threw a Molotov cocktail in the restaurant in Quebec City or who hid the dynamite sticks in Longueuil. It is not the leaders, but people who work for them and who get orders from them. How can we catch the leaders if the bill only helps us catch those who do the work and not those who order it? On three occasions, the minister has been unable to answer this question, simply because the Bloc Quebecois is right. This bill does not reach all the way up to the leaders, and something will have to be done about that very soon. If we are to put an end to this plague, we must deal not only with the ordinary members, but also with the leaders.

Another issue that would have been very easy for the Minister of Justice to address in the bill, as we repeatedly asked him, is money laundering. As you know, Canada has the dubious honour of being the G-7 country where the most money is laundered every year. According to the statistics and to judges and law enforcement officers, it is estimated that between $30 billion and $60 billion is laundered in Canada every year. Some judges say $60 billion, while law enforcement officers say between $30 billion and $40 billion, based on how much they have seized, which represents about10 per cent of all the money laundered in Canada. Given that they seize approximately $3.5 billion, $4 billion or $5 billion per year, they estimate money laundering to represent approximately $30 billion, $40 billion or $50 billion. But regardless of the exact amount, even it were only $20 billion per year, as my hon. colleague said earlier, this is about as much as Canada's annual deficit. It is a awful lot of money.

To cover all the bases and provide a comprehensive solution to the problem of biker gangs, organized crime and money laundering, provisions dealing with these specific issues could have been included in Bill C-95. For instance, the production and distribution of $1,000 bills could have been prohibited. Canada may be the only country in the world where such large denominations are used. According to our information, no country in the world has banknotes worth as much as $1,000. As we know it is not every John Doe that walks around with a wad of $1,000 notes in his pocket. My notebook, here, has less than 30 pages, but if it were a wad of $1,000 notes, I would have $30,000 in my hand. It is easy to carry, to pass from hand to hand. Money laundering is easy. We could simply prohibit that. It would have been very easy to include in Bill C-95 a provision about that. It would have been easy also to include in Bill C-95 provisions requiring financial institutions to report any dubious transaction of $10,000 and more. It would have been easy also to require casinos, travel agencies or any other groups which are paid or see carried about huge sums of money of $10,000 and more, to report such facts. One judge told me that, because of the current state of the legislation, he was unable, despite the bank's co-operation, to find guilty of fraud an individual who went to the bank to deposit a hockey bag full of money. He came in with the bag which he put on the counter saying he wanted to deposit some money. The bag held about $1 million in $50, $100 and $1,000 notes. Even if the bank did co-operate and even if the police did its work, there are so many loopholes in the Canadian legislation that the judge was not in a position to convict this man. Everybody goes around with bags full of dollars. Everybody does that in Canada. Oh, sure. It is total nonsense. It makes so little sense that on the very day when we are dealing with Bill C-95, we read this headline in a newspaper: Thanks to the weakness of our legislation, Canada is a paradise for traffickers. This news report says exactly what we have been repeating for two or three years: our legislation is ineffective. The report says that the Canadian legislation on the laundering of money has so many loopholes that it is extremely difficult to enforce. The Canadian police, and even those the justice minister brags about meeting a couple times, are dreaming of the day when they will have half or even only the quarter of the provisions existing in the United States. In Canada, we have to prove beyond any doubt that the money is the proceeds of criminal activities. In the United States, the onus is on the accused. Why did the minister not take the opportunity, with Bill C-95, to amend this legislation, when the government can count on the co-operation of all parties in the House to have legislation with teeth, and legislation that would meet the demands of many groups and political parties, like the Bloc Quebecois or the police association?

I will conclude by saying that this is a step in the right direction, but I would have liked the minister to listen more to the official opposition, the Bloc Quebecois. He did not agree 100 per cent with the Bloc, which would have been hard for him to do in this election period. However, I think the Bloc Quebecois made some remarkable progress here and will continue to fight and will still be here, after the next election, to ask the government for some amendments to this legislation, in order to meet the needs and the demands of Quebecers in this area.

An Act to amend the Criminal Code (criminal organizations) and to amend other Acts in consequence (Bill C-95)

Citation 1997, c. 23, s. 9

Royal Assent April 25, 1997

Hansard

April 21, 1997 [House of Commons]

Mr. Alan Rock

Mr. Chairman, what must be remembered is that the objective is not to deal with groups on the margin who may have three or four people committing crimes. The objective is to get tools into the hands of the police so they can gather evidence in relation to organizations that pose a serious risk to the safety of the community and that are engaged on a systematic basis in the commission of serious offences throughout the country.

The hon. member asked me about groups subdividing into cells of four in order to escape the strict terms of the definition. In my view if any such thing happened, the court could and would simply look beyond the artificial subdivision to the existence of the larger group on the facts and would not permit such a ruse or artifice to interfere with the enforcement of this law.

For example, just because a given biker gang which is internationally known and internationally active creates subgroups of four members each and gives them a different name would not protect them from this law. The court would be able to look at evidence of the reality behind the artifice and would be able to conclude that the group or association was broader than just the four members and would apply the law as such.

Let me get to the hon. member's broader question which has to do with how this law works. This law works in two fundamental ways.

First of all, for the first time it establishes a formal framework which defines organized crime. That framework provides access by the police, if they are investigating such a phenomenon, to investigative tools which would not ordinarily be available: wiretaps with a different standard; extensions of wiretaps which would otherwise not be available; prolonging the period after which notice of a wiretap has to be given, which in other cases would have to be given sooner. Access to income tax information is another investigative technique or tool which would not otherwise be available to the police. That is the first thing it does. It establishes a new category of organized crime. If the police are investigating it, they can do things they would not be able to do if they were investigating other kinds of crime.

The second thing this legislation does is it establishes different consequences for organized crime as opposed to other kinds of crime. Penalties are more severe. If a person commits the same crime but does it in association with, for the benefit of, or at the direction of organized crime, then the consequences will be more significant than they otherwise would be. The proceeds of crime legislation will apply to the crime. Beyond that, the court can not only seize the proceeds of the crime, it can also seize the instruments used to commit it. If a truck is used to drive explosives from point A to point B to plant them for the gang, the truck can be seized if the evidence shows it was an instrument used in the commission of the crime. Those are the two fundamental things in the bill. There are others. The first is that it establishes something called organized crime. For the first time in our Criminal Code it creates that category. It provides for special tools for the police when they investigate this category of crime which is very, very difficult to do. There are also special consequences including harsher penalties and application for the proceeds and instruments to be seized. Those are the two items.

There is another element my friend asked about which I would like to speak to briefly. He asked how we prove it or how it works. For example, if police forces thought they were investigating a gang and wanted to have access to these provisions, and say, for example, they were applying to the electronic surveillance board or wiretap board and wanted to be relieved of the obligation of proving it was a last resort as we proposed they should be able to, they would have to show reasonable grounds to believe that what they were investigating was an organized crime offence, that a criminal organization was involved and that these sections should pertain to that investigation. They would have to do that on proof. They would need to have evidence before the court to satisfy the reasonable grounds test and they would get the warrant under those circumstances.

April 21, 1997 [House of Commons]

Mr. Michel Bellehumeur

Mr. Chairman, what I understand is that they are introducing the first phase because they do not know what to propose in the further phases. The minister has just said so. I understand. What I do not understand however is when he says that it was quick and effective. Again, I remind members that we have been asking the government to introduce this bill for two years now. The same thing can be said about Bill C-17. The minister spoke about it three or four times. I remind him that this bill had been introduced back in 1994. The Bloc Quebecois had to threaten the government to propose anti-biker amendments in order to get the minister to bring that bill back to the House and have it passed.

There is another point I want to raise with the minister. The government of Quebec and the Bloc Quebecois raised on several occasions the issue of crime proceeds and money laundering in Canada. Again today, a newspaper mentioned that legislation on money laundering is very difficult to implement because there are so many loopholes. Reference is made to Canadian policemen; they must be the ones the minister says he has met several times. I also met several chiefs of police and policemen in Quebec, who told me almost the opposite of what the minister has been telling this House for the last little while, in particular about the legislation on money laundering, about which they were almost unanimous. I have even talked to judges and attorneys general of Canada. So, we read in the paper this morning that the police in Canada would love to have half or even one quarter of the measures that exist in similar legislation in the United States.

As for the whole issue of anti-biker or anti-gang or anti-crime in general, we in the Bloc Quebecois have said repeatedly that stricter legislation is needed on money laundering. I realize that Bill C-95 contains provisions concerning the seizure of real property or other property. I know that Bill C-95 is a step forward. However, this is nothing compared with what chiefs of police have been asking for years in the way of legislation on money laundering. While the minister was at it, why did he not add some amendments on money laundering, in order to make this activity more difficult in Canada? Now we are known as the drug trafficker's paradise. We already knew that Canada was a tax haven for money laundering. The minister should realize there is some urgency in this case as well, and even the Bloc Quebecois would have liked to see him pass legislation to deal with this. As far as money laundering is concerned, when we talk to the police, they say that between 20 and 30 billion dollars are laundered annually. A judge of the Quebec Superior Court told me it could be as much as 50 or 60 billion dollars. Again, considering the urgent nature of these demands which, I think, we made very clear to the government, the same way we did in the case of anti-biker legislation, I want to ask the minister why, when he was working on this bill, he did not introduce legislation to make it well nigh impossible to launder money, an activity that is today a disaster for the economy? And tomorrow it will be even worse for Quebec, for a sovereign Quebec, but for Canada as well.

Mr. Alan Rock

Mr. Chairman, the hon. member mentioned his interest in the issue of money laundering. As I said before, we already adopted Bill C-17. In this bill, sections 27 to 39 deal with money laundering. Most of the improvements mentioned by the hon. member have already been passed in Bill C-17. Of course we need more. As I said before, we do not see Bill C-95 as the last phase of our efforts but as an initial step. So let us start with the first step, and then in a few months or a few years we will propose other measures, but for the first time, this bill will provide a legal framework for dealing with organized crime.

April 21, 1997 [House of Commons]

Mr. Réal Ménard (Hochelaga-Maisonneuve, BQ)

Mr. Speaker, I really feel that today we are experiencing the British parliamentary system at its best, with the opposition co-operating and the government taking action. You will recall that, in August 1995, a tragic and totally unexpected event-there had been no warning sign-happened in the riding of Hochelaga-Maisonneuve when an 11-year-old boy walking back from the toy library, a very popular place in my community, was killed for being in the wrong place at the wrong time. I must say that since that event, people have been mobilizing, first in my community, and then throughout Quebec and Canada. I am very grateful to the minister; I recognize that when dealing with an issue such as this one, there is no room for partisanship among MPs. I thank the justice minister and his assistant, David Rodier, as well as Yvan Roy, who bent over backwards to keep the dialogue going on a number of legislative measures we thought had to be looked at in order to come up with concrete solutions to fight organized crime. Before going any further, I would also like to thank my colleague, the member for Berthier-Montcalm, our justice critic, who has been very active and perceptive in supporting the need for an antigang law.

We must be very clear with our fellow citizens. Nobody in this House claims that Bill C-95 will solve all the problems. None of us believes that passing this piece of legislation will eradicate organized crime. But what we are saying is that today we are sending a very strong message to the community as a whole to the effect that neither the official opposition nor the government will give up on this scourge. One could ask what is organized crime and how come that phenomenon has grown so much over the past few years.

I would like to propose a definition that is commonly used by police forces and to remind viewers that whenever we speak about organized crime, we are referring mainly to four elements. First, there are the proceeds of crime. Naturally, the purpose of organized crime is to make money. The second element is power, control over a specific territory. Then come fear and intimidation. The fourth and final element is corruption. You could say that organized crime does not exist in every society and you would be right. Some specific, precise conditions are required for organized crime to thrive in a society. There are at least four conditions which make cities like Montreal, Toronto, Calgary and Winnipeg, and the maritimes, good locations for organized crime. For organized crime to thrive, it needs a wealthy community where it can make money. That is why we talk about corruption in the third world, but in those countries, organized crime is quite different from its usual manifestations in urban environments. In order for organized crime to take root somewhere, it needs convenient access to major routes. Since it is an import-export trade, organized crime in Canada is concentrated in major centres across the country. For organized crime to prosper, it needs a free society, a society without dictatorial powers and oppression. Fourth, and probably the most important, is that, to prosper, organized crime needs a society where there are rights, charters and bureaucracy. We know full well-that is what police officers told me, and probably told the Minister of Justice also-that the greatest ally of organized crime is the charter of rights and freedoms, which has given it some immunity. It has been a powerful tool for organized crime. Once these conditions are met, organized crime proceeds in phases.

Operations of organized crime and its representatives have three different phases. The first one is control of a territory. Control of a territory is gained by intimidation, by generating fear. Such a territory becomes the exclusive turf of a particular group. After you control a territory, you get into money laundering. I will come back to the importance of money laundering for organized crime. I should mention that money laundering in Canada accounts for about $20 billion, invested in legal or illegal activities. Once money has been laundered, it can be invested in legal enterprises. In Montreal, to give you an example that I know very well, organized crime has invested mostly in restaurants, bars and the like, although I do not think this is unique to Montreal. I know it is the same in other communities. So, we welcome the minister's bill. We agree that, as hon. members and as legislators, we cannot give up, that, we must assume our responsibilities and take action on such an important issue. Of course, we would have preferred to have this debate much earlier, because, as Bloc members, we have been pleading with the Minister of Justice for two years to look into what is going on in Canada's big cities.

Today, we have a bill and we will co-operate. I say to the Minister of Justice that, if I can be of any help, wherever he wants me to speak or whatever he wants me to do, he can count on my full co-operation, because, once again, partisanship has no place in such an issue. I would like to mention an extremely troubling fact. We have known for three months now that organized crime has changed the way it operates. Criminal organizations must not be underestimated, they are intelligent, well organized, and they have many means at their disposal to carry out their activities. In the past, these organizations used to limit their operations to 60 days. They were active in counterfeiting and they could detect wire tapping devices, and they were aware that, when their lines were being tapped, the warrant could not go beyond 60 days. In that sense, I find the measure the minister is providing in the legislation most appropriate, making it not only easier to get warrants to authorize wire tapping, but also not necessary to prove that it is used as a last resort and the only investigative tool available to the police. It will be a lot simpler and easier to get such a warrant. However, I must say that the way bombs are made now, the way explosives are handled by both major gangs, and I am referring of course to the Rock Machine or the Hell's Angels, is that these people now put in devices to make sure that the bombs will explode. The police had come to be able to identify which gang the bomb came from by the way it was made, and the way the explosive device was put together, the way the bomb was assembled often gave an indication of which group was responsible for it. To counter that, criminal organizations began to equip explosive devices with a timer so that no bomb ever misfire. The reason I am telling you this is obviously not to scare people but to make them understand that organized crime and its various manifestations are not something transitory that will go away and that we will not have to worry about a few weeks down the road. The justice minister is right to put forward such a bill because organized crime is a permanent fixture. Even though we passed Bill C-61 on the laundering of the proceeds of crime, organized crime has prospered. I think the measures being proposed here will be relevant and effective in helping police forces conduct investigations more quickly and produce much stronger evidence. Ultimately, attorney generals will be able to dig up evidence and initiate legal proceedings. Criminals will stand trial and we will be able to dismantle or at least shake up the higher echelons of organized crime.

This bill contains 10 specific provisions I would like to explain to the people listening to us. First of all, the essence of this bill is that it creates the new offence of participation in a criminal organization. The bill provides that any offence for which the punishment is five years in prison or more will be deemed a criminal organization offence. Indeed the minister has cast a wide net. The bill covers drug offences, possession of stolen goods, influence peddling, and all other criminal organization offences. This is a judicious bill that defines criminal organizations as any group consisting of five or more persons. I tend to agree with this number. I know that Reform members have suggested that this number be reduced to three. But I think that, given the way organized crime works, we will be able to meet the objectives of this bill while maintaining this number at five. So a new offence has been created. The minister did not agree to the request made by the Quebec government to add a provision on crime by association. Since the beginning of this debate, the minister has been extremely reluctant to create a crime by association. I do respect the legal arguments behind his position. I think we could have created a crime by association, which would have been in compliance with both section 1 of the Charter and the legal guarantees in sections 7 to 14 of same. What is important however is not to determine if I was right, if the minister was right, or if the Quebec government was right, but to dismantle any known criminal gangs. So, a new offence is created. New provisions concerning explosives have also been added. That was also something the Government of Quebec had requested. The bill says that any person who possesses, uses, or handles an explosive substance for the benefit, in total or in part, of a criminal organization is guilty of an offence, under aggravating circumstance, and liable to imprisonment for 14 years. I think it is very important to understand how crucial this provision is, because as we know, explosives are very often used to commit crime, especially by biker gangs. This will now constitute an aggravating circumstance. This notion of aggravating circumstance is already included in the Criminal Code, since, a few years back, we had section 718.9 modified to add a number of factors that, taken into consideration by the judges, lead to tougher sentencing. If a criminal offence is committed by an organized gang, this will be considered an aggravating circumstance, especially when explosives are used. I think this is an extremely positive measure. Judges will also be given the possibility of deferring or postponing parole, or restricting eligibility to parole. It will be possible for them-and this is quite clear in the bill-when an individual is sentenced for gangsterism, to order that 50 per cent of the sentence must be served before the individual can be eligible to parole. I think this measure is extremely important because it encourages informers. One of the extremely modern ways to fight organized crime is to encourage informers to come forward. Nobody in organized crime will ever confess, agree to testify or co-operate if he or she knows that three, four or five months down the road, the person he or she informed against will be free to make trouble for them. Measures like postponing parole or aggravating circumstances are very important measures because they favour informers, which is a key weapon, often used, to track down organized crime.

Another extremely important measure I talked about a little earlier is that it will be easier to obtain a warrant for electronic surveillance. Nowadays, electronic surveillance is a last resort measure. One has to demonstrate to the satisfaction of a judge that this is the ultimate way to conduct investigations. Thanks to the provisions of this bill, it will be easier to not only get authorization to proceed with electronic surveillance but also to extend the warrant as much as up to one year. This is extremely important. Another clause will make it easier and faster to obtain search warrants, for which one needs evidence, of course. The judge will always have to be satisfied. The bill contains an extremely interesting and original provision which provides for the forfeiture not only of the proceeds of crime, but also of vehicles used to commit offences. For example, if a truck is used to commit a crime, it could be confiscated. If a building is used-because the bill also applies to buildings-it could be confiscated. At present, there are provisions in a number of laws which allow for the forfeiture of property, but it is always done by a court order and it always pertains to property deemed to have been used in laundering of proceeds of crime. We will now be able to confiscate not only property used for the laundering of the proceeds of crime, but also property, such as a vehicle, used to commit a crime.

Another extremely interesting provision is that the judge will be able to issue an order to keep the peace, to refrain from seeing certain persons, from leaving the country, a judicial order against a person if there is sufficient evidence that that person will take part in the commission of a crime by a criminal organization. In other words, it is a preventive measure. The price of not keeping the peace could be an offence punishable by fine or imprisonment. The final measure the minister referred to concerns information and provides that the solicitor general will table an annual report on organized crime, on what progress has been made, where organized crime is active and, obviously I hope, on suggestions for fighting it. It is overall an interesting bill. It combines a number of measures called for by police and the Government of Quebec, particularly with respect to explosives. We must nevertheless realize today that we as parliamentarians have become aware of what is going on in organized crime because people have taken action. Some of them are fellow residents in my riding of Hochelaga-Maisonneuve, including the mother of young Daniel Desrochers, Josée-Anne, who circulated a petition and who used every public forum to awaken parliamentarians. I think that whoever we are and wherever we sit in this House we owe a debt of gratitude to Josée-Anne Desrochers. The police also acted and created CAPLA, the Comité d'action politique pour une loi anti-gangs. There was all sorts of pressure. As well, there was my colleague, the member for Berthier-Montcalm, who took the lead in this matter and very early on spoke to the minister on a number of occasions. He was very stubborn, obsessive and persevering, I would say. It helped, because his efforts were not in vain. The proof is that today we have legislative measures.

Here are a few indications of the scope of organized crime, showing how its effects are felt throughout society, and how important it is for us, as legislators, to be extremely vigilant. In 1992, the underground economy was estimated at 5.2 percent of the gross national product, some $36 billion. That is in 1992 dollars. In today's dollars, those numbers would be a lot higher. The Insurance Bureau of Canada estimates that annual losses associated with unrecovered stolen vehicles-which is also one aspect of organized crime-amount to $293 million; $293 million per year for stolen vehicles. A pretty considerable sum. In 1994, Canadian chartered banks estimated their losses due to fraud at $143 million. Within organized crime, there is a sort of specialization. Some groups have become expert in what we call counterfeiting bank notes and putting them into circulation. I think this is a specialty of Asian groups, who have become quite expert at it. In 1994, the banks reported they had lost $143 million because of fraud. The most interesting number comes from very knowledgeable people in the field-the police forces-and concerns the income generated by organized crime, which is estimated at $20 billion. The figures for revenues from crime are close to the figures for the Canadian deficit. How much is the Canadian deficit? My colleague for Berthier-Montcalm, who follows these issues closely, could tell me the exact amount, but I believe it is $19 billion. The Canadian deficit is about $19 billion while revenues from crime total $20 billion per year. Is it possible, as legislators, to remain idle when confronted with this fact? I think not. However, despite all the good things I said concerning the government-and believe me, this is extremely circumstantial-the fact remains that it could have done much more. We made representations to the government. So did other groups, that is police forces and other people involved. We know perfectly well that the next step will certainly be the laundering of money. We know that. The fact that Canada is a money laundering paradise is very well known.

Canada is extremely liberal on that matter. This cannot go on. I must tell you the police community made a very important demand, that is the obligation for the major chartered banks to report any suspicious transaction over $10,000. This is extremely important for those who investigate to be able to trace back the origin of suspicious transactions. Right now, chartered banks must keep a record of all operations that they think are suspicious, but they are under no obligation to report them. I think it would have been worthwhile to include a legal provision specifying that failure to report such operations may be a punishable offence. I am convinced that banks would have co-operated, because the Canadian Bankers Association has taken some internal measures to detect dubious transactions, but all this must become an obligation. Police officers had also asked that $1,000 bills be taken out of circulation. Is there anyone in this House naive enough to think that ordinary people walk on the street with $1,000 bills in their pockets? Mr. Speaker, if I you were to do a survey in this place, I am sure that very few of us-including yourself, the pages, the members of this House and the people in the gallery-would have a $1,000 bill in their pockets. We know full well that the $1,000 bill makes it possible for some people to carry large amounts in their pockets and we know for sure that the $1,000 bill is a boon to organized crime. The Canadian Police Association has asked that the $1,000 bill be taken out of circulation, and that is something that will have to be considered. Here is another extremely important demand: I was telling you earlier about the need to have banks divulge dubious transactions of more than $10,000, and I think that must not be restricted to the banks. Casinos could also be included in that list, as well as travel agencies and all those businesses trading in luxury items that may eventually be infiltrated and help us trace the criminal chain of command.

These are some measures we are suggesting. I think the justice minister will welcome them. I want to remind him that the reality of organized crime is not temporary. It is a huge threat. To this day, organized crime has managed to poison the life of entire communities, and I am thinking of course about the eastern part of Montreal with what happened in the riding of Hochelaga-Maisonneuve, but it is not only the eastern part of Montreal that is deeply affected by this reality. This reality is also a daily concern for the people of Saint-Nicolas, who have mobilized to fight this problem. Is it acceptable that bunkers can be built in urban centres, near residential areas, and that people can openly and publicly make money through illegal means and disturb the peace within our communities? I think not. As parliamentarians, we have a responsibility to do everything in our power to stop these people, to hold them accountable, to send them to prison and to launch investigations. Too often, over the past few years, I heard people say that it was the police's fault, because they did not build good cases. I took part in public debates, open lines and television shows where the easy argument that was used was: "If the police did a better job, it would be easier to fight organized crime". I think this argument does not withstand scrutiny because each time a police force wants to press charges, there are prosecutors and lawyers who study these cases to see how well the evidence would stand up in court, to determine if it could be challenged or not. It is not just about police resources; it is also about the Criminal Code and giving the courts the interpretation tools they need. I am not saying that adding police resources is not a good thing. I am thinking of course about the Carcajou squad, in Montreal, and GRICO. It is indeed a good thing. When, in a special squad, you have the means to shadow individuals, the more people you have in your squad, the easier it is not just to build solid cases but to act quickly. There is something that must never be forgotten. You know how devious the whole field of law is. You know the effect one decision can have on case law and how it can change the course of law. I know that my colleague, the member for Berthier-Montcalm, who is a lawyer, one of the best I would say, but not a criminal lawyer, is aware of the 1992 Stinchcombe ruling. How did this affect case law? It meant that, with respect to disclosure of evidence, the public prosecutor is obliged to file, before the trial, all the elements that contributed to the evidence. This means that all information regarding a tail, personal notes, videotaped material, everything that contributed to the evidence must be handed over to the defence. This is fraught with consequences, because it forces those building cases to be extremely imaginative, extremely innovative in order to outwit their opponents from one trial or investigation to the next. On the whole, I think this is a bill that deserves our support. As the opposition, we are going to co-operate. We did so today. We have acted very expeditiously. I say again to the minister that, whatever we can do, whatever forum he would like to send us to, whatever demonstration we can take part in to ensure that this bill is passed before the imminent election that you know will see us back here as the official opposition, just as we are now, we will co-operate. If the minister wants us to make representations to the other House to help things along, we are prepared to do so because we have known for several months that partisanship has no place in this issue of organized crime. All my colleagues in the Bloc Quebecois agree with me that, when public safety is at stake, when the tranquillity of entire sections of the community are threatened, we have a responsibility to act quickly, not to be complacent. That is what we have done as the official opposition and that is what we will continue to do in the coming days.

April 21, 1997 [House of Commons]

Mr. Alan Rock

… What will the bill give police forces that they do not already have under the existing Criminal Code? Why do they think it will be important to them in their fight against organized crime? At the moment if police officers want to get a wiretap they have to prove a number of things to a judge first. Among those they have to prove on evidence that every other kind of investigative technique either has been tried and failed or if it was tried would fail because of the nature of the investigation. That takes police officers to the point of having to swear an affidavit or other form of particulars of what has already been done, go through the list of alternative methods and satisfy the court on evidence that it is a last resort in the investigation of a certain crime. The bill would remove that burden. It would simplify the process of getting a wiretap if the police officer is investigating criminal organization offences. Similarly with warrants. Returning to wiretaps, it would relieve police officers of a paper burden. We are not saying we should allow free access to intrusive methods because it is administratively difficult for police. We are saying we should make that change because when investigating organized crime it is almost always obvious that it is a last resort for the reasons I have already given. It is very difficult to investigate. We are taking a burden from the police which we think is undue in the circumstances of offences of this kind. Some say if it is all so easy to establish they can establish it to the satisfaction of the judge and nothing is lost. We are trying to recognize the unique character of these offences in the way investigative tools are available to police officers. If we have the courage to conclude on the facts that it is almost always the last resort, then let us say it in the criminal law and not have the police go through the empty process of establishing it. It sends a signal as well. Furthermore, police officers have told me that they get wiretaps and the day after they start the paperwork to prepare for the renewal because they only get it for 60 days. They tell me that in the context of an organized crime offence it is absurd because those investigations take an exceptional period of time. They have to put together bits and pieces of conversations and relate them to other information. It is a very complex process. They almost always need the wiretap for longer than 60 days. In the bill we are permitting the court to provide the wiretap for an extended period so that the police will be using their resources investigating crime rather than busily working at paperwork for the extension application. Similarly notice of the wiretap has to be given after the wiretap is finished to people wiretapped so that they know it and can take proceedings. We have extended the period during which they can give notice in these cases because some of the investigations go on for an exceptional period of time. At the moment there is a very narrow category of offences for which access to income tax information can be gained. That is as it should be. Income tax is filed on an undertaking with the Canadian people. It is implicit the information be kept absolutely confidential by Revenue Canada. We do permit it at the moment for a very few offences. Officials will know the sections. Basically they deal with drug offences.

What we have proposed is significant. It is to extend the category of access to tax information to assist in investigations into organized crime offences. They cannot just walk in and take the information out of a file. They have to go before a judge, get a warrant, establish to the satisfaction of the judge that a criminal organization offence is being investigated, and that they need the information and it relates to the investigation. Then the warrant can be given and can be limited to such information as the court thinks is appropriate. Nonetheless it is an important breakthrough in terms of giving police more information to fit the puzzle together as to who has what, what are the proceeds of crime, what money is being laundered or what illegal activity is taking place? Similarly we are proposing for the first time to extend the proceeds of crime legislation beyond drug offences and the like to organized crime offences. It is not only the proceeds. Cash can be taken from their desks during the arrest. It can be instruments as well possibly including real estate if it has been fortified or modified to facilitate the commission of an offence. That is a very important point.

We spoke to the mayor of St. Nicolas or other communities where there are headquarters of organizations of great concern to the citizens. We can imagine a gang setting up in a municipality somewhere, taking over a house, fortifying it, setting up barriers so that the police could not raid it, putting concrete in front and surveillance cameras on top, modifying it and selling drugs out the back door or using it to store explosives or some other such thing.

If the real estate is modified or fortified to facilitate the commission of criminal offences, the real estate could be regarded as one of the instruments of crime and could potentially be seized after conviction for an organized crime offence. That is an extremely important tool.

The bill includes serious increases in sentences for crimes committed in association with or for the benefit of criminal organizations. I could have explosives illegally on my person and I would be subject to a maximum of five years in prison. If I am doing it for the benefit of a gang, if I am delivering the explosives to a gang or have planted them for the gang, whether or not I am part of the gang I could face up to 14 years in prison. Why? Because we are targeting organized crime which in turn is targeting us, our families and our children. That is why. That is not only important because it reflects society's denunciation of organized crime activity. It is also an important tool for the police that may be in a position of having picked people up, arrested them and charged them. Then they have a potentially serious sentence facing them. Police officers can say they are prepared to discuss with them the charge they will be brought before the court on or what submission they will make to the court in relation to the sentence if they co-operate by providing them with information they need. It is a very important tool for police that should not be underestimated.

Then there is the so-called peace bond provision which is not there now. It will let police officers bring someone before the judge and say they have reasonable grounds to fear the person will commit a criminal organization offence. They can ask the judge to look at the evidence, at the people he associates with, at what he has done in the past, at what the wiretap has turned up and at all the other circumstances. Then they invite the judge to conclude there is a reasonable basis to fear the person will commit a criminal organization offence. They can tell the judge that he has committed a number of them in the past and is still with the same group of people. They can ask the judge to look at what he has said publicly and privately. In those circumstances the court can impose for up to a year conditions on the person's liberty such as prohibiting him from communicating with other members of the group. This would seriously undermine the ability of the leadership of groups to carry on their business. The police believe that is also a valuable tool. I take the member's point. I should have to satisfy him that what we are proposing here is not only lawful but will be effective. I am able to report from my dealings with the police, the crown attorneys and the attorneys general of the provinces that we have a collection of measures. They are not enough in and of themselves but they will make a difference. They will make it that much easier for the police to tackle this dreadfully difficult problem. We will be back in the future with more proposals. This is only the first phase of what we will do. Organized crime is a menace in the country. I do not think most of us have an appreciation for what a serious threat it is to the economy and future of the country. It is a good start. These measures will make a difference for police and that is why we are here.

September 29, 1997 [House of Commons]

Hon. Andy Scott (Solicitor General of Canada, Lib.)

…Another area where police have said they need more and sharper tools is in the fight against organized crime. Organized criminal activities are clearly a matter of growing concern for the police, the general public and the government. The recent bikers war in Quebec underscores that organized crime is not something intangible, something that happens in dark alleys hidden from view, but can and does have a direct impact on our neighbourhoods. The international trafficking in illicit drugs with associated money laundering continues to be the highest threat of all. Recognizing that organized crime knows no jurisdictional boundaries, our efforts to fight it are and will continue to be domestic, continental and international in scope. Nationally there is a strong and growing commitment among police and law enforcement agencies in all jurisdictions to work with my ministry and the Department of Justice to build stronger partnerships to combat organized crime. This fall I will be making in the House of Commons the first annual statement on organized crime to report on the implementation of the anti-gang legislation, Bill C-95, and our efforts to improve co-ordinated enforcement. Also in this regard I will be meeting tomorrow with Janet Reno, the American attorney general, to review progress and identify the next steps in our co-operative Canada-U.S. efforts to fight cross-border crime. Citizen participation in determining solutions is no longer an option. As far as we are concerned it is an obligation. We in government must not forget our obligation to keep Canadians informed of developments in the criminal justice system. We need to share information about issues of importance to Canadians in order that we can have fruitful and informed discussions on those very issues.

November 27, 1997 [House of Commons]

Mr. Richard Marceau (Charlesbourg, BQ)

Madam Speaker, organized crime is a major problem in Quebec and Canada, but particularly in the Quebec City area, where my riding of Charlesbourg is located. As my hon. colleague from the Reform Party mentioned earlier, there was another murder in my riding last week, in a family restaurant. As families were enjoying a quiet evening meal at the restaurant, they witnessed the cold-blooded murder of a man. This dramatic incident is but one example of the kind of violence biker gangs are responsible for in Quebec. It has reached such proportions that recently—two weeks ago I think—the Lloyds Insurance Company of London announced its intention to no longer insure bars in the Quebec City area. This shows how bad the situation is. The party that has been asking this government to do something about biker gangs since 1995 is our party, the Bloc Quebecois. After the Bloc Quebecois put a great deal of pressure on the government in Ottawa on behalf of Quebeckers, the government started to act in April 1996, but that was not enough, because too many unfortunate incidents have occurred in the past year. As I referred to a while ago, there is a very heavy concentration of biker gangs in Quebec. There are, of course, the Hell's Angels, but there is also the Rock Machine, which is apparently about to join forces with another biker gang, an international one this time, called the Bandidos. It is very clear that the government does not have the desire to put all of the law enforcement resources necessary in place to deal with this problem. In his speech, the minister claims that he has restored security in the border communities where the goods were crossing. As recently as this fall we witnessed the aborted raid at Kahnawake, where there were sizeable stocks of arms brought in from outside, and it was not the Quebec Minister of Public Security who was responsible for aborting the raid, either. This one very recent example can make us doubt the desire of this government to fight organized crime effectively.

One can also ask oneself the following question: Is the antigang legislation the government across the floor wants to see passed sufficient? Is it stringent enough? According to the Bloc Quebecois, even the definition of a criminal organization, referred to a moment ago by my hon. colleague from the Reform Party, still does not go far enough. Vagueness remains, and this could lead to challenges of the constitutional validity of this legislation. The act also authorizes the seizure of goods that have been used by criminal organizations. Although it is a nice initiative, a look at the concrete facts points to some shortcomings. Consider the cases where the police moves in to make a seizure. Two weeks ago there was a raid at the Hell's Angels hideout in Saint-Nicolas, near Quebec City. When the police arrived at the bunker, they took it over, but there was almost nothing left. Is there not a way to ensure that the police can act more quickly so that these seizure operations can really be effective against organized crime? This is a legitimate question. Concerning Bill C-95, the Minister of Justice at the time said that the object was to hit the master minds behind these criminal organizations. But at that time, the bill was not at all that clear, and I remember a discussion between my colleague for Berthier—Montcalm and the minister. My colleague had difficulty finding in the bill what was meant by a master mind, and these people were not mentioned anywhere in the bill. So this is another weakness in the bill.

The minister also wants to give the police more flexibility to carry out investigations on money laundering. This is an excellent initiative, but we have to go further than that. We should also consider parole because, beyond these gang problems, there is for instance the Lagana case, where the lawyer succeeded in getting him paroled after he had served one sixth of the sentence. The minister will have to tighten up the law generally and also the Parole Act so as to prevent this type of criminal from going on parole so soon. In this regard, I will be introducing in a few minutes a bill to amend the Corrections and Conditional Release Act so as to make it clearer. Its purpose will be to amend section 103 of that act so that appointments to the National Parole Board will stop being subject to the political patronage they are exposed to nowadays and will instead be made under supervision by the people, and through the people under the supervision of the elected members of this House. In this way, impartial people will be appointed and they will have the necessary background to deal with this type of problem. In conclusion, many other efforts have to be made in the fight against organized crime. The government must act and it must act quickly to reassure the public, which is frightened. They have reasons to be frightened when violence reaches people in a family restaurant in a quiet and prosperous suburb. The government must come to realize that its laws and its commitment to deal with this issue are not clear. One reality that the government does not seem to recognize is the fact that biker gangs, to take only this example of organized criminal groups, are growing, and that every day there are more and more people joining these gangs. The Bloc Quebecois doubts that the government is willing to commit the necessary resources to the fight against organized crime, and we expect initiatives that are much more concrete than those that the minister is proposing today.

Corruption of Foreign Public Official Act (Bill S-21)

Citation 1998, c. 34, ss. 9 & 11

Royal Assent December 10, 1998

Hansard

December 3, 1998 [Senate]

Céline Hervieux-Payette

Honourable senators, I am pleased to rise to speak on a bill of such major importance for the conduct of international business.

Corruption is a threat to the rule of law, democracy and human rights. It undermines the principle of good governance, threatens the stability of democratic institutions and undermines the moral foundations of society. Corruption is prejudicial to international trade and free competition, and hampers economic development, particularly in developing countries. Through its OECD partners, Canada is working actively to encourage global systems for ensuring security and the improvement of the human condition and to strengthen trading ties, in order to help nations develop and prosper. We are increasingly aware that the best way to defend our national interests is to defend them within international institutions and tribunals and to put in place rules and institutions that will allow Canadians to obtain the kind of protection they need.

Bribery of public officials is one of the major problems encountered in international trade and investment. Within the OECD, it is a very important issue for Canada and for other international organizations. The OECD has 29 members, including Canada, the United States, most of the European countries, Japan and South Korea, and is the principal economic policy tribunal for the most advanced industrialized democracies.

The convention binds each signatory to establish a criminal offence of bribery of foreign public officials in international transactions and to take the necessary action, in accordance with its legal principles, to establish the responsibility of corporations in the event of bribery of a foreign public official.

Each party, or country, must ensure that these penalties are effective, appropriate and dissuasive, and that the bribery and the proceeds of the bribery can be seized. The range of penalties must be comparable to that for domestic bribery. The new offence of bribery of foreign public officials is a crime carrying a maximum jail sentence of five years. Section 67.5 of the Income Tax Act has also been amended to add this new offence to the list of Criminal Code offences to which this provision refers, thus ensuring that bribes paid to foreign public officials are not tax deductible.

The convention also requires the parties to ensure that bribes and the proceeds of bribing a foreign public official can be seized and confiscated, and to consider imposing other civil or administrative penalties. The new offence of bribery of foreign public officials is an organized crime offence authorizing the search, seizure and detention of criminal proceeds and is also considered a major offence in a charge of laundering criminal proceeds.

The convention also contains provisions dealing with enforcement, legal assistance and extradition, which Canada already meets. Where their judicial system allows it, each party is required to provide assistance with criminal and civil matters. During the negotiations, Canada said it could provide assistance to other states in criminal matters but not in civil ones.

At the G-8 Summit in Birmingham, Canada and the other G-8 members undertook to make every effort to ratify the OECD Convention by the end of 1998.

The Canadian business community considers the OECD Convention to be one of the greatest achievements to date in the international campaign to combat bribery. This convention is regarded as an opportunity to create an environment in which Canadian companies will be able to compete on the basis of quality, price and service, as it will limit the capacity of foreign competitors to use bribery to land contracts.

So far, Japan and Germany have tabled their instruments of ratification with the Secretary-General of the OECD. Also, the United States and the United Kingdom have completed their domestic procedures and should table their instruments in the coming weeks.

Five of the OECD's ten largest countries must ratify the Convention by the end of 1998 for it to come into force. We hope that Canada, as a leader in the fight against corruption, will be the fifth country to ratify the convention.

[December 3, 1998][Senate Committee of the Whole]

The Honourable Lloyd Axworthy, P.C., M.P., Minister of Foreign Affairs

Honourable senators, thank you for the opportunity to appear before your committee and to address Bill S-21 dealing with the bribery and corruption of foreign officials in international business transactions. This is a very important piece of legislation. I appreciate the fact that the Senate is now in deliberation on this matter.

Senator Hervieux-Payette, in presenting this bill, made a very important point. She said that corruption distorts all aspects of international trade, competition, economic development and investment. In fact, it has a corrosive effect on the fundamentals of the rule of law, democracy and human rights.

I would compliment the Standing Senate Committee on Foreign Affairs for its recent report on Asia which I had the opportunity to read last evening. It makes a very important connection between an effective business climate and an effective global system which has the responsibility to live up to the rule of law and to adhere to basic principles.

It has certainly been my experience in negotiating and working on a number of these matters that one of the most insidious influences that we now face internationally is the incidence and frequency of corruption in a wide variety of countries. It undermines not only what we do as Canadians in our relations, but it has also had quite a dramatic and horrific effect on a number of countries.

By taking the position represented in this legislation, by setting certain standards and following up with efforts to provide a much stronger international code, we believe countries will, themselves, incorporate a broader set of standards and behaviours which will improve the general business climate internationally. We believe this effort will also impact upon the capacity of countries themselves to develop a regime which recognizes that good government, clean and honest government, is the most effective form of promotion for economic development, economic growth, and maintaining good relationships internationally.

In this sense, we are exporting not only our goods and services but certainly our values. We have learned the hard way that integrity and probity in one's behaviour result in all kinds of benefits and proper conduct. That, in itself, will result in a much better climate of relationships for all of us.

In developing our partnerships, it is important that we tackle these problems. As senators know, this has been a major focus of work in the OECD. It has commanded the attention of OECD ministers. Agreements were made just in 1997 to proceed with this.

The OECD draft was put together last spring. Since then, we have worked actively in consultation with the provinces and with the business community in Canada to see how it can be implemented. The legislation that is before you today is a result of that.

I should also like to mention that the Organization of American States has also adopted a convention on corruption which follows many of the same principles, as has the Council of Europe. What you can see is a broadening network of commitment and engagement of a number of countries in establishing these kinds of standards.

This legislation will allow Canada to honour the commitments that we have made at the OECD, as well as commitments made by the Prime Minister at the Denver Summit of the G-8 and the United Nations. I strongly believe that it will also respond to the needs of Canadian business. Most honourable senators have probably received correspondence or know that the business community, in particular the international business community of Canada, has been a strong advocate of this legislation. You will be hearing later from the transparency group who will make the point for you. To their credit, they believe that doing clean business is good business. They have been a strong promoter of this measure.

We are in a very key position at this time. Under the OECD rules, five countries are needed to ratify it in order for it to become law. Canada is the fifth country to provide the ratification. If we can do this expeditiously, we will be able to claim that we are providing the key which will unlock the door to making this happen.

The essence of the convention is the requirement that each state which is party to it will criminalize the bribery of foreign officials, and take measures to establish the liability of legal persons, which also includes corporations, for the bribery of foreign public officials. If you look at clause 3 of the bill, you will know that this is the centrepiece of the proposed legislation before you.

The provision prohibits the bribery of a foreign public official in the course of business. It would be punishable on indictment and carries a maximum penalty of five years in prison.

The bill describes facilitation payments that would be exempt from the ambit of the offence. Facilitation payments are the normal course of licensing fees and permits which one uses in terms of international trade discourse, for example, cargo fees. As well, it would not be an offence if the advantage were lawful in the foreign public official's country or public international organization. Countries have their own laws which we must recognize and by which we must play.

Reasonable expenses incurred in good faith and directly related to the promotion, demonstration or explanation of products and services, or to the execution or performance of a contract, could also be argued as a defence under the act.

Honourable senators have also heard reference to the fact that bribes paid to foreign public officials under this legislation would not be deductible under the Income Tax Act.

The bill further proposes to create two additional criminal offences, namely, the offence of possession of property or proceeds obtained from bribery of foreign public officials; and the offence of laundering the property or proceeds.

In closing, it is useful to quote Donald Johnston, a former minister of justice who is now the Secretary General of the OECD. In a recent article he was quoted as having said that integrity in commercial transactions is essential in making the global marketplace work and to assure that the public supports it. He said that the logical consequence of globalization is that honesty has to be enforced at the global, not just the national, level.

With the passage of this legislation, Canada has the opportunity to ratify the OECD convention and to bring it into force, thus ushering in a new era of international accountability.

Mr. Chairman, I believe that explains the basic intent of the legislation. I would be happy to answer any questions that members of the committee may have.

December 3, 1998 [Senate Committee of the Whole][Entire Exchange]

Senator Joyal: Clause 6 of the bill reads as follows:

A peace officer or a person acting under the direction of a peace officer is not guilty of an offence under section 4 or 5 if the peace officer or person does any thing mentioned in either of those sections for the purposes of an investigation or otherwise in the execution of the peace officer's duties.

My first reaction to that was to recall the McDonald commission. Are we not giving peace officers our blessing to break the law when they are conducting investigations? Were there not some commissions that made very stringent recommendations to Parliament regarding how peace officers must abide by the legislation when they conduct their investigations?

Mr. Axworthy: Senator, this is designed primarily to protect police officers doing investigations. If they seize proceeds from an illegal act, an act of bribery, they have to be given exemption, otherwise they would be liable under the act. We would have great difficulty with enforcement if we started indicting police officers for carrying out their duty of dealing with whatever exchange had taken place under a bribery charge. This is simply to ensure there is a clear sense of accountability for those who are engaged in the act. It does not drag police officers themselves into criminal conduct.

Julian Reed (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Foreign Affairs)

Mr. Speaker, I rise with pleasure to speak to a matter of concern to all of us, the subject of Bill S-21, the bribery and corruption of foreign public officials in international business. This bill when enacted will allow Canada to ratify the convention on combating bribery of foreign public officials in international business transactions. This convention was negotiated by the members of the Organization for Economic Co-operation and Development. The 29 member OECD, which includes Canada, the United States, most European countries, Japan and South Korea, is the major economic policy forum for the world's most advanced industrialized democracies.

It is an accepted fact that corruption distorts international trade and competition. It impedes economic development. In developing countries in particular corruption distorts public policy. It leads governments to make decisions that are not in the public interest but are in the interest of those who benefit from the bribes. Corruption also has the effect of lowering the quality of goods and services provided by the private sector in the course of meeting its contracts. If substantial bribes are being offered the money comes either by shortchanging the countries with which one has a contract or by undermining the quality of the goods and services being provided. Furthermore it has an insidious effect of threatening the rule of law, democracy and human rights. It undermines the development of competent political and democratic institutions. Where they are in the course of development, it blocks that development. Stability and security are essential preconditions for economic growth. Prosperity, sustainable development and employment engender greater security and stability. The successful promotion of Canadian values abroad can be assisted by increased economic partnerships between Canada and other countries.

The issue of the corruption of foreign public officials is not new and continues to be a major problem affecting international trade and investment. The problem has been the focus of attention within the OECD, the Organization of American States and the Council of Europe. To implement the OECD convention would enhance Canada's reputation as a world leader in fighting corruption. It would honour the commitments Canada has made at the OECD, at the Denver and Birmingham summits of the G-8 and at the United Nations. And it would continue to ensure if not enhance Canada's standing at the OECD. Some have questioned whether what we are doing is enough.

My response is that this is a dramatic and significant first step in the right direction. I will highlight the key elements in this legislation. The essence of the convention is the requirement that each state party criminalize the bribery of foreign public officials in international business transaction and take measures to establish the liability of legal persons for the bribery of a foreign public official. This provision appears in section 3 and is the centrepiece of the proposed act. It prohibits the bribery of a foreign public official in the course of business whether directly or indirectly. It calls for significant penalties. The offence would be punishable on indictment and carries a maximum penalty of five years imprisonment. This legislation will use the definition of person found in the Criminal Code that includes Her Majesty and public bodies, bodies corporate, societies, companies and inhabitants of counties, parishes, municipalities or other districts in relation to the acts and things they are capable of doing and owning respectively. Therefore for the purpose of the offences under this proposed act, potential accused are not limited to natural persons. Corporations also fall within the scope of these offences. The bill describes facilitation payments that would be exempted from the ambit of the offence. It would not be an offence if the advantage were lawful in the foreign official's country or public international organization. Reasonable expenses incurred in good faith and directly related to the promotion, demonstration or explanation of products and services or to the execution or performance of a contract with the foreign state could also be argued as a defence. The bill would amend section 67.5 of the Income Tax Act to add this new offence to the list of Criminal Code offences referenced in that section in an effort to deny the deductibility of bribes paid to foreign public officials.

The convention requires the parties to provide that the bribe and proceeds of the bribery of a foreign public official be subject to seizure and confiscation. It requires the parties to consider the imposition of additional civil or administrative sanctions. For this reason the bill proposes to create two additional criminal offences, the offence of possession of property or proceeds obtained or derived from the bribery of foreign public officials or from laundering that property or those proceeds, and the offence of laundering the property or proceeds obtained or derived from the bribery of foreign public officials. The bill incorporates the proceeds of crime provisions of the Criminal Code for use on prosecutions of the new offences. The new offence of bribery of foreign public officials is an enterprise crime offence to permit the search, seizure and detention of these proceeds of crime and is a predicate offence for the offence of laundering of the proceeds of crime. The convention has provisions dealing with mutual legal assistance and extradition with which Canada can comply. If possible under their legal systems, each party must also provide legal assistance in criminal and civil matters.

It is important to note the Canadian business community is behind this initiative. It considers the OECD convention as the most significant achievement to date in the international campaign against bribery and corruption. This convention is seen as an opportunity to create a level playing field on which Canadian companies can compete on the basis of quality, price and service. This was said loudly and clearly by members of Transparency International when they appeared before the Senate last week. When he appeared before the Senate, the Minister of Foreign Affairs quoted Donald Johnston, a former Canadian Minister of Justice and current Secretary General of the OECD, who said in a recent article that “Integrity in commercial transactions is essential in making the global market work and to ensure that the public supports it. A logical consequence of globalization is that honesty has to be enforced at the global, not just national, level”. With the passage of this legislation Canada has the opportunity to be the fifth country to ratify the OECD convention and to bring it into force, thus ushering in a new era of international accountability. I ask all hon. members to consider that the war on corruption is well underway. There is now no looking back.

Benoît Sauvageau (Repentigny, BQ)

Madam Speaker, like my colleague from the NDP, I too am pleased to speak today on Bill S-21. This is an act respecting the corruption of foreign public officials and the implementation of the convention on combating bribery of foreign public officials in international business transactions, and to make related amendments to other acts. The Bloc Quebecois supports this bill because it addresses the problem of corruption in international business transactions involving governments and government projects. It follows on the signature by Canada and 28 other countries of the convention on combating bribery which was signed last year. This agreement required five of the ten greatest OECD trading partners to ratify the convention by the end of 1998. Four have already either done so or stated their intention of doing so by the end of December, the United States, Germany, Japan and the United Kingdom. Canada's ratification, therefore, would allow the convention to come into effect.

Here we are at five minutes to midnight, and the government is just waking up, only a few days before the end of these sittings, and asking us to turn our work topsy-turvy in order to get this convention put through. Obviously, we support it, but some questions could be asked about the process leading to its adoption. I will describe the convention. By signing it, the countries commit to enact legislation which will make it illegal for companies to bribe representatives of foreign governments. They also promised to develop a mechanism for overseeing the implementation of the law. Under this convention, the parties must ensure that intentionally offering or agreeing to give or offer an unfair pecuniary or other advantage to a foreign public official to obtain or retain a contract or any other unfair advantage in international trade constitutes a criminal offence. The convention also applies to kickbacks paid to persons holding public office, that is lawmakers and officials of public organizations. In addition, this convention deals with facilitation payments and requires that the parties implement rules to prevent misleading accounting practices and the use of forgeries for the purpose of bribing or covering up bribery.

The purpose of this bill, whose main thrust is found in clause 3, is to implement this convention. From now on, all OECD countries will be subject to the same rules. Bribery and kickbacks will no longer be tolerated and will in fact be considered criminal offences. This convention will ensure that businesses in Quebec and Canada have access to a more level playing field on which to compete internationally. Of course, the Bloc Quebecois joins the business community of Quebec and Canada in supporting this bill. But perhaps we could go further. There are now 28 member countries in the OECD. We all know that we also trade extensively with developing countries, APEC countries and other countries around the world. So, as far as we in the Bloc Quebecois are concerned, this convention negotiated with 28 OECD countries should be placed as quickly as possible under the aegis of the WTO. I must say I am bitterly disappointed with the Liberals' attitude. The Conservatives have spoken of threats. Here we have another example of the lack of respect of Liberal members and an example of the way they perpetuate the bad reputation politicians have in the community as a whole. When members speak in this House in a debate that is not totally conflictual and are continually being interrupted by sarcasm, jokes or private conversations, they may well wonder what happened to courtesy. Perhaps there is none in that party, it is found only among the opposition. That would be one more thing they do not have that the opposition does. They have a whip that occasionally tightens the screws. Will they understand? Perhaps the whip should move and sit there to get them to understand common sense. When they are not busy accusing or threatening the Conservatives, they are preventing other members of this House from speaking by holding their Christmas party in the House at 3.50 p.m. on a Monday. It is rather disgraceful.

We are pleased that the Canadian government moved quickly to implement the convention on combating bribery in international business transactions, thus becoming the fifth OECD member to do so. However, we must question the government about its true intentions, as we wonder whether it is not making a small concession to hide a more serious problem, that is the absolutely dreadful working conditions imposed on children, men and women in some parts of the world. The Canadian government could not care less, because “we must not adversely affect our companies' competitiveness”. In order to make money, increase their sale figures and preserve their competitiveness, some Canadian companies go to countries where human rights are not respected. The Senate made two very realistic recommendations: the establishment of a code of ethics for businesses that is more strict than the voluntary one, and a requirement to comply with minimal standards to be eligible for government assistance regarding international activities. But these two issues will remained unanswered for a very long time, because while it looks like the government is quick to take action, it is slower in providing concrete help. I will conclude on this point, and we will see the government in action.

December 7, 1998

André Bachand (Richmond-Athabaska (PC))

…This bill, which we will be passing and which the Senate will hopefully ratify soon afterwards, will ensure that the primary condition, set out in the first operative provision of Bill S-21 will come into effect and be enforced in five countries. I hope that the review will go further than the periodical report and include non-government and non-profit organizations. I think we should go much further than that. However, with Bill S-21, Canada meets its international obligations. That is a step in the right direction. The issue has been raised in the House and we in the Progressive Conservative Party are going to push to have it move forward. As the Bloc Quebecois members have often pointed out, the next step is human rights. In the interests of greater credibility, much more will eventually have to be done with respect to international trade as it affects human rights. The Standing Committee on Foreign Affairs and International Trade has its work cut out for it. At some point, it would be a good idea for us to give thought to what sort of policy Canada could enforce that would incorporate a number of laws and international agreements to which Canada is already a party. So Bill S-21 is speeding through. There was, however, I believe, agreement in this House that corruption should cease. But will that happen? Probably not tomorrow, but at least people will know that Canada, like four other countries, has a law, has signed a convention, and that it could push for the signing of these agreements, and perhaps even make it a kind of condition. When Canada negotiates or renegotiates international agreements or portions thereof, it must ensure that the other signatories also enact anti-bribery legislation. Bribery used to be a way of life. If people wanted a passport in some countries, they had to bribe an official. They were told this was the way things were done, and it was hard to deal with that. Now, fortunately, because of globalization of markets, among other things, the situation has evolved and the laws and regulations governing a country are now scrutinized closely by all real and potential world trading partners. This bill is therefore a good one. It comes to us from the Senate, an institution that of course could do with some improvement. However, that shows that there are things that can be credibly accomplished within parliament, and this is our goal in the Progressive Conservative Party. We enthusiastically support Bill S-21 and assure the government and parliament, both the House of Commons and the Senate, of our full co-operation.

An Act to amend the Criminal Code, the Controlled Drugs and Substances Act and the Corrections and Conditional Release Act (Bill C-51)

Royal Assent March 11, 1999

September 28, 1998 [House of Commons]

Hon. Anne McLellan (Minister of Justice and Attorney General of Canada, Lib.)

….As hon. members who represent northern constituencies will know, a new diamond mine industry is beginning to take shape in the Northwest Territories. This is expected to bring employment and economic benefits to the territories, but the high value of uncut diamonds has raised concerns about the potential for theft and the possible use of diamonds as a means of smuggling or money laundering by organized crime. To protect the new industry and Canadians, the proposed amendments would modernize old provisions dealing with the theft and illegal possession of precious metals and ores. The term previous metal would be replaced with valuable mineral to include diamonds and other non-metallic minerals. The legislation would also create a federal power to prosecute some offences where uncut diamonds are involved to respond effectively to organized crime and interprovincial smuggling activities. This would be concurrent with provincial jurisdiction so that either level of government could prosecute. This would allow for federal prosecutions where an offence which started in the territories involved one or more provinces as well or where a major domestic or international organized crime interests are involved. The law does not affect any existing provincial powers and would leave it open to federal and provincial officials to co-ordinate who would prosecute on a case by case basis.

Fighting against organized crime effectively is a priority of this government, and we are proposing many other changes to fight various activities involving organized crime. The bill, if passed, would amend the Corrections and Conditional Release Act so that persons found guilty of organized crime activities would not be entitled to any sort of accelerated parole review. The legislation would permit electronic surveillance in the case of serious offences involving prostitution and investigation of prostitution telephone networks and indirect involvement in organized crime. Organized crime in Canada has also been linked to telemarketing fraud and related offences. My colleague, the Minister of Industry, already has amendments before parliament to criminalize various forms of deceptive telemarketing activity and to allow wiretapping to investigate them.

In this legislation I am proposing an additional amendment which would allow the proceeds of deceptive telemarketing offences, which can be a major source of income for organized crime groups, to be targeted using the existing Criminal Code proceeds of crime provisions. The government is concerned about telemarketing fraud and related practices, and we regard the confiscation of illegal profit as a major step to counteract it. The government has also been asked by the provinces for changes to Criminal Code provisions dealing with gambling. Generally gambling is a criminal offence unless the activity involved falls within one of a series of exemptions created in the Criminal Code such as those for operations conducted or licensed by the provinces or parimutuel betting on horse races approved by the minister of agriculture.

The changes I am proposing would create two new exemptions. First, it would allow dice games in operations that are conducted and managed by the provinces. Second, it would allow gambling operations on international cruise ships. I want to assure the House that changes are not intended to increase the level of gambling activity in Canada. Nor do we expect them to have this effect. What we are seeking to do is to ensure that gambling and tourism operations in Canada compete with those of other countries, especially the United States, on an equal basis. Dice games are not a major part of casino gambling, but casinos which offer them may have a competitive advantage over those in adjacent jurisdictions. Ontario is particularly concerned that its operations offer a similar range of games to those in neighbouring U.S. states. Once this amendment takes effect it will be up to each province to decide whether it wishes to allow dice games in its casinos. In the case of international cruise ships, the amendments would allow Canadian registered cruise ships which fall under Canadian law regardless of where they are and foreign registered cruise ships in Canadian waters to offer gambling to passengers.

The changes also ensure that the operators of cruise ships which enter Canadian waters will not be charged with importing the gambling equipment in their casinos. This is expected to provide direct benefits to the cruise industry itself and indirect benefits to tourism and other business in the ports where cruise ships call. Canadian registered cruise ships can compete effectively while abroad and foreign registered ships will not be deterred from calling on Canadian ports. The cruise industry is an important and growing part of regional economies, particularly in the St. Lawrence valley of Quebec and the coastal waters of British Columbia. I am happy to be able to propose amendments which will address the economic concerns and interests of these provinces and their populations.

Another area of the criminal law which is of concern to my provincial counterparts is that of prostitution. Concerns have been expressed to my predecessor and myself that the 1997 Criminal Code amendments making it an offence to obtain the prostitution services of a person under 18 would be difficult to prosecute. The provinces had asked us to bring forward an amendment changing the offence from obtaining the services of a young person to communicating with a young person for that purpose. I am happy to propose such an amendment in this legislation. Similar wording in other prostitution offences has been held not to offend the charter by the courts. Several changes in the area of search and seizure are also proposed in this legislation.

The Criminal Code already provides the courts with the power to authorize the use of electronic surveillance of telephones and specified locations. Where this permission is given, it also authorizes police to install the necessary listening devices, but the legislation says nothing about their subsequent removal. The proposed amendments would address this situation by clarifying that judicial permission to install and use these devices also includes permission to remove them. In many cases, the initial authorization runs out before police can safely go back to retrieve the devices. In such cases, the proposed amendments would allow the courts to specifically authorize their removal. The wording governing a series of search warrant provisions would also be amended to standardize the provisions and ensure that only public officers who have law enforcement responsibilities and peace officers could execute search warrants.

In 1997 the Criminal Code was amended to allow a justice who denies an accused person bail to also order that the accused not communicate with any witnesses or victims while in custody. This was identified by the provinces as particularly important in domestic violence cases where victims are often subjected to immediate pressure not to provide evidence or co-operate with the police. Provincial authorities have subsequently pointed out that these non-communication orders are effective only after the accused has been brought before a justice for a bail hearing. This could be several days after the initial arrest, during which time accused persons can and do contact victims or witnesses. To respond to the province's concerns, the proposed legislation would create a parallel provision allowing the first justice who sees the accused after arrest to make an immediate non-communication order. Once imposed, the temporary order would bar communication while the accused is held pending the bail hearing. It would be reviewed by the justice who hears the bail application, who could replace it with a non-communication order pending trial whether the accused is held in custody or released on bail.

This government is committed to the ongoing review of the criminal law and to the maintenance of effective legislative measures to protect society. As part of this effort, this legislation contains a series of other measures to address concerns about the legislation, adjust offences and punishments, modernize the statute and correct oversights enacted in other recent legislative initiatives. We will continue to monitor the legislation and bring forward further changes as the need for them becomes apparent. I look forward to the support of all members of the House for this important Criminal Code omnibus legislation.

October 7, 1998 [House of Commons]

Mr. Michel Guimond (Beauport—Montmorency—Côte-de-Beaupré—Île-d'Orléans, BQ)

Mr. Speaker, as I am the first member of my party to speak to this bill, I will speak for the 40 minutes accorded me. To talk on such a vast and interesting topic, I would need more than 40 minutes, but I will not invoke the Standing Orders of this House to seek unanimous consent to speak longer. I will try to limit myself to the 40 minutes allotted me. Mr. Speaker, as you are considerate toward members, I would ask you to let me know when I have only five minutes left, as is the practice in this House. First off, perhaps some of my colleagues opposite or elsewhere in this House are wondering why the Bloc Quebecois transport critic is speaking to a bill concerning major amendments to the Criminal Code and the Controlled Drugs and Substances Act and amendments to the Corrections and Conditional Release Act. The reason is quite simple. It is not just because I am a lawyer by training, but this bill contains a provision we find very interesting. Without making any assumption about our party's position at third reading, I will say right off that this bill can be improved. We intend to make certain amendments in committee, which we believe will hold the government's attention and that of all the members of the Standing Committee on Justice and Human Rights.

Let me begin by discussing the general provisions of this bill, before getting to the one which is of particular interest to me. This bill includes amendments to permit the operation of casinos on international cruise ships that are Canadian or in Canadian waters. It also amends the Criminal Code to permit dice-games conducted and managed by a province. I am convinced that Loto-Québec will be very interested in that provision. The bill also seeks to widen the scope of the offence of obtaining the services of a prostitute under eighteen years old. It amends the Criminal Code to repeal the “year and a day rule” for offences involving homicide and criminal negligence causing death. The bill modernizes the fraud and theft provisions in respect of valuable minerals. It also modernizes the provisions concerning the offence of making likenesses of bank-notes. It ensures that only officials with law enforcement duties can execute search warrants. It provides for the authority to remove lawfully-installed electronic surveillance devices. It provides sentencing measures dealing with the consideration of outstanding charges, the offender's ability to pay a fine and addressing technical matters. It provides rules governing when conditional sentences run following the breach of a condition. It brings deceptive telemarketing offences against the Competition Act under the forfeiture provisions for the proceeds of crime. Finally, it provides a number of other technical amendments. The bill also provides for amendments to the Controlled Drugs and Substances Act that deal with aggravating factors in sentencing and the criminal liability of law enforcement officers engaged in their duties. And, finally, it provides for amendments to the Corrections and Conditional Release Act that exclude those convicted of organized-crime offences from eligibility for accelerated parole review.

Because Bill C-51 represents an important victory for the Bloc Quebecois with respect to the operation of casinos on international cruise ships, hence my remarks this afternoon, we support the bill in principle. We feel, however, that the bill does not go far enough with respect to money laundering, particularly as it does not remove $1,000 bank notes from circulation. We know that our colleague, the hon. member for Charlesbourg, introduced a private member's bill about this.

October 8, 1998 [House of Commons]

Mr. Michel Bellehumeur (Berthier—Montcalm, BQ)

…. The other important thing I wanted to mention about Bill C-51 is the accelerated parole review provision. I would like to speak to this briefly. In 1997, the media brought us the Lagana affair. It will be recalled that this involved a lawyer, Joseph Lagana, sentenced in 1995 to 13 years in prison for his involvement in a drug importing case and for laundering almost $47.4 million. The worse part of this story is that Mr. Lagana was released after serving only one sixth of his sentence, that is 26 months instead of the 13 years of imprisonment he had been sentenced to by the judge. The accelerated parole review procedure provided in the Corrections and Conditional Release Act benefited this major drug trafficker, who was released after serving only one sixth of his sentence because his crime was considered a non-violent offence under the law and he had not served time before. On this subject, let me digress to say a word about the application criteria of this accelerated review procedure. In 1987, the chief justice of the supreme court made a decision in the Smith affair, saying: Because they are the direct cause of the hardship experienced by their victims and their families, we must ensure these importers of narcotics bear their share of culpability for the countless serious crimes of all sorts committed by drug addicts to support their addiction. It read further: With due respect, I believe that, when convicted, these individuals, with very few exceptions, should be sentenced and actually serve long term sentences. This shows that the supreme court considers drug trafficking to be a scourge of serious magnitude that must be eradicated. In our view, since money laundering sustains this scourge, anyone who is found guilty should indeed, in the words of the supreme court justice, serve long term sentences. But the Liberal government obviously does not agree, since it is allowing criminals like Joseph Lagana to take advantage of accelerated parole reviews.

The Lagana affair prompted the Bloc Quebecois, through the member for Charlesbourg, to introduce a private member's bill to have this kind of review denied to criminals found guilty of money laundering, among other offences. While Bill C-51 is a step in the right direction, the new provisions will not apply to Mr. Lagana and others like him, because bankers and lawyers who are convicted for money laundering but not for an organized crime offence will still get away with serving one sixth of their sentence. This is totally unacceptable to the Bloc Quebecois. We will not tolerate other Lagana cases. Therefore, we are informing the House that, on Bill C-51, the Bloc Quebecois will be proposing amendments to offset the Liberal government's lack of courage on this issue. The fact that the government is making a minor correction to a situation does not release it from all its obligations. I also want to discuss the powers of the attorney general of Canada.

The battle against money laundering does not seem to be a priority for this government, which takes a piecemeal approach to things. The solutions it is proposing do not go nearly far enough. There is no doubt about this government's apathy, because it could, right now, take effective action against money laundering. The Bloc Quebecois has been raising this whole issue for a long time now. Listeners will probably recall that we even made it part of our platform in the last election campaign, and that we were not short of suggestions for what this government should do about this terrible problem in Canada. As I mentioned earlier, the member for Charlesbourg introduced a private member's bill to deal with the issue. Since its purpose is to do something about the problem of money laundering, I trust that it will have the support of the government. One thing the government could easily and rapidly do, even in Bill C-51 before us, is to eliminate $1,000 bank notes, which is a top priority for the Bloc Quebecois. Canada is one of the only countries to issue such a high denomination. Police forces tell us that this makes it easier for criminals to launder their ill-gotten gains. The Bloc Quebecois is also suggesting that financial institutions should in future be required to inform the police of any dubious transaction involving $10,000 or more. This requirement would also apply to casinos and travel agencies. Despite what it is saying, the Liberal government's response to money laundering has been far from effective. Strict measures are long in coming. Because of that inertia, we must constantly raise the issue and hound the government, as we did in the case of the motorcycle gangs, for instance. The government finally decided to act following the enormous pressure exerted by the Bloc Quebecois regarding that issue. I do hope that, following our private members' bills and our representations, the government will finally take action regarding money laundering, if not with Bill C-51, then in a subsequent piece of legislation.

Since time is running out, I will conclude by saying that the Bloc Quebecois is pleased that operating casinos on cruise ships on the St. Lawrence River will now be permitted. As I said earlier, thanks to the hard work of several MPs from the Quebec City area, the government finally realized that the situation could no longer persist. The tourist industry in the Quebec City area will now be in a position to thrive even more. The Bloc Quebecois is also pleased to have made the government realize that the accelerated review process was flawed. Again, the Bloc Quebecois said repeatedly that it was unacceptable to see a notorious drug trafficker take advantage of that procedure. Unfortunately, the government did not realize the magnitude of the problem, since its proposed amendments do not go far enough. When will the government understand that it is useless to try to fight gangs if nothing is done about money laundering? In the area of crime, as in any other one, money is everything. However, the government does not seem to have understood that yet, or at least it is slow to do so. It is slow to amend the legislation, so that Canada can finally lose its unenviable title of money laundering haven. The Bloc Quebecois supports Bill C-51, to the extent that the government is aware that the legislation has a number of flaws on which the Standing Committee on Justice and Human Rights will have to work.

October 8, 1998 (House of Commons)

Mr. Peter MacKay (Pictou—Antigonish—Guysborough, PC)

… I also question the government's true commitment to fighting organized crime given that the solicitor general and the Liberal government itself could be doing much more in this area. Recent revelations from the auditor general seem to indicate that contrary to what the solicitor general announced publicly about this government's commitment to organized crime, the reality is that millions of dollars have been taken out of the RCMP budget. We also know that in the last year to year and a half we have seen the devolution of the ports police in areas like Halifax and Vancouver. I assure this House that one very prevalent factor waiting in the wings is the decision to make Halifax a post-Panamax port. With this decision there will be significantly increased traffic on that port. Instead of a specialized police force, the ports police aimed at combating organized crime and the importation of drugs, weapons and other contraband materials, now we have that duty being passed on along with other duties the current Halifax metro police and RCMP are charged with. It is not a partisan comment on my part. That is simply the conclusion that has been reached in examining these facts.

I do not reach this conclusion alone. Each year the U.S. State Department prepares a report called “International Narcotics Control Strategy Report”. In its most recent report, the State Department singled out Canada as an easy target for drug related and other types of money laundering. The same report also listed Canada in the same category as Columbia, Brazil and the Cayman Islands as an attractive location to hide illegal cash. Finally, the same report was very critical of Canada's lack of legislation to control cross-border money flow. The Canadian Police Association, as it is a very insightful group, has also echoed similar concerns. London police Chief Julian Fantino, head of the organized crime committee in the Canadian Association of Chiefs of Police, said that money laundering is an easy feat in Canada. According to some reports, the RCMP has estimated the value of laundering money in Canada between $3 billion and $10 billion.

The solicitor general recognizes this problem, should be aware of it and should act on it. During the government's first ever annual statement on organized crime, the solicitor general promised new anti-organized crime legislation that would finally require significant steps toward combating this situation. It would also require that financial institutions report suspicious transactions and cross-border currency movements. As a matter of interest, the solicitor general's predecessor and the current Deputy Prime Minister made a similar commitment in September 1996 following the conference on organized crime. Sadly, Canadians continue to wait and organized crime continues to penetrate this country. In April of this year the present solicitor general repeated that promise again and had a conference that was very well publicized. There was a great deal of ballyhoo about the solicitor general's initiatives and spoke quite openly about his intentions for combating organized crime. He made the same promise to the police in the past year in August and in the span of nearly two years this government has made the same promise on four separate occasions but have delivered nothing. I would concede that the solicitor general has a laudable commitment to consultation as well as airline conversations but he also should know that the law enforcement community has had enough and does not want any more shallow promises. The government is incessantly holding conferences under the guise of consultation and yet there do not seem to be any meaningful consequences that come about as a result of these consultations. The solicitor general's dismal response to the problem of organized crime and this government's manipulation of consultation has become a tool of delay and frustrated police to the point where the executive director of the Canadian Police Association recently stated to the media: “Quite frankly, we don't care what this government has to say anymore”. That is a very telling comment from the Canadian Police Association when saying this in response to the government's commitment to organized crime. Are we to believe the brave talk of the solicitor general? Given his credibility problems of late, that does stretch it quite a bit. The solicitor general since June 1997 has said we would do away with any problem recognizing his statements that fighting organized crime is one of his strategic priorities. We are patiently waiting, as are the Canadian people, the Canadian Police Association and indeed all police associations across the country. Police and the public are forced to judge the solicitor general's commitment to strategic priorities by actions and results.

Words alone, no matter how tough they sound, just do not cut it when it comes to fighting organized crime. There are also significant amendments with respect to telemarketing fraud. Proceeds gained from deceptive telemarketing practices that would be subject to seizure and forfeiture under Bill C-51 are a positive step. This bill would also make it illegal to generate currency by copying bank notes by computer assisted or electronic means. Certainly forgery has become a problem in this country as it has around the world. I commend the government for this positive amendment although it is unfortunate that we have yet to see other measures aimed specifically at organized crime in this country. Given the rising market value of forged currency, this amendment would establish theft and smuggling of other valuable commodities such as diamonds, gemstones or any rock or ore. It is a positive focus of this omnibus bill and would make offences aimed at those types of forgeries punishable under the Criminal Code.

October 8, 1998 [House of Commons]

Mr. John Reynolds (West Vancouver—Sunshine Coast, Ref.)

… I will discuss another story in relation to conditional sentencing. Domenico Tozzi, the greatest money launderer in Canadian history, was sentenced to 10 years and a fine of $150,000 for his role in the importation of 2,500 kilos of cocaine plus 25 tonnes of hashish. When he did not pay his fine the sentence was increased to 12 years and he was released after only serving two years in jail. I do not know what 2,500 kilos of cocaine and 25 tonnes of hashish are worth, but I would guarantee it is in the millions. A judge put him in jail for 10 years and gives him a $150,000 fine. He wondered why he should pay the fine if he would only get two more years in jail. Then our great system allowed this man back on the streets after just two years in jail.

Bill C-51 does nothing to solve that problem. We are going to make amendments to it. As my Conservative colleague said, hopefully the government and the rest of the House can work on this in a non-partisan way to bring in laws all Canadians want. Ex-lawyer Joseph Lagana was involved in the importation of 558 kilos of cocaine and in laundering $47.4 million. He was sentenced by a judge to 13 years. He was released after two years and two months to a halfway house where he is free from 6 a.m. to 11 p.m. What message does that send to Canadians? He imported cocaine which kills young people and laundered $47.4 million. That probably goes right over top of the average Canadian's head. It is astounding. Average Canadians cannot even think of figures that large. What does he get? Two years and two months. That shows young people that a life of crime pays. It creates career criminals. Will this man go back to an honest job? Will anybody in Canada be convinced that after two years and two months he has been rehabilitated? Anthony Volpato, described by the papers as one of the leading figures in the Montreal Mafia, was sentenced to six years for conspiracy to import 180 kilos of cocaine. He was freed after only one year.

This kind of sentencing has to stop and we have to make amendments to the bill to make sure it stops. Let us talk about organized crime, another area in which Bill C-51 is sadly lacking. As Bill C-51 implies organized crime figures are not choir boys. Why would we treat them that way? The minister thinks she is getting tough in Bill C-51 by eliminating the accelerated parole hearing after one-sixth of a sentence has been served. It is better than before. Organized crime figures will still have access to day parole and be released after serving one-third of their sentences. As I said in my previous comments on conditional sentencing, this is a joke. It is objectionable, unacceptable and naive. Organized crime laughs at going to jail for a couple of years. Mr. Speaker, I am sure you like going to the movies. The part of the bill on organized crime kind of reminds me of the movie Goodfellows . In that movie three Mafia members were convicted of a crime and doing time by having pasta dinners in prison. They are sitting tight being model prisoners, knowing they will get out before their full sentence is served. The notion and the part of the movie with the Mafia members drinking Chianti and making pasta is as comical as Bill C-51 in that regard. Let me remind the justice minister that members of criminal organizations are by definition in section 2 members of a group of at least five persons, formally or informally organized, having as a primary activity the commission of an indictable offence and the members having been in the preceding five years in a series of such offences. That is very serious stuff.

In short, these people should be held for their full sentences. They should not get full parole as Bill C-51 allows. Serious crime, serious time. We have to get that message across to organized crime. These people should not enjoy the generous system of day parole, full parole and statutory release. There should be no exception for organized crime. Does the minister really believe, be it one-sixth or one-third, that these people can be rehabilitated in such a short period of time? I gave an example before of those with 13 years sentences being out in two years for crimes involving millions of dollars. They will, as the movie Goodfellows portrays so accurately, sit tight, keep up the connections while incarcerated and return to their lives of crime when released. Is the minister expecting organized crime members to have some sort of Epiphany while in prison? This is another sadly lacking element in Bill C-51 and one we cannot support. …

October 8, 1998 [House of Commons]

Mrs. Christiane Gagnon (Québec, BQ)

… If I have a few minutes left, I would like to address the part of Bill C-51 dealing with eligibility for accelerated parole review. Here again, we feel the government is not going far enough. Granted, this would be a major change. It would give teeth to our legislation dealing with certain drug traffickers. I will use the few minutes I have left to try to explain how this amendment could prove worthwhile and be improved upon by the government. In August 1997, we learned of the Lagana affair from newspaper reports. A lawyer had been sentenced in 1995 to 13 years in prison for importing cocaine and laundering $47.4 million. As we know,

Mr. Lagana was released after serving only 26 months, or one-sixth of his sentence, because he had become eligible for accelerated parole review. After serving just one-sixth of his or her sentence, any non-violent criminal who has never done time before may apply for parole. In response, the Bloc Quebecois, through the member for Charlesbourg, introduced a private member's bill to eliminate this accelerated procedure for those found guilty of money laundering.

In Bill C-51, the government wants to correct this situation. It is proposing to exclude those convicted of organized crime offences from eligibility for accelerated parole review. This amendment is a step in the right direction, but it is limited to the provision of the Criminal Code dealing with organized crime. It does not affect bankers, individuals or lawyers convicted of money laundering who are not part of organized crime. Such individuals may therefore continue to launder millions of dollars and serve only one sixth of their sentence in jail. We would have liked to see this amendment extended to include lawyers and bankers who launder money. This is a completely unacceptable state of affairs. We in the Bloc Quebecois will not stand for another case like that of Lagana. We will introduce amendments to make up for the Liberal government's lack of courage. We would also have liked to see $1,000 bank notes taken out of circulation, because we know that it is easier to launder that denomination. We are one of the only countries in the world with this denomination in circulation. We would also like financial institutions to be permitted to alert the police about suspicious transactions of $10,000 and over. I will not be able to address all the other items. Since there are a good dozen amendments in Bill C-51, it is difficult to give them the attention they deserve in a mere fifteen or twenty minutes. In conclusion, as I mentioned, we are very happy with the Criminal Code amendment having to do with cruise ships.

November 4, 1998 [House of Commons]

Ms. Eleni Bakopanos (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Justice and Attorney General of Canada, Lib.)

….Another change which was a priority was the provision linking the new deceptive telemarketing offences proposed by the Minister of Industry in Bill C-20 with the Criminal Code proceeds of crime provisions. When Bill C-20 was drafted and introduced it was not apparent that this was an important link. Competition Act offences are regulatory criminal law and the competition bureau would not usually consider it necessary to target proceeds from the other offences it enforces such as misleading advertising. This is not the case with deceptive telemarketing. As we have seen both from our own examination of the problem and recent media coverage, telemarketing fraud and deceptive telemarketing are capable of generating large proceeds. They involve the use of telephone boiler rooms to contact large numbers of victims. Individual losses may be large or small, but if many victims are targeted the overall proceeds are often very large, marking confiscation a major deterrent and an important step toward compensating victims. The proceeds are so large in some cases that this sort of crime has attracted the attention of more traditional organized crime groups in Canada, making the targeting of proceeds even more important.

Both the Minister of Justice and the Minister of Industry take this matter very seriously. As soon as the need for this link was identified it was included in the bill. The offence of fraud already falls within the proceeds of crime scheme. The inclusion of deceptive telemarketing will help to ensure that criminals cannot hide their own considerable profits from forfeiture and restitution to their victims. Another organized crime priority for both Quebec and the solicitor general was the exclusion of those convicted of organized crime offences from accelerated parole review. This proved to be a fairly straightforward amendment. It was proceeded with but concerns have been voiced that it does not go far enough. As proposed, organized crime offenders would be excluded as long as the organized crime element is proven either on conviction or sentence. To go further than this and catch everything at conviction might require the restructuring of the money laundering offence. This would go beyond what is reasonable to attempt to do in an omnibus bill. The solicitor general and the justice minister were anxious to proceed with this change quickly. The criminal organization offence was added to the Criminal Code less than two years ago by the government. Fairly quick action was needed on this issue before a significant number of cases arose.

Another important organized crime issue is the potential use of rough diamonds produced in Canada as a medium of exchange by organized crime. As members of the House will know, the first ever Canadian diamond mine began production in the Northwest Territories earlier this month. This represents an important and welcome source of economic development for Canada's north, but there are concerns that the high value of rough diamonds will attract thieves and organized crime interests. For this reason the Minister of Justice wanted to move quickly to expand the Criminal Code offences dealing with precious metals to include valuable minerals other than gold, silver or platinum. This would ensure the law covers rough diamonds and any other gemstones or other similar minerals that might be discovered in Canada in the future. ....

November 4, 1998 [House of Commons]

Mrs. Christiane Gagnon (Québec, BQ)

… In introducing her bill, the justice minister was proud to announce she was out to control the activities of organized crime. And then she proceeded to introduce a change to the accelerated parole review process under the Corrections and Conditional Release Act. First of all, let us make it clear that the Bloc Quebecois has for some time been condemning the absurdity of the accelerated review process. My colleague from the Bloc Quebecois, the hon. member for Berthier—Montcalm, repeatedly questioned the Minister of Justice, asking her whether she thinks it is right for a major drug dealer like Joseph Lagana, who laundered nearly $47 million, to get paroled after serving only one sixth of his sentence. The Bloc Quebecois did not simply question the justice minister on this issue, it also proposed solutions. Indeed, my colleague, the hon. member for Charlesbourg, presented a bill to amend the Corrections and Conditional Release Act to deny high-profile drug dealers access to an accelerated parole review. The amendments proposed by the hon. member not only addressed organized crime, as the minister proposes in her bill, they also went beyond that to encompass conspiracy and money laundering. The solutions of the hon. member for Charlesbourg were even submitted to the justice committee as an amendment to Bill C-51.

We know what happened; the Liberal majority rallied around the minister and refused to pass them. This refusal is typical of the Liberal government's lack of courage as far as money laundering is concerned. If the minister really wanted to deal with this dangerous problem, she would follow up on the Bloc Quebecois proposals. Among the recommendations were the withdrawal of the $1,000 bill. In our opinion, this is an extremely sensible proposal. What we are asking of the government is very simple: not to issue any more $1,000 bills. That would have a direct effect on money laundering. Obviously, it will take this government a few years to understand, just as in the case of amendment for the cruise ships, that Canada is a money laundering centre. It will take the government even longer to realize that having $1,000 bills in circulation helps the cause of money laundering.

The Liberal government cannot be pushed. It prefers a step by step approach. It does not appreciate our telling it what to do, even when what is needed is obvious. The government, which we consider arrogant, wants to seem to be taking initiatives, although we have long been proposing solutions. Despite this strange situation, the Bloc Quebecois has not given up. We will continue to ride this government to get it to act rather than remain complacent. We have introduced private members' bills to get things moving. I know something about this because I myself introduced two private member's bills. Both were rejected by the Minister of Justice, even after I had devoted a great deal of effort to raising awareness among stakeholders. There was a great deal of support for my bills, and several members here in the House were behind me. Faced with this situation, the Liberal government had no choice but to proceed, but it took all the credit. It turned it into a government bill and made us wait two years for the amendments to the Criminal Code, instead of giving credit to members who have the public's interests at heart. One amendment involved sex tourism; it would have made it an offence to engage in sex with children in another country. The other had to do with genital mutilation of African girls who are now Canadian citizens. I worked very hard on these two bills and they were rejected by the then Minister of Justice. After much pressure from stakeholders and from members, the Liberal government finally caved in and agreed to amend the Criminal Code, because it had no choice. We are not about to give up. After a careful review of a situation, we do everything we can to bring about the amendment of legislation that is outdated or contrary to the public's interests. The Bloc Quebecois has the interests of Quebeckers at heart.

November 5, 1998 [House of Commons]

Mr. Peter MacKay (Pictou—Antigonish—Guysborough, PC)

… What was missed was the opportunity to enact in the Criminal Code stiffer penalties for those involved in organized crime activity. It failed to include mandatory minimum sentences for those motivated by gang activity to embark upon a life of crime, crime that inevitably puts people's lives at risk through drug peddling, prostitution and the type of gang warfare we have seen in the streets of Montreal and which is spreading to other cities in Canada. This bill will remove a provision that in light of advances in forensic science and health care will also focus in on some of the technological advances that have been made. The current Criminal Code disallows the prosecution of individuals convicted of murder, manslaughter or other offences after a year and a day has passed. That enactment has been made. I would embrace it as a positive measure. Obviously there are situations that unfortunately could occur. A person whose life has been threatened due to injuries related to crime and is on a life support system or in critical condition may through their own will hold on until after a year and a day has passed. The perpetrator is then not held criminally accountable under the old system.

I repeat my challenge to the government, though, with respect to its true commitment to crime fighting. As I mentioned earlier, the solicitor general specifically could be doing a lot more when it comes to violent crime and when it comes to organized crime. Nothing has undermined the solicitor general's performance record more than his inaction on this organized crime front which is supposedly one of the government's three strategic priorities. The solicitor general has said quite often in the House and to the media that organized crime is big business and it is bad business. Recognizing this and doing something about it are two different things. Recognizing it, acknowledging it and saying publicly that he wants to do something about it, that is fine but the clock is running. When it comes to these types of issues, when the clock is running people are getting hurt, killed and things are happening that the government has an opportunity and I suggest a responsibility to do something about. The solicitor general has an opportunity to do just that through legislative initiatives and through resources. Resources of course are a problem that the government is wrestling with, its priorities. Where does it spend the money? Where does it cut the money? Once more to echo comments from the opposition benches, the priorities and where the cuts seem to be taking place are extremely disturbing and questionable.

All Canadians I believe are embarked on that process of questioning why the government is making cuts in the areas where there appears to be the most need. One of the areas I would describe as being the most in need is that of frontline policing and the need of police officers to have the resources to do the job they have been tasked with. That is not just partisan bluster on my part. That is the conclusion reached by the U.S. State Department when it was viewing areas in the world where organized crime was beginning to become a growth industry. There was an international report tabled, “The International Narcotics Control Strategy”. In that report the State Department singled out Canada as an easy target for drug related and other types of money laundering. The same report also listed Canada in the same category as Colombia, Brazil and the Cayman Islands as an attractive location to hide illegal cash. That same report also criticized Canada's lack of legislation to control cross-border money flow. This is a very serious problem, so much so that York police Chief Julien Santino, head of the organized crime committee of the Canadian Association of Chiefs of Police, said: “Money laundering is an easy feat here in Canada. According to these reports the RCMP has estimated that the value of laundered money in Canada is between $3 billion and $10 billion”. I express guarded support for Bill C-51 on behalf of the Conservative Party. We would have liked to have seen further amendments as are appropriate under an omnibus bill. There is a common sense need for more stringent controls and more stringent areas for the government to look at in terms of sentencing. We will be supporting this legislation and hoping for greater initiatives on the part of the solicitor general and the Minister of Justice.

November 30, 1999 [House of Commons]

Mr. Lynn Myers (Waterloo – Wellington, Lib)

Mr. Speaker, I am very pleased to rise today in support of the motion to ask the Standing Committee on Justice and Human Rights to study the issue of organized crime and analyze the legislative avenues open to parliament to fight against activities of criminal organizations.

I have 10 years experience in police service. As the former chairman of the Waterloo Regional Police, I find this of particular interest. It is certainly one where all Canadians look for leadership from their federal government to ensure our communities, wherever they are in this great country, are safe and secure for themselves and their children.

Public concern over organized crime is not limited to any one part of Canada. The RCMP reports that there are biker gang activities and criminal enterprises in several parts of this country. Indeed, the gang problem goes far beyond outlaw biker groups. In addition to biker gangs, there is a host of organized crime groups that operate and prey upon the weak in their own communities and on Canadian society. That is unacceptable.

It is commonly known that organized crime is actively involved in trafficking in illegal drugs. Last summer all of Canada saw firsthand how organized criminal snakeheads were callously smuggling Chinese people on rusty old ships to our shores. This is unacceptable as well. It is perhaps less well known that they are also involved in environmental crime, like illicit waste treatment and disposal, trade in endangered species and ozone depleting substances. They are involved in economic crime like white collar crime, for example, such as security fraud and telemarketing fraud. We also know that they are involved in the sale of counterfeit products, in violation of intellectual property rights and software piracy, money laundering and motor vehicle theft for export or for parts.

There are those who claim that the police are powerless to fight organized crime. Some argue that the police need more money. Others argue that they need less. I think we should find out what the facts are in this case.

It has been two years since parliament considered and enacted any gang legislation. The provisions contained in Bill C-95 originated in discussions with the police community and other members of the justice system in September 1996 when the then minister of justice and the solicitor general held a national forum on organized crime. This event brought together representatives from the police community, the federal and a number of provincial governments, the legal community, private industry and academics to examine the increasingly complex problem of organized crime in Canada and to recommend integrated and effective measures to address it. Participants examined the feasibility of legislation that would provide new tools to the police, prosecutors and courts to combat organized crime.

We must recall another factor that led to the enactment of Bill C-95, and that is the public's revulsion at the violent events associated with a turf war between two rival biker gangs, the Hell's Angels and the Rock Machine in Quebec, in which not only members of the gang but also innocent bystanders were tragically affected.

The legislation that followed Bill C-95 enacted new powers in relation to the interception of private communication, proceeds of crime and property used to commit offences and other things. It also outlined for the first time in Canadian criminal law a definition of a criminal organization and created a new offence of participation in a criminal organization offence. This legislation has been in force now for two years.

This may seem like a long period of time to some, but I understand that a typically complex organized crime investigation takes several years to progress to the point where charges are laid. In fact, I know that to be the case.

Nevertheless, some of these investigations directed at criminal organizations using the tools provided in Bill C-95 have now been completed. Charges have been laid and prosecutions are proceeding. Indeed, there have been convictions. Reports have appeared in the media in recent weeks regarding some of these prosecutions, notably in the provinces of Quebec, Manitoba and Alberta.

It is important, however, to ensure that the provisions of Bill C-95 are well understood. Not every case is appropriately pursued as a criminal organization investigation or a prosecution. It is not intended to be the only tool used to combat organized crime. It is built on the tools already available in the criminal code and responded in particular to investigative and prosecutorial challenges posed by criminal organizations. These are specialized tools in that sense.

Justice officials have been working in co-operation with the solicitor general's department to provide training to police and prosecutors regarding the contents of the criminal organization legislation. Justice officials have provided full day and half day training sessions across the country to over 500 members of the provincial and federal police and prosecution services.

Law enforcement must be careful to ensure that powerful but integrate powers provided for in legislation are not used inappropriately or unnecessarily.

The committee may want to assess the extent to which the provisions are being used and their effectiveness. If there are ways to improve upon the manner in which the legislation is used, we should facilitate the sharing of these best practices. If there are improvements in the legislation that could be considered, we should assess them collectively.

In another area of organized crime, combating telemarketing fraud remains a priority for the Government of Canada, in particular within the context of its organized crime agenda.

Since the 1997 binational report, Canada in partnership with the United States has made significant strides in combating cross-border telemarketing fraud. The major legislative developments include Bill C-20, which recently added the new offence of deceptive telemarketing to the Competition Act.

It also includes Bill C-51, which amended the criminal code to link the new deceptive telemarketing offences in the Competition Act to the criminal code scheme authorizing the seizure and forfeiture of proceeds of crime for enterprise crime offences. This amendment now allows the significant proceeds generated by many telemarketing schemes to be captured.

Finally, Bill C-40, which amended the Canada Evidence Act and the Extradition Act to provide for the use of video linked testimony to be given at criminal trials and at extradition hearings.

We are building on our successes and will continue to combat telemarketing fraud through public education, information sharing and co-operative law enforcement using the new legislative tools that we have developed over the past year.

Before concluding, I would also like to address the issue of acts of intimidation directed against key players in the criminal justice system. My colleagues in the House will know that the concerns have been voiced with regard to this issue of intimidation directed against officials responsible for the investigation and prosecution of crimes: judges and persons responsible for the administration of sentences of convicted offenders, as well as members of the public who become involved in the criminal justice system as informants, witnesses or members of juries.

The intimidation of justice participants is purpose-driven. The purpose is either to interfere with the ability to secure a conviction against the accused or, in the case of an organization, against other members of the organization in the future, or to exact revenge. It is intended to destabilize the criminal justice system, particularly where the prosecution of organized crime is concerned.

The government is acting in this area and the Department of Justice is currently examining this issue. It is consulting with representatives of federal, provincial and municipal police agencies, federal and provincial prosecutors, federal and provincial correctional officers and officials and judges in all parts of Canada. The object of this exercise is to determine the scope and severity of the problem of intimidation and to develop an appropriate legislative response. I applaud this initiative. It is important for all our communities in terms of making them safer and more secure.

I will conclude by observing that organized crime is a pressing problem which takes various and many forms. The international community has identified the fight against organized crime as a priority issue. The Canadian government has taken a similar position, and rightfully so. It is important for all Canadians to have us move in this very important area.

Let us see if the Standing Committee on Justice and Human Rights can identify legislative avenues that can be effectively pursued by parliament to win the fight against the activities of criminal organizations.

I think this motion is most in order. It is useful and we should get on with passing it to make sure it goes to the committee where we can examine these and all important issues relating to organized crime.

November 30, 1999 [House of Commons]

Réal Ménard (Bloc Québécois)

Mr. Speaker, I am pleased to ask my colleague a question because he is the chair of the Standing Committee on Health, of which I am a member. I know that he has shown a wonderful sense of fair play, and it is a great pleasure to work with him.

The last report of the Criminal Intelligence Service Canada described organized crime as making $10 billion annually from drug trafficking, and an estimated $400 million from the sale of jewellery on the black market. Every year, fraudulent credit card purchases total close to $80 million.

As for economic crimes—the hon. member referred to telemarketing—losses are in the neighbourhood of $4 billion. Fraudulent use of credit cards accounts for something like $127 million. Between 8,000 and 16,000 people are smuggled into Canada illegally every year.

Car theft is still on the rise. And between $5 billion and $17 billion in illicit funds are laundered annually.

Would the hon. member agree with me that all options must be considered in our efforts to more effectively combat organized crime? It is not just a question of additional resources for the police, but all options must be considered, including—and this is something I think the committee will have to look at—the Japanese model, which prohibits the public display of crests and badges belonging to biker gangs, up to and including possible use of the notwithstanding clause.

Would the hon. member agree that all options must be considered and that the Standing Committee on Justice and Human Rights must not exclude any of them?

November 30, 1999 [House of Commons]

Mr. Lynn Myers

Mr. Speaker, I thank the hon. gentleman opposite for his question. It seems to me that what the motion today is saying is that by referring the motion to the justice and human rights committee we should analyze the legislative avenues open to parliament to fight against the activities of criminal organizations and then report back to the House.

If the question is, should we take a look at the variety of options available to the committee and ultimately to parliament and all parliamentarians, it seems to me that we should. We should take a look at the kinds of things that we as a society and we as parliamentarians should do in order to curtail criminal activity wherever it may be in this great land of ours.

As a former chairman of the Waterloo Regional Police, I can tell the House first hand that police services across our great country need parliament's assistance in this very important area. The government has done many things over the last number of years to enact the kinds of legislation that are necessary to give the police the kinds of measures they need in order to carry out their function in society, all of which enables us to live in more safe and secure communities wherever they may be in Canada.

I look forward to the report of the standing committee in this very important area. I know that under the leadership of the chairperson, who is a very capable individual, that is precisely what will be done. The committee will report back to the House in a very meaningful way and give parliament and, by extension, all Canadians the kinds of necessary analysis and tools that will help us to ensure that criminal activity is curtailed in Canada.

November 30, 1999 [House of Commons]

Mr. Gurmant Grewal

Mr. Speaker, I rise on behalf of the people of Surrey Central to speak to the Bloc supply day motion that calls on the House to order the Standing Committee on Justice and Human Rights to study the issue of organized crime, to analyse avenues available to parliament to combat these criminals, and to report back to the House by October 31, 2000.

Today the government side of the House is being forced by the opposition to discuss organized crime. We will see how little it will do, if anything. The people of Surrey Central are anxious to do something about organized crime and its effect on our country, our cities, our region, our children, and many other aspects of our lives.

The weak Liberal government that has no vision and no political will keeps our criminal justice system weak. There are less and less resources, money and effort going to our law enforcement community. We can clearly see this in Surrey. We feel the effects of the scarce resources of the RCMP which is trying to preserve and protect our communities.

The immigration minister tells the Prime Minister to adopt a new slogan. The motto is that Canada is the place to be. The Prime Minister brags about that. There is no political will on Liberal benches to give B.C. and the rest of Canada the RCMP services that are needed. Because of this, international criminals know that Canada is the number one country and the place to be.

The Liberals already know that organized crime has a great effect on our country. There is no need to study it. Illegal migrants arrive at our airports and on our coasts. They are brought here by organized criminals, and the Liberals do nothing about it.

They do nothing about corruption in our embassies. When it comes to filtering out criminals our embassies are just like sieves. In Hong Kong 2,000 visas were stolen. Are gentle people stealing them and using them? No, it is organized crime. It is criminals who stole the visas and used them to bring over 2,000 criminals into Canada, and the Liberals do nothing about it.

I did something about it when my constituents told me about corruption at the embassies at New Delhi and Islamabad. Legitimate immigrants were harassed while criminals were buying their way into Canada.

I got results. Was I lucky? No. I did the work. I had the political will to get to the bottom of these allegations of crime and corruption on behalf of the people I was elected to represent.

I took action on their behalf. I went to the RCMP. They were glad to work with me and they did a good job. People were fired as a result of my efforts and the corruption was cleaned up, for a while at least.

The Liberals keep the RCMP starved of resources: money, equipment and personnel. The Liberals do it with our military as well. They starve our emergency preparedness, too. The Liberals leave only four officers patrolling the B.C.-Washington border near my constituency. Our ports and docks are understaffed.

Perhaps only 5% of containers are inspected at the Vancouver port, but many of them contain drugs and other things being smuggled for organized crime. The Liberals are not serious about fighting organized crime. If they were they would dispatch the military on a special two-day mission to open the 95% of containers that have not been inspected. Let us get to work.

We know that there are refugee claimants on our streets selling drugs. We know they have been arrested, but the police tell us they are back on the street within hours, or at least the next day, after being slightly slapped on the wrist. Why does the government not do something about it? It is a shame.

Third world people are being enslaved into a life of crime. They are being sent to the U.S. via Canada. What do the Liberals do about it? Nothing. The CIA and the FBI in the U.S. are furious about what is happening in Canada. They are furious about our Prime Minister because he is cutting budgets, dragging his feet and not upholding Canada's part in fighting crime in North America.

The government knows about money laundering operations in our country. Organized crime has built a very large, multibillion dollar underground economy. The weak Liberal government has done nothing about it.

Last week the newspapers published 10 ways to launder money and those are the 10 ways the Liberals have refused to prevent money laundering.

As a former credit union director, I know that our federal government is not doing enough to help prevent fraud through our financial institutions. There are many areas where the government has dropped the ball on combating organized crime, including industrial espionage, white collar crime, national security risks and others.

The Liberal government should have introduced legislation to protect the rights of civil servants who come forward to expose corruption in government. It should have done this long ago. In other countries the legal rights of public servants who blow the whistle are protected. They are rewarded. In Canada we need at least to protect the public servants who report, in good faith, evidence of wrongdoing. They should not be subject to disciplinary action, as the government has shown in the last few years.

Canada needs a mechanism for our public servants to follow when they detect wrongdoing, including mismanagement, misleading information, cover-ups and other things like the issue we are debating today.

I will soon be putting forward a bill for the government to support that will protect and reward whistleblowers. The purpose of the act will be to establish a procedure and provide appropriate rewards and incentives for whistleblowing. Everyone knows about the work of Brian McAdam, who exposed corruption in our Hong Kong embassy.

The sidewinder investigation should certainly be of value and in the best interests of Canadians. My hon. colleague has already spoken about it. For three months Fabian Dawson, a Canadian journalist working out of B.C., has been publishing articles chronicling corruption in our federal government's overseas missions.

We commend these Canadians for their work, but where is the government? Where are the Liberals? Why do the Liberals not investigate what Fabian is writing about? Why do they not help him? Why will they not take action when our media uncovers things through good journalistic investigation?

Today we are looking for answers to the problem of organized crime. What can parliament do? It is easy. The people of Surrey and all Canadians know how easy it is. Contrary to the motion we are debating, there is no need to study this problem. We already know the answers. Parliament can legislate tougher penalties. Parliament can provide whistleblowers with protection and rewards so that they can come forward with the evidence of corruption, exposing the techniques and modus operandi of organized criminals and gangs like the triads.

Rather than this weak Liberal government listening to them and taking appropriate action, rewarding whistleblowers like Brian McAdam and Corporal Read, it tries to shut them up and muzzle them while intimidating and threatening them. This weak government should see to it that the laws which are already in our statute books are enforced. The government can do that by providing our law enforcement community with what it needs to get the job done.

In Surrey the RCMP is always short of staff, equipment, time and resources. There is no reason for that except that the Liberals are starving the force of what it needs. We are the fastest growing community in Canada and this government is starving our city of police protection from organized crime. It is a shame.

I ask this weak Liberal government to wake up. Rather than sitting on its hands, looking like an empty bag, it should get tough on organized crime and send a strong message to criminals around the world on behalf of the people of Surrey, B.C. and all Canadians. It should tell those criminals that Canada is not the place to be.

November 30, 1999 [House of Commons]

Mr. John Maloney

Mr. Speaker, I am very happy to rise today to speak to this matter. Certainly the debate in itself will send a message to organized criminal elements that their behaviour and activities will not be tolerated for the reasons which have been elaborated and which I will continue to elaborate.

I will be sharing my time with the hon. member for Scarborough East.

I would like to take a bit of a different tack in my address. I would like to address some of the key international activities of the federal government in addressing organized crime.

As members on both sides of the House will appreciate, international co-operation in combating organized crime is very vital. Canada, like other countries, is faced with responding to an increased movement of goods and people as our economy globalizes. At the same time, increased use of telecommunications and finance in everyday affairs shrinks our world.

To be sure, criminals are quick to try to capitalize on the opportunity that globalization and technological change present. Canadian ministers and officials are required regularly to attend meetings or conferences where key discussions and negotiations occur and where decisions are taken as to how to combat organized crime. It is a very complex issue. The objective is always to support a co-ordinated international approach to deal with this problem while recognizing that the sovereign interest of states must be respected.

An important recent meeting was the 1994 UN ministerial conference on organized transnational crime held in Naples. At that session a political declaration and global plan of action on organized crime was produced. This document has served as a framework for future multilateral activity in this area, some of which I will now describe.

At the Halifax summit of 1995, on the initiative of the Canadian government, the G-8 heads of state created an experts group on transnational organized crime, now called the Lyon Group. The Lyon Group has produced 40 recommendations on fostering closer co-operative legal assistance, law enforcement and other efforts to address the problem. This was followed by a meeting of G-8 justice and interior ministers on high tech crime in December 1997, a video conference of the G-8 ministers of justice and interior in December 1998, and most recently a meeting of G-8 ministers in Moscow on October 19 and 20 of this year where discussions focused on financial crime, high tech crime and illegal immigration.

The relationship between the Canadian and the United States governments and their agencies in combating organized crime is very important given the economic and cultural ties that we and our neighbours share. We share the same North American space and many of the same interests in combating transborder and transnational crime.

In February 1997, on the initiative of the Solicitor General of Canada and the Attorney General of the United States, it was agreed that Canada and the United States would form the Canada-United States cross-border crime forum. This agreement was reinforced by the commitment of the Prime Minister and President Clinton in April 1997 to form a bi-national body on criminal justice issues.

The Canadian group is comprised of officials from the Department of the Solicitor General, which co-chairs the forum with the U.S. Justice Department, the RCMP, the Canadian Security Intelligence Service, Correctional Service Canada, Revenue Canada, the Canada Customs and Revenue Agency, Citizenship and Immigration, Foreign Affairs, the Department of Finance, as well as representatives from provincial governments, including Quebec, and our police forces.

The U.S. group is comprised of U.S. attorneys, officials from the FBI, the DEA, the U.S. Marshalls Service, the Immigration and Naturalization Service, U.S. Customs, the Bureau of Alcohol, Tobacco and Firearms, the Secret Service, the Internal Revenue Service and regional and state officials.

The first full meeting of the cross-border crime forum took place in Ottawa in October 1997. The forum met again in Washington on May 21, 1998. The most recent meeting of the forum was in June of this year in Prince Edward Island.

The forum provides a regular opportunity for officials from Canada and the United States to discuss transnational crime problems and strategies to improve operational and policy co-operation and co-ordination. The work of officials through the forum's subgroups on intelligence, enforcement, prosecutions and telemarketing fraud is ongoing.

Bi-national strategies and threat assessments have been developed and continue to be refined. Officials are also evaluating current priorities and examining practices and legislation on both sides of the border to support co-operation at the national level, as well as regionally and locally in communities where border crime is a serious public safety concern.

The next meeting of the forum is to take place in May or June 2000 in the United States.

Still looking at the Americas, the Secretary of State for International Financial Institutions participated on behalf of the solicitor general at a ministerial level conference on money laundering held in Buenos Aires in December 1995. The conference produced an action plan on how to deal with money laundering in the Americas in terms of strengthening law enforcement, regulatory and legal measures. The action plan is an important marker for efforts in this hemisphere to combat organized crime.

I would also note Canada's activities in the Inter-American Drug Abuse Control Commission, or CICAD as it is known by its Spanish acronym, of the Organization of American States. The focus of the commission is to address drug abuse and trafficking within the Americas, as well as related activities such as money laundering.

The Deputy Solicitor General of Canada was elected chair of CICAD's multilateral evaluation and monitoring working group at the May 1998 meeting of CICAD in Washington, D.C. This working group has developed a framework to evaluate member states' anti-drug efforts, which was completed at a meeting held August 31 to September 2 of this year.

Canada, as a member of the G-7 countries, was a founding member of the Financial Action Task Force on Money Laundering, the FATF. This task force was created at the G-7 summit held in Paris in 1989 to consider whatever measures were deemed necessary to eliminate money laundering and to develop international standards in this area.

The FATF released a report including 40 recommendations to fight money laundering, which are now considered model measures to be taken at the national and the international levels to put a stop to money laundering.

These recommendations were reviewed in 1996 to reflect the new patterns and the countermeasures taken in this area, like money laundering on the Internet.

The FATF now brings together 28 member states representing the main financial centres of the world.

Canada is also a collaborative and supportive member of the CFATF, the Caribbean Financial Action Task Force, a sister organization of the FATF.

The group members are committed to promoting and implementing the 40 FATF recommendations.

I mentioned the United Nations in my earlier comments. Canada is an active participant on crime issues in the United Nations and its specialized commissions, in particular the United Nations Commission on Narcotic Drugs and the Commission on Crime Prevention and Criminal Justice.

A convention on transnational organized crime is being negotiated now in the UN Crime Prevention and Criminal Justice Commission. The work on this convention will have an impact on Canada's domestic policies and programs. Canada must be ready to meet its obligations and governments must take account of this.

At the same time, the convention will provide general tools for law enforcement and legal assistance among countries at the international level. It is expected that the convention will be adopted by the Millennium United Nations General Assembly in the year 2000.

A comprehensive and co-ordinated approach to combating organized crime nationally is essential to make Canada an effective international partner.

The main objectives of Canada's international activities are to promote Canadian values and policies while building a strong network for practical co-operation.

In this exercise, it is important that the federal government works in partnership with the provinces and territories, and with the communities across the country. We must ensure that our domestic arrangements and our international arrangements are compatible and support each other.

November 30, 1999 [House of Commons]

John McKay

Mr. Speaker, the motion reads:

That this House instruct the Standing Committee on Justice and Human Rights to conduct a study of organized crime, to analyze the options available to parliament to combat the activities of criminal groups and to report to the House no later than October 31, 2000.

I say at the outset that I support the motion and look forward to the reference to the committee on which I sit and which I consider to be a very important committee to the House.

I take this opportunity to congratulate the hon. member for Berthier—Montcalm for his initiative in this area. It is always appropriate that parliament oversees government initiatives and, in this particular instance, this is a valuable and worthwhile initiative.

I will speak to the irony underlying this discussion. This irony revolves around the rule of law. Canada prides itself as a nation subject to the rule of law, much to the chagrin sometimes of many of the members of the House, particularly when the rule of law comes in conflict with, for instance, the supremacy of parliament or when we have interpretations from the Supreme Court of Canada which conflict with the will of parliament. Fortunately, we all respect the rule of law and therefore are able to work out those conflicting points.

Governments are circumscribed by the rule of law. Institutions are circumscribed by the rule of law. Individuals are circumscribed by the rule of law. People in institutions cannot simply do what seems most advantageous to their self-interest, regardless of whether it be in the field of criminality or in the field of civil law.

Canadians live under the rule of law and see it as their most valuable tool to protect themselves, their families and their assets against arbitrary actions by governments, institutions, police and other individuals.

Organized crime on the other hand has no such limitations. Whether it is trafficking in people, drugs, liquor or stolen cars, organized crime challenges the very basis of our Canadian society as we know it and, therefore, it is a threat like no other threat to our civilization.

The irony is that while organized crime seeks to destroy the rule of law in order to gain its revenues, it simultaneously wishes to invest its revenues and its proceeds from its activities in the societies which have the highest standards of the rule of law, because there they provide safe and secure banking systems, safe and secure property registration systems and safe and secure judicial remedies.

The irony is resplendent that ill-gotten gains, regardless of where they come from, whether they be from North America or from other places, frequently end up here because of the rule of the law and because of the security of our various institutions.

I hope I am not naive, and there are some who might say otherwise, but I believe that organized crime will be with us forever, much like original sin, of which many of our members know a great deal. It has been around since the dawn of time and is not likely to go away soon.

Given that it is not likely to go away soon, we have to be realistic about what can or cannot be done in the area of organized crime. I believe we should support the efforts of the RCMP in their interdictions in Sri Lanka for people smuggling, or in Akwesasne for other kinds of smuggling. The question really is whether the government is approaching this in the best possible fashion. What are the initiatives that make the most sense?

To me, hitting at profitability is what makes a great deal of sense. What hits most at profitability? I think that will be the question that determines the direction of the committee. For instance, the principles enunciated by the ministers collective of justice for the country states that taking a profit out of organized is an effective way of putting these criminals out of business and efforts to seize their illegal proceeds should be vigorously pursued. I support that view.

Let us take a look at some of the initiatives that this government has taken on in the last few years. The first initiative is the $115 million given to the RCMP to upgrade its CPIC facility. I had the good fortune of touring that facility in the last term and found it to be a useful tour. I encourage the other members to do so as well because the information held in those files is quite useful in fighting crime.

The next one was $18 million to the data bank initiative. Many of these people have no compunction about any method in order to secure their profits.

An additional $78 million to the national anti-smuggling initiative will fund 100 additional RCMP officers in major airports to help target organized criminals who use these airports as points of entry into Canada.

An additional $15 million paid annually will put more RCMP officers in Vancouver, Toronto and Montreal, and $13.8 million to the RCMP to use for workload increases. Thirteen proceeds of crime units have been created within the RCMP across Canada.

While all of these are laudable initiatives, I do not want to be circumscribing the work of the committee, assuming the motion goes forward, by simply listening to what the government says. To my mind, if those initiatives do not meet the profitability test as to cutting out the profitability of the activities of organized crime, then we probably have to ask ourselves whether that is well spent money. If the foregoing interrupts the profitability anywhere along a spectrum then, in my view, the initiative is doing a good job.

I look forward to the reference to the committee. I reflect on the last time that parliament referred an initiative to the justice committee which was in the area of drunk driving. We on the justice committee spent a great deal of time reviewing the evidence. As the evidence came before us, we started to see the patterns that were there and the gaps in the legislation. We were fortunate enough to not only be able to produce a unanimous report, but the justice committee also produced a bill which was referred back to the House and in turn proclaimed on July 1.

In my constituency, the work of the justice committee and the support that we received from the justice minister and the government in that area, and from all parties, was well received by my constituents. I look forward to this initiative also being dutifully undertaken by the committee and that it will produce a report that will not only be of use to the government but of use to the House.

Frankly, I will be interested at looking at anything that is effective. I will also be interested in looking at initiatives which are not effective. We live in a world of limited resources. We continue to live and will always live in a world of limited resources. We as a government will always be criticized that we never apply enough resources. If the resources that are being applied are not useful and are misdirected then that should also be part of the review of the committee.

While I appreciate that there is an irony going on here, that the rule of law is being abrogated by a certain subset of criminals, ironically, the work of the committee will, I hope, return us to the rule of law. I hope that ultimately, as we examine this issue, we will continue to move ourselves back to a rule of law and a society where all people can have security of person and property.

November 30, 1999 [House of Commons]

Francine Lalonde (Bloc Québécois)

Mr. Speaker, I am pleased to rise today to speak to the Bloc Quebecois motion. It reads as follows:

That this House instruct the Standing Committee on Justice and Human Rights to conduct a study of organized crime, to analyse the options available to Parliament to combat the activities of criminal groups and to report to the House no later than October 31, 2000.

I applaud my colleagues who have worked on these important issues, sometimes at their own personal risk, particularly the hon. member for Berthier—Montcalm, who, with my colleague from Saint-Bruno—Saint-Hubert, is leading this debate, the hon. member for Saint-Hyacinthe—Bagot and the hon. member for Hochelaga—Maisonneuve who, in a way, raised the red flag after the tragic death of the young Daniel Desrochers in his riding. This young boy died in a car bombing incident involving feuding criminal gangs.

I am very proud of the work my colleagues have done. We cannot tolerate in the Quebec society, or the Canadian society for that matter, any kind of ingrained violence as a way of determining markets. This is how it works in the underworld. Neither can we allow crime to become a way of becoming rich without being punished, because all our values could be compromised in the long run.

On a number of occasions, it was pointed out that, in Quebec, which we do not like to think of as a violent society, between 1994 and 1998, criminal organizations were responsible for 79 murders and 89 attempted murders, 129 cases of arson and 82 bombings.

This is a serious situation. We know that it is not all that serious in Quebec, but we are still concerned. However, this scourge also ties in very closely with what is happening internationally. Today we are looking at the globalization of organized crime. Global crime involves more than connections between Canada, Quebec and the United States, for example, with some ramifications in Mexico. It is much larger than that.

As I said before, we know that places that lend themselves to criminal activity become markets that are fought over internationally. We only have to look at the various gangs competing with one another with the means and the level of violence we know.

I just want to take a moment to mention that, in other countries, in Europeans countries for example—and I have been made aware of that—one type of crime that is being dealt with is the exploitation of half a million women from developing countries who are brought to western Europe each year for profitable sex crimes.

We know that young women and women are kidnapped and disappear and that they end up being exploited somewhere. When you add up all these numbers, it looks like a modern-day white slave traffic.

Then there is the whole issue of the displacement of persons. According to the International Organization for Migration, those who are involved in the organized trafficking of human beings are responsible for the displacement of one million individuals at any given time, generating $7 billion worth of business every year.

Putting an end to the trafficking of human beings was the primary goal of the European Union summit held in Finland. The aim was not to simply prevent the displacement of people. Displaced people who are charged $20,000—in the case of those from China for example—are subject to a kind of slavery and control including threats against their person.

Several migrants from Europe landed illegally in western Canada. Recently, some of them were brought here by boat in the same unacceptable fashion.

Drugs are an international scourge. Numbers vary but, according to a document we produced, there is between $100 and $500 billion in trade every year. By comparison, drugs account for 8% of international trade, or approximately $400 billion, roughly the same as oil and gas. This is a lot. Oil and gas represent an extremely important part of international trade. The drug trade is said to be of an equal value.

The stakes are enormous and profits from organized crime could be as high as one trillion dollars. I am not mistaken. I do not mean one thousand million in French, or one billion in English, I mean one trillion, which as far as I know is “un billion” in French.

This goes to show how extremely important these illicit, violent activities are with all their showy wealth. In Moscow I have seen the most sumptuous boutiques. There are 20 BMW dealerships in Moscow, and it would seem that very few are authorized dealers. There is world-wide trafficking in the resale of stolen automobiles.

Why mention this in connection with the death of the Desrochers boy? In order to indicate the extreme importance of the work my colleagues on both sides of the House will have to do. They will certainly need to know exactly what is going on, as far as international agreements are concerned, because the globalization of crime is such that it cannot be considered localized and therefore solvable locally. This is particularly the case now that there are new approaches, such as high tech crimes, cyber attacks and crimes committed by hackers.

Now there are brilliant hackers who are able to commit financial crimes by infiltrating computer systems and then, with a few keystrokes, hiding all evidence of their crime, or transferring the proceeds from it to another country.

This field is one of extraordinarily rapid change, and it is at the service of biker gangs as much as it is for any other group. Under these circumstances, the authorities face a major challenge, because the crime must first be located and then the data has to be obtained to prove it. There is considerable urgency here.

Some countries, we have heard, want to make encryption keys mandatory. Encryption uses extremely lengthy formulas that supposedly make it impossible to get into messages and therefore protect honest people from those who want to invade their privacy. They may, however, also afford protection to dishonest people by preventing the justice system from being able to find out what they have been doing. This is what happened in Japan, when a sect carried out its plans to poison subway travellers and Japan found itself with evidence that had to be decrypted. This was a very long and difficult task and it had to be done before the criminals could be tried, and they were not able to decipher it completely.

In closing, I wish to say that, as a society, we cannot allow these crimes to go unpunished, because the entire social balance is jeopardized. What is more, young people who are struggling to make it in the world may be attracted by this way to get rich quick.

November 30, 1999 [House of Commons]

Mr. Michel Bellehumeur (Berthier—Montcalm, BQ)

Mr. Speaker, I listened carefully to the speech made by my colleague and I can see once again that the hon. member for Mercier has a very good grasp of the issue of organized crime and of its scope, in Quebec and in Canada.

Her calm and rational tone was a reflection of today's debate. Indeed, all the parties said they would support the Bloc Quebecois' motion. We feel this is a very important issue which deserves to receive all our attention, and the other parties obviously think so too.

I have a question for the my colleague, the hon. member for Mercier. I know she is very interested in what goes on at the international level. I am sure she said something about this, but I missed the beginning of her speech. I would appreciate it if she could comment about what is being done at the international level, if she had not already done so in her speech.

I realize that we must first have good national legislation. Obviously, we must first clean up our own backyard, but my question to the hon. member is about what goes on at the international level. Does the hon. member think that, once we will have cleaned up our act, there are things that must be done at the international level? Is some form of co-operation desirable? Are there useful lessons that could be learned from European countries, as the hon. member has frequent contacts with them and comes back with good ideas? I know that she recently travelled with the Minister of Justice precisely to talk about organized crime at the international level.

I would like to hear the hon. member, because she has a unique experience. The Bloc Quebecois is lucky to have her, because she increasingly brings her great expertise to us and to all Quebecers. I would like to hear her comments on this issue.

November 30, 1999 [House of Commons]

Mrs. Francine Lalonde

Mr. Speaker, my hon. colleague is making me blush.

Indeed, I have had the opportunity to join the justice minister at the G8 Summit. Having a government with a small majority can sometimes be useful to the opposition. I know about the collaborative work being done, and the secretary of state has mentioned the Lyon Group.

To be able to work together, countries have to agree on some rules. They have to know that if an offender is sent to another country, he will be treated the same way as he would be in his own country. Therefore, it is extremely important for countries to come to an agreement, and it is not always easy, because each and every state wants to run things.

I am glad to see that the committee is considering this issue as well as parliaments around the world, so that they can exchange information. Of course, in order to be able to exchange information and make a decision when the proceeds of some crime are located, we have to decide in advance how the proceeds of crime will be divided and who will try the alleged offender.

Will foreign countries agree with the way the trial will be run? We also have to think about the severity of the penalties provided. This has become crucial because it is so very easy for criminals to go from one country to another.

I want to thank my hon. colleague for his question. I think that, from now on, parliamentarians from countries around the world will have to talk about these things. I hope the committee will be the one to initiate these discussions. I also hope that the committee of a sovereign Quebec will be able to carry on and to discuss this issue with the committee of a sovereign Canada and the committees of other jurisdictions. It will be crucial to agree on some basic rules to ensure a minimum of justice.

November 30, 1999 [House of Commons]

Mrs. Suzanne Tremblay (Rimouski—Mitis, BQ)

Mr. Speaker, I am pleased to take part in the debate on the motion, which may be made votable, introduced by the Bloc Quebecois on one of the opposition days provided for in the agreement between the parliamentary leaders of the various parties represented in the House.

The full motion reads as follows:

That this House instruct the Standing Committee on Justice and Human Rights to conduct a study of organized crime, to analyse the options available to Parliament to effectively combat the activities of criminal groups and to report to the House no later than October 31, 2000.

In March 1998, Angus Reid conducted an omnibus survey containing questions about organized crime. The results of the survey said it all: 91% of the population described organized crime as a problem, and one Canadian out of two thought that it was a serious problem; 21% of the population thought that existing efforts to combat organized crime were adequate, and 77% wanted to see such efforts increased. Finally, the same survey showed that residents of Quebec and British Columbia were more anxious about organized crime than other Canadians.

For the Bloc Quebecois to have set aside as a possible theme for this day a subject as important for our collective future as sovereignty and anti-democratic measures to control that process being dreamt up by the Minister of Intergovernmental Affairs and the Prime Minister is a sign that the situation is critical with respect to organized crime.

Since our arrival in the House in 1993, a number of incidents have had a sobering impact on our existence as ordinary citizens wishing to live in peace and harmony. Let us recall briefly some of the more tragic among them.

In 1995, during a war between biker gangs for the control of a territory, Daniel Desrochers, an 11-year old boy, was killed by the explosion of a bomb in the Hochelaga—Maisonneuve, in the east end of Montreal.

A few months later, a bomb went off in Saint-Nicolas, just south of Quebec City, and windows were shattered, including those in a baby's bedroom.

In 1997, Diane Lavigne and Pierre Rondeau, two prison guards, were killed in cold blood, presumably by bikers.

In a report by the Canadian Press published in Le Soleil of March 20, 1998, the then Quebec minister of public security, Pierre Bélanger, declared that the security and custody measures taken for the suspect had cost $1 million. Moreover, the chief crown prosecutor in Montreal, André Vincent, said Hell's Angels hitmen killed the two prison guards at random, just to destabilize the justice system. He added that these criminals intended to attack crown prosecutors and judges too.

I will add that André Tousignant, one of the Hell's Angels hitmen, was murdered and his body found on February 27, 1998, in the woods near Bromont.

These terrible incidents add to the problems faced by, among others, the Sûreté du Quebec in the fight against the so-called forced plantings of marijuana in farmlands across Quebec. In this regard, the Canadian Police Association stated in a press release on October 8 that the awful reality was that organized crime had reached epidemic proportions and that the police were frustrated by the lack of tools and resources to fight it.

The statistics are very revealing in measuring the scope of the problem of organized crime, regardless of its source. For example, the RCMP advises that, between 1994 and 1998, in general terms, there were 79 murders and 89 attempted murders in connection with biker gang wars in Quebec. These wars are also behind 129 cases of arson and 82 bombings.

If we look at an impact study on organized crime commissioned by the Office of the Solicitor General and released in 1998, we learn that the illicit sale of drugs in Canada provides revenues of $10 billion annually to those involved. Evaluations of the scope of the world market of illicit drugs vary between $100 billion U.S. and $500 billion U.S. Le Devoir of January 8, 1999 reported that, in Canada, in 1998, smuggling, which concerns all criminal organizations, involved primarily tobacco, alcohol and jewellery. It even reported that, in jewellery alone, the Canadian black market was estimated to be worth $400 million. All smuggling activities together are estimated to have cost the federal and provincial governments some $1.4 billion.

Crimes of an economic nature are on the same scale. To list them quickly, these include fraudulent telemarketing, aimed particularly at the elderly, stock market fraud and the fraudulent use of credit cards. According to the same source, it would appear that economic crimes cost the people of Quebec and of Canada a minimum of $5 billion annually.

This being the case, what has the Parliament of Canada done on the legislative, financial and international levels?

Let us look at the legislative aspect first of all. The government has passed four bills we feel it would be worthwhile to review briefly.

First there is the Witness Protection Act. Police forces are now in a position to provide better protection to those co-operating with them in obtaining evidence against criminal organizations.

Second, the Criminal Law Improvement Actenables the police to carry out storefront operations more easily. This enabled the RCMP to successfully carry out Operation Compote, resulting in charges against 50 people, one of them a Montreal lawyer.

The third is the anti-gang legislation passed in April 1997, the main thrust of which is inclusion in criminal law of the definition of gang.

This bill makes it a crime to take part in the activities of a gang and provides heavier penalties for those who commit crimes for a gang. It also authorizes the seizure of goods used for gangs' criminal activities.

It should noted that this legislation does not target the leaders of criminal gangs, since it is assumed that the individuals targeted are the ones who commit the crime. However, it is a well-known fact that in this type of criminal organization, the dirty jobs are often done by subordinates and that the leaders must be caught for these organizations to be broken up.

The fourth legislative measure is the Controlled Drugs and Substances Act, which gives police the power to conduct reverse sting operations with undercover officers.

In spite of all these legislative provisions, police forces seem unable to put an end to the activities of criminal gangs. As for the financial resources earmarked by the governments of Canada and Quebec to fight organized crime, they seem clearly inadequate. However, it must be realized that it is difficult to get a precise breakdown of all the moneys spent on the issue that we are discussing today.

Finally, at the international level, during a conference held in Montreal in 1998, the deputy commissioner of the RCMP for investigations, René Charbonneau, proposed the establishment of an international criminal tribunal to deal with drug dealers.

In light of this brief overview of organized crime in Canada, we can see that the measures and the legislation in place and the amount of money spent at this time cannot eradicate this problem. That is why the Bloc Quebecois believes it is important to examine the tools available to us to determine if they could be improved or if they could be complemented by new legislative, administrative and financial measures.

There seems to be a consensus on the urgency of passing new tougher and more explicit legislation to counter activities by criminal organizations.

Organized crime is certainly a national problem that threatens public safety. It is important that the efforts made by parliament to pass legislation that is suited to the reality faced by police match the efforts made by police in the field to uncover criminal organizations.

The federal government must show the political will to take action and must find ways to improve intelligence gathering by the police, to impose harsher sentences on members of criminal organizations and to give more teeth to its money laundering legislation.

November 30, 1999 [House of Commons]

Mrs. Suzanne Tremblay (Rimouski—Mitis, BQ)

Mr. Speaker, I am pleased to take part in the debate on the motion, which may be made votable, introduced by the Bloc Quebecois on one of the opposition days provided for in the agreement between the parliamentary leaders of the various parties represented in the House.

The full motion reads as follows:

That this House instruct the Standing Committee on Justice and Human Rights to conduct a study of organized crime, to analyse the options available to Parliament to effectively combat the activities of criminal groups and to report to the House no later than October 31, 2000.

In March 1998, Angus Reid conducted an omnibus survey containing questions about organized crime. The results of the survey said it all: 91% of the population described organized crime as a problem, and one Canadian out of two thought that it was a serious problem; 21% of the population thought that existing efforts to combat organized crime were adequate, and 77% wanted to see such efforts increased. Finally, the same survey showed that residents of Quebec and British Columbia were more anxious about organized crime than other Canadians.

For the Bloc Quebecois to have set aside as a possible theme for this day a subject as important for our collective future as sovereignty and anti-democratic measures to control that process being dreamt up by the Minister of Intergovernmental Affairs and the Prime Minister is a sign that the situation is critical with respect to organized crime.

Since our arrival in the House in 1993, a number of incidents have had a sobering impact on our existence as ordinary citizens wishing to live in peace and harmony. Let us recall briefly some of the more tragic among them.

In 1995, during a war between biker gangs for the control of a territory, Daniel Desrochers, an 11-year old boy, was killed by the explosion of a bomb in the Hochelaga—Maisonneuve, in the east end of Montreal.

A few months later, a bomb went off in Saint-Nicolas, just south of Quebec City, and windows were shattered, including those in a baby's bedroom.

In 1997, Diane Lavigne and Pierre Rondeau, two prison guards, were killed in cold blood, presumably by bikers.

In a report by the Canadian Press published in Le Soleil of March 20, 1998, the then Quebec minister of public security, Pierre Bélanger, declared that the security and custody measures taken for the suspect had cost $1 million. Moreover, the chief crown prosecutor in Montreal, André Vincent, said Hell's Angels hitmen killed the two prison guards at random, just to destabilize the justice system. He added that these criminals intended to attack crown prosecutors and judges too.

I will add that André Tousignant, one of the Hell's Angels hitmen, was murdered and his body found on February 27, 1998, in the woods near Bromont.

These terrible incidents add to the problems faced by, among others, the Sûreté du Quebec in the fight against the so-called forced plantings of marijuana in farmlands across Quebec. In this regard, the Canadian Police Association stated in a press release on October 8 that the awful reality was that organized crime had reached epidemic proportions and that the police were frustrated by the lack of tools and resources to fight it.

The statistics are very revealing in measuring the scope of the problem of organized crime, regardless of its source. For example, the RCMP advises that, between 1994 and 1998, in general terms, there were 79 murders and 89 attempted murders in connection with biker gang wars in Quebec. These wars are also behind 129 cases of arson and 82 bombings.

If we look at an impact study on organized crime commissioned by the Office of the Solicitor General and released in 1998, we learn that the illicit sale of drugs in Canada provides revenues of $10 billion annually to those involved. Evaluations of the scope of the world market of illicit drugs vary between $100 billion U.S. and $500 billion U.S. Le Devoir of January 8, 1999 reported that, in Canada, in 1998, smuggling, which concerns all criminal organizations, involved primarily tobacco, alcohol and jewellery. It even reported that, in jewellery alone, the Canadian black market was estimated to be worth $400 million. All smuggling activities together are estimated to have cost the federal and provincial governments some $1.4 billion.

Crimes of an economic nature are on the same scale. To list them quickly, these include fraudulent telemarketing, aimed particularly at the elderly, stock market fraud and the fraudulent use of credit cards. According to the same source, it would appear that economic crimes cost the people of Quebec and of Canada a minimum of $5 billion annually.

This being the case, what has the Parliament of Canada done on the legislative, financial and international levels?

Let us look at the legislative aspect first of all. The government has passed four bills we feel it would be worthwhile to review briefly.

First there is the Witness Protection Act. Police forces are now in a position to provide better protection to those co-operating with them in obtaining evidence against criminal organizations.

Second, the Criminal Law Improvement Actenables the police to carry out storefront operations more easily. This enabled the RCMP to successfully carry out Operation Compote, resulting in charges against 50 people, one of them a Montreal lawyer.

The third is the anti-gang legislation passed in April 1997, the main thrust of which is inclusion in criminal law of the definition of gang.

This bill makes it a crime to take part in the activities of a gang and provides heavier penalties for those who commit crimes for a gang. It also authorizes the seizure of goods used for gangs' criminal activities.

It should noted that this legislation does not target the leaders of criminal gangs, since it is assumed that the individuals targeted are the ones who commit the crime. However, it is a well-known fact that in this type of criminal organization, the dirty jobs are often done by subordinates and that the leaders must be caught for these organizations to be broken up.

The fourth legislative measure is the Controlled Drugs and Substances Act, which gives police the power to conduct reverse sting operations with undercover officers.

In spite of all these legislative provisions, police forces seem unable to put an end to the activities of criminal gangs. As for the financial resources earmarked by the governments of Canada and Quebec to fight organized crime, they seem clearly inadequate. However, it must be realized that it is difficult to get a precise breakdown of all the moneys spent on the issue that we are discussing today.

November 30, 1999 [House of Commons]

Mr. Michel Bellehumeur (Berthier—Montcalm, BQ)

Mr. Speaker, my comment will be along the lines of those I have made in the course of the day. It must be understood that the motion tabled by the Bloc Quebecois today, which will get hopefully a unanimous vote in the House of Commons this evening, is the product of considerable work.

The Bloc Quebecois has long been discussing and working on it. I take this opportunity to thank the members for Saint-Bruno—Saint-Hubert, Saint-Hyacinthe—Bagot, Hochelaga—Maisonneuve, Lévis-et-Chutes-de-la-Chaudière, Québec and Drummond, and, for their support, the members for Roberval and Rimouski—Mitis, who, in the past few hours, have been negotiating with the other opposition parties to come up with a motion that would receive the unanimous approval of the House. Once and for all, we will study this issue seriously and with all assumptions on the table.

It is common knowledge that drug dollars are a huge problem. The Bloc Quebecois has already tabled a bill on money laundering. Could we not in our study also look at the issue of money laundering and take the avenue proposed by the Bloc concerning, among other things, $1,000 bills and the deposit of large sums of money? Could the member respond to this question?

November 30, 1999 [House of Commons]

Mrs. Suzanne Tremblay

Mr. Speaker, I will respond quickly.

Indeed, I think we must study this issue. Our colleague from Charlesbourg has already introduced a bill to remove $1,000 bills from circulation. We are probably the only major industrialized country to have such a large bill. It is easier to carry ten $1000 bills in one's pockets than five hundred $5 bills or two hundred $10 bills, and so on. It makes for not such a thick wad with ten $1,000 bills, and it is easier to launder them, in the casino, for example, some evening.

November 30, 1999 [House of Commons]

Ms. Sophia Leung (Vancouver Kingsway, Lib.)

Mr. Speaker, I rise today to express my support for the motion currently before the House. I will share my time with the hon. member for Wentworth—Burlington.

Organized crime is a serious national and international problem that threatens public safety. It is now a multibillion dollar enterprise in Canada. It has a negative impact upon all Canadians.

Many of the problems Canadians see every day are linked to organized crime. Whether it be a drug related burglary, a carton of smuggled cigarettes, a telemarketing scam or juvenile prostitution, it is usually part of the larger problem of organized crime. That is why fighting organized crime is a major task for the government and a key priority of the RCMP.

The federal government has done much so far to hit hard at those criminals. The government is proud of what it has accomplished, but we all know there is more work to do. The government has undertaken a number of initiatives in its fight against organized crime. This government also recognizes that in the global war on organized crime, no one country or government can win by acting alone. Take the example of human smuggling and trafficking.

The government shares the concerns and frustrations of many Canadians in relation to the challenges posed by the arrival of illegal migrants. Canadians are proud of and deeply committed to our humanitarian traditions, but it is equally true that we have no tolerance for those who would abuse this generosity. Today criminally organized smuggling and trafficking operations are conducting an extensive international trade in lives and in the forced labour of human beings.

The United Nations estimates that international smuggling and trafficking operations have grown to a $10 billion a year industry. Organized criminals are demanding as much as $50,000 from their naive or misguided victims, exploiting their simple desire for a better life. We know that this debt is typically repaid over a short and brutal lifetime of illicit activity, sexual exploitation and forced labour.

This is a truly despicable set of circumstances but we must be clear about its source and direct our rightful anger and outrage toward the criminals who seek profit in human suffering rather than toward those victims who in search for a better life allow themselves to be put into such slavery.

Let us be clear about what has been happening with respect to our recent boatloads of arrivals from China. The boats were identified, intercepted, boarded and apprehended. Nine crew members have been charged. Their passengers have been detained. Organized crime has been denied access to the source of its profit. The economic incentive has been cut off. Those who have claimed refugee status are being given a fair hearing on an accelerated basis and in accordance with our charter, our international obligations and our proud humanitarian traditions.

Canadian government officials from the coast guard and national defence, the RCMP and Citizenship and Immigration Canada have all responded admirably under extremely stressful conditions, but the integrity of the system is something we take very seriously. Simply put, if we allow the rules to be abused and the rules are not respected, they cease to have meaning.

People smuggling and human trafficking are serious international problems. That is why we have initiated a serious international response. Canada has assumed a leading role in the development of United Nations protocols on transnational organized crime and migrant smuggling.

We have been working closely with our partners in the United States to improve our crime databases and on joint efforts to track and apprehend international criminals and terrorists. We are working along similar lines with law enforcement agencies in Australia, New Zealand and the European Union. It is worth noting that other countries are confronting similar problems, often on a significantly greater scale. This month alone Australia has seen the arrival of 10 migrant vessels carrying almost 900 people.

We are working with the People's Republic of China. Senior immigration officers along with members of the RCMP have recently returned from Beijing and the Fujian province where they met with representatives of the Chinese government, its enforcement officers and local police.

Last September I and two colleagues from the House went to China. We had discussions and negotiations with Chinese officials to work jointly to solve the human smuggling problem. This visit has helped us to advance our working relationship on human trafficking, people smuggling and the repatriation of Chinese nationals. The Chinese government has reported the recent seizure of six migrant vessels, including up to four which are thought to have been destined for Canada.

Smuggling has been around for a while. It is a fee for service operation where smugglers are paid for simple passage across international borders. They provide this service through various means which include such things as false travel documents and undetected border crossings. Their customers are sometimes economic migrants, but sometimes they are legitimate refugees who resort to smugglers as the only way to escape the source of their persecution.

Human trafficking is more akin to human slavery. The goal of traffickers is to profit from indentured human slaves. Once their debts have been imposed, the victims of human trafficking are bound to a long term repayment plan involving forced labour, prostitution and other illicit activities. These victims often have reason to fear for their lives and the lives of their family members back home.

For human traffickers, the goal is not legal status. In the first instance it is to evade detection at our ports of entry in order to enter unnoticed and force their passengers underground and into slavery as soon as possible. We are opposed to both smuggling and trafficking. But above all,

Canada will not tolerate the abuse of our system by organized criminals engaged in such deplorable human exploitation.

The Minister of Citizenship and Immigration has travelled across the country speaking with her provincial counterparts, representatives of various non-governmental organizations and other concerned citizens. She has listened to a wide range of views on the matter in order to come up with a solution to this problem.

There is no easy solution to this problem. That is why I am pleased to support the motion that is before the House. I urge all members to do so.

November 30, 1999 [House of Commons]

Mr. John Bryden (Wentworth—Burlington, Lib.)

Mr. Speaker, it is really a pleasure to rise in this debate because just yesterday I was saying that I felt that the Bloc Quebecois, despite their agenda of sovereignty, contributes mightily to this parliament. I think this motion today is an example of a very positive contribution of the Bloc Quebecois.

I do not have a lot of time, but I would like to take this debate in a particular direction. I would like to draw the Bloc's attention and this parliament's attention to the fact that organized crime has also entered the field of charities. I think this is something that should be of concern to the justice committee when it comes to act on the motion proposed by the Bloc Quebecois.

Mr. Speaker, organized crime enters the field of voluntary service in a number of ways. One way is the proliferation of various telemarketing and direct mail scams. The commercial crime squad of the RCMP has recently reported, in Montreal in fact, that there have been links to the biker gangs. They have established links to biker gangs of organizations that are engaged in soliciting funds by telemarketing.

These are the people, Mr. Speaker, who phone and chiefly prey on the senior citizens in our society, both in French and in English, I have to say. It very much is a Canadian thing because this type of activity occurs and all we Canadians, our elderly parents, actually are very vulnerable to it.

So this kind of thing is going on, Mr. Speaker. The other thing that is occurring that again I believe is the effect of organized crime, and this is the case of international organized crime where organizations take advantage of the ethnic makeup of Canada and perpetrate scams that basically involve making contact with individuals from whatever ethnic group and saying that a long lost relative has died in Africa, or Europe, or the former Yugoslavia, or the far east, and that they have been left an inheritance.

A lot of people have lost a lot of money through these scams which, again according to sources in the RCMP commercial crime squads, often are linked to international organized crime. Canada's ethnic community is very vulnerable to this kind of thing.

But, Mr. Speaker, probably the most significant penetration of organized crime into the charity field has to do with the fact that as the law stands now with respect to non-profit organizations, and especially charities, because there is so little scrutiny on the way charities operate, and so little scrutiny on the financial affairs of charities, I suggest to you, Mr. Speaker, that charities have become a major conduit for the laundering of money.

Now, Mr. Speaker, I am not going to give you chapter and verse on which charities are engaged in this or which organizations are actually involved in it because, frankly, I do not know. I am not a policeman. I am not somebody who is involved in ferreting out criminal activity. I can tell you though, Mr. Speaker, based on my research, and you know, Mr. Speaker, I am very active in examining the charity sector, I can tell you that there is a lot of evidence, and recorded evidence, that charities have been used as fronts to finance overseas ethnic conflicts and terrorism.

That stands to reason, Mr. Speaker, because a charity can collect money. Under the current rules a charity can collect in loose change, shall we say, at bingos and lotteries and all that kind of thing, more than a million dollars and there is absolutely no way that that money can be audited as it stands now. On the other side with charitable organizations that have overseas branches, again there is no mechanism, Mr. Speaker, to be sure that when that money of that charity is transferred out of this country to its parent organization in another country, that that parent organization is not using it to finance ethnic conflict or some very non-charitable activity.

Well, Mr. Speaker, what is good for international terrorism, I suggest to you, is good for international organized crime and I will say that the government has shown some interest in this area and we can hope that perhaps we will move with some kind of legislation, or some better regulations at the very least, to control charities which I point out to you, Mr. Speaker, is a $90 billion industry that has run for years and years without any kind of meaningful oversight.

And so, Mr. Speaker, I conclude my remarks. I am glad to put that on the record so that that can be part of what the justice committee considers when it follows through on the motion by the Bloc Quebecois, but I will end my remarks by saying that I think it is an excellent motion. I think it is the credit to my colleagues opposite and sometimes, Mr. Speaker, quite frankly, you know they do so well, that sometimes I wish that they were the official opposition but then, what can I say, Mr. Speaker. They would have to change their politics for me to really believe that. Thank you so much, Mr. Speaker, and I thank them as well.

Immigration and Refugee Protection Act (Bill C-11)

Citation 2001, c. 27, s. 246

Royal Assent November 01, 2001

Hansard

February 27, 2001 [House of Commons]

Mr. Keith Martin (Esquimalt—Juan de Fuca, Canadian Alliance)

… Human smuggling is an international problem. It is linked with international crime gangs. These people are criminals and we are very happy that the minister put extra penalties in the bill. There are $1 million in penalties to individuals who are profiting from the human misery that goes with human smuggling. The people who are engaged in this activity are organized criminals. They are profiting from human misery. We need to work with our partners on this matter…

April 3, 2001[Standing Committee on Citizenship and Immigration] [Entire Exchange]

Ms. Joan Atkinson: We'd be happy to provide you with examples of the research we've done in terms of some of the rationale for putting the particular weight on some of the factors that we have. We'd be happy to describe in a further meeting how we think the adaptability feature will work, and so on.

Currently the difficulty we have with the entrepreneur program versus the investor program is that the entrepreneur program is not terribly clear in that an entrepreneur is required to demonstrate that they have the ability to establish a business, but they don't necessarily have to have any business experience, whereas an investor must definitely have past business experience.

All the indications are that past business experience is a pretty good indicator of future business success. So in order to establish more objective and common standards for the selection of business immigrants, we will have a common definition that will include business experience. An investor will be an immigrant who has business experience, and so will an entrepreneur.

An investor, on the other hand, will have to have a net worth of at least $800,000, and an entrepreneur, a net worth of at least $300,000. So again, we're adding some more objectivity and consistency into the way we select entrepreneurs, by establishing a minimum threshold for net worth for this category of immigrant.

Finally, of course, the investor will have to establish to the satisfaction of an officer that they have indeed made an approved investment in Canada. We will continue with the current investor program—that is, the single federal fund outside of Quebec. The Quebec program will continue; that is guaranteed in the legislation. In the federal fund outside of Quebec, the money will be collected and then allocated to all the participating provinces according to a formula. So that provision of the investor program will remain.

Finally, I've pointed out at the bottom of the page that we will be providing new tools to identify and refuse applications by members of organized crime and persons intent on laundering assets through the investor program. We have to be vigilant, given that we are talking about fairly significant amounts of money in the investor program. We have obligations under the new proceeds of crime legislation and the regulations on tracking proceeds of crime and money laundering, and we will ensure that we have the tools available to do that in the immigration context.

The Chair: These are what clauses in the bill?

Ms. Joan Atkinson: They're clauses 12 and 14—clause 12 in terms of the selection of economic immigrants, and clause 14 for the regulation-making authority under that.

The Chair: Okay. Inky, and then John.

Mr. Inky Mark: In speaking with your officers in Hong Kong just a couple of weeks ago, one of the concerns was verification of accounts.

One thing we don't want to promote is laundering of money in this country, but the other thing that I believe North Americans must understand is there is a cultural difference between people from Asian countries and this country. They don't trust government, and you can understand why they don't. So I think there has to be more flexibility on the personal account side. If we want to know every nickel they own, it's highly unlikely they're going to tell us that.

Ms. Joan Atkinson: Assessing the net worth of investors or entrepreneur applicants is certainly one of the more challenging tasks that visa officers have. Visa officers are not forensic accountants, and they don't necessarily have that type of very detailed knowledge in terms of assessing business documentation.

As a result, in order to ensure that business immigrants have a fair assessment, we are increasingly turning to outside accounting firms. We are increasingly asking the client to get an assessment of their business performance or their net worth done by one of the big five accounting firms, because we simply don't have that expertise or knowledge amongst our visa officer cadre. We think in fact it's fairer to the applicant, rather than us trying to second guess what their documentation says, to ensure it has been vetted by a competent assessor who has the knowledge and expertise to do that and then bring that to us.

The Chair: John, have you any questions on this?

Mr. John McCallum: I could.

The Chair: I thought I saw your hand go up.

Mr. John McCallum: Well, I'll take advantage of the floor.

I just have one question about the investor program. I don't have a terribly good understanding of it. I gather money comes in and is distributed by the federal government for use in the different provinces across the country, assuming the province has some kind of an agreement.

I have a couple of questions. How much money is involved? Do all provinces have such an agreement and therefore the money is distributed to every province according to a formula? Are there one or more provinces that don't have an agreement?

Ms. Joan Atkinson: Not every province has an agreement with us in terms of the disbursement of the investor funds. The participating provinces are Ontario, Prince Edward Island, and—

Mr. Mark Davidson: British Columbia.

Ms. Joan Atkinson: —British Columbia. They're the only provinces currently getting funds under the investor program because they're the only ones who have signed the agreement.

The agreement is simply that the province set up the appropriate mechanism or the appropriate vehicle to receive the funds. It is given to the province in the context of a loan for five years. They have to return the principal to the investment fund at the end of five years and that principal gets returned to the investor.

Mr. John McCallum: Approximately how much money per year are we talking about?

Ms. Joan Atkinson: I don't have those figures with me.

I should mention we're talking about two programs, because there is also the Quebec program. Quebec runs its own investor program and has a different method of receiving and spending the funds. Then we have the program for the rest of Canada.

I can provide those figures. I don't have them here with me today, but I can certainly provide those figures.

The Chair: I thought Ontario hadn't signed on. We don't have an agreement with them and therefore we have not disbursed any of those moneys at all.

Ms. Joan Atkinson: We don't have an immigration agreement with the Province of Ontario.

The Chair: Right.

Ms. Joan Atkinson: We do with every other province.

The Chair: That is incredible.

Ms. Joan Atkinson: This is very specific to the investor program.

The Chair: Okay.

I need to ask again about competition for the best and brightest in the world, meaning entrepreneurs and potential investors who in fact create jobs. How did we come up with this $800,000 net worth, or the $300,000 net worth as an investor? On the basis of what criteria was the threshold established?

In my opinion, that's a barrier or a fence much too high. At the end of the day, is somebody prepared to bring half a million dollars? Let's face it, this is not a quick way into this country.

If you do have business experience and if you do have investment, that should be one of the criteria that allows you to at least be considered. You have to meet all those other tests in order to be admitted into this country. Again, how did we justify it and how did it compare to other countries that in fact are also looking for the best and brightest?

Ms. Joan Atkinson: The net worth in terms of the investor and the entrepreneur program was done very much in consultation with the provinces and territories that have a very direct interest in this program. They very clearly see the benefits of investors and entrepreneurs in terms of capital investment and job creation in their respective jurisdictions. The $800,000 was arrived at through discussion and negotiation with all the provinces involved.

It is also very competitive with similar programs. Other countries have investor-like programs, including Australia, the United States, and the United Kingdon. The $800,000 is very competitive with those programs in terms of the net-worth requirement.

The Chair: There's a new wrinkle here, even though the investor-immigrant program has gone back and forth over the number of years I've been here. It used to be a direct investment and the investment was defined, not passive or something. Then we went to where the government takes in all the money and guarantees it to the investor so no one gets shafted. We understand there were some real scams out there. Now we're indicating you could have a hybrid of both, but a bona fide investment in Canada could also qualify. It's going to be a hybrid of the two systems.

Ms. Joan Atkinson: It's not really. The investment will continue to have to be made in only the approved fund.

The entrepreneur, on the other hand, is a different kettle of fish, if I could use that terminology. By putting the net worth in the entrepreneur program, we're trying to promote some consistency in the way we select entrepreneurs. Currently there's no minimum net worth requirement for entrepreneurs, so these officers have very little in the way of guidance to determine what's appropriate.

If an entrepreneur wants to come to Canada and establish a business, what amount of money do they need? It's very inconsistent. What we're doing is providing a level of consistency so it's clear, both to the client and to the decision-maker, what the threshold is in terms of minimum net worth for an entrepreneur. But an entrepreneur can invest that money wherever they want. The idea behind the entrepreneur category is that those are people who are going to get directly involved in business and run businesses themselves.

The Chair: I agree with you, but you've defined investor. It says “indicates to the minister in writing and establishes to the satisfaction of a visa officer that they have made an investment in Canada”. I think you were talking about the investor and not the entrepreneur. For the entrepreneur, as you said, we're setting some sort of guideline or standard, but...

Jean and John.

Ms. Jean Augustine: I'm not too sure that my question is exactly on the investor, but the terminology here troubles me a little bit.

We define an entrepreneur to mean an “immigrant who”, and we then talk about “business immigrants”, and yet there are other places where we talk about “foreign nationals”. I want to be clear what the terminology is and how we are using it in the bill. Could we have some reasoning around that term “foreign national”? Because I have some trouble with that. As I go from the bill to regulations, you seem to be using the term “foreign nationals” and at the same time “immigrants”.

The Chair: That was a nifty way of getting into a very big discussion and a question that we all have with regard to so-called “foreign nationals”. That's a definition, Joan, that we want to probe and discuss at length. We're not going to do it right now, but thank you, Jean, for putting it in there, so that we don't lose sight of it. I want to get into the consistency of using the same thing, and foreign nationals is one question. We'll leave that for another day, if we could. A very good question.

John.

Mr. John Herron: On the fourth bullet on page 12, you mention that the objective is to identify and refuse applications by members of organized crime and persons intent on laundering assets. Now, currently, if an investor or an entrepreneur makes an application, are they required to state the name of their spouse?

Ms. Joan Atkinson: Any applicant for permanent residence in Canada has to list all the accompanying members of their family, including their spouse and dependent children.

Mr. John Herron: If they are no longer married, or are separated or divorced, or in the process of, would they be required to put the name of their spouse? Correct me.

Ms. Joan Atkinson: If they are divorced or legally separated, then they would not be required because there is no requirement under the Immigration Act or regulations to examine those people.

Mr. John Herron: Wouldn't that be something that might be, perhaps... We talk about relationships of convenience. Maybe we could have separations and divorces of convenience in that regard. Wouldn't that be a logical situation where we would want to have that information?

Ms. Joan Atkinson: Well, anything is possible in the immigration business, as we know, but if you are legally separated or divorced, then that person is no longer of any concern to the immigration department because that is no longer a legal relationship. It is no longer a standing relationship. Therefore, we believe we have no right—or no need is perhaps the best way to put it—to examine that individual, because if you are legally separated or divorced, that person's not coming to Canada with you.

The Chair: John, you too are very crafty in getting to an area that... I think you asked a fundamental question, so I'm sure we'll get into it as we probe this particular aspect even further, but not right now. I want to move on to self-employed persons.

Mr. John Herron: I've taken very little time.

The Chair: Thank you, John. I know. But that's because usually when you do, you make an absolutely fantastic intervention. I'll give you a short supplemental.

Mr. John Herron: Do we check now through Interpol, or any of the like, whether the spouse's name or the person's name for investors or entrepreneurs might be associated with organized crime? Is that the process now?

The Chair: You know, Joan, I think that whole issue is going to be discussed—believe it or not—in the security, criminality, admissibility section—

Mr. John Herron: I'll take a yes or no.

The Chair: —which is Thursday. Yes, I'm sure.

Ms. Joan Atkinson: Yes.

The Chair: Okay, you see, John—

Ms. Joan Atkinson: Any adult member of the family, including spouse or partner or dependent child, is checked.

Mr. John Herron: Through Interpol.

Ms. Joan Atkinson: Well, they're checked against our databases. They go through the security screening system.

Mr. John Herron: Thank you.

Thank you, Mr. Chair. I appreciate it very much.

The Chair: We've got one page left, in fact. Then we're going to hold the refugee part to Thursday.

Ms. Joan Atkinson: Okay.

The Chair: Because I'm sure that that piece is also very important. So far, we've done very well. We've asked all the right questions and I was going to say we received all the right answers, but I'll leave that editorial comment for after, as we debate this.

Okay, self-employed persons.

Ms. Joan Atkinson: Self-employed persons is the third category of business immigrant, if you will. I should just say that this is not a legal text. In terms of whether we're using the words “foreign national” or “business immigrant”, we are trying to explain our policy intent in plain language. It's not a legal text that would necessarily have all the legal terminology, just as an aside on that one.

The Chair: Are you going to scare us by saying that in the end the regulations are going to be in legalese that nobody will understand and lawyers will make money out of?

Ms. Joan Atkinson: Well, it's certainly not our intention—

The Chair: It's going to be in plain language, that's what you're—

Ms. Joan Atkinson: That's right.

The Chair: Okay.

Ms. Joan Atkinson: We're going to try to make the regulations in plain language—

The Chair: Very good, thank you.

October 1, 2001 [Standing Senate Committee on Social Affairs, Science and Technology] [Entire Exchange]

Mr. William Lenton, Assistant Commissioner, Royal Canadian Mounted Police: Honourable senators, thank you for the opportunity to speak to this issue this afternoon. I would like to introduce Superintendent Ray Lang who is the officer in charge of the immigration program within the RCMP. He will be able to answer your more technical questions.

I would like to make it clear at the outset that the RCMP is responsible for the criminal enforcement aspect of issues emanating from Citizenship and Immigration Canada and we enjoy a very good working relationship with the department.

According to the United Nations, there are between 20 million and 40 million undocumented immigrants throughout the world at present. It is also clear that North America is the destination of choice for these people. The degree of sophistication of technology these days makes it very difficult for us in law enforcement to establish the authenticity of the people who are coming to Canada. This is exacerbated by the fact that many of the jurisdictions from which these people come are either war torn or do not have the types of systems of records that we have come to expect here in Canada.

The significant impact of this on Canadian society is not to be ignored. There is a significant cost involved in processing the people who come to Canada, in integrating them, in removing those who are not permitted to stay, and in conducting investigations and prosecuting where necessary.

We have recently seen a significant increase in involvement of the criminal element in smuggling and trafficking in humans. We are increasingly concerned about the possibility of injury to or death of the migrants themselves, who some may characterize as being victimized by the process. We are also concerned about the level of physical and sexual assaults, the imposition of long-term labour, extortion and the sorts of thing that are practised by the groups that bring in these people.

Trafficking in women and children is a particular concern. The United Nations' office for drug control and organized crime declared that traffickers of people make an annual profit of some $7 billion a year from prostitution alone. This is part of a larger industry that is estimated at approximately $30 billion with respect to immigration violations.

Our mandate within the RCMP with respect to immigration matters is threefold. Our program works in concert with domestic and foreign agencies at all levels, as well as the community at large, to protect and enhance the quality of life through education, prevention and enforcement.

We have three national priorities. They are, first, combating and disrupting criminal organizations involved in facilitating illegal entry of migrants into Canada; second, investigating unscrupulous professional immigration facilitators who aid and abet the illegal entry of migrants into Canada and, third, timely acquisition and sharing of information and intelligence pertaining to the enhancement of the national program strategy that I have set out.

We believe that the proposed legislation will reinforce our ability to fight the organized crime portion of the migration problem as it links to terrorism, which is underscored by the recent events.

The elements of particular interest to us include the introduction of tougher penalties for criminal organizations convicted of facilitating the entry of migrants into Canada. The bill includes a definition of a criminal organization that is similar to that in the Criminal Code but is somewhat broader, which can help us in the unique context of immigration files. The bill establishes new offences with respect to the misuse of travel documentation. Of great importance is the introduction of the application of proceeds of crime to immigration-type offences.

We are always happy to receive new tools to fight organized crime more effectively. We look forward to the passage of this legislation which we feel will enable us to work better with CIC and other federal enforcement partners in the fight against immigration problems.

The key point we recognize is the degree of cooperation that is needed in combating this global and domestic crime.

In conclusion, we support the intent of the new legislation. We anticipate that new tools will be made available to enhance our ability to ensure the safety of Canadians and the integrity of our immigration system.

October 2, 2001 [Standing Senate Committee on Social Affairs, Science and Technology] [Entire Exchange]

Senator Beaudoin: You say that since September 11, we have all been concerned with security. Of course, that is universal. However, if I am not mistaken, you say that this bill, as drafted, does not respond to our concerns in practice. Having regard to our values, our democratic and legal systems, does this bill respond to our concerns in the present situation?

Mr. Maynard: It does not answer everything, but it answers as much as an immigration bill can. There will be other legislation to address other aspects of the terrorism and security questions. There is the money-laundering legislation and the membership of a terrorist organization legislation. UN charters have been signed. Criminal law is to be written. We will have other laws that are not part of the Immigration Act but which address those issues. The Immigration Act is not the right forum for addressing those issues. The Immigration Act says that people who are security threats, who are members of terrorist organizations, are not admissible to Canada, and if they are in Canada, they are removable. They can be detained and put through a process to confirm that they are terrorists and, having been confirmed, they shall be deported.

That is what the act says now, and that is what Bill C-11 will say as well. There are some differences between Bill C-11 and the current act that have to with back-end processes, with the nature of the hearing process that is undertaken to determine whether a person is a terrorist. There are some changes there, but as far as front-end changes dealing with the ability to stop people at the port of entry, the ability to detain people, the ability to commence processes to determine whether they should be admissible are concerned, it is pretty much the same. I cannot see how it could be written differently to provide more protection. The bill says that we do not want terrorists in Canada. I suppose we could add the word "really" and say that we really do not want terrorists in Canada.

The Chairman: That idea sort of appeals to me.

I have a question about the transitional provisions. Transitional provisions in Canada on a whole range of public policy areas have always been such that if you are in a pipeline, you stay in the pipeline and the new provisions only apply to new entrants to the process. You say the transitional provisions have the potential to work unfairly. Is it possible to draft regulations vis-à-vis the transitional issues that would deal with your concerns?

October 3, 2001 [Standing Senate Committee on Social Affairs, Science and Technology] [Entire Exchange]

Mr. Manion: I cannot believe that somebody has not done some work on this.

My concern is not so much about the size of the immigration movement but the content of the immigration movement. My concern is that judgments about these things should be made by the Government of Canada, not by crooks, by terrorist organizations, by unscrupulous lawyers and unscrupulous immigration consultants. That is not to say that all of them are these things. Those who are insulted by these remarks probably fall within those categories.

Immigration has been very important to Canada. However, at its peak, immigration has been run by ministers who know what they are doing, with the support of cabinet. The key decisions have been made by ministers, not by officials and not by interest groups. I will stop there.

Senator Di Nino: Do you feel that we could improve Bill C-11 to deal with the kinds of concerns that you just expressed?

Mr. Manion: My own view is that it should be scrapped and started again from scratch.

Senator LeBreton: After that comment, perhaps my question is irrelevant. A phrase that I have written down which has been mentioned by almost all of the witnesses in our deliberations on this bill is "lack of integration." There seems to be a great many silos. However, that is just a comment.

I am interested in your views on the immigrant investment program, in view of trafficking and laundering. Do you feel that there are enough safeguards in the immigrant investment program, or is that area also prone to tremendous abuse?

Mr. Manion: I think that the refugee process has become so mammoth that it is soaking up virtually all the available resources in the immigration portfolio. Governments in Canada are now spending something in the order of $4 billion per year on immigration and refugee matters. Most of that is spent unproductively. There is not enough money for enforcement. There is not enough money for visa control overseas. There is not enough money for proper coordination. There is not enough money to supervise some of these programs. They are started and then run automatically over the telephone and by paper. That is no way to run an immigration program. I am horrified by what I see and what I hear every day from friends who have connections in the immigration service.

The morale in the immigration service is dreadful and deplorable. The service believes that it is running a very badly conceived and badly led program, that nobody understands its problems and that it is not resourced to deal with its problems.

Senator LeBreton: Are there any other comments on the Immigrant Investor Program? When you consider the amounts of money that were obviously behind the event on September 11, do you think there are enough safeguards surrounding the immigrant investment program? We bring people into the country simply because they will commit to spending certain amounts of money, setting up businesses in Canada and hiring certain numbers of people. Do you have any knowledge of abuse of this program?

Mr. Collacott: I would like to speak briefly to that. There have been major problems with that program. It was suggested 10 years ago in major reports that we may not even need the program because investment is supposed to go into risk capital and there is enough risk capital in Canada. It has been very popular for immigration consultants. There is a chapter on that subject in the book by Charles Campbell entitled Citizenship Fire Sale. Basically, you can immigrate to Canada without meeting normal immigrant requirements through this program. The average person coming in has relatively little education and cannot speak English or French. It is tremendously popular in certain circles. It has been complicated to some extent because of special provisions for Quebec. However, long ago it was suggested that it was not really required in terms of Canadian needs.

Mr. Bissett: It is a program that is vulnerable to a lot of abuse. We know that has happened in the past. I am inclined to agree with Mr. Collacott that we really do not need it. If immigrants with a lot of money want to come to Canada and to invest their money here, they are free to come. They do not need to come through this program. The program can and has been used by the Russian mafia, by the Chinese triads and others to buy their way into Canada.

Mr. Bauer: I would agree with what has been said. It is a shadowy area, as you know and is hard to pin down. Even when people are prosecuted, as they are about once ever three years, not too many facts are revealed. I agree with the others that it is an unnecessary program. The chaps who were involved on September 11 had lots of money available to them. This is a wonderful way to plant sleepers in a society to await the time that you push a button, which may be five years from now. It avoids difficulties with security or anything else.

Senator Keon: One of the witnesses yesterday suggested that, fundamentally, the structural framework under which Bill C-11 was written was fundamentally flawed, that what was needed was legislation that would integrate the resources that are currently with the Department of Immigration with resources that can be used to ferret out criminal activity, et cetera. In that way the legislation could provide the Department of Immigration with the resources to deal intelligently with all these people who are now overwhelming the system.

You gentlemen are obviously extremely knowledgeable. One of you suggested that the bill should be scrapped and that we start over. Another of you said that it is totally inadequate and that we should send it back.

I would like to ask all four of you what you think should be done with the legislation. If it is replaced, what kind of legislation should replace it?

Mr. Collacott: Is that an invitation for us to rewrite the legislation? After all, senator, we are all retired.

Senator Keon: I would like to hear from you about the fundamental structural framework within which perfect legislation could be written.

Mr. Bauer: Mr. Chairman, I do not think it is necessary. When we say throw the bill out and start over again, we do not mean throw everything out. There are parts of the bill that are fine. They reflect the previous act, which is working perfectly well. Last year this bill went around on the flying circus from city to city and all the interest groups complained about it. If you examine the softening that took place after that, one more tour and there will be no bill at all and everybody will just come in without having to go through any procedure.

You cannot change everything, but you can tighten up the front end so there is a more obvious obligation to consult with security people, et cetera, more time to do it and provide something to keep people from operating freely in our society while the more dubious ones are being checked.

Frankly, the most important change I would make would be to implement a professional civil service type of commission or organization for choosing members of the Immigration and Refugee Board as the current members retire.

In addition, I would avoid single member panels. The problem at the heart of this refugee issue is that the problem of numbers is constantly running into the problem of efficiency. When Mr. Showler was here the other day, he said, "We will streamline it and move more cases. We will do that by having single member boards." That means more decisions will be positive. There will be more positive decisions because reasons for the courts do not have to be written for positive decisions.

Another thing that should be forbidden completely to the board is the holding of accelerated hearings when there is not a full hearing. They do this for all sorts of groups, especially when the group is large. These are the ones where there are dangers. Yet these people simply come in with their lawyer and a refugee control officer and have a little chat - it is all from a little piece of paper. I have seen the same paper, the same story turn up in the morning and the afternoon for two different claimants. It is routine. Lawyers recycle these things. They have their clerks do them. These people never see a member of the board. They never have to answer questions in a formal hearing. I would say that about 25 per cent to 30 per cent of these are Sri Lankans, Somalis, Mexicans and Argentineans who come in by the hundreds.

This gives nobody any knowledge of anything. Questioning is important to determine the credibility of a claimant. Questioning requires intelligence, skill and time. Those involved do not wish to spend time on questioning. You must resolve the conflict between volume and shortage of time. That means more resources and more members with lower salaries. They do not have to be paid $90,000.

October 22, 2001 [Standing Senate Committee on Social Affairs, Science, and Technology] [Entire Exchange]

Carole Brosseau, Lawyer, Research and Legislation Division, Barreau du Québec: Thank you for this opportunity to appear before the Committee to present our views on Bill C-11. I want to apologize for some of our experts and members of our Bar committee who would have liked to be here today but were unable to make themselves available due to the short notice.

First of all, Bill C-11 has undergone a number of changes, but the clarifications introduced in this Bill are both significant and meaningful. As early as 1998, the Barreau du Québec took a favourable position with respect to rules that differentiate between immigration and refugee issues. Therefore, we are happy with the way Bill C-11 is currently drafted.

However, in clause 5 and throughout Bill C-11, we have noted the very broad regulatory power conferred by this legislation, and because of a built-in flexibility, it is clear that this is quite an extensive regulatory power. Regulations create rights. The Standing Committee on Justice proposed an amendment with respect to the laying before both Houses of Parliament of certain regulations. That amendment is now part of the Bill you are considering. Although we believe it is a step in the right direction, it is not enough.

For example, regulatory powers under the Proceeds of Crime Act that passed a year ago provided for pre-publication of regulations 60 days in advance so that interested parties, such as the Barreau du Québec or others, could make their views known on the content of the regulations and their impact on either the legislation itself or money laundering.

Although this Bill provides for the tabling of regulations, there is no pre-publication period set out to allow people an opportunity to make criticisms or suggest improvements - because criticism can be constructive - to the content of the regulations. We believe there is a need to go a little further and allow for comment and careful review of any proposed regulations to be passed in support of this Bill.

My second point relates to the powers of immigration officers, as set out in the legislation. As you are aware, clause 138 provides that immigration officers have the authority and powers of a peace officer. About a year and a half ago in Quebec, given that the powers of peace officers were being broadened on a regular basis, it was decided to introduce a code of ethics for police officers. For the same reasons, the Barreau du Québec favours including a code of ethics in regulations respecting the conduct of immigration officers. This is particularly necessary because at the present time, when someone tries to bring a complaint against an immigration officer for abuse of authority or similar reasons, the response given, to prevent an investigation from going ahead, is that this is strictly an industrial relations matter. The fact is, however, that this extends well beyond the limits of labour law. The powers of search, arrest and detention that immigration officers can now exercise must be framed in a code of ethics that would apply strictly to them. The resulting transparency would be beneficial both to the government, Canadian citizens and others who may want to avail themselves of the provisions of Bill C-11.

As regards the inadmissibility provisions under clause 30, they are problematic particularly as regards the tests set out in the Bill. It talks about reasonable grounds to believe. That test is really quite inadequate. We can come back to that later. A parallel can be drawn with Bill C-36 that was introduced after Bill C-11, but it is certainly a very poor test to apply.

With respect to misrepresentations, clause 40 in particular talks about withholding material facts or being reluctant to answer questions. When a person enters Canadian soil, he or she is not necessarily entitled to seek counsel at the time of arrival. Demonstrating such reluctance could have very serious consequences. The individual runs the risk of being removed and losing his or her status. Other than the exceptions, the consequences are quite far-reaching.

In order to counter that, it is absolutely essential that an individual entering Canada be properly informed of his rights, that he be entitled to seek legal counsel and have access to very specific information about child-care services, for example, or legal aid available in the region corresponding to the individual's point of entry into Canada. It is the whole question of confidentiality when the Federal Court or a judge has jurisdiction to determine whether certain information will or will not be passed on to the individual. Here, again, we would draw a parallel to C-36 in a number of respects. We believe it is important - and this is not particularly clear when you read the provisions dealing with confidentiality of information - to ensure that a judge has the right to review the entire file and that he is able to provide a summary of the information as soon as possible to the individual concerned, to allow him or her to make full answer and defence.

There is always a conflict between national security and the right to make full answer and defence. It is really a matter of balancing out the disadvantages. That is exactly what we are currently experiencing. It is very important - and we are indeed in favour of the judicial review approach under the circumstances - that the judge have a proper right of review.

I would also like to make some comments with respect to the ID card proposed for permanent residents. I have no objection to this. Ms Caplan announced several days ago that this card will replace the landing record. I must admit the card will be much more convenient. This is a valuable approach. However, where the card might not work so well - because we don't have all the details at this point - is with respect to the information it will contain. We are talking here about summary identification - in other words, the person's name, address and date of birth.

It is not possible, with such minimal information, to determine the person's profile.

I will now turn it over to Mr. Gervais.

Mr. Gervais: I would like to conclude by addressing a point that we believe is of the utmost importance. The Barreau du Québec, through a variety of representations made both to the federal government and provincial legislators, has always questioned the composition of organizations - be they of a judicial, quasi-judicial or administrative nature - whose role it is to make decisions about important matters. Our questions in this regard pertain mainly to the independence and impartiality of the members of such organizations. In a decision relating to immigration matters handed by the Supreme Court on October 18, 2001, in the Law Society of British Columbia v. Mangat case, the Court talks about the principles of independence and impartiality, reminding us of the importance of security of tenure, financial security and institutional independence for members of such organizations.

Some questions do spring to mind when reviewing the provisions of clause 153 of the Bill. I understand that this clause provides for people to hold office for a term of seven years, but there is nothing there with respect to reappointments or the appointment process per se. The clause simply states that members are appointed by the Governor in Council, without there being any specific kind of skills required, no external committee formed, no consultation of any kind and without considering standards that have always been enforced by the courts and the Supreme Court of Canada. The clause simply says that appointees are subject to removal; no process is in place or even described in the legislation whereby a commissioner who became subject to a removal order would at least be in a position to argue his case.

The system being proposed here is unusual, in that there seems to be a desire to let the Board deal with everything internally. First of all, there seems to be a desire to set aside judicial tribunals. This can be seen in powers granted the Immigration and Refugee Board, both at the trial and appeal levels, as compared to the limited powers available in cases of judicial vocation.

We are also struck by the fact that there seems to be an attempt to considerably diminish the role of legal experts within the Board. Let me explain what I mean. Clause 162 states that each division of the Board has exclusive jurisdiction to hear and determine all questions of law and fact, including questions of jurisdiction. Such questions will be decided by a single commissioner. However, when you look at the specific qualifications for the position of commissioner, you quickly see that the composition of the Board is such that few people having any legal training are required. I realize that other types of expertise may be needed and that questions of law are not the only ones to be decided, but important issues can arise and it is important to know that there is a desire to have such issues examined before a court of law.

Clause 167 also provides that a person can be represented by a barrister, solicitor or other counsel, or that someone can be designated for that purpose. But exactly what type of person would be designated? Once again, I come back to the Supreme Court ruling of October 18, 2001 in the Law Society of British Columbia v. Mangat case, when again, the Supreme Court recognized that in our society, we have barristers or solicitors that act as legal counsel because they are members of the Bar. As members of the Bar, society can expect such individuals to perform their work according to certain standards of discipline and be subject to mechanisms relating to professional responsibility, liability insurance guarantees and guarantees pertaining to the behaviour of individuals who may represent other persons. There is now recognition of the option of having other people represent lawyers.

The fundamental point here for me, as both a lawyer and Crown attorney, is that I can provide guarantees. I have no objection to other persons representing people who are the subject of court proceedings. That is what the legislation already provides, and the Supreme Court makes mention of that fact. But what guarantees will such individuals have to provide? In other words, any person off the street - and I am not saying they are all like that - could pass himself off as a legal practitioner without having any specific legal skills or training, without being able to provide guarantees of any kind, without having insurance and without being subject to professional inspection. We have seen similar situations where we were required to intervene because people were engaged in the illegal practice of law before certain administrative tribunals. Once again, we are opening up administrative tribunals to charlatans while, at the same time, taking away the possibility of going before a court of law.

I find it surprising that clause 174 states that the Immigration Appeal Division is a court of record. About a month ago, the Quebec Court of Appeal was asked to rule on the constitutionality of an administrative tribunal in Quebec. It determined that the administrative tribunal was indeed an administrative tribunal, rather than a judicial tribunal, because it did not have the powers of a court of record. The first thing I read in clause 174, however, is that we are now creating an administrative body having powers that bear a striking resemblance to those currently exercised by judicial tribunals, or what are called courts of record. The Appeal Division is thus being made into a semi- or quasi-judicial court of record at the same time as decision-makers with a background in law are being cast aside and the opportunity of bringing an issue before the Federal Court is being removed. Clause 71 provides the right to proceed with an application for judicial review but according to paragraph 2(d) of clause 72, that application can be disposed of without personal appearance or representation based on nothing more than a review of the file.

I believe the wording of these provisions must be re-examined, and insofar as there is a desire to move quickly on this, I believe it would be possible to do so. There are rules in place, but there is also a need to protect the rights and privileges of people who come before commissioners or officers.

Clause 167 refers to the fact that someone can be represented before the commission, but to my knowledge, other provisions in the legislation are such that representations can be made to officers or to the minister. There is no provision stating that such individuals can be represented by a barrister or other counsel. I see that as a weakness, if we want the legislation to be truly administrative in nature.

Also, we know that through regulation, we will be tempted to consider and accept people that come to Canada to enter professional practice. One has only to read the Supreme Court's ruling in Law Society of British Columbia v. Mangat to see that appointments and criteria with respect to professional practice are a provincial responsibility under sub-section 92(8) of the Constitution.

We realize that this is not within the purview of the Committee, but we have always had strong feelings about it - which brings me back to my initial comment. In each of the provinces, systems are in place relating to disciplinary rules, means of verification, inspection, and criteria that set a high standard to be met by people allowed to enter into practice. Why? To represent other people. Once again, we would refer back to what the Supreme Court said in its 1989 ruling in Andrews v. Law Society of British Columbia. In the absence of an independent legal profession, and I quote:

[...] having the necessary experience and skills required to perform its specific duties in relation to the administration of justice and the legal process, the entire legal system would find itself in a precarious position.

That is what the Supreme Court has said. So, please, don't allow people with legal training to be shunted aside. We have been trained to represent people on the basis not only of facts, but of questions of law that go to the heart of our training and our accreditation as professionals.

The position taken by the Barreau du Québec is one of balance. We understand there are prerogatives the minister may wish to exercise; we have no major objection to that, but to ensure the appropriate balance, we have to preserve the rights of the affected parties, of the people that could benefit from the process and of the various actors who may be called upon to play a role in this context.

Senator Beaudoin: I would like to begin by thanking the representatives of the Barreau du Québec for being with us today. Welcome. We are always pleased to hear from you, particularly on bills such as C-11, C-7 and C-36. It's always nice to hear a different perspective, particularly when it's based on legal principles.

Ms Brosseau, I very much liked what you said about the fact that we have too much of a tendency to rely on delegated legislation. That is not only the case in Ottawa. The same applies to Quebec City, Toronto, Halifax, Vancouver - indeed, all the major cities of Canada. I think this is a practice that is subject to tremendous abuse. Particularly in difficult bills such as Bill C-11. We see the same thing in Bill C-7. As for Bill C-36, we may escape that to a certain extent because there is less delegation involved, given that it deals primarily with the criminal law.

Do you have any suggestions as to a possible cure for that increasing tendency to rely on delegated legislation? Of course, we can't avoid it. Parliament cannot do everything. The Governor in Council has a very important role to play, but I am wondering whether we, as parliamentarians, are doing everything we can to eliminate the kind of abuse of this practice that we are seeing throughout Western countries at this time.

Ms Brosseau: The real problem is legislating via regulation. That weakens our democracy. That is the reason why we have always criticized the practice of using regulations to legislate. Even though we trust our elected representatives, engaging in democratic debate about how we think things should work can only improve or strengthen our legislative and legal systems.

For one thing, there is more and more legislation. It seems to me the number of new bills and the pace at which they are passed into law are such that we have no choice but to get around the system by relying on the use of regulations. Previously, much more time was taken to prepare legislation. Now, things move very quickly, either because of events or the need to react quickly, or because of the current pace of the legislative process.

You asked me whether I think there is any way of avoiding a situation where regulations would be too prominent and have a negative impact on legislation. I think we need to consider reviewing our Regulations Act, particularly the federal act, to always require pre-publication of any proposed regulations. We have criticized that weakness in many pieces of legislation. As I was saying earlier with respect to the Proceeds of Crime Act, provision was made in that case, but it was an exception. It came about as a result of tremendous pressure, particularly because of the impact of that legislation on professional bodies. Thus provision was made for pre-publication, consultations, and so on. I think that would be a way of countering this new wave or reinstating democratic control over the legislation itself.

In this way, the law could not be completely distorted in favour of regulations that would not be subject to the same controls as the law itself. That may be a possible solution. I would certainly suggest trying it. That's why we pointed out earlier that clause 5 does not go far enough, despite the amendments made to the Bill by the Standing Committee on Justice and Human Rights. As you can see, it is always useful to hold consultations when bills are being examined. They often result in better legislation. That would be one way of accomplishing such an objective.

An Act To Amend The Criminal Code (Organized Crime And Law Enforcement) And To Make Consequential Amendments To Other Acts (Bill C-24)

Citation 2001, c. 32, ss. 12 and 81

Royal Assent December 18, 2001

Hansard

April 23, 2001 [House of Commons]

Hon. Anne McLellan (Minister of Justice and Attorney General of Canada, Lib.) moved that Bill C-24, an act to amend the Criminal Code (organized crime and law enforcement) and to make consequential amendments to other acts, be read the second time and referred to a committee.

She said: Mr. Speaker, I am pleased today to lead off the debate on an issue of major concern to all Canadians: the problem of organized crime and the legislative tools available to our police, prosecutors and courts to address that problem.

[Translation]

In the Speech from the Throne, our government promised to take aggressive steps to combat organized crime, including the creation of stronger anti-gang laws.

[English]

Building upon the foundation that the government put in place over the past several years, including the 1997 anti-gang amendments to the criminal code, the proposed legislation would enable law enforcement to respond to the threat of organized crime in the country.

Bill C-24, an act to amend the criminal code regarding organized crime and law enforcement, responds to our commitment to law enforcement officials and to my provincial counterparts to provide additional legislative tools to assist them in the fight against the many manifestations of organized crime. The legislative measures set out in Bill C-24 seek to assist Canadian law enforcement officials in the fight against organized crime.

These proposals fall into four categories: first, measures to improve the protection of people who play a role in the justice system from intimidation; second, the creation of an accountable process to protect law enforcement officers from criminal liability for certain otherwise illegal acts committed in the course of an investigation; third, legislation to broaden the powers of law enforcement to forfeit the proceeds of crime, and in particular the profits of criminal organizations, and to seize property that was used in a crime; and, fourth, the creation of a number of new offences targeting involvement with criminal organizations.

I would like to take a few moments to acknowledge the valuable contributions made to its development by my provincial colleagues and their officials. It has been a truly collaborative effort characterized by mutual respect, patience and a commitment to the development of a broad based response to the threats of organized crime.

These efforts resulted in the adoption last September of the national agenda to combat organized crime. In Iqaluit, the solicitor general and I agreed with our provincial and territorial colleagues on an action plan. That plan has several key elements, but expanded and strengthened legislative tools were at the forefront of this national response.

We recognize that tougher and more effective laws are not the full answer to the problem of organized crime. The enforcement program that we announced when the bill was introduced demonstrates our commitment to attacking the problem on all fronts.

The first aspect of Bill C-24 involves a range of steps to deal with the intimidation of persons involved in the criminal justice system. There are those who ask why is it necessary to amend the law to deal with the intimidation of persons involved in the criminal justice system. They point to a number of provisions in the criminal code that might be employed to address this issue. The simple answer is that the existing law needs to be strengthened.

The criminal justice system depends for its proper functioning upon the participation of various members of our community. There are the professionals responsible for the investigation and prosecution of crime, the judges and those who deal with convicted offenders, and members of the public who participate as witnesses and jurors.

[Translation]

For all stakeholders to be able to participate effectively, they and those with whom they are associated must be free to act without being subjected to threats, prejudice, intimidation or physical injury.

[English]

In recent times prosecutors, judges, witnesses, police and prison guards, as well as their families, have been subjected to intimidation intended to destabilize the criminal justice system. The purpose of intimidation is to interfere with the ability to hold trials in an environment conducive to proper deliberations where participants in the system feel free to play the role expected of them.

Whether acts of intimidation are subtle or explicit they are of particular concern with regard to the prosecution of organized crime. Concern about organized crime was shared by members of parliament. Last year the subcommittee on organized crime was struck to examine a myriad of issues related to organized crime. It brought forward recommendations which included two specific criminal code amendments intended to address concerns over intimidation.

I am pleased to note that Bill C-24 implements both those recommendations. One of those recommendations called for the enactment of measures beyond those now in place to more fully protect jurors serving in trials related to organized crime.

Accordingly the government proposes changes to the jury selection process set out in the criminal code to allow a judge to order that the names and addresses of prospective jurors not be read out in open court. A judge would be empowered in appropriate cases to ban the publication of any information that could disclose the identity of a juror.

Additionally Bill C-24 not only increases the penalty associated with the existing offence of intimidation to five years imprisonment. It introduces a new offence punishable by up to 14 years imprisonment to deal with acts of intimidation that target justice system participants intended to impede the administration of criminal justice.

A new section of the criminal code would make it an offence to engage in acts of violence against a justice system participant or a family member of that participant. It would be an offence to harass, stalk or threaten these people with the intention of either provoking a state of fear in a group of persons or the general public in order to impede the administration of justice or a justice system participant in the performance of his or her duties.

I turn my attention now to the aspect of Bill C-24 that seeks to protect law enforcement officers from criminal liability when for legitimate law enforcement purposes they commit acts that would otherwise be illegal.

The Supreme Court of Canada in its unanimous 1999 judgment in Regina v Campbell and Shirose stated that the police was not immune from criminal liability for criminal activities committed in the course of a bona fide criminal investigation. However, while observing that "everybody is subject to the ordinary law of the land", the supreme court explicitly recognized that "if some form of public interest immunity is to be extended to the police..., it should be left to parliament to delineate the nature and scope of the immunity and the circumstances in which it is available". Through Bill C-24 the government takes up the challenge offered to it by the Supreme Court of Canada and properly assumes its responsibility to provide guidance.

After issuing a consultation paper last year and engaging in much consultation the government has put the proposals before the House. The proposed scheme contemplates several means of ensuring accountability. These involve a combination of new legislative measures contained in Bill C-24, police training, as well as reliance on existing judicial and disciplinary means to ensure compliance with rules governing their use of powers given under the law.

The legislation does not propose the granting of blanket immunity to all law enforcement officers for unlawful acts committed in the course of carrying out lawful law enforcement responsibilities. However, the legislation does provide a form of very limited immunity. Colleagues need to understand that for many years law enforcement authorities were working on the basis that they had common law immunity. All the supreme court did was make it plain that there was not common law immunity but called upon parliament to put in place a legislative scheme if it saw fit.

Here is how the scheme would work. When a public officer is engaged in the enforcement of any act of the Parliament of Canada, doing that which would otherwise constitute an offence may be permissible if the following elements exist.

First, before the person can act he or she must be designated a competent authority. The individual must also believe on reasonable grounds that committing the act or failing to act is the reasonable course of action and proportional in the circumstances and including whether there is any other available means of carrying out their duty.

Nothing in the proposed scheme would provide immunity for the intentional or criminally negligent causing of death or bodily harm; the wilful attempt to obstruct, pervert or defeat the course of justice; or conduct that would violate the sexual integrity of an individual.

Another feature of the legislative package before us today is a new approach to addressing participation in the activities of criminal organizations. The bill contains a new definition of criminal organization and three new offences that effectively criminalize the full range of involvement with organized crime.

At its core, the danger of organized crime flows from the enhanced threat posed to society when people combine for the commission of serious crimes. Historically criminal law has responded to this elevated harm by punishing individuals for engaging in conspiracy and for aiding or abetting the commission of specific offences.

In 1997 in Bill C-95 parliament went further and directly targeted organizations of such individuals for the very first time by providing a definition of criminal organization, increased investigative powers and increased penalties for those committing crimes in conjunction with criminal organizations.

Law enforcement officials and provincial attorneys general have called for a simplified definition of criminal organization and for offences that respond to all harmful forms of involvement in criminal organizations. That is precisely what we have done in the legislation before the House today.

The current definition only covers criminal organizations that have at least five members, at least two of whom have committed serious offences within the preceding five years. As well, the organizations themselves must be shown to have been committing crimes punishable by a maximum sentence of five years or more in prison.

Canada is a signatory to the United Nations convention against organized crime which affirms that a group of three persons having the aim of committing serious crimes constitutes a sufficient threat to society to warrant special scrutiny from the criminal justice system.

I believe that Canadians want our law enforcement officials to be able to target criminal groups of three or more individuals, one of whose main purposes or activities is either committing serious crimes or making it easier for others to commit serious crimes.

In conjunction with a more streamlined definition, the full range of involvement with criminal organizations is targeted in Bill C-24 by three new offences.

The first offence targets participation in or contribution to the activities of criminal organizations. Taking part in the activities of a criminal organization, even if such participation does not itself constitute an offence, will now be a crime where such actions are done for the purpose of enhancing the ability of the criminal organization to facilitate or commit indictable offences.

The bill also addresses the concern expressed by law enforcement officials and provincial attorneys general that the current requirement of proving beyond reasonable doubt that the accused was a party to a specific crime shields from prosecution those in the upper echelons of criminal organizations who isolate themselves from its day to day activities.

We know that successful recruitment enhances the threat posed to society by criminal organizations. It allows them to grow and to more effectively achieve their harmful criminal objectives. Those who act as recruiters for criminal organizations contribute to these ends both when they recruit for specific crimes and when they recruit simply to expand the organization's human capital.

Thus the expressed provisions of the proposed participation offence make it clear that the crown does not in making its case need to link the impugned participation, in this case recruitment, to any particular offence.

Some have called for mere membership in a criminal organization to be an offence. In my view such a proposal would be extremely difficult to apply and would be vulnerable to charter challenges.

The second new offence retains the core of section 467.1 of the criminal code which is the criminal organization offence introduced in Bill C-95. The new offence targets those who aid, abet, counsel or commit any indictable offence in conjunction with a criminal organization.

Unlike the existing provision, it would not require the crown to prove both that the accused has participated in or substantially contributed to the activities of a criminal organization and that he or she has been a party to the commission of an indictable offence punishable by five or more years of imprisonment. The participation-contribution requirement has been removed entirely and the range of offences targeted has been broadened to include all indictable offences.

The third new offence deals specifically with leaders in criminal organizations. Like the participation offence, it does so not by criminalizing status but by proscribing the harmful behaviour itself.

Leaders of criminal organizations pose a unique threat to society. Operationally they threaten us through their enhanced experience and skills. Motivationally they threaten us through their constant encouragement of potential and existing criminal organization members. Accordingly in the bill we have moved aggressively to identify, target and punish those within criminal organizations, whether or not formally designated as leaders, who knowingly instruct others to commit any offence, indictable or otherwise, under any act of parliament for the benefit of, at the direction of, or in association with a criminal organization.

The penalty provisions for the three offences I have outlined confirm the government's resolve to provide a proportionate and graduated means of addressing all forms of involvement with criminal organizations and to ultimately break the back of organized crime in Canada. The participation offence I previously described is punishable by a maximum of five years of imprisonment, the party liability offence by a maximum of 14 years of imprisonment, and the leadership related offence is punishable by a maximum of life imprisonment.

Furthermore each of these punishments has been fortified by an appropriately aggressive sentencing regime. Its two critical components are mandatory imposition of consecutive sentences for the offences and a presumptive parole ineligibility period of one-half the imposed sentence. When these measures are combined with our newly expanded and improved criminal forfeiture scheme our message to organized crime is clear: crime does not, will not and must not pay in Canada, and we will take all necessary measures to ensure the continued safety of our homes, streets and communities.

Not all provisions of the bill specifically target organized crime groups. Several elements in the proposed legislation are meant to improve criminal law generally. These improvements to the law will nonetheless be extremely useful in combating organized crime.

The offences initially listed as enterprise crimes were those considered most likely to be committed by organized crime groups. Over the years, as organized crime evolved and moved into new areas of criminal activity, new offences were added to the list of enterprise crimes. Today the list of such crimes stands at over 40 with no indication that we will stop adding new offences to the list.

At the same time, by limiting the proceeds of crime provisions to certain listed offences, we have created two types of criminal: the criminal whose proceeds are subject to the proceeds of crime provisions of the code and whose illicit profits can be ordered forfeited by the courts, and the criminal whose profits fall outside the reach of the proceeds provisions of the code.

Furthermore, there is a proposal to eliminate the enterprise crime list approach and expand the application of the proceeds of crime provisions to designated offences, that is, to most indictable federal offences. In this manner the profits from the commission of most serious crimes would be subject to forfeiture. All existing protections, such as notice provisions, applications to revoke or vary orders, appeals and remedies, will of course continue to be available to the accused and to third parties.

Canada must be in a position to offer the necessary assistance to foreign countries that have successfully investigated and prosecuted members of organized crime groups and whose courts have ordered the confiscation of tainted property located in Canada. I would like to ensure that Canada is not singled out for its inability to provide the necessary assistance to help such jurisdictions obtain the confiscated property.

Accordingly, the bill proposes a number of amendments to the Mutual Legal Assistance in Criminal Matters Act that would allow Canada to enforce foreign confiscation orders. That is important. The provisions contained in the proposed legislation would allow Canada to respond on the basis of a treaty to requests from a foreign jurisdiction for assistance in enforcing a confiscation order issued by a court in that jurisdiction in relation to proceeds of crime derived from the commission of a criminal offence for which the accused was convicted. In anticipation of a confiscation request, Canada would also be able to provide assistance in respect of a request to seize or restrain the targeted proceeds located in Canada.

The proposed amendments would also facilitate requests from Canada regarding the enforcement of restraint or forfeiture orders for proceeds of crime located in foreign jurisdictions.

The last element that I want to stress deals with offence related property. The bill contains amendments to make the offence related property forfeiture regime in the code apply to all indictable offences. As well, the present exemption from forfeiture for most real property would be eliminated.

I believe the measures I have outlined today would ensure that we have the tools necessary to combat the increased threat of organized crime. Let there be no mistake that the proposals before us would provide more effective laws and aggressive prosecution strategies to target organized crime at all levels.

I thank colleagues for their support of this initiative. I look forward to their support because the initiative would ensure that our streets and communities are safe from a most pernicious element within our society, organized crime.

Mr. Michel Bellehumeur (Berthier—Montcalm, BQ)

….Then there is the whole issue of the seizure and forfeiture of the proceeds of crime. However, in this respect we believe the department could have introduced much more relevant and daring amendments. We believe the department did not go far enough in terms of the legislative tools it is giving the courts, the police and the penal system as a whole. There is still work to be done in this respect even though progress has been made.

We are so far behind and we have so few tools to successfully fight organized crime that any change, no matter how small, must be welcomed and applauded. But while we are at it with the help of experts to draft something that is defendable and enforceable and is what the people want, we might as well do it right. We really have to look at the whole issue.

There is one matter that scares several people, namely the amendments aimed at protecting the officers in charge of enforcing the anti-gang law. Now, a police officer investigating very specific crimes such as the trafficking of human beings, alcohol, tobacco or firearms smuggling, heinous crimes, international terrorism, crimes against the environment and everything related to drug offences, will at last be able to commit acts otherwise illegal were it not for that protection.

So that members can really understand what I am talking about, I will give an example. Criminal groups, be it biker gangs, the Italian network, Chinese triads or the Russian mafia, which is also present in Canada, are well organized. They have made it very difficult for the police to infiltrate them. Very often, in those biker gangs whose methods we are more familiar with, to determine if a new member going up every step in the organization is trustworthy and is one of them, the leader will ask him to commit certain illegal acts.

The bill says that an investigating officer could commit certain acts without fear of prosecution. This is not protection at large; murder, rape, acts of violence and so on are excluded. This is for very specific offences. For example, in a biker gang operating a large drug market, an undercover officer could be asked to sell drugs. That is an illegal act. Without protection, the police officer could be liable to prosecution for that. Yet he must do so to be accepted as a member of the biker gang, get to know more and possibly gather enough information to prosecute the guilty parties.

This is very much a societal issue. It is a complex matter and it could lead to abuse. We must be very careful in implementing the law. However, if we want to fight organized crime effectively, we must have such tools.

Some countries go much further than that, but we should begin by looking at their experience and see how this is done, see how things work and what the results will be over time. This is a step in the right direction, albeit a very small one in terms of both the offences and the people.

If memory serves, the Minister of Justice once tabled a white paper on the issue of granting immunity to any public official during the course of any investigation which is even more encompassing. At the time, my initial reaction was “They want a police state. This makes no sense. We must restrict that, we must establish a framework, we must set limits”.

Again, the minister seems to have listened. This is not a common occurrence, but we should mention it when she does so. Or else it is the department that listened to what I said, so that today such immunity is only granted to peace officers conducting investigations in very specific areas. It is very limited in scope. It is something.

Where I have questions and am anxious to hear what the Solicitor General of Canada and the Minister of Justice, who will certainly be appearing before the committee, have to say about this issue—I say this up front so they can be ready—is when it comes to giving the political arm authority to make such actions legal. Under the proposed legislation, the solicitor general would authorize such actions. Truly, if there is one thing that must not be mixed with politics, it is the law.

It would be a kindness to the minister to tell her that she is on the wrong track, that this should be left up to the courts, as is now the case for wiretapping, for certain very specific seizures outside normal court hours. It could be a judge who, as part of an investigation and upon presentation of evidence, gives authorization. It could be ex parte. It could be various ways of speeding up authorization. But it must be someone who is independent of the political arm. It must be a judge who gives authorization and who oversees the result.

This is one amendment we are going to try to make when this bill comes before the Standing Committee on Justice and Human Rights.

Generally speaking, it is not what is in the bill that is causing a problem but much more what is not. With this in mind, I think that it will be easier to work with officials of the Department of Justice and try to convince them to make certain additions to the bill.

I will conclude by saying that one thing is certain and that is that those enforcing the legislation must also be given the necessary money. It is all very fine and well to have a well-drafted bill, but the necessary money must be there for them to enforce it.

In Quebec, we have shown that when the police were given adequate financial support, they were able to do an effective job of combating organized crime, as they did in the Opération Printemps 2001, a major cleanup operation. We should continue in this vein by passing this bill.

April 23, 2001 [House of Commons]

Mr. Bill Blaikie (Winnipeg—Transcona, NDP)

Mr. Speaker, I am pleased to rise and say a few words on behalf of the NDP on this particular debate.

I agree with my hon. colleague from the Bloc when he says that a great deal of credit should be given to the Bloc Quebecois for pressing the matter in the House over the previous years. I understand the satisfaction it must be experiencing in seeing the government respond. By the Bloc's own analysis, some 80% of the bill includes measures that it has requested.

Quebecers have experienced, to a completely excessive and unsatisfactory degree, the somewhat dubious benefits of the activities of gangs, as have other Canadians in other provinces.

We have the bill before us and we are anxious that it not be debated at great length here in the House. We would like to see it go to committee. If we are serious about wanting the legislation implemented and used to curtail the activities of criminal gangs, we must get it through the House and into committee and look at some of its provisions.

If there are things that can be improved and clarified, and I certainly think there are, then let us go about doing that and getting the legislation into force so that we can determine through experience whether the bill will actually work. That is the only way we can find out what will work, both in terms of the ability of police to investigate and lay charges and the ability of the courts to obtain and uphold convictions.

It is certainly not the intention of the NDP to delay passage of the bill. I simply say to my colleagues in the Bloc who have, shall we say, a somewhat robust history of making the work of the Standing Committee on Justice and Human Rights somewhat difficult because of their objections to Bill C-7, the bill on the youth criminal justice act, that I imagine they will face a bit of a dilemma if that is the case.

I am not saying that is the case now, but if it turns out to be then we cannot get to this legislation until we have dealt with the youth criminal justice act. That is another piece of legislation about which, despite its inadequacies, we will not be able to learn more until we have had an opportunity to see it in practice.

This bill introduces three new offences and tough sentences that target various degrees of involvement with criminal organizations. That is all well and good. It is appropriate that these new offences be introduced. I look forward to hearing expert testimony on that in committee. Certainly in principle it is a good idea and one that we support.

Protecting people who work in the justice system from intimidation, either against them or their families, is certainly something we would support. However we would go even further, as have other members who have spoken today. We would like to see, or at least have it made clear and explicit in the legislation, that it is not just members of parliament who are protected by the legislation. Provincial ministers of justice, provincial politicians and, as the member from the Bloc said only moments ago, simple politicians, because of various zoning or other questions, may also find themselves in conflict with the interests of criminal gangs.

We may therefore want to look in committee at ways to either broaden the list of those explicitly included or to clarify the definition so it does not just apply to members of parliament.

Simplifying the current definition of criminal organization in the criminal code is another aspect of the bill which seems to be merited. We look forward to hearing more about it in committee.

Broadening the powers of law enforcement to forfeit the proceeds of crime, and in particular the profits of criminal organizations, and to seize property used in a crime are things we may well need to put into legislation so that governments have the tools at their disposal to deal more forcefully with organized crime.

An accountable process must be established to protect law enforcement officers from criminal liability when they commit what would otherwise be considered illegal actions while investigating and infiltrating criminal organizations. That is something I understand from my meetings with the Canadian Police Association earlier this year. I certainly understand the concern of police officers who work undercover in difficult situations and need more freedom to act without worrying about criminal liability. We cannot grant them absolute freedom, of course, so it is a fine line. The minister has attempted in the legislation to define what that line is.

This is something I look forward to discussing in committee because people have expressed concern about where the line is drawn. I understand and appreciate those concerns and yet I am sympathetic to what police officers have requested. We certainly accept the principle of protecting, to some degree, police officers who are engaged in this kind of activity and we look forward to hearing from people on both sides of the issue as to where the line should be drawn.

I am particularly pleased that this legislation has come forward because I myself, some time ago in a previous parliament, brought forward a private member's bill regarding anti-gang measures. It is no secret to people who know something about Winnipeg that it has gang problems in its inner city, not just biker gangs but criminal gangs of various descriptions.

There is a great deal of interest on the part of many citizens of Winnipeg in giving the police and government the appropriate tools with which to deal with these gangs. The Manitoba NDP government is also interested in seeing much tougher measures to deal with gangs.

I will leave it at that. However I cannot resist saying that the government, when it announced in a press release that it was stepping up its fight against organized crime, stated:

> The Government will also inject an additional $200 million over the next five years to implement legislation and related prosecution and law enforcement strategies to fight organized crime. This funding will build on the $584 million that the RCMP received in the 2000 budget—

Having had the weekend I have just had, I cannot help but reflect on the kinds of resources used this past weekend in Quebec City to deal with, by and large, peaceful protesters.

I am not talking about the anarchists and the Black Bloc, the people who tried to take down the fence. I am talking about what I was going to call policing but which was, in many respects, gassing, rubber bulleting and water cannoning of people who were not trying to take down the fence or hurl stuff at the police on the other side. Most of those people were simply acting on what they thought were the rules of the game at the summit; that is, as long as they were not trying to break the perimeter and were acting outside the perimeter in a peaceful way, they would be immune from police action.

When I consider the resources that went into the summit, I sometimes wonder, as must many ordinary Canadians, why it is that when one wants a police officer in a hurry one cannot be found but when there is a summit meeting there are 6,000 of them. Where did they all come from?

How many communities were left without police protection over the last several days so that students could have their first experience of tear gas while sitting around singing or standing innocently, or perhaps curiously, looking at the wall?

I apologize for those remarks but I think some people, even some police, must feel that on occasion. I have a great deal of sympathy for police officers in the RCMP, the Sûreté du Québec and others who must sometimes wonder why the government is willing to pay so much in overtime and put so many resources into something like that. When police want resources to deal with criminal gangs or people who make life miserable for Canadians in various communities and contexts they cannot get an extra dime out of the government, but by God, just announce there is a protest coming and they get all the equipment and resources they ever wanted.

There is something not quite right here, as far as I am concerned. This legislation is a step in the right direction. We want to see certain things clarified in committee and we look forward to that process.

April 23, 2001 [House of Commons]

Mr. Peter MacKay (Pictou—Antigonish—Guysborough, PC)

Mr. Speaker, I am pleased to participate in this debate and to follow the hon. member for Winnipeg—Transcona, a new member of our justice committee who brings a great deal of credibility to the debate and great oratorical skill to the House of Commons.

Our party, as are I think all parties without exception, will be supporting Bill C-24. It is somewhat of a reincarnation of legislation we saw in the last parliament. It is very important and timely to the process of dealing with the ongoing plague of organized crime in Canada. It will allow police officers and prosecutors, both through legislation and in some instances through increased resources, to combat and turn their undivided attention in some instances to the growing problem of organized crime.

Neil Young sings of rust never sleeping. Well, crime never sleeps. Crime is unfortunately becoming more and more active in many communities and I am not talking only of the big cities. Crime is becoming prevalent in small towns and rural parts of the country.

We are particularly vulnerable in coastal communities, I hasten to add. Sadly, since the disbandment of the ports police in the country that is even more the case. We are seeing an obvious attempt by organized crime to profit from illicit acts of importation, in many instances of contraband materials. I am talking about drugs, which are the chief trade, as well as guns, pornographic and contraband materials brought into the country under the radar of our current law enforcement capacity. One would hope with the greatest optimism that this legislation will help address, at least in part, this very complex problem.

There is a great need for this legislation. The RCMP, who arguably is the most affected by the issue, is I think cautiously optimistic. The new RCMP Commissioner Zaccardelli alluded to the fact that organized crime has plans to use bribes to destabilize the country's parliamentary system. That came as a shocking revelation to many when they read it in the newspapers. It raised eyebrows across the country. It demonstrated the profound epidemic of organized crime and the lengths that organized crime will go to on occasion to exert influence, and I am obviously not talking about a positive influence.

That epidemic has for many years been virtually ignored by the current government. It is therefore very encouraging to see it finally recognize the issue and give it a priority after seven years.

On Tuesday, September 12, 2000, the Quebec public security minister, Serge Ménard, urged the federal government to use the notwithstanding clause to outlaw membership in gangs such as the Hells Angels and the Rock Machine. Because such a move might be struck down by the courts as unconstitutional, he was urging the government to give at least an indication that it would not hesitate to use the notwithstanding clause.

When it comes to organized crime, one thing everyone understands is that it does not play by the rules. It does not abide by the laws, whereas of course law enforcement, prosecutorial services and the government not only have to put laws in place but stay within the boundaries and confines of those laws, and rightly so. Therefore we are sometimes talking about a distinct disadvantage on the part of our system of enforcement vis-à-vis outlaw gangs. Extraordinary times sometimes call for extraordinary action. That is why, I am sure, the suggestion was made that the notwithstanding clause might be invoked in those circumstances.

The Department of Justice clearly suffers from constitutional constipation at times, I think, from this fear that somehow if a law is made that might be deemed unconstitutional we should refrain from enacting it.

This law will be challenged in our courts, as many laws before it have been challenged. That is part and parcel of the process. In particular, I can guarantee that the legislation that expands police powers will be the subject of numerous court challenges. We can bank on it.

We simply cannot hesitate in or refrain from introducing legislation in the fear that somewhere in the land, whether it be in the Supreme Court of Canada or in some other court, a judge may decide that this is not within the bounds of the constitution. That is part of our judiciary. That is part of the process. I guarantee that this legislation will be challenged, like other legislation has been.

However, when dealing with organized crime and the repercussions of having organized crime go unchecked we sometimes have to make laws that expand the current envelope and go beyond the realm of what has been the normal practice.

While the Quebec minister was expressing these concerns, on the very next day, September 13, the day after the call from the security minister of Quebec, Mr. Michel Auger, a journalist in Montreal with the Journal de Montréal, was shot five times in the back. This was most likely the action of and has been attributed widely to outlaw motorcycle gangs. I am informed that it was likely the act of someone who wanted to join one of the gangs and was part of the movement to get in, to show somehow that this person had what it takes to be involved in this type of activity. They are sometimes the most dangerous, these puppet groups, these individuals who are trying to ingratiate themselves, to earn their patch so to speak. Mr. Auger's fate and the fate of many others who have expressed opposition to organized crime and have raised the spectacle of somehow trying to get this issue under control has been that they have sometimes faced the wrath of the gangs themselves.

Criminal gangs are far-reaching now. They are branching out. As I said in my opening remarks, they are found in communities across the country, whether they be rural or urban. Many Canadians are starting to feel particularly unsafe because of this audacious presence. In the city of Halifax, there are many people who are very concerned. Individuals such as Matt Jardine and others who live in Halifax are concerned about what is happening in their city.

An outlaw motorcycle gang, the Hells Angels, now has its colours flying in radiant lights in front of its clubhouse in the city of Halifax. This is the affront to democracy. It is an affront to policing and the safe, secure feeling that people should have in their communities.

There is a real need for this legislation. Again, it is encouraging that it is being brought forward now. The minister often uses the phrase in a timely fashion, and this has been timely for many years. The time is here and we are encouraged by that.

Organized crime also is becoming very prevalent in many circles where it was traditionally unseen, such as the Internet. The Hells Angels, I am told, have one of the largest Internet sites available. It is information that is now transmitted through cyberspace, not only across this country but across the United States, North America and the world. That is very disturbing. Obviously the ability to transport information can be an extremely positive thing, but organized crime can use it for a very nefarious purpose, so there is certainly a need for legislation in that area at some future time. It is not addressed by this legislation.

The bill has taken on a very broad background, if we will, in terms of what types of organized crime we are dealing with. Eastern bloc European gangs have emerged, such as the traditional Mafiosa-Italian connections, and there are the snakehead organizations, Chinese triads, Oriental groups that are forming gangs and the traditional so-called motorcycle gangs, which are, as I have said, becoming more prevalent.

The Minister of Justice gave repeated assurances to study options for strengthening our current legislation to break the back of organized crime. Although some of those details were not discussed publicly, we do know that attempts were made to introduce legislation in 1997. We see it coming back now in this form. The minister reiterated this in her comments.

I do applaud her. I applaud the minister's initiative in bringing forward this legislation now. It has finally received priority and would allow those administering it, mainly the provinces and the law enforcement community, to attack the issue and to attack the underbelly of these gangs. In particular, this legislation allows for greater use of attacking the proceeds of crime, that is, going after the actual resources of organized crime and taking away the flow of money and the benefits received from illegal acts.

It also very clearly and specifically simplifies the definition and the composition of criminal organizations for purposes in a court. The bill targets various degrees of involvement within organizations, that is, it attaches the type of activity that is deemed to be participation in a criminal organization. Sometimes that is just watching. Sometimes it could be the person working on a dock in Halifax who turns a blind eye to an importation or to a boxcar coming in with illicit contraband material.

The legislation also would make it easier for police and prosecutors to arrest and jail those involved in organized crime and keep them in prison for longer periods of time. There is a greater element of deterrence, both specific and general, at work in the bill for those who choose this path.

The bill would allow law enforcement officials to declare forfeit the proceeds of crime from organizations, to seize the property and to perhaps put that resource back into the community that has been harmed. It allows law enforcement officers to seize things like houses, boats, cars and money and to allow the resource that has been pillaged and raped from a community to go back into it and perhaps benefit it and try to rehabilitate some of the harm that has been done.

The legislation would also strengthen rules protecting against intimidation of witnesses, jurors and their families at organized crime trials. It would strengthen the protection for federal ministers and members of parliament. It would improve protection for law enforcement officers from criminal liability when they commit certain illicit acts while engaging in undercover operations.

One thing missing from the legislation and which has been pointed out by several members today is that it does not include provincial ministers. I believe that was perhaps a legislative oversight. I am certain it is something that can be corrected at committee.

In particular, the provisions in this bill send a very important signal that the Parliament of Canada is not going to sit back and rest on the laurels of the fine men and women who are currently working in our justice system, but that it is actually going to bolster support for them and enhance their ability to do their job and their ability to protect us, because it is that thin blue line, as it is sometimes called, that the police provide to the citizens of Canada.

We are supportive of the amendments that deal with taking away the proceeds of the crime, taking away the lifeblood. There are very positive amendments to this bill that could be tightened up. Again, hopefully we will have an opportunity to do that in the process.

Of course I mentioned the absence of protection for provincial ministers. There is also perhaps some need to protect journalists in some instances, as we saw with Mr. Auger.

There is a problem with respect to the funding for the legislation. That in and of itself is perhaps its greatest weakness. The legislation has come about, typically, with great fanfare and with announcements made in the press gallery. I think the minister has had her knuckles rapped a little in that regard. The legislation announces $200 million to address this specific problem. That comes as great news to those in law enforcement and was met with great enthusiasm by the commissioner of the RCMP and others.

However, the question, the next natural progression of that, is this: when will the money come? There were references in that very press conference to the earlier announcement of $584 million to the RCMP to upgrade CPIC, to allow for greater resources, to allow for more overtime, to allow for resources and for perhaps greater access to justices of the peace or greater access to informants. They are all important elements of the police task in protecting Canadians.

When will the money arrive? It would be very interesting to hear from the minister or members of the government how much of that $580 million, the earlier announcement, has actually been put into the coffers of the police. I suspect that the same question will be asked of this $200 million in very short order, because they are crying out for those resources. The police are desperately in need of the financial support. It is fine to make the announcement, to give the moral support here, but they need the actual resources and they need them immediately. That is a question that has yet to be answered.

There is a positive starting point here. There is certainly a determined commitment on the part of the government and on the part of all members of parliament. This has affected individual members of parliament. A member of the Bloc found himself in a very unsettling position, I am sure, when he was the subject of threatening actions on the part of an outlaw motorcycle gang.

The limitless resources of the organized criminal element highlight the fact that the police are often left feeling that they are not on a level playing field legislatively because of their limitations within the law. However, they are also under the increased pressure because organized crime has unlimited resources and is essentially using more and better technology than is available to the police. Members of organized crime are watching the watchers. They are using videotape to tape the police to find out who is watching them. They are transmitting information about judges, about prosecutors and about police. They are sharing information about undercover officers. They are using the Internet to its maximum benefit.

This is the brave new era. This is an age wherein we should be giving the police the tools and the technology to fight organized crime on the same level that organized crime is using. Typically we have seen the government try to fix a problem that in some instances it created. I refer to the ports police. There have also been severe cuts to the RCMP in the past number of years. Clearly the RCMP was suffering budgetary restraints when it had to close its training facility in Saskatoon. Clearly when the Canadian Police Information Centre computer system was almost on the verge of collapse without an immediate influx of money, it was symptomatic of underfunding on the part of our national police force. Bill C-24 would not provide this immediate injection of funding.

There are, as I indicated, elements and commitments that we are very supportive of. What we want to see and what we want to diligently pursue is that the funding is actually going to be there. There are clauses in the bill like, for example, clause 27 at page 29, which talks about the definition of criminal organization. It now needs to be composed of three or more persons and the crown now does not need to show that the offences were committed in the previous five years.

Some of the legislation may seem technical and inconsequential to the untrained ear, but this is very important for the crown and for the police working in cohort to secure convictions. We saw a very recent sting operation in the province of Quebec and parts of Ontario that resulted in individuals being rounded up and charged. There are potentially charges there that will not be affected by the introduction of this legislation, but in the future certainly it will help in the successful prosecution of these types of offences.

One problem that I have picked up on is that Bill C-24 fails to make it a criminal offence to be a member of a group already proven to be a criminal organization. Whether or not an organization is criminal would have to be proven in each particular case, that is, it would create needless expense in some instances and a duplication of resources that would prolong many criminal trials.

There is a general consensus that the legislation is positive. Much of the technical examination of the issue came about as a result of the Shirose and Campbell case that dealt with immunity. It dealt with police officers having the ability to infiltrate crime through in some instances buying illicit substances like drugs and participating in questionable conduct themselves to prove allegiance and to prove that they were working with the gang to gain its trust so that they could break it up.

This is something that raises concern among lawyers and privacy protectors. There will be an examination by a court of law to see that it is in proportion, that it is reasonable in the circumstances. These are the types of matters that we could try to fine tune.

It will no doubt result in court challenges and that should be welcomed. Members should embrace that reality. It is our responsibility to make laws and it is the responsibility of the courts to examine and interpret those laws in some cases.

With regard to the intimidation factor, it is very important that there be as broad a definition as possible for who should be protected from intimidation. Trials cannot function if jurists, lawyers, witnesses, and in some instances police, are feeling intimidated. Intimidation and extortion are things that gangs deal in very much. They put fear into the minds of people if they come forward to testify against gang members.

I am hopeful the minister and the government will be open to certain amendments, further examination and strengthening of the legislation. I trust all members would be supporting the bill.

Mr. Dennis Mills (Toronto—Danforth, Lib.)

Mr. Speaker, I am pleased to have an opportunity to make a few remarks in support of the legislation. I would like to touch on an issue that my colleague from the Conservative Party raised during his remarks. It has to do with that part of his speech that dealt with the exposure of journalists when they are involved in doing research and writing about biker gangs.

It has a very special chord of relevance for me. During the last election campaign I met a constituent, Yves Lavigne, who wrote the book Hell's Angels at War, the biker gang book. He has written three books actually. Hell's Angels: Taking Care of Business is another one. People like Yves Lavigne have tremendous experience and insight. They think outside the box of normal police forces.

Would it be a good idea for the RCMP or other police forces to use people like Yves Lavigne, who have spent 15 or 20 years of their lives focused on a specific area of organized crime, as consultants to make sure that the police think outside the traditional box and bring these gangs to justice in a more expeditious manner?

April 23, 2001 [House of Commons]

Mr. Peter MacKay

Mr. Speaker, the member raises a very important element which is missing from the legislation itself. I agree that the police should be outsourcing to individuals who have expertise in this area. It is an incredibly overwhelming issue in terms of its complexity and the lengths that organized crime will go to infiltrate legitimate businesses.

Organized crime will seek to undermine the credible people working in the system, whether working directly in justice or as legislators, and to undermine the media who have a role in reporting and making public the activities of organized crime.

I agree that police officers should have within their mandate the ability to engage these individuals for information purposes and for their expertise. The legislation does not provide for the protection of specifically journalists, authors and those who write and have obtained special information that is helpful and relevant to the police.

I am encouraged that the issue is being fleshed out and that we will have an opportunity to correct it to make that additional protection available. Hopefully the spirit of productive debate and study at the committee level will improve this important legislation which he and other members support.

April 23, 2001 [House of Commons]

Mr. Stephen Owen (Vancouver Quadra, Lib.)

Mr. Speaker, I am very pleased to stand today to speak in favour of Bill C-24. I was pleased to listen to the Minister of Justice and I heard the comments made by members of the opposition who seem to have a full understanding of the issue.

If it is not understood in the Canadian public at large, it is well understood in the House by all parties and all speakers that the scale of organized crime in the country and internationally, the magnitude of the threat that it poses to our society, is something of real urgency. The bill addresses it and needs to be passed quickly and put into force.

I would like to speak about the variety and complexity of the problem internationally as well as to individuals, communities, government and private enterprises in Canada.

Internationally there is more than a trillion dollars a year in earned profits from criminal activity worldwide. The figure is growing every year. It has not been hampered and restricted by deficit cutting that governments around the world have had to undergo through the 1990s. These profits have been soaring. In terms of the critical nature of this threat, former President Clinton identified organized crime as the number one threat to national security in the post cold war world.

The citizens of my constituency, Vancouver Quadra, understand the chilling nature of the threat. It is much broader than just gang wars. It involves the supply of drugs to our schools and children. It involves property crime that is attendant on drug addiction which is fed by organized crime. It involves home invasions and the security of our homes. Ten years ago who in our society had heard the chilling terms of terror such as home invasion, carjacking or drive-by shooting? These are new terms of terror which are directly connected to the scourge of organized crime in society.

In terms of our economy, billions of dollars of laundered money are put into our society which is based on a market economy. It is corrupted by them. They debase the vigour of competition in our market economy and threaten our economic viability.

They also threaten our economic institutions. Corruption and organized criminal activity in scams with respect to banks, credit card fraud, telemarketing fraud, insurance fraud and stock market fraud are all part of the growing expanding scourge of organized criminal activity which is sapping the economic strength of the country as well as the safety of our citizens.

In terms of government agencies themselves, we have had troubling information about the infiltration and corruption of people working in government agencies at all levels in Canada and internationally.

These are major challenges for our society. They require new tools, many of which the bill provides. If we think about how we will apply those tools we have to think carefully about the new nature of criminal organizations.

Criminal organizations working in Canada and around the world are no longer monolithic crime families that are suspicious of each other or competitive with each other against criminal projects for turf. Today criminal activity is conducted in a highly networked, complex, flexible and international fashion. Criminal gangs are no longer fighting for turf with each other although that happens, and we know too sadly of the horrors in Quebec of criminal gang wars. However that is not the typical character of organized criminal activity today.

Organized criminal activity works in networks, works in cells across criminal organizations and across borders to uniquely compose a criminal operation across boundaries, gangs and criminal products. It requires a very special approach from law enforcement agencies which is not our traditional approach. It requires those agencies to be more flexible and more resourced in their response. I will be splitting my time.

I would like to comment on the new tools that are necessary and that are being applied by the bill. Monetary resources are needed for police agencies. Those have been provided for over the last two years with increased budgets and there are projected further injections of financial resources for the RCMP and other law enforcement agencies. That is critical.

The bill presents other tools. There will be stiffer penalties for participation in criminal gang activity and broader definitions of what constitutes criminal gangs and criminal activity. There are very important provisions to create the offence of intimidation of officials in the criminal justice system. It is a critical point of protection that is necessary and overdue.

The expanded definitions and increased ability to seize the proceeds of crime are important in the bill. There must be an ability to seize and forfeit property in a fashion that is efficient, quick and hits at the heart of the enterprise nature of organized crime.

The mandatory reporting provisions for suspicious financial transactions are important. Fifteen billion dollars was estimated as the amount of laundered funds from illegal activities in Canada last year.

I will conclude by addressing specifically the unique and changed nature of organized crime in society. It is flexible and networked. It crosses boundaries and is cross organizational. It is necessary to have an integrated and co-ordinated approach across the collection of criminal intelligence, police operations and prosecution of crime. These have to be working as a seamless whole.

The information and intelligence gathering must not be in a secretive closed chest fashion among competing law enforcement agencies. It must be shared in a mandatory fashion, but it must be secure and centrally analyzed. It must be disseminated on a need to know basis and the success and experience of operations have to be fed back into that intelligence system.

The operations themselves must be joint force operations, drawing across law enforcement agencies for the best and the most appropriate resources that can be uniquely composed and targeted on any particular criminal activity. It should then be shut down, redistributed and refocused on other criminal activity if it is to mimic the flexibility and the networks of criminal organizations themselves.

There must be an effective link to intensive prosecution which the bill and the organized criminal justice policy address. Dedicated legal advice must be present at the very earliest stages of an investigation to deal with the incredible complexity of criminal investigations and prosecutions, laws of disclosure, laws of search and seizure, laws of wiretapping, and laws of proceeds of crime. The best legal advice must be used at the beginning of an investigation right through to an intensive prosecution to make sure those prosecutions are successful.

I repeat that organized crime is an immense threat to society. Its magnitude is overwhelming. The bill needs to be passed as soon as possible.

April 23, 2001 [House of Commons]

Mr. Greg Thompson (New Brunswick Southwest, PC)

…. Bill C-24 would simplify the definition and composition of the criminal organization. This is very important. It would target various degrees of involvement with these organizations. It would make it easier for police and prosecutors to arrest and jail gangsters and keep them in prison for longer periods of time. It would allow law enforcement to forfeit the proceeds of crime from these criminal organizations and to seize property that was used in a crime. In other words, it would send out a message that crime did not pay. It would strengthen rules protecting against the intimidation of witnesses, juries and their families in an organized crime trial.

Last on my list is to strengthen protection for federal members of parliament and to improve protection for law enforcement officers from criminal liability when they commit certain illegal acts while engaged in undercover operations to infiltrate criminal organizations.

That sounds good. We are hoping the government does eventually come up with a bill, obviously with the help of the opposition and some of the fine amendments which I am sure will be coming from all of the parties on this side of the House because, Mr. Speaker, as you will remember, last September it was the opposition, particularly the Bloc Quebecois, that brought forward this emergency debate on organized crime in the House.

April 23, 2001 [House of Commons]

Mr. Michel Bellehumeur (Berthier—Montcalm, BQ)

Mr. Speaker, the bill introduced by the minister this morning contains almost 80% of what the Bloc Quebecois has been asking for over the last five or so years.

One point, however, is missing from the bill on organized crime now before us and that is the whole issue of reversing the burden of proof and the proceeds of crime.

My question for the member is a very simple one. Everyone knows that money is the sinews of war, whether politics or organized crime are involved. The comparison may be slightly imperfect, but it boils down to the same thing; there is organized crime because there is money to be made. The more money they make, the stronger and more organized they will be.

There is really nothing in the bill to facilitate the work of the police and crown prosecutors, to reverse even somewhat the burden of proof, so that it is not up to the crown to prove the illegality of an acquired asset, but rather up to organized crime to prove the legality of its origin.

My question for the member is as follows. Will he be able to support this, when he talks of amending the bill? Is it in this sense of giving additional tools to the police and crown prosecutors to facilitate proof with respect to such things as money which is, as we know, the sinews of war?

[English]

Mr. Greg Thompson

Mr. Speaker, this goes back to previous comments and to questions answered by my colleagues in the House. There is always that balance between charter rights and the willingness or the desire to crack down on criminals. There is a balance to be struck. Certainly that reverse onus is something worth looking at.

However, the truth is that organized crime has the resources. The government brags about the money it is putting in, but there are some prosecutions that have been going on in the country against organized crime by the Government of Canada where the cost is in excess of $10 million. The money being put in is a drop in the bucket. Not to discount the fact that $200 million over five years is a lot of money, but in comparison to the proceeds of crime, which are reaching into the billions, the point has to be made that we have to fight back with the resources we have and often that means money to fight crime. Bringing in legislation that is tough yet honours the charter is the challenge for the government. We are hoping the bill will do that given some of the amendments we will put forward from this side of the House.

April 23, 2001 [House of Commons]

Mrs. Suzanne Tremblay (Rimouski-Neigette-et-la-Mitis, BQ)

… There is also the matter of reversal of the burden of proof in connection with the proceeds of crime, to which we shall return in committee and in subsequent debates.

In the short time I have left, I would like to say how important it is for the minister to proceed with this bill, to get it in force promptly, for the House not to be recessed before it is passed, and for her to ensure the funding is made available, the cash required to make it enforceable.

April 23, 2001 [House of Commons]

Mr. Bernard Bigras (Rosemont—Petite-Patrie, BQ)

…The other aspect addressed by this bill is the whole matter of seizure and forfeiture of the proceeds of crime…

Mr. Stephen Owen (Vancouver Quadra, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, I am very pleased to stand today to speak in favour of Bill C-24. I was pleased to listen to the Minister of Justice and I heard the comments made by members of the opposition who seem to have a full understanding of the issue.

April 23, 2001 [House of Commons]

Mr. Gurmant Grewal (Surrey Central, Canadian Alliance)

Mr. Speaker, on behalf of the constituents of Surrey Central I am pleased to participate in the debate on Bill C-24, an act to amend the criminal code respecting organized crime and law enforcement and to make consequential amendments to other acts.

The bill has two main purposes: first, to provide new tools in the fight against organized crime; and, second, to respond to the 1999 supreme court decision in R. v Campbell and Shirose, which put in doubt the ability of police and police informants to break the law as part of undercover operations aimed at penetrating criminal organizations.

After years of the Reform Party of Canada, now the Canadian Alliance, fighting for tougher laws to help combat gangs and other criminal organizations, the federal Liberals have finally introduced some of the legislation we have been calling for. The fact is that the weak Liberal government lacks the political will to get tough on crime, particularly on organized crime.

It has introduced this legislation because of intense pressure from the official opposition and other opposition parties and because of the pressure from police and the public in general. Combating organized crime was part of the detailed justice platform released during the election campaign by the Canadian Alliance.

The penetration of organized crime into Canadian society is a very serious matter. Criminals move from jurisdictions with strong controls to jurisdictions with weak or no controls. This criminal activity undermines Canada's financial and social systems and increases the power and influence of illegal businesses.

A staggering variety of activities such as extortion, home invasion, murder, theft, drugs and arms trafficking, counterfeit currency and passports, migrant smuggling, prostitution, Mafia, casino and lottery frauds are additional costs to society at the expense of the taxpayer and at the expense of our future. These activities make our streets unsafe.

We in Canada are also concerned that the privacy of Canadian citizens could be unreasonably invaded. There should be sufficient protection and the freedom of law-abiding citizens should be preserved. The loopholes in the system and the law are not plugged in Canada. That is the main problem. Canada is a candy store for these criminals. Unfortunately criminals have the motivation to come to Canada and commit crimes because they consider Canada to be a crime haven.

The blurred vision of the Liberals has caused the dismantling of Vancouver port police. Everyone knows that. This makes the port a gateway for the importation of drugs and narcotics. It opens up the way for criminals and makes their jobs easier rather than tougher. It is a shame that the Liberal government gives international organized criminals VIP treatment while those same criminals, according to the Immigration Act, are supposed to be inadmissible to Canada.

I remember when I was on the immigration and citizenship committee that we introduced a motion to study fraud and criminal activities under the Immigration Act not for general immigrants but for illegitimate and criminal elements coming to the country. Liberal members refused that motion.

Previous legislative attempts to deal with the problem have been ineffective. Bill C-95 did not go far enough in providing the tools needed for the law enforcement agencies to fight organized crime.

Years ago, perhaps in the early 1980s, the government of the day not only ignored the recommendations of the law enforcement agencies but it even refused to acknowledge the existence of organized criminal activities in Canada. Since that time organized crime has significantly increased. Canada has now become a global centre and a haven for organized crime because of its laws.

Whatever the government does now it is too late and too little. The criminals are lightyears ahead of the law enforcement agencies. They have more resources, more money and better state of the art technology while the agencies on the other side even lack the law with tooth and are struggling to maintain yesterday's technology.

A Liberal dominated subcommittee of the justice standing committee on organized crime held in camera hearings on the problem and issued its report just prior to the dissolution of the House. I will talk about that report in a short while.

I also want to mention that I represented the official opposition as a member of the subcommittee on organized crime. Since the hearings were in camera I will not go into detail but will talk about some of the issues that are in the public domain.

It is sad that the recommendations of the subcommittee were not fully implemented through this bill. Even though the committee was a Liberal dominated committee, the bill of course would enhance the fight against organized crime, though not enough, and should not be delayed unduly.

I will now talk about the main features of the bill. There will be longer consecutive sentences for gang activity: up to five years for participating in a criminal organization; 14 years for carrying out indictable offences for the benefit of a criminal organization; and life for being the leader of a criminal organization.

A new definition of a criminal organization would be: only three members required instead of the current five; there is no need to prove that members participated in indictable offences in the five years preceding prosecution and providing that, in addition to indictable offences punishable by five years or more, offences can be prescribed as serious offences.

It is stated that the intention is to cover offences, such as prostitution and gambling, that are controlled by organized crime.

Another point is the protection of justice system participants. Threatening a judge, prosecutor, juror, et cetera, or a member of their family would be punishable by up to 14 years and murdering a justice system participant would be first degree murder.

The next point concerns police immunity. The solicitor general responsible for the RCMP or provincial ministers responsible for the police will be able to designate officers who may, in the course of an investigation, commit offences other than offences causing bodily harm, obstructing justice or sexual offences.

Forfeiture of property would apply to all property used in committing a crime rather than just property especially built to carry out the crime. Judges will have to determine whether the forfeiture is appropriate given the nature of the crime. Presumably a house may not be forfeited if five marijuana plants are found in it but it could be if 500 or 5,000 plants are found in it.

There are still many significant deficiencies in the bill that require further address or amendments. Even many recommendations of the subcommittee have not been addressed in the legislation. I was a member of that committee and it was a Liberal dominated committee.

There are maybe 10 points I want to mention. The relevant elements of existing legislation, resources, investigative and prosecutorial practices, should be deployed to their fullest potential and effective strategy to fill any gaps should have been developed and addressed in the legislation. The committee was concerned about it and it made very clear recommendations about it.

The criminal code should have been amended so that all its provisions related to organized crime activities could have been brought together in a specific part to be entitled enterprise crime, designated drug offences, criminal organizations and money laundering. This recommendation was not followed.

The criminal code should have been amended to allow for the designation of criminal organization offenders in a manner similar to that applicable of dangerous offenders and long term offenders provided for at section 752. This would allow, at the sentencing stage, after a conviction has been obtained, for the imposition of imprisonment for an intermediate period or for long term supervision in the community after a sentence of up to 10 years. The recommendation was not followed.

Section 184 and following the criminal code dealing with judicially authorized audio and video surveillance should have been amended to increase in non-criminal organization offences from 60 days to at least a 120 day period for which such activities could be authorized and renewed. This particular recommendation is very important if the Liberals were to listen to Canadians, to the Canadian Police Association and to front line police officers who are dealing with organized criminals. When police officers need to obtain a particular warrant they have to write about a thousand pages. A lot of work has to be done to obtain a warrant.

Once a warrant has been obtained it is valid for only 60 days, whereas the criminal activity continues for months and years probably. They then have to go back and do all the paper work again in order to obtain a warrant for wiretapping or other things. The recommendation is very important and I hope the justice minister will follow through with it. Since we are debating the bill for the first time, the government has lots of opportunity if it is sincerely listening to this.

The provisions of part VI of the criminal code should have been reviewed and amended so as to streamline and simplify the requirements and practices involved in the judicial approval and renewal of audio and video surveillance as a law enforcement investigative strategy. This recommendation was not followed.

Section 743.6(1.1) of the criminal code should have been amended to allow sentencing judges to order that offenders serve full sentences instead of half the sentences currently served, of incarceration without any form of conditional release in cases where there is evidence that a convicted person committed an offence to the benefit of, at the direction of or in association with a criminal organization.

The criminal code should have been amended so that there was a reverse onus placed on a person convicted of an enterprise crime, a designated substance offence, a criminal organization offence or money laundering whose assets have been seized, to prove that these assets have not been acquired or increased in value as the result of criminal activity. There should be a reverse onus on the criminal rather than on law enforcement agencies to prove that. This is a very important recommendation.

If the convicted person were unable to discharge the burden of proof, as I mentioned, to the satisfaction of the court, these assets should be declared to be forfeited. This recommendation was not followed through.

The Canada Evidence Act should have been amended to codify and simplify the rules related to disclosure. The disclosure rules are so vague that jurisdictions in foreign countries refuse to co-operate with Canadian law enforcement agencies because of our stupid and ineffective disclosure laws.

The human resources expertise and technology levels should be sufficient to effectively combat organized crime. Unfortunately the funding announced by the justice minister today providing only $200 million over five years does not appear adequate and does not come close to the amount needed for frontline law enforcement officials to do their job effectively.

The funds allocated on a yearly basis would not significantly enhance police or prosecution resources when we consider that a relatively simple prosecution could cost as much as $10 million. Those resources are inadequate.

A national tactical co-ordinating committee should have been established to promote the exchange of information and sharing of experiences among field operators in order to fight organized crime. This recommendation made by the subcommittee on organized crime was not followed through again.

Because of lenient disclosure laws in Canada, as I mentioned earlier, law enforcement agencies from other countries refuse to share sensitive information with their Canadian counterparts on organized criminals operating in their country. This jeopardizes our efforts to combat crime and demoralizes our frontline officers.

One of the most disturbing features of the legislation is its failure to make it a criminal offence to be a member of a group already proven to be a criminal organization in Canada. Contrary to the justice minister's suggestions, this provision does not make participation or membership in a criminal organization illegal unless it can be proven that the person had the intention to facilitate illegal transactions for that organization.

The fact that an organization is a criminal organization would have to be proven in each particular case that goes before the court resulting in needless duplication of resources, expertise and prolonged criminal trials.

The bill fails to adequately protect other key players in the fight against crime. In particular, provincial justice ministers, MLAs, MNAs, MPPs are not granted the same level of protection as federal parliamentarians, despite the fact that they are directly responsible for the enforcement of these provisions. They need to implement the law.

We all know the case of Michel Auger who had the courage to stand up against crime and other journalists who were not given protection.

In conclusion, I urge the government to make the legislation tougher, to provide more resources to police and to encourage the aggressive use of the new tools.

In particular, the recommendations of the subcommittee, regarding forfeitures, wire tapping and serving full sentences, have not been addressed or have only been partially met. Therefore, I hope the justice minister will be open to considering amendments that would further streamline the Canadian justice system and would offer Canadians a greater measure of security through the legislation.

April 26, 2001 [House of Commons]

Mr. Kevin Sorenson (Crowfoot, Canadian Alliance)

Mr. Speaker, it is a privilege and a pleasure to stand in the House again to debate a bill that is being brought forward. Our party commends the government for bringing forward Bill C-24.

Organized crime poses an enormous threat to Canada. It poses an enormous threat to Canada's national security and economic stability. Therefore we on this side of the House welcome Bill C-24, the subject of today's debate. It is a piece of legislation that the Canadian Alliance has been demanding for some time.

In the Canadian Alliance Party we believe we need to put in place the resources to fight crime, to fight all elements of crime. As we look at the daily papers and as we turn the television sets on, we see that organized crime is becoming more prevalent on a daily basis. In 1998 the commissioner of the Royal Canadian Mounted Police, Philip Murray, said:

> Organized crime in Canada is now so pervasive that police have been reduced to putting out isolated fires in a blazing underworld economy.

What Philip Murray was saying was that in regard to organized crime there is a huge bonfire, with the whole land ablaze, and our police force has very limited resources to put out what we might call small brush fires.

An Ottawa Citizen article dated March 3, 1999, explained the prevalence of organized crime. It states:

> Canada is particularly vulnerable to drug trafficking—the principal source of revenue for most organized crime groups—according to the Drug Analysis Section of the RCMP. Smugglers are attracted to Canada because of the low risk of arrest due to limited police resources that have stymied investigations, relatively light penalties, and our sprawling, largely unmonitored borders.

This article highlights three of the huge concerns dealing with drug trafficking as well as organized crime. The first is limited police resources. The second is light sentences. With the light sentences being handed down, people understand that crime sometimes does pay. Of course the third point is the geographic location of Canada and the fact that it has such huge, long, unmonitored borders.

International drug trafficking is an organized criminal activity that threatens democratic institutions, fuels terrorism and human rights abuses and undermines economic development. Drug trafficking is an inherently violent activity. Violence is used by involved organizations to protect turf, settle disputes and eliminate those who oppose them. Some of those who oppose them are government members, the judiciary, investigative journalists and reporters, individuals who are willing to take a stand. We all, as a joint body here, need to be willing to take a stand.

The Canadian government estimates the revenue involved. It shocked me when I heard that the amount of revenue our Canadian government estimates is in the underground illegal drug market in Canada is $7 billion to $10 billion.

The Canadian drug market is dominated by many foreign organizations. We know of many of the countries that are involved. There are Italian based organized criminals who are involved in upper echelons of the importation and distribution of many drugs. Asian based groups are active in heroin and, increasingly, in cocaine trafficking at the street retail level in Canada. Colombian based traffickers still control much of the cocaine trade in eastern and central Canada. As well, outlaw motorcycle gangs play a major role in the importation and large scale distribution of cannabis, cocaine and other chemical drugs.

Motorcycle gangs and those involved in organized crime are not in only one or two provinces. Provinces throughout this nation are now recognizing and understanding the concerns in regard to organized crime as they deal with the motorcycle gangs and especially the drug trafficking of those gangs.

Most illicit drugs arrive in Canada by aircraft, marine container or truck. More than 9 million commercial shipments enter Canada each year, 75% at land borders and the rest at international airports, marine ports, postal facilities and bonded warehouses. Approximately 1 million marine containers holding illegal drugs enter Canadian ports annually and another 200,000 enter by truck or rail after being unloaded at United States marine ports and then moved out.

In 1995, 5.2 million trucks entered Canada from the United States. Three years ago it was estimated that by the year 2000 this number would reach 6 million to 6.8 million. We have a customs inspection rate of less than 2% and we are talking about 5.2 million vehicles that are estimated to contain drugs and are crossing the border.

At least 100 tonnes of hashish, 15 to 24 tonnes of cocaine and 4 tonnes of liquid hashish are smuggled into Canada each year. Some 50% of the marijuana available in Canada is produced in Canada, but the other 50% is brought in from other countries.

The domestic production of marijuana is estimated to be at 800 tonnes. In 1994 an RCMP operation found that $10 million worth of marijuana was exported from British Columbia to the United States.

To exemplify this point I again quote from a news article, this one appeared in the Globe and Mail in April 1999, just two short years ago:

> Dale Brandland, a sheriff from Washington State, testified that many marijuana growers have moved to Canada in recent years to escape harsher U.S. drug laws. U.S. police have said that organized crime groups, including the Hells Angels and various > Asian gangs, are shipping the highly popular drug back into the United States, sometimes swapping it pound for pound for cocaine.

The 1998 sentiments expressed by the former commissioner of the RCMP regarding the prevalence of organized crime was recently echoed by the president of the Canadian Police Association who has said that organized crime is gaining the upper hand on law enforcement and it is time for tougher laws. Canadian Police Association president, Grant Obst, said:

> Things are going out of control and it is time to do something about it. The biggest problem organized crime has is they have too much money. And our biggest problem is we do not have enough.

Regarding resources this is what the president of the Canadian Police Association said:

> We are fighting a battle with a group of individuals who have it would seem an unlimited amount of dollars available to them.

The old saying goes that it takes money to make money. In Canada it takes money perhaps to be involved in organized crime and it would be very obvious that they seem to have that money.

We need to put in place resources for those individuals who are willing to fight organized crime. It is time our country takes a stand and provides them with the right resources.

Through Bill C-24 the federal government is injecting $200 million over the next five years to implement the legislation and related prosecution and law enforcement strategies. This funding is to build on the $584 million that the RCMP received in the 2000 budget to help fight organized crime.

Although the money is a welcome addition it simply is not enough. I have already discussed that the drug trafficking could be close to $10 billion per year and we are throwing $200 million more at the problem. It seems to be a drop in the bucket.

Canada's national police force cannot fulfil domestic obligations, let alone our international obligations to provide legal and police assistance in countries such as Colombia and Peru due to the previous cuts. The report on plans and priorities for the RCMP funding for 1998-99 to 2000-01 showed a continuous decline in spending for federal policing services.

The cuts affected policing services in the area of drug enforcement, customs and excise, proceeds of crime and international liaison. The cuts affected policing services in the area of drug enforcement. That is organized crime. The area of customs and excise is directly related to organized crime. The area of proceeds of crime and international liaison is also related to organized crime.

There was to be a 65% reduction of the 1996-97 funding levels for the anti-smuggling initiative despite the fact that larger sophisticated criminal organizations continue to successfully engage in the smuggling and distribution of contraband goods.

Without adequate increased funding and more highly trained skilled provincial police and RCMP officers, the bikers, the Mafia and the Asian based organized criminals will continue to have a free run and to smuggle drugs across our borders.

As we have seen in Edmonton and Calgary they will have the ability to kill innocent bystanders who are caught up in turf wars and caught up in money laundering. They will continue to intimidate and threaten. They will continue to injure and kill members of the judiciary, crime reporters, correction officers, and maybe even some day members of parliament.

I would therefore urge and recommend a significant increase in the expenditures proposed in Bill C-24. I do so with the confidence that the majority of Canadians would agree that fighting organized crime is a top priority.

A 1998 report of a national survey on organized crime and corrections in Canada revealed that Canadians support increased funding for the RCMP to combat organized crime. I will quote from page 3 of that document:

> Virtually all respondents want government to spend more money to fight organized crime; in a forced-choice situation, respondents picked organized crime as a spending priority over all other proposed options except health care.

I have only scratched the surface of this most important piece of legislation. I hope to get another opportunity in the near future to speak again to this criminal law bill. Some of the other points in the bill are well worth supporting.

We need to have a concentrated effort on everything it would take to fight organized crime. Canadians want to feel safe. We want to feel safe in our homes, in our communities, in our provinces and in our country. When we look at the survey we understand why Canadians want more money for health care. They want to feel safe. They want to feel if they become ill that the resources are there to help them.

Canadians want to be safe on their streets. They want to know the Canadian government is absolutely committed to keeping communities safe. The great fear many Canadians face is the onslaught of crime. I do not mean petty crime although we want to fight that as well. They fear organized crime because it is a direct threat to our society, to the well-being and safety of our communities, and to our children and our grandchildren.

April 26, 2001 [House of Commons]

Mr. Réal Ménard (Hochelaga—Maisonneuve, BQ)

Mr. Speaker, you know how much I have been concerned about organized crime and the fight against organized crime as the member for Hochelaga—Maisonneuve.

I have to say right off that I find this bill introduced by the Minister of Justice and her colleague, the Solicitor General of Canada, extremely positive. We will certainly have to work in committee to improve it, but I think our colleague, the member for Berthier—Montcalm and Bloc Quebecois justice critic, has also said he is relatively pleased.

I recall that in the early 1990s, we learned as parliamentarians with some stupefaction just how deep the roots of organized crime went in our societies. We were used to calling ourselves a country of law and order, where basic freedoms thrive and where there is essentially no political corruption. This remains the case and continues to be relevant.

We came to realize in the early 1990s that the real threats we faced as parliamentarians representing a challenge for the future for all of our societies included those related to organized crime.

I think members will remember that the catalyst, the event that triggered this realization, was the killing, the car bomb that went off in Hochelaga—Maisonneuve on August 9, 1995, which for the first time in the history of crime claimed an innocent victim, a young lad of 11, Daniel Desrochers.

I do not think I am wrong to say that because of this event we as politicians realized the scope of the threat of organized crime in our societies.

This was followed by action, which I and other parliamentarians joined in. Not only did politicians realize the scope of organized crime. So did the agencies responsible for law enforcement. Police forces also called for more resources.

Members will also remember that in 1997, two years after the car bombing, the House passed a bill creating the new offence of participation in a criminal organization. A new offence was added to section 467.91 of the criminal code, namely the offence of participating in a criminal organization, of gangsterism.

That bill was passed very quickly. We were fairly convinced that it would provide a useful additional tool to law enforcement bodies and police forces.

One must admit that we had underestimated the incredible adaptability to change of biker gangs.

When we think about organized crime there are two or three realities to keep in mind. The first one is that organized crime exists across Canada. There are 36 biker gangs in all the provinces. The most powerful ones are those that have ties with the Hell's Angels which have managed to set up chapters across Canada. For a long time they had been excluded from Ontario, but last year they managed to move into the Ottawa—Vanier area.

Organized crime has three features. It is a criminal organization that is motivated by the prospect of money and it is generally a transborder organization. It must be realized that organized crime is involved in the import-export business. Some conditions must exist for organized crime to prosper.

In the early 1990s, when I began to take an interest in this issue as a member of parliament, I met a number of police officers. The officer who has been the most helpful, the best trainer and the one who gave me the most judicious advice was at the time the officer in charge at the Canadian Association of Chiefs of Police and the officer in charge of organized crime in the Montreal urban community police department. This officer was Pierre Sangollo, who today is on duty in the small city of Sainte-Julie.

Pierre Sangollo had told me “Never forget that in order for organized crime to proliferate, prosper and expand in a society it needs at least three conditions”. It needs a society with a minimum of wealth since organized crime gets richer through extortion, plundering, robbery and fraud. Therefore organized crime needs an environment where there is a minimum of wealth.

It needs a society where there are rapid means of communication. When we look at the strategies used by organized crime we see that its members often have contacts in the harbours, in air traffic and in areas where one can make rapid connections with various continents.

To proliferate, organized crime also needs a bureaucratized society. The Canadian charter of human rights is a positive document, in its own right. Everybody is in favour of a society where the rule of law is paramount, where everyone is equal before the law and where constitutional protections exist. I am sure parliamentarians who passed the charter of human rights in 1982 never expected there would be such obstacles to the fight against organized crime, for the charter has proved to be in certain respects an ally in the proliferation of organized crime.

I will give you an example of this. Some clauses of the charter provide that everyone has a right to full justice. Some natural justice principles are entrenched in the charter of rights. My colleague and friend, the member for Chicoutimi, knows that principles of natural justice are entrenched in the Canadian Charter of Rights and Freedoms.

In the early 1990s the supreme court handed down a ruling, called the Stinchcombe ruling. Under this ruling crown attorneys have to disclose all the evidence they have against the accused.

When the subcommittee of the justice committee was struck it travelled across Canada. Crown attorneys told members that a criminal investigation involving some shadowing of members of organized crime can easily cost the state, the crown, $1 million.

With the Stinchcombe ruling members can imagine the reproduction and reprography costs involved when there are tons and tons of documents by the boxful.

When I travelled to Vancouver I was shown, while the crown was preparing the trial of some members of organized crime, a room the size of the House containing full boxes of documents used by the crown to prove its case. These documents had to be copied and provided to the defence.

This had to be done because of a principle entrenched in the charter of rights. One can imagine how complicated it can be for those implementing the act to deal with such situations.

In order for organized crime to prosper a certain number of conditions are required: a bureaucratized state where there are constitutional guarantees for all, a society where routes allow transborder trade, and a society which is bureaucratized and often acts as an ally of members of organized crime.

In spite of all this, in 1997 we passed it in good faith. I remember that the five parties in the House at the time were unanimous. We passed the bill in less than one week at all stages. In committee everyone worked in good faith; everyone acted quickly.

We had with Bill C-95 a new tool that we thought would be effective in the fight against organized crime. What was that tool? It was a definition in the criminal code creating an infraction for gangsterism. When five people were convicted of a crime punishable by a five year term in prison they were considered to be a gang. To take part in a gang crime, to take part in its money making schemes and to commit a crime for gang members was punishable by a 14 year prison sentence.

We were convinced that with this tool, Bill C-95, we could bring down the heads of organized crime. In 1995 there were 36 biker gangs: Hell's Angels, Rock Machine, the Outriders and so one. There were 35 of them across Canada. Believe it or not, in five years, with Bill C-95, we have been able to press charges in only three cases.

Between 1995 and 2000 no more than three trials in all of Canada were conducted on the basis of Bill C-95 and the new infraction in the criminal code.

Why were we not able to bring the leaders of organized crime to justice? Because organized crime is smart. Organized crime has means. Organized crime is rich and has a formidable capacity to adapt.

What did the leaders of organized crime do? They set their various groups up as satellites. The Hell's Angels created affiliate clubs: the Spartiates and the Nomades, to name them. These affiliates recruited young people without records, people who had not in the previous five years committed an offence punishable by five years' imprisonment and who could not therefore be brought before the courts.

This is why the crown prosecutors told us “The tool you gave us with Bill C-95 does not work, and the definition of organized crime has to be changed”.

I would like to give an example of how ineffective the tool we adopted was. I have to say that the government did not drag its feet with respect to organized crime. There are at least six laws that were amended, including the proceeds of crime legislation, the Witness Protection Act, and the law that permits shadowing and setting up storefronts legally. As lawmakers we have been extremely busy with legislation on organized crime. It has not been a partisan issue in recent years.

I have a number of examples. Dominic Tozzi, one of the greatest money launderers ever caught in Canada, got out of prison two years after being sentenced to 10 years in penitentiary for laundering $27.2 million. Dominic Tozzi laundered $27.2 million. He was sentenced by a court of law to 10 years in prison, but with the applicable rules of law he was released after two years.

Antonio Volpato, one of the major figures in the Montreal Mafia, was released after serving one year of his sentence instead of six. The sentence arose from a charge of plotting to import 180 kilos of cocaine. It is rather a lot in terms of an offence.

There is also Joseph Lagana, a former lawyer and financial adviser to the mafia who served two and a half years of a 13 year sentence for importing 558 kilos of cocaine and laundering $47.4 million.

Even after passing Bill C-95 and amending six acts recently, there have been situations involving known members of organized crime. We are not dealing with young offenders subject to the Young Offenders Act but rather known criminals capable of laundering $47 million with the support of a huge network.

These are all challenges we had to overcome in order to fight organized crime. I am sure members all have in their ridings, and there may even be some in the gallery today, people who think it is easy to crack down on criminal organizations. As parliamentarians we now know that it is extremely hard and that we need much more powerful tools than the ones we have now.

Faced with this problem the justice minister, with whom I regularly train in the gym, introduced a bill that would change the definition of organized crime slightly. The organized crime offence will be much easier to prove in court. It will no longer be necessary to have five people who have committed punishable offences in the last five years. Organized crime and the related offence of gangsterism are now defined as participating in or contributing to any activity that helps a criminal organization achieve its objectives.

It is also provided that a well known leader of a criminal organization like Mom Boucher is liable to life imprisonment. This is interesting. For a long time that was the problem. We were able to convict members of criminal organizations but not their leaders.

With the proposed amendment to Bill C-24 this should be much easier to do.

I will conclude by pointing out another positive aspect of the bill. The notion of offence related property will be broadened so that the proceeds of crime money laundering act will be used a lot more. This is another very positive aspect of the bill.

In conclusion, every citizen must feel concerned by the issue of organized crime. Organized crime affects all communities. It does not affect only poor communities.

I believe that Bill C-24, which can be improved on in committee, is an excellent piece of legislation. I will be pleased to work with the hon. member for Berthier—Montcalm and with members from all parties to improve this bill in committee between now and the month of June.

May 8, 2001 [Standing Committee on Justice and Human Rights]

Hon. Anne McLellan (Minister of Justice and Attorney General of Canada, Lib.

… Bill C-24 also adds new legislative provisions of particular value and effectiveness in targeting organized crime. The first set of proposals will amend the proceeds of crime provisions in the Criminal Code. Parliament adopted proceeds of crime legislation in 1988 that referred to the term “enterprise crime” and included some 20 offences identified as falling within the ambit of that term. Under Bill C-24, all indictable offences except those that will be excluded by regulation will be the subject of proceeds of crime provisions.

As we all know, organized crime operates internationally. A number of recent international instruments and conventions contain provisions regarding countries being able to give effect to foreign confiscation orders. In fact, Canada has used the enforcement systems in other countries, but it is itself unable to reciprocate. Bill C-24 will allow Canada to cooperate with its partners by facilitating the execution of forfeiture orders issued in foreign jurisdictions.

The Criminal Code contains at the present time a limited regime whereby offence-related property, that is, property that has been used to commit an indictable offence, may be seized or restrained and confiscated. This scheme, however, is limited to property used in relation to the commission of criminal organization offences. As a result of the limited application of the forfeiture scheme, we have, as in the case of proceeds of crime, two classes of criminals: those whose offence-related property is subject to confiscation, and criminals whose property has been used to commit an offence but cannot be confiscated. Instruments used to commit crime will therefore be targeted more comprehensively if Bill C-24 becomes law.

At the same time, and in order to ensure fairness in the process, a proportionality test has been included such that no forfeiture will occur if the forfeiture of the property in question is disproportionate to the nature and gravity of the offence and the circumstances surrounding its commission. A further protection is made available in respect of possible forfeiture involving dwelling houses in that the court will also have to consider the impact of a forfeiture order on the members of the accused's immediate family if that dwelling house is their principal residence.

I have discussed the background to and justification for the various elements of Bill C-24 and I hope that I have at least addressed some of the questions and concerns you may have. Canadians and other stakeholders are eager for us to enact this bill and to move on to the important implementation stage.

I look forward to working together to ensure the speedy passage of this bill.

May 8, 2001 [Standing Committee on Justice and Human Rights]

Hon. Lawrence MacAulay (Solicitor General of Canada)

…The bill would also expand the seizure and forfeiture of proceeds of crime. As it stands, the courts can take away proceeds of crimes such as drug traffic, murder, and fraud. Soon they will be able to take away the unlawful proceeds of most indictable offences.

These changes will make our 13 proceeds of crime units established in 1997 even more effective. These units, which combine the resources of the RCMP and those of other police and government agencies, were created to target organized crime groups and seize their criminal profits.

To date, over $100 million in criminal assets has been forfeited and fines imposed. More than $180 million in assets has been seized and is subject to court proceedings and possible forfeiture. The proposals in Bill C-24 will also complement our efforts and legislation against money laundering…

May 8, 2001 [Standing Committee on Justice and Human Rights][Entire Exchange]

Mr. Lynn Myers (Waterloo—Wellington, Lib.): Thank you very much, Mr. Chairman. I have three quick questions.

First of all, I want to thank the ministers for being here today. More to the point, in speaking to a number of people and Canadians across the country, I know they support the fact that Bill C-24 has been brought forward. They believe it is in fact appropriate given the circumstances and, more to the point, the problems associated with organized crime.

Minister MacAulay, I want to pick up on what was being said previously with respect to clause 2 and proposed sections 25.1, 25.2, 25.3, and 25.4, that being that you as a competent authority make the designations based on advice from police officers and senior officials.

When I first read the white paper of June 2000, I was a little concerned about that section. The white paper seemed to imply that there was going to be greater interference on behalf of the ministers. When I see the legislation as it is drafted now, it gives me greater comfort, because it seems to me that it's more arm's-length. I think that's precisely what police officers and people in the field wanted to see, based on their experience. I wonder how that transition took place, from what the white paper seemed to imply, to what is in the legislation as it has been drafted and which seems to me to be more reasonable.

Mr. Lawrence MacAulay: What do you want me to do, Lynn? Do you want me to explain where we are now, or the consultations—

Mr. Lynn Myers: No, I think I understand where you are now. I wondered what took place between the white paper and the legislation. The white paper seemed to be more involved. In other words, you would have been more involved on a day-to-day basis. That's my reading of it, anyway. I think it's a good transition.

Mr. Lawrence MacAulay: It is a very important issue in all countries, I think—and in this one, too—to make sure solicitors general or ministers are not involved in the operational areas of the police forces in the country.

Needless to say, the Minister of Justice and I had discussions with a lot of different groups in this country, including a lot of different police forces and organizations, as I indicated. They certainly also were.... How we arrived where we did arrive was with a lot of assistance from this committee and from police organizations across the country. That is, in fact, how we got to where we are.

As I said, when I sat down—and it is certainly a very interesting experience to sit down with undercover agents who are, without a doubt, risking their lives in order to make sure we have a safer society in this country—they explained to me exactly what they needed, why it has to be them, and why it has to happen so quickly sometimes. Of course, there has to be accountability, but there are times when a police officer who is operating undercover has to do something fairly quickly, and he has to be able to do that without going back and getting a whole lot of papers signed. The big thing is to make sure they are able to operate in an effective manner in order to infiltrate these organizations.

It is more than organized crime. The example, Lynn, too, is that if you're investigating a murder and someone needs to do undercover work in order to obtain information that the police feel would convict somebody, I would not know about that. All I would know is that these people are designated, but I should not know about the specific case. What they have to be able to do is have the authority to send these people in and be able to collect the evidence in order to convict the person. That's why it's not just specifically organized crime. If it's murder or other things, they have to collect the evidence for that.

Mr. Lynn Myers: I applaud your ability to hear that message, because it seemed to me the message in the white paper was that we don't trust police to be able to do the job. What you're now saying, though, in effect, is that you do trust the police to do their work, and I applaud that.

Mr. Lawrence MacAulay: Not only do we trust the police, Lynn, the people of this nation trust the police in this country, which is very important.

Mr. Lynn Myers: When I was the head of the Waterloo Regional Police Service—700 police officers in a population of about 450,000 people—one of the things I saw, not on a daily basis but certainly from time to time, was the lack of coordination that exists between some of the policing authorities—in other words, provincial police, the RCMP, and local regional police. I'm glad to see that's being addressed, but I'm wondering if you could elaborate a little bit more about the kinds of efforts you're putting into this matter, because it seems to me that until and unless we get the full cooperation of policing services across the country, it's something to strive for, it's something important, and it's something that's required. I'd like to hear what you have in mind in terms of making sure that is a constant and a given.

Mr. Lawrence MacAulay: Well, Lynn, yes, last September the Minister of Justice and I had a meeting in Iqaluit with provincial and municipal counterparts. We announced a national agenda to combat organized crime.

What we're trying to do is make sure we have much more of a coordinated effort on research, and enforcement, and as Anne indicated, in legislation. In fact, that's how you reach a general consensus as to what the best approach is to use in legislation like this. If you involve all the players, you're going to have better cooperation.

That's what's taking place with this piece of legislation—making sure we involve as many people as we can. That's why the meeting last September, the meetings previous, and hopefully the meetings down the road are so important to make sure you have a coordinated effort in order to fight organized crime.

The problem is you can duplicate services, you can duplicate actions, and with that you waste funds—much needed funds—in order to fight the enemy, which is organized crime. I certainly believe we're on the proper track, but there's always need for changes.

The Chair: Thank you very much.

Mr. Cadman, three minutes.

Mr. Chuck Cadman: Mr. Chair, I think we all recognize the international scope of organized crime. We can't do it all by ourselves.

I was just wondering if you could elaborate to an extent on what degree you've involved your colleagues in Immigration and Foreign Affairs in this.

Ms. Anne McLellan: You're right, to effectively fight organized crime, you not only have to have an effective domestic strategy, but you have to be working with your international partners, since organized crime, because of technology primarily, knows no borders—especially if you're looking at crimes like money laundering, since because of technology you can move money around from country to country quickly and fairly secretly.

We—my colleague the Solicitor General and I—obviously understand that if we are going to have an integrated approach to organized crime, we not only have to work with the provinces and the territories, local, provincial, and federal police forces, but you also have to work with colleagues such as the minister for national revenue, who is responsible for customs and is on the front lines of our anti-smuggling initiatives. We also have to work with the minister for immigration, because tragically, one of the new profit centres for organized criminal associations is human-smuggling.

Internationally, we discussed this in Milan a few months ago, there is this whole developing area of what we would describe as effectively a slave trade in which women and children, primarily female children, are sold into sexual slavery and other forms of slavery and brought across borders illegally and unknown to law enforcement authorities.

We're very aware of the kinds of problems that are emerging and the new profit centres, tragically, for organized crime, and we all have to work together. In fact, we and our officials.... Everything you see today is the result of interdepartmental meetings and discussions that involved our colleagues in key departments like national revenue and immigration, because they have important pieces of this and we all have to be working together.

Mr. Stephen Owen (Vancouver Quadra, Lib.) Thank you, Mr. Chair, Ministers.

I have two observations that each minister may want to comment on. One is with respect to the ports police. We've heard many comments over the last few years about the elimination of the ports police. I'd like to reflect on our experience in Vancouver and wonder, perhaps to the Solicitor General, whether this is something that's common across the country. Not to exaggerate the situation, but the ports police in Vancouver were spectacularly unsuccessful in identifying and investigating cases of smuggling through the port. At the request of the Vancouver city police, working in cooperation with the RCMP, the decision to eliminate the ports police was supported. Funds were given over to the coordinated, concentrated, and much more effective, it turns out, operation of RCMP and city police, to have extra resources to take over that role.

Is this something that has happened across the country as well? Because we continue to hear concern about the elimination of ports police, as if this is somehow a reduction in the effectiveness and the resources going to this investigation of crime.

The second observation is with respect to the increasing complexity of police investigations and prosecutions. Particularly with respect to organized crime and around such things as disclosure rules, proceeds of crime rules, now extra definitional rules, search and seizure, and wiretap evidence, it's increasingly important that lawyers be involved to give advice to the police at earlier and earlier stages if we're going to have successful prosecutions. And yet in this country, distinct from the United States, we have a tradition of recognizing the different roles of police investigation and crown counsel prosecuting crime.

I wonder if the Minister of Justice might have some comments on how we're going to respect that distinction in role while police and prosecutors become more entwined at an earlier and earlier stage.

Mr. Lawrence MacAulay: Thank you, Mr. Owen. The fact of the matter is, the RCMP and Canada Customs, as you indicated, are both very active in this area of watching the drug flow and making sure that the RCMP fulfils its mandate in that area.

There was some concern previously, and of course that's why changes are made. Changes are made in order to improve, to make sure the funding allocated, no matter who gets it—all the dollars are ours, nationally—is spent as effectively as possible. With the cooperation we've had with the RCMP and Canada Customs, and with the municipal police, it is, in fact, more effective.

Ms. Anne McLellan: In relation to your second point, Stephen, I'm going to let Yvan tell you about some of the things we are doing, and perhaps some of the changes we've made to better integrate, at least in certain ways, advice from lawyers working in and around proceeds of crime issues in terms of their advice to police.

I'll turn it over to Yvan.

The Chair: Try to be brief. We have a couple more and only two minutes left.

Mr. Yvan Roy: I'll try, thank you, Mr. Chairman.

You have those integrated proceeds of crime units, 13 of them in the whole country, where lawyers working for the Department of Justice are involved. However, in order to protect the need for crown prosecutors to be independent, they do not make the determination as to whether charges should be laid or not. They give advice as part of the investigation but they don't make the final determination as to whether we're going to court with these cases, for the very reason you give—that is, trying to keep the balance between giving advice on the one hand, and on the other, making the decision at the end of the day that a case should go to court.

May 8, 2001[Standing Committee on Justice and Human Rights][Entire Exchange]

Mr. Dave Douglas (Chief Officer, Organized Crime Agency of British Columbia): Thank you, Mr. Chairman.

It's a joint presentation this afternoon. I'm going to make some opening remarks concerning the organized crime situation in British Columbia. Then Inspector Ryan from our proceeds of crime unit is going to talk specifically about Bill C-24. His speaking notes are available to this committee, and a copy has been given to the clerk.

In British Columbia, it's safe to say, the face of organized crime has changed a great deal in the past five years. British Columbia, like the rest of the country and the law enforcement agencies around this country, faces unprecedented challenges.

Globalization is a factor. When we look at the map of the world, we see borders, but when organized crime looks at that same map, they see no borders, no jurisdictional boundaries, just a seamless capability for criminal activity. This has created a tremendous international movement of criminals and related commodities, especially in British Columbia, where the geography of organized crime kicks in with seaports, airports, extended border and coastline.

We're faced with the challenges of what we call the fusion of these criminal groups. Organized crime groups now are run like corporations, because they see the benefits of cooperation. They've developed non-traditional alliances, and the turf wars of the past that caused internal disruption are gone. They're now pooling their resources for a common criminal purpose. These groups have become very entrepreneurial and are involved in multi-commodity criminal activity, which crosses over traditional law enforcement stovepipes, such as drugs, customs, and immigration.

• 1535

We're faced with the challenges of the new technological age. The technology that fuels legitimate activity also fuels criminal enterprise. A wide variety of transnational organized crime groups are heavily involved in cyber-crime. Russian organized crime recently attempted a cyber break-in of Citibank in an effort to steal $10 million, and we see traditional Italian organized crime moving toward online Internet gambling. They see it as an emerging trend. They've done the risk assessment, and it involves less risk than drug trafficking.

We're faced with the challenge that our police cellphones and pagers are monitored and intercepted by scanners and computers. The Hell's Angels are using the Internet to send encrypted messages between chapters. Proceeds of crime are used to finance legitimate companies, which creates unfair competition. In the Haney chapter of the Hell's Angels you'll find 32 legitimate online trading businesses.

So what does this mean for us in law enforcement? In B.C. all of our investigations go international immediately.

We are now faced with the aspect of Asian organized crime, which is laundering in excess of $1 million a day in British Columbia. The moneys are being sent offshore to be reinvested in real estate and businesses in China and Vietnam. These businesses are sold off, and the money is reinvested into illegitimate and legitimate businesses here in Canada.

The solution to organized crime, as I've said before, lies in the political will, funding, and police leadership. From my perspective I've seen that political will evolve over the last year or so. With police leadership we are beginning to mirror organized crime, developing local, national, and international partnerships; allocating our scarce human, fiscal, and material resources to our priorities; pooling our expertise; utilizing geography and technology to our own advantage; and being innovative in the process.

In the area of funding, I think the government has to be innovative. The government has to recognize the contribution of other provincial police agencies in this country besides the RCMP. The Organized Crime Agency of British Columbia, like other provincial police agencies, has a mandate to fight organized crime nationally and internationally.

In reality police agencies such as ourselves can only expend approximately 8% to 10% of our existing police budgets on actual front-line policing projects to address the organized crime situation in Canada. We need a mechanism whereby we can come to the federal government to obtain funding for specific projects that have a national interest, such as the Hell's Angels or Asian organized crime. Right now that mechanism is not in place. I'm certainly not afraid of reaching any benchmark of accountability that would be placed on such funding.

With our current operational model, I'm confident that we will succeed in having the necessary impact on organized crime.

Inspector Mike Ryan (Proceeds of Crime Division, Organized Crime Agency of British Columbia): Thank you, Mr. Chairman.

I'll be reading from a prepared text, which Chief Douglas indicated had been handed out earlier. British Columbia has always placed a priority on attacking the financial basis of organized crime and offences committed to benefit criminal organizations. That must continue to be a priority in order to effectively stop criminal activity. To accomplish this it is paramount that some of the provisions of Bill C-95 be retained and expanded, specifically matters that relate to restraining and forfeiting proceeds of crime. Also, those provisions that extend part VI, wiretap authorizations and access to income tax information in relation to criminal organizations, must continue in order to ensure that the police have the necessary means to investigate organized crime.

Bill C-24 may, however, fall short in its effect on organized crime at an international level. Where a group of three or more persons—and persons in the Criminal Code may be real or corporate persons—has as one of its main purposes or activities the facilitation of one or more serious offences, presumably some or even all of those three persons may be located outside of Canada. While the most visible aspect of organized crime is often the acts of violence and drug abuse on the streets of Canadian towns and cities, those events are often caused by competition between rival groups regarding international distribution systems. The true power base and decision-making process are often in another jurisdiction. This legislation must include some consideration of the international aspects of organized crime in order to be effective.

Precedents for this suggestion can be found at part XII.2 of the Criminal Code, section 462.31, which covers acts or omissions that occur anywhere in regard to money laundering if those acts or omissions constitute an enterprise, crime, or designated offence in Canada. Also, at part IX, section 354, where acts or omissions respecting the possession of the proceeds of crime occur anywhere, if they had occurred in Canada, it would constitute an offence. These two offences were constituted to recognize the fluidity of criminally derived wealth, which flows easily through international boundaries.

Criminal organizations are similarly fluid, as their members' acts of facilitation and material benefits recognize no boundaries. Consider what might occur where frauds, stock market manipulations, or weapons trafficking are committed by an organized crime group that structures itself so that one of the requisite three components is not located in Canada. In order to advance prosecutions with regard to money laundering and the possession of the proceeds of crime, it is necessary to prove the substantive offence from which the criminal benefit was derived. If the offence of participation in a criminal organization cannot be established due to international structuring, it may be impossible to attack the proceeds of crime derived from that activity.

Also, Bill C-24 states that the substantive offences must be indictable offences of five years or more or any other offence set out in the schedule. It was an anomalous situation that gambling, prostitution, and some other signature offences of organized crime were not caught by Bill C-95. All indictable offences should be included so as to make the application fully comprehensive and thus allow police and prosecutors to move forward with organized crime.

By listing offences we can expect to encounter the problem that certain offences will not be part of the legislative scheme when they are needed to counter organized crime. Advances in communication technology will create new methods of committing all profit-generating crimes, some of which have been and others that have not been heretofore utilized by organized crime groups.

All crimes related to the financial industry and the developing world of e-commerce must be considered under the umbrella of this legislation. For example, we are predicting that Internet gambling will become extremely significant to organized crime and money laundering. Yet Bill C-95 did not capture that offence as it was not punishable by imprisonment of five years or more.

The most important question surrounding Bill C-24 is whether the elements of the offence can be proven in court. While some maintain that the elements of the existing criminal organization offence are extremely difficult to prove without a confession, adequate intercepted communication, or gang member turned witness, the significant issue presented by this legislation is whether it will be seen as charter consistent.

What is of particular concern is whether proposed subsections 467.1(1) and 467.1(3) will survive, given that there is no requirement to demonstrate that the accused was a party to the offence. These provisions are reminiscent of the murder felony rule that was struck down as not having the required level of intent. The structure of this amendment breaks new ground on the required mental and physical elements and sets undefined points of intent.

The expansion of the definition of offence-related property beyond that which has been found in the Controlled Drugs and Substances Act and what has been introduced in the Criminal Code by Bill C-95 will be an extremely significant benefit to law enforcement. The seizure and forfeiture of the instrumentalities from a broader range of offences will serve to have an immediate deterrent financial impact as well as a punitive impact.

Similarly, the expansion of the definition of those offences from which the proceeds of crime can be seized and forfeited will also be a significant benefit. This could correct the situation where police investigate organized crime groups that specialize in the lucrative manufacture of counterfeit credit cards contrary to section 342 but cannot restrain or seize the proceeds of crime arising from that offence as it is not currently defined as an enterprise crime offence.

Also, there is a need to broaden access to income tax information to all designated offences, as that access is not overly intrusive and is now available only in drug and criminal organization investigations.

The initiatives to deal with intimidation are also seen to be of significant value. However, again, where the offence is applicable only to criminal justice participants, the protection should be conceptually expanded to include all vulnerable persons. It may be possible to develop no-go zones or bubble zones akin to the peace bond provisions of the Criminal Code.

What is clear is that it will become incumbent upon law enforcement to demonstrate the threat posed by organized crime. While this is an extremely difficult task, given the secretive nature of organized crime, there must be constant liaison between front-line investigators, prosecutors, and those in government who formulate criminal law policy to ensure that police have modern, charter-consistent legislation to take on criminal organizations in their totality.

We must remember that criminal organizations do not operate in watertight compartments of drugs-only or Criminal Code-only offences. Criminal organizations engage in offences under a range of federal and provincial statutes.

At the Organized Crime Agency of British Columbia, we have designed our enforcement approach to combat this problem from this perspective. Therefore, it is necessary that we also approach the prosecutional function from this perspective as well. There must be serious consideration given to the formation of joint federal-provincial prosecutional units to effectively marshal all resources against organized crime.

Thank you.

The Chair: Thank you very much.

And now we turn to the Canadian Police Association and le Fédération des policiers du Québec.

Mr. Mike Niebudek (President, Ontario Association of Mounted Police; Vice-President, Canadian Police Association): Thank you, Mr. Chair.

My name is Mike Niebudek. As you mentioned, I am vice-president of the Canadian Police Association. With me today is Mr. Yves Prud'homme, who is also a member of our association and also the president of the Fédération des policiers et policières municipaux du Québec. Mr. Prud'homme will address some issues after my presentation.

Organized crime effects all Canadians. It undermines our economy, reduces our security, and threatens the integrity of our political institutions. In the Province of Quebec, where organized crime gangs have battled for territory, 150 murders have occurred over the past decades, including the murders of two prison guards and several other innocent bystanders.

The Canadian Police Association recently surveyed front-line police officers—investigators responsible for organized crime investigations in their jurisdictions. More than 50 investigators from coast to coast have responded. There is virtually agreement among these investigators that Canadian police agencies are presently ineffective in controlling organized crime in Canada.

The Canadian judiciary has not utilized existing legislation and available remedies to deal effectively with convicted criminals. Bill C-95 has not provided sufficient legislative support to fight organized crime.

Existing immigration laws and enforcement are not sufficient to deal with criminals originating form outside Canada. Police services do not have adequate funds for organized crime investigations. Greater priority needs to be placed on training and technology. Issues concerning territory, resources, and sharing of information continue to arise between agencies.

Making participation in a criminal organization a crime—it is ironic that those who choose to flagrantly live outside the laws of Canada are the first to seek refuge and protection from those very same laws when confronted with prosecution. Availing themselves of the best legal defence money can purchase, sophisticated criminals will challenge complex legal issues and strict technical compliance of changing rules of law enforcement.

We are pleased by the response contained in Bill C-24, which provides, first, escalating measures for various degrees of involvement with criminal organizations; secondly, a simplified definition of criminal organizations to address existing concerns; and thirdly, consecutive sentencing and increased parole ineligibility for people involved in organized crime.

Rehabilitation is ineffective in dealing with people who have made a lucrative living profiting on their illicit activities. Our sentencing and release practices should in fact focus on tougher measures to deter participation, provide meaningful consequences for criminal activities, and encourage participation with law enforcement by providing evidence against others within their organizations.

Our second point is on protecting people in the justice system from intimidation. The Canadian Police Association has called for greater protection for witnesses, victims, jury members, officials, police officers, and informants who are targeted by organized criminals to defeat the course of justice. With the growth of organized crime in our communities, we are seeing much bolder and aggressive acts by criminals against those who stand in their paths. Police officers, jail guards, judges, members of Parliament, prosecutors, and members of the media have been subjects of threats, intimidation, and violence. We support the proposals to strengthen the offences that deal with these types of conduct. We must be supported, however, with vigorous prosecution and tough sentencing practices to instil meaningful consequences on the abhorrent acts.

An investigator assigned to the proceeds-of-crime unit to address the proceeds-of-crime amendments involved in this legislation has told the Canadian Police Association that finding cases for proceeds-of-crime investigations was like “shooting fish in a barrel”. His ability to conduct investigations was limited, however, by legislative demands and resources.

• 1550

The proposals contained within Bill C-24 expand the scope of enterprise crimes for asset seizure and for exporting orders and broaden the application to any property used in the commission of a crime. These amendments address a number of shortcomings of the existing law, and we support the proposals.

[Translation]

Fourthly, law enforcement officers must be protected. On April 22, 1999 the Supreme Court of Canada, in the decision of R. vs Campbell and Shirose, ruled that the principle of Crown immunity does not cover the actions of a police officer who violates the statute, notwithstanding that those actions were taken to further a bona fide criminal investigation.

A broader base of exemptions for police officers involved in criminal investigations is required to ensure effective enforcement and adequate protection for police officers from criminal liability.

The Canadian Police Association has passed resolutions at our 1999 and 2000 annual general meetings, calling upon the Solicitor General of Canada and the Minister of Justice to introduce a statutory exemption regime that would permit effective enforcement and afford sufficient protection from liability for police officers engaged in all types of criminal investigations.

We have one issue of concern, however, with the concept of limiting immunity from certain acts. We submit that a test of reasonableness would, in any event, prevent the granting of immunity from acts such as recklessly causing death or bodily harm, sexual offences, or obstructing the course of justice.

By prescribing these limitations within law, however, we are essentially flagging for sophisticated criminals the types of crimes that will be demanded of their subject in order to establish loyalty and preclude infiltration. This may in fact cause greater harm than good, and we have expressed reservations about this approach.

In conclusion, Mr. Chairman, we are pleased to convey our support for this legislative package. There remain, however, issues that still need to be addressed and we would like to enumerate several of these for your information.

Colleagues have told us that some investigations have reportedly been abandoned due to the high cost of maintaining wiretaps, including the cost of monitoring, translation and transcription. Others fail to get off the ground.

For example, we need to streamline the criteria for obtaining warrants and electronic surveillance orders for organized crime offences.

Disclosure requirements place onerous obligations on the Crown and law enforcement to copy all documentation and materials, including sensitive witness or victim information, with little regard for cost or efficiency. Efforts to use electronic means for transfer, such as CD-ROM disclosure packages, have generally been rebuked by the defense bar and judiciary.

There is a desperate need to strengthen our correctional system to restrict the illegal activities of organized criminals within our correctional institutions.

We must provide greater funding, technology and protection to our borders to prevent the smuggling of illegal contraband, including people, drugs, child pornography and firearms.

Sophisticated organized crime groups are exploiting technology, yet police services struggle to adopt new and emergent technologies and methods.

Ultimately, the federal government has to invest sufficient resources to provide ongoing support for a comprehensive multi- jurisdictional inter-agency approach.

I will skip some of my notes in order to allow my colleague from the Quebec Federation of Police Officers to elaborate on these points.

The Canadian Police Association advocates the development and implementation of a strategic national response to organized crime, providing greater priority, funding, support and coordination for local, provincial and federal police jurisdictions.

In closing, we appreciate the attention that the Minister of Justice, the Solicitor General of Canada, their officials, and the members of this committee have dedicated to this effort, and we are pleased to convey our appreciation and support.

• 1555

The Canadian Police Association remains committed to working with the members of this committee, the government of Canada, and other stakeholders, to address this significant public safety concern.

Thank you. I will now give the floor to Mr. Yves Prud'homme, President of the Federation of Quebec Municipal Police.

The Chair: Thank you.

Mr. Yves Prud'homme (President, Fédération des policiers et policières municipaux du Québec, Canadian Police Association): Mr. Chairman, members of the committee, ladies and gentlemen, honourable members, I would like to thank you all for having allowed us to meet with you in order that we as well as the representatives of the Canadian Police Association present our comments on Bill C-24.

I would briefly remind you that the Federation of Quebec Municipal Police is an organization representing 120 union associations and over 8,800 municipal police officers throughout Quebec, including, obviously, the Fraternity of Police Officers of the Montreal Urban Community,

As you are no doubt aware, the increasing phenomenon of organized crime in Quebec, specially biker gangs, has led different police organizations to ask the legislator for antigang legislation in order to counter this specific type of crime.

In 1993, as President of the Montreal Urban Community Police Department Fraternity, I denounced the absence of legislative means and resources, both financial and human, and requested that the various governments support their police officers in the fight against this scourge. The government answered our concerns in part, but the complexity of Bill C-95, adopted in 1997, made our jobs just about impossible.

Today, we would like to congratulate the Minister of Justice, the Honourable Anne McLellan, for Bill C-24, which in a certain sense corrects what was lacking with the previous bill. We all agree that these criminal biker gangs are, in every aspect, gangs of individuals without scruples who do not hesitate to commit crimes, each and every one heinous, sometimes and even often leading to the death of innocent victims. These exceptional types of crimes require, in our opinion equally exceptional means to put an end to these acts of extreme violence.

We feel that Bill C-24 does not go far enough sending a clear and equivocal message to those working in this milieu.

Aside from the measures contained in Bill C-24, we feel that the government should envisage harsher deterrents, such as reverse onus, which would mean that the accused would have to demonstrate that they are not guilty of the offenses with which they are charged and the Crown would have to demonstrate that the charges laid and offenses committed are related to organized crime. This reversal of the onus should also apply to the proceeds of crime and specifically to the profits of organized crime and goods seized. Therefore, it would be up to the people affected by this measure to demonstrate that their goods do not come from the proceeds of crime.

As to access to parole, we feel that the proposed changes are insufficient. In our opinion, legislation should deny access to parole for those individuals who are found guilty of organized crime related offenses.

As to the resources required to efficiently combat these very wealthy criminal organizations, they are clearly deficient. On April 20th, we sent the Right Honourable Jean Chrétien, Prime Minister of Canada, a letter indicating how disappointed we were as to the sums allocated to fight this type of crime.

In fact, no new money has been added to the budget of municipal police organizations who participate in joint task forces with our police provincial and federal police brothers and sisters. Without the funding, it is impossible to increase the number of police officers and, by the same token, efficiently fight this type of crime.

To sum up, Mr. Chair, we support many of the amendments put forward by the minister, but we are seeking a more hardline approach in the hope that one day our zero tolerance policy will be an effective deterrent on organized crime.

Thank you for your attention.

The Chair: Thank you.

[English]

Finally, the Canadian Bar Association.

• 1600

Ms. Joan Bercovich (Senior Director, Legal and Governmental Affairs, Canadian Bar Association): On behalf of the Canadian Bar Association, thank you for the opportunity to appear before you today.

As many of you know, or all of you know, the Canadian Bar Association is an association of over 37,000 lawyers across the country, and our national criminal justice section represents both crown prosecutors and defence attorneys from across the country. Our submission will be presented by Greg DelBigio today. Mr. DelBigio is an active member of our section and has appeared before this committee and others on various criminal justice matters over several years. He will present the submission and will be happy to take any questions that you might have.

Thank you.

Mr. Greg DelBigio (Member, National Criminal Justice Section, Canadian Bar Association): Thank you. I am pleased to be here. I want to thank you for the opportunity. I am pleased to be making a presentation at the same time as these police groups.

This bill is of enormous significance. We received two days' notice of this hearing, so my submissions today are not going to be complete, but silence or a failure on my part to address some points should not be interpreted as acknowledgement by the CBA or an endorsement of the provisions that I do not speak to.

The themes I'm going to speak to today are whether there's a demonstrated need for a significant change to law. Is there evidence of necessity? Is the bill an appropriately measured response to needs that exist? Once again, the CBA takes the position that some of the proposed changes are very significant; they fundamentally alter some provisions of law as they now exist.

I listened to the police groups speak and to their submissions, and I hear frustration. There's no doubt that policing is a difficult task. I have no doubt that funding would improve their opportunities to attain the objectives that they work to do. I hear them speak of proceeds of crime, and it might be that responding to proceeds of crime and money laundering is an effective way to attack organized crime. But the bill goes far beyond that.

The concern that the Canadian Bar Association has is the maintenance of the rule of law. The Supreme Court of Canada said that it is a deeply ingrained value in our democratic system that ends do not justify means. Frustration with the current ability to enforce law in an effective way must not give way to responses that are not measured and that are not necessary. If there is treachery in the criminal element, it does not follow that the police must be allowed to be equally treacherous. Such reasoning tears at the fabric of our democracy. Such reasoning undermines our rule of law. It is imperative above all that the rule of law be maintained.

The CBA takes the position that the evolution of law must be slow and measured, and it's only then that it's possible to determine the efficacy of any change that might be brought about—whether a change will enhance the ability of the police forces to obtain their objectives, or whether the change will operate in a way that is undesirable. Slow change is needed for that reason. Historically, the law has evolved in slow and measured ways. But this bill departs from that. Rapid change in law may disrupt the law in ways that cannot be predicted….

Mr. Dave Douglas: I'd like to make a brief comment on the number of Bill C-95 investigations that we have ongoing in British Columbia. The difficulty with that legislation and putting it into an effective enforcement model is sheer dollars. It costs anywhere from $1.25 million to $1.5 million to investigate one colour-bearing member of the Hells Angels. These groups have formed themselves into a cellular structure. They're difficult to infiltrate. Once you get in there, it's costly to continue that investigation. It takes a long time.

In Edmonton recently—it's an ongoing case right now, the first test of the new anti-gang law—there are 33 accused, plus two corporations, on charges of conspiracy, money laundering, and drug trafficking. The trial should last six months. The crown's case involves 70,000 pages of documents, 450 tapes containing 4,300 conversations, and the jury will be required to bring in more than 200 verdicts. So this is a huge project, never mind for the police, for the judiciary too.

I think it boils down to, first, the ability of the police to investigate criminal organizations via Bill C-95, and that comes back to the leadership issue, where we're focusing and allocating our resources to our hard priorities and our hard targets. Furthermore, down the road, it involves the ability of the judiciary to handle the sheer volume of that kind of testimony.

May 8, 2001 [Standing Committee on Justice and Human Rights][Entire Exchange]

Mr. Dave Douglas: Within the agency we have a ports component, which is a joint force operation with the RCMP, ourselves, Canada Customs, the ports corporations, and it's a component within the agency that strategically targets those kinds of organized crime groups around the ports. The Hell's Angels, I believe, have 37 members on the longshoremen's union there.

We've been very successful in the past three or four months in making numerous seizures at the port of Vancouver, both in the container port and other ports over on Vancouver Island. And we're successful at it because we strategically target key groups for enforcement. I think the sheer volume of container traffic there is somewhere in the neighbourhood of 1.5 million containers a year. So trying to detect it in any other way is almost impossible, unless by sheer luck.

• 1655

But as I said before, by strategically targeting for enforcement those key groups who use the port of entry, we've been very successful in the last few months with seizures of tonnes of marijuana in containers, alien smuggling, and 2.5 tonnes of cocaine that were seized just off the coast of Vancouver Island. We've been very successful.

Mr. Chuck Cadman: As a percentage, how much are you actually nailing?

Mr. Dave Douglas: I'll give you a good example of this. Through the intelligence that was gained in the investigation of a recent case that involved 200 kilograms of heroin in a container that was seized, the day these people were arrested—and this is a three-year investigation that cost $7 million—there was another seizure taken in the Toronto area.

They were talking about holding back on distributing the 200 kilos of heroin so the price would be driven up in Canada and they'd make more money at it. Meanwhile, back at the ranch, because they're figuring they're going to make more money at this, they're ordering another container. In the end, we found they had already brought in 17 containers in the past year that we didn't know about. So what are we getting? It's hard to say. There are huge amounts of narcotics coming in through that port.

The Chair: Thank you very much.

Ms. Sgro.

Ms. Judy Sgro (York West, Lib.): In regard to the proceeds of crime that we talk about a lot, are you seeing any of the benefits down at your local level? This is, in particular, to the fellow from British Columbia who talked about it.

Insp Mike Ryan: Under the Seized Property Management Act and the regulations, any investigations that are prosecuted federally within British Columbia see those forfeited proceeds accruing to the federal government.

We raised this issue with the province in approximately 1997, and I'm aware that the province has written on the matter. At this point in time, the last information I had was that British Columbia does not feel that it's receiving its fair share of distribution from the federally seized proceeds-of-crime program.

Mr. Dave Douglas: I would make one comment on it. In every investigation or project that we build and the major case model that we use to start up our projects, we build in a proceeds-of-crime component. The only way to disrupt and suppress organized crime is to go after the assets. The deterrent just isn't there, so the only way to do it is to seize the assets.

In the last year we have seized in excess of our own budget in cash. We've paid for ourselves in the last year just on sheer money seizures. As I said in my opening remarks, we're faced with, from just one Asian group, Big Circle Boys, $1 million a day being laundered out of British Columbia.

I would say marijuana cultivation is huge. It has to be the number-three export of British Columbia right now.

We're making an impact, but we can get better at it, and we are getting better at it by focusing on key people for enforcement.

I'll give you an example. We target a group, and the coordinated enforcement plan involves two red dots in the middle of this cell. We use the intelligence gained through part VI intercepts to go in and take out those two people with significant money. Within two weeks, there were $2.3 million seized from that one group alone, along with the fact that the seizure of marijuana was in the millions, the product ready to go south. There's a huge market south of the border.

The Chair: Thank you very much.

May 8, 2001 [Standing Committee on Justice and Human Rights][Entire Exchange]

Mr. Peter MacKay: Thank you, Mr. Chair.

I'm wondering, from both police and Bar Association perspectives, given some of the concerns that are going to result from the inevitable charter challenges, if it would warrant exploring having this referred to the Supreme Court for a reference, to avoid the inevitable expense and distraction from the real fight against organized crime that is going to result in the prosecutors, in my view, carrying the dual purpose of prosecuting the case and, essentially, preparing the case for the federal government to fight in the Supreme Court of Canada, which is where it will ultimately be resolved. So wouldn't we really be well advised to get this done at the first instance, have the aspects, particularly, of suspension of the normal guidelines that would attach to police behaviour referred to the Supreme Court, and proceed with other elements of this legislation that we can all see the common good in?

Mr. Mike Niebudek: You're talking about specifically the immunity issue?

Mr. Peter MacKay: The immunity elements of this Bill C-24.

Mr. Mike Niebudek: I suppose the Attorney General of Canada could ask for it. How long would that take, how long a process would it be, could it be fast-tracked in order to address the concerns that...? I think it all comes to the issue of the Shirose and Campbell decision, as far as their recommendation is concerned. The judgment, I believe, did not address the fact that it should specifically be thrown through the judicial system, but I believe it only specified that the legislator needs to address it. So if it's done in a very succinct and quick manner, I don't see any opposition to that avenue.

Insp Mike Ryan: Mr. Chairman, I'd like to point out that there already exists in the Criminal Code and in the CDSA 3 examples of police immunity. Under the CDSA police regulations the police are allowed to traffic in narcotics. That is already within the fabric of Canadian law. The second example is the money laundering legislation, section 462, which allows police officers and police agents to launder money if acting under the direction of a police investigation. The third is possession of the proceeds of crime. So we do have some of those exemptions already in place.

The Shirose and Campbell portion of this legislation does present certain broad parameters for police conduct, but the police conduct that I think, from my experience as a police officer, is most encountered is the spontaneous moment when someone gives you a credit card and tells you to go and buy a stereo, and it's a stolen or counterfeit credit card. There is no time for judicial authority. At the end of the day, the police are accountable for the damage and loss of property. I think the court of public opinion will keep the police accountable for serious breaches of criminal law that this legislation provides for.

Mr. Greg DelBigio: The decision with respect to reference is a difficult tactical decision. Often facts will assist constitutional litigation. At the very least, though, it would be necessary or appropriate that there be full representation by all groups with interest, a full complement of interveners, in this type of litigation, if it should exist. With respect to the three examples of police immunity, I believe, at least in British Columbia, there is right now a challenge ongoing with respect to the CDSA provisions, but it's still at the trial court level, so at a very early stage of test.

May 9, 2001 [Standing Committee on Justice and Human Rights]

Hon. Lawrence MacAulay (Solicitor General of Canada, Lib.)

Thank you, Mr. Chairman. I'm pleased to be here again today to discuss the spending estimates and the priorities of the portfolio of the Solicitor General.

Joining me is the Deputy Solicitor General, Madame Nicole Jauvin; RCMP Commissioner Zaccardelli; the Commissioner of Correctional Service Canada, Ms. Lucie McClung; the acting chair of the National Parole Board, Madame Renée Collette; and the director of CSIS, Mr. Ward Elcock.

As you know, last week I announced the appointment of Mr. Ian Glen as chair of the National Parole Board. He will begin his duties on May 22, and I am sure he will be pleased to meet with members of this committee in the near future. I would like to take this opportunity to thank Madame Collette for her hard work over the past number of months as acting chair of the parole board.

Before we take questions, I would like to update you on what we've done over the past year and how we plan to maintain and improve our country's public safety in the year ahead.

Since my last appearance before this committee, we've taken action on many fronts in a balanced approach to making Canada safer, and we've focused on prevention as much as punishment.

Some of the work includes: tough new money-laundering legislation and the creation of a new Financial Transaction and Reports Analysis Centre of Canada; a new law that makes criminal records of pardoned sex offenders available for background checks, giving further protection to children; proposed legislation to preserve the integrity of our charities by preventing groups with links to terrorists from getting or keeping registered charity status; new resources for police and customs to monitor smuggling activity in the light of tobacco tax increases put in place last month; and responding to the needs of victims, following recommendations by the committee after its review of the Corrections and Conditional Release Act.

But it's in the area of organized crime that we have taken our most aggressive steps. Most of you may recall that the federal, provincial, and territorial ministers responsible for justice unanimously declared organized crime a national priority.

Last September we agreed on a national agenda to combat organized crime. The agenda commits us to cooperate in a number of areas: we created a new process to coordinate policy and priorities, with a committee of deputies reporting to us each year; we agreed to work together to develop laws so that police and prosecutors have the best tools possible to fight organized crime; we agreed to start national data collection on organized crime so that we have a better sense of its impact in communities; and we agreed to support public education and crime prevention, because communities should be active partners in addressing local problems. We have already seen some results.

• 1535

In April, the Minister of Justice and I announced aggressive new measures in proposed amendments to the Criminal Code on organized crime and law enforcement and new funding to fight organized crime. Bill C-24 is the result of wide consultations with provinces and police. As I indicated yesterday, the bill reflects the work of the subcommittee on organized crime and has received the support of our provincial partners and police.

New resources will be used to put the new legislation in place and build on the government's investment in other areas, like the $584 million that the RCMP received in the 2000 budget for organized crime enforcement, improved national police services, and new communication systems.

On the world stage, last December, Canada was one of over 100 countries to sign a first-ever UN Convention on Transnational Organized Crime. The convention included two protocols—one on migrant smuggling, and another on trafficking in women and children—which Canada also signed.

In addition to working with the UN, we also continue our work with G-8 partners who recently reaffirmed a commitment to fight organized crime.

Our relationship with our closest neighbour, the U.S., continues to be strong, and that is most apparent in our law enforcement and intelligence agencies on both sides of the border.

Take, for example, the very successful Canada-U.S. Cross-Border Crime Forum. It brings us together on problems such as smuggling, organized crime, telemarketing fraud, money laundering, missing and abducted children, high-tech crime, and more. This year's forum will be held June 20, here in Ottawa, and when I met with U.S. Attorney General John Ashcroft in March, we discussed how much we were looking forward to chairing this forum together.

The strength of that Canada-U.S. partnership was also clear in the Ressam case. As you know, Ressam was convicted last month in the U.S. for actions related to terrorism. The verdict sent a strong message to terrorists, and it has pointed to a positive, productive partnership between Canada and the U.S. on enforcement and intelligence.

All the initiatives I've mentioned so far show the value and the strength of our partnerships across government and in our communities. Public safety depends on them. The best way to make Canadians safe is by making sure all partners work together, and our national information systems are a good example of what practical and partnerships can produce.

The national DNA data bank is one example of such a partnership. You'll be pleased to know that the data bank has already proven to be the powerful investigative tool we designed it to be. Since it opened last June, there have been 22 matches using DNA to link crime scenes to each other or to convicted offenders. With each passing week, there are even more. Clearly the success of the data bank highlights the importance of investing in the very best technology possible.

The integration of justice information to better serve public safety is something we're actively working on with all our partners. Our investment in the renewal of CPIC, modernizing Canada's national police information system so that it's shared more broadly among criminal justice officials, is another example of new partnerships being forged. Significant progress has been made, and CPIC's most urgent needs, regarding accessibility and service disruptions, have already been addressed.

These initiatives bring partners together so that information from different databases will be shared more quickly, using the full benefit of new technology. For example, we want to be able to share police reports more quickly with prosecutors or transmit court records instantly to correctional officials.

When it comes to keeping track of offenders and sharing that information with police, we're also planning major improvements. Yesterday I announced that Correctional Service Canada and the National Parole Board are beginning an extensive $47-million upgrade on the national offender management system, OMS. Corrections officials use this national electronic system to gather, store, and retrieve files on federal offenders. The new funding will bring OMS technology into the 21st century and ensure that information-sharing on offenders is current, complete, and reliable. The upgrade is very important to the operations of Correctional Service Canada and the National Parole Board, and most importantly, will contribute to the safety of Canadians.

As you know, the federal government has put a high priority on keeping Canada safe, but more than that, it recognizes that feeling safe and secure is a fundamental right for all Canadians.

All the major indicators continue to show that Canada is among the safest countries in the world. The crime rate has declined for the past 10 years. Violent crime is down, and the homicide rate continues to fall. In the past 15 years, we've cut recidivism by more than half.

On that front, the National Parole Board will soon release its mid-year performance report, and I can tell you that the results continue to show that conditional release is a sound investment in public safety. Most offenders on day parole, full parole, or statutory release complete their sentences successfully and do not commit new crimes. But we're always looking for ways to improve the process.

I am pleased to announce today that, beginning in July this year, victims will be able to make verbal presentations at National Parole Board hearings. As you know, until now, victims could submit written statements and attend hearings as observers but were not allowed to speak. That will soon change.

Following on the recommendations of this committee, my department has directly consulted with victims and victim organizations across Canada on how best to put these recommendations in place and improve services to victims of crime. Clearly, victims have asked for a voice in the parole process, and I think it's about time we give them the opportunity to be heard.

It's my duty as Solicitor General to lead Canada's efforts in public safety so that we can continue to feel safe in our neighbourhoods. So while it's clear that we've already delivered some tangible results, we will not stop there.

We'll continue to use the tools we have and keep working to develop new ones. That means we will keep building partnerships at home and abroad, use technology to our advantage, continue our research and policy development, work on new laws and update old ones, and focus on programs that work.

We will listen to the concerns of Canadians and keep them informed on how our leadership in public safety is working for them, and we'll do our best to ensure that Canadians can continue to be proud of how safe this country really is and how their government and communities are working together to keep it that way.

Thank you, Mr. Chairman.

May 10, 2001 [Standing Committee on Justice and Human Rights]

Chief Julian Fantino (Toronto Police Service)

Mr. Chairman, you've done your homework.

First, to the honourable members of the committee, I do wish to express our appreciation for the opportunity to come here and speak about a very significant issue that we're all very concerned about. However, I don't think I need to take up a whole lot of time either with regard to the profound issues about which we speak, issues that clearly go to the very fabric of our Canadian society. This is, of course, that whole business of organized crime and its impact. Your own committee material points to a whole lot of those impacts and the economic crime cost to Canadians, and there's no need to articulate that time and time again.

However, we do have some issues that need to be addressed: the whole business of drug trafficking in our society and the ancillary crime that's associated with that, right down to the community level; the whole business of money laundering, home invasions, extortions, high-tech commercial crime. All of these things are not only the kinds of issues that make the nightly news, if you will, but we have real victims and real citizens who are constantly being victimized because of all of these issues.

I do want to get a perspective, though. I have found over the years that organized crime, in the main, has been glamorized by movies and television. It's become, I think, in the mindset of many people a source of entertainment. And I think in some cases it's almost received respectability. Organized crime is none of these things. Organized crime is the elderly being swindled out of their life savings, immigrants being forced into a life of prostitution, one of the threats to our youth. And of course, we all know about very unfortunate, only too frequent incidents of young people overdosing on drugs and so forth. The bottom line, which we all have to appreciate, is that this is a greed-driven activity. It's mercenary in its nature, it has no conscience, and it's only done for money.

So taking the profit out of organized crime certainly is a very significant tool that needs to be put into the program for maintaining some semblance of safety, security, and quality of life and protecting our nation from the threats posed by the activities of organized crime, which are multifaceted and international in nature—it's global, as we all know.

So I wanted to come here today—and I appreciate the opportunity—to applaud the initiatives that are being proposed in Bill C-24. As you well know, Mr. Chairman, you've been on the forefront with a lot of these things, and we've been at this for a great many years. The issues we have brought forward consistently to you, the policy-makers, have been community-based. I feel that I'm here today, privileged to represent my community, to bring forward community-based issues on behalf of the citizens of the City of Toronto. That is the purpose and intent of my comments, absolutely.

Many of the amendments in Bill C-24 are absolutely critical. But I also wish to state with all candour that, as you would expect, we would hope for more work in this area, to keep the radar screen alive and continue the good work that has now resulted in Bill C-24. It's a work in progress—that's the point I wanted to make, Mr. Chairman.

In order to make significant gains in the war against organized crime, we need even more of the kinds of initiatives contained in this particular bill. I also suggest that some of the provisions contained in Bill C-24 can still be improved, to give us the intended results, which I believe are laudable indeed. For example, Mr. Chairman, members of the committee, the whole area of proceeds of crime is an excellent item. Also, the team investigative prosecution concept that is embodied in the spirit and intent of the legislation, funding to put teams in place at ground zero, if you will, to do this kind of work is very laudable. But it has to go beyond the federal offences to include some of the other offences that are hybrid in nature, but nonetheless not specifically included, as I see it, in the current proposal.

There also is a need, of course, for the federal government and the provinces to work more closely together on some of these issues, especially in the area of prosecutions and the proceeds of crime, the asset forfeiture provisions, etc. We desperately need funding to allow the Department of Justice, the provincial court attorneys, the RCMP, and our municipal and provincial police services to develop a higher effort in this area, to put together what we have termed an all-star team to combat organized crime at a national level.

May 10, 2001 [Standing Committee on Justice and Human Rights]

Chief Jack Ewatski (Winnipeg Police Service): Mr. Chairman, honourable members, thank you very much. It certainly is a pleasure to be here this morning and I thank you for this opportunity.

As the chief of police of one of the major metropolitan areas of this country, I come before the committee today to speak about the most serious threat to public safety in Canada today, that being organized crime.

As a member of the Canadian Association of Chiefs of Police organized crime committee as well as a member of the Criminal Intelligence Service Canada executive board, I can bring forward the fact that organized crime is a national law enforcement priority.

Organized crime is a real and present threat to our society here in Canada as well as to nations around the world. We cannot view organized crime activity in jurisdictional isolation because sophisticated organized crime groups operate in a global economy setting.

The social, financial, and public safety impacts of organized crime are real. The cost in human suffering as a result of activities such as prostitution and drug abuse cannot be measured by dollars alone. The negative impact to our social fabric can be seen by those who have been caught up in the web of deviant lifestyles and dependence resulting from criminal activities and by those whose actions promote a feeling of hopelessness and fear.

When one considers the financial losses associated with organized criminal activities by various criminal acts, not only to individuals but also to our economy in general, it can easily be established that organized crime costs Canadians billions of dollars each year.

Thefts, robberies, drug sales, extortion, and fraudulent acts, to name a few, account for staggering amounts of money and goods that are siphoned from the pockets of honest people, laundered through a network of illegitimate establishments, and put in the hands of those who choose to live outside of society's rules.

Safety, and more importantly, the perception of safety, is negatively affected by criminals, organized or not. It is the fear and intimidation of organized crime that strikes terror into the hearts of Canadians when accounts of violent, ruthless, and senseless acts are reported on.

The feeling of fear can be described as a silent killer of community, health, vibrancy, and spirit.

The Canadian Association of Chiefs of Police understands, as any public safety issue, that organized crime has to be attacked in a multidisciplinary three-pronged approach. Awareness, education, and enforcement are the components of this approach, and strategies must be developed for each one. One of the biggest challenges is ensuring that the Canadian public is aware of the threat that organized crime poses to our country. The heightening of this awareness must be done responsibly to ensure we are not contributing to the feeling of panic, without losing sight that organized crime is real and alive in our country.

Communication strategies must put a face on organized crime to counter the perceptions held by many who believe it only exists in other societies and not in Canada.

We must tackle the problem at the grassroots level with the youth who need to know that organized crime or any criminal lifestyle is not something to aspire to. The glamour of the gangster culture, as expressed in the name of entertainment, is not real. What has to be shown are the real consequences of criminal behaviour, including incarceration and/or a violent early death.

Enforcement needs to be swift, strong, and consistent when criminal activity occurs. Police and all the players in the criminal justice system need the tools to get the job done. We all play a role in this endeavour, and whether it's resources, training, or legislation, these tools must be available to us when needed.

As I said before, organized crime is real in this country. My peers from other jurisdictions can speak with much greater authority about criminal activity in their areas. I can tell this committee that in Manitoba organized crime exists. Motorcycle gangs, culturally based gangs, and enterprising criminals who band together in a non-traditional organized crime model have made their presence known in my province.

Drugs, prostitution, extortion, violent crime, money laundering, and credit card frauds are just some of the activities that have been linked to organized crime groups in Manitoba.

Although the level of sophistication between an international motorcycle gang and a local street gang may differ, they all have one thing in common: they prey on society by various means for their own lawless, selfish purposes, not caring about the damage they do to others.

The proposed legislation contained in Bill C-24 is in my mind a step in the right direction to enhance the capabilities of the criminal justice system to stay ahead of organized crime. These are some of the legislative tools that we as chiefs across this country have been asking for. These tools will be used by our front-line officers to be as effective as possible in dealing with this serious criminal activity.

We must be very clear in the message we want to say to those who believe in a lifestyle of organized crime. The message must come from a united voice of those tasked with public safety. And it must say loudly that Canada is the absolute worst place in the world for organized crime to operate in.

Thank you.

May 10, 2001 [Standing Committee on Justice and Human Rights]

Mr. Irwin Koziebrocki: If Commissioner Zaccardelli says to you, “I need the right to buy stolen goods”, why can't you have a specific provision in the Criminal Code that says the police, in the course of their investigation, can purchase stolen goods?

If Commissioner Zaccardelli says to you, “We need the right to purchase stolen liquor, or the liquor that breaches our customs laws”, give him the right to buy the stolen liquor. If he needs the right to purchase counterfeit money, give him the right to purchase counterfeit money.

Those are things police officers need to do in order to do their investigation. They don't need necessarily to sell drugs. That was the problem in Campbell and Shirose. They decided they weren't going to be purchasers of drugs any more, they were going to be sellers of drugs. The court said “You can't do that, you're not entitled to break the law, no one's above the law”.

You give them a blanket-type circumstance here, where a police officer can go undercover into an organized crime outfit. Let's say they're bikers, for example, and the biker says “Let's go do this robbery". Do you go along as a police officer and take part in that particular robbery? This legislation would allow you to do that. Is that right? I'm not sure that's right.

Take a look at this particular legislation. It says you can do everything short of murder and sexual assault, effectively. The undercover police officer goes into the organization and they want to test his virtue. What do they do? If they're really bad guys, like the police say they are, they're going to ask you to do one of the crimes that are prohibited: "Go out and kill that guy. He's a fink. Prove that you belong. And go out and rape that poor woman over there, because we want you to show your mettle." What do you do when you're an undercover police officer in those circumstances?

That's the problem with this legislation. It's open-ended and it provides for virtue testing of those people who are going undercover in these circumstances. If you want specific immunities that are important for police to do their investigations, there's nothing wrong with that. You can do that. You can say that police can buy stolen goods. They can buy credit cards. They can set up a shop where people who steal things come and sell it to them. They can set up a finance company where the bad guys are going to launder their money.

Ms. Judy Sgro: But with all due respect, you realize how many volumes of documents would be required to continue to put these things in there in terms of what you're allowed to do. Technology changes. They'd have to be coming back every time you turned around to add more things in there.

Mr. Irwin Koziebrocki: That's why you're here. That's why we'll come here.

May 10, 2001 [Standing Committee on Justice and Human Rights] [Entire Exchange]

Mr. Peter MacKay: Thank you, Mr. Chair. I have a couple of quick questions along the lines of the forfeiture aspect.

It seems to me, and it's often repeated, that really the most effective way to combat organized crime is to cut off the flow of cash. I think most Canadians are startled to know that some of these criminal organizations are so far-reaching that they can actually continue to operate even within the prison system. And perhaps the most dangerous situation for a police officer to be in is to be undercover in a federal penitentiary trying to penetrate some of these organizations. From the police perspective, is there more that can be done in that instance to try to ensure that even after the fact these criminal cells are not permitted to continue?

With respect to some of the overall tools available, although Bill C-24 goes a long way if it's passed in its current form with these designations, can we do more to streamline the criteria for things like warrants, electronic wiretaps, this type of thing? It is a common complaint that it takes reams and reams of paper under the existing laws to allow police the judicially authorized interventions they're seeking.

Chief Julian Fantino: You're quite right. I think it was mentioned earlier that we had the tools before to do the job, but over the years those tools have been evaporating very quickly. Applications for warrants, or part VI applications, now go on into thousands of pages in some cases. I don't even know if everybody reads that material, but it seems now that we have to amass it. It's no longer the substance; it's how much paper you collect, the volume of the briefs, that seem to be a benchmark as to whether you make the case or not.

Having said all of that, there is one item that I think should be considered in the proposed legislation, and that is the proceeds provision needs to be broadened beyond the specified or the designated offences, which encompasses all of the indictable offences in the federal legislation. I think that's too restrictive, because very often at the prosecution stage it would mean under these circumstances that forfeiture will no longer be available in relation to hybrid offences when the crown, for instance, elects to proceed by way of summary conviction.

That is a critical issue, and it's a point I wanted to make. I appreciate the opportunity to raise this. It may exclude such offences as theft, fraud, and money laundering, depending on how the crown elects to proceed with these particular issues. So I think we have to look at that and look at the hybrid offences issues and especially when we talk about proceeding by the crown, which is a choice they make, by summary conviction. We should embrace those offences as well.

Mr. Peter MacKay: That often has time limitations as well.

The Chair: That was very well done, I should say.

Over to Mr. DeVillers. See if you can do so well.

Mr. Paul DeVillers (Simcoe North, Lib.): I will try, Mr. Chair.

I'm always comforted when we have these hearings and we have Chief Fantino telling us we're not going far enough and Mr. Koziebrocki telling us the reverse, that we're going too far. It tells me that perhaps the legislation has achieved some of the balance we're trying to find.

However, I did hear Commissioner Zaccardelli and Chief Fantino bragging about not being lawyers. I am a lawyer. Not only that, I'm a left-leaning, bleeding heart liberal lawyer.

A voice: The worst kind.

Mr. Paul DeVillers: In spite of that, I'm able to support this legislation.

Having been on the subcommittee that did a lot of our investigation and our hearings, we learned that in regard to Mr. Koziebrocki's objection and concerns over the change in the numbers in the definition of a criminal organization, in fact what was happening is organized crime is adapting to that very legislation and breaking themselves up into cells of fewer than five people and operating in those circumstances in reaction to the legislation.

• 1020

So I think this is a situation that does require extraordinary legislative measures to deal with it, because organized crime, as we learned on the subcommittee, is very adaptable. Similarly with the authorization, if it were specific, as is suggested, then they would curtail their activities to circumvent many of the provisions that might be put into the legislation.

That's something we learned, that organized crime is very adaptable and will adjust to the legislation. So I wonder if we could get a reaction to those concerns that we heard as a subcommittee.

May 15, 2001 [Standing Committee on Justice and Human Rights][Entire Exchange]

Mr. Marc St-Laurent

…The second amendment we want is very important to us. This is the reverse onus for the forfeiture of proceeds of crime. Bill C-95 as well as Bill C-24 provide for a reverse onus when the accused is put on parole or when an individual who has been sentenced is released after incarceration. We are glad to see that the legislator is ready to reverse the burden of proof, but we are surprised by the fact that this applies to keeping a person in custody but not to the confiscation of goods. Is a violation of a person's freedom not more significant than a violation of his or her property rights? We put this question to you. This kind of investigation is very costly. These organizations exist in order to make a profit. If we really want to combat them, we do not only need heavier sentences, we must also be able to seize their goods and to prove that these goods belong to them. They have so many dummy companies and ways to show that these goods do not belong to them that proving this kind of thing is already a burden. The act must be amended…

Mr. Bill Marra

Also here is Stéphanie McFayden, a policy analyst with FCM.

We are very pleased to be here on behalf of the federation. We do have a written brief, but unfortunately, with the short turnaround time, we have only an English version. I understand it will be translated and provided to you at a later date. My presentation will strictly highlight what is in the brief.

FCM represents the interests of all municipalities on policy and program matters within federal jurisdiction. As you probably know, over 1,000 municipalities currently are members of FCM, certainly representing a large population of our country.

I am a member of FCM's Standing Committee on Community Safety and Crime Prevention, and the issue of organized crime has been one of great concern to our committee and to the Canadian communities we represent.

As community leaders, we are aware that organized criminal activity is too much for one municipality to handle. Criminal organization have tentacles that reach far beyond our municipal boundaries; nevertheless it is at the community level that our citizens are feeling the impacts of organized crime. Outlaw motorcycle gangs, prostitution, youth gangs, drugs, shoplifting rings, violent confrontation, and certainly some of the technical scams that we're seeing with debit cards and credit cards are all issues that we're feeling in a very significant way within our communities and on our streets.

Because we are so close to the impacts of organized crime, municipal leaders are very pleased to see the introduction of Bill C-24. We believe the initiatives described within this bill will help police forces be more effective and put a real dent in the organized crime issue.

FCM supports the proposed revisions to simplify the definition of criminal organization to make participation in such organizations an offence with much more meaningful consequences. We are also very pleased to see the initiatives around the seizure of proceeds of crimes. FCM has long supported the notion that we need to take the profit out of organized crime, and indeed we urge you to direct any proceeds of crime seized under this law back to fighting organized crime, and as you heard from your previous delegate, the expense related to organized crime and law enforcement.

We have some suggestions that we would like you to consider. I'll elaborate on two of them, and then I'll summarize rather quickly and have my friend provide you with some additional information.

As much as we endorse Bill C-24, we do believe an improvement is needed to these provisions to make them truly responsive to community needs. We urge you to amend the proposed definition of offence-related property to clearly include the notion of bunkers. I'm not personally familiar with what's happened with bunkers, but certainly my friend will elaborate later on. Our community has not had the misfortune of realizing this impact.

The bunkers, as some of you know, are the fortified clubhouses used by gangs, particularly outlaw motorcycle gangs. Communities such as Blainville, Montreal, and Quebec have seen outlaw motorcycle gangs purchase homes in residential neighbourhoods and then proceed to turn these houses literally into fortresses. These bunkers are used as places to meet and plan criminal activity, and they pose a very real threat to the neighbourhood life. Their mere presence creates an atmosphere of tension, due to these intensive fortifications. More importantly, these bunkers act as a very visible target for rival gangs, creating a focal point for violent confrontation in what should be a peaceful residential setting.

Municipal leaders are attempting to address this issue through anti-bunker bylaws. These bylaws prohibit the use of a variety of fortifications on these properties.

An amendment to add bunkers to the Criminal Code definition of offence-related property would place municipalities across the country in a much stronger position to enact bylaws so that gangs will be discouraged from establishing a clubhouse within their community.

It is important that the Criminal Code specifically authorize municipalities to pursue orders to seize and confiscate real property defined as a bunker, and in fact FCM recommends that the Government of Canada provide municipal governments recourse to civil remedies for asset forfeiture. We need to be able to act quickly and effectively to get forfeited clubhouses out of our communities and out of our neighbourhoods.

On another point, FCM is very pleased to see the added protection from organized crime to people involved in the criminal justice system that is offered in Bill C-24. However, there was a noticeable gap in the scope of these provisions, and I want to thank our friend Monsieur St-

Laurent, because he certainly made the point, as well. They need to be amended to explicitly recognize elected municipal officials.

• 1150

As currently proposed, the list includes witnesses, jurors, police, prosecutors, prison guards, judges, members of Parliament, and senators. But there is a special need for municipal government officials to be included in this protective legislation, because we—just like members of Parliament or members of the Senate—have found ourselves targets of intimidation and threats from criminal organizations as a result of our official positions. You'll hear more on this point in a moment.

Because city councils approve budgets, bylaws, and police activities, they have a direct impact on organized crime. Examples include the anti-bunker bylaws and approving municipal police budgets. Zoning bylaws end up controlling gambling, pawn shops, pornography, and prostitution. The priority is to target organized crime.

Mr. Chairman, FCM supports the changes proposed to the Criminal Code in order to combat organized crime. The Department of Justice and the Solicitor General ought to be commended for developing a strong response to this complex problem.

In order to ensure that the changes respond to community needs, FCM recommends the following modifications to Bill C-24. The first, which I briefly described, redefines offence-related property to specifically include fortified bunkers.

The second is that municipal elected officials be included in the list of people provided with special protection under Bill C-24.

The third is that crime proceeds confiscated under this legislation be used specifically to initiate law-enforcement tactics against organized crime.

And the fourth is that the federal government allow municipalities recourse for civil remedies for asset forfeiture.

I'll turn that over to my friend, Mayor Gingras.

May 16 [Standing Committee on Justice and Human Rights]

Hon. Anne McLellan (Minister of Justice and Attorney General of Canada, Lib.): Thank you very much, Mr. Chairman.

… Since becoming Minister of Justice I have considered my main goal to be helping to provide Canadians with an effective and responsive system of justice. In recent years this goal has become more challenging, as all of you on this committee are well aware. Today globalization and technology are having an impact on law and the administration of justice. Take, for example, crime. Crime follows opportunity. Modern society presents opportunities for new crimes and new ways of committing old crimes, often at long distance and across borders, using telephones or the Internet, and there are new ways of concealing evidence, laundering money, and committing fraud.

So the challenge is to maximize the benefits of globalization for our citizens, while at the same time protecting them from its risks. To do this effectively, we must be willing to rethink our basic notions of sovereignty, human rights, and privacy. Most importantly, we must be willing to work around the world, in a wide variety of fora, on a host of emerging issues that are of direct relevance to the lives of Canadians here at home.

...

In the interests of predicting and adapting to the rapid changes around us, we are also embracing innovative ways to organize ourselves and deliver our services. Thus, you will see a reorientation of our federal prosecution service, the Justice Department lawyers who prosecute federal offences in the areas of illicit drugs, organized crime, proceeds of crime, income tax evasion, and a host of regulatory issues. You will see a renewed federal prosecution service, featuring more cooperative approaches with the provinces and territories and strengthened relationships both inside and outside the department.

....

May 29, 2001 [Standing Committee on Justice and Human Rights] [Entire Exchange]

Mr. Michel Bellehumeur: I have no illusions. I will not have two victories in a row.

It is an amendment that the Fédération des policiers et policières du Québec, among others, wants; its representatives came here to testify. It is about the overturning of evidence from goods and products that came from illegitimate sources. It is aimed at organized crime, among others those people who drive Mercedes cars and live in a $300,000 castle and declare an income of $25,000 per year. There is a small problem.

In all probability, it would be up to them to demonstrate that the goods came from legitimate sources.

• 2135

I think there has been a lot written on this subject and that the police, among others, want such an amendment.

[English]

The Chair: Mr. Toews.

Mr. Vic Toews: I do have a concern about this, and perhaps it relates to the concern I have about the protection of property generally. I don't like to see criminals amass fortunes and not pay taxes on them, but I am concerned here. If I understand the import of the amendment, a police agency or a government agency could come in and take my house by simply alleging that it was the result of a criminal activity, because no one could be as prudent as I've been in amassing a half-million-dollar or three-million-dollar house, which I don't have.

Mr. John McKay: I'm glad you clarified that.

Mr. Chuck Cadman: But you will after this raise.

Mr. Vic Toews: They would seize that house and say, well, this is the proceeds of crime, and therefore I am now obligated on a balance of probabilities to demonstrate that it did not come from organized crime activities. I think there has to be some onus on the state to prove, at least on a balance of probabilities, that there is some connection between that house and the proceeds of organized crime. I'm just wondering what the impact of this amendment is, because if this is simply an arbitrary way for government to seize houses of citizens without demonstrating some kind of a reasonable case, I couldn't support this amendment.

The Chair: Mr. Mosley, did you want to comment?

Mr. Richard Mosley: Yes. With the greatest respect, I would suggest that the amendment would be counterproductive to what I think is the intent with which it is being presented. If you read proposed subsections 462.37(1) and 462.37(2) very carefully, the court can only make these orders where satisfied beyond a reasonable doubt. All the person who is the putative owner of the property need do is raise a reasonable doubt to defeat the application by the crown. The effect of the amendment would be to raise that bar to a balance of probabilities.

October 18, 2001 [Standing Committee on Justice and Human Rights]

Mr. Stockwell Day (Okanagan—Coquihalla, Canadian Alliance): Thanks, Mr. Chairman.

Through you, to the ministers, clearly they all recognize the world has changed since September 11, and in profound ways. We were all reminded of that, those of us who were able to be in Halifax yesterday, who watched the departing ships and saw the families obviously emotional at the departure of their loved ones. Also, for me, and I think for many others, it increases our resolve—and I think for you also, I won't question that—to make sure, as our faithful troops go to foreign shores or seas to defend our freedoms, that we are doing all we can domestically to fight against terrorism here.

That's why the Canadian Alliance, on September 18, tabled a number of provisions to do this. I recognize, for whatever reasons, that the government voted against those, but now you're moving ahead. Some of those things we'd suggested have been looked at and in fact are entertained in the legislation.

My concern—and I preface my question with these remarks—is that when a safety net is being constructed and it's designed to catch those who would abuse the freedoms we have, when you're weaving that net of safety, you cannot leave giant holes in it. Otherwise, the good material that's there will be all for naught because there will be holes. When I think of the government's own security and intelligence services repeatedly warning of the need for more rigorous and efficient immigration and refugee laws and the Criminal Code provisions to back them up—the government's own security people—then clearly I see our concerns are echoed.

That's why I refer to comments made Tuesday of this week at an international conference on money laundering in Montreal. Sergeant Philippe Lapierre of the RCMP's national security investigation section in the counterterrorism branch talked about this, about how terrorists actually do their work within Canada.

I'm looking to the legislation as we reflect on his remarks. I'll quote him very briefly. He wasn't referring to all people coming here, and neither are we, but he said, for those who want to abuse the system, “Some [of them] are sent here with a mission and some people come on their own and are recruited.” But he said they all have the same modus operandi. They fall into this means of operating.

• 1605

The first thing they do is claim—fraudulently—refugee status. That allows them to stay here. Then they apply for welfare and medical benefits. Then often they commit criminal acts such as fraud and petty theft—again, here's where our provisions need to be very clear—and then they often use legitimate business as a front to launder money for their own activities. I'll leave for background—although it's your own material—the names of a number of individuals who have done this, not the least of whom is, of course, Al-Marabh, a failed refugee claimant who was not deported or detained. He was facing criminal charges at the time in Massachusetts, and there's a possibility he was involved in these atrocities in New York. I can only imagine what may have happened or may not have happened had he been detained.

Quite rightly, as we look at the provisions in the act—rightly but unfortunately—there are some necessary but unfortunate restrictions on the liberties of law-abiding citizens and law-abiding claimants.

It seems to me there is a lack of balance, a real focus on the taking away of liberties, unfortunately, of those who are law abiding and law following. There seems to be a reluctance, which I don't understand, to detain and deport those who are here without proper qualifications or possibly here on a questionable basis, and that's my question. We're looking at the act. It's very detailed; there are many pages here.

Can either minister, Mr. Chairman, direct us specifically to the new clauses, the new provisions, that say the authorities have here what they've never had before—the ability through Criminal Code provisions or others to detain and if necessary deport those who are posing a danger to us? Could we identify that? And could either minister also reflect again on why there seems to be a focus—there needs to be some—on an increased police presence here, on the internal border, but less focus on changes for people coming in on the exterior or the perimeter border?

So first, the very specific provisions, can you direct us to those? The minister talked about tools needed to identify and detain. Let's start with these provisions here, under necessary Criminal Code backup, that will be required to identify, detain, and deport where necessary. Can you direct us to the specific clauses?

Mr. Lawrence MacAulay: Thank you very much.

There are clauses not in this bill that we're aware of, like pre-arrival information, that will be available. That's in the Senate Bill S-23. It will require pre-arrival information for people who are coming to this country. As you are aware, we've put scanners at the airport that are hooked to the databanks of the RCMP and the FBI. If the fingerprints or palm prints of anybody who has committed a criminal offence are in the databanks of the RCMP or the FBI, it will immediately come back on these scanners to our airport entry points. These are some of the provisions that have been put in place in the last month in order to upgrade our systems.

October 23, 2001 [Standing Committee on Justice and Human Rights]

Commissioner Giuliano Zaccardelli (Commissioner of the Royal Canadian Mounted Police):

Thank you for the opportunity to be here today to discuss Bill C-36, the proposed Anti-terrorism Act, tabled in the House of Commons on October 15 of this year.

My remarks will be brief but will highlight three important messages. First, the RCMP is taking a measured and sustained response to terrorist activity. Second, the proposed legislative change will enable law enforcement agencies such as the RCMP to continue to fight terrorist activity in a balanced way. Third, all that we do at the RCMP is consistent with Canada's legal framework and the values that Canadians cherish.

Before I speak to you about the RCMP's measured and sustained response to terrorist activity, let me begin by setting the stage somewhat.

What is terrorist activity? Terrorist activity is indiscriminate, global in scope, and destabilizing in effect. Those who carry out terrorist activity have no respect for human life. They will stop at nothing in their effort to achieve their goals. Terrorist activity is carried out by groups and individuals willing to commit suicidal acts of mass destruction against innocent civilians. They think nothing of strapping a bomb around their waist and detonating it and themselves in a location strategically selected to result in the greatest possible loss of life and destruction of property.

• 0935

Terrorist groups are intricate, complex, sophisticated, and clandestine criminal organizations. Terrorist groups have long-term goals, to infiltrate and assimilate in society and establish individuals with sleepers' roles.

Terrorist activity poses an extraordinary threat to society, as evidenced by the tragic events of September 11. The fight against terrorist activities calls for extraordinary action. Since the tragic events of September 11, the prime objective of the RCMP has been and will continue to be to ensure public safety. There has been a heightened awareness of the need to remain vigilant. That heightened awareness remains solidly in place at the RCMP since the attacks on Afghanistan positions by American and British forces, which began on October 7. But our actions do not stop at awareness and vigilance.

What has the RCMP done? Post-September 11, the RCMP has initiated a full-scale domestic investigation to determine if there was any Canadian involvement in the events of that tragic day. This includes an effort to determine if there are threats to Canada coming from either within the country or outside. In addition, task forces dealing with the events of September 11 have been established in key locations across Canada, with all our law enforcement partners and intelligence agencies, everyone who can contribute to this cause.

Investigative efforts are also under way in an attempt to ensure that terrorist funding is cut off. These investigations are transnational in nature and require a coordinated national and international effort by law enforcement and security agencies. As a result, the RCMP is working closely with international partners in all its activities, and because terrorist groups are intricate, complex, sophisticated, and clandestine criminal organizations, our investigations will require long-term, intensive efforts.

Our measured and sustained response was further bolstered on October 12, when the Government of Canada announced new funding to assist the RCMP in its work on the anti-terrorism plan. The RCMP received $59 million for new measures that will strengthen Canada's ability to prevent, detect, and respond to existing and emerging national security threats. The RCMP is pleased that the Government of Canada has provided this additional funding.

As I told the Standing Committee on Citizenship and Immigration last week, this money is helpful, but the RCMP and security agencies, CSIS in particular, can use even more money so that we can provide better security for Canadians in this country.

In terms of working with our partners, on the domestic front we have put into place some very concrete activities to ensure that our partners are in the loop on law enforcement initiatives with regard to terrorism. For example, all RCMP provincial headquarters have briefed their respective provincial and municipal partners on events that impacted on their jurisdictions. These regional initiatives include regular briefings of provincial departments of justice, policing services at various levels, and briefings to municipal mayors, provincial emergency measures organizations, and airport authorities.

As you can see, we are constantly sharing information with our partners, as well as evaluating the national security situation and modifying needs according to the circumstances at hand. We are also working very closely with the Solicitor General to contribute to the national security committee headed up by the Minister of Foreign Affairs. We are providing advice and intelligence on how best to ensure public safety, and of course, we are sharing information and intelligence whenever we can with our international, national, and local partners.

• 0940

In the circumstances, we feel that we have done what we can to heighten vigilance, readiness, and response capacity. However, the RCMP supports the proposed legislation.

Some people say that Canada already has a strong legislative framework and enforcement capacity to deal with terrorist threats. It has been our experience, based on our investigation into the tragic events of September 11, that this is not true. Notwithstanding our efforts, it has become evident that there are significant obstacles preventing law enforcement organizations such as the RCMP from detecting, deterring, and destabilizing terrorist groups. Traditional investigative tools are inadequate. It is our view that Bill C-36, the proposed anti-terrorism act, will make a significant contribution to the ability of law enforcement to fight terrorism in this country and abroad.

More specifically, Bill C-36 will criminalize terrorist financing, establish a procedure to freeze, seize, and forfeit proceeds for and proceeds of terrorist activities or groups. It will enhance our ability to protect sensitive information. It will create new investigative tools and allow for preventive arrests when needed to address the serious threats posed by terrorists groups and those who would carry out terrorist activities. It will establish a means to identify and list terrorist groups.

The draft legislation proposes limits be placed on the activities of police, and as exists now, police actions are subject to the limits placed on them by the Charter of Rights and Freedoms. Let's be very clear. We are not talking about, in any way, shape, or form, acting or behaving outside of the charter and freedoms of this country.

To sum up, I want to underscore that the RCMP is very supportive of Bill C-36. Not only does Bill C-36 provide the necessary tools for law enforcement to help combat terrorist activities, but it also provides important safeguards to ensure that the exercise of these powers is not solely at the discretion of law enforcement officers. You are all aware of the involvement of the Attorney General and judges in every step of this process.

You have heard me say many times that, at the RCMP, our role is to uphold the law and to strike that balance between the protection of society and respect for individual rights. We constantly strive to make how things are done as important as what gets done. Our behaviour as an organization and as individuals must at all times be based upon integrity, honesty, professionalism, compassion, respect, and accountability. Our values must reflect those of Canadian society, and I believe they do. We will not abandon this important goal.

Thank you for the opportunity to share with you today the RCMP's views on the proposed legislation.

October 24, 2001

Professor Wesley Wark (International Relations Programme, University of Toronto):

… On terrorist financing, again this measure has been called for over a number of years by people who have watched over terrorist problems in Canada. I think it's long overdue. The one issue I would raise, with regard to the monitoring and interdiction of terrorist financing, is that as the bill currently stands, it raises the possibility of creating overlapping jurisdictions, or overlapping areas of operations, between the existing centre to monitor financial transactions that was created to pursue money-laundering issues—and now will have a function in terms of pursuing terrorist financing—and the mandate of the Canadian Security Intelligence Service, to concern itself with terrorist financing and fundraising in Canada.

Overlapping jurisdictions in the security and intelligence business is the bane of that business. We have to be careful any time we seem to be creating the circumstances to provide such overlap. I wonder whether this needs to be looked at again…

October 25, 2001

M. Jim Peterson: Thank you dear colleagues. I appreciate the opportunity to appear before your committee today to discuss those aspects of Bill C-36, the Anti-terrorism Act, which deal with terrorist financing.

I will focus on how the Bill expands the scope of the Proceeds of Crime (Money Laundering) Act (PCMLA) and the mandate of the Financial Transactions and Reports Analysis Centre of Canada (FINTRAC). I will comment on new measures that affect charities and will mention our international efforts.

[English]

At the outset, let me assure honourable members that the government is committed to depriving terrorists of the ability to finance their activities. We believe that cutting off their funding is a key step in reining in the capacity of terrorists to function. Achieving this objective, however, will not be easy. It requires both strong domestic measures and a unified international effort.

• 0940

As you know, the government has been working with its international partners to develop a coordinated global response to dealing with terrorist funding. Canada and its G-7 partners have moved quickly to develop and implement action plans to combat the financing of terrorism, doing so by blocking the assets of terrorists and their associates.

We're also an active member of the Financial Action Task Force on Money Laundering. We support the organization's efforts to develop and implement international standards to prevent the use of the global financial system for terrorist financing. The Honourable Paul Martin, chair of the G-20 group of finance ministers and central bank governors, has begun the task of broadening the base of support for effective and coordinated international action through that group.

Our goal is that all jurisdictions will join with us in adopting strong domestic regimes against terrorist financing and will cooperate with us internationally to track down and deny a safe haven anywhere for terrorist funds.

[Translation]

Canada's participation in international efforts has already translated into domestic action, primarily through the implementation of United Nations Security Council Resolutions.

Regulations in force since February 2001 freeze property owned or controlled by the Taliban, and Osama ben Laden or his associates.

New regulations, in force since October 2nd, go further by giving the government the authority to freeze assets of other terrorists and terrorist organizations that are listed either by the U.N. or by the Governor in Council.

The government listed individual terrorists and terrorist organizations under these regulations on October 2nd, and added to that list on October 12th. These new regulations have allowed the government to work closely with the international community to ensure that any terrorist assets are subject to sanctions.

[English]

The federal regulator, OSFI, has on several occasions since September 11 reminded financial institutions of their obligations under these regulations and urged them to cooperate fully with law enforcement in their investigation. OSFI has also used its website to provide financial institutions with the most up-to-date information about listed terrorists.

The new regulations require financial institutions to report monthly to their regulator on whether or not they have terrorist assets in their possession and, if so, to aggregate the information about those assets. The Minister of Finance has committed to making regular reports on the terrorist assets that are identified by our financial institutions.

These regulations were an important step in our efforts to thwart the financing of terrorist activities through our Canadian FIs. They establish key terrorist financing countermeasures and provide a bridge to the anti-terrorism plan that will be accomplished, we believe, through the passage of the bill before you.

[Translation]

Among other things, THIS Bill introduces changes to the Criminal Code that put into law various measures set out in the United Nations Regulations of October 2nd. Most importantly, the changes make it a criminal offence to finance terrorist activities.

In addition to criminalizing terrorist financing, it is important that effective means be found to deter and detect these illicit activities.

• 0945

To this end, changes to the Criminal Code require all persons to report to the RCMP and CSIS if they have property in their possession or control that they know belongs to a listed terrorist.

In addition, the Criminal Code amendments include monthly reporting requirements for financial institutions modeled on those established in the U.N. Regulations of October 2nd.

[English]

This bill also strengthens Canada's existing anti-money laundering regime both to guard against abuse of the financial system by terrorist groups and to provide law enforcement and intelligence authorities with information about terrorist financing activities. Under the current Proceeds of Crime (Money Laundering) Act, financial intermediaries must meet consumer identification and record-keeping standards and report transactions related to the identification of money laundering.

At present FINTRAC is mandated to receive and analyze reports that may be relevant to money laundering activity and to disclose key information to law enforcement authorities. The scope of FINTRAC and this bill are both expanded to encompass terrorist financing.

Let me provide a brief overview of the key measures.

[Translation]

FINTRAC's role will now extend beyond money laundering to include terrorist financing.

Financial intermediaries will have to report to FINTRAC any financial transactions they suspect are related to terrorist financing offences. They will also be required to report if they are in possession of terrorist assets or have knowledge about a transaction, or proposed transaction, involving such assets.

At the same time, FINTRAC will be responsible for disclosing identifying information to law enforcement agencies if the Centre suspects the information is relevant to the investigation of terrorist financing activities.

[English]

As well FINTRAC must report to CSIS if this information is relevant to threats to the security of Canada.

To further combat terrorist financing, FINTRAC will be allowed to share key identifying information with its international counterparts. However, new safeguards will be built into the law to ensure that the information is treated confidentially and also to limit disclosure of this information by foreign law enforcement agencies.

I would also like to assure members that the PCMLA was designed in a way that respects the privacy of individuals by ensuring that reported information is treated with the utmost care. The fundamental safeguards that were written into the law with regard to money laundering are also maintained with regard to terrorist financing. For example, the operation of FINTRAC remains at arm's length from law enforcement and is subject to the Privacy Act.

The final issue I want to mention concerns the registration and tax treatment of charities. Your bill includes income tax provisions that prevent terrorists from exploiting the tax privileges associated with charities. The bill enacts the new Charities Registration (Security Information)

Act and amends the Income Tax Act to prevent organizations that support terrorist activities from enjoying the tax privileges granted to registered charities.

The Solicitor General and the Minister of National Revenue will now be empowered to issue a certificate denying charitable status to an organization. The Federal Court will be mandated to review that certificate to ensure that it is reasonable.

• 0950

[Translation]

Beyond the measures in the charities legislation to deny tax privileges, other elements of Bill C-36 relating to the criminalization of terrorist financing would support additional steps by the government. If an organization willfully provides financing for terrorist activity, then there would be grounds for proceeding with criminal sanctions and the forfeiture of assets

These new measures will protect the integrity of the registration system for charities under the Income Tax Act, and maintain the confidence of Canadian taxpayers that the benefits of charitable status are available only to organizations that operate exclusively for charitable purposes.

[English]

Terrorism, honourable colleagues, must and will be fought on many fronts. Canada will continue to work with its international partners in the G-7, the G-20, and the Financial Action Task Force on Money Laundering to develop and promote global standards to fight terrorist financing. Canada will see that tough laws are put in place, see that they are enforced, and see that there is a seamless web of international cooperation to deny funding to terrorists.

I mentioned earlier that strong domestic measures are needed if we are to deprive terrorists of funding and fulfill our international responsibilities. With the key elements of Canada's new money laundering regime already in place, the measures in Bill C-36 will help us achieve this objective by further strengthening and expanding the new regime. The amendments to the PCMLA in this bill will assist law enforcement agencies and CSIS by providing them with additional information to detect, investigate, and prosecute terrorist activities and to deprive them of their finances.

I thank you.

The Chair: Thank you very much, Mr. Peterson.

Now we'll turn to Mr. Toews for seven minutes.

Mr. Vic Toews (Provencher, Canadian Alliance): Thank you, Mr. Chair.

I want to commend the government for finally moving ahead on this file. Prior to September 11, it was clear that the federal government simply didn't have any interest in complying with international UN conventions. I refer not only to the suppression of terrorist bombing but to the suppression of terrorist financing, where Canada was not complying with its UN obligations. That, frankly, was a disgrace, and I'm very pleased that the government is moving ahead in this direction. We all know that money is the lifeblood of terrorist organizations, much as it is for organized crime. Unless we make concerted efforts to stop the flow of money, we will not stop the flow of arms, nor will we stop other terrorist activities throughout the world.

Now, I listened with interest to your comments. I appreciate the briefing and your appearance here. It's clear now that FINTRAC has additional responsibilities, and I'm concerned about the financial institutions that are providing the information to FINTRAC in terms of tracking the relevant information. Are our resources, that is, the federal government resources furnished, sufficient to expeditiously analyze the information our financial institutions are providing us? Clearly, with the added responsibilities, there's going to be more information. What we don't want to see is the business of our country, particularly that of the financial institutions, bogged down because of too much paperwork. I think we have a concomitant obligation to provide appropriate resources and personnel for our agency. Has the administration by the federal government of this program received additional resources, Mr. Peterson?

Mr. Jim Peterson: Thank you very much, Mr. Toews.

• 0955

It's a very important point, and the answer is, in short, yes. Let me just say that, yes, Bill C-36 does expand our capacity to freeze and also to seize the funds of terrorists. Prior to it, we did have in place regulations here in Canada that allowed us to freeze assets of the Taliban and assets of those associated with bin Laden. Even before this bill was in place, we were able, again by regulation, to pass another one that allowed us to expand the web beyond the Taliban and bin Laden to other terrorist assets—

Mr. Vic Toews: Thank you, Mr. Peterson.

I appreciate the fact that you're moving ahead on that, and certainly Bill C-36 is very important. What I want to know, if I could get an undertaking from you, is specifically the needed increase in resources and personnel. If you can't provide me with that today, at least undertake to provide it. That's all I require, for you to produce that in a timely fashion.

Mr. Jim Peterson: I will ask Mr. Horst Intscher, the head of FINTRAC, to outline what he's done in terms of expanding his personnel.

Mr. Horst Intscher (Director, Financial Transactions and Reports Analysis Centre of Canada, Department of Finance): Thank you, Mr. Chair.

We have begun work on creating the capacity to undertake this additional work by identifying the resources we would require. This is in terms of both analytic capacity and of information technology resources and infrastructure for the protection of the sensitive information that would be flowing to us. I understand that we expect we will require some additional resources, and I'm fairly confident that we will be able to obtain those resources through the Treasury Board.

Mr. Vic Toews: If you could then undertake to provide this committee with that information, I would certainly appreciate it.

Also, is there a liaison that goes on with the bank in determining exactly how much additional resources in terms of personnel or otherwise we require? We don't want the government going off in some direction without proper input from the financial institutions.

Mr. Jim Peterson: I think you have raised a very important point—and I'm glad you have—about the obligation imposed on our financial institutions to increase their surveillance and their reporting. Yes, the onus on our private sector institutions has increased considerably because of this. I also want to say to you that I am very proud of and grateful for the way they have responded, particularly the speed. It's not an easy task for them. I expect that in the future it'll be made slightly easier because of new computer technologies, the new IT they will bring in. We will certainly be coordinating matters with them on this front. You're quite right, there is an added onus there, and certainly an added onus on government.

Let me assure you, Mr. Toews, and the other honourable members that we will make these resources available to FINTRAC.

Mr. Vic Toews: Thank you.

The Chair: Thank you very much.

Monsieur Bellehumeur, you have seven minutes.

[Translation]

Mr. Michel Bellehumeur (Berthier—Montcalm, BQ): Thank you very much.

Mr. Peterson, the Bloc Québécois has been concerned about the whole issue of money laundering for a long time. I remember asking the government about it in 1994. They were the first questions I asked during my first term and I remember very well that in 1994 the government's answer was that there were no money laundering problems.

I also remember having talked about international agreements. I was told there were no problems and that everything was fine in Canada. Today, you are singing a different tune; I'm very happy to hear you do it.

But even though we have whatever law we want, we need the political will to enforce it and the financial resources to apply it correctly.

Speaking of political will, before even looking at Bill C-36, we know very well that since the 11th of September many countries have frozen assets. Many countries have followed some money movements step by step.

• 1000

We also know that in Canada during the last two years more than $100 billion, it seems, have left the country for certain tax havens recognized by the OECD and the Canadian government. You know all that.

We also know that it seems that Canada has now frozen about $125,000 that was being used by terrorists or terrorist groups. Before even looking at Bill C-36, I want to know the extent of the political will within the government to act in the case of money laundering. Have you done some audits to see if the hundreds of billions of dollars that have left Canada towards tax havens are going to terrorist groups?

M. Jim Peterson: Mr. Bellehumeur, you have had a number of good initiatives in this area over the last few years. We have accepted some of your suggestions, including the one on the $1,000 bank note, which was canceled. It was a good idea, we thank you for it, and we have accepted it.

The issue of money laundering and tax havens is a difficult one. We cannot solve it alone. To do so, we need the cooperation of other countries all over the world. That is why we are now working with the international community at this tie, including G-7. Certain discussions have already started with the Finance ministers of G-7. We have also, through Mr. Martin, used our relationships within G-20 to promote the adoption of standards by each of these countries and the creation of international cooperative links.

It should also be noted that we are in a good position with other countries, for example in the Carribean because we represent...

[Editor's note: Inaudible]

...the International Monetary Fund and the World Bank. We have worked with them already to establish information exchange systems and to fight money laundering. But it will need more work.

We will continue. We have already supplied technical assistance to Carribean countries to help them improve their systems. Our objective is that after cooperating with all the other countries in the world there will be no more tax havens that terrorists could benefit from.

Mr. Michel Bellehumeur: Mr. Peterson, thank you for your answer but we see that at this time, when Bill C-36 has not yet been adopted, billions of dollars are leaving the country and we seem to have no control over this. It is true that it is a complex issue. However, if we really want to fight terrorism, we have to invest a lot because money is the fuel of war for them also. At this time, Canada has not invested enough in this area.

Bill C-36 is before us. My question is as follows: how will Bill C-36, and especially its clauses on money laundering, and the implementation of international agreements, guarantee us as parliamentarians, Canadians and Quebeckers that you will be able to trace the money that will leave Canada for those tax havens and that you will be able to ensure that this money will not be used by terrorist groups? That was my first question.

Here is my second question. To work effectively, you need technology, experts, training and people to work on the issue. I imagine that if the government is serious and has the political will to act on this, it has already foreseen how much money it will need to fight effectively against crime, money laundering and terrorist groups.

Currently, we are in limbo. In virtually all departments, we don't know how much it will cost. You, who are used to working with numbers in the Department of Finance, do you have, within your department, evaluated the price of an effective fight, and especially the implementation of Bill C-36?

M. Jim Peterson: Thank you. We have not yet announced the exact costs but we will do so shortly. If in the beginning we do not allocate enough resources to fight terrorist financing, we will make adjustments. We will increase these resources and take your committee's suggestions into account if you have any ideas to improve our work in fighting terrorism.

[English]

The Chair: Mr. Blaikie.

[Translation]

Mr. Michel Bellehumeur: But I don't have any guarantee.

[English]

The Chair: You only get your seven minutes. You don't get Bill's.

[Translation]

M. Jim Peterson: There are never any guarantees, but we will do everything possible and I know you will help us.

[English]

The Chair: Mr. Blaikie, you have seven minutes.

Mr. Bill Blaikie (Winnipeg—Transcona, NDP): Thank you, Mr. Chairman.

I don't have so much a question as a comment. There seems to be an interesting theme developing here with respect to Bill C-36, and that is the need for international or transnational uniformity when it comes to dealing with unethical behaviour. We don't want to create havens for various kinds of activity, in this case terrorist activity, through a lack of uniformity.

We heard the argument yesterday that when certain laws were toughened up in the United States, terrorists moved to Canada in order to use Canada as a base for their activity. At least, that was the claim of one of the witnesses yesterday. We have heard that argument today, that it's very important to have the same or relatively the same laws in all jurisdictions so that unethical behaviour cannot move itself around, so to speak, looking for the most favourable circumstances.

I agree, Mr. Chairman, but to take another example, some argue that there needs to be some kind of uniformity with respect to poor labour standards around the world and that this needs to be enforced so that unethical business activity can't go around the world looking for the most favourable circumstances. Now, I find it passing strange, Mr. Chairman, that when this argument is made with respect to labour standards, it is regarded as a heinous notion, unrealistic—I could name a host of adjectives that have been used over the years to describe calls that have been made by the NDP and others for this kind of international uniformity when it comes to restricting unethical activity.

I hope this might be a conceptual breakthrough. I will certainly try to ensure that it is, Mr. Chairman. If we can act internationally to constrain unethical behaviour, in this case the unethical behaviour we call terrorist activity, then surely we don't want to have havens for other kinds of unethical activity, whether it be the exploitation of working people through lack of labour standards or whether it be the exploitation of the public purse through tax havens.

It's not just havens for terrorists' money we might want to address. Perhaps we should be looking at some kind of international harmonization or international regimes so that corporate interests can't shelter their money from legitimate tax imposition, period. It doesn't have to relate to terrorist activity. I just make this point, Mr. Chairman, because I find it odd to sit and listen to all these arguments that I agree with but that fall on deaf ears when I make them myself in respect of other issues.

I have one question related to your submission, Mr. Minister, and that has to do with... You talk about banks or financial institutions having to report with respect to terrorist assets they may have. Now, I'm presuming these are already frozen assets. If they aren't, they should be, and if they are frozen, how can people add to them if they're frozen?

Mr. Jim Peterson: You're quite right. Any funds of listed terrorists that have been identified are in fact frozen and cannot be touched by the owner of that account or the institution itself.

Mr. Bill Blaikie: What would they be reporting?

Mr. Jim Peterson: They would be reporting on where they've found accounts and assets, which would in effect be frozen under the regulations now in place. Bill C-36 will give us additional rights with respect to those assets and funds, such as the ability to seize them.

You make a very interesting point on the harmonization of standards, not just those for money laundering and terrorist funding. One of the quintessential problems that has always plagued us as Canadians is the overlap, the duplication, and the contradiction of laws we have among provinces and between the federal government and the provinces.

We know that interprovincial barriers to trade in goods and services cost us an enormous amount, anywhere from $4 billion to $7 billion a year in lost growth, so I take your point about the need for good laws and perhaps for fewer laws in many cases.

The Chair: Mr. Blaikie.

Mr. Bill Blaikie: I'm not sure the minister did take my point; in fact, I'm not sure he got my point at all. Nice try. That was a nice little diversion into federal-provincial stuff, but I was talking about the international situation, core labour standards, and the WTO. Then the minister wants to rap on about interprovincial trade and the need for...sorry, but that's not what I was talking about.

Mr. Jim Peterson: You also mentioned the taxation of funds that are outside a country's border or jurisdiction. We have worked very closely with the international community to develop common laws with respect to that, and we have done so by following the OECD model draft convention for the prevention of international double taxation and tax escape or avoidance. This has been a good model to work from. It is in place with many different jurisdictions. There will have to be a lot more work done with the so-called tax haven countries, which have traditionally been involved in a lot of offshore banking, to make sure they're not laundering money—

Mr. Bill Blaikie: And ship flagging.

Mr. Jim Peterson: —and not...you're missing my point, Mr. Blaikie. I was talking about international tax avoidance.

• 1015

The Chair: Thank you very much, Mr. Blaikie and Mr. Peterson.

Mr. MacKay.

Mr. Peter MacKay (Pictou—Antigonish—Guysborough, PC/DR): There's a real breakdown in communications on the entire spectrum here.

Speaking of information sharing, I'm interested, Minister, if you could give us perhaps some concrete examples of what it means, in the grand scheme of things, to ensure the seamless web of international cooperation. That's very powerful language, but I'm interested to know what pragmatic, concrete steps are in place to ensure that the information sharing is taking place not only between ourselves and our G-7, G-20 allies, but also within departments here in Canada. It's a question that's been asked of every minister who's appeared before us. How is the Solicitor General of Canada, CSIS, and the RCMP working closer, as a result of this legislation, to ensure that information is passed on?

Further to that, I would like to know, in, again, a very practical way, if you foresee difficulties in proving this element of terrorist fundraising as part of the criteria that the crown will bear the burden of proving. Is this ideological, religious, or political purpose behind the fundraising activity? I believe this is going to be a very difficult and tough threshold to meet in many instances. I wonder how the Department of Finance has contemplated, in real terms, how you prove this element, this purpose, this mens rea behind the actual fundraising activity.

Mr. Jim Peterson: With your permission, Mr. MacKay, I would like to have Yvan Roy answer the question about the religious belief, and then call on Inspector Beer to talk to you about the efforts at international cooperation.

[Translation]

Mr. Peter MacKay: There is no problem. Mr. Roy, you can answer in French.

Mr. Yvan Roy (Assistant Deputy Minister and Counsel to the Department of Finance): With pleasure.

The clauses in this Bill that are related to terrorist financing are of a criminal nature. You have worked in this area since you are a former solicitor. You know that the standards are high in such circumstances and that the proof must be beyond a reasonable doubt.

As for any infraction that requires a specific intent or motivation, the motivation and the specific intent will be deduced from the proof offered. In such circumstances, the proof will most often be of a circumstantial nature. It is possible that in such cases we may have direct proof, because, as you know, such infractions may be subject to electronic surveillance. You also know that we often learn a lot about people's intentions in this area.

The Bill tries to provide the state with all the tools available in this regard, but at the same time it must balance the various interests. I have read the transcripts of the Minister of Justice before this committee and of the public servants that have appeared before you and I know that the government does not intend to attack groups that have nothing to do with terrorism. That is why you have a definition of "terrorist activity" that is in some way limited and requires a high level of proof. It is the government's wish, and it believes that it would be possible to find sufficient proof to make the appropriate deductions or, through surveillance or informers, determine the reasons for which this money is collected.

We are therefore talking about a balance of interests, of not attacking the wrong groups and of having a high standard while having the means to take the appropriate legal action.

The minister of Finance obviously has a secondary interest in this matter since the application of criminal law does not come under that department's jurisdiction, but it does have an interest as it wants those clauses to work. We believe that it will be possible to see that the right people are brought before the courts in due course, as you say in English.

• 1020

[English]

Mr. Peter MacKay: I have a question about proposed section 83.02, specifically under the heading of “Financing of Terrorism”. It talks about:

> directly or indirectly, wilfully and without lawful justification or excuse,

It's absent the word “knowingly”. It says “wilfully”. Certainly banks in particular and other financial institutions could willingly be in possession of funds that came from a nefarious group.

I'm wondering if the addition of “knowingly” is something your department has contemplated here. I can foresee instances where money could be held, assets could be held, wilfully, and yet the excuse of knowingly...it might add clarity to that proposed section.

Mr. Yvan Roy: Mr. MacKay, if an institution, a bank, actually anyone in this country, is knowingly in possession or control of assets related in some fashion to terrorist activities, they are under obligation, by law, to freeze those assets, that is, to refuse to deal in any way, shape, or form with those assets. I would refer you back to proposed section 83.03 to that effect.

Those who knowingly continue to deal with those assets are guilty of an offence that is itself very significant in that it is punishable on summary conviction with respect to an institution by a fine of $100,000. If the state were to prosecute that case by indictment, the fine is open-ended. There is no limit that can be imposed. So the sense is that those who are dealing with money that they know is owned or controlled by terrorists are very well captured by that provision. When you're talking about the financing, which is now doing wilfully what you should not be doing, that is, giving money to these people for that purpose, this is a different offence.

The landscape is well-covered with those two provisions, with all due respect.

Mr. Peter MacKay: What's the length of time you can freeze and hold these? I haven't found any provisions that refer directly to where those assets would go upon seizure. Is there any provision that would funnel those assets to law enforcement, for example?

Mr. Yvan Roy: Here is how the scheme is supposed to be working. You have the provision in here that says you freeze those assets, that is, you are not moving them. You have to sit on them, basically. You cannot deal with the property in any way, shape, or form. There is then an obligation in law to advise the RCMP and CSIS—the law says forthwith, immediately—about what it is you have done. These people are then tasked under the law to conduct an investigation. Once you are advised of something like this you conduct an investigation and they will then be, in due course, in a position to seize, refrain, and eventually forfeit that property.

If at the end of the day the investigation shows that actually we have been wrong, it should be the duty of the institutions—and I know they will do it—to basically stop the freezing that has taken place. The investigation having been conducted, they will be then in the position to say, we do not have suspicions any more about that property and therefore we will, from now on, continue to deal with that property.

To answer your question directly, there is not a limit on how long that property will be frozen, because of the nature of what it is we're talking about, which is an investigation. The process is you freeze, you investigate, you seize, refrain, and confiscate.

The Chair: Thank you very much, Mr. Roy.

John McKay.

Mr. John McKay (Scarborough East, Lib.): The thesis of your presentation, Minister, is that you are standardizing reporting requirements around the world.

• 1025

Last night on CBC Carol Off did a piece on Saudi banks. To telescope the presentation, it is essentially that the Saudi banks are highly cooperative in covering for Mr. bin Laden and his colleagues. There's reasonable likelihood that most of the money that finances these operations is in Saudi Arabia.

I'm not putting that forward as evidence; I'm putting that forward as a media statement.

Not to put too fine a point on it, my recollection of moneys collected so far, essentially, is that it's chump change. So the real question is what the reach of this bill is.

I see in proposed section 83.11 that there is a requirement that authorizes foreign banks within the meaning of section 2 to report their activities.

This is my first question. If there is a Saudi bank that is listed or operating in Canada or in any of our other allies' jurisdictions, and presumably our legislation is harmonized with those other jurisdictions, are those Saudi banks, either through this proposed section or parallel sections in other legislation, required to report as would Canadian banks? I'm using Saudi Arabia as an example. Similarly, if a Canadian bank is operating in Saudi Arabia, is there a reporting requirement that would obligate our bank to report back?

Secondly, what happens when you get it wrong? Inevitably, the crown will seize and freeze assets, which it shouldn't have done. I'm interested in knowing what will be the extent of claims for a crown immunity. What will be the access to recourse for those citizens who are aggrieved by wrongful seizures and freezings? Will there be an exposure on the part of the crown to damages?

Mr. Jim Peterson: Foreign banks operating in Canada will be subject to the disclosure provisions. Canadian banks operating abroad, through a branch in that foreign jurisdiction, will be subject to the disclosure provisions. Canadian banks operating abroad through a foreign subsidiary will not be.

On the issue of crown immunity and wrongful seizure and damages, I turn again to an expert.

Mr. Yvan Roy: Thank you, Mr. Minister.

The government has taken and will continue to take great care in making determinations on who is going to be subjected to some of these provisions. There are a number of ways where the government is going to be involved; the listing of people is certainly one of them. Another one is how these different provisions will continue to apply.

Basically, the regime you have with respect to money laundering found in the Criminal Code finds application here, and that is, if the government is going to be making some mistakes, the same regime that applies now will continue to apply in the future. Therefore, in cases where the government, for instance, has been negligent, there is a way of getting relief before the courts. The courts will always be there to stop this from happening and to obtain the appropriate damages in appropriate circumstances.

The law, as it existed before, continues to apply here, and there is no special immunity that the government will try to seek in cases involving this. This is not the goal of this new legislation. And we continue to be governed by the same laws with respect to negligence and other things of that nature.

Mr. Jim Peterson: Very simply, if you feel you're wrongly listed, you can apply to the Solicitor General, and if that doesn't work, you can apply to the court. Also, the Solicitor General is required to review the list of listed persons every two years.

• 1030

But do you know what, Mr. McKay? There are going to be mistakes. The difficulty when there may be so many people having the same name or just a slightly different name, and things like that... It is not possible to run this system without making mistakes.

Mr. John McKay: Going back to a Canadian bank operating in a jurisdiction where we think there are terrorist assets, and in the course of normal business a transaction occurs that the Canadian subsidiary reports, what will be the follow-up on that?

Mr. Jim Peterson: If it is a foreign branch of a Canadian bank, those assets would be reported to FINTRAC; they would be reported to OSFI. Then, if the appropriate standards were met at FINTRAC, they would be reported to the RCMP and/or CSIS, if there was a threat to the security of Canada.

I'd like to call on Inspector Dave Beer to talk more about it.

Superintendent Dave Beer (Proceeds of Crime Branch, Royal Canadian Mounted Police): Thank you, Mr. Chair.

I think it's important to understand that the essence of the terrorist funding portion of this legislation is essentially to add the act of fundraising and providing funds for terrorist activity into the existing Proceeds of Crime (Money Laundering) Act.

From that perspective, and from an investigative perspective, which I think is the essence of your question, what agencies like FINTRAC and the investigative agencies are being asked to do is to recognize proceeds for crime, utilizing the legislative and investigative tools and investigative branches that were created for proceeds for crime. It's actually simply a reversal of the process.

In your particular example, where a suspicious transaction or a transaction attributed to a listed person would be reported through FINTRAC, FINTRAC would make a determination of the nature of the activity, whether or not it was suspicious, and if so, according to the Proceeds of Crime (Money Laundering) Act, for which amendments are being considered here, it would be reported to the appropriate police agency and would be investigated accordingly.

The Chair: We'll now go to Mr. Cadman.

Mr. Chuck Cadman (Surrey North, Canadian Alliance): Thank you, Mr. Chair.

To follow up on a question that I believe my colleague Mr. Peter MacKay brought up, regarding the final destination of any asset seized or forfeited, will it be returned to law enforcement? Out of the proceeds, are there going to be moneys available to law enforcement to continue the fight, and more importantly, is there any indication or any provision in this bill for restitution to victims?

I cite the Air India bombing, where we had 329 victims. I have a large Indo-Canadian community in my constituency, and many Canadian families were impacted by that. I'm sure they'd be very interested in your answer.

Are some of the proceeds and the forfeitures from terrorist funding going to be directed back towards the victims?

Mr. Yvan Roy: The legislation, as crafted, is simply an add-on to what is already in place. What I mean by that, with respect to the two areas you're referring to particularly, is the fact that the money or the assets, once they have been forfeited, are not forfeited to anyone in particular. It is the crown, whether the provincial crown in cases that will be handled by provincial attorneys general or the crown in right of Canada in cases involving the Attorney General of Canada, that will be the beneficiary of the money or the assets that have been forfeited. In other words, that goes into the federal treasury.

A voice: The general revenue.

Mr. Yvan Roy: Yes.

Regarding victims, the provisions that exist in the code—you are very familiar with them—continue to apply with respect to those offences, because these are offences that are found in the Criminal Code. So if there is to be restitution or compensation that fits within the parameters of what is already in the code, that will apply to them too. But there is nothing special, specific to the situation that is created in this legislation.

• 1035

Mr. Chuck Cadman: Thank you.

The Chair: Mr. Paradis.

[Translation]

Mr. Denis Paradis (Brome—Missisquoi, Lib.): Thank you very much for you presentation, Minister.

The comments that spring to mind are related to... Minister, you mentioned in your presentation that the amendments to the Criminal Code will make it necessary for financial institutions to present monthly reports. But when we think of financial institutions, we think of certain categories of professionals who will also have to make reports I would imagine. These categories must include accountants, notaries, brokers and lawyers.

My comment is not necessarily related to legal professional privilege because I think it is important that privilege not be absolute in cases of terrorist crimes, among others, that are committed or being committed.

The first part of my question is about the necessary balance between divulging information on money held in areas where privilege applies and its disclosure to implement the law.

Here is the second part of my question. In certain parts there is mention of monthly reports. A large chartered bank can easily make monthly reports, but for a small broker or notary in Saint-Hyacinthe, it is a duty that can be a fairly onerous obligation. Have you considered dealing with the professional associations in each province to find disclosure methods that would impose less on small professionals.

M. Jim Peterson: I think that is a good suggestion. We will always be open to ideas that lessen the burden of disclosure. It is true that it would be more difficult for small businesses because they do not have the resources of major institutions. If there were to be suggestions to alleviate that burden, I would like to hear them. You may have other suggestions for us.

Richard.

Mr. Richard Lalonde (Chief, Financial Crimes, Financial Sector Policy Branch, Department of Finance): I would simply like to add that the Proceeds of Crime (Money Laundering) Act affects many financial institutions and that the scope of this Act is not quite the same in cases of reporting transactions and frozen accounts.

In the latter case, yes the financial institutions must report certain information to law enforcement authorities and to their regulatory agency, but if we look at the list of financial institutions that are subject to this, we see that it does not cover, for example, accountants, lawyers and other small businesses.

That being said, it is true that in some cases, small life insurance companies would be subject to this but most companies subject to this provision are major ones.

I do not know if I have to also answer the question regarding privilege. In this case, about the proceeds of crime the Act provides, in section 11, I believe, that nothing related to the reporting of transactions or doubtful operations removes anything from professional privilege.

• 1040

Therefore the common law privilege that protects certain communications between a lawyer and client is well recognized in this Act. That being said, it is important that all financial intermediaries be subject to this law, otherwise there would be a...

[Editor's note: Inaudible]

The Chair: Thank you, Mr. Paradis and Mr. Lalonde.

Mr. Bellehumeur, three minutes.

Mr. Michel Bellehumeur: I will not ask the question I wanted to ask. Instead I will comment on your answer to Mr. Paradis' question.

I know small law firms that make big transactions. If we look at very recent history, even if it only at gangsterism in Quebec, we see that there is a lawyer whose name I will not mention because I am not sure of it, who was convicted of money laundering. There were large sums involved, millions of dollars. Are you telling us that such people are not covered?

M. Jim Peterson: We know very well that there have been cases where a few lawyers committed an infraction. I will not...

[Editor's note: Inaudible]

...to the bar for what we do here. It is absolutely necessary that all financial intermediaries respect the provisions of the act on money laundering and supplying terrorists with money. As lawyers, they can respect the lawyer-client privilege. They have a right to do that. But when they are not acting as lawyers, but as financial intermediaries, that is another matter. In such cases, they would be obligated to report.

Mr. Michel Bellehumeur: I mentioned a number a while ago. Currently, since September 11th, how much money has Canada seized?

[English]

Mr. Jim Peterson: The latest figure is $150,000. There will be further reports coming in to us, and they will have to be refined. As I've said, it's very difficult often to find out for sure whether an account that's been seized is the one that was intended to be frozen. The minister will be giving a report in the not-too-distant future. OSFI is working on refining some of those numbers for us right now.

[Translation]

Mr. Michel Bellehumeur: Would an amount of $150,000 justify that? Do you think you will get more than that?

M. Jim Peterson: Certainly. Even if there wasn't a penny frozen in Canada, we would still have to be in the forefront of the nations to protect people, including Canadians, from terrorism.

Mr. Michel Bellehumeur: But not only on paper; in reality also.

[English]

The Chair: Thank you, Mr. Peterson.

Mr. Owen, for three minutes.

Mr. Stephen Owen (Vancouver Quadra, Lib.): Thank you, Mr. Minister and officials, for appearing before us and giving us your thoughtful comments.

Perhaps I could just ask further questions with respect to the impact this has on lawyers. I think it's true—I think we've mentioned—a lawyer's trust account would be caught under clause 49, under the definition of entity. Under clause 51, lawyers would be caught under the professional category. I heard the answer that professional confidences would remain.

• 1045

I'm just having a little difficulty understanding how you could retain professional confidence at the same time as reporting on a financial transaction. I think there was a suggestion that if you were acting as a conduit for a funding transaction, it would be something different from your solicitor-client privilege. Is that what is being suggested? I'd like to have a bit of a better explanation of why that is so, if that is the intent.

Mr. Jim Peterson: I guess the one possibility would be to say that anything a lawyer does is beyond the reach of the law, with respect to money laundering, helping to fund terrorists, or moving terrorist funds around the world. We don't believe that should be the case.

If a client comes in to a lawyer and says, “I want you to take this $1 million in ten-dollar bills, put it in your trust account and issue me a cheque,” should the lawyer be exempt from that or not, simply because of the privilege we've always accorded to lawyers in dealings with their clients? In that case, the lawyer could say, “Yes, I will deposit this, but I have to report it.” At that point, the client could walk out of his office and the solicitor-client privilege would be respected.

If this committee is telling us that type of transaction should not be caught by this bill, I would like a very clear signal from you.

Mr. Stephen Owen: Okay. Thank you.

I think it is very important to clarify, on the record, that this act already creates, and this amendment bill will create, an exception to the solicitor privilege or confidence with respect to the flow-through of funds that are suspicious by their nature, exceed a certain amount, or are clearly directed toward the financing of crime.

Mr. Jim Peterson: That is not denying anyone the right to get important legal advice from a lawyer. The privilege is still maintained when they do that. But when the lawyer steps beyond the bounds of giving that advice and serves as the financial intermediary, they must report it, as anybody else would have to.

The Chair: Mr. Roy,

a brief answer.

[English]

Mr. Yvan Roy: I'll be very brief, Mr. Chairman. I thank you very much.

The view that is taken by the government is that the solicitor-client privilege is perfectly protected by these provisions. Indeed, section 11, as referred to by Mr. Lalonde, states that clearly, in the Proceeds of Crime (Money Laundering) Act.

What you have, however—and you can refer if you want to the regulations—are the parameters that are given to the transactions a counsel should be able to conduct, without being subjected to the legislation. Let me read very briefly what that is.

The PCMLA includes, according to the regulations, the receiving or paying of funds other than—these would be covered by the privilege—those received or paid in respect of professional fees. So you don't have to disclose professional fees. You don't have to disclose either disbursements, expenses, or bail.

In other words, as the minister is stating, once you're acting as a financial intermediary you're covered; when you're acting as a lawyer, you're protected. That is the view that has been taken by the government. We think that is the state of the law, at least as we understand it.

Thank you, Mr. Chairman.

The Chair: Peter Mackay, for three minutes.

Mr. Peter MacKay: I have just a very brief follow-up question, Mr. Roy, on that point.

I guess it becomes blurry when you're acting as a financial intermediary if you, for example, engage in the setting up of an account for a client. That, to me, falls somewhere in-between the definitions you've just described. I suppose, particularly then, it comes down to the knowledge the lawyer had of the reasons for the account and the source of the funds.

• 1050

I want to thank all of you for being here and for your expertise in this area. I think it is absolutely critical in the war against terrorism to get at the lifeblood and the source of this activity, although I think, sadly, we've all learned that the cost of terrorism is not as high as we thought it might be when it comes to the types of activities they can engage in. Weapons of mass destruction are not necessarily the same as we thought they were before September 11.

More generally, to the minister, does your department envisage the necessity of greater technology in terms of surveillance? What accounting is there for that in your plans? What new powers do you foresee in this information gathering? On the use of electronic eavesdropping through satellites and wiretaps, is that something you can foresee FINTRAC engaging in directly, or will it be entirely left in the hands of the RCMP, CSIS, and Defence?

Mr. Horst Intscher: Thank you, Mr. Chairman.

We have no authority, and seek no authority, to conduct investigations. We are entitled to receive and analyze certain information that financial institutions are obligated to report to the government. We can also access, under arrangements, databases maintained for law enforcement purposes. We are also free to receive voluntarily provided information by law enforcement, or by citizens for that matter. But we are not entitled to go out and seek information through overt or covert investigation. We were created as an analytic body. That's our mandate, and we certainly are not seeking to expand that aspect of our mandate.

The provisions of this bill make it possible for us to look at this same data, not only through the optic of the search for money laundering, but also through the optic of the search for terrorist financing. The provisions in the bill that relate to FINTRAC are simply intended to provide us with the authority to look for a different type of activity in the same data that's already being reported to us.

The Chair: Thank you very much.

Mr. Grose, three minutes.

Mr. Ivan Grose (Oshawa, Lib.): Thank you.

My question may only serve to prove how difficult this is going to be. We talk about confiscation and lifting exemptions for charities. At the moment, the United States and Britain are bombing Afghanistan, in the hope of hitting a few terrorists, I understand. But the United States is also dropping food. The United Nations is supplying food, and half a dozen well-recognized charitable organizations are supplying food.

Inasmuch as we don't know what the terrorists look like, with a couple of exceptions, they are probably benefiting from this food. Food is often used as a weapon of war. How in the world do you separate the wheat from the chaff?

Mr. Jim Peterson: Mr. Grose, you raise one of the very difficult questions we're called upon to face. These are tough calls. The law deals with financing terrorists; it does not proscribe humanitarian efforts to help other people. So one would have to look very closely at every transaction, to make sure that line is drawn.

Mr. Ivan Grose: But it's going to be a very difficult line to draw.

Mr. Jim Peterson: I'm sure the person you should talk to on this is the CCRA minister, Mr. Cauchon. We have about 76,000 to 77,000 registered charities in Canada today, and a lot of these involve those very difficult types of distinctions.

• 1055

Our effort here is to make sure a charity that funds terrorists, or directs money to terrorist activities, is de-certified, has its tax status removed, and has its funds forfeited to other charities or to the crown. Our effort here is to deny tax status to it and the capacity to exist.

In the case where a charity is supplying food to refugees in Afghanistan, I have no doubt the CCRA would tell you that is not financing a terrorist activity.

The Chair: Thank you, Mr. Grose and Mr. Peterson.

At your suggestion, we'll see if we can arrange to have Minister Cauchon here at 11:30.

Some hon. members: Oh, oh!

The Chair: Mr. Fitzpatrick.

Mr. Jim Peterson: I didn't realize I had such power. I've never had that before.

Mr. Brian Fitzpatrick (Prince Albert, Canadian Alliance): Thank you, Mr. Chair, and thank you, gentlemen, for taking the time to come here.

I have some difficulties with the reporting requirements under this legislation. I think Mr. Blaikie raised the point already. Under proposed section 83.1 it's mandatory that you report to the Commissioner of the RCMP and the Director of CSIS if you have funds or assets. I'm sure there are provisions where they have to be frozen as well. Then we have the money laundering requirements, which I'm not totally familiar with, but I imagine they impose burdens and obligations on third parties that are holding assets, and so on.

The question that comes to mind is if we have those two requirements, why do we have proposed section 83.11, where on a monthly basis these institutions have to report to their regulatory agencies with these monthly reports?

I'm going to try to put this in perspective. In Ontario there are probably thousands of financial planners, insurance agents, and small independent operators. They're going to be filing monthly reports, I presume, with the Ontario Securities Commission. I doubt whether the Securities Commission has anybody who's going to monitor and go through these reports. They have lots of obligations already.

What are they supposed to do with these things? By that stage the assets are frozen, this has been reported to the RCMP and CSIS, and the money laundering thing has already kicked in. Now they must also have somebody in business continuously monitoring these accounts and sending these reports to the Securities Commissioner, or, if you're in the insurance business, the Superintendent of Insurance.

So they are getting thousands of pieces of paper every month, and I'm sure they're not going to look through these things. What are they supposed to do—box them up and ship them to the Commissioner of the RCMP, CSIS, or the intelligence community? What's the purpose of this mountain of paperwork that I think you're really creating under proposed section 83.11?

Just as another point, two experts on terrorism were here yesterday. I think they basically said the cattle were out of the barn. This legislation should have been in place a long time ago. The al-Qaeda network is probably underground, and they're three steps ahead of us on this sort of thing.

What's the purpose of the mountain of paperwork under proposed section 83.11?

Mr. Jim Peterson: Look, if this committee today, or after the law is enacted, as you may amend it, has better and less onerous ways to do this, then we welcome those suggestions. We will, I can assure you, be working with financial institutions to try to alleviate that burden as much as possible.

It's obvious why FINTRAC would want this information. We don't want to duplicate its activities. Our financial intermediaries are already reporting to FINTRAC on money laundering, so we think it just makes sense to add one more report, i.e. on terrorist financing. We think that helps the institutions that have to report, as opposed to reporting to a different institution.

You may ask why we want them to report on a monthly basis as well to the Superintendent of Financial Institutions—

Mr. Brian Fitzpatrick: The Securities Commission also.

• 1100

Mr. Jim Peterson: OSFI, which is where we will be getting the reports federally.

Part of the role of OSFI is not to act as a cop but to ensure that these institutions are safe and sound. Part of that investigation into whether an institution is safe and sound, protecting depositors and policyholders, is their system of governance. That goes into OSFI's calculation.

If they get information on the types of activities that are coming through, and can monitor the information that comes in, then that is again one of the aspects of the governance of a particular institution. So that is part of the reason we think it's important that they report to the regulator as well.

I'm not particularly as worried about the big institutions, because they have the capacity to do this, but I think it will be a factor in a lot of smaller institutions being told, “We want you to be very prudent and we want you to adhere to the law as well.”

The Chair: Your time is up, Mr. Fitzpatrick.

Mr. Lee, three minutes.

Mr. Derek Lee (Scarborough—Rouge River, Lib.): Thank you.

Mr. Peterson, as you know, Parliament has a constitution based in unfettered power to send for a person's papers and records, and although that can only be changed explicitly by statute by Parliament, in clause 70, which deals with proposed subsection 59(1) of the proceeds of crime act, the PCMLA, there is wording that refers to the case of an order for production of documents. On the face of it, it might be interpreted to actually impinge on Parliament's constitutional right to send for a person's papers and records.

So my question is, is this why the change in wording to insert conditions on responding to orders for production of documents? Why the change in wording?

Secondly, was it intended to bushwhack Parliament's constitutional right? The answer to that question is either a simple yes or no. If it is yes, we have another set of issues. If it is no, then could we have that confirmation today, or later in writing in due course, so it can be confirmed on the record that it is not the intention of the statute to impinge on Parliament's PPR authority?

Mr. Jim Peterson: I can't imagine, Mr. Lee, that it would be, but I shall ask Mr. Roy to respond to your very precise question.

Mr. Yvan Roy: I would like to give you a precise answer to your precise question, but I'm not sure I would be in a position to do so, because I'm not sure I got the question as clearly as I should.

Section 59, as it is to be amended, simply, by my way of reading it at least, refers to an addition with respect to the financing of terrorist activities. In the production orders, it is with respect to judicial orders that can be issued for the purpose of getting information. I do not see anything in it that would touch in any way, shape, or form the privilege of Parliament to seek information and documents. But I should hear you more.

Mr. Derek Lee: To clarify this, if I may, the wording says that an official at the centre shall reply to an order for production of documents only if there if there is a CSIS act or a certificate referred under section 60.1. There must be a certificate.

If the order for production of documents includes orders that Parliament would make under PPR, then it is arguable that Parliament would have to ensure some kind of a section 60.1 certificate. Of course, that is not the case now, and in my view never should be.

I'm asking for clarification. Why the change in wording to require the certificate? I'm going to assume that no one ever thought of this. The government was not thinking of this—and that's good, ignorance is bliss—but if they were, if someone in government was thinking of parliamentary orders for production when they wrote this, then they're trying to bushwhack Parliament and I want a confirmation of the intention—not just for now but in case this issue comes up later. I want it very clear on the record that it is no one's intention, around this table, in the House, or in government, to impinge on Parliament's PPR. If you read the wording of the section, and consider my words now, I think you'll understand what I'm getting at.

• 1105

Mr. Jim Peterson: Mr. Lee, I can assure you that as we poured through the minutiae of these very detailed amendments, the thought never crossed our minds. But I think it's a very good point you've brought out. I think we owe you a response, and we'll get it to you as soon as possible. Thank you very much for your stellar sweeping.

The Chair: Thank you very much, Mr. Peterson and Mr. Lee.

Mr. Bellehumeur, three minutes.

[Translation]

Mr. Michel Bellehumeur: The current provisions of the Criminal Code have allowed the seizure of $150,000 related to terrorism. We know that in Canada billions of dollars are laundered annually. Even if we increase the infractions, the applicable penalties, and if you get the power to freeze these sums for longer, if there is no political will to conduct inquiries and go the distance, you won't necessarily seize more money. That's what I want you to understand. I'm not saying that it is not necessary. I understand that it is necessary to do so and in fact we are asking that it be done, but we need more than information and powers that are on paper. Political will is needed, and I don't feel that the federal government has it. That was not a question but a comment.

I will now ask my question. It touches on something else that concerns me. Does the proposed section 83.28 apply to lawyers? Can you tell me if subsection 83.28(8) applies to lawyers? If that is not the case, we have a problem.

Mr. Jim Peterson: Thank you Mr. Chairman.

You are right. When we started working on the money laundering bill, we believed that between $5 and $17 billion were being laundered annually. So we have succeeded.

I will let Mr. Roy answer the specific questions you have asked.

Mr. Yvan Roy: Thank you Minister.

Your questions, Mr. Bellehumeur, bring me to a clause in the bill that allows for a specific kind of inquiry.

Mr. Michel Bellehumeur: You are forcing someone to testify.

Mr. Yvan Roy: We are forcing someone to testify. I believe that the Minister of Justice said to you that this means of inquiry is already allowed under other acts. In fact, because here it can be used in cases of mutual assistance.

You are asking if a lawyer could be called to testify before this committee. The answer is yes since there are no limitations in this area.

A lawyer can be called upon to testify before any court of law but there are limits as to what he can say during his testimony and the court will recognize those limits. What are they? The lawyer-client privilege.

If you are a lawyer, that does not mean that you can't testify or be forced to do so, but there are impassable limits, in other words that privilege we all know.

The Vice-Chair (Mr. Denis Paradis): Thank you very much Mr. Roy and Mr. Bellehumeur.

We will move on to Mr. McKay.

[English]

Mr. McKay.

Mr. John McKay: The way in which money is traditionally transferred from jurisdiction to jurisdiction in certain countries is a fairly informal network. Literally, somebody will walk into a shop on the Danforth, write a cheque for $1,000, the individual will charge a fee and phone somebody in another country, Afghanistan, Pakistan, you name the country, and the transaction is completed.

• 1110

The British bill I think—and I'm not absolutely certain, having gone through it—provides for seizure of cash really in any form, and there's no $10,000 threshold or anything like that.

I don't really know whether this is a large item or a small item. I do know it is a traditional way of doing transactions in certain kinds of cultures. I would expect that at least criminal activity takes place in these kinds of transactions. Certainly it's not all criminal activity by any means—there may not even be large percentages of criminal activity—but I should imagine it would be a way of doing transactions that defeats the intention.

Can you give to this committee any assurances, either within this bill or outside of this bill, that those kinds of transactions, if you will the nickel and dime transactions, are being monitored, and whether in fact... I'll put it dramatically: this bill seems to cover the big ones, but there's a whole bunch of fish swimming through the net because the net is not tight enough.

Mr. Jim Peterson: Thank you, Mr. McKay.

I have no terribly satisfactory answer for you on this. A Hawala-type operation is an alternative remittance system. It is, we believe, caught by the current money laundering law and will also be caught under the terrorist provisions that are brought in to the bill.

Having said that, we then go from a question of what can you do to stop these things to recognizing that they may be highly movable and portable, that they may not have a big infrastructure, and certainly are not registered.

One of the discussions we're undertaking with our international counterparts, and it will be a big part of the discussions of the Financial Action Task Force on Money Laundering on this is how can we deal with this type of informal, non-registered, highly mobile type of remittance system?

Dave, maybe you'd like to say something about this. Maybe, Horst, you have some thoughts on it.

Mr. Horst Intscher: I would note that, in our view, these types of remittance systems are caught under the definition of money services businesses, and therefore are subject to the record keeping and reporting requirements of the Proceeds of Crime (Money Laundering) Act. They will be subject to compliance audits by FINTRAC, as are other money services businesses.

In addition, to the extent that they do not reveal themselves to us as reporting entities, when their remittances in any way come in contact with the regular, the formal financial system, there will be an additional means of ascertaining what their activities are and taking steps to bring them into compliance with the act.

If they fail to comply with the record keeping and reporting requirements, they are opening themselves up to serious sanction under the provisions of the act that relate to failing to report. Perhaps Mr. Beer might have something to add.

The Chair: Mr. Beer.

Supt Dave Beer: The question is a very astute one, and there's no question that informal systems such as you described will pose quite a challenge.

• 1115

Let me revert to the question raised earlier by Mr. Peter MacKay about the importance of international communication and understanding. The extent to which these informal systems exist, and taking the opportunities to learn more about them; the extent to which they will be more difficult to trap, inasmuch as they're outside of the traditional banking sector or the traditional financial sector; the extent to which we can use other investigative techniques and powers, dealing with them more in terms of a substantive offence than purely a money laundering offence or a terrorist funding activity—these will be important to gaining some success. But you're absolutely right; it would be very challenging.

The Chair: Thank you very much, Mr. Beer.

Mr. Peter MacKay.

Mr. Peter MacKay: Thank you, Mr. Chair. To all of you again, I'm very heartened to hear the minister say, in a very frank way, that this is going to take some time. We're not always going to get it right. We're going to learn from the experience of other countries. I think that's a very healthy approach to take, Minister. This is something we're all going to be going through collectively, both here in this country and across the world.

I have two very quick questions, specifically to follow up my colleague, Mr. Bellehumeur. The first deals with the investigative hearings described at proposed subsection 83.28(8), in clause 4. I believe that is the specific subsection that talks about exemptions from disclosure of things that might otherwise be considered privileged, both as to demands for testimony and the production of documents, which might crop up in the case of a lawyer representing a client.

The other question I had relates specifically to instances where there has been a seizure, for whatever period of time. I think we can all foresee instances where, because of the complexity of cases involving financial transactions—and I've been involved in ones that dealt with vehicles or with incredible volumes of documents because of the attempts to avoid leaving a money trail... I'm wondering what safeguards there are for those whose assets have been seized.

Mr. Roy, you referred to the fact that cases may come to light—sometimes months or years down the road—where considerable sums of money have been frozen. Is there a compensatory scheme? Is there recourse for an individual to say, “Look, I've lost a great deal of money in interest while my assets have been tied up through this procedure”? Is there a fallback for them? God forbid that this happen, but it could, and it has in the past.

The Chair: Mr. Roy.

Mr. Yvan Roy: Thank you, Mr. Chairman.

As I indicated when I tried to answer a question from the other Mr. McKay, the law as it stands continues to apply in those circumstances. If there were, on the part of the state, negligence that could be ascribed to the behaviour, the law will continue to apply. Therefore redress would be available before the appropriate courts in those circumstances.

I also expressed, when I answered the question coming from Mr. McKay, the thought, and certainly the wish, that the guidelines given to government officials are to use provisions like this only in appropriate cases. We are not supposed to use provisions like this to go on a wild goose chase.

That is certainly not what is expected and not what has happened with respect to money laundering, for which we've had such provisions. We've had experience for the past 13 or 14 years, and it has not happened. It is not expected that it will happen with the provisions proposed to Parliament for adoption here. They are targeted to terrorism, but sit within the general context of the law. The protections that exist in that context continue to apply here. There is nothing removing governmental actions here from the general application of the law.

Mr. Peter MacKay: No, I appreciate that.

The Chair: Thank you very much. I have to go to Madam Allard.

Madam Allard.

[Translation]

Ms. Carole-Marie Allard (Laval East, Lib.): I have a question for Mr. Roy. Mr. Roy, you have often testified before our committee regarding the study of another bill that was very important for my constituents of Laval-East.

• 1120

In fact, you know that once again last weekend a young teenager was shot by a biker. That is very tragic.

Previously we studied an antigang bill and now we are looking at an antiterrorist bill. Can you tell us if the concept of participation in the antigang bill is related to the one in the antiterrorist bill? I know that this is not about finances, but I would like to benefit from Mr. Roy's knowledge.

Mr. Yvan Roy: Thank you madam.

I worked closely on the development of the bill to which you refer, C-24. My involvement in the preparation of Bill C-36 was not as great since I had changed jobs in the meantime. However I am happy to say that the concepts in Bill C-24 were used by the writers of Bill C-36. Incidentally, the participation and facilitation concepts that were studied by this committee in the context of Bill C-24 are in Bill C-36. If they were relevant for C- 24, they should also be for C-36.

Ms. Carole-Marie Allard: I would like to ask you another question Mr. Roy. We have the impression that the antiterrorist bill broadens the powers of the Federal Court, gives certain powers to the judges of the Superior Court and also to the judges of Court of Quebec to decide on releases. In the end, are we not diluting the powers of the judicial system by giving multiple jurisdictions to multiple courts? Have we considered the creation of a special tribunal for terrorists acts so that it could rule on a case from beginning to end?

Mr. Yvan Roy: As far as I know, there has been no question of creating a specific special court for this. It has been established—and you yourself have remarked that it is in the Bill—that there must be judicial supervision of many powers given to the State. That is why the judges of different jurisdictions have supervisory responsibilities.

The basic principle adopted is that when federal government measures are at issue, we use the Federal Court to decide and supervise the judicial powers, and when the case is more provincial in nature we use the provincial and superior courts to supervise everything.

We have created special tribunals in very special cases. I do not believe that this is something that we should favour. I prefer to have judges with an extensive knowledge of the law look at these questions and consider the numerous elements and interests that have to be taken into account in such difficult circumstances.

The Chair: Thank you Ms. Allard and Mr. Roy.

[English]

A last question goes to Mr. Sorenson.

Mr. Kevin Sorenson (Crowfoot, Canadian Alliance): Thank you, Mr. Chairman.

I want to thank you for coming. I found this very fascinating. When we talk about the war on terrorism, obviously travel and dollars—being able to limit their financing—are two of the key roles in fighting terrorism.

Part of what we're concerned with here is there are no institutions, I would imagine, here in Canada with “Al-Qaeda Inc.” bank accounts. We realize from witnesses there are many small cell groups active in Canada. CSIS has said there have been 50 organizations raising money for terrorist organizations in the past. So we know there are large organizations, but there are also these little cell groups. In the past week, in Fort McMurray, three terrorists were arrested with 15 different aliases and all these different credit cards.

• 1125

What I'm driving at is this. Various financial institutions are going to be required to determine if these larger organizations are active in their territory and using their banks as an institution. But how effective are little banks in Fort McMurray, with three individuals—and maybe another four individuals in a small little cell group—going to be?

And what is the cost to them going to be? Have we anticipated any administrative costs we can expect these administrations to have to come up with ?

We talk about summary convictions, and you also mentioned that larger institutions may be able to handle or absorb these. Summary convictions of $100,000 may be a fairly small conviction for a very large group, but these little cell groups... My concern is—though I never really thought I'd ever hear myself say this—for some of the institutions. Are they going to put someone in charge of that?

My other question, very quickly, involves the example where $150,000 has been seized. How many different groups are represented within this dollar amount, and how did it come about? Did it come about as a result of banking institutions coming to CSIS or RCMP, or did it come about through the RCMP saying: “These are individuals; let's seize their personal accounts”?

The Chair: Thank you, Mr. Sorenson.

Mr. Peterson.

Mr. Jim Peterson: Thank you very much, Mr. Sorenson.

On your second point, the $150,000 that was announced previously was the result of financial institutions coming forward, having recognized some of the terrorists who were listed.

On your issue concerning small financial institutions, maybe in smaller communities, not having the resources, to the extent they're linked into one of the major financial institutions I suspect it will not be long before they are online with certain types of communications systems that will hopefully alleviate this burden.

I know part of the work of FINTRAC and Horst Intscher is not to act as cops, but to work with all types of institutions on implementation. Maybe he could say a few words about that.

Mr. Horst Intscher: The approach we are going to take with all reporting entities, really, is to work with them in partnership to help them understand their compliance responsibilities and achieve compliance in as easy and unburdensome a way as possible.

To assist them in making some of the determinations they have to make, we have issued some guidelines. We will be continually revising the guidelines, to flag for them things they should keep in mind when they conduct transactions. Also, to help them report to us in a simple manner, we're establishing very simple electronic reporting means that they'll be able to use.

We will be calling on them periodically to ask if they have any problems and whether we can help them or help provide training materials.

Mr. Kevin Sorenson: Some of these are very small credit unions—

The Chair: Mr. Peterson wants to make another point, Mr. Sorenson, and this will be the final point.

Mr. Jim Peterson: Having been so graciously cut off, thanks, Mr. Chairman.

The Chair: Not at all.

[Translation]

M. Jim Peterson: I would like to answer Mr. Bellehumeur's question. Do we have the will to go after the money launderers and the terrorists?

I can assure all of you that there is a great will to do so within the government. We will do everything in our power, everything possible, which should be the duty of every one of us.

[English]

I want to thank you all very much, Mr. Chairman, and especially you, for this opportunity to appear before you. If you have other questions arising out of your deliberations that involve us, we'll be pleased to work with you. Good luck.

The Chair: I'm sure you've enjoyed your first appearance before the justice committee so much you'll be anxious to come back.

Mr. Jim Peterson: Certainly.

The Chair: I would also note, further to your suggestion earlier that we have the minister responsible for the CCRA drop by, that our staff here is capable of practically anything. We're going to suspend, to allow the opportunity to change cards, and we'll have the minister responsible for CCRA before us very shortly.

October 30, 2001

Mr. Michel Bellehumeur (Berthier—Montcalm, BQ): First of all, I would like to thank you for joining in with all the others who have voiced their concerns regarding the possible application of Bill C-36. Quite sincerely, I agree with everything you have said, from A to Z. I have been saying the same things over and over again ever since the bill was first tabled.

To sum up, the way the bill is drafted, there is the possibility of abuses, and I think that all six of you share this point of view. You are not questioning the rationale for such legislation, but it does allow for abuses. Individual rights and freedoms, and even the rights and freedoms of society, could be threatened by potential abuses of the legislation.

The bill places far too much power in the hands of individuals. The balance that the government has been trying so hard to attain, which seems to have been an important element right from the outset, is the balance between national security and rights and freedoms. Obviously, this objective has not been reached. I think that everyone also agrees that a sunset clause is needed.

Here is my question: Would it be possible to add something to this bill that would shed more light on the rationale for its introduction? I will explain what I mean by that.

I am convinced that we need such legislation, if only to implement here in Canada certain international conventions that we have yet to implement. We also need such legislation to deal with the whole problem of money laundering. At present, Canada is far, far too lax, and we really have to think about this problem.

Yet it seems to me that something is lacking. I am thinking aloud along with you, and I would like you to tell me whether I am completely mistaken or if it would be possible to do a better job of delineating the reasons for such legislation and the way we would like to see it applied in Canada. I think that a precondition is missing for the application of Bill C-36.

I know there are provisions in the Criminal Code... I do not have an example with me, but at the very beginning of the Criminal Code, there is a section on people who threaten the stability of the government or the democratic nature of a government. The offence is set out at the very beginning of the Criminal Code. We should add a similar precondition to Bill C-36, saying that the legislation applies once the offence has been proved beyond all reasonable doubt.

I am also worried about the new principles having to do with suspicion, etc. Could we use the principles that are well-known in Canada that say "when there are reasonable grounds to believe that such and such an individual or such and such an organization is threatening the democratic nature" or "attempts to overthrow a government or destabilize it financially or an order of government politically?" Could we use something like that? I have not made up my mind about the terms of the definition, but could we add some kind of precondition for the application of the legislation, which would naturally go along with a sunset clause requiring a review and Parliament voting on the legislation again, since this is such an exceptional piece of legislation?

Could that reassure the people who are worried that the use of Bill C-36 could harm people's individual and collective rights?

October 30, 2001

Mr. Michel Bellehumeur: I think that you're right to say that in times of crisis we must be careful not to go to the other extreme. Right now, Canadians and Quebeckers are looking for security because of the events we all know about. They're going to grasp at anything we give them if we tell them it's good for national security and their own security. You can be sure that people will grasp at that. I think you have the right to ring the alarm when things go too far and you're doing that this morning. As parliamentarians, we must listen to what you are saying.

We must look at this as objectively as possible without getting into specifics, without grasping at that false sense of security. It must be said that no legislation is going to stop men or women who decide to die for a cause. Yes, you can have legislation, but you also have to look for balance. We don't have that balance here. Quite clearly, we don't have it.

As far as I'm concerned, I'm in favour of a sunset clause. I'm also in favour of respecting international conventions. But the way it's worded... Even international conventions, as you said earlier, refer to certain clauses of the Criminal Code. I have some serious problems right now. Yes, I want those international conventions, but they refer to clauses of the Criminal Code which actually go very far concerning hazardous products. When ordinary people stand in front of a truck carrying nuclear products, that is considered a terrorist act.

I think that the hate propaganda provisions aren't a problem, anymore than those that pertain to laundering proceeds of crime. I also think that the registry of charity organizations, except for the very secret part of putting people on the list or not, is still acceptable, depending on a review of those cases. However, for the rest of the legislation, I would like to see a sunset clause.

In the U.S.A., there is a sunset clause setting out that it's for three years, renewable for two years thereafter; so it's a maximum of five years. In France, the legislation clearly spells out that it dies on December 31, 2003. I think that it's even more complex in Great Britain: there are things that are done every year with some kind of vote. I think it would be normal to do that here, save for the exceptions I've just mentioned. Do you agree on that?

• 1105

Mr. Pierre Bosset: Yes, generally speaking. The time limit is necessary and it is even in the spirit of the international conventions on human rights that Canada has ratified, which provide that in times of emergency, you can temporarily suspend human rights on condition you say so. In this case, we did not proclaim a state of emergency. We could have done that. Canada does have an Emergency Measures Act that was passed here a dozen years ago but it wasn't raised in this case. But we are faced with exceptional circumstances and everyone agrees on that. And because we are facing exceptional circumstances, this bill has to be limited as to its duration.

I think the enumeration of the nevralgic or problematic aspects of the bill that you've made are pretty close to the consensus of the witnesses you have before you. At the very least, I think the lawmaker would not err in attaching a sunset clause to the provisions you've just mentioned.

[English]

October 30, 2001

Prof. Julius Grey: As to the first part, I agree with you. Raising funds is not economic, it's an issue of property or direct working of a terrorist organization. It's the same thing as happens with a criminal gang, a Mafia, in Canada. It's just as criminal to launder their money as it is to do the actual violent business they may be doing. That's not economics. It's the same with destruction of property. I don't object in that area, because when you destroy property, you may also destroy people—setting fire to something destroys both. That's not what I worry about.

What I worry about is disruption to people's economic interests, and there you're perfectly right. You're saying there could be tremendous havoc with our markets with all sorts of things. I agree with you, and I think these things can be prohibited. For instance, I don't know if you followed the case, but a 16-year-old hacker in Montreal did a tremendous amount of damage. A hacker can do a considerable amount of harm. Nevertheless, I think we must distinguish between that and terrorism. The reason I don't want activities that are intended, for instance, to harm the economy, so-called economic espionage etc., to count as terrorism is not that I think these are nice and proper things for people to do, but that I think they should be dealt with under the normal Criminal Code provisions. They do not deal with that type of intimidation, a threat to somebody's life or direct property, setting fire, throwing bombs, sending envelopes full of white powder, whether or not they contain the suspect substance. That is a different type of terror and a different type of intimidation.

I bring back my point. There are a great many things people do in our society that are terrible. If we classify too many of them as terrorist, we're basically undoing the whole idea, because they're no longer that exceptional and that special. So with the economic stuff, it's not that I wish to approve, for instance, harming markets intentionally, it's that I don't think they amount to terrorism, and there is a provision in the Criminal Code.

October 31, 2001

Ms. Pierrette Venne: I have one final question to ask.

Since the coming into force of the Proceeds of Crime Act, many lawyers have come to complain about the new provisions being imposed upon them. They are required to declare suspicious operations. They have told the media and everyone who would listen that this is an infringement on solicitor-client privilege and that it will turn lawyers into informants working for the State. We know that in the future, under Bill C-36, the Money Laundering Act will also cover the funding of terrorist activities. This is what will be in force.

Given that lawyers are not supposed to facilitate crime, why are these lawyers coming to tell us that they feel constrained by this Money Laundering Act which will heretofore also apply to the funding of terrorist activities? Do you have an explanation to give us in this regard?

The Chair: Mr. Potter.

Mr. Simon Potter: Madam, thank you for giving me the opportunity to speak to you about this matter, because it is often misunderstood.

Lawyer associations have never come to ask that lawyers be allowed to commit crimes. That is not it. What we want to do is to protect the confidentiality of what a client may tell his or her lawyer. This confidentiality is absolutely essential to the proper administration of justice and to the protection of individuals vis-à-vis the State, vis-à-vis their adversaries, vis-à-vis their competitors. Without this confidentiality, clients will not be open with their lawyers. This confidentiality must be protected.

With regard to the proceeds of crime and, now, terrorist activities, clients must be able to speak openly to their lawyer without the latter suddenly feeling the need to right away run to the police to report some suspicious thing that his or her client may have revealed. We must protect the confidentiality of the solicitor-client relationship. This does not mean that lawyers must be allowed to participate in these crimes, not at all, but the lawyer who is told something by his or her client must be allowed to keep this information confidential.

The Chair: Mr. Lomer.

Mr. Michael Lomer: In the course of my function as a defence lawyer, I may have clients confess all sorts of things to me. If it were the law that I had to then tell the crown what that confession was—and then turn myself into a witness, I might add—our administration of justice would cease to function. It just would not work, because defence lawyers would then be perceived, quite accurately, as being Trojan horses for the prosecution. That's not the way we work it in an adversarial system.

On that point, I point to proposed subsection 83.1(1), where it says a person in Canada has to tell both the RCMP commissioner and the director of CSIS. Is there some sort of jurisdictional thing that you have to tell both of them? I don't get that. Is it to keep the left and the right hands knowing what's going on at the same time?

Leaving aside that curious “and”, the part I draw your attention to is information about a transaction—

[Translation]

Ms. Pierrette Venne: What provision are you speaking about?

Mr. Simon Potter: It is proposed section 83.1, Madam.

[English]

Mr. Michael Lomer: If you look at proposed paragraph 83.1(1)(b), where it talks about “information about a transaction”, that clearly would be a transaction in the past. If I were defending somebody, that would mean if my client came to me and told me about that transaction, under this law I would be required to turn around and tell the commissioner of the RCMP and the director of CSIS. That's a clear violation of solicitor-client privilege. The section has to be changed. It has to at least acknowledge that defence lawyers defending people charged with these offences can actually receive information without the obligation to turn it over to the police.

The Chair: Thank you.

I think Mr. Ouimet wants to speak to this, and then I'm going to go to Madam Carroll and Mr. MacKay. We're over time here.

[Translation]

Mr. Ouimet.

Mr. Gilles Ouimet: With regard to the solicitor-client relationship in particular, there is also a provision according to which a lawyer may not divulge the fact that he or she has made a report or has communicated the information required under the law.

This provision will undermine the very basis of the trust relationship between a lawyer and his or her client, to the extent that the client will have no way of knowing if his or her lawyer has made such a declaration or not. This is a provision that may cause problems in certain situations.

The Chair: Thank you very much.

[English]

Madam Carroll, for three minutes, and then Peter MacKay.

Ms. Aileen Carroll (Barrie—Simcoe—Bradford, Lib.): Thank you, Mr. Chair.

Fortunately for me, since I have only three minutes, John McKay asked Mr. Potter a lot of what I wanted to ask, so it's on the record and I'm grateful for that.

Mr. Potter, I would just like to ask you, in reference to page 15 of your brief and the sunsetting, is the bar recommending that the entire bill be sunsetted when you say that? In the second paragraph you say there are some portions that are of general value and should be retained past the operation. Could you just elaborate on that?

Mr. Simon Potter: Thank you very much. By the way, as you come from the riding where my brother lives, it's a question I'm very happy to answer for his benefit.

Ms. Aileen Carroll: I'll tell him.

Mr. Simon Potter: There are three sections in the bill that deal with hate crimes, for example, that make them hate crimes even if they are carried over the Internet. We have no problem with those three sections, and in our submission we identify precisely which three sections they are. We want the rest of the bill sunsetted. We don't see a need to sunset those three.

Ms. Aileen Carroll: I have a supplementary question, Mr. Chair.

I've had some people mention to me that sunsetting would create a dilemma for a defence lawyer, that he's in a process, looking at a timeline, and evidence is going to be submitted. Would a sunset clause have a negative impact on his or her ability to defend?

Mr. Simon Potter: Well, my answer is there should be no problem with a sunset clause. What we are dealing with here is essentially massive increases in police powers, and I don't see any difficulty with those police powers—which didn't exist yesterday, which apparently will exist in a few weeks time—not existing in a few years. I don't see the difficulty there.

Some people have suggested you don't want to find yourself in the middle of a police investigation and suddenly have your power disappear. I can understand it might be problematic for the police, but we don't run our society for the police.

• 1735

Ms. Aileen Carroll: Thank you.

I have one last question, for Professor Magnet. I listened carefully to what you said about this bill being modelled on the United Kingdom's bill of 2000, that we aren't the U.K., we don't have Northern Ireland, and we're not a superpower, and generally, you hit a lot of chords with me. Do you think a sunset clause is sufficient, then, to take out a bill that is, in your view, so untypically Canadian?

Prof. Joe Elliot Magnet: I think a sunset clause is necessary for the reasons my colleagues have put forward, but I don't think it's sufficient; in other words, I have not seen the justification put forward for these powers. So I fear that even if we were to clean up our act in three or five years, we still would have eroded our juridical culture, we would have damaged our society, we would have created disaffection, and possibly we would have done some good, but we've seen no justification that we would. In other words, we lack the strategic dimension here as to what we're responding to. We all know about September 11, but we don't know anything else. So until that justification is made, until we have better strategic information, I would say these measures are not to be implemented.

Ms. Aileen Carroll: Do the Brits have a sunset clause?

Prof. Joe Elliot Magnet: No.

November 1, 2001

Ms. Pierrette Venne: Thank you, Mr. Chairman.

I would like to talk about the financing of terrorism activities. As you know, on Monday of this week, the American secretary asked international financial action groups to draw up international criteria to counter the financing of terrorism.

I'd like to ask you whether you believe it is possible to arrive at a consensus on the means to take to curtail the financing of terrorist activities. According to you, what should those criteria be?

• 1115

Perhaps we could include them in Bill C-36, since we are amending the Proceeds of Crime (Money Laundering) Act, and add the financing of terrorist activities to our changes.

[English]

The Chair: Mr. Westwick.

Mr. Vincent Westwick: This is a difficult question to answer because grappling with the aspects of financing of terrorism is new to all of us. What has impressed us in the bill is that there are tools provided. I would simply repeat the point that Mr. Adkins made the last time, namely that we're not sure whether they will be adequate enough; we're not sure of their full application, but we like what we see so far.

The Chair: Mr. Adkins.

Det S/Sgt Brian Adkins: I think that's a very challenging question as well. I don't know whether you could get an answer to that question right now with the urgency of this bill. But I think it raises a valid point that should be considered down the road.

The other thing is we are unique in Canada, and it's very important that we take a look and ask what's going to be affected here. There may be things we may agree with internationally. There may be things we can't agree with. So I think whatever we do has to be tailored in Canada. The chiefs have many relationships back and forth with policing across the world, and of course you're familiar with Interpol. I think those are issues. But that's a question that has to be studied to get a successful answer.

The Chair: Mr. Obst.

Const Grant Obst: Just quickly, I think Madame Venne has hit on a good point. I can't address specifically your question with respect to financing of terrorism. But there are a number of additional tools laid out in this bill that many of us in law enforcement, even the more mature investigators, are going to be dealing with for the first time. We've been talking about a sunset clause and about a review and about timing for any one of those, and I'm thinking that what we should probably be talking about is some strategy where we stay in touch with each other—not constantly; I think heard the amount of time of six months talked about. That might not be a good idea and perhaps that should be examined a little closer, so that we can see how these new things are working. Mr. Niebudek indicated we may be back saying they're not working—we need this changed, we need that changed—and I don't think we should lose sight of that.

The Chair: Mr. Knight.

Mr. Leo Knight: Thank you, Mr. Chairman.

In response to the member's question, I referred in my presentation to a report from the assistant director of Interpol to a subcommittee on crime in Washington, D.C. I have a copy of that report. If the member would like, I can make it available to him.

The Chair: Thank you very much.

And now to Mr. Owen for three minutes.

Mr. Stephen Owen (Vancouver Quadra, Lib.): Thank you all for appearing before us today.

I'd like to make just one observation. First of all, we've talked a lot regularly in this committee about the extraordinary new powers of this bill. It's a complicated, large bill and it addresses very important issues before us.

But I think it's useful to remember that much of what is in this bill is simply an extension of what we already have. I am thinking of many of the tools that have been provided to deal with organized crime before, whether it's with respect to money laundering, proceeds of crime, or electronic surveillance, whether it's the penalties, whether it's participating, directing, or facilitating those criminal organizations. I suppose it's not unusual that these are simply applied now to terrorism, because terrorist organizations are the ultimate criminal organization.

But when we talk about these extraordinary powers we realize that most of them already exist. Even the investigative hearing exists now in the mutual legal assistance provisions we have with respect to cooperation with other countries.

I'd like to place two questions that relate to that statement. One is with respect to the cooperation among law enforcement agencies, particularly internationally, given what we know about the international quality of terrorist organizations. It speaks to the situation that is sometimes called subcontracting. This may be part of the concern with the extended powers to the CSE to intercept communications that begin or are directed to Canada when they have a foreign target.

In the past there has been concern that security forces in different countries do in each other's countries what they are not allowed to do in their own countries without judicial authorization and then swap the information.

• 1120

First of all, I'd like to know if that happens. If it happens, is it necessary for it to happen in order to deal with the international nature of crime? If it is necessary for it to happen, do these new powers to the CSE allow security forces, intelligence forces, to do within a new prescribed law what they feel is necessary, but were not able to do within the law previously?

The second question goes to the convergence of terrorism and organized crime. It has been suggested certainly to me in previous inquiries I've been involved with that organized crime actually has a very strategic reason for financing terrorism, and that's because it diverts resources.

What we're seeing immediately now from complaints or concerns expressed by people in Montreal is their worry that the resources are going to be diverted from the initiative towards organized crime, which hits that area of Canadian society in a particularly violent way, to terrorism. It would seem to me, if that is the case and there is some redirection going on, it may at least prove the objective of the point that was made earlier, that organized crime is financing terrorism. I wonder if any of you might have any comments on those two questions.

The Chair: Thank you very much.

First, Mr. Westwick.

Mr. Vincent Westwick: On the first point about agencies doing work in other countries and then exchanging—that sort of thing—quite frankly, I'd never heard about that until I heard about it on TV the other night. It's not something that happens in the police world. It's not a regular practice at all. I can't speak for the intelligence community in that sense, but it certainly doesn't happen in the police community. In addition to the ethics of policing, I think there are also the charter applications in terms of the evidentiary value of the fruits of that kind of exercise. They would be very questionable. But I would say that's simply not the way police in Canada do business.

The Chair: Mr. Niebudek.

Mr. Mike Niebudek: I'll cover your two questions, but you did make a comment about the sunset clause before, and I'm amazed as to the amount of attention this sunset clause issue is getting.

First of all, if one were to tell me that they expect in two years to get rid of terrorism, I would ask them what colour the sky is in their world. It's not going to happen. We know that. That's a given.

So why are we knocking a sunset clause for this particular bill when we're not doing it for Bill C-24, for example, or any other bill that we've enacted to protect society because of new trends and new ways people are committing crimes. That's a comment on that issue.

As for the CSE, the Communications Security Establishment, I digress, like my colleague from the chiefs association. I can't answer that question. That's probably one question that would be left to the intelligence community, as was mentioned.

With regard to the organized crime funds diverted into terrorism, it is not something I am personally aware of. The only thing I've heard was one of the media a couple of days ago alluded to that. If members of organized crime divert funds into terrorism or other organizations, then they're dealt with as terrorists according to the....

The Chair: Thank you very much.

Mr. Adkins is next.

Det S/Sgt Brian Adkins: Yes, I think the first question is a difficult one to answer, and as I said, it's best left to other people who are in that business.

With regard to the second question, I think you make an important nexus, Mr. Owen, between organized crime and between terrorism, because many times terrorism has been financed by the activities of organized crime. It's just under a different area. When you start hearing about false identifications and all these other things, these are all part and parcel of the issue. I think it's important to recognize that.

It's important to recognize as well that the terrorist investigations are things that will be going on. Those other investigations will continue at the same time. Sometimes they will be the same people in relation to those organized crime activities—those credit card activities, those things that strike at the heart of the economy and that debilitate everyone.

Mr. Stephen Owen: We may not need parallel resources. The same resources can be targeted at both.

Det S/Sgt Brian Adkins: Well, I don't think that will be possible just because of the type of people you're looking at and the types of groups that are there. As a result of September 11, you have an issue that has to be dealt with, and there have to be resources committed to that. You're not going to be able to say we're going to get two abilities here to do something. You're going to have to say we're committed to that.

The Chair: Leo Knight.

Mr. Leo Knight: Thank you, Mr. Chairman.

Mr. Owen, in response to the second part of your question, as a former deputy attorney general of British Columbia, I know you worked extensively with the former Coordinated Law Enforcement Unit. You appreciate the difficulties and the intrinsic complexity of an organized crime investigation.

• 1125

You can take it that because of the convergence with terrorism we're seeing—and certainly this has been demonstrated in a number of matters, such as fake identities and identity theft, etc.—the complexity of those types of investigations is increasing exponentially. I know you're aware of just how complex and how difficult they are. Well, they've just become a lot more difficult.

The Chair: Ms. Boniface.

Commr Gwen Boniface: I wanted to add something on the link that I think exists between organized crime and terrorism in terms of funding.

There's great opportunity for organized crime to take advantage when governments' economies have been destabilized. As we see in areas of the world where we have officers working in UN missions, organized crime greatly takes advantage of the instability of the country.

I would make the link from that front as well as in terms of organized crime and terrorism. On the second front, in the sense of their high levels of organization, the clandestine work and sophistication and money organized crime and terrorist groups have gives them very similar abilities to work amongst and inside groups and evade law enforcement, strictly because of how well funded they are.

November 1, 2001

Mr. James Aldridge: I appreciate that, Mr. Chairman. I do appreciate it, and let me end with this. It's in the conclusion of my paper, but I would like to say it.

There is a kind of pattern that has emerged in the last year or so in the way we as a country are reacting to a number of evils that confront us. In order to combat evil, money laundering for example, Parliament has enacted a law that has been challenged by law societies for overreaching itself and affecting solicitor-client privilege. I understand that this matter will be proceeding into the courts on the alleged overreach of the money-laundering bill: a recognized evil and an overreach.

Last spring the House passed Bill C-24 on organized crime, which is now before the Senate. It recognized the evil of organized crime and the necessity to pass laws about organized crime, but that included provisions enabling designated police officers to commit acts and/or omissions that would otherwise constitute crimes. In my view and the view of many other people, that is overreaching the power needed to combat the evil. In order to pursue the legitimate fight against evils of terrorism, the government has now presented a bill that, despite the best intentions of the drafters, may result in overreaching, with draconian measures being taken against legitimate political dissent and potentially subjecting Canadians to dire consequences without basic procedural standards.

I suppose the general point I would make to parliamentarians is try to focus—if I may say this with the greatest of respect—on the precise evil you are trying to address and restrict the laws to those evils. I think that will result in a healthier evolution of our legal system.

November 6, 2001

Mr. Stephen Owen (Vancouver Quadra, Lib.): Thank you all for being here, including Professor Mendes. I hope he can stay for a couple more minutes. Time is short, and we could use many hours to gain from your experience.

I have a few comments that might attract some reply. Professor Cameron's ideological profiling is an interesting idea around ideological, religious, and political motivation. In fact, it's intended to profile people with those motivations who intend to intimidate by committing very serious crimes. So within that subset of perversity that would cause people to intend to intimidate through very serious crimes, you're trying to profile, but I can see that this causes anxiety, and I can understand that.

• 1655

I'm wondering whether a non-discrimination clause, one making it clear in the definition section what the purpose of the inclusion of motivation is, might be of assistance.

Sunset, not sunset, is it... does it perhaps... Professor Mendes, because the court sees justice as not being static, would the court perhaps be more likely to find some of the unique provisions constitutional at this time if they knew there were a sunset clause? That's a question.

The problem with lists and the unfairness that can occur, a problem we're all wrestling with and one you raised, is that the proceeds of or for crime, a real target of this legislation, requires, as we've heard, a lot about freezing. You have to have a process where you can both give notice and have an immediate effect, and that's something that will be a bit of a challenge.

From an international point of view, in particular with respect to the U.K., Amnesty International has often been very critical of security forces using pre-emptive killings of IRA operatives. One of the things about preventive arrest is that it's within the law, a very measured, overseen process, designed to avoid putting security forces in the position of facing imminent and very serious consequences by moving outside the law or even being instructed to move outside the law in those cases.

Professor Schwartz, in terms of customary and conventional international law, I think that the purpose—and you may have identified this—of that exemption was to exempt those involved in an armed conflict that might come within international law's definition of a just struggle against oppression. It might also come under the international law prohibition against targeting non-combatants, as you've mentioned, and that would apply to states as well as, I would think, to...

November 6, 2001

Mr. Stephen Owen: Thank you to Professor Schwartz in particular, because you referred to the CBA brief.

One of the deep and enduring difficulties the CBA has is with the effect on solicitor-client privilege or relationship. Of course this isn't new in this legislation; it was in the money-laundering legislation previously and has now been extended to cover terrorism and proceeds of crime.

It occurs to me—and I'd value your comment on this—that the problem we're getting here is that the historical relationship between solicitor and client, or barrister and client, grew out of a judicial process, but the practice of law has broadened to such an extent that many solicitors are simply performing functions that some other financial officer might perform. Therefore, the bar is caught in the breadth of its practice, which is good, but the threat to a privilege that was meant to apply to a much narrower practice traditionally.

Of course, the difficulty with having this breadth of practice and having solicitor-client privilege apply to the whole thing is that it leaves a large hole in an attempt to stop money laundering or financing of terrorist activity. I wonder if you have an observation on this.

Prof. Bryan Schwartz: Yes. I don't claim to be fast enough or wise enough to have all the answers on this issue right now, but it does seem to me that some more creative thinking could be done along the lines you suggest of not just looking at practice comprehensively, but saying that when you are defending an alleged terrorist there should be much more protection for the relationship than when you are acting as a conveyance or a financial officer.

To reiterate an earlier suggestion I made, I'm not saying it's a traditional solicitor-client relationship when your lawyer can look at information without conveying it to you. But is that better than saying nobody on your team can look at it at all, only the judge? This isn't something we've done before, but as you're suggesting, extraordinary times may call for extraordinarily creative thinking. It may be there's a way we can have this balance between public security and the continuing role of lawyers that is a little bit better than the one we have in the proposed bill.

Mr. Stephen Owen: There are provisions with respect to intercepted communications where lawyers for accused can actually have access to the transcripts and such without sharing them with their client.

November 8, 2001

Mr. Michel Bellehumeur (Berthier—Montcalm, BQ)

The alarm bells went off in 1995, and the government did not seem to want to take action. As we well know, customs and the border have been like a sieve for many years. It is well known that a lot of money laundering is done in Canada and that Canada has signed international conventions but has not put them into effect. So now the government wants to make up for lost time and do so very quickly.

Today I am wondering whether we are not going about things the wrong way and whether the committee should not draft a report similar to the Senate report, providing general recommendations, rather than adopting the bill clause by clause. Should we not report back to the Minister of Justice, so that she and her officials can draft another bill that she can bring back to the committee for consideration, so that we can be sure that no mistakes are made.

Even if we put in a sunset clause to take effect after three or five years, those mistakes will be in force for that time.

During those three years, mistakes will be made. Many people have talked to us about the 1970s and as a Quebecker, I could tell you some things about that as well. Mistakes can also be made regarding refugees or charities that are on the list. Mr. Allmand, your organization was on the terrorist list before this legislation. If the bill passes, the list will be secret. Who will be on the list? Perhaps even the Bloc Québécois.

Are we not making a mistake here, and should we not take this time instead to give general direction to the minister, so that she can go back and do her homework? There might be less pressure on her than during the period following September 11th, and she can come back to us with a bill that is more consistent with our Criminal Code and better suited to our institutions and our know-how, which is different from that of the United States, Great Britain and France. That will be my only question, and I believe that it is a very important one.

Dr. Anu Bose (Executive Director, National Organization of Immigrant and Visible Minority Women of Canada):

… I move, Mr. Chairperson, to speak on money laundering because that is what I did my doctorate in, money laundering in the informal economy and the institution of Hawala as practised in India. Unfortunately, an arrest here and an arrest there will not address this problem, since a great deal of money is transferred around the world through an informal underground clearing-house system that swaps money to move funds from place to place. It has been described in some detail in Hilary Mackenzie's article in The Ottawa Citizen of October 20, and I would refer your researchers to that.

It is a situation based entirely on trust, contrary to Fukuyama's characterization of developing countries as low-trust societies. There are no rules, no regulations, and no direct communication between the parties. All the transactions are done through the broker, who gets a percentage as a commission. It's cheap, efficient, and a welcome change from nationalized banks with extortionate rates, bureaucratic procedures, and surly clerks. FINTRAC would be well advised to keep this on their research agenda.

We are concerned as to who will foot the bill for national security. The Honourable Minister of Finance has led us to believe that he does not have in mind incurring a deficit in his budget. So where are the moneys to be found, especially now when economists tell us that we are experiencing a mild recession due to the fallout from September 11? Will there be further cuts in spending on health and education, which will affect the most vulnerable sectors of our society, especially those from visible minorities? Will our social capital base be further eroded? Will Canada's international aid budget, which is at a 30-year low, be further jeopardized in the present climate? Even the president of the Public Policy Forum has seen fit to warn the federal government that the preoccupation with terrorism could compromise future competitiveness and living standards. Forty-four percent of Canadians now have inadequate work-based skills and are unable to function in the knowledge economy.

In conclusion, the NOIVMW constituency is composed of women, some of whom have had to flee from terror, oftentimes state directed or state inspired, in their countries of origin. They and their families came to Canada to rebuild their lives and live in peace. They certainly do not wish to be victims of terror from within or without. NOIVMW asks you, the elected representatives of the Canadian people, to look for a balance between individual liberty and collective security. To let national security concerns trump our cherished freedoms would be to hand the victory to the very same terrorists that this bill purports to control.

Mr. Brian Fitzpatrick (Prince Albert, Canadian Alliance)

… Another comment that has been made—I've heard it over and over again, but I'm not exactly in agreement with it—is why are we concerned about economic matters? I take issue with that. This is more than just acts of violence. If somebody shuts down our energy source in January, we have problems. The way our financial system works in this world today, with the global economy and so on, if somebody can shut down the information systems that the financial services sector relies upon, we have big problems. I really do think that terrorists are bent on destabilizing society through whatever ways they can. So to confine something to a pure act of violence is not sufficient in this area. I think they would use any means available to them to achieve their purposes. If they could destabilize our economy, our system, or our way of doing something, they would do so. I just want to make that comment.

I want to zero in on the idea of mistaken identity under this concept. With all due respect, the people on the U.S. list are predominantly of Muslim and Arab background. What I've heard about the Canadian list is that it's the same thing. I'm quite sure there are a lot of common names in the Arabic and Muslim communities.

I'm just thinking about this thing. If it were in a different context, and the name of John McKay, Andrew Scott, or John Maloney were put on a list and the money-laundering provisions were in place, with the requirement to report all the financial institutions and having the ability to freeze and close down things and so on, I think we would probably realize that there would be a lot of injustice occurring with that sort of system.

This is a concern I have with the listing provisions. If a mistake is made, I think it could have very harmful effects on a lot of innocent people. There really isn't a lot of protection in there if you want to get your name taken off. You can apply to the Solicitor General, and if the Solicitor General is sympathetic to your cause, your name might be taken off. But other than that, there isn't a whole lot more in the bill. That's something I would like the spokesman from the Muslim community to address. We've heard from union people and other groups, and that's something I would like to hear.

I have had a look at the Senate report, and I think they've done a very thoughtful analysis of this piece of legislation. I'd be curious to hear your response to their proposals with regard to this bill….

November 20, 2001

Ms. Anne McLellan: Keep in mind, Mr. Cotler, that you yourself have written fairly eloquently and persuasively on this very point, and I'm not going to repeat what you have said.

• 1335

I have made it absolutely clear from the outset that what we have to do is reorient the way we go about dealing with these kinds of horrific acts. As we know, and as you've written yourself very recently, our criminal justice system is generally premised on the fact that a crime is committed, an investigation takes place, charges may be laid, the courts do what they do, and so on. What we learned on September 11 is that this simply is not the kind of approach that is going to work in and of itself. Of course, it will continue to play some role, nobody's suggesting otherwise, but we must for the sake of innocent civilians in our country—and I think of those in other countries who are our allies—understand the modern face of terrorism. It is globalized, it uses technology, it is sophisticated, it does not care how many people it kills, how many innocent people's lives are destroyed in the pursuit of its objective. We know they raise money worldwide. They launder billions of dollars daily throughout the world. In fact, it calls upon us to take a new approach as part and parcel of our criminal law. We are called upon to do this as members of a civilized community, as members of a global community who understand the invidious nature of terrorism and how it strikes at the right of every one of us to human security and safety.

This legislation acknowledges the fact that in instrumental ways, be it through information gathering, be it through law enforcement, we need new tools to help provide the human security and safety that all Canadians have a right to and, quite truthfully, all members of the civilized world have a right to.

November 20, 2001

Mr. Richard Mosley: This adds a number of offences, under the Security of Information Act, to the definition of "enterprise crime offence" in the Criminal Code. The addition of new proposed section 28 is to ensure that part XII.2 of the code, with regard to proceeds of crime, is applicable to the Security of Information Act. If and when Bill C-24 comes into effect, neither provision would be required. There is a coordinating amendment in the package to address this fact for new proposed section 28.

(Amendment agreed to—See Minutes of Proceedings)

(Clause 29 as amended agreed to on division)

(On clause 30)

The Chair: Amendment G-60 is on page 128 of the first package.

• 2405

Mr. Richard Mosley: This is a technical and consequential amendment further to the last change, because there are now 28 sections and not 27 sections in the act.

(Amendment agreed to—See Minutes of Proceedings)

(Clause 30 as amended agreed to on division)

(Clauses 31 to 33 inclusive agreed to on division)

(On clause 34)

Mr. Stephen Owen: Mr. Chair, with respect to clause 52, the amendments that are suggested are amendments to a provision of Bill C-22, which Parliament has already passed, and the words “reasonable grounds to suspect” already exist in that legislation passed by Parliament.

The implication of this provision, this clause, is to add the underlined words “or a terrorist activity financing offence”. So the effect is to enlarge that section to apply to terrorist financing in addition to the money-laundering or proceeds of crime legislation previously dealt with. So we're not actually dealing with the phrase “reasonable grounds to suspect”; we're extending what is already passed by Parliament to cover terrorist financing offences as well.

The Chair: I'm going to go to the vote on BQ-34.3, an amendment to clause 52.

(Amendment negatived)

The Chair: Monsieur Bellehumeur, I take it from your enumerating all of those that you believe there is enough common argument in this that we would apply the vote on BQ-34.3 on clause 52 to the balance that you identify.

[Translation]

Mr. Michel Bellehumeur: No, but I was saying it was the same principle. If the committee votes against my amendment BQ-34.3, it should also vote on my other amendments. I want you to understand that the principle of BQ-34.3 is the same as is contained in the others. The term I wanted to change was the same one. It wasn't that it applied. Vote on that as a block of amendments if you will, but vote so that the record will show that you rejected those amendments, Mr. Chairman.

Mr. Richard Mosley: This is an amendment to delete the word at line 39 to clarify that the suspicion here is on money laundering, not on activities resulting in money laundering.

(Amendment agreed to—See Minutes of Proceedings)

The Chair: Then we have amendment BQ-43.

June 11, 2001 [House of Commons]

Hon. Lawrence MacAulay (for Minister of Justice and Attorney General of Canada)

… I would like to note the importance of the provisions in the bill regarding proceeds of crime. Right now there are a number of offences in which illegal profits can be seized by police and ordered forfeited by courts, like drug trafficking or murder.

The bill also expands the range of offences to include almost all indictable offences. This would mean that police could take away the proceeds of crime from criminals more effectively….

…The law enforcement justification under Bill C-24 is not a blank cheque for law enforcement officers, far from it. It is a balanced system with strict limits and conditions. It responds to very real and substantial law enforcement needs. Together with the other provisions on criminal organizations, intimidation and proceeds of crime, the bill represents a major step forward in the public safety agenda.

September 19, 2001 [Senate]

Hon. Wilfred P. Moore moved the second reading of Bill C-24, to amend the Criminal Code (organized crime and law enforcement) and to make consequential amendments to other Acts.

He said: Honourable senators, I am pleased today to begin debate at second reading of Bill C-24. This bill is an extremely important piece of legislation, one that is being put forward to provide vital new tools to help law enforcement and criminal justice officials in the fight against organized crime and to provide law enforcement generally.

We are all aware of the significant problem of organized crime in this country and, indeed, worldwide. Criminal groups have become involved in a wide range of illegal activities that include illegal trafficking in drugs and control of organized prostitution. Other activities of criminal groups include smuggling of people, illegal traffic in firearms, cross-border smuggling of contraband such as tobacco and alcohol, serious economic crime such as credit card fraud, insurance fraud, stock market fraud, and even environmental crimes such as the illegal dumping of toxic wastes.

Canadians and persons around the world are paying a serious price for these crimes. We pay in health costs linked to drug abuse and related illnesses such as HIV and hepatitis. The smuggling of people, often under dangerous conditions, threatens human lives and often leads to slavery-like conditions for those persons paying the criminal gangs that transport them. Financial and telemarketing fraud schemes cost victims thousands, sometimes tens of thousands of dollars. Frequently, the victims are people who can least afford it, such as elderly persons on fixed incomes.

Finally, for many crimes, the whole country pays in terms of insurance rates, interest rates and lost tax revenues.

Honourable senators, we must not forget the cost in terms of public safety and public security. In some areas, the open activity of organized criminal groups has led to an atmosphere of lawlessness and fear. There has been a significant number of murders of gang members by other gang members. Innocent third parties have also been killed. In addition to killings, local officials and ordinary citizens have been threatened and intimidated.

(1530)

All of this is unacceptable, honourable senators. We have laws in place that help to deal with these problems, but these must be strengthened. Bill C-24 addresses this need with respect to organized crime, as well as making general improvements in our law enforcement capability.

The proposals of the bill fall into four categories. The first is measures to improve the protection of people who play a role in the justice system from intimidation. Second is the creation of an accountable process to protect law enforcement officers from criminal liability for certain otherwise illegal acts committed in the course of an investigation. Third is legislation to broaden the powers of law enforcement to forfeit the proceeds of crime, in particular the profits of criminal organizations, and to seize property that was used in crime. Fourth is the creation of a number of new offences targeting involvement with criminal organizations.

The first aspect of Bill C-24 involves a range of steps to deal with the intimidation of persons involved in the criminal justice system. The criminal justice system depends for its proper functioning upon the participation of various members of our community. These are the professionals responsible for the investigation and prosecution of crime, the judges and those who deal with convicted offenders, and members of the public who participate as witnesses and jurors.

For criminal justice stakeholders to be able to participate effectively, they and those with whom they are associated must be free to act without being subjected to threats, prejudice or physical injury. In recent times, prosecutors, judges, witnesses, police and prison guards, as well as their families, have been subjected to such intimidation. As we are also aware, journalists who provide the important service of reporting on crime have also come under threat. Bill C-24 includes a number of provisions to deal with this intimidation.

Honourable senators, new provisions of the Criminal Code will provide greater protection of jurors by limiting access to names, addresses and occupations of potential jurors. Jurors should not have to question whether their involvement in a case may lead to physical or emotional harm to them or their loved ones. By protecting the privacy of jurors, we can take the necessary steps to address this problem.

Also, Bill C-24 makes important changes to the Criminal Code's treatment of the offence of intimidation itself. First, the bill increases the penalty associated with the existing offence of intimidation to five years imprisonment. Furthermore, a new intimidation offence has been added to the Criminal Code, with a maximum penalty of 14 years. This new offence deals specifically with acts of intimidation that target justice system participants and journalists. The new section makes it an offence to harass, stalk or threaten these people with the intention of provoking a state of fear so as to impede the administration of justice or impede such persons in the performance of their duties.

I turn my attention now to the aspect of Bill C-24 that seeks to protect law enforcement officers from criminal liability when, for legitimate law enforcement purposes, they commit acts that would otherwise be illegal.

The Supreme Court of Canada, in its 1999 judgment in Regina v. Campbell and Shirose, stated that the police were not immune from criminal liability for criminal activities committed in the course of a bona fide criminal investigation. However, while observing that "everybody is subject to the ordinary law of the land," the Supreme Court explicitly recognized that:

...if some form of public interest immunity is to be extended to the police..., it should be left to Parliament to delineate the nature and scope of the immunity and the circumstances in which it is available.

Honourable senators, law enforcement officers do need a limited justification for acts or omissions that would otherwise be illegal when they undertake these acts and omissions for the purpose of good-faith investigations. In the absence of sufficient protections in the current law of Canada, the Supreme Court's judgment has had a significant negative impact on law enforcement in Canada. The impact has been especially great on undercover operations targeting organized crime.

As noted in the white paper entitled "Law Enforcement and Criminal Liability," tabled in the Senate in June 2000, long- accepted and valuable law enforcement techniques have been called into question by that ruling. For example, the judgment has called into question the legality of routine purchases by law enforcement officers of contraband to gather evidence for prosecutions. Similarly, the judgment has affected the ability of law enforcement officers to pose as criminals by participating, temporarily and in a controlled manner, in the activities of their targets. In a wide range of areas, the vital public interest of ensuring that law enforcement can effectively gather evidence and infiltrate criminal groups has been affected. Particular affected areas include investigations into the smuggling of people, illegal traffic in firearms, hate crimes, cross-border smuggling of contraband such as tobacco and alcohol, international counterterrorism investigations, the use of counterfeit payment cards, and offences related to fisheries and environmental protection. While the impact is perhaps most critical in regard to organized crime, it covers a wide range of criminal activity, including terrorism.

Bill C-24 responds to this situation. Under the bill, a public officer engaged in the enforcement of an act of the Parliament of Canada would be able to engage in conduct that would otherwise constitute an offence, provided certain important limiting conditions are satisfied.

First, before the officer can act, he or she must be designated by a competent authority. Further, as a fundamental condition and limitation of the scheme, the officer must also believe on reasonable grounds that committing the act or omission is reasonable and proportional in the circumstances. Under law, this determination of reasonableness and proportionality will be made with regard to such matters as the nature of the actual act or omission, the nature of the investigation, and the reasonable availability of other enforcement techniques.

Nothing in the proposed scheme would provide immunity for the intentional or criminally negligent causing of death or bodily harm, the wilful attempt to obstruct, pervert or defeat the course of justice, or the conduct that would violate the sexual integrity of an individual.

The scheme includes ministerial accountability through the designating role of responsible ministers as competent authorities. The designations may be subject to specific conditions. Further, if designations are misused, they can be taken away.

The scheme also requires the special authorization of certain acts and omissions by senior officials responsible for law enforcement. Except in exigent circumstances, such authorization is required for acts or omissions that would likely lead to the serious loss or damage to property and for the direction, by officers, of all acts or omissions by agents.

Furthermore, there is a provision for public annual reports by all competent authorities, as well as for a full parliamentary review of the limited justification scheme within three years.

Honourable senators, the provisions applying to the limited justification scheme do not propose the granting of blanket immunity to law enforcement officers. Rather, there are numerous safeguards. For many years, law enforcement authorities were working on the basis that they had common- law immunity. What the Supreme Court did was make it plain that there was not common-law immunity and called upon Parliament to put in place a legislative scheme if it saw fit. This is what the law enforcement justification scheme will do, through a balanced and effective scheme with strict limitations and conditions.

Another major set of provisions in the legislation before us today is a new approach to criminal organization offences. The bill contains a new definition of "criminal organization" and three new criminal organization offences.

In 1997, in Bill C-95, Parliament directly targeted criminal organizations by providing a definition of "criminal organization," increased investigative powers and increased penalties for those committing crimes in conjunction with criminal organizations. While these provisions have been of benefit, our experience with them has shown that they can be improved.

Law enforcement officials and provincial Attorneys General have called for a new definition of "criminal organization" and for offences that respond to the full range of involvement in criminal organizations. This bill responds to these priorities.

The new definition of "criminal organization" will target criminal groups of three or more individuals, one of whose main purposes or activities is either committing serious crimes or making it easier for others to commit serious crimes. This is an improvement on the current definition, which refers to five or more individuals, which required proof of the commission of a series of offences over five years and did not adequately include the concept of facilitation of offences. This new definition also more closely follows internationally accepted definitions of organized criminal groups.

The new definition also clarifies that the definition of "criminal organization" does not apply to a group of persons that forms randomly for the immediate commission of a single offence. This helps to appropriately limit the scope of the definition.

I now move to Bill C-24's improvements to the law on proceeds of crime. Currently, the proceeds-of-crime provisions are directly related to the designated drug offences and a list of other offences referred to as "enterprise crimes." Over the years, as organized crime evolved and moved into new areas of criminal activity, new offences were added to the list of enterprise crimes. Today, the list of such crimes stands at over 40, with no indication that we will stop adding new offences to the list.

Bill C-24 eliminates the list approach and expands the application of the proceeds of crime to all federal indictable offences. This should be subject to the exception of indictable offences that are excluded by regulation. In this manner, the profits from the commission of most serious crimes would be subject to forfeiture. This will simplify and expand our approach with respect to proceeds of crime. However, existing protections to ensure that seizures are appropriate and subject to defined procedural requirements will remain in place.

Other provisions of Bill C-24 will give criminal justice officials new powers with respect to foreign confiscation orders. The ease with which financial resources can be transferred around the world presents a challenge for all countries in the attempt to fight crime by seizing its proceeds. Canada must be in a position to play its part in addressing this challenge and offering necessary assistance to countries that have successfully investigated organized crime within their jurisdiction and ordered their assets to be confiscated.

Accordingly, the bill proposes a number of amendments to the Mutual Legal Assistance in Criminal Matters Act that would allow Canada to enforce foreign confiscation orders.

An additional element of Bill C-24 that I will highlight for consideration of the Senate deals with offence-related property. The bill contains amendments to make the offence-related property forfeiture regime in the Criminal Code apply to all indictable offences under the code and expands the application of the regime to all real property, subject to a proportionality test.

As I stated, three new criminal organizational offences have also been created. These replace and substantially improve upon the criminal organization offence that was created at section 467.1 of the Criminal Code by Bill C-95.

The first offence targets participation in or contribution to the activities of criminal organizations. Taking part in the activities of a criminal organization, even if such participation does not itself constitute an offence, will now be a crime where such actions are done for the purpose of enhancing the ability of the criminal organization to facilitate or commit indictable offences. This is an important recognition in law that those who knowingly help criminal organizations in this way are criminals themselves.

The second new offence targets those who aid, abet, counsel or commit any indictable offence in conjunction with a criminal organization. The emphasis in this provision is the commission or other direct involvement in indictable offences when this is done for the benefit of criminal organizations.

The third new offence deals specifically with leaders in criminal organizations. Leaders of criminal organizations pose a unique threat to society. Operationally, they threaten us through their enhanced experience and skills. Motivationally, they threaten us through their constant encouragement of potential and existing criminal organization members. By effectively targeting the leaders of criminal organizations, we go after those who ultimately are the most responsible for the wide range of harm caused by organized crime and should bear the heaviest responsibility. This section makes it an offence for an individual as a member of a criminal organization to knowingly instruct, directly or indirectly, the commission of an offence for the benefit of, at the direction of, or in association with a criminal organization.

Honourable senators, we must ensure that the leaders of criminal organizations are not able to hide behind the screen of activities engaged in by their subordinates or agents when in fact these leaders are ultimately responsible for these activities.

These three new offences should mark a major step forward in the fight against organized crime. Nevertheless, some questions have arisen as to why Bill C-24 does not simply make it an offence to be a member of a criminal organization.

Honourable senators, quite aside from the Charter of Rights and Freedoms considerations that would be raised by a membership offence, the three new offences that I have just mentioned will be more effective tools than a provision that criminalizes membership. Membership can be extremely difficult to prove because organizations often operate underground or covertly. Further, the criminal groups may decide to continually change the indicators of membership in order to stay one step ahead of the law. Also, simply targeting membership would fail to recognize that individuals who are not formal members of organized gangs often play a role in facilitating crimes and benefiting criminal organizations. The approach that Bill C-24 takes with respect to criminal organization offences will therefore be preferable to criminalizing membership.

I should also emphasize that the penalty provisions for the three new criminal organization offences will proceed on an increasing scale of seriousness. The participation offence is punishable by a maximum five years of imprisonment, the party liability offence by a maximum of 14 years of imprisonment, and the leadership- related offence by a maximum of life imprisonment. Enhanced sentencing provisions are also added, including mandatory imposition of consecutive sentences for the offences and a presumptive parole ineligibility period of one half the imposed sentence. Given the serious harm caused by organized crime in Canada, we must ensure that the punishments we impose adequately reflect the nature of the illegal activity.

Honourable senators, as I have indicated, the threat posed by organized crime is very real and very grave. While we have tools in place to help deal with this, these tools must be improved. At the same time, we must ensure that the tools that we put in place are appropriate tools. The provisions of the criminal law must not be allowed to overshoot their appropriate scope. We must ensure, while fighting organized crime and making improvements generally to the effectiveness of law enforcement, that we do not have unwanted negative impacts on the lives of ordinary Canadians.

In this last regard, I am heartened by the knowledge that the Department of Justice engaged in extensive consultations on the provisions of this bill before it was introduced. These consultations included but were not limited to the consultative process on the law enforcement justification provisions that occurred with respect to the white paper tabled in the Senate in June 2000. In addition to that public paper, stakeholders representing a wide range of interests were brought in for a number of extensive meetings on all provisions of this legislative project. Numerous suggestions were made and acted upon. This has helped ensure that Bill C-24 will be a balanced, responsible and effective piece of legislation.

After most serious reflection and work, honourable senators, the appropriate balance has been maintained. I believe that Bill C- 24 reflects the law enforcement needs of this country and does so in a reasonable and fully accountable manner. I urge all honourable senators to lend their support to this bill.

Hon. A. Raynell Andreychuk: Honourable senators, I have a question for the Honourable Senator Moore. We have before us today an immigration bill that touches upon some of the international activity involving the movement of people. Thankfully, most people move for valid reasons. However, we are aware that we must monitor both some immigration and some refugee issues. The honourable senator has now introduced legislation that is aimed at some of the criminal activity occurring internationally.

We have been graphically reminded of terrorism. With these pieces of legislation, how does the government propose to attack what are now interrelated issues? Whenever we talk about terrorism, we get into the criminal activity that is prevalent both offshore and onshore and the migration of people, legally and illegally. What we are missing is some national strategy to attack it all rather than what appears more and more to be a piecemeal activity. Would the honourable senator care to comment on that?

Senator Moore: I thank the honourable senator for her question. I am not sure what will come out of the deliberations in the House of Commons as a result of what happened last week. This legislation was drafted and prepared before those events took place. I appreciate your comment with respect to the obvious overlap of the responses that may be required and the authorities that will be needed. Perhaps legislation that will address your concerns will be forthcoming. In reply to an earlier question today concerning the immigration bill, our leader said that other changes may be forthcoming with respect to that statute and, perhaps, with respect to this one.

Senator Andreychuk: Honourable senators, we must look at trafficking in migrants and an international convention, as well as some national enabling legislation. We should then look at drug strategies and gangs and criminal activity strategies and money laundering. More and more, the international community is saying that these activities are all interrelated. Perhaps we have not been so successful because we have been looking at the nature of the activities in a segmented way. Surely it is time to see how we can draw them all together in a more coherent way so that we might be more successful.

Perhaps I should not have used the September 11 incident. However, it has been of some concern that trafficking in migrants is an activity that is very much like trafficking in drugs. It moves one step ahead of those who wish to enforce the laws because we have only one convention over here for certain purposes and we have not interrelated the administration, the services, the conventions and the laws.

Senator Moore: I do not know whether that was a question or an observation of merit. I hope this legislation will answer some of those questions. To repeat what I said earlier, as we move forward, perhaps we will see other legislation come forward that will tighten up the overlapping issues that you raise.

Hon. Pierre Claude Nolin: Honourable senators, I also have a few questions for the honourable senator. A few years ago, we studied a bill in response to a decision from the Supreme Court in the Feeney case. The Supreme Court decided that it was unconstitutional for a policeman to gain access to a private dwelling without a warrant, regardless of the fact that in the Feeney case the accused had signed a statement to the effect that he had committed the crime for which he was accused. Those of us involved in the Legal Committee remember that case. We helped to craft an amendment to the Criminal Code. That was an important piece of legislation because the court said that the Criminal Code was not respectful of the Charter.

If I look at the second group of remarks that the honourable senator alluded to in his speech, he talked about commission of infractions by law enforcement officers. What kind of control is built into the bill to ensure that the court will not tell us, in one or two years hence, "Gentlemen, we understand what you tried to do. We agree with the principles stated in section 25.1(2), but you breached the Charter because of paragraphs (1), (2), (3) and (4). Go back and do your work and correct the code"?

What is in this bill to ensure that we will not have to redo it in two years?

Senator Moore: Honourable senators, I should like to have an opportunity to go through the bill and respond in complete detail. It is certainly the thrust of the bill to put in place provisions that will enable officers to do their job without abusing their office. They will be limited to the scope of their activities proportionate to the nature of the offence they are investigating and not beyond that. Perhaps we can go into that in more detail at committee, but that is how I understand the nature of it.

Senator Nolin: We will look at that thoroughly in committee, but if you look at the way the bill is written, it covers two types of situations. In the first situation, there is no urgency. There is a set of rules for when an officer is asking a superior for a warrant and the superior is then asking the responsible person in charge — basically, federal and provincial ministers — to grant the request. That is for normal, non-urgent business.

There is another set of sections that deal with urgency. If you recall the Feeney case, it would have been labelled "urgent." Even then, we crafted a set of techniques where, even in an urgent situation, the police officer needed a warrant. That is why I asked the question. If it is not urgent, they go to the minister to get permission to commit an illegal act. If it is not urgent and they can go to the minister, they can go in front of another authority that is much more or less influenced by the internal matter of the organization — that is, the department or the police organization.

Does the honourable senator understand my concern? I think we all share this concern. We are all in favour of giving the police all the tools they require, and even more, to help them in the proper performance of their job, but there are some limits. It is our responsibility to ensure that those limits are not crossed but, if they must be crossed, that they are crossed properly. That is my concern.

On motion of Senator Stratton, for Senator Kelleher, debate adjourned.

September 25, 2001 [Senate]
Hon. James F. Kelleher

Honourable senators, it gives me great pleasure to rise today to give second reading to Bill C-24, to amend the Criminal Code, specifically addressing the issues of organized crime and law enforcement.

The onus on us as senators as we deal with this bill is particularly heavy given the events of two weeks ago in the United States. While this bill was not written to address the evils of terrorist organizations operating within our borders but to deal primarily with organized gangs and organized crime, we should determine what effect it may have in giving support to law enforcement agencies as they combat all parts of crime planned and organized by groups of people.

I also approach the discussion of this bill not only as a senator but also as a former Solicitor General responsible for police enforcement at the federal level in Canada and as a lawyer who has a healthy respect for the Charter of Rights and Freedoms.

Last week, Senator Moore gave us a fairly thorough review of the contents of Bill C-24. I see no need to repeat that. However, there are some aspects of this bill and the government announcements that surrounded its presentation in the House of Commons and the Senate that I wish to emphasize.

First, I believe it is very important that our Standing Senate Committee on Legal and Constitutional Affairs study this bill thoroughly. This is one of the bills that was rushed through the House of Commons with some enthusiasm from virtually all sides before the summer break. I, too, applaud many aspects of this bill. I recognize the need to pass legislation to help combat organized crime. However, I do not believe we should act with too much haste. This is a relatively large bill, and we should look at its wording carefully to determine if it effectively grapples with the matter of organized crime in a way that we as senators can agree with and support.

This bill has been introduced and presented to us as creating three new offences, all of which relate to participation in a criminal organization. In fairness, Bill C-24 does not so much create three new offences as it clarifies and expands upon an existing offence. Having said that, these improvements are welcomed and long overdue and should greatly assist law enforcement officials in their fight against organized crime.

One of the most controversial aspects of this legislation is that in some instances it creates prosecutorial immunity for the police should they commit a crime while in the course of an investigation. These provisions result from the Supreme Court of Canada decision in Regina v. Campbell & Shirose, which declared that the police were not immune from criminal liability for criminal activities committed in the course of an investigation. The court charged us, as parliamentarians, to determine when and for what crimes there should be immunity.

This bill allows police to take reasonable and proportional illegal action when investigating or infiltrating criminal organizations. Before an officer can break the law, authorization from the minister responsible for the police force is required. There are limits expressed in the statute so that there would be no police immunity for intentionally or recklessly causing death or bodily harm, for sexual offences, or for deliberately obstructing the course of justice. Of course, there is the possibility that these clauses could very well become the subject of constitutional challenges once this bill becomes law.

As senators, we can never forget the protections afforded by the Charter of Rights and Freedoms. Thus, we must do our very best to ensure that all clauses in all bills comply with the Charter. Unfortunately, this is not always an easy task. Absent a court challenge, it is not always certain whether a clause will be in compliance with the Charter. Our job is to seek the best balance possible, not to run roughshod over the Charter, but not to run scared of it, either. If, despite our best efforts, a challenge is made before the courts, then we must accept that as a fair and just part of the process.

At this point, what concerns me more than any possible court challenge is the question of who should be authorizing these new police powers — a minister of the Crown or a judge. Some who approve this power being given to the police and who appeared before the Justice and Human Rights Committee in the other place suggested there might be some comfort in having the authorization in the hands of a member of the judiciary, someone who is immune from partisan politics and might be more measured and responsive to such police requests.

I could not agree more. If we are to ensure public confidence in these provisions, we must guard against even the appearance of political influence. I am very surprised that the government does not also see it this way, especially given all the problems arising from the APEC conference. As senators, we have the benefit of reviewing the recently released report of Justice Hughes about that conference. One of the key principles coming from that report is that when police are performing law enforcement functions, they should be entirely independent of the government.

The last matter I wish to touch upon today is one which, as a former Solicitor General, greatly concerns me. When this bill was first introduced, the Minister of Justice announced an additional $200 million to fight organized crime. If this government can waste hundreds of millions of dollars attempting to register the guns of innocent Canadians and still not get it right, then I have a hard time believing that $200 million is nearly enough to combat organized crime.

As senators, we must determine how much is really needed to effectively implement this legislation. If the financial resources are not forthcoming, then I question the point of even dealing with this bill.

While on the subject of money and resources, honourable senators, I should mention that I am pleased to see the expanded provisions allowing for greater seizure of assets tied to organized crime. It is time that we went after the rewards of organized crime and reclaimed these resources for the benefit of us all. Ideally, we could use the proceeds of these seizures to add to the resources necessary to effectively fight organized crime.

Honourable senators, Bill C-24 is an important bill, but it does require further study. I know that the committee will do an excellent job and I look forward to its report.

On motion of Senator Joyal, debate adjourned.

November 21, 2001[Standing Senate Committee on Legal and Constitutional Affairs]

Senator Kelleher: Therefore, the police could be involved in committing terrorist acts in the course of their investigations if they were so permitted; is that correct?

Mr. MacAulay: Falling under this legislation, if a terrorist organization is involved, it could also be involved in organized crime, which would tie the two together under this legislation. One could be investigating a terrorist organization for organized crime activity. That could very well take place.

Ms McLellan: Senator, your question is a good one. One might have authorization for law enforcement officials to participate in a money-laundering scheme, the money of which is used to finance terrorist activities.

Senator Kelleher: The question is timely, in light of Bill C-36, to let the people of Canada know that this can also involve terrorist activities.

Ms McLellan: Indeed. Money laundering is probably a good example where we know that terrorist organizations raise money here and around the world, and we might want to authorize our law enforcement authorities to go undercover and participate, for example, in a money-laundering operation, in order to reveal the full extent of the operation, to lay charges and to blow it apart.

Mr. MacAulay: I had the privilege of meeting an undercover officer who was involved in this type of activity and who explained the need for this kind of legislation.

Mr. Paul Kennedy, Senior Assistant Deputy Solicitor General: There are many serious criminal offences that the police are not authorized to do, for example, murder, sexual offences, assault causing bodily harm and obstruction justice. The definition of terrorist activity is at the high end, and includes offences that put lives in jeopardy. The officers are not authorized to do that under this scheme.

As part of the normal investigation done of such organizations, there are support or ancillary activities that they have to be involved in. The Minister of Justice referred to money laundering. Another example is the preparation of false documents. These are all tools that people have to commit terrorist activities. The officers will be working with these people to find out who is doing what and to infiltrate the groups. You can take from there that the officers will be doing things such as bombings. That would defeat the purpose. However, they have to go in at the entry-level and investigate to be able to take action. There are thresholds that are off the table and are not done.

Senator Kelleher: We had a MacDonald Royal Commission on that several years ago.

Mr. Kennedy: Yes, I am aware of that.

Mr. Antonio Nicaso, Journalist, Author: I realize that time is short and you have much consultation to reflect upon. I would like to provide you with a few quick points on organized crime in Canada.

We are a microcosm, a kind of laboratory, where underworld groups interact, cooperate, commingle funding, share the burden of criminal operations and provide infrastructure to each other. Organized crime operates in every part of Canada. Some groups have their turfs, although no one has a geographic monopoly. Some groups have their specialties, but no one completely monopolizes a market. Organized crime arises in any segment of the society where there is a profit to be made, from the drug underworld to the stock markets. There are no limits except the limits that we can successfully and forcefully impose.

The Canadian Security Intelligence Service estimates that at least 18 groups operate in Canada, and that number does not allow for new groups that break away from mother cells and form their own operations. Organized crime groups are not of any specific ethnic sector, although there are mafias specific in background to Eastern Europe, Asia, Europe and South America. There are also commercial mafias, white-collar cartels that manipulate stock markets, launder money and monopolize segments of industry.

Organized crime feeds all of the needs of society that are forbidden, over-taxed or over-regulated. Many of these are called victimless crimes or non-violent initiatives. I am thinking here of drug addiction and illegal migrant transit and the smuggling of cigarettes and liquor. However, the underpinning of these and other activities is enforcement by violence. Organized crime acts, as does legitimate government and commerce, in the role of provider and protector.

In these times when mighty issues related to terrorism are being dealt with by the Government of Canada and the governments of the world, we must be careful that other serious issues do not fall by the wayside.

The relentless campaign of criminal activity in Canada has been subject to grave underestimation for decades. Due to lack of attention, lack of funding, lack of political will or over-sensitivity to ethnic groups, and, at times, all four at once, criminal organizations have been permitted to grow to an incredible power in this country.

Criminal groups, ranging from small organizations that prey on ethnic communities to truly transnational cartels that operate vast networks, find Canada an appealing place to do business. Canada, within the world of organized crime, is perceived in three ways. It is perceived as a haven, as a transit country and as a source country for drug manufacturing, producing and refinement materials.

As a haven, it only requires a casual reading of media reports to discover the presence of wanted criminals from the former Soviet Union, from Sicily and other parts of Italy, from China and the Caribbean. While entering Canada is relatively easy, remaining here, protected by the Charter of Rights and Freedoms, is even easier. From Canada, these global criminals can make huge fortunes in the U.S market while remaining protected by the laws of Canada. We must ask ourselves why they feel safe coming here.

As a transit country, one must only look to the cartels that bring their product, whether illegal migrants or narcotics, through Canada and into the United States. An example of this is the Caruana-Cuntrera, a Sicilian mafia group, one of the major organized crime groups in the world. They found it easier to ship cocaine from South America around the United States by boat into Canada and then down into the United States market. We must ask ourselves why is organized crime afraid of American laws and borders and not afraid of ours.

As a source country, one must only examine the huge growing number of marijuana operations in British Columbia, an industry that produces a product that rivals the quality of the product of Mexico, and the relative ease in Canada of obtaining precursor chemicals needed in the production of methamphetamine and ecstasy has created a cottage industry that itself reaps significant profits for organized crime. We have to ask ourselves why Canada has turned into the Mexico of the north and become the pharmaceutical support system to the mafias.

Post September 11, perhaps the most successful anti-organized crime initiative will happen, as it seems is the Canadian way, by accident. The crackdown on terrorism will result in a success against transnational criminals and that success can only be called a shameful accident. The impact of anti-terrorism measures has effectively frozen many criminal operations in place. Huge shipments of drugs are piling up in Asia and South America as border control is tightened and massive quantities of drug profits are backing up in Canada. Without reparation of the drug profits, further shipments are halted. Temporarily, organized crime is suffering a collateral damage. All this is good because, currently, there are no significant police operations underway against organized crime: The investigators and resources have been diverted to combat terrorism.

It is interesting to note that, with all the efforts being made against terrorism, terrorism itself has claimed no lives within Canada. Organized crime, however, has claimed more than 150 people in Quebec alone. Is this not a form of terrorism, when children cannot play in the streets, women cannot work in safety, when businessmen who resist organized crime are beaten to death? Maybe the political will and spirit that have somehow emerged to battle the Osama bin Ladens of the world will be focused on the underworld kingpins that call Canada home.

This bill before you is not everything to everyone. Civil libertarians will doubtless find flaws to probe, issues to examine and water to be added to the wine. That is their job and our civil libertarians in Canada are known around the world for their effectiveness.

Law enforcement agencies might suggest the bill is not strong enough, that they need more muscle and more power and more money. They might suggest, and here I agree with them completely, that an integrated policy on organized crime, ranging from correction to immigration, to the judicial system, to taxation, is needed.

Bear in mind that we live in extraordinary times. At this time and place, we have the beginning of a national understanding of the depths of organized crime and we have the right people with the right expertise to do the job. All that is needed is adequate funding, adequate laws and adequate political will. There have been many more incidents of underworld murder than there have been cases of law enforcement abuse.

This bill has strong elements to be proactive, instead of reactive. It can do away with the sad image of fighting organized crime in a way that brings forward a picture of firefighters running from fire to fire, dousing the hot spots, then moving on to the next, only to have the flames arise behind them.

This bill can enhance other Canadian strategies, notably the money laundering legislation and anti-gang bill. The time is right to fit in another interlocking piece of legislation that will strengthen and complete a national strategy against organized crime.

I do not envy you in your efforts to balance the broad spectrum of needs and demands being made upon you. However, I believe it can be done and it must be done.

As you can tell from my accent, I come from a country that has suffered mightily through a century of complacency towards organized crime and has suffered through its relentless corruptions. Please remember that it was only when the mafia of Italy directly attacked the state, murdering judges, journalists, police officials and women and children, and bombed the cultural centres of Italy, that laws were enacted to protect the country.

It was the mafia's fear of the state that led them to these excesses. We should look closely at why. In Canada, we fear organized crime, but organized crime does not fear us.

Senator Beaudoin: Mr. Auger, you say that the legislation before us is better than none at all. You also say that the Americans have a head start on us in this area. Could you tell us how they operate?

Mr. Auger: I would say that the Rico statute, which is more or less the equivalent of the provisions of Bill C-24 in the Criminal Code, is such that organized crime in the United States is targeted.

In Quebec in particular, there was a spectacular trial recently where Maurice Boucher was accused of murdering a prison guard. In his arguments, the defence attorney said: "My client is perhaps a major criminal leader, but how could a criminal leader collude with a little informer?" To undermine the credibility of the witness, the defence attorney used the facts that the individual was a member and a leader of a criminal organization. To the best of my knowledge, using an argument like that to acquit an individual is not customary in court.

If it had been in the United States, Maurice Boucher would not have been accused of murder. He would have been accused of leading a criminal organization which has committed murder, is involved in drug trafficking, and so on. Why? Because it is easier to prove that there is a criminal organization that is to determine who ordered the action. The American prosecutor must show that the organization committed the crime, that there are individuals who follow orders and others who give them.

In Canada, accusing someone of a very specific crime is much more complex. In my case, the police identified the shooter. They are 100% sure that he is the shooter. However, they do not have enough proof to obtain a warrant for a wiretap. They put him under surveillance. They used all kinds of techniques, DNA and all that, they identified up to 15 people who participated in the crime. Each individual did his part. One made the weapon, the other passed it on, another obtained information from confidential government documents, and so on. Other individuals conducted surveillance activities for up to two days before the crime took place outside Journal de Montréal offices. Each person had a role to play and everyone is interchangeable. It is an organization. That is the current difficulty.

The reality of organized crimes here is that our legal system is designed to deal with individuals and not criminal organizations that have become more and more powerful. This reality is the 170 victims of murder in Quebec to gain control of drug trafficking.

Personally, I was shot six times in the back. If a bill like C-24 had been in force, I would not have been a victim. Criminals have just realized the importance of this bill. The act is not even in force, but the Hells Angels have closed their bunker, they have stopped wearing their colours, they have stopped the parades and demonstrations of force.

A young boy was killed three weeks ago in Montreal. He was waiting in line. A member of the Hells Angels was celebrating his having been made a member of the group. He simply used a firearm - that is the charge that is before the court - to wipe the boy out because he wanted to show how powerful he was. This is what criminal gangs of today are like. They use all means - especially illegal ones - to arrive at their goal which in the end, is money.

In my opinion, legislation has not kept pace with the reality of organized crime in Canada.

[English]

Mr. Nicaso: I have some personal experience with the RICO statute. I left Italy after a car bomb attempt on my life. After the first publication of the regional code of the Mafia, I moved to the United States. I had the opportunity to deal with people like Mayor Giuliani, free people who had put much effort into fighting organized crime. I spoke with them many times. They were very pleased with the RICO statute. To fight organized crime, a police officer needs a complete piece of legislation.

For example, recently, in Europe, they passed a charter of rights in which they define association in a very specific way. It says that they would allow association only for political, cultural and recreational reasons, but not for criminal reasons. That would allow them to criminalize membership.

In the Unites States, they use RICO to attack criminal enterprise because the only way to fight organized crime is to hit them in their pocket. Unfortunately, when I said that Canada is an easy spot, there is a reason for that. We have to consider that, before 1989, we did not have money-laundering legislation. It was harder to import cheese into this country than a piece of luggage full of cash, dirty money.

During that time, many criminal organizations moved into Canada. That is because Canada is still an easy place in which to invest money. We should not underestimate the fact that we allow people to invest $300,000 in this country as a landed immigrant. In Quebec, we recently had a case involving the wife of a wanted criminal from Italy. She invested $300,000 in Canada. No one asked her where the money came from.

In 1994, all the leaders of the world signed an agreement at the United Nations summit in Naples. For the first time, they defined organized crime. It was a correct definition of organized crime.

In Bill C-95 there is a definition of organized crime that does not exist. I say that for one simple reason. That is because it refers to five or more people, and formally or informally organized crime. The characteristic of organized crime is the formality of their structure. It is the fact that there is a hierarchical structure. Bill C-24 is a better approach.

It is important to create a national strategy and to deal with organized crime in a different way. In Canada, there is still a much lower risk of prosecution and detention than in other countries, for example, in Europe and in the United States. In the United States, they have mandatory prison terms. Here, we have a Club Med instead of a penitentiary. We do not consider drug traffickers as dangerous offenders. That is a mentality that we should change. We should be thinking about organized crime in a large way. Police officers need a piece of legislation that deals exclusively with the definition of organized crime. They need to do other things to attack organized crime in different ways.

Mr. Nicaso: On many occasions I have defined Canada as a welcome wagon for organized crime. That is for one simple reason. According to criminal intelligence services, we have at least 18 different organized crime groups in this country. They move their resources and they invest, work and operate in this country. We must ask ourselves why they love and come to Canada. I have an answer for that. Before 1989, we did not have money-laundering legislation.

I have just published a book on one of the major organized crime groups in Canada, and in the 1980s they deposited more than $35 million in cash in five Montreal banks without problems.

After the Campbell and Shirose decision, the kingpin of this organization was under surveillance. He told fellow drug traffickers: "I do not go in the United States. I feel safer in Canada." He is not the only one who says that.

This man admitted that he imported into Canada 1,500 kilograms of cocaine. He received a conviction for 18 years. He will be released in 2003. He is now in a medium security detention facility in Northern Ontario. He is wanted in Italy, where he had two convictions, one of 30 years and another one of 21 years for international drug trafficking and his Mafia associations. He is wanted in Germany, England and France. He was arrested in Canada in 1998, convicted in 2000. He will be released on parole in 2003. This is the way we deal with drug traffickers in this country.

We did not have a currency law before January 2000. That is why we have a concentration of organized crime in Canada. When I said that Canada is a welcome wagon for organized crime, it is because it is relatively easy to enter and leave the country, because we do not require visas for people coming from Europe, we do not have a system to check people and we have cases where people are wanted in Italy and they are living in Montreal without a problem.

We wish to focus on the traditional organized crime, but we must also look at the Russian Mafia, the Colombian cartels, the Triads and so forth. Why are they all in this country?

Another aspect to this issue is mandatory prison terms. In the United States, three years means three years; in Canada, three years does not mean three years.

It is very easy to get a Canadian passport. A good example is the situation with Ahmed Ressam, who was arrested at the Canada-United States border. He was planning to bomb the Los Angeles airport.

Mr. Prud'homme: You are right, and I am going to give you a concrete example of what I have experienced. The Sherbrooke Hells Angels based a biker in Iqaluit to sell hashish from Sherbrooke. Similar examples are to be found around the world.

A police money-laundering operation in Montreal from 1990 to 1994 revealed that the Sherbrooke Hells Angels' cocaine came through the Hells Angels international group and that the work was being done in co-operation with the Montreal mafia. The Colombians were in cahoots with the Hells Angels for the sake of exporting the cocaine. This is a problem that has to be dealt with on a worldwide basis. This is a difficult problem to deal with in the big cities; imagine what it is like for small towns in remote areas.

In greater Granby, with a population of about 60,000 people, the police are under surveillance. Files are kept on them. Officers are even visited at home. Organized crime is taking action against officers. No longer is the police officer investigating the criminal; the criminal is investigating the officer. In a municipality of 200 or 300 residents, there are surely members of organized crime.

November 22, 2001[Standing Senate Committee on Legal and Constitutional Affairs]

Ms Perkins-McVey:

…In general, we believe that better use of current resources to enable law enforcement officers to do their jobs is perhaps the best way to beat organized crime.

One of the significant questions to think about is, will this bill solve the problem? We suggest it will not. Yesterday you heard the Minister of Justice McLellan talk about the fact that this bill is different from Bill C-36 because it is meant to deal with the profit motive. Our position is that this bill does not focus sufficiently on taking away the profit motive of crime. If we were to look at decriminalizing soft drugs and prostitution, that takes some of the profit motive away from some of these persons involved in organized criminal activities. We believe that focussing laws such as the money-laundering legislation that has already been passed, which takes away the profit motive, will have a far better effect on combating organized crime than some of these overbroad offences that are contemplated in Bill C-24.

November 28, 2001[Standing Senate Committee on Legal and Constitutional Affairs]

Mr. Marc St-Laurent, Deputy Chief, Investigations Division, Montreal Urban Community Police Department

…Our disappointment with Bill C-95 is matched by our delight with Bill C-24. We are therefore enthusiastic and confident about the future, because this bill to fight organized crime at last meets our expectations. We support the amendments proposed in the bill, in particular the new definitions of "criminal organization" and "criminal organization offence." We also support, needless to say, the measures designed to protect justice system participants and provide immunity for peace officers. We believe that the new rules governing the seizure and forfeiture of offence-related property and proceeds of crime are better than the current rules…

.. The other element we feel is important is the reversal of the burden of proof where applications for the forfeiture of proceeds of crime are made. We all know how difficult and costly it is to prove that something is the proceed of a crime, particularly because organized crime members often use dummy corporations in transactions involving real estate and goods. Would it not make sense to require organized crime members to reveal the source of their goods, if they have been found guilty of being an organized crime member? Those are the two recommendations we would like a future bill to incorporate.

November 28, 2001[Standing Senate Committee on Legal and Constitutional Affairs]

Mr. Mike Ryan, Inspector, Organized Crime Agency of B.C.

Thank you for the opportunity to appear today. I, too, have a prepared text and will make a copy available at the end of today.

The Organized Crime Agency of British Columbia feels that Bill C-24 represents an opportunity for law enforcement in Canada to significantly advance prosecutions in regard to organized crime groups.

The broadening of the definition of enterprise crime to include all indictable offences under the Criminal Code and any act of the federal Parliament provides a significant opportunity for law enforcement to seize the proceeds of crime from the broadest range of profit-motivated offences engaged in by organized crime groups. Without the expansion of this definition, the proceeds of crime from offences such as forging or falsifying a credit card cannot be seized.

Earlier this year, my agency seized an illegal credit card factory that held at risk a total of $330 million in credit potential. The proceeds of crime from this offence could not be seized due to the current restricted definition.

Expanding the definition of offence-related property will also be of significant assistance. As such, seizures from a broader range of offences will be a significant deterrent to prevent organized crime groups from investing in profit-motivated crimes.

Currently, under the Controlled Drugs and Substances Act, $1 million in a bank account that can be proven to be assembled for the purposes of concluding a drug deal can be seized. If the $1 million is proved to have been assembled for the purposes of wash trading in securities, acquiring illegal weapons or explosives, or financing any other non-drug offence, it cannot be seized….

…It should be pointed out as well that the 1997 amendments contained several provisions that allowed police officers to traffic and purchase illegal drugs to counter drug dealing. Other provisions in the Criminal Code allow police to launder money, to be in possession of proceeds of crime and to possess restricted or prohibited weapons for the purposes of an investigation. These exemptions are already in Canadian law and have existed for some time. They permit law enforcement officers to do certain things that are technically illegal. These exemptions have proven their worth in the battle against organized crime and without incident or suggestion of abuse.

November 28, 2001[Standing Senate Committee on Legal and Constitutional Affairs]

Senator Pearson: In that sense, do you think this bill will be helpful in dealing with the way in which the pimps and others are working under the aegis of organized crime?

Mr. Ryan: Yes, I do. For example, you may be able to seize the proceeds of crime from the drug activity in which these young persons are involved, when the proceeds flow upwards to the groups or individuals that organized these young people. However, you are not able to seize the offence-related property such as the cars that they have obtained as a result of extortion. That is the dichotomy.

A difference that was not touched upon is the fact that under the CDSA or the drug legislation the police can make application for income tax records, where it is necessary, with the judicial authority to do so. That still remains to be addressed. If the offence is gambling, the police cannot make application for income tax records.

Organized crimes groups do not take one type of crime. They cover gambling, several different types of drugs, extortion from prostitution and move with some degree of fluidity between them. These barriers within the legislation present problems.

Senator Pearson: This bill will take out some of them, will it not?

Mr. Ryan: Yes, it will remove some of those barriers.

November 28, 2001[Standing Senate Committee on Legal and Constitutional Affairs]

Mr. Asselin: If I may, I believe that you all agree that what has allowed organized crime to take on the importance that it now has, is due not only to the intimidation factor but also due to wealth. They line their pockets in two ways: through drug trafficking and through the proceeds of crime.

At this time, because of the laws regulating certain types of drugs and other substances, peace officers can also engage in drug trafficking, importing, and production, in order to infiltrate these groups and dismantle their organization. Under the Criminal Code, they are allowed to launder the proceeds of crime, and in so doing, commit the same offence, with less supervision and fewer restrictions than are included in the Criminal Code with Bill C-24. The use of such means has not yet led to any abuse.

For example, as Mr. St-Laurent told you, since the regulation allowing us to engage in trafficking and possession of drugs came into effect in 1997, we have undertaken a dozen operations. Those who are assigned to such activities are hand picked. We have 12 such officers. Bill C-24 stipulates that the Quebec Minister of Public Security will designate which law enforcement agencies have the qualification or expertise to undertake such activities.

With respect to drugs, on the 150 police agencies in Quebec - at least until recently - only the Sûreté du Québec and the Montreal Urban Community Police Service were involved in laundering the proceeds of crime and in drug trafficking operations. Of those two agencies, only our ultra-specialized and properly trained units are involved.

I believe that the supervision is even greater than what is stipulated in the Criminal Code at this time.

November 28, 2001[Standing Senate Committee on Legal and Constitutional Affairs]

Mr. St-Laurent: No, I do not mean internally. I am telling you that there is always an a judicial control after the fact. We cannot carry out operations that lead to arrest without disclosing how it was done and by what means. A judge will always evaluate what police officers have done to determine whether it was just, acceptable and reasonable. It will be evaluated. Otherwise, police officers will not be allowed to do it.

Let me come back to the example given just now by Mr. Ryder. Currently, police officers are protected by the law. They can use force up to and including lethal force, in cases where they deem that their lives or citizens' lives are endangered. They are not asked to have prior judicial authorization, they are left to act according to their discretion.

Afterwards, they will evaluate whether what was done was just and reasonable. Currently, with the narcotics act, we are doing exactly the same thing. Mr. Ryder mentioned other exceptions provided for by the act, aimed at the proceeds of crime or arms trafficking.

Infiltration is a means of investigation. There are not countless ways to investigate and fight organized crime. There is electronic eavesdropping, searches, shadowing and infiltration.

Without these means we cannot work. You have just deprived us of one of these means with the Campbell and Shirose decision.

The Campbell and Shirose decision did not say that police officers cannot engage in infiltration, but rather that it must be monitored by legislators. They chose monitoring, which is not unlike what they did with the Narcotic Control Act. We should apply the same principle and provide judicial protection to police officers. In our former operations, we always avoided, as much as possible, committing any offences and we always made sure that there would be no victims. The police officer was certain that he would not be found guilty because he did not intend to commit a criminal act. He was doing his work and he was trying to set up a file in order to arrest criminals.

In today's debate, it is as if police officers had asked for the right to commit criminal acts, which is not the case and never will be. We are tested in our daily work and we have to engage in infiltration.

I just mentioned a case that did not involve organized crime and that is reality. We arrest the individual and interrogate him. If he has nothing to say, the young person might be abducted in two months, but we will have done all that we could do. We cannot go any further than that, and legislators must find the best way of proceeding.

Senator Moore: In your remarks, you mentioned that the police should be targeting the businesses that these organized criminals are in. We have heard from witnesses before you of the millions, if not billions, of dollars that have been generated and are out there. In the course of your research, where is this money deposited, and does Bill C-24 not give the police the tools they need to chase down and seize those monies?

Mr. Lavigne: I have always been of the opinion that Revenue Canada investigators should be the people tasked with dealing with money laundering and proceeds of crime. The untouchables who finally nailed Al Capone and who fought organized crime in the U.S. in the 1920s and 1930s were not police officers. They were Revenuers who worked for the Department of Treasury. Al Capone got nailed on tax evasion. There needs to be more cooperation. There has always been a reluctance to bring the tax people in. It is a power struggle, but I think these agencies should cooperate more.

Money laundering is, in one sense, well understood and, in another sense, truly improperly understood. The Hells Angels do not put this money into foreign bank accounts. They put it in a plastic pipe and bury it in their backyard. I carry a shovel in the trunk of my car, hoping one day I will luck out. Five million dollars was found in California in a Hells Angels' front yard in a plastic pipe.

Most criminals, the smart ones, will not flash the cash, because if they do, they will get hit on for money. They look grubby. Look at the Volpe brothers in Toronto, who were the organized crime in Ontario - the only organized crime as far as the media was concerned. One of them ran a parking lot, wore a little windbreaker and pants, and read books every day. You would not make him for an organized crime figure. They bury their money.

The Colombians are the guys with the accountants who run the money through the system. The others are pretty smart.

Senator Moore: Where is the bikers' money in Canada? Is it in banks or buried?

Mr. Lavigne: In British Columbia, they nearly spent $250,000 of it buying a seat on the Vancouver Stock Change and running a member for public office in White Rock. They own a lot of businesses.

A police officer has to prove a crime was committed. Revenue Canada just walks in and says, "Prove to me these assets are legal." This is where the police and Revenue Canada can work together. The police identify the Hells Angels, their wives, their associates, their friends, their network. Revenue Canada hits all those people: Mr. Big, his wife, his girlfriends, his family, his parents, her parents, their associates, and audits all of them. Four apartment buildings will be in his second girlfriend's name. A fleet of limousines that work the airport will be in the name of an associate. If all these people eventually get audited, the noose gets really tight. Even if no one is ever charged, they will have to forfeit all this money, which is very damaging to organized crime. Money is their power. It corrupts. It buys stuff.

I would love to see Revenue Canada do that. It is such an easy thing to do, because they know who all the bad guys are. Bikers are so obvious. Audit them. The corner stores get audited every day. Legitimate business people get audited every day. It frightens them. I think that would probably be the best way at this moment in time to hurt organized crime.

[Translation]

Senator Joyal: I would like to go back to the issue of society's control over the police, because that is an important part of your presentation. There are a number of organizations in the system that are responsible for ensuring that the police respect the law. These organizations are also responsible for ensuring that police forces respect codes of ethics and that officers are reprimanded if abuses occur. For example, the new legislation on police forces in Quebec provides for a police review board. If we give this board a mandate, as part of the powers that are granted under clause 25 of the bill, it will be able to do its work and satisfy our concern as a democratic society that the rule of law is respected and that the proper balance is maintained.

We need the police. That is absolutely clear. We recognize it. But we have to see how we can set up some controls over the police to ensure that, if the police does not fight crime efficiently, there is some organization that will make it possible for journalists to do their job and alert the public accordingly.

You don't seem to consider these organizations very important, or effective. I mentioned the Quebec provincial police review council; there are similar councils for the RCMP and in other provinces.

Mr. Paul E. Kennedy, Senior Assistant Deputy Solicitor General, Office of SADSG, Police and Security, Solicitor General Canada:

…The big cases are done with joint force operations. They must be done that way in order to have effective sharing of information. Thirteen proceeds of crime units have been established federally. There is a reference to Revenue Canada. Those units are involved with various agencies including customs and the revenue agency. There are forensic accountants involved.

If there is not a proceeds of crime criminal case, the matter is turned over to the Canada Customs and Revenue Agency. They follow up with a revenue assessment - either civilly on based on tax evasion, as the case may be. There is that collaboration.

All of those techniques are used. We are aware that Al Capone was not discovered only today. The Canada Customs and Revenue Agency has a permanent SI unit that investigates what we used to call net worth cases. If you have a lifestyle that you cannot justify, they do a net worth assessment. We use all the tools available to us.

I wanted to raise that to say that we are aware of all of the techniques employed; none of us fell off the turnip truck. It may be that a journalist can tell us how to do policing better. Everyone is open to ideas. It is a challenging environment. Every time we pass a law, people respond. We seize property used for criminal activity. Therefore, people use rental property…

An Act To Amend The Criminal Code, The Official Secrets Act, The Canada Evidence Act, The Proceeds Of Crime (Money Laundering) Act And Other Acts, And To Enact Measures Respecting The Registration Of Charities In Order To Combat Terrorism (Bill C-36)

Citation 2001, c. 41, ss. 14 and 33

Royal Assent December 18, 2001

Hansard

October 16, 2001 [House of Commons]

Hon. Anne McLellan (Minister of Justice and Attorney General of Canada, Lib.)

...We are all aware that the lifeblood of terrorist organizations is money. Bill C-36 proposes new measures under the criminal code to combat the financing of terrorism. It includes measures related to the seizure, restraint and forfeiture of terrorist property. The new measures related to financing would allow us to effectively go after the heart of terrorist financing networks.

For example, it would be an offence to collect or provide cash knowing that it would be used to facilitate or carry out an offence that constitutes terrorist activity. It would be an offence to provide financial services knowing that they would be used to facilitate or carry out terrorist activity or to benefit a terrorist group. Persons in the financial services industry who knowingly engage in transactions related to terrorism could find themselves charged criminally.

These measures are also subject to safeguards including substantive and procedural requirements governing seizure, restraint and forfeiture. Third party interests including those of the innocent families of those involved would be protected.

...The bill also amends the proceeds of crime or money laundering legislation. Fintrac's mandate would be expanded to gather, analyze and disclose information on terrorist money laundering. The safeguards built into the Fintrac process would be maintained.

Mr. Vic Toews (Provencher, Canadian Alliance)

There are a number of amendments to other acts in the bill, including the Official Secrets Act, the Canada Evidence Act, the Proceeds of Crime (Money Laundering) Act, the National Defence Act and many others. We must be diligent in ensuring that all amendments to these acts strike the appropriate balance between national security and the right of the public to be informed of government business. The leader of the PC/DR coalition has been especially vigilant in respect of this disclosure. He has mentioned it in various questions and other statements, as have other members of the House.

Mr. Michel Bellehumeur (Berthier--Montcalm, BQ)

As far as money laundering is concerned, for at least five or six years now the Bloc Quebecois has been saying over and over that the borders between Canada and the United States are as full of holes as a sieve and that Canada enjoys the wonderful international reputation of being a country where money laundering is easy and where there may be the least monitoring of this.

I know that this is being corrected. I know that we have not been a voice crying out unheard in the wilderness for those five or six years. I know that the government has amended some laws in response to overtures by the Bloc Quebecois. I know that as far as Bill C-36 is concerned the criminal code is also being amended, with a far more specific objective: terrorist groups. This is a good thing.

I do not, however, think that the wake up call of the events of September 11 was necessary for this to happen. Actions could have been taken back when we started talking about the situation, back when we began to address the problem represented by Canadian customs and the Canada-U.S. border.

The final objective is to work with the international community to bring terrorists to justice and address the root causes of their hatred.

Mr. James Rajotte (Edmonton Southwest, Canadian Alliance)

Mr. Speaker, an expert on money laundering has been quoted in news reports today as calling Canada the Maytag of the north, well known to terrorists and other criminals as a good place to launder money.

The justice minister and the finance minister both assured us that the government had the legal power to seize and freeze the financial assets of bin Laden and other terrorists. If that was the case, will the Prime Minister explain why this new bill changes the very law that his government said had the powers already?

October 16, 2001 [House of Commons]
Hon. Anne McLellan (Minister of Justice and Attorney General of Canada, Lib.)

Mr. Speaker, as I have indicated before in the House, under section 3(2) of the United Nations Act we do have the power to commence civil forfeiture proceedings, but what we are doing in the anti-terrorism legislation is putting in place a strengthened and more formal process by which we have the power to seize, to restrain and to seek civil forfeiture. Let me make it absolutely plain that under section 3(2) of the United Nations Act that presently exists we do have the power to seek civil forfeiture of frozen assets.

October 16, 2001 [House of Commons]
Mr. James Rajotte (Edmonton Southwest, Canadian Alliance)

Mr. Speaker, section 3(2) of the United Nations Act is the act that the government is changing under this law. Two senior ministers weeks ago asserted that the government had the legal power to seize and freeze bank accounts, and yet at the first opportunity they have changed the law. Why did two senior ministers state in the House that the government had these powers?

October 16, 2001 [House of Commons]

Hon. Anne McLellan (Minister of Justice and Attorney General of Canada, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, we do have that power and in the legislation what we are doing is streamlining and formalizing that process.

Mr. Jay Hill (Prince George—Peace River, PC/DR) Mr. Speaker, under Bill C-36 persons who believe they should not be on the terrorist list must ask the solicitor general to remove their names. If the solicitor general does not make a decision within 60 days, people must apply to the courts for redress. Could the solicitor general assure the House that he will make his decision within 60 days so that innocent, wrongfully accused or wrongfully listed Canadians are not required to go to court to have their names removed?
Hon. Lawrence MacAulay (Solicitor General of Canada, Lib.) Mr. Speaker, I can assure my hon. colleague that I would evaluate the situation and a decision would be made promptly.

Hon. Sharon Carstairs (Leader of the Government)

We need to be able to protect Canadians and prevent terrorist acts from being committed in the very first place. We need investigative tools that will help us gain information on terrorist groups before they engage in their attacks. We need preventive arrest powers to help us interfere with and destabilize terrorist groups who are in the planning stages of an attack. We need new Criminal Code offences that allow us to convict those who facilitate, participate in and direct terrorist activity. These must include a preventive aspect that applies whether or not the ultimate terrorist acts are carried out. We also need to be able to stop the flow of money that terrorists need to carry out their terrible acts. These are some of the gaps that Bill C-36 would fill.

An Act To Amend The Criminal Code (Proceeds Of Crime) And The Controlled Drugs And Substances Act And To Make Consequential Amendments To Another Act (Bill C-53)

Citation 2005, c. 44, s. 1

Royal Assent November 25, 2005

September 27, 2005 [House of Commons]

Hon. Paul Harold Macklin (Parliamentary Secretary to the Minister of Justice and Attorney General of Canada, Lib.)

Mr. Speaker, I am pleased to rise today in debate on Bill C-53, An Act to amend the Criminal Code (proceeds of crime) and the Controlled Drugs and Substances Act and to make consequential amendments to another act.
[Translation]

First and foremost, this bill seeks to amend the Criminal Code to put in place a reverse onus with respect to certain proceeds of crime applications. The new measures would apply to those convicted of a criminal organization offence or a serious drug offence and will provide that, subject to certain conditions, the property of such an offender identified by the Crown can be forfeited by order of a court unless the offender proves that the property is not the proceeds of crime. In effect, these new provisions would add a new, more aggressive forfeiture method to the Criminal Code, in addition to the proceeds of crime forfeiture provisions that already exist. This legislation also makes a number of corrective amendments to the current forfeiture of crime provisions for the purpose of ensuring clarity in these provisions. The proposed new reverse-onus forfeiture power under Bill C-53 builds upon the current proceeds of crime scheme in the Criminal Code.

The current provisions originate from legislation put in place in 1989. They are part of the criminal process that comes into play when a court is imposing sentence on an offender. At their core, they are fundamentally designed to put in practice the straightforward principle that crime ought not to pay. By allowing the government to claim the proceeds of crime, these provisions directly attack the illicit economic gain that is the prime motivation of many types of criminal activity, especially organized crime activity. As such, proceeds of crime legislation is absolutely vital in helping to deter this type of crime and to undermine the criminal groups that are responsible for it.
[English]

These proceeds of crime provisions are found at part XII.2 of the Criminal Code. They allow for the forfeiture of proceeds upon application by the Crown after a conviction for an indictable offence under federal law, other than a small number of offences exempted by regulation. These offences, for which this current procedure is available, are referred to as designated offences under the code.

Currently, in order to obtain forfeiture the Crown must show on a balance of probabilities that the property is the proceeds of crime and the property is connected to the crime for which the person was convicted. Alternatively, the Crown can also obtain forfeiture even if no connection between the particular offence and the property is established, provided that the court is nevertheless satisfied beyond a reasonable doubt that the property is proceeds of crime.

Attached to these existing forfeiture tools are other related powers. These include, for example, powers allowing special search warrants to find property that may be proceeds of crime; the powers of restraint and seizure of property pending resolution of criminal proceedings to ensure that the property does not disappear before a possible forfeiture order; and provisions for court proceedings to permit relief from forfeiture where appropriate in order to ensure the protection of legitimate interests in property, including third party interests.

These existing proceeds of crime measures have proven to be fair and effective powers under the Criminal Code. However, there are strong arguments that they have not been effective enough.

While Canadian authorities have managed to seize, restrain and ultimately forfeit substantial suspected criminal assets, these amounts are believed to represent a relatively small proportion of the total amount of proceeds of criminal activity in Canada.

Organized crime groups in particular are believed to have control of sizeable financial assets that are the product of illicit financial activity that have not successfully been recovered by Canadian authorities. There is a substantial international dimension in this as well, as criminal groups transfer illicit gains out of the country, or indeed, transfer illicit gains from activities in other countries into Canada.

While our current proceeds of crime provisions are effective, the government is of the view that they can and should be improved upon, especially in relation to organized crime. We must build upon the current provisions in order to make them more effective. In particular, there are limitations in the way the current provisions operate that create barriers for police and prosecutors.

While criminal organizations are believed to be involved in numerous offences leading to substantial illicit material gain, convictions are typically obtained only with respect to a small number of offences. It is not always the case that these offences have associated proceeds. For example, if such a criminal is convicted of murder, no particular proceeds will in general be associated with that one offence. Even for other types of offences that often do involve economic gain, such as drug trafficking, it frequently is the case that arrests will take place just before a major drug transaction takes place. While the organization itself likely will have been involved in numerous other trafficking activities, the particular offence for which the person is charged in that case would have involved an offer to traffic, for which there may be few or no related proceeds. Even where conviction does take place for an offence for which there are related proceeds, and forfeiture of these proceeds is possible, the particular offence and associated proceeds will very often only represent a small proportion of the total offences and illicit accumulation of property for which the criminal organization is responsible.

This means that the Crown often has to rely on the second branch of the current proceeds test, requiring proof beyond a reasonable doubt that the property is nevertheless the proceeds of criminal offences. This often means that even after a successful prosecution, there is a prospect of substantial additional proceeds litigation with sometimes doubtful prospects of success to obtain property, which in the organized crime context very much appears from the outset to be proceeds of crime.

It is for this reason that a new reverse onus proceeds of crime forfeiture power is needed. It is the view of the government that there are certain criminal circumstances under which it is legitimate to presume that the identified assets of an offender are proceeds of crime. Of course, it should still be open to an offender to prove on a balance of probabilities that assets are in fact not proceeds of crime. However, failing such proof, the property should be forfeited by the order of the court. This is the basis of the proposed new power under Bill C-53.

This is a type of procedure that has already been adopted in a number of other democracies in respect of proceeds of crime. It is a power that federal, provincial and territorial ministers responsible for justice have identified as needed in Canada as well.

Mr. Art Hanger (Calgary Northeast, CPC)

Mr. Speaker, I find this legislation interesting in the sense that quite a battle has raged onward with law enforcement and its legislators in trying to address the whole issue of proceeds. I remember as a serving officer that in an investigation there was always this matter of trying to seize the goods, whether it was a drug trafficker or some other organized criminal group. There were so many loopholes in the law that many of the organized criminal groups or individuals would simply sign their proceeds over to their lawyer and the Crown could not touch them. For the most part I think that is basically where the legislation sits today.

The other part of it was an issue that would deal with perishable seizures. For instance, there were individuals who went into ranching. Perhaps they would have 500 head of cattle. All the cattle were bought with illicit money from the drug trade. How does one look after 500 head of cattle? Who looks after 500 head of cattle? Is the Crown responsible for looking after 500 head of cattle? The issue became a moot point because nobody wanted to do it. Of course the proceeds would slip away and again end up in the hands of the lawyer who was defending the person.

I am curious. When it comes to an outright seizure, what does the state have to do to prove that the goods were obtained through illegal activity? What hoops does the Crown have to jump through? The legislation can say a certain thing, but until we see it all played out on the ground, we will not really know how effective it is going to be.

September 27, 2005 [House of Commons]

Hon. Paul Harold Macklin

Mr. Speaker, the principle being advanced here is very clear and distinct in what we are really trying to say. I agree with the hon. member to the extent that if we can take the profits out of crime, then there really is not any particular reason for pursuing that sort of activity.

With respect to the member's specific concerns about the ability of our legal system to trace money and to hold money, there are in place already certain provisions that will permit that money to be held, and even if it could be shown to be in the lawyer's hands, to be held pending the hearing process.

The other option that is offered in this legislation that is of some interest to the member is that first of all, in order for the reverse onus to apply, the Crown would first be required to prove, on a balance of probabilities, either that the offender engaged in a pattern of criminal activity for the purpose of receiving a material benefit or--and here is the one that likely comes closer to fitting the member's concern--that the legitimate income of the offender cannot reasonably account for all of the offender's property.

This is broad and far-reaching. It goes well beyond the present legislation where we are limited really to the proceeds of that particular act of criminality, unless we can prove beyond a reasonable doubt that something did come from and can be identified as proceeds of crime by itself.

The member's concerns are legitimate. It is something that should be raised at committee. We should ask the experts to make sure that they have the tools in place to allow for the tracing and following of moneys. I believe that this new bill will really go a long way toward taking profit out of crime. Then I think we will see some positive results in terms of our law enforcement.

Mr. Randy White (Abbotsford, CPC)

... That is my preamble to my examples of this bill, which is really talking about seizure of assets, and it is a good thing.

Not too long ago there was a drug bust. It not only included drugs, but about eight or ten feet away in the rafters there was about $400,000 all wrapped up in plastic which the police took out of the building. This case went to court and the judge, in his infinite wisdom, gave all the money back to the dealers because they said they did not know it was there, that it was just something that must have been up in the rafters. Poor dears. He virtually gave the drug dealers $400,000 because in that courtroom with that defence lawyer, they did the wrong thing. They went after the defence of that drug money.

Although we have laws in this country, the problem is that lawyers on the defence side and the judges making the decisions are making the wrong decisions applicable to laws like this. It is not just the law that has seizure of assets that is important, it is the application of the law within the courtroom. I do not know what it is going to take for us in our society to go to the defence lawyers and say that we all have a problem, that for goodness' sake they know where the $400,000 has come from. It cannot be given back to the dealers. They would just use it to buy and sell again.

I cannot say how many times I have been involved in situations where money has been seized, put in trust because it cannot be given back to the dealers, when in fact the lawyers can get their hands on it. They go in on behalf of the dealers, charge a fee of the amount that is in the trust account, get all the money out of the trust account, give part of it back to the dealers and keep a good chunk of change for themselves. Those lawyers out there know who I am talking about. That is trafficking. It is wrong. It is stupid. It is not just a matter of setting a law to seize assets, it is the application of the law after it is made. These laws are not made to be broken or challenged. They are not made to have application under the Charter of Rights and Freedoms. They are made to prevent illegal use of money.

Mr. David Tilson (Dufferin—Caledon, CPC)

Mr. Speaker, would the member comment on the reverse onus section that is in the bill? As I understand it, for the reverse onus section to apply, the Crown has to prove on the balance of probabilities that the offender has engaged in a pattern of criminal activity and the court then makes a ruling to seize whatever the material is.

As one of my colleagues has said that it is some reverse onus clause. This is the first thing that has to happen. The Crown has to prove on the balance of probabilities that either the offender engaged in a pattern of criminal activity for the purpose of receiving material benefit or the legitimate income of the offender cannot reasonably account for all the offender's property.

After the court makes the ruling, then comes what I gather the government calls the reverse onus clause. The offender has to prove on the balance of probabilities that the property is not from the proceeds of crime.

What does the member think of the reverse onus clause?

September 27, 2005 [House of Commons]

Mr. Randy White

Mr. Speaker, in effect the onus is still on the Crown to prove that it has a repeat offender, more or less. In most cases that money is not found with a repeat offender. This is somebody who is sent out with little or no record. There will be a big problem resulting from that.

September 28, 2005 [House of Commons]

Mr. Richard Marceau (Charlesbourg—Haute-Saint-Charles, BQ)

...In order to fight crime better in general, and especially organized crime, the Bloc has long sought changes in the Criminal Code to provide a reverse onus of proof in proceeds of crime applications. This would force offenders, once convicted of a serious offence, to demonstrate on a balance of probabilities that their property was not acquired through criminal activity.

Organized crime is one of the most serious social issues that we face—all the more so in view of the fact that Quebec has been the scene for ten years of a bloody war among the various criminal motorcycle gangs. This is a war, we should remember, that has cost more than 160 lives, including entirely innocent victims who had the misfortune to find themselves in the way of these bikers.

In the name of public safety, but also and especially to support the police forces in their attempts to counter organized crime, we have campaigned fiercely for substantial changes to the current legal system in order to put more tools at the disposal of crown attorneys and police forces.

By amending the Criminal Code in accordance with the letter and spirit of Bill C-53, we will be taking a huge step forward, and I know already that our efforts will be welcomed by both the police forces and all crown attorneys.

The Bloc Québécois has been pressing the federal government for years to introduce effective legislation for fighting criminal gangs. During the 2000 election campaign, the Bloc carried on this battle, demanding that Ottawa amend the Criminal Code to give police and crown attorneys more effective weapons for fighting and eliminating organized crime.

I would like to take this opportunity to salute the hon. member for Hochelaga, who has been working on this issue for years, that is, since the death of young Daniel Desrochers, 10 years ago. My colleague is a leader in the fight against organized crime.

On October 27, 2004, with the support of the Conservative member for Provencher and the NDP member for Windsor—Tecumseh, I tabled Bill C-242. This bill served as a working paper for the legislation introduced by the Minister of Justice. I want to salute the courage of the minister, and particularly the determination that he has shown in finally convincing cabinet of the merits of the Bloc Québécois' proposal and of the need to follow up on it. It is unfortunate that, for too long, the Liberal government dragged its feet in the fight against organized crime.

It took the Bloc's determination and the government's minority status in the House to force a debate and the tabling of this legislation. Indeed, it was in March 2005 that opposition parties got together to have a motion, of which I was the sponsor, adopted by the House, challenging the government to propose, by May 31, 2005, legislative provisions that would reflect my Bill C-242. Bill C-53 was introduced in the House on May 30, at the very last minute.

Once it is passed, this legislation will greatly streamline the rules of evidence regarding the seizure of goods belonging to a person found guilty of certain offences. More specifically, the bill will amend the Criminal Code so that the goods—identified by the Crown—of a person found guilty of an offence involving a criminal organization, or found guilty of trafficking, importing, exporting or producing drugs, can be confiscated by the court, unless the offender can show, on a balance of probabilities, that his assets are in no way related to his criminal activities, and that they are not proceeds of crime.

In order for the reverse onus to apply, the Crown would first be required to prove, on a balance of probabilities, either that the offender engaged in a criminal organization offence or two serious offences for the purpose of receiving material benefit, or that the legitimate income of the offender cannot reasonably account for all of the offender's property. I would point out in passing that a serious offence means a criminal act punishable by a maximum prison sentence of five years or more.

At present, in order to obtain an order of forfeiture, the Crown must prove, on a balance of probabilities, that the property is the proceeds of crime and that the property is connected to the crime for which the person was convicted. The Crown therefore must do two things: first, convict the accused and second, prove the illegal and illegitimate origin of the property in order to seize it.

The Charter rightly imposes respect of the right of accused persons to be presumed innocent. It is therefore fundamental that the Crown begin by establishing proof beyond any reasonable doubt of the guilt of the accused, before the reversal of the burden of proof intervenes in the equation. The Crown must prove, beyond any reasonable doubt, that the accused is guilty of a criminal offence and designate the property it wishes to seize because it is the proceeds of a crime. The accused must again prove, this time—I repeat—by the balance of probabilities, the legitimate origin of the property the Crown wants to confiscate from him.

The Bloc has been saying for years that this reversal of the burden of proof is necessary to battle organized crime and money laundering effectively. Organized crime represents an ongoing threat to society and so it is essential to have effective measures in place to facilitate the battle against this scourge.

Given the many negative effects of organized crime, in both in its social and economic aspects, there is ample justification for strengthening the legislation to fight crime.

Economically, organized crime generates huge revenues, which are often reinvested in the legitimate world, but without making a positive contribution to it. The resulting tax evasion deprives governments of considerable revenues, and gangsters refine their techniques every day to avoid having their assets reviewed by the courts.

Very simply, it is becoming particularly frustrating for ordinary taxpayers to see notorious criminals display ostentatiously and condescendingly the proceeds of their illegal activities. How many times have we heard comments from citizens disgusted with the administration of justice when they see individuals with a plainly criminal past being convicted of a crime and then resuming their jet-set lifestyles as if nothing had happened, because they know full well that these people have not earned an honest dollar in their lives?

As lawmakers, we have to act to restore the public's confidence in its justice system. It has become imperative that criminal organizations be sent a clear signal that the days are over when they could shamelessly make a fast buck without facing punishment. From now on, criminals will have to face the consequences of their actions and, in that sense, they will no longer be able to benefit from their criminal and illegal activities.

Let us not be fooled. There is nothing wrong with calling for the seizure of goods constituting the proceeds of crime. It is common sense. Period.

By amending the Criminal Code to reverse the burden of proof as regards the acquisition of luxury items by an individual found guilty of gangsterism, we are giving police and the Crown another means to eradicate this problem. An individual found guilty and sentenced accordingly will still, at the end of the sentence, have to demonstrate that their assets were acquired using legitimate means.

It will become particularly difficult for a criminal to show that his luxury home, his chalet in the north, his condo in Florida, his shiny motorcycle, his sports cars, and his entire lifestyle correspond to declared income more often than not so low it hovers around the poverty line.

Such a legal initiative could also complicate the widespread practice by criminals of using front men. We know that individuals register their assets in the name of their spouse, parents or friends in order to avoid having major financial assets in their own name that could be confiscated by the government. The bill must take into account this particular reality whereby these front men are very often forced to obey the criminals.

I believe this is one of the concerns raised by our NDP colleagues. I can assure them that I will do everything in my power to reassure them in this regard. The analysis that lead to the introduction of Bill C-53 was largely inspired by a number of international legal precedents. The OECD's financial action task force on money laundering, the FATF, had proposed, in one of its 40 recommendations to fight money laundering, adopting measures allowing for the confiscation of assets.

September 28, 2005 [House of Commons]

Mr. Joe Comartin (Windsor—Tecumseh, NDP)

...The basic principle is that proceeds of crime should be forfeited and that the Crown should not have to prove what are proceeds of crime using the criminal standard, but rather using the civil standard. Rather than having to prove beyond a reasonable doubt that the gains were from criminal activity, the prosecutor would only have to establish a reasonable belief that there was a gain. The onus would shift to the convicted person to establish that the assets, the cash or whatever the assets are, were not received as proceeds of a crime.

There is a jurisdictional issue here. Manitoba and Ontario both have legislation that deals with the proceeds of crime. We have to be very careful that we do not further complicate the receipt of these assets by the Crown by overlapping jurisdictions. For that reason, when the bill goes to committee, as it obviously will from the support it has received, that will be one of the issues that will have to be addressed. Hopefully, we will hear from provincial attorneys general or their representatives with regard to their position on the bill.

There is one that gives me greater concern and I have expressed this to my confreres on the committee. I have heard from the Canadian Bar Association and other legal groups. They are concerned about the reverse onus applying to assets that are mixed with those of other individuals.

The commercial wing of the Canadian Bar Association used the example of a person who was in a business relationship and unbeknownst to that person, one of the partners or associates had been engaged in organized crime activity and some of the money invested in the firm had come from those activities, but the person was an innocent third party. That person would be faced with the Crown moving against an asset in which the person had an interest. It is important that we build in protections for that business partner. I believe it is possible to do that without undermining the effectiveness of the legislation, but the legislation as drafted does not address this point, at least not to my satisfaction.

The second area where we run into this is with respect to family assets. The immediate stereotype involves someone in a full time relationship with another person. We assume that individual would know if the other person was engaged in organized crime or drug activity, the two criminal areas that the clauses of the bill control, but that in fact is not the case. It is not unusual for family members—and it does not necessarily mean a spouse or a partner; it may be a more extended family member—with joint assets with the person who has been convicted of an offence to have no knowledge that the asset was obtained by way of proceeds from crime. We need to be sure that we protect those innocent third parties.

There is one final point that I want to make, and this came up in a completely different context. The commissioner of the RCMP was before the committee, and I have to say that my memory is fading on this point as I cannot remember if he was before the justice committee or the subcommittee on public security. He raised concerns about police forces becoming dependent on the proceeds of crime. Where these funds go is also very much an issue.

Commissioner Zaccardelli was very clear that he felt it was inappropriate for any police force in this country, and I think he would probably say anywhere in the world, to become dependent as the recipients of the proceeds of crime once they are forfeited to the Crown. That is another issue that very much has to be addressed, with regard to the role that the crown attorneys and the police forces would play at the local level. That needs to be addressed.

Hon. Peter Adams (Parliamentary Secretary to the Minister of Human Resources and Skills Development and Minister responsible for Democratic Renewal, Lib.)

…Under the proposed scheme, the court would have to be satisfied on a balance of probabilities that either the offender has engaged in a pattern of criminal activity for the purpose of providing the offender with material benefit, or that income of the offender unrelated to crime cannot reasonably account for the value of all the property of the offender. Upon these conditions being satisfied, any property of the offender identified by the Attorney General will be forfeited unless the offender demonstrates, again on a balance of probabilities, that the property is not proceeds of crime. The court, however, would be permitted to set a limit on the total amount of property forfeited as may be required by the interests of justice.

I want to comment on the particular offences that would be subject to this reverse onus set of provisions. These offences do not comprise all of the designated offences that are subject to the current proceeds of crime scheme under the Criminal Code. It is important to emphasize this. It is also important to emphasize that the current forfeiture scheme under the code will continue to exist and be available for this wider range of offences. Indeed, at the discretion of the Crown the current forfeiture scheme will also be available even for the particular offences identified in the reverse onus forfeiture scheme.

What Bill C-53 adds, however, is an additional special forfeiture power for which the Crown, at its discretion, may apply in respect of the narrower class of offences that I just mentioned. Ultimately, the new forfeiture power is targeted at organized crime and its main activities. That is why the legislation specifically identifies criminal organization offences as the basis for the reverse onus forfeiture.

These criminal organization offences are crimes that logically can support a presumption that substantial property of the offender is the proceeds of crime. A core aspect of the definition of criminal organization is that it is a group formed for the purpose of committing offences to obtain “material benefit”. There is, therefore, a logical basis founded on the definition of criminal organization itself for the underlying presumption inherent in the reversal of the onus. There is also the justification of taking special measures to address the substantial societal harm caused by organized crime.

The one other category of offences to which the reverse onus provisions will apply are the serious drug offences of trafficking, importing and exporting, and production of illegal drugs where these offences are prosecuted on indictment. There are probably no offences more closely associated with organized crime than these serious drug offences, so it was thought entirely in keeping with the purpose of this legislation to include them. There is also the justification of taking special measures against such drug offences that represent matters of recognized societal harm in their own right. These are the offences that the government puts forward in Bill C-53 as appropriately being subject to the reverse onus forfeiture which my colleague was discussing earlier.

September 28, 2005 [House of Commons]

Mr. Vic Toews (Provencher, CPC)

... The key purpose of the bill is to provide a reverse onus of proof in proceeds of crime related to organized criminal activity. The provisions in the bill have long been a part of the Conservative Party platform and I hope to see the legislation passed as quickly as possible.

Indeed, it is noteworthy that the bill generally speaking enjoys all-party support, something that is all too rare in the House of Commons.

I hope that some of the explanation that the parliamentary secretary gave just a moment ago in the House will assure some members of the New Democratic Party that the interest of innocent third parties are preserved. The bill does not need too much retinkering or amendments. I am concerned that the bill, which appears to be on the face of it a relatively good bill, not be held up any further.

The reverse onus provision for proceeds of crime was recommended by the subcommittee on organized crime but was not included in the government's last bill addressing organized crime, Bill C-24, which was tabled and passed in 2001.

I want to note that there are serious shortcomings in our organized crime legislation. This is an important step to address some of those shortcomings, but there are many other issues that need to be addressed.

I know that it is quite onerous now when we are prosecuting organized criminal organizations that in each specific case there has to be a reproving of the fact that the organization is a criminal organization. Quite frankly we should adopt some of the legislation from other jurisdictions and I specifically refer to the RICO laws in the United States that have been very effective in attacking organized crime. We could learn a lot from that legislation. It respects I believe due process. It respects the constitutional safeguards not only in the American constitution but in the Canadian constitution as well. We should not hesitate to adopt similar procedures where it is in the best interest of Canadian public security.

I make the comment that we do not consider this the fight against organized crime to be at an end simply because we are agreeing to what is an important amendment because in the overall picture it is still a relatively small step.

I feel compelled to point out that the Liberals did not act on the reverse onus measure until they faced significant provincial pressure from the provincial ministers of justice as well as the opposition justice critic since the beginning of this minority Parliament.

I know that certain provinces, including my home province of Manitoba, have passed similar legislation. I do not think we should hesitate in moving forward with federal legislation. The provinces did so out of desperation. They were not receiving any help from the federal government and quite frankly had to move ahead. I support what the provinces generally speaking have been doing. However, it is a much more cumbersome process that the provinces had to adopt.

I strongly believe that the level of government that is primarily responsible for the enforcement of the criminal law should also be responsible for passing appropriate legislation dealing with the proceeds of crime. We should not leave it to the provincial governments to do it under their constitutional jurisdiction under property and civil rights. It is cumbersome and not as effective. This is the right approach and we should not hesitate. I do not think there would be any province standing in the way of Parliament in terms of taking those steps.

Organized crime is a problem that reaches across nations, oceans and boundaries affecting communities everywhere. The violence, the welfare and the financial implications of organized crime are far reaching. Globalization and technological revolution has made it possible for organizations to exert enormous influence on an international scale.

Generally speaking, we are asking our police forces to face a 21st century problem with all of the technological advantages that organized crime has with essentially 19th century tools. Many of our evidentiary laws are old laws.

They are simply not updated often enough in order to keep abreast of the changes in technology, so we need to, on an ongoing basis, ensure that our police forces have not only the appropriate frontline police resources but indeed the legal resources in the form of effective laws. This is one such step in bringing our criminal law essentially out of the 19th century and into the 21st century. In that sense it is a quantum leap for Canada. Unfortunately, we have not learned from the examples which other countries have gained and therefore we are still far behind other countries in terms of addressing issues of organized crime.

The extent of collaboration within and among criminal groups has broadened greatly. The available technology has improved their ability to conduct organized crime by leaps and bounds, and therefore Canada has become a very attractive place for these types of criminals. According to Criminal Intelligence Service Canada, virtually every major criminal group in the world is active in Canada.

In 1998 the Department of the Solicitor General of Canada, now the public safety department, commissioned an independent study to assess the cost of certain activities related to organized crime. It was found that the economic costs of organized crime, I am not talking about the economic profits to organized crime, but the costs, amount to at least $5 billion a year. Frontline police officers who are struggling to maintain their fight on existing technology simply do not have the resources to compete with the new and emerging technologies to which these criminal organizations have access.

The reverse onus provision for proceeds of crime is vital for an effective war on organized criminal activity. At present, in order to obtain an order of forfeiture, the Crown must prove on a balance of probabilities that property is the proceeds of crime and that the property is connected to the crime for which the person was convicted. The Crown must prove that the accused or convicted person owns the property and that the property is the proceeds of crime.

Again, given the resources available to many criminal organizations, accountants, lawyers and the like, they have learned to distance themselves from their assets. Often criminal organizations do not use the regular types of security that other businessmen would have to use. They enforce their security in ways that legitimate business people do not and should not.

If there is no connection between the offence and the property established, the court nevertheless may order forfeiture of the property if it is satisfied beyond a reasonable doubt that the property is the proceeds of crime. That is the existing law now.

The amendments introduced in Bill C-53 provide that once an offender has been convicted of the appropriate crime, that is a criminal organization offence or certain offences under the Controlled Drug and Substances Act, the court shall order the forfeiture of property of the offender identified by the Crown unless the offender proves on a balance of probabilities that the property is not the proceeds of the crime. Once the conviction is made now, any property belonging to the accused is forfeited unless the accused establishes that the property is not the proceeds of the crime.

There have been some concerns about the constitutionality of the legislation. I think, however, it is very clear that there are no constitutional problems. The reverse onus provision does not impinge on individual liberty rights secured by the Constitution, but rather relate to property rights once he or she has already been convicted of a criminal offence.

We are not talking about double jeopardy. We are not talking about reverse onus in the establishment of an essential element to a criminal offence. This is an appropriate constitutional response of the federal government under its criminal law powers or a provincial government under its rights to regulate property and civil rights.

September 28, 2005 [House of Commons]

Mr. Russ Hiebert (South Surrey—White Rock—Cloverdale, CPC)

… The bottom line is Parliament needs to send a message that crime does not pay. Unfortunately, our criminal justice system is in such a shambles right now after 12 years of Liberal rule, that many people are getting exactly the opposite message. I cannot help but be reminded of the case of Paul Coffin who was recently convicted for defrauding this very government of $1.5 million. While he repaid much of the money, he received no jail time and kept about $500,000. The message in that case for many Canadians is that crime does pay.

Nevertheless, Bill C-53 would ensure that those who are engaged in serious criminal enterprise, especially the illegal drug trade, would never profit from their crimes. Currently, those involved in this illicit trade in my part of Canada clearly see their crime as a profitable enterprise even when caught and convicted.

Apart from the potential stigma of a criminal conviction, those who run the marijuana grow houses in B.C. really do make a good profit. Even upon conviction there is rarely any jail time and the fines are a fraction of the income received from this illegal activity. They see the fines as simply the cost of doing business. My hope is that Bill C-53 is a first small step in a movement to suppress the grow houses, the smuggling of marijuana and cocaine over our borders and related violence that accompanies the drug trade.

With that in mind, I would like to focus on a couple of aspects of the bill that the minister and the justice committee may want to examine in greater detail as Bill C-53 moves through Parliament. First is the 10 year limitation on seeking forfeiture. Currently clause 6.1 of the bill says that the court may impose forfeiture only if it is convinced that:

> within 10 years before the proceedings were commenced in respect of the offence for which the offender is being sentenced, the offender engaged in a pattern of criminal activity for the purpose of directly or indirectly receiving a material benefit, including a financial benefit;

I believe we may want to reconsider limiting forfeiture in this way. It is important to remember that the individuals involved with most crime families and criminal organizations have been involved in criminal activity their whole lives. Yet, according to the bill, if such a criminal were to be prosecuted for organized crimes that took place more than 10 years before being charged, they apparently would be legally entitled to keep the proceeds of their crimes. Admittedly, such circumstances would be uncommon, yet I do not believe we would want to allow a free pass to such criminals.

Consider the case of a mobster who has lived his whole life off the avails of crime, who is finally ratted out by an informant for murders he committed earlier in his criminal career, yet there is no evidence of criminal activity for the past decade. The police finally have the evidence they need to put the don behind bars. However, even with the conviction and jail sentence, the mobster and his family keep the ill-gotten millions he amassed over his criminal career.

The second area the minister and the committee might want to examine further is the sheltering of ill-gotten gains in someone else's name. This problem was brought to my attention recently through round table meetings I have been holding across Canada as part of our party's task force on safe streets and healthy communities.

The leader of the official opposition asked me and Jim Flaherty, a former attorney general of Ontario and Conservative candidate, to head up this task force as we seek solutions to the problem of violent, drug related crime in Canadian society, the same crimes that Bill C-53 helps to address in part.

Police officers have related to me their frustration at attempting seizure of criminally derived assets from a spouse or a family member who are given title to a car, house or other property. Yes, the bill allows for fines in lieu of seizure where assets are inextricably comingled or found to be beyond the direct reach of authorities. However, I suspect that this obvious loophole for sheltering criminal assets could be tightened significantly.

The third area the minister and the justice committee may want to consider is the sheltering of assets overseas by such criminals. Again, the bill allows for fines in lieu of seizure where assets appear to be beyond the direct reach of Canadian authorities, yet fines may never be paid while criminal assets continue to exist beyond the reach of Her Majesty's government. Indeed, even if this new legislation is effective domestically, then we can well anticipate that the smarter and wealthier criminals will seek to deposit and invest their funds offshore.

According to the International Monetary Fund, estimates of money laundering worldwide amount to anywhere from $590 billion to $1.5 trillion.

According to the most recent Criminal Intelligence Service of Canada report:

> —recent law enforcement projects in B.C. have discovered organized crime groups capable of laundering proceeds of crime derived from the cross-border smuggling of cocaine and marijuana, totaling approximately C$200 million.

That is just in B.C.

> The Financial Action Task Force on Money Laundering, an international-based organization, has recently identified the following worldwide trends in money laundering typologies also evident in Canada: these include the use of wire transfers, and organized crime's utilization of gatekeepers, as they act as intermediaries with financial institutions in addition to providing an appearance of legitimacy. In addition, casinos, including on-line casinos, white-label Automated Teller Machines (ATMs), and money service businesses, such as currency exchanges are increasingly employed by organized crime groups to launder their money in Canada.
> While organized crime groups based in Canada are laundering money here and abroad, Canada is also used by foreign-based groups for the purposes of laundering the proceeds of crime due to the stability of the economy and the soundness of its financial sector. There are individual facilitators and criminal organizations who specialize in providing money laundering services to a number of other organized crime groups.These individuals and criminal groups are not necessarily involved in other types of criminal activity but they do provide an essential component to the successful operation of criminal networks even though they may not be core members of the organization. Some marihuana brokers, for instance, have tasked individuals outside of their criminal organizations with converting the U.S. cash into Canadian currency through currency exchanges on their behalf.

While Parliament is considering the very subject of seizing criminal assets, it is a most appropriate time to be examining how we might strengthen our efforts to reduce the laundering of funds and to repatriate criminal assets from foreign jurisdictions.

Some questions that need answers include the following. Is there more that can be done domestically to track the flow of funds overseas? What is needed domestically to help these efforts? Do we need to impose an anti-money laundering regime on money service businesses and currency exchanges? Do we need more resources for police or for FINTRAC, the Financial Transactions and Reports Analysis Centre of Canada? we be looking at new treaties with certain offshore banking havens? Alternatively, are there any jurisdictions that have become extremely problematic for Canada in our fight against organized crime for which the application of limited sanctions may be appropriate?

If the Minister of Justice is serious about forfeiture, then these questions also must be addressed more fully. While legislation alone cannot answer all of these questions, they must be answered all the same.

As I conclude my comments on Bill C-53, I leave members with some thoughts based on what I have been hearing from Canadians as I have travelled across Canada these past weeks as co-chairman of our party's task force on safe streets and healthy communities. Several themes have been repeated at these meetings, including dismay at the toothlessness of the Youth Criminal Justice Act, light or non-existent jail time for serious violent crimes and lax immigration rules that allow criminals to exploit the system. In addition, illegal drugs were fingered as a common denominator in most crimes, while unstable family environments were identified as the starting point for many career criminals.

October 6, 2005 [Committee][Entire Exchange]

Hon. Roy Cullen (Etobicoke North, Lib.): ... The bill talks about the reverse onus with respect to assets upon conviction. I'm a full subscriber to the fact that a person is innocent until proven guilty; don't get me wrong. However, let's say a person who is alleged to be dealing in drugs is arrested and brought to trial and the person has a whole range of assets. If during the period of the trial, the person divests themselves of the assets in very clever and neat ways, which I'm sure is within their capacity if they're part of organized crime, and ultimately is convicted, but when people look there aren't many assets lying around, tell me, are there any processes or controls to deal with that?
Mr. Shawn Scromeda: That is a matter of existing law as well. It's not just a concern under this bill. Under existing proceeds measures, there are concerns that in between the time of order of forfeiture, which as you correctly point out is only after conviction, the person would be tempted to or would actually try to divest themselves of the property. That's why under the existing provisions there are extensive measures that allow for the seizure and restraint of property pending a final forfeiture order....

November 1, 2005 [Committee][Entire Exchange]

Hon. Roy Cullen: ... Finally, in the context of solicitor-client privilege, you raised a point in your submission. It may be somewhat off topic as well, but in the context of proceeds of crime and anti-money laundering, I know there was an issue with respect to solicitor-client privilege and lawyers sharing information with FINTRAC. The problem with that, of course, is that while 99% of lawyers are law-abiding citizens, the 1% who perhaps aren't are exempted. The criminals, and that's who we're talking about here, will launder their money through those types of lawyers, and that's why the government took a very broad-scope approach. I know there are discussions with the Bar Association, FINTRAC, Finance, and the government. Could you report? Do you know where that's at?
Ms. Joan Bercovitch: Discussions are under way. We're not at liberty to discuss the status at this time.

November 15, 2005 [Committee][Entire Exchange]

Mr. Shawn Scromeda (Counsel, Criminal Law Policy Section, Department of Justice): The "interests of justice" is a term that is considered and used often by the courts. Some of the considerations underlying this provision relate to the very nature of the forfeiture itself. Reverse-onus forfeiture is based on a presumption that property is the proceeds of crime, not on a direct finding by the court that it is the proceeds of crime. It's a distinction from our current proceeds-of-crime regime.

The effects of this are potentially wide-ranging. There may be circumstances where it is simply too difficult for an accused or a third party to mount an effective defence. I think we've heard, especially, some concerns about third parties who may be affected by reverse-onus forfeiture but who may not have the means or the capability to do this.

Given that we are proposing a fairly aggressive widening of the forfeiture power, it is felt that as a balance to that, discretion on the part of the court to address situations where the total amount of forfeiture may be disproportionate to what appears to be the total underlying criminality, or where, as I said, there might be third-party interests involved that haven't been adequately represented, which the court can raise of its own motion, is the sort of consideration we think the court would bring into play under "interests of justice".

I guess I would point out, as well, that other legislation that, in part, provided something of a model for ours--the Irish legislation, the U.K. legislation, civil forfeiture regimes in the provinces, although this is not civil forfeiture--also has, in terms of nature, an aggressive nature, and has similar provisions. It does not further qualify the "interests of justice", but uses the term, "in the interests of justice" to provide some judicial discretion on the total amount of forfeiture.

Hon. Roy Cullen: I'm confused now. I thought you just finished saying that the crown prosecutor would put together a case that says, "Look, even though we only have this one conviction on this small drug deal"--I guess they'd have to have a history of criminality--"this individual has all these assets. So we're proposing to the court that all these assets be subject to this reverse onus. There's a presumption that they were derived from the proceeds of crime." What kind of judicial discretion is needed? I don't follow.

Mr. Shawn Scromeda: The additional tests that we have set out for the pattern of criminality are specifically set in the legislation on a balance of probabilities, which isn't the normal criminal conviction standard. We have put in hurdles, but the hurdles are not very high. It is a potentially very broad forfeiture power, and ìt could lead, in some circumstances, potentially to excessive forfeiture. If a judge feels that it is excessive, based on the total amount of presumed criminality or apparent criminality, he could restrain that through the discretionary limit on the amount of total forfeiture.

Hon. Roy Cullen: Why couldn't that be left to the accused or the convicted, his or her attorney, to make that case and to limit it?

Mr. Shawn Scromeda: There may be circumstances in which it's difficult to demonstrate the legitimate origin of property that still does have a legitimate origin.

Hon. Roy Cullen: What about that third-party issue you raise? Give me some more information on that and why that might be an issue.

Mr. Shawn Scromeda: That was an issue, I believe, that came up in testimony before the committee. Although we do already have and have incorporated into the reverse onus scheme the right of third parties to make an application, there may be circumstances in which third parties are unable to do that. Given the fact that we've broadened the nature of the forfeiture power here, it was thought, as part of a balancing mechanism to that, including the third-party interest, to expand the ability of a judge, where he sees it's in the interests of justice, to relieve against forfeiture. And one of those, as I say, might be third party, where an unrepresented third-party hasn't made a case, but it's nevertheless clear to the judge that this property is not justified to be taken away. He may, of his own motion, say this is not in the interest of justice.

November 15, 2005 [Senate]
Hon. Pierre Claude Nolin

… In essence, Bill C-53 would apply to any offence that can be prosecuted by indictment, thus the more serious offences. Clause 6 lists those offences, namely any criminal organization offence punishable by five or more years of imprisonment and any offence under section 5, 6 or 7 of the Controlled Drugs and Substances Act or any activities related to such an offence, prosecuted by indictment.

That gives you an idea of the framework to which this rather extraordinary reverse onus of proof measure applies. That is why it applies to the more serious offences.
Clause 6 states the circumstances that could lead to forfeiture and to the reverse onus of proof by which the offender must prove that his property is not proceeds of crime.

A court imposing sentence on an offender convicted — and I must emphasize this small, yet highly important, nuance that it is only when the offender is convicted that the reverse onus of proof can apply — of a designated offence, those I have just mentioned, shall, on application of the Attorney General, order that any property of the offender be forfeited if the court is satisfied, on a balance of probabilities, that within ten years before the proceedings were commenced in respect of the offence for which the offender is being sentenced the offender engaged in a pattern of criminal activity for the purpose of directly or indirectly receiving a material benefit, including a financial benefit; or the income of the offender from sources unrelated to designated offences cannot reasonably account for the value of all the property of the offender.

If the offender shows that his property is not proceeds of crime, the court cannot order the forfeiture.

As you can see, honourable senators, once the offender has been convicted, the onus of proof is transferred, after certain criteria are met, from the Crown to the convicted offender, who now has to prove that the property is not the proceeds of criminal activity.

Allow me to quote a few statistics to convince honourable senators of how much of a problem money laundering is in Canada. The RCMP reports that approximately CAN $17 billion, is laundered in Canada each year. This is not a small-time operation. Bill C-53 is designed to curb — since eliminating it would be impossible — this highly questionable criminal activity.

As I indicated previously, Bill C-53 flows logically from the amendments to the Criminal Code that we passed back in 2001, precisely to improve the conditions surrounding the whole issue of restitution or forfeiture of the proceeds of crime. Needless to say, police associations across the country unanimously support this bill. In fact, they would really have liked us to pass such an amendment back in 2001. Unfortunately, that proved to be impossible. The time has come to act; so, let us act. The police associations agree with us on this issue.

In conclusion, I wish to remind you that, contrary to some Supreme Court rulings that challenged the reverse onus of proof before a conviction, those of you who might be concerned about respecting the Charter in the context of a reverse onus of proof will not find any basis in what the government is proposing, since this reverse onus of proof applies only after an accused has been convicted.

Considering the very large number of rulings that they have made, it is very likely that the courts, which have already found it highly important for Canada to do everything possible to deal with organized crime and the dangerous consequences of criminal activities, will accept this new reverse onus of proof once an accused is convicted.

November 15, 2005 [Senate]
Hon. Larry W. Campbell

… The proceeds of criminal activity allow organized criminals to commit further crime, recruit additional members and facilitate generally the criminal operation of their groups. I think all honourable senators would agree that organized crime demands specific, focused and sustained responses.

Honourable senators, the proposed reforms in Bill C-53 build on the existing forfeiture provisions in the Criminal Code. The current proceeds of crime scheme allows for the forfeiture of proceeds upon application by the Crown after a conviction for an indictable offence under federal law, other than a small number of offences exempted by regulation.

In order to obtain forfeiture, the Crown must show on a balance of probabilities that the property is the proceeds of crime and that the property is connected to the crime for which the person was convicted. The Crown can also obtain forfeiture even if no connection between the particular offence and the property is established, provided the court is nevertheless satisfied beyond a reasonable doubt that the property is proceeds of crime.

The existing proceeds of crime provisions that remain under Bill C-53 will continue to be effective in obtaining forfeiture of proceeds of crime in general circumstances. For example, if a person is convicted of theft and property can be identified as the product of that theft, then the existing proceeds provisions can operate to remove any illicit gain. Even where it may become apparent that identified property is not the product of the particular theft, the existing proceeds provisions can operate, provided proof is provided beyond a reasonable doubt that the property is proceeds of crime.
While these current provisions can be effective, their effectiveness can be limited in comparison with the extensive illicit gains accumulated by organized crime. The existing provisions are most effective with respect to discrete types of criminality, where property is clearly associated with a single offence or small number of offences. That is often not the situation with respect to organized crime.

Further, it must be recognized that obtaining forfeiture of the proceeds of crime can be an especially difficult task for police and Crown prosecutors in situations of sophisticated criminality and active concealment of the criminally derived nature of assets.

Honourable senators, although criminal organizations are believed to be involved in extensive criminality leading to substantial illicit gains, the particular crimes for which convictions are finally obtained against these criminals may not be one with the associated proceeds, or even if they are, the proceeds will represent only a small part of the total proceeds of crime earned and controlled by these organizations. It is for this reason that the reverse onus forfeiture power is being advanced. Bill C-53 contains a fundamental improvement on the current scheme to address this proceeds of crime challenge in relation to organized crime.

Bill C-53 provides an additional forfeiture power — in addition to the existing powers that will remain — that allows for the application of a reverse onus of proof after conviction for a criminal organization offence that is punishable by five or more years of imprisonment or certain drug offences under the Controlled Drugs and Substances Act when prosecuted on indictment.

The definition of a criminal organization offence in the Criminal Code includes the three special criminal organization offences that have been created in the code, namely: participation in the activities of a criminal organization; committing a crime for the benefit of, at the direction of or in association with a criminal organization; and instructing the commission of an offence for a criminal organization. The definition of a criminal organization offence also includes other indictable offences punishable by five or more years when committed for the benefit of, at the direction of or in association with a criminal organization.

These criminal organization offences are crimes that logically can support a presumption that substantial property of the offender is the proceeds of crime. A core aspect of the definition of criminal organization is that it is a group formed for the purpose of committing offences to obtain material benefit. There is, therefore, a logical basis for the underlying presumption inherent in the reversal of the onus.

Honourable senators, as I noted earlier, the one other category of offences to which the reverse onus provisions would apply are the serious drug offences of trafficking, importing and exporting, and the production of illegal drugs, where these offences are prosecuted on indictment. There are probably no offences more closely associated with organized crime than these listed serious drug offences, so it was thought to be in keeping with the purpose of the legislation to include them. Our laws have traditionally taken special measures against such drug offences as they represent matters of recognized societal harm in their own right.

While additional offences are not directly included in the scope of this scheme, it should be recalled that many other offences can be prosecuted as criminal organization offences, provided that it is demonstrated that the offences were committed for the benefit of, at the direction of or in association with a criminal organization, so the scheme can apply more broadly in this manner, provided the link with organized crime is made.

An Act To Amend The Criminal Code (Auto Theft And Trafficking In Property Obtained By Crime) (Bill S-9)

Citation 2010, c. 14, s. 7

Royal Assent November 18, 2010

Hansard

October 5, 2010 [House of Commons]

Mr. Bob Dechert

Mr. Speaker, I am pleased to speak today to Bill S-9, An Act to amend the Criminal Code (auto theft and trafficking in property obtained by crime). This bill targets property crime, in particular auto theft which continues to cause serious harm to Canadian communities. To this end, Bill S-9 would create a new offence of motor vehicle theft, a new offence to address tampering with an automobile's vehicle identification number and new offences to address trafficking in property obtained by crime.

...

Both the VIN tampering offence and the distinct motor vehicle theft offence would offer benefits to the criminal justice system not offered by the current offence used to cover these activities, “possession of property obtained by crime” found in section 354 of the Criminal Code. A conviction for either of these offences would clearly and more accurately document a person's involvement in an organized vehicle theft ring as part of the criminal record. This, in turn, would help police and crown prosecutors to deal appropriately with these people in subsequent investigations and prosecutions. The House will note that the VIN tampering offence contains an express exception in subsection 353.1(3) to ensure that those individuals who must remove or alter a VIN in the course of legitimate auto repairs, maintenance or modification are not captured under the ambit of this offence.

(1610)

A question was raised in the Senate committee on why this express exception is required when subsection 353.1(1) also contains a lawful excuse defence. I will take a moment to explain how the provision works.

...

Bill S-9 also proposes to create offences to address trafficking and property obtained by crime. The proposed trafficking offences are intended to target the entire length of the marketing chain that processes the proceeds of theft and other crimes like fraud. One form of trafficking in property obtained by crime is the movement of stolen automobiles and their parts. This is where organized crime is most involved in auto theft, either through car- theft rings, chop shops, or re-VINing a car for the sophisticated international rings that smuggle stolen luxury cars to foreign locations.

Currently, section 354 of the Criminal Code, the general offence of possession of property obtained by crime, which carries a maximum of 10 years imprisonment for property valued over $5,000, is the principal Criminal Code offence used to address trafficking and property obtained by crime. This possession offence does not adequately capture the full range of activities involved in trafficking.

Both proposed offences have higher penalties than the existing offence of possession of property obtained by crime. If the value of the item trafficked exceeds $5,000, anyone convicted of this offence could face imprisonment for up to 14 years. If the value does not exceed $5,000, it would be a hybrid offence and subject to imprisonment for up to five years on indictment or up to six months on summary conviction.

In the auto theft example, the trafficking offences would capture all of the players in a chop-shop operation, whereas the offence of possession of property obtained by crime would apply only to those in possession of property such as stolen cars or car parts. In order to avoid detection and reduce the probability of multiple counts in the event of an arrest, chop shops have very little inventory at any given time. It is to be noted, however, that the trafficking offences address dealings involving all property obtained by crime, not just the results of auto theft and chop-shop operations.

I am pleased that the trafficking offences also provide the Canada Border Services Agency with the legislative tools necessary to allow them to detain property, including stolen cars about to be exported from Canada, in order to determine whether they are stolen and to allow the relevant police agency to recover them and take the appropriate action. Bill S-9 is a comprehensive piece of legislation that addresses many of the activities that organized crime undertakes in relation to auto theft and other forms of property crime.

October 5, 2010 [House of Commons]

Mr. Thierry St-Cyr (Jeanne-Le Ber, BQ)

Mr. Speaker, I listened to my colleague's speech. Personally, I am quite worried by the Conservatives' approach to crime. The bill before us today deals with the issue of serious and violent crime. Yet at the same time, the government is doing everything in its power to abolish the gun registry, which the police want to have at their disposal because it helps them in their work. This morning we spoke about another bill concerning justice and white-collar crime. This government, just like the Liberal government before it, is refusing to address the issue of tax havens. Even if white-collar criminals are put in prison for a while, if they can hide their money in tax havens around the world and spend the rest of their days living off the proceeds of their crime, it is not much of a deterrent.

Does my colleague have the same worries about the Conservative government's doublespeak and hypocrisy when it comes to justice issues? They play the tough guy and boast that they are tough on crime. But when it comes time to take real measures, and not just change the length of a prison sentence in a bill—and you have to wonder if criminals often read the Criminal Code—that is another story. They need to do more than just grandstand. We need real, meaningful measures to fight crime and, in terms of prevention, measures for gun control and control of tax havens. Is that not doublespeak right there? The government has done nothing in terms of prevention, but it has been very big on repression.

October 5, 2010 [House of Commons]

Mr. Brian Murphy (Moncton—Riverview—Dieppe, Lib.)

...

Perhaps what is most modern about the bill is the respect that it gives to vehicle identification numbers.
[Translation]

We believe it is useful to add measures concerning vehicle identification numbers and we would like to discuss this measure in committee. That is the kind of innovative measure that could help combat the problem of auto theft in Canada.
[English]

The obliteration of VIN numbers is a low-risk, high-profit tactic of organized criminal gangs. This provision should help crack down on organized criminal activity, a main source of auto theft in Canada. By denying criminal gangs access to a primary source of funding, the currency of gangs, we can inhibit them from developing their activities elsewhere. The possession of property: to be in possession of a stolen car:

[Translation]

The provision concerning the possession of stolen vehicles is interesting and also merits discussion. That is another measure that could prove to be a useful tool for police forces. We need to be innovative in order to combat criminals who steal vehicles, who themselves are becoming increasingly sophisticated.

October 5, 2010 [House of Commons]

Mr. Marc Lemay (Abitibi—Témiscamingue, BQ)

We need to take action quickly. These vehicles are generally stripped for parts, and are rarely exported. They are exported, but not much. This is where organized crime comes in. These individuals place orders for certain types of motor vehicles, which are then stripped for parts. The thief is one thing. Yes, he is a criminal, but the ones who place the orders are the worst ones. These types of orders are generally made through organized crime groups. So we must find a way to punish them.

The question was put to Criminal Intelligence Service Canada, and this was its reply:

The Insurance Crime Prevention Bureau has identified an increase in four main fraud techniques that are used by organized crime to steal vehicles. These include: the illegal transfer of Vehicle Identification Numbers (VINs) from wrecked vehicles to similar ones that have been stolen; a legitimate VIN is used to change the legal identity of a stolen vehicle of the same make, model, and colour, a process called “twinning”.

Let us consider the example just given. The VIN from a wrecked Honda Civic 1998 can be used for a stolen Honda Civic 1999. This is where we are being asked to take action.

October 25, 2010 [House of Commons]

Hon. Marlene Jennings (Notre-Dame-de-Grâce—Lachine, Lib.)

Thus, with Bill C-26, the government created a separate offence for theft of a motor vehicle, and this offence is also included in Bill S-9. The mandatory minimum sentence for this offence is six months' incarceration for a third offence or in the case of an indictable offence.

This is important because all studies show that motor vehicle theft in certain cities is quite well organized. The evidence from various police forces, including municipal and provincial forces and our national police force, the RCMP, has clearly indicated that to be the case. When someone is on their third such offence, it becomes quite serious. The criminal justice system must therefore send a clear message that this kind of criminal behaviour is unacceptable.

The new offences provide for a broad definition of trafficking. This would cover selling, giving, transferring, transporting, importing, exporting, sending or delivering property obtained by crime or offering to do any of those things.

Thus, the new legislative provisions would target all the middlemen involved in moving stolen property, from the initial criminal act through to the ultimate consumer. That is very important. Of course it happens in other cities, but we know that in Montreal and Winnipeg in particular, most motor vehicle thefts are committed by organized crime groups. This means there is a network of individuals whose only goal and mission is to steal cars. The orders often come from outside Canada, with requests for x number of certain models, for instance, Lexus vehicles from a given year, Chevrolets from a given year, specific models and colours of BMWs from another year, and so on. The crime of motor vehicle theft is driven by the network.

May 6, 2010 [Senate]
Sponsor Hon. John D. Wallace

As I previously mentioned, Bill S-9 has three main components: the creation of a distinct offence of "theft of a motor vehicle"; second, a new offence for altering, obliterating or removing a Vehicle Identification Number, or its VIN; and third, new offences for trafficking in, and possessing for the purpose of trafficking, property obtained by crime, including the importing or exporting of such goods.
...
Why is it that this distinct offence of theft of a motor vehicle is necessary? Property crime, and in particular auto theft, remains an issue of paramount importance for most Canadians. Yes, there has been a downward trend in auto theft rates, thanks mostly to the innovative policing policies and technological advances, but despite that, it still remains one of the highest-volume offences in Canada, averaging about 400 auto thefts per day. Yes, that is correct — 400 auto thefts each day. The goal of this bill is to assist the police in reducing these auto theft rates even further, so that when police apprehend these criminals, the repeat offenders will be incarcerated and removed from the streets.

Auto thefts hit Canadians in their pocketbooks. I know that we have cited the dollar value provided by the Insurance Bureau of Canada many times before, but it is extremely important that it not be forgotten; namely, that the total cost of auto theft to Canadians is approximately $1.2 billion each year. Without a doubt, these substantial costs are ultimately borne by taxpayers, the insurance industry, policyholders, governments and victims.

Auto thefts are often committed as random acts by individual criminals, but increasingly, organized crime is becoming more and more deeply entrenched into the auto theft industry. It is estimated that roughly 20 per cent of all stolen vehicles are linked to organized crime activity. The financial motivation to commit auto theft is high, and indeed the profits made from the theft of motor vehicles form a very substantial source of income for organized crime.

As stated before, organized crime groups participate in the trafficking of stolen vehicles in at least three ways. First, organized crime is involved in the process of altering the legal identity of a vehicle by changing its VIN. Second, they operate "chop shops," where stolen vehicles are disassembled and their parts are trafficked, often to unsuspecting customers. Third, high- end, late model luxury sedans and sports utility vehicles are exported from Canadian ports to foreign locations in Africa, the Middle East and Eastern Europe. Bill S-9 creates new tools that will address each of these unlawful activities.

This first form of criminal involvement — VIN tampering — is a process that involves stripping the vehicle of all existing labels, plates and other markings that bear the true Vehicle Identification Number, and then manufacturing replacement labels, plates and other markings bearing a false VIN that was obtained from imported or salvaged vehicles.

There is currently no offence in the Criminal Code that directly prohibits tampering with a VIN. Like trafficking, the current Criminal Code provision that is used to address VIN-tampering is the general offence of "possession of property obtained by crime" that is found in section 354 of the Criminal Code.
This will be an additional offence, so that a person could be charged with both "possession of property obtained by crime" under section 354 of the Code, as well as the proposed VIN-tampering offence, which in combination could result in a longer sentence.
...
An advantage that both the new VIN-tampering offence and the new distinct motor vehicle theft offence would have over the current offence used to cover these activities — namely, possession of property obtained by crime under section 354 of the Code — is that a conviction for these new offences will more clearly and accurately document, as part of their criminal record, a person's involvement in an organized vehicle theft ring. This will most definitely assist police and Crown prosecutors in dealing more appropriately with those particular offenders in any subsequent investigations and prosecutions.

Finally, Bill S-9 will also create new offences that target the trafficking in property obtained by crime, or the possession of such property for the purpose of trafficking. These amendments are extremely significant, and while my comments to this point have focused on auto theft, I want to be clear that the proposed trafficking offences are intended to target more broadly the entire criminal marketing chain that processes the proceeds of theft and other property crimes, including, for example, fraud.

These new offences will, however, also directly address the present auto theft problem. The trafficking in property obtained by crime includes the movement of stolen automobiles and their parts. This is where organized crime is most involved in auto theft, either through car theft rings, "chop shops" that dismantle stolen cars for parts, the act of "re-VINning" a vehicle to hide its identity, or the sophisticated international rings that smuggle stolen high-end luxury vehicles from Canada.

The new trafficking offence broadly defines trafficking to include the selling, giving, transferring, transporting, exporting from Canada, importing into Canada, sending, delivering or dealing with in any other way, as well as offering to do any of the above, in respect of property obtained by crime. This definition addresses the myriad ways in which criminal enterprises seek to get their ill-gotten gains to the eventual market. Bill S-9 also creates an offence of possession of property obtained by crime for the purpose of trafficking in order to capture this unlawful activity even at its initial stage, where the goods have not yet started to move through the illegal marketing chain.

Some might question why these new offences are necessary when the Criminal Code already prohibits the possession of property obtained by crime. Currently, section 354 of the Criminal Code — that is, the general offence of "possession of property obtained by crime" — which carries a maximum of 10 years' imprisonment for property valued over $5,000, is the principal Criminal Code offence that is now used to address trafficking in property obtained by crime. This possession offence does not, however, adequately capture the full range of activities that are involved in trafficking. The trafficking of property obtained by crime is an enterprise crime, and it is what motivates property crime more generally. With these new offences, Bill S-9 will be targeting all of the activities that are undertaken by criminal enterprise, and thereby making it considerably more difficult for organized crime, or individuals, to engage in these types of illegal behaviour.

The proposed new trafficking offences will capture all of the players who are involved in a trafficking operation, such as a chop shop, whereas the existing "possession of property obtained by crime" offence applies only to those who are actually in possession of the property, such as the stolen vehicles. By their very nature, operations such as chop shops have very little inventory at any given time in order to avoid detection and reduce the probability of multiple counts in the event of an arrest. These new offences go to the heart of what motivates property crime generally, and are specifically intended to address the entire chain of criminal acts that together yield the financial benefits that ultimately make property crime so lucrative.

Another extremely important point is that both of the proposed new trafficking offences will also have higher penalties than the existing offence of possession of property obtained by crime since trafficking is considered to be a more serious matter than simple possession. ... Honourable senators, it is also important to note that these new trafficking offences will make available to Canada Border Services Agency the necessary authority to allow them to detain property, including stolen cars that are about to be exported from Canada, in order to determine if they are stolen and to allow the appropriate police agency to recover them.

May 26, 2010 [Senate]

Hon. Larry W. Campbell

Honourable senators, I am pleased to speak to you today as the critic on Bill S-9, An Act to amend the Criminal Code (auto theft and trafficking in property obtained by crime). Bill S-9 replicates Bill C-26 as it was passed by the House of Commons in the previous session. As honourable senators will recall, Bill C-26 was being reviewed by the Senate in the last session when Parliament prorogued.

I would refer honourable senators to the speech I made on Bill C-26 on October 29, 2009, as my feelings on this legislation have not changed. However, I will briefly address the main legislative changes that the bill proposes. This bill deals with trafficking, importation and exportation of property obtained by crime, but its main purpose is to target auto theft. This bill establishes the distinct offence of theft of a motor vehicle. It creates a new offence for altering or removing a VIN — the vehicle identification number — and creates new offences for trafficking in and possessing for the purpose of trafficking property obtained by crime.
This bill will give law enforcement agencies more ability to target organized crime groups, specifically those who have profited greatly from auto theft crime in the past.

We are all aware that auto theft in Canada is a serious problem. Motor vehicle theft is estimated to cost Canadian taxpayers in excess of $1.2 billion a year, and the dangers involved put their safety at risk. Nonetheless, auto crime has declined substantially in recent years. This is due in large part to the hard work and dedication of Canadian police forces. Our law enforcement agencies have been able to evolve and adapt to changes in criminal activity, and so should our legislation.

I support this bill. It is another good step in the ongoing fight against auto theft in Canada. However, there are some issues I would like to see raised in committee when this bill is studied. Some of the statistics that have been used in the study and discussion of this legislation are not as up to date as they can or should be. We cannot expect our justice system to effectively battle vehicle theft if our legislation is based on old data.
I would also like to see some more concrete evidence to support the implementation of minimum sentencing for third-strike vehicle theft offences. Honourable senators, the changes proposed by Bill S-9 are an important step towards reducing auto theft in Canada. This bill should be sent to committee to be studied without delay.

May 26, 2010 [Senate Committee][Entire Exchange]

Hon. Robert Nicholson, P.C., M.P., Minister of Justice and Attorney General of Canada:
With this legislation, the government will update the Criminal Code to address the problems created by complex auto theft rings and other forms of property crime undertaken by organized criminals in Canada today. The bill proposes to create a separate offence of theft of a motor vehicle, which would carry a mandatory prison sentence of six months for conviction of a third or subsequent offence when it is prosecuted by indictment. It will establish a new offence of altering, destroying or removing a vehicle identification number, VIN, and it will make it an offence to traffic in property obtained by crime and make the possession of such property for the purpose of trafficking an offence.

This bill is part of our government's efforts to crack down on those criminals who choose to participate in auto theft and in other aspects of serious property crime. It is painfully clear that organized crime is significantly involved with auto theft in this country.

In recent years, our auto theft rates have remained at unacceptably high levels, while the number of recovered stolen vehicles has declined. This indicates an increased involvement of organized crime in auto theft. Law enforcement experts tell us that when a car is not recovered, organized auto theft rings have likely exported it to a foreign country. It used to be that over 90 per cent of stolen cars were recovered. Today that has fallen to 70 per cent, nationwide, with recovery rates varying by cities.

In large cities in Ontario, Quebec, and Nova Scotia, organized crime groups are believed to be more active in thefts, thanks in part to readily accessible ports, which allow cars to be shipped out of the country quickly and with relative ease. Out of the approximately 147,000 automobiles stolen every year, police and insurance experts estimate that about 20,000 of these cars are shipped abroad.

To this end, the creation of a distinct offence of motor vehicle theft sends a strong message to potential thieves that the criminal justice system is serious about fighting theft in Canada. The government's proposed offence would be a hybrid offence with a maximum of 10 years imprisonment on indictment and 18 years imprisonment on summary conviction.

A distinct offence of motor vehicle theft will help give the courts a better idea of the background of the offender for bail hearings and sentencing purposes. Indeed, this reasoning holds true for the proposed VIN, vehicle identification number, tampering offence that I will discuss in a moment.

Conviction for either of these offences would more clearly and accurately document a person's involvement in an organized vehicle theft ring as part their criminal record. This in turn would help the police and Crown prosecutors to deal appropriately with those people in subsequent investigations and prosecutions.

The theft of a motor vehicle for profit usually involves an elaborate cycle of theft, disguising the vehicle, and resale or export. One of the ways in which vehicles are disguised and resold is through the tampering of the vehicle identification number, the VIN. There is currently no offence in the Criminal Code directly prohibiting the alteration, obliteration or removal of a VIN. Currently under the Criminal Code, those who tamper with VINs are often charged under section 354, the offence of ``possession of property obtained by crime.'' This offence includes a provision stating that proof of possession of a vehicle with a removed or obliterated VIN is, in the absence of evidence to the contrary, proof that the vehicle was obtained by crime.

Organized crime is also involved in auto theft and property theft in general, through the trafficking of property obtained by crime in chop shops or other theft rings that deal with a wide variety of stolen property.

The proposed trafficking offences in Bill S-9 would begin to address these problems. Trafficking in property obtained by crime, along with other criminal activity such as drug trafficking, prostitution and fraud, is one of the many activities that makes organized crime profitable in this country. The bill would make it a crime to traffic in, or possess for the purpose of, trafficking property obtained by crime, including importing or exporting.

Currently, section 354 of the Criminal Code, the general offence of possession of property obtained by crime, which carries a maximum of 10 years for property valued over $5,000, is the principal Criminal Code offence that is used to address trafficking in property obtained by crime. However, this possession offence does not adequately capture the full range of activities involved in trafficking.

The proposed offences would provide a wide definition of trafficking that would include the selling, giving, transferring, transporting, importing, exporting, sending or delivering of goods or offering to do any of the above, of property obtained by crime. This new law would target all the middlemen who move stolen property, from the initial criminal act through to the consumer.

Both proposed trafficking offences have higher penalties than the existing offence of possession of property obtained by crime. If the value of the item trafficked exceeds $5,000, anyone convicted of this offence could face up to 14 years in prison. If the value does not exceed $5,000, it would be a hybrid offence and subject to imprisonment up to five years on indictment or six years on summary conviction. This penalty would be consistent with the existing penalty scheme already in the Criminal Code.

It is also worth noting that if any indictable offence is found to have been committed for the benefit or at the direction of or in association with a criminal organization, an additional offence would apply. It would be open to the Crown to prove the additional element of a link to organized crime and obtain a separate conviction under section 467.12 of the Criminal Code. The maximum penalty for this offence is 14 years, which, as you I am sure are aware, must be served consecutively to any other offence for crime.

The proposed trafficking offences would also respond to the concerns of stakeholders such as the Insurance Bureau of Canada that has long advocated for stronger enforcement to prevent the export of stolen vehicles. Under the Customs Act, in order for the Canada Border Services Agency to apply the administrative powers of the Customs Act to the cross-border movement of property obtained by crime, such goods must first be expressly classified somewhere in federal law as prohibited goods for the purpose of importation or exportation. This bill would supply that classification provision.

Today, Canada Border Services Agency officers are only authorized to examine and detain goods entering or exiting Canada in order to determine whether or not the importation or exportation complies with federal legislation controlling the movement of goods across our borders.

The mandate of the CBSA does not include a broad law enforcement role, and its officers therefore have limited authority to deal with the movement of stolen property. The express prohibition provision in this bill would allow CBSA officers to examine and detain stolen goods, which could ultimately result in the police laying criminal charges. With this proposed amendment, the CBSA officers could identify targets, conduct examinations and detain these goods. They would then search law enforcement databases to determine whether the goods had been reported stolen, and refer the case to the police in appropriate cases.

Depending on where I am in the country, I hear about organized crime chop shops and export schemes that move automobiles and automobile parts out of this country. I hear about the deficiencies in the current law. Law enforcement officials wonder how many people possess the stolen goods. They talk about the chop shops and remark that they may arrest the people at the chop shop but miss many others involved in the crime.

Senator Wallace: As you point out, minister, with this and other bills initiated through your department, there seems to be a focus on organized crime. There are serious issues in the country and we have to adjust the Criminal Code and other laws to adapt to those issues.

I wonder if there is anything more you would like to add in relation to the impact you see this bill having on organized crime. I have recently heard that, on average, 400 auto thefts occur in this country each day. Obviously, many of those thefts relate to criminal organizations. Therefore, I wonder about the impact you hope this bill would have on criminal activity.

Mr. Nicholson: That is part of that message. The face of crime in this country has changed over the last 20 or 30 years. The operations law enforcement agencies are going up against are becoming more sophisticated. I hear this all the time. Crime is becoming borderless, and this is why you have the provisions with respect to Canada Border Services Agency.

It is not just a question of someone stealing a car and trying to sell it to someone in the next town. I pointed out that 20 per cent of these cars are being shipped out of the country; they are gone. This is why they cannot be located.

They all tell me the same thing. They say that even though crime is becoming more sophisticated, the Criminal Code has not been updated in over 100 years. You have to update the laws to respond to the current challenges. That is what they were telling me. If you have any witnesses from the law enforcement side, I am sure they will confirm what I am telling you.

Senator Angus: In your opening remarks, you said the reason behind this legislation is to stop or minimize the theft of vehicles because the laws are not tough enough. Is the prime reason for the great volume of auto thefts the weakness of the present legal regime, or are there other more sinister reasons?

Mr. Nicholson: I think it is a little more complicated than that, senator. Two types of activity are going on in this country, and this bill addresses both of them. On one occasion, we wanted to address one part of it, and then I asked why we are not doing the other, so now we have everything.

We are talking about two types of crime. One is the organized crime that steals a car for the purposes of chop shops, exporting the car or parts, or somehow recycling the stolen car. That is part of it. I have heard loud and clear from law enforcement agencies in a number of major Canadian cities that this is a big problem. As well, I hear from other individuals that there are people who are unsophisticated, not part of organized crime necessarily, that will steal the car and abandon it, steal the car again, that sort of thing. The bill addresses both aspects of that crime.

We have talked at some length about the organized crime part of it, but, again, making it a separate offence allows the Crown attorney to know what they are talking about. I have had Crown attorneys tell me they are not sure what the individual has been found guilty of, and guess what? It is actually more dangerous to steal a car than many times stealing other types of property in this country. Why? Because many times, you are putting people at danger. People get killed when people drive recklessly or are trying to escape detection. Having this as a separate offence allows everyone to know what he or she is dealing with. If this individual has taken the wrong path into the career of serial car thief, the Crown and everyone should know about that involvement.

Senator Lang: I would like you to elaborate on the fact that 90 per cent of the vehicles were recovered a number of years ago and now we are down to 70 per cent, which is significantly different from the point of view of numbers being recovered. We are at 20,000 vehicles being exported from this country at present, in part because of the laws that are in place.

Have the law enforcement agencies that you have spoken to, and the provincial authorities, given any indication to you that with the passage of this bill — and maybe even a tougher bill once Senator Baker gets finished with it — that they will be able to negate the 20,000 vehicles shipped out of this country? Will passage of this bill put a number of the crime rings out of business?

Mr. Nicholson: In my opening comments, I touched on the increased sophistication in this business and that it knows no borders. I commented that there are large-scale operations and the present provisions in the Criminal Code are not adequate to stop these operations. One provision that is very well received concerns the changes with respect to the duties and the ability of agents of the Canada Border Services Agency to intercept property that is being shipped in and out of this country. Senator Angus mentioned containerization. I have heard it again and again that the present laws are inadequate in giving the borders services agencies the ability to look and find out what is going on in relation to what is coming in and going out of the borders of this country. A car in and of itself is not a prohibited good. It is not like an illegal drug or an illegal gun. The laws have to be changed; they have to be updated. I have said to those who work with me putting this together that it is one of my favourite parts of this proposed legislation. I am very interested in the new provisions of the Criminal Code and I am pleased to have this bill. Changing the provisions with respect to Canada Border Services agents — and my colleague the Minister of Public Safety has direct responsibility — is one of my favourite parts of this bill because I have heard it again and again that these cars are being shipped out of this country and the present laws are completely inadequate to deal with this activity.

Caroline Xavier, Director General, Corporate Secretariat Directorate, Canada Border Services Agency: Bill S-9 creates specific offences: the offence of auto theft; the offence of tampering with a vehicle identification number, a VIN; and the offences of trafficking in property obtained by crime and possession of property obtained by crime for the purpose of trafficking. This bill will have a direct and positive impact on the CBSA in that it expressly prohibits the importation and exportation of property obtained by crime.

Senator Joyal: What authority do you have when you suspect that goods going through the border are the proceeds of some criminal activity?

On what basis can you intercept goods you suspect are the proceeds of criminal activity?

Ms. Xavier: There is an export program that exists and it is a part of the agency's mandate. Under the current program, the person must go to the agency or the exit point before going, for instance, to the United States or to the maritime port in order to declare the goods to be exported and the specific information concerning those goods. That will not change.

In the Customs Act now, we have those authorities for our strategic export control. We have a strategic export control program as part of our current Customs Act authorities.

The reporting element required for a consumer or traveller right now will still continue to exist. These authorities will allow us to be able to look at the documentation we are receiving in advance, perhaps, and take more of an investigative lens or an intelligence-type lens to them. We will look at where these goods are destined and be able to work with our police authorities and RCMP partners to determine whether there could be an infraction or a prohibited good.

Right now, if a good is prohibited, such as a stolen vehicle, for example, we cannot detain it. We can only call the local police authority.

Richard Dubin, Vice-President, Investigative Services, Insurance Bureau of Canada: With organized crime so pervasive in the business of auto theft and with the profits so high, it is not surprising that intelligence authorities suspect that terrorist groups may be financing themselves with auto theft. A July 16, 2007, article in The Boston Globe cited the FBI's belief that dozens of vehicles stolen from the United States have been used as car bombs in Iraq. The Insurance Bureau of Canada is aware of approximately 200 stolen vehicles that were shipped to the Middle East as part of Project Globe and another investigation where stolen vehicles were sent to Lebanon.

Senator Wallace: You may know one of the aims of the bill is to deal with the importation and exportation of stolen automobiles. We understand that a significant part of that criminal business, if not all of it, is linked to criminal organizations.
In that context, does your department have any statistics or information you can give us at all about the extent of that illegal trade across the border, not only of automobiles but also of automobile parts that result from chop shop operations?
Mia Dauvergne, Senior Analyst, Policing Services Program, Canadian Centre for Justice Statistics, Statistics Canada: We do not have information specifically on the involvement of organized crime in motor vehicle theft. As Ms. McAuley explained earlier, we can use vehicle recovery status as the proxy measure. Beyond that, we do not have anything at this time.

Ms. Megan Walke (London Abused Women's Shelter)

London [Ontario], as Peter will attest, is a hub of trafficking activity. Girls and women are recruited both from and to London. The lead with our London Police Service human trafficking unit recently said that trafficking is an epidemic in society.

The trafficking unit provided service to many girls between the ages of 11 and 17. These girls and women are trafficked by their boyfriends, family members, and organized crime. By organized crime, we often think of bikers or the Mafia, but I'm talking about small gangs that exist in communities across the country.

We need to recognize that there is a relationship between organized crime, male violence against women in intimate relationships, and trafficking. As has been stated already, trafficking of women and girls is highly profitable, unlike trafficking of weapons or drugs, where the trafficker has to continue to spend more money to get more supplies. Traffickers can make money off of the same woman over and over again.

Many women we work with have been forced by their pimps to bring home every day between $1,500 and $2,000. This means that they are providing sexual services and fulfilling the porn-fuelled fantasies of anywhere between 15 and 20 men per day.

We ask that you please try to understand and acknowledge that there is a relationship between prostitution and trafficking and that prostitution is inherently harmful, violent, and dehumanizing. Prostitution fuels trafficking.

Hon. Kim Pate

… Third, and finally, Bill C-75 will bring into force Criminal Code provisions passed as part of former Bill C-452 and relating to the prosecution of exploitation and human trafficking.

Honourable colleagues, I believe we all agree on the need for urgent action to end the exploitation of women and girls. Findings of the UN special rapporteur on violence against women, the house Justice Committee's report on human trafficking, and the Thunder Bay Police Services Board Investigation, as well as testimony at the Inquiry into Missing and Murdered Indigenous Women and Girls have all emphasized that Indigenous women and girls are particularly at risk and they unequivocally link this reality to Canada's colonial legacy of discrimination against Indigenous peoples and the failure to ensure the safety and to uphold the rights of Indigenous women and girls.

Criminal law responses to exploitation and trafficking too often risk missing the mark, however. Fundamentally they fail to address underlying social and economic inequalities that too often result in women and girls being exploited. Even within the criminal justice system, however, law enforcement activities have been criticized for failing to hold accountable those who are profiting from exploitation at the highest level. If they are to live up to their laudable purpose, Bill C-75's provisions on trafficking must go beyond the current processes that too often focus on arresting exploited women and those involved in trafficking schemes at the lowest levels.

Bill C-75's first measure is a presumption of exploitation wherever a person who is not exploited lives with or is habitually in the company of a person who is exploited. This provision aims to facilitate proof of exploitation, in particular given the power imbalances faced by exploited and marginalized women that prevent far too many from reporting their exploiters, let alone providing witness testimony. Yet as the Canadian Centre to End Human Trafficking has noted, those most frequently arrested on the scene of illicit businesses and in the immediate presence of exploited women are often exploited women themselves and low-level managers, some of whom were also formerly exploited women. They are not leaders of trafficking organizations and most certainly not those who are profiting most from them at the highest levels.

The second key provision imposes a reverse onus on those convicted of exploitation, intended to facilitate forfeiture of proceeds of crime. Again, this is a provision whose effectiveness relies on the ability to hold those profiting at the greatest levels accountable. Those who seek to profit from exploitation too often see it as a "low-risk, high-profit" enterprise because of the reusable nature of human beings, as compared, say, to trafficking in drugs or firearms, and the anonymity that corporate law affords to those who wish to use lawful corporate structures to carry out human trafficking. I trust these provisions will be considered in depth at committee so as to ensure they meet the objective of holding accountable those who choose to establish and profit from illicit businesses that perpetuate the exploitation of women and girls.

Hon. Pierre-Hugues Boisvenu

…Fifth, Bill C-75 would reclassify more than 150 criminal offences. More specifically, more than 110 indictable offences will be hybridized. Some of the indictable offences that would become hybrid offences include defrauding the government, breach of trust and conspiracy.

By reducing the penalties for fraud and other white collar crimes, this bill would discourage the whistle-blowers from denouncing fraud. Take, for example, those who courageously denounced crimes in Quebec's construction industry. I remind senators of the infamous Michael Applebaum, the former mayor of Montreal found guilty of eight charges, including fraud against the government and breach of trust. Bill C-75 will make it possible for white collar criminals to get reduced penalties through summary trials and sentences of two years less a day.

Why reduce sentences for criminals like Michael Applebaum who steal from taxpayers and undermine the credibility of our institutions? There was also the notorious Bernard Trépanier, whom you probably know as "Mr. Three Per Cent." He was to be tried in two criminal cases related to the Quebec construction industry, one for his alleged involvement in the Faubourg Contrecœur scandal and the other for charges of fraud and corruption involving a municipal contracts kickback scheme.

April 08, 2019 [Senate Committee][Entire Exchange]
Arnold Viersen, Member of Parliament, Co-Chair, All-Party Parliamentary Group to End Modern Slavery and Human Trafficking: Bill C-75 would also finally bring into force the former Bill C-452, which was proposed by former NDP Member of Parliament Maria

Mourani. This bill contained three important tools to fight human trafficking: A reverse burden of proof in cases of human trafficking, the ability for courts to seize the proceeds of crime for human trafficking offences and consecutive sentencing for human trafficking offences.
Mr. Viersen: I did come prepared with a few quotes from some of the police officers I've spoken with and have worked with. There's Detective Sergeant Dominic Monchamp from Montreal's human trafficking unit. He says that having consecutive sentencing, certainly acts as a deterrent:

> I think that this message will restore the balance. Handing down consecutive sentences will restore the balance. These individuals are going to have to think before they act. They will no longer see this type of crime as being worthwhile. That is how they currently see it.

Gordon Perrier from the major crime division in Winnipeg said:

> The amendments in Bill C-452 will enhance our ability to remove the profit from exploitation of this crime. I know from my own experience as an organized crime investigator, that forfeiture and consecutive sentences work. Deterrence and breaking the cycle of profitability can change behaviour and prevent others from entering that offending cycle of behaviour, greed, and disrespect for others.

Hon. Bill Morneau (Minister of Finance): ...Another way we're helping to protect Canadians is by combatting financial crime. I know this committee has done a lot of work in this regard and I know that you've looked at how we can best do that, and I'd like to thank the committee for that work. With this legislation, we know we can help improve Canada's anti-money laundering and anti-terrorist financing framework, strengthening the resources, intelligence and information sharing needed to identify and meet evolving threats, while also continuing to protect the privacy rights of Canadians and manage the regulatory burden on the private sector.

Mr. Pierre-Luc Dusseault: I will be brief. Last year, Canadians made investments of $353 billion in the 12 most notorious tax havens. As Minister of Finance, you have a similar budget, that is to say approximately $350 billion for the federal state. What is your reaction to that figure?

Hon. Bill Morneau: I don't know if those figures are accurate.

Mr. Pierre-Luc Dusseault: Those figures on direct foreign investment came from Statistics Canada.

Hon. Bill Morneau: I'm going to ask Mr. Marsland to answer that question. What I can tell you, however, is that we introduced several measures in the budget to ensure that we have a system that will protect our economy and allow us to fight money laundering and the funding of terrorist activities. In our opinion, this is very important for our economy. Over the past few years, we have done several things to improve the system, notably as concerns effective ownership, so as to know who the real beneficiaries are in organizations. Mr. Marsland, what do you think of those figures?

Mr. Andrew Marsland: I'm sorry. I'm not familiar with the actual numbers you're quoting, so I can't comment on them.

May 02, 2019 [Standing Committee on National Finance][Entire Exchange]

Mr. Mark Schaan (Director General, Marketplace Framework Policy Branch, Innovation, Science and Economic Development Canada): Thank you, Mr. Chair. [English] Today the changes we're discussing are related to the Canada Business Corporations Act. They follow on from changes that were part of budget 2018, related to beneficial ownership transparency. In budget 2018, we introduced changes to the Canada Business Corporations Act to require corporations to hold information related to beneficial ownership and those who exercised significant control over privately held corporations registered under the Canada Business Corporations Act.

That was part of a broad federal-provincial-territorial agreement that was reached by ministers of finance in 2017 as a commitment from all jurisdictions to be able to proceed with the same agreement arrangements within their own corporate statutes. The change we're introducing here is a further clarification of the rules we set out in those amendments, which is related to who can access that initial information.

In particular, the changes specify that an investigative body would be able to access these records upon request. Notably, those investigative bodies in question are police tax authorities and any investigative body added by regulations, so we've left ourselves some flexibility in the future.

The investigative body can make a request if it has reasonable grounds to suspect that the information would be relevant to an investigation of one of the offences set out in the schedule and at least one of the requested corporation itself, a CBCA corporation sharing, an investor of significant control with the requested corporation, or another entity over which one of the requested corporation's investors of significant control has investor of significant control-like control.

It establishes penalties for non-compliance and it also sets out some safeguards for the usage and request of that register of significant control, notably that an investigative body must file an annual report to the director of Corporations Canada on aggregate use of the request power. It also sets out that investigative bodies must keep records when they use the request power.

The Chair: It's open to discussion. The finance committee did a study on the money laundering and terrorism financing act. Mr. Fergus.

[Translation]

Mr. Greg Fergus: That's why I'm asking the following question. Mr. Schaan, is the $5,000 fine enough to encourage private companies to keep their information up to date?

Mr. Mark Schaan: Thank you for the question. There are two aspects of the penalties set out in the bill. First, the $5,000 fine is only for administrative errors made by a company that doesn't comply with the details described in the bill. Moreover, the bill includes an additional fine of $200,000 and a prison term of up to six months for non-compliance with the provisions of the bill.

It's a distinction between the two types of penalties. There are administrative penalties for an organization that simply makes an administrative error in their registry of beneficial owners or for failure to do so in an administrative manner. Then the second type of penalty is for a clear contravention of the spirit of the law, which is when you knew of information related to a beneficial owner that you failed to include. That can be up to $200,000 and up to six months in prison.

We do think that balance is right in terms of administrative burden for the vast majority of these private corporations that are small and medium-sized enterprises, but there's also the significance of a significant fine and prison time for those who are bad actors using corporate shells.

Mr. Greg Fergus: For those bad actors—and thank you for making that distinction—is it up to $200,000 and up to six months in prison per error, or is it in general for being a bad actor?
If someone is purposely trying to falsify information, if they're laundering money and the extent of that.... Is that a maximum or is there some discretion involved there for the prosectors?

Mr. Mark Schaan: The courts and the Public Prosecution Service would be those who would interpret the penalty scheme, but it's essentially for intentional non-compliance. If they were able to articulate before the courts that they felt that there were multiple counts of intentional non-compliance, for each entry or other factors, the courts may be in a position to adjudicate that there's warrant for multiple penalties of a similar offence.

Mr. Greg Fergus: Thank you.

The Chair: Mr. Dusseault.

[Translation]

Mr. Pierre-Luc Dusseault: Thank you, Mr. Chair. Thank you for following up on the report of the Standing Committee on Finance on this subject. Although this falls short of the committee's expectations, it's still a step in the right direction. My first question concerns the registry maintained by investigative bodies. It isn't specified how long the investigative bodies must maintain the registry of requests, which records all the details of each request and the follow-ups. First, what's the purpose of this measure?

Mr. Mark Schaan: Investigative bodies must prepare a report each year. The first bill, the 2018 budget bill, stated that the registry spoke for companies. It's necessary to maintain an annual registry containing all the changes made. [English] On a going forward basis, corporations will have to maintain their registry of significant control, including any changes that are brought to their attention.

In terms of the investigative bodies, they'll have to file annually as to the number of records they've requested. In terms of how long they would keep them for, that would be subject to the particular laws that they're subject to on information management.
[Translation]

In this context, if an investigation continues, it's necessary for investigative bodies to maintain these documents.

Mr. Pierre-Luc Dusseault: You referred to the significant participation in the company. I think that we're talking about 20% or 25% in this case. Is that correct? Why did you choose this figure for the significant participation? It seems fairly high. People who may have bad intentions could quite easily bypass this 25% rule.

Mr. Mark Schaan: Thank you for the question. Your question has two important points. First, the definition of control rating has two aspects. The first aspect is the percentage of shares that a person holds and that give the person control, which is 25%. The bill also includes a definition of a person who controls a company with less than 25%.

We think we've captured that because we have both aspects. There's also an important linkage to other aspects of our total approach to money laundering, terrorist financing and proceeds of crime, in that enterprises already, under FINTRAC regulations, when they utilize a Canadian financial institution, are required to deposit with their financial institution any beneficial ownership information related to the exact-same percentage. We see this as boots and suspenders in that it also provides ease for the corporation in that the same requirements they're subject to for banking purposes are the same requirements they're subject to for corporations. We think that parallel actually builds a strong system

Mr. Pierre-Luc Dusseault: I have a question about the registry, and not necessarily the registry maintained by the investigative bodies. Is the ultimate purpose of this measure to create a central registry of beneficial ownership of companies registered at the federal, provincial and territorial levels? Will there be a central registry of all this information? My personal idea would be to make it public. I'm not talking about all of it, of course, but some of it. I know that the government doesn't support this position. Will there at least be a central registry?

Mr. Mark Schaan: Thank you for the question. This project is broader than the scope of the bill. The project to improve the system of transparency with regard to corporate profits in Canada involves all the provinces and territories. All the stakeholders agreed to carry out the work in two phases. The first phase, which is described here, requires each company to maintain these records and documents. Investigators must also have access to them. [English]

The second piece of this project is to work with the provinces and territories to identify how we want to move forward with further access, recognizing that in the world of money laundering, terrorist financing and tax evasion, you need a coherent system across all of the corporate registries, because if you only do one, then everyone just re-registers in a potential other jurisdiction.

The second phase of this is to work with the provinces and territories to identify how we would like to be able to share this information and what makes the most practical sense in terms of who should have access and how we should store it. For right now, corporations have to hold it and competent authorities can access it when there's a suspicion and a linkage to an investigation. The second phase is who else and where it should be stored.

Mr. Greg Fergus: ...Seriously, following up on a comment from Monsieur Dusseault, in regard to the 25% significant ownership threshold that we've established, could you speak to some of the other thresholds that other jurisdictions are doing? I'm speaking in particular of what the U.K. and the EU are offering.

Mr. Mark Schaan: I'm trying to remember. Darryl will look that up. In the world of publicly traded corporations, it's a 10% threshold because the feeling there is that the transparency of ownership when it's a share of a publicly traded corporation is of a different order, in part because the transparency isn't so much about money laundering or crime necessarily, but about who potentially has access to the proxy and who can control decision-making.

In the U.K. and the EU it's.... There we go. Ian knows this.

Mr. Ian Wright (Director, Financial Crimes Governance and Operations, Financial Systems Division, Financial Sector Policy Branch, Department of Finance): Within the general world, and within the Financial Action Task Force discussions, it's generally 25%. That's the number that's tossed around, although there are variances. I think that's seen as an appropriate balance between the burden placed upon reporting entities and individuals who fail to report versus the ability to control a company. The ability to get collusion among five, six, eight or 10 individuals is much less of a risk than when you only have to get two or three or four people joined. That said, I think there will be further discussion on that number. A lot of discussion is going on internationally and with our colleagues in other countries on what thresholds are appropriate as the threats and the risks begin to grow.

Mr. Mark Schaan: We did quite a bit of international scanning as we developed this project. The one piece where I think we made a number of improvements, which relates more to the 2018 changes than these, was around the fact that the registry needs to include the actual person at the end of the chain for the beneficial owners.

From the U.K. model, we learned of their requirement to list only the next entity, which means that you end up having to follow a chain of a series of numbered corporations to finally get to the ultimate owner, whereas we've asked corporations to go as far down the chain as they can.

Mr. Greg Fergus: Mr. Chair, I'd appreciate it if Mr. Wright and Mr. Schaan could perhaps send to the committee the latest scan of the international standards from the U.K. and the EU in particular. It was my understanding that they were going to move to a threshold lower than 25%, if not now, then soon.

Mr. Mark Schaan: I could do so.

The Chair: Okay. If you could get us that....You mentioned, in your opening remarks, that there are safeguards for the usage. Could you outline the key three? There is some fear about access out there. We heard that during our hearings.

Mr. Mark Schaan: One is the types of offences the investigative bodies would potentially be able to secure these records for. The schedule of offences is essentially those that have a tie to money laundering, proceeds of crime and terrorist financing. The second threshold is that there needs to be a reasonable nexus between the information and the investigative body. It can't be a fishing expedition. The third is the duty to report. The investigative bodies have to file an aggregate to the director of Corporations Canada so that there can be some transparency as to how often a power is being used and who is using it.

The Chair: Mr. Dusseault.

[Translation]

Mr. Pierre-Luc Dusseault: I'll be brief. You said earlier that, to find the identity of the natural person who owns a company, you sometimes need to go through a whole series of companies, which may own each other, until you can find the owner of the company concerned. This company may be the subject of an investigation.

Take the example of a case where the information isn't accurate. In other words, the company has done everything in its power to discover the identity, but it has made a mistake or it hasn't succeeded because the person concerned doesn't co-operate and disclose their identity. To what extent does the legislation enable us to take action? How does the legislation address this issue? Criminals are unlikely to co-operate and identify themselves at the end of this chain of companies.

Mr. Mark Schaan: That's a good question. It generated a great deal of discussion in the team that helped develop the bill. First, we must establish that this issue is the reason for the two types of penalties. It's not the companies' fault if they fail in their efforts to investigate the people who control the shares in the company. The second important aspect is the incorporation of other tools.[English] This is just one tool. What we've tried to do, across the overall approach to money laundering and terrorist financing, is to create a set of tools that can collaborate with each other, so among the tax authorities and the investigative bodies and the additional resources that have been placed there. You're right. We can't place too much burden on the corporation, because its full-time job is not to investigate, ultimately, who may be shareholders in their enterprise. Its full-time job is to run the company.

This is one more tool for competent authorities, amongst other things such as tax filing, tax investigations and financial authorities. We hope that it's an additional aspect of the overall effort, recognizing that it has limitations but that these can be made up for in other zones.

The Chair: Okay. Thank you. From subdivision A, we will turn to strengthening the anti-money laundering and anti-terrorism financing regime, subdivision B. We have with us Paul Saint-Denis, senior counsel, criminal law policy; Mr. Trudel, director general, specialized services sector; and Ms. Trotman, director, financial crimes. Okay, Mr. Saint-Denis, the floor is yours.

Mr. Paul Saint-Denis (Senior Counsel, Criminal Law Policy Section, Department of Justice): Thank you, Mr. Chairman. The proposal contained in the bill is a very simple one. We are proposing to amend the offence of money laundering with an additional mental element of recklessness. This would mean that this modified offence would have three potential mental elements as alternatives: one of knowing, one of believing and one of being reckless as to the origins of the property that may be proceeds of crime. We believe that, with this amendment, it will be easier for prosecutors to prosecute certain types of the money laundering offences.

The Chair: Okay. Are there any questions on this section? Mr. Fergus.

[Translation]

Mr. Greg Fergus: Thank you, Mr. Saint-Denis. I would like to ask you and your team whether other countries use the recklessness test and what results these countries achieve.

Mr. Paul Saint-Denis: In Australia, I think that the federal government uses the recklessness test when it prosecutes money laundering offences. However, I don't know to what extent convictions for this offence are based on the recklessness test or other tests such as knowledge or belief.

Mr. Greg Fergus: Perhaps I should have asked about the differences between Canada and other countries that have been very successful in their fight against money laundering. For example, does their criminal code contain elements that aren't found in our code?

Mr. Paul Saint-Denis: It should be noted that money laundering is a particularly difficult offence to prove. In particular, it must be demonstrated that the individual knew that the amounts they were dealing with were proceeds of crime. I think we could say that no country is very successful when it comes to this offence.

In Canada, we actually have two possible charges when we believe that an individual has committed a money laundering offence. In addition to the money laundering charge, we have a related charge of possession of property obtained by crime. We'll charge the individual with both offences, but the crown will drop the money laundering charge, which is much more complex, and keep only the possession charge. This charge is easier to prove, and the penalty is the same as the penalty for money laundering, namely, a maximum penalty of 10 years in prison.

However, to answer your question more directly, I can't think of any specific country that has been very successful in its money laundering prosecutions.

Mr. Greg Fergus: I asked this question because, during the study that we conducted last year, we learned that Canada didn't score well in the report of the financial action task force, or the FATF. I wouldn't say that we were the worst, but we weren't the best. I imagine that there are examples in other countries that we could learn from. This was the basis for our recommendations.

Mr. Paul Saint-Denis: It's important to remember that common law applies in Canada. A number of FATF member countries have a civil law regime, where the approach to prosecutions is completely different.

Mr. Greg Fergus: I completely agree. That's why we focused on the United States and the United Kingdom.

Mr. Paul Saint-Denis: When the FATF came to assess Canada's measures to fight money laundering and terrorist financing, we held several discussions on the distinction between the prosecution of a possession offence and a prosecution of a money laundering offence. The FATF is particularly interested in money laundering and terrorist financing. When we explained to its representatives that we institute proceedings for the related offence of possession, they were less interested because the offence wasn't money laundering. Yet these two offences are very similar. In Canada, the crown will opt for the least difficult method to achieve the same result. In other words, the crown will institute proceedings for possession. However, for the FATF, this method isn't ideal. I think that we were penalized because we don't choose the ideal solution, which would be to prosecute for money laundering.

That said, we must nevertheless recognize that money laundering offences are extremely complex. The investigators must have extensive financial analysis expertise, which is very costly. As your committee likely learned during its study, not only was the RCMP reorganized, it also reassigned its staff to focus more on national security issues. Since fewer investigators were available, fewer money laundering investigations were conducted.

As a result, the FATF has described Canada as less than stellar in the investigation and prosecution of money laundering.

[English]

The Chair: Mr. Wright, I believe you wanted in. Go ahead.

Mr. Ian Wright: Yes, maybe I'll add a little bit to that. This change to the Criminal Code is, we feel, necessary, but it's not necessarily sufficient for us to address the broader issues that we have with prosecuting and trying to enforce money laundering and terrorist financing. Budget 2019 has quite an extensive suite of other activities and other funding that we're bringing forward. There's the ACE team. There's this trade-based money laundering centre that's being created. There's funding provided to the RCMP to support the federal policing and funding for FINTRAC.

I think we should look at this as one part of a broader effort by the government to strengthen overall, and hopefully that will then lead to stronger enforcement, prosecutions, investigations and such.

Mr. Pierre-Luc Dusseault: Thank you, Mr. Chair. Obviously, this is a step in the right direction. However, I'm not convinced that it will help catch people who are involved in professional money laundering. It's often a chain of people, as we said earlier. The person at the end of the chain, a money laundering professional, is well protected. They've set up barriers and walls everywhere to protect themselves and to avoid knowing everything that goes on with the offence until the money or proceeds reach them.

Will this really resolve the issue? The person can still protect themselves fairly easily from charges, even with the addition of the recklessness test.

Mr. Paul Saint-Denis: Your observation is fair. Of course, people who engage in professional money laundering are three, four or five degrees removed from the offence that generates the proceeds of crime. We know that. The addition of the recklessness test may help in some cases, even in the case of money laundering professionals.

However, you're right to believe that this tool won't resolve the issue. That goes without saying. However, we believe that this tool will help us in cases where the current tools wouldn't give us the means to successfully institute proceedings.

We hope that this will be a useful additional tool. That said, no single response or legislative amendment will resolve the issue of professional money laundering. The things that we have here will help, but I think that professional money laundering will remain an issue.

Mr. Pierre-Luc Dusseault: We need to find one, however. That's the challenge.

Mr. Paul Saint-Denis: If there were a solution, I'm fairly certain that we would have found it by now.

The Chair: Thank you, both. Thank you, all. We'll turn to subdivision C, the Proceeds of Crime (Money Laundering) and Terrorist Financing Act. Ms. Trotman, go ahead.

Ms. Tamara Trotman (Director, Financial Crimes Governance and Operations, Financial Systems Division, Financial Sector Policy Branch, Department of Finance): I will be dealing with amendments relating to the Proceeds of Crime (Money Laundering) and Terrorist Financing Act, or the PCMLTFA. The first set of proposed amendments would add the Competition Bureau and Revenu Québec as disclosure recipients of the Financial Transactions and Reports Analysis Centre of Canada, or FINTRAC, intelligence. This is intended to support the investigation of tax evasion and mass marketing fraud.

The second set of amendments modifies the timing and the discretion of the director of FINTRAC to make public certain information related to an administrative monetary policy. These amendments will also clarify the information for which confidentiality orders could be issued in an administrative monetary penalty litigation, which would exclude the identity of the reporting entity, the nature of the violations and the amount of the penalty imposed.

Finally, there are technical amendments that clarify terminology and improve readability of the text.

Thank you.

The Chair: Does anyone have any questions? Just to start, can you expand on what mass marketing fraud is?

Ms. Tamara Trotman: Sure. The Competition Bureau has a central role in the fight against deceptive marketing practices and mass marketing fraud, which can include communication via traditional mail, telephone or email. The Competition Bureau included them as disclosure recipients in these proposed amendments to the legislation because they do have a large intelligence-gathering function.

The Chair: Is that also via the Internet, via phone calls?

Ms. Tamara Trotman: That's correct.

Mr. Pierre-Luc Dusseault: My question has to do with the administrative monetary penalties and the issue that was flagged by a court, I believe. The court deemed the process to be overly vague and subjective, saying it lacked clear criteria. Does this remedy the problem?

Ms. Tamara Trotman: Thank you for the question. I'm going to switch languages to answer.
[English] Yes, this is intended to remove the discretion of the director of FINTRAC, so it would make the naming automatic when an administrative penalty has been either issued or following an appeal process. The entity would be named automatically.

[Translation]

Mr. Pierre-Luc Dusseault: It concerns only the naming of the entity. However, does it remedy the underlying issue, in other words, the overly vague and broad nature of the director's discretion? Entities being penalized didn't really know how the director had arrived at the specified amount, finding it excessive.

[English]

Ms. Tamara Trotman: Exactly. The second piece of the proposed amendments would allow for an ongoing court proceeding, and if the courts had issued a confidentiality order, FINTRAC would still be able to name the entity, the amount of the penalty and what it was for.

Mr. Ian Wright: I would also add that outside of this FINTRAC is revamping the process, and they are working on issues around ensuring greater visibility and transparency within how fines are determined and how the process works. That's separate from this. This is just a procedure talking about the naming process, but FINTRAC is working quite actively to address the issues raised by the court in the proceedings you're referring to.

[Translation]

Mr. Pierre-Luc Dusseault: Therefore, the problem still stands. Only part of it has been addressed.

[English]

The Chair: Is there anyone else on this section? Thank you on subdivision C. We'll move to subdivision D, the Seized Property Management Act.

[Translation]

Mr. Nicholas Trudel (Director General, Specialized Services Sector, Receiver General and Pensions Branch, Department of Public Works and Government Services): Thank you, Mr. Chair.

I am going to briefly describe the status quo in relation to the Seized Property Management Act and, then, explain how it will work after the amendments are made.
[English]

Currently, my organization is responsible for administering seized property that's being seized pursuant to federal criminal charges only. There are specific charges for which the act is eligible. These are specific charges under the Criminal Code, the Controlled Drugs and Substances Act and the Proceeds of Crime (Money Laundering) and Terrorist Financing Act. These are very specific charges for which we are able to serve, and this would be upon issuance of a management order by a judge.

The current legislation and the limits that it has prohibit serving cases such as the fraud case that was described pursuant to your question, Mr. Chair.

Also, these criminal cases I think are not static. Although they may start out as a federal criminal charge, as a prosecution proceeds and investigations proceed, what began as an expected federal criminal charge may conclude ultimately in some other outcome: acquittal, a lesser charge, a plea bargain, etc.

The inability to provide services beyond the current scope of the act has some challenges associated with it. Firstly, if we're unable to serve law enforcement as a service provider for the management of these assets, that law enforcement is required to manage the assets themselves. If they are laying charges beyond or haven't laid charges yet, these assets remain with law enforcement to do. That means they spend law enforcement resources managing assets.

Certainly, the uncertainty of outcome from the outset of an investigation through to the end can prohibit the confiscation or seizure of assets or suspect assets. Lastly, as a challenge, it could spell inefficiency, in that we have multiple levels of organizations—provincial, municipal, federal—all maintaining the capacity to deal with seized assets.

The changes to the act would allow my organization to serve any federal public official, provincial public official or municipal public official. We would be able to serve any offence: a specific violation of any provincial or federal law for assets that are connected to an offence, or when assets are believed to be intended for the commission of an offence. It's a much broader ability to support and we'll be authorized to manage and dispose of those assets and provide advice to client organizations.

It would require consent. Provinces, territories and municipalities would choose to use those services. This is not imposed. It's available to them if they so choose. Our minister or his representatives would be required to agree to provide the service, with a mutual agreement between the two of us. They would also need to agree to share the net proceeds, so if the outcome is that a seized asset is forfeited to the Crown and sold or liquidated and costs are recovered—that's how the program is paid for under the current act and how it will continue to be paid for after the proposed amendments—then the net proceeds of sale are shared with the jurisdictions that participated in the law enforcement action. That's also part of the existing regime.

Really, it represents a broadening of who we can offer services to and in what context, but the core function remains as it is today.

The Chair: In terms of proceeds from the sale of assets, is that shared now?

Mr. Nicholas Trudel: Yes.

The Chair: It is shared now and based on an agreement with the provinces or whatever.

Mr. Nicholas Trudel: That's correct. The current regulations, which aren't affected by these amendments, specify the sharing methods, both within Canada and abroad with foreign jurisdictions that participate in a prosecution.

The Chair: Could you give me an example of an asset that would need management? Would it be a yacht or whatever?

Mr. Nicholas Trudel: It's pretty much anything you can imagine. There are two general categories of assets. These are assets that are used in the commission of an offence. These are offence-related properties such as a vehicle used to smuggle, a property used for a clandestine lab, etc., and then there are the proceeds of crime themselves: the cash, the fancy cars, the luxury properties that folks would buy. They also include things such as businesses that can be used to launder money.

Prior to conviction, these assets, although seized, remain the property of the accused, so they need to be maintained. A business may need to continue to be run or a luxury vehicle may need to be preserved in the state in which it was seized. Even a residence may continue to be occupied by the accused while the process unfolds, and that can take years.

The Chair: Okay. Are there any other questions? To the witnesses, if you have anything you want to add, just put up your hand and we'll catch you.

Mr. Fergus.

[Translation]

Mr. Greg Fergus: I have a simple question, Mr. Trudel. Was the amendment added at the request of the provinces and territories so that the government would help them with the disposal of assets?

Mr. Nicholas Trudel: My program staff are very engaged with their provincial and municipal counterparts.

In some cases, we already have mutual aid agreements in place. A number of provinces have signed memoranda of understanding regarding either the management of a particular case or the rules and procedures for co-operation. It's important to understand that a criminal case involving an asset is ever-changing. The process can be initiated with the expectation that it will take place at the federal criminal level, but the outcome can be completely unexpected. The asset may indeed be seized, but by another authority.

Therefore, we need to make sure we dovetail our approaches. The support being proposed is very much in line with the active co-operation that already happens between municipal, provincial and federal police authorities. They, too, work together very closely to determine how best to pursue the investigation.

Mr. Greg Fergus: Thank you, Mr. Trudel.

[English]

The Chair: Are there no other questions?
...

Mr. Greg Fergus: I guess I would try to figure out how we are taking into account, of course, the advent of Bitcoins, or cryptocurrencies, the abstracted term for it. How are we dealing with that, with crypto-wallets and the like?

Ms. Tamara Trotman: We're currently following the previous parliamentary review of the PCMLTFA at the regulatory stage. We're currently developing—

Mr. Greg Fergus: That's the 2013...?

Ms. Tamara Trotman: It was 2012, but yes, that's correct. We're currently in the process of the second phase of regulatory amendments. We're developing regulations related to virtual currencies, which include things like Bitcoin, etc. I guess it was in June of last year, in 2018, that we went out with the prepublication version, and are trying to finalize, before the end of this session, the regulations in that respect.

Mr. Greg Fergus: I have other colleagues around the table who are more adept than I am at understanding cryptocurrencies and that whole aspect. Forgive me if I'm out of my league on this one. It just seems like we're catching up to the last report, of 2012, in 2018. My sense from a lot of the testimony....

Sorry, Kim, you weren't there, but Pierre-Luc and Tom were there, or Dan was there, and Francesco.

I'm just trying to figure this out. There were a lot of demands for us to really try to get ahead of the game, because the market has evolved enormously since six years ago.

Ms. Tamara Trotman: Currently the Financial Action Task Force, which is the international standard-setting body in the space of financial crimes—money laundering, counter-proliferation and terrorist financing—is in the process of developing guidance around what they call virtual “assets”, what we call virtual “currencies”. Our legislation is largely compliant with the direction they are moving in. However, we're coming out in advance of the agreement on that standard internationally. We are slightly ahead of other jurisdictions in that respect.

Mr. Greg Fergus: Very good. Thank you.

The Chair: I believe Mr. Trudel wanted in.

Mr. Nicholas Trudel: To carry on with regard to the question, we've already seen some confiscation of virtual currency. We're dealing with our first case. Part of the benefits of the amendments we're proposing is that we will be able to lend that expertise to other jurisdictions within Canada. You can imagine a small municipality or provincial detachment that comes across a virtual currency confiscation. They may not have the capacity to know exactly how to handle it technically.

That's something we've worked on with the RCMP, in contact with colleagues internationally, in terms of figuring out how best to do this. We know that in some instances the real owner is invisible and not necessarily in Canada, so you can't necessarily lay a criminal charge within Canada. The amendments that we propose here and the expertise that we have, with the other changes that are proposed, would help us to get after these kinds of more complex assets that are used by more sophisticated operators.

May 27, 2019 [Standing Committee on National Finance]
Mr. Francesco Sorbara

Mr. Chair. I'd just like to comment that in the media recently, there has been much talk about the reports recently issued by the Government of British Columbia with regard to money laundering. As a committee, we were tasked to do a five-year review of anti-money laundering and terrorist financing. It was an exhaustive study that we did for a number of months. We travelled here in Canada and abroad. The review is something that the committee was tasked to do and did quite judiciously, and it is something that our government has obviously dedicated resources to in budget 2019.

It concerns all Canadians from coast to coast to coast that Canada has become or is a centre point for money laundering. It's very fitting to see that in budget 2019 we are continuing to undertake a number of measures, which I think all parties would applaud, in terms of fighting money laundering whether with regard to its impact on house prices in Vancouver or Toronto, or with regard to the impact in general of lost tax revenues for our government to fund the services we need.

The proposed amendment would add a reference to compliance agreements in the provision that makes public naming automatic in certain circumstances with respect to violations related to the proceeds of crime, money laundering and terrorist financing.

It's also being proposed that a level playing field be ensured so that all regulated entities that commit a violation will be named, including when a compliance that remains in place between the reporting entity and Financial Transactions and Reports Analysis Centre of Canada, otherwise known as FINTRAC, would also ensure that there is no advantage for regulated entities to enter into a compliance agreement with FINTRAC to avoid naming.

June 10, 2019 [Senate]
Hon. Elizabeth Marshall

...
Honourable senators, I want to say a few words now about money laundering. This issue was referred to the Standing Senate Committee on Legal and Constitutional Affairs, but I was interested in this topic. I was doing a bit of research before that section of the bill was referred to another committee. I want to talk about it and then, later on, I can refer to what the Legal and Constitutional Affairs Committee had to say about the issue.

Honourable senators, in Budget 2019, the government lays out its concerns regarding money laundering. For the past few years, the issue of money laundering has played out in the media in British Columbia. Last year, the B.C. government retained retired RCMP Deputy Commissioner Peter German to conduct an independent review of money laundering in Lower Mainland casinos. His report was released in March 2018.

More recently, two other reports have been released on money laundering in real estate, luxury cars and horse racing. These reports were commissioned in September 2018, following a widespread concern about the province’s reputation as a haven for money laundering.

The first report was from an expert panel on money laundering, which was appointed by the B.C. government to review money laundering in the real estate sector. The second report was from Peter German’s second review into money laundering, focusing on the construction industry, real estate, luxury cars and horse racing.

The C.D. Howe Institute also released a report entitled, Why We Fail to Catch Money Launderers 99.9 percent of the Time. In this report, author Kevin Comeau says that Canada's anti-money laundering protections, especially as they pertain to real estate, are among the weakest of those of Western liberal democracies and billions are being laundered in Canada annually.

In addition, the House of Commons Finance Committee issued a report in November of last year on their review of the Proceeds of Crime (Money Laundering) and Terrorist Financing Act.

The Standing Senate Committee on Banking, Trade and Commerce also issued a report in 2013 titled as follows: Follow the Money: Is Canada Making Progress In Combatting Money Laundering and Terrorist Financing? Not Really.

The federal government has been criticized for not taking enough action to counter money laundering.

Budget 2019 commits $11 million this year and $141 million over five years to the RCMP, Public Safety Canada, Canada Border Services Agency and FINTRAC to strengthen Canada's anti-money laundering and anti-terrorist financing regime.

In addition to the funding, Bill C-97 proposes amendments to the Criminal Code and Proceeds of Crime (Money Laundering) and Terrorist Financing Act.

As I mentioned earlier, this section of the budget implementation act on money laundering was referred to the Standing Senate Committee on Legal and Constitutional Affairs, and I will comment further on this item later in my speech.

June 17, 2019 [Senate]
Hon. Peter M. Boehm

...Our colleague, Senator Marshall, referenced money laundering in her speech. We all know of the report from May out of British Columbia about the staggering amount of laundered money that seeped into the economy of that province last year — more than $7 billion, in fact. Worse still, that places British Columbia fourth, behind Alberta, Ontario, and the Prairie provinces. The report that uncovered the depth of the problem was prepared by British Columbia's Expert Panel on Money Laundering, which was chaired by Professor Maureen Maloney. Evidently, money laundering is a national concern.

The report estimated that, in 2018, $40 billion worth of proceeds of crime seeped into the Canadian economy.

Colleagues, we can surely all agree that, so far, Canada's laws haven't gone far enough in tackling what is a critical issue.
[English]

Senator Wetston and Senator Downe have been especially strong in this chamber on the subject and on the corresponding matter of beneficial ownership. In recognition of the very real impact dirty money has on Canadians — for example, increased house prices — Bill C-97 seeks to strengthen Canada's anti-money-laundering rules. The suite of amendments includes changes to the Canada Business Corporations Act, the Criminal Code, the Proceeds of Crime (Money Laundering) and Terrorist Financing Act, and the Seized Property Management Act.

These amendments, once Bill C-97 passes, will improve timely access to beneficial ownership information; add "recklessness" to the offence of money laundering, which would have the effect of criminally punishing people who, knowing the money might be illegal, moved money on others' behalf despite the potential criminal nature of doing so; add the Competition Bureau and Revenu Québec to the list of entities entitled to financial intelligence information from the Financial Transactions and Reports Analysis Centre of Canada, FINTRAC; broaden access to specialized asset-management services and increase transparency in administrative monetary penalty procedures and clarify confidentiality of proceedings. That last point, covered by clause 111 of Bill C-97, will ensure that any regulated entity found to have committed an infraction under the Proceeds of Crime (Money Laundering) and Terrorist Financing Act will be named publicly, as will their financial penalty, by FINTRAC.

This is an especially important change. We cannot underestimate the power of "naming and shaming" when it comes to ensuring companies follow the rules. In that spirit, just last week, the Financial Services Committee of the United States House of Representatives passed the Corporate Transparency Act. While it still must make its way through the rest of the legislative process, the Corporate Transparency Act is intended to require companies to publicly disclose their true beneficial owners to FinCEN, the United States Treasury Department's Financial Crimes Enforcement Network. Corporations would need to disclose those names as soon as the company is established and would also need to provide FinCEN annually with updated lists of beneficial owners to ensure the public registry is accurate. The intention is to make it much more difficult for criminals and other bad actors to launder their ill-gotten gains through anonymous shell companies.

It is my hope that Parliament will soon look at implementing similar legislation in Canada.

To further combat the far-reaching problem of money laundering here at home, the government very recently committed new funding for the RCMP. Minister of Finance Bill Morneau and Minister of Border Security and Organized Crime Bill Blair announced on Thursday that the RCMP will receive $10 million for improved technology that will help the RCMP with its investigations.

British Columbia's own Finance Minister, Carole James, welcomed the announcement but stressed that there needs to be more of a focus on enforcement.

October 5, 2010 [House of Commons]

Mr. Bob Dechert

Mr. Speaker, I am pleased to speak today to Bill S-9, An Act to amend the Criminal Code (auto theft and trafficking in property obtained by crime). This bill targets property crime, in particular auto theft which continues to cause serious harm to Canadian communities. To this end, Bill S-9 would create a new offence of motor vehicle theft, a new offence to address tampering with an automobile's vehicle identification number and new offences to address trafficking in property obtained by crime.

...

Both the VIN tampering offence and the distinct motor vehicle theft offence would offer benefits to the criminal justice system not offered by the current offence used to cover these activities, "possession of property obtained by crime" found in section 354 of the Criminal Code. A conviction for either of these offences would clearly and more accurately document a person's involvement in an organized vehicle theft ring as part of the criminal record. This, in turn, would help police and crown prosecutors to deal appropriately with these people in subsequent investigations and prosecutions. The House will note that the VIN tampering offence contains an express exception in subsection 353.1(3) to ensure that those individuals who must remove or alter a VIN in the course of legitimate auto repairs, maintenance or modification are not captured under the ambit of this offence.

(1610)

A question was raised in the Senate committee on why this express exception is required when subsection 353.1(1) also contains a lawful excuse defence. I will take a moment to explain how the provision works.

...

Bill S-9 also proposes to create offences to address trafficking and property obtained by crime. The proposed trafficking offences are intended to target the entire length of the marketing chain that processes the proceeds of theft and other crimes like fraud. One form of trafficking in property obtained by crime is the movement of stolen automobiles and their parts. This is where organized crime is most involved in auto theft, either through car- theft rings, chop shops, or re-VINing a car for the sophisticated international rings that smuggle stolen luxury cars to foreign locations.

Currently, section 354 of the Criminal Code, the general offence of possession of property obtained by crime, which carries a maximum of 10 years imprisonment for property valued over $5,000, is the principal Criminal Code offence used to address trafficking and property obtained by crime. This possession offence does not adequately capture the full range of activities involved in trafficking.

Both proposed offences have higher penalties than the existing offence of possession of property obtained by crime. If the value of the item trafficked exceeds $5,000, anyone convicted of this offence could face imprisonment for up to 14 years. If the value does not exceed $5,000, it would be a hybrid offence and subject to imprisonment for up to five years on indictment or up to six months on summary conviction.

In the auto theft example, the trafficking offences would capture all of the players in a chop-shop operation, whereas the offence of possession of property obtained by crime would apply only to those in possession of property such as stolen cars or car parts. In order to avoid detection and reduce the probability of multiple counts in the event of an arrest, chop shops have very little inventory at any given time. It is to be noted, however, that the trafficking offences address dealings involving all property obtained by crime, not just the results of auto theft and chop-shop operations.

I am pleased that the trafficking offences also provide the Canada Border Services Agency with the legislative tools necessary to allow them to detain property, including stolen cars about to be exported from Canada, in order to determine whether they are stolen and to allow the relevant police agency to recover them and take the appropriate action. Bill S-9 is a comprehensive piece of legislation that addresses many of the activities that organized crime undertakes in relation to auto theft and other forms of property crime.

Mr. Thierry St-Cyr (Jeanne-Le Ber, BQ)

Mr. Speaker, I listened to my colleague's speech. Personally, I am quite worried by the Conservatives' approach to crime. The bill before us today deals with the issue of serious and violent crime. Yet at the same time, the government is doing everything in its power to abolish the gun registry, which the police want to have at their disposal because it helps them in their work. This morning we spoke about another bill concerning justice and white-collar crime. This government, just like the Liberal government before it, is refusing to address the issue of tax havens. Even if white-collar criminals are put in prison for a while, if they can hide their money in tax havens around the world and spend the rest of their days living off the proceeds of their crime, it is not much of a deterrent.

Does my colleague have the same worries about the Conservative government's doublespeak and hypocrisy when it comes to justice issues? They play the tough guy and boast that they are tough on crime. But when it comes time to take real measures, and not just change the length of a prison sentence in a bill—and you have to wonder if criminals often read the Criminal Code—that is another story. They need to do more than just grandstand. We need real, meaningful measures to fight crime and, in terms of prevention, measures for gun control and control of tax havens. Is that not doublespeak right there? The government has done nothing in terms of prevention, but it has been very big on repression.

Perhaps what is most modern about the bill is the respect that it gives to vehicle identification numbers.
[Translation]

We believe it is useful to add measures concerning vehicle identification numbers and we would like to discuss this measure in committee. That is the kind of innovative measure that could help combat the problem of auto theft in Canada.
[English]

The obliteration of VIN numbers is a low-risk, high-profit tactic of organized criminal gangs. This provision should help crack down on organized criminal activity, a main source of auto theft in Canada. By denying criminal gangs access to a primary source of funding, the currency of gangs, we can inhibit them from developing their activities elsewhere. The possession of property: to be in possession of a stolen car:
[Translation]

The provision concerning the possession of stolen vehicles is interesting and also merits discussion. That is another measure that could prove to be a useful tool for police forces. We need to be innovative in order to combat criminals who steal vehicles, who themselves are becoming increasingly sophisticated.

October 5, 2010 [House of Commons]

Mr. Marc Lemay (Abitibi—Témiscamingue, BQ)

We need to take action quickly. These vehicles are generally stripped for parts, and are rarely exported. They are exported, but not much. This is where organized crime comes in. These individuals place orders for certain types of motor vehicles, which are then stripped for parts.

The thief is one thing. Yes, he is a criminal, but the ones who place the orders are the worst ones. These types of orders are generally made through organized crime groups. So we must find a way to punish them.

The question was put to Criminal Intelligence Service Canada, and this was its reply:

The Insurance Crime Prevention Bureau has identified an increase in four main fraud techniques that are used by organized crime to steal vehicles. These include: the illegal transfer of Vehicle Identification Numbers (VINs) from wrecked vehicles to similar ones that have been stolen; a legitimate VIN is used to change the legal identity of a stolen vehicle of the same make, model, and colour, a process called "twinning".

Let us consider the example just given. The VIN from a wrecked Honda Civic 1998 can be used for a stolen Honda Civic 1999. This is where we are being asked to take action.

October 25, 2010 [House of Commons]

Hon. Marlene Jennings (Notre-Dame-de-Grâce—Lachine, Lib.)

Thus, with Bill C-26, the government created a separate offence for theft of a motor vehicle, and this offence is also included in Bill S-9. The mandatory minimum sentence for this offence is six months' incarceration for a third offence or in the case of an indictable offence.

This is important because all studies show that motor vehicle theft in certain cities is quite well organized. The evidence from various police forces, including municipal and provincial forces and our national police force, the RCMP, has clearly indicated that to be the case. When someone is on their third such offence, it becomes quite serious. The criminal justice system must therefore send a clear message that this kind of criminal behaviour is unacceptable.

The new offences provide for a broad definition of trafficking. This would cover selling, giving, transferring, transporting, importing, exporting, sending or delivering property obtained by crime or offering to do any of those things.

Thus, the new legislative provisions would target all the middlemen involved in moving stolen property, from the initial criminal act through to the ultimate consumer. That is very important. Of course it happens in other cities, but we know that in Montreal and Winnipeg in particular, most motor vehicle thefts are committed by organized crime groups. This means there is a network of individuals whose only goal and mission is to steal cars. The orders often come from outside Canada, with requests for x number of certain models, for instance, Lexus vehicles from a given year, Chevrolets from a given year, specific models and colours of BMWs from another year, and so on. The crime of motor vehicle theft is driven by the network.

May 6, 2010 [Senate]

Sponsor Hon. John D. Wallace

As I previously mentioned, Bill S-9 has three main components: the creation of a distinct offence of "theft of a motor vehicle"; second, a new offence for altering, obliterating or removing a Vehicle Identification Number, or its VIN; and third, new offences for trafficking in, and possessing for the purpose of trafficking, property obtained by crime, including the importing or exporting of such goods.
...
Why is it that this distinct offence of theft of a motor vehicle is necessary? Property crime, and in particular auto theft, remains an issue of paramount importance for most Canadians. Yes, there has been a downward trend in auto theft rates, thanks mostly to the innovative policing policies and technological advances, but despite that, it still remains one of the highest-volume offences in Canada, averaging about 400 auto thefts per day. Yes, that is correct — 400 auto thefts each day. The goal of this bill is to assist the police in reducing these auto theft rates even further, so that when police apprehend these criminals, the repeat offenders will be incarcerated and removed from the streets.

Auto thefts hit Canadians in their pocketbooks. I know that we have cited the dollar value provided by the Insurance Bureau of Canada many times before, but it is extremely important that it not be forgotten; namely, that the total cost of auto theft to Canadians is approximately $1.2 billion each year. Without a doubt, these substantial costs are ultimately borne by taxpayers, the insurance industry, policyholders, governments and victims.

Auto thefts are often committed as random acts by individual criminals, but increasingly, organized crime is becoming more and more deeply entrenched into the auto theft industry. It is estimated that roughly 20 per cent of all stolen vehicles are linked to organized crime activity. The financial motivation to commit auto theft is high, and indeed the profits made from the theft of motor vehicles form a very substantial source of income for organized crime.

As stated before, organized crime groups participate in the trafficking of stolen vehicles in at least three ways. First, organized crime is involved in the process of altering the legal identity of a vehicle by changing its VIN. Second, they operate "chop shops," where stolen vehicles are disassembled and their parts are trafficked, often to unsuspecting customers. Third, high- end, late model luxury sedans and sports utility vehicles are exported from Canadian ports to foreign locations in Africa, the Middle East and Eastern Europe. Bill S-9 creates new tools that will address each of these unlawful activities.

This first form of criminal involvement — VIN tampering — is a process that involves stripping the vehicle of all existing labels, plates and other markings that bear the true Vehicle Identification Number, and then manufacturing replacement labels, plates and other markings bearing a false VIN that was obtained from imported or salvaged vehicles.

There is currently no offence in the Criminal Code that directly prohibits tampering with a VIN. Like trafficking, the current Criminal Code provision that is used to address VINtampering is the general offence of "possession of property obtained by crime" that is found in section 354 of the Criminal Code.

...
This will be an additional offence, so that a person could be charged with both "possession of property obtained by crime" under section 354 of the Code, as well as the proposed VIN-tampering offence, which in combination could result in a longer sentence.
...
An advantage that both the new VIN-tampering offence and the new distinct motor vehicle theft offence would have over the current offence used to cover these activities — namely, possession of property obtained by crime under section 354 of the Code — is that a conviction for these new offences will more clearly and accurately document, as part of their criminal record, a person's involvement in an organized vehicle theft ring. This will most definitely assist police and Crown prosecutors in dealing more appropriately with those particular offenders in any subsequent investigations and prosecutions.

Finally, Bill S-9 will also create new offences that target the trafficking in property obtained by crime, or the possession of such property for the purpose of trafficking. These amendments are extremely significant, and while my comments to this point have focused on auto theft, I want to be clear that the proposed trafficking offences are intended to target more broadly the entire criminal marketing chain that processes the proceeds of theft and other property crimes, including, for example, fraud.

These new offences will, however, also directly address the present auto theft problem. The trafficking in property obtained by crime includes the movement of stolen automobiles and their parts. This is where organized crime is most involved in auto theft, either through car theft rings, "chop shops" that dismantle stolen cars for parts, the act of "re-VINning" a vehicle to hide its identity, or the sophisticated international rings that smuggle stolen high-end luxury vehicles from Canada.

The new trafficking offence broadly defines trafficking to include the selling, giving, transferring, transporting, exporting from Canada, importing into Canada, sending, delivering or dealing with in any other way, as well as offering to do any of the above, in respect of property obtained by crime. This definition addresses the myriad ways in which criminal enterprises seek to get their ill-gotten gains to the eventual market. Bill S-9 also creates an offence of possession of property obtained by crime for the purpose of trafficking in order to capture this unlawful activity even at its initial stage, where the goods have not yet started to move through the illegal marketing chain.

Some might question why these new offences are necessary when the Criminal Code already prohibits the possession of property obtained by crime. Currently, section 354 of the Criminal Code — that is, the general offence of "possession of property obtained by crime" — which carries a maximum of 10 years' imprisonment for property valued over $5,000, is the principal Criminal Code offence that is now used to address trafficking in property obtained by crime. This possession offence does not, however, adequately capture the full range of activities that are involved in trafficking. The trafficking of property obtained by crime is an enterprise crime, and it is what motivates property crime more generally. With these new offences, Bill

S-9 will be targeting all of the activities that are undertaken by criminal enterprise, and thereby making it considerably more difficult for organized crime, or individuals, to engage in these types of illegal behaviour.

The proposed new trafficking offences will capture all of the players who are involved in a trafficking operation, such as a chop shop, whereas the existing "possession of property obtained by crime" offence applies only to those who are actually in possession of the property, such as the stolen vehicles. By their very nature, operations such as chop shops have very little inventory at any given time in order to avoid detection and reduce the probability of multiple counts in the event of an arrest. These new offences go to the heart of what motivates property crime generally, and are specifically intended to address the entire chain of criminal acts that together yield the financial benefits that ultimately make property crime so lucrative.

Another extremely important point is that both of the proposed new trafficking offences will also have higher penalties than the existing offence of possession of property obtained by crime since trafficking is considered to be a more serious matter than simple possession. ... Honourable senators, it is also important to note that these new trafficking offences will make available to Canada Border Services Agency the necessary authority to allow them to detain property, including stolen cars that are about to be exported from Canada, in order to determine if they are stolen and to allow the appropriate police agency to recover them.

May 26, 2010 [Senate]

Hon. Larry W. Campbell

Honourable senators, I am pleased to speak to you today as the critic on Bill S-9, An Act to amend the Criminal Code (auto theft and trafficking in property obtained by crime). Bill S-9 replicates Bill C-26 as it was passed by the House of Commons in the previous session. As honourable senators will recall, Bill C-26 was being reviewed by the Senate in the last session when Parliament prorogued.

I would refer honourable senators to the speech I made on Bill C-26 on October 29, 2009, as my feelings on this legislation have not changed. However, I will briefly address the main legislative changes that the bill proposes. This bill deals with trafficking, importation and exportation of property obtained by crime, but its main purpose is to target auto theft. This bill establishes the distinct offence of theft of a motor vehicle. It creates a new offence for altering or removing a VIN — the vehicle identification number — and creates new offences for trafficking in and possessing for the purpose of trafficking property obtained by crime. This bill will give law enforcement agencies more ability to target organized crime groups, specifically those who have profited greatly from auto theft crime in the past.

We are all aware that auto theft in Canada is a serious problem. Motor vehicle theft is estimated to cost Canadian taxpayers in excess of $1.2 billion a year, and the dangers involved put their safety at risk. Nonetheless, auto crime has declined substantially in recent years. This is due in large part to the hard work and dedication of Canadian police forces. Our law enforcement agencies have been able to evolve and adapt to changes in criminal activity, and so should our legislation.

I support this bill. It is another good step in the ongoing fight against auto theft in Canada. However, there are some issues I would like to see raised in committee when this bill is studied. Some of the statistics that have been used in the study and discussion of this legislation are not as up to date as they can or should be. We cannot expect our justice system to effectively battle vehicle theft if our legislation is based on old data.
I would also like to see some more concrete evidence to support the implementation of minimum sentencing for third-strike vehicle theft offences. Honourable senators, the changes proposed by Bill S-9 are an important step towards reducing auto theft in Canada. This bill should be sent to committee to be studied without delay.

May 26, 2010 [Senate Committee][Entire Exchange]

Hon. Robert Nicholson, P.C., M.P., Minister of Justice and Attorney General of Canada: With this legislation, the government will update the Criminal Code to address the problems created by complex auto theft rings and other forms of property crime undertaken by organized criminals in Canada today. The bill proposes to create a separate offence of theft of a motor vehicle, which would carry a mandatory prison sentence of six months for conviction of a third or subsequent offence when it is prosecuted by indictment. It will establish a new offence of altering, destroying or removing a vehicle identification number, VIN, and it will make it an offence to traffic in property obtained by crime and make the possession of such property for the purpose of trafficking an offence.

This bill is part of our government's efforts to crack down on those criminals who choose to participate in auto theft and in other aspects of serious property crime. It is painfully clear that organized crime is significantly involved with auto theft in this country.

In recent years, our auto theft rates have remained at unacceptably high levels, while the number of recovered stolen vehicles has declined. This indicates an increased involvement of organized crime in auto theft. Law enforcement experts tell us that when a car is not recovered, organized auto theft rings have likely exported it to a foreign country. It used to be that over 90 per cent of stolen cars were recovered. Today that has fallen to 70 per cent, nationwide, with recovery rates varying by cities.

In large cities in Ontario, Quebec, and Nova Scotia, organized crime groups are believed to be more active in thefts, thanks in part to readily accessible ports, which allow cars to be shipped out of the country quickly and with relative ease. Out of the approximately 147,000 automobiles stolen every year, police and insurance experts estimate that about 20,000 of these cars are shipped abroad.

To this end, the creation of a distinct offence of motor vehicle theft sends a strong message to potential thieves that the criminal justice system is serious about fighting theft in Canada. The government's proposed offence would be a hybrid offence with a maximum of 10 years imprisonment on indictment and 18 years imprisonment on summary conviction.

A distinct offence of motor vehicle theft will help give the courts a better idea of the background of the offender for bail hearings and sentencing purposes. Indeed, this reasoning holds true for the proposed VIN, vehicle identification number, tampering offence that I will discuss in a moment.

Conviction for either of these offences would more clearly and accurately document a person's involvement in an organized vehicle theft ring as part their criminal record. This in turn would help the police and Crown prosecutors to deal appropriately with those people in subsequent investigations and prosecutions.

The theft of a motor vehicle for profit usually involves an elaborate cycle of theft, disguising the vehicle, and resale or export. One of the ways in which vehicles are disguised and resold is through the tampering of the vehicle identification number, the VIN. There is currently no offence in the Criminal Code directly prohibiting the alteration, obliteration or removal of a VIN. Currently under the Criminal Code, those who tamper with VINs are often charged under section 354, the offence of ``possession of property obtained by crime.'' This offence includes a provision stating that proof of possession of a vehicle with a removed or obliterated VIN is, in the absence of evidence to the contrary, proof that the vehicle was obtained by crime.

Organized crime is also involved in auto theft and property theft in general, through the trafficking of property obtained by crime in chop shops or other theft rings that deal with a wide variety of stolen property.

The proposed trafficking offences in Bill S-9 would begin to address these problems. Trafficking in property obtained by crime, along with other criminal activity such as drug trafficking, prostitution and fraud, is one of the many activities that makes organized crime profitable in this country. The bill would make it a crime to traffic in, or possess for the purpose of, trafficking property obtained by crime, including importing or exporting.

Currently, section 354 of the Criminal Code, the general offence of possession of property obtained by crime, which carries a maximum of 10 years for property valued over $5,000, is the principal Criminal Code offence that is used to address trafficking in property obtained by crime. However, this possession offence does not adequately capture the full range of activities involved in trafficking.

The proposed offences would provide a wide definition of trafficking that would include the selling, giving, transferring, transporting, importing, exporting, sending or delivering of goods or offering to do any of the above, of property obtained by crime. This new law would target all the middlemen who move stolen property, from the initial criminal act through to the consumer.

Both proposed trafficking offences have higher penalties than the existing offence of possession of property obtained by crime. If the value of the item trafficked exceeds $5,000, anyone convicted of this offence could face up to 14 years in prison. If the value does not exceed $5,000, it would be a hybrid offence and subject to imprisonment up to five years on indictment or six years on summary conviction. This penalty would be consistent with the existing penalty scheme already in the Criminal Code.

It is also worth noting that if any indictable offence is found to have been committed for the benefit or at the direction of or in association with a criminal organization, an additional offence would apply. It would be open to the Crown to prove the additional element of a link to organized crime and obtain a separate conviction under section 467.12 of the Criminal Code. The maximum penalty for this offence is 14 years, which, as you I am sure are aware, must be served consecutively to any other offence for crime.

The proposed trafficking offences would also respond to the concerns of stakeholders such as the Insurance Bureau of Canada that has long advocated for stronger enforcement to prevent the export of stolen vehicles. Under the Customs Act, in order for the Canada Border Services Agency to apply the administrative powers of the Customs Act to the cross-border movement of property obtained by crime, such goods must first be expressly classified somewhere in federal law as prohibited goods for the purpose of importation or exportation. This bill would supply that classification provision.

Today, Canada Border Services Agency officers are only authorized to examine and detain goods entering or exiting Canada in order to determine whether or not the importation or exportation complies with federal legislation controlling the movement of goods across our borders.

The mandate of the CBSA does not include a broad law enforcement role, and its officers therefore have limited authority to deal with the movement of stolen property. The express prohibition provision in this bill would allow CBSA officers to examine and detain stolen goods, which could ultimately result in the police laying criminal charges. With this proposed amendment, the CBSA officers could identify targets, conduct examinations and detain these goods. They would then search law enforcement databases to determine whether the goods had been reported stolen, and refer the case to the police in appropriate cases.

Depending on where I am in the country, I hear about organized crime chop shops and export schemes that move automobiles and automobile parts out of this country. I hear about the deficiencies in the current law. Law enforcement officials wonder how many people possess the stolen goods. They talk about the chop shops and remark that they may arrest the people at the chop shop but miss many others involved in the crime.

Senator Wallace: As you point out, minister, with this and other bills initiated through your department, there seems to be a focus on organized crime. There are serious issues in the country and we have to adjust the Criminal Code and other laws to adapt to those issues.

I wonder if there is anything more you would like to add in relation to the impact you see this bill having on organized crime. I have recently heard that, on average, 400 auto thefts occur in this country each day. Obviously, many of those thefts relate to criminal organizations. Therefore, I wonder about the impact you hope this bill would have on criminal activity.

Mr. Nicholson: That is part of that message. The face of crime in this country has changed over the last 20 or 30 years. The operations law enforcement agencies are going up against are becoming more sophisticated. I hear this all the time. Crime is becoming borderless, and this is why you have the provisions with respect to Canada Border Services Agency.

It is not just a question of someone stealing a car and trying to sell it to someone in the next town. I pointed out that 20 per cent of these cars are being shipped out of the country; they are gone. This is why they cannot be located.

They all tell me the same thing. They say that even though crime is becoming more sophisticated, the Criminal Code has not been updated in over 100 years. You have to update the laws to respond to the current challenges. That is what they were telling me. If you have any witnesses from the law enforcement side, I am sure they will confirm what I am telling you.

Senator Angus: In your opening remarks, you said the reason behind this legislation is to stop or minimize the theft of vehicles because the laws are not tough enough. Is the prime reason for the great volume of auto thefts the weakness of the present legal regime, or are there other more sinister reasons?

Mr. Nicholson: I think it is a little more complicated than that, senator. Two types of activity are going on in this country, and this bill addresses both of them. On one occasion, we wanted to address one part of it, and then I asked why we are not doing the other, so now we have everything.

We are talking about two types of crime. One is the organized crime that steals a car for the purposes of chop shops, exporting the car or parts, or somehow recycling the stolen car. That is part of it. I have heard loud and clear from law enforcement agencies in a number of major Canadian cities that this is a big problem. As well, I hear from other individuals that there are people who are unsophisticated, not part of organized crime necessarily, that will steal the car and abandon it, steal the car again, that sort of thing. The bill addresses both aspects of that crime.

We have talked at some length about the organized crime part of it, but, again, making it a separate offence allows the Crown attorney to know what they are talking about. I have had Crown attorneys tell me they are not sure what the individual has been found guilty of, and guess what? It is actually more dangerous to steal a car than many times stealing other types of property in this country. Why? Because many times, you are putting people at danger. People get killed when people drive recklessly or are trying to escape detection. Having this as a separate offence allows everyone to know what he or she is dealing with. If this individual has taken the wrong path into the career of serial car thief, the Crown and everyone should know about that involvement.

Senator Lang: I would like you to elaborate on the fact that 90 per cent of the vehicles were recovered a number of years ago and now we are down to 70 per cent, which is significantly different from the point of view of numbers being recovered. We are at 20,000 vehicles being exported from this country at present, in part because of the laws that are in place.

Have the law enforcement agencies that you have spoken to, and the provincial authorities, given any indication to you that with the passage of this bill — and maybe even a tougher bill once Senator Baker gets finished with it — that they will be able to negate the 20,000 vehicles shipped out of this country? Will passage of this bill put a number of the crime rings out of business?

Mr. Nicholson: In my opening comments, I touched on the increased sophistication in this business and that it knows no borders. I commented that there are large-scale operations and the present provisions in the Criminal Code are not adequate to stop these operations. One provision that is very well received concerns the changes with respect to the duties and the ability of agents of the Canada Border Services Agency to intercept property that is being shipped in and out of this country. Senator Angus mentioned containerization. I have heard it again and again that the present laws are inadequate in giving the borders services agencies the ability to look and find out what is going on in relation to what is coming in and going out of the borders of this country. A car in and of itself is not a prohibited good. It is not like an illegal drug or an illegal gun. The laws have to be changed; they have to be updated. I have said to those who work with me putting this together that it is one of my favourite parts of this proposed legislation. I am very interested in the new provisions of the Criminal Code and I am pleased to have this bill. Changing the provisions with respect to Canada Border Services agents — and my colleague the Minister of Public Safety has direct responsibility — is one of my favourite parts of this bill because I have heard it again and again that these cars are being shipped out of this country and the present laws are completely inadequate to deal with this activity.

Caroline Xavier, Director General, Corporate Secretariat Directorate, Canada Border Services Agency: Bill S-9 creates specific offences: the offence of auto theft; the offence of tampering with a vehicle identification number, a VIN; and the offences of trafficking in property obtained by crime and possession of property obtained by crime for the purpose of trafficking. This bill will have a direct and positive impact on the CBSA in that it expressly prohibits the importation and exportation of property obtained by crime.

Senator Joyal: What authority do you have when you suspect that goods going through the border are the proceeds of some criminal activity?

On what basis can you intercept goods you suspect are the proceeds of criminal activity?

Ms. Xavier: There is an export program that exists and it is a part of the agency's mandate. Under the current program, the person must go to the agency or the exit point before going, for instance, to the United States or to the maritime port in order to declare the goods to be exported and the specific information concerning those goods. That will not change.

In the Customs Act now, we have those authorities for our strategic export control. We have a strategic export control program as part of our current Customs Act authorities.

The reporting element required for a consumer or traveller right now will still continue to exist. These authorities will allow us to be able to look at the documentation we are receiving in advance, perhaps, and take more of an investigative lens or an intelligence-type lens to them. We will look at where these goods are destined and be able to work with our police authorities and RCMP partners to determine whether there could be an infraction or a prohibited good.

Right now, if a good is prohibited, such as a stolen vehicle, for example, we cannot detain it. We can only call the local police authority.

Richard Dubin, Vice-President, Investigative Services, Insurance Bureau of Canada: With organized crime so pervasive in the business of auto theft and with the profits so high, it is not surprising that intelligence authorities suspect that terrorist groups may be financing themselves with auto theft. A July 16, 2007, article in The Boston Globe cited the FBI's belief that dozens of vehicles stolen from the United States have been used as car bombs in Iraq. The Insurance Bureau of Canada is aware of approximately 200 stolen vehicles that were shipped to the Middle East as part of Project Globe and another investigation where stolen vehicles were sent to Lebanon.

Senator Wallace: You may know one of the aims of the bill is to deal with the importation and exportation of stolen automobiles. We understand that a significant part of that criminal business, if not all of it, is linked to criminal organizations.

In that context, does your department have any statistics or information you can give us at all about the extent of that illegal trade across the border, not only of automobiles but also of automobile parts that result from chop shop operations?

Mia Dauvergne, Senior Analyst, Policing Services Program, Canadian Centre for Justice Statistics, Statistics Canada: We do not have information specifically on the involvement of organized crime in motor vehicle theft. As Ms. McAuley explained earlier, we can use vehicle recovery status as the proxy measure. Beyond that, we do not have anything at this time.
